
This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

THE GOVERNMENTS OF CONTINENTAL EUROPE.

X. GREECE.

It is impossible, in our historical and classical associations, to separate from modern Greece our ideas of its ancient classic splendour. We cannot divest ourselves of the epics, lyrics, and dramas of her poets, the eloquence of her orators, the wisdom of her philosophers, and the bravery of her warriors. We are, as it were, inspired by Homer. We can imagine Demosthenes rousing into enthusiasm, courage, and patriotism all the energies of the popular assemblies whom he addressed in the most forcible, logical, and eloquent harangues that were ever uttered by man. We can also in imagination enter into the spirit of the Olympic Games, in which the most athletic and dexterous of the Greeks contended more vigorously for honours than they would for their lives—and we, in idea at least, enter upon the triumphal battle-fields and sea-fights which impart splendour to Grecian history. And we should indeed be ungrateful did we not acknowledge the instruction which we have derived in learning, in science, and in art from the ancient Greeks. It was the civilisation of the Greeks which first enlightened and gave poetry, erudition, sculpture, architecture and painting to the Romans. It was to the Greeks that the Byzantine historians and writers owed their education and their knowledge. And it was immediately after the Eastern Empire was utterly subdued by the Turks that Central and Western Europe derived from the Greeks, who fled from Thrace, the benefits which revived learning among the Latins, and which afterwards extended erudition and civilisation to the Teutonic and Celtic nations of the west and north.

But, with the exception of such of those magnificent ruins as have survived the depredations and ferocities, not only of the barbarians of the middle ages, but of some modern Vandals, and the local associations of scenery, with the configuration, unchanged since the days of Herodotus, of the continent and islands of Greece, the traveller amid those classic lands will find little that is agreeable or hopeful, but he will daily encounter that disorder and degradation which generate sorrow and which subdue hope.

About 270 years before the utter subjugation of Greece by the Turks, the latter, after conquering Constantinople, partitioned Greece into feudal lordships, which they distributed among the Normans, Venetians, and French military leaders. Those feudal lords oppressed the Greeks no less severely than did the Ottomans at a subsequent period.

For 237 years—that is, from 1481 to 1718—the Greeks and Turks were almost incessantly at war, contesting every position of Greece. The treaty of Passarovitz ceded to the Porte the absolute sovereignty of all the Grecian States.

The spirit and practice of the Turkish Government—the insecurity of property during a long period, first of the rule of the Latins and afterwards of the Turks, disheartened the majority, rendered desperate, and generally demoralised the Hellenic race. This was not only the case in the Morea and Continental Greece, but especially in the Greek islands.

When the Greeks first attempted their independence, they met with the sympathies of all Christian Europe, and the sincere approbation of all who cherished the spirit of civil, political, and religious liberty. Had the Greeks been trained by education and practice to exercise and to appreciate the blessings of freedom, the hopes at that time of the benefactors of mankind would long ere this have been realised. But, unfortunately, the education and traditions for several centuries—the jealousies and animosities of chiefs, and the diversity of the races of inhabitants, have all been unfavourable to civilisation, and to religious and civil freedom.

The Greeks revolted against Turkish domination in 1821—asserted independence, and proclaimed a Republican Government. A destructive war ensued; the Governments of Russia, France, and Great Britain interfered, and the Sultan was induced to consent to the independence of Greece. In 1827, Count Capo d'Istrias was elected President of Greece for the term of seven years; in January, 1828, he entered upon the duties of his office, and he succeeded in establishing nearly an efficient administration.

Greece was then divided provisionally into thirteen administrative sections; viz., Eastern and Western Greece, Argolida, Arcadia, Laconia, Lower and Upper Messenia, Elida, Achaia, Eubœa, the North and South Cyclades, and the Sporades.

The government was re-organised by the fourth National Congress, which met at Argos in the summer of 1829, Capo d'Istrias still remaining at its head. The Panhellenium, a council of twenty-seven members, was replaced by another body consisting also of twenty-seven members, called the Gerousia, senate or congress. This body gave its opinion on matters of legislation, but had not the power of a negative upon the decisions of the regency. Besides the senate, there was a ministry consisting of four departments, each having a secretary; viz., the home department, foreign affairs, including commerce, the judiciary, public instruction, and ecclesiastical affairs, war, and marine and finances. Three supreme tribunals were also instituted.

In February, 1830, the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, France, and Russia, named Prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg as the hereditary Sovereign of Greece, with the title of "Sovereign Prince." He accepted the appointment, but afterwards resigned it.

Prince Otho of Bavaria was, in virtue of the authority transmitted by the Greek nation to the convention held at London, and by the treaty concluded there in 1832, appointed king, and ascended the throne in February, 1833, with a regency of four persons until he attained twenty years of age, which was on the 1st of June, 1835.

The government was in 1833 divided into ten monarchies; viz., the Morea into five, Eastern and Western Greece into three, and the islands into two monarchies. These were subdivided into eparchies, and the whole into 468 municipalities or communes (Dimoi). Since the retirement of Capo d'Istrias, the affairs of Greece have been involved in financial difficulties, heavy taxations, and commercial restrictions.

The provisional government of Greece adopted liberal and sound principles of commerce and navigation; and if that under King Otho had continued to act under those principles, we might expect that the shipping and trade of this country —so conveniently situated for commerce, although its productions are not very abundant—would, before now, have enriched the population as well as the treasury.

Under the government of King Otho, which is in practice nearly a despotism, not only have many vexatious regulations and restrictions been introduced, but the state-officers and other employés interfere in a manner which in no country but in Spain and her colonies, and to some extent Portugal and Naples, has offered so unworthy an example to the world. Among other vexatious practices are those of absolutely rating the prices at which currants and other articles of export are to be purchased, and of affixing capricious values to augment the duties on commodities. Greece, under these circumstances, certainly does not afford the prospect of attaining financial, political, or commercial prosperity.

The export and import duties have been in practice augmented, so that the contrabandist, and not the treasury, profits by the unwise and impracticable policy; and so stringent are some of the articles of the recent customs'-law that the authorities in the out-ports are ashamed to attempt carrying them into effect.

The export-duties are severely oppressive on the growers of currants and other fruits. The new customs'-law is based upon the principle that "Fraud is the basis of all trade," and that this fraud can only be prevented by a formidable system of penalties and punishments.

The taxation of Greece is certainly grievous in amount, oppressively exacted from the people, and the whole system is ignorantly arranged and worse managed. For so small a population, the whole being under a million of inhabitants, the government is upon too great and too expensive a scale, and the outlay upon palaces and public edifices not only profuse, but unjust; while, at the same time, there is ample cause to suspect that neither economy nor honesty have been strictly observed in any branch of the public expenditure. The Greek loan, and the excess of payments over income, has increased the debt to nearly two and a half millions sterling guaranteed by England, France, and Russia, £600,000 to Bavaria, besides a heavy internal debt; and the expenditure for the three years ending 1852 exceeds the revenue by one-sixth.

If Candia had been annexed to Greece on the revolution, and if a strong, intelligent, and strictly just administration had been established, the natural capabilities of Greece and Candia, and the energy of the people, would have, during the last ten years, rendered both countries rich and independent. Agriculture, commerce, and revenue, would have naturally flourished, the public credit would have been maintained, and neither England, France, nor Russia, would have had to pay the interest of the Greek loan.

The military force of Greece for 1852 consists of 8,603 men, including gensd'armerie, frontier guards, and a small cavalry and artillery force.

The navy consists of two corvettes, of twenty-six guns, two small steamboats, three brigs, seven schooners, five cutters, one royal yacht, two or three packet-boats, and twelve gun-boats. The whole power of this force is insignificant; but the Greeks are admirable sailors.

The whole exports for 1849 amounted to 13,000,000 drachmas, or about £500,000 sterling; and the imports to 20,000,000 drachmas, or about £750,000 sterling. Yet with this miserable commerce, and a country the greater part of which is rendered unfit for profitable agriculture by rocks and mountains, there is a Government, an executive and administrative establishment, consisting of ministers of the interior, foreign affairs, finance, and justice, war, religion and public instruction, all with extensive bureaucratic appointments. The legislature consists of a senate and house of representatives; and although the former constitution of France was in a great degree imitated, there is scarcely a semblance of public liberty in Greece. The legal tribunals are the Areopagus, or Court of Cassation, the royal Court of Appeal at Athens, and the royal Court of Appeal at Neuplia: besides which there are minor courts.

The police, which is the worst in Europe, is under a director-general. There is also a post-master-general, but the communication by letters is slow and uncertain.

Although the Greeks have preserved their ancient language in a much greater degree than the Italians, it is only in Eastern Greece that the Hellenic race predominates; and they are inferior both in chivalry, bravery, and virtue to the inhabitants of Northern Greece, who are chiefly Bulgarians, Wallachians, and Albanians. Out of Greece, however, the Greeks distinguish themselves as mariners and as merchants; and although in their own country they inherit a great share of the mendacity of their ancestors, yet as merchants in foreign countries they are generally faithful in fulfilling their engagements, and they soon accommodate themselves to the customs and morals of the people among whom they reside.

The Court of Athens is the focus of intrigues; and Russia and Greece having the same religion for their establishments, an extensive and intimate connexion subsists between the priests of Greece and those of the Russian empire, which combination, by its influence over a superstitious people, and the ambition of an unscrupulous hierarchy, appears to us to be menacing the statu quo of Turkey in Europe.

THE MYSTERIES OF THE WINE TRADE.

An impression has long existed that a very extensive manufacture of wines is going on in various parts of the world for the special benefit of British consumers. Vague rumours about elder-berry-juice, logwood, cider, Cape, and "brandy-kowe," about mixing, blending, doctoring, and other mysterious processes and ingredients, have been afloat; and curious bits of knowledge which have occasionally come to light have seemed to lend these rumours some confirmation. Thus Mr. Cyrus Redding recalls to mind the amusing incident which occurred in Carlton House, an anecdote now pretty well known, but which, it seems, Mr. Redding first had from Colonel McMahon. How the Prince Regent had in a corner of his cellar a small quantity of remarkably fine wine of a peculiar quality and flavour; how this wine remaining for some time untouched, "the household" thought their master had forgotten it, and to make up for this inexcusable lapse of memory, took upon themselves to drink it nearly out; how the Prince one day, expecting some illustrious connoisseurs to dinner, ordered this particular wine to be served, and thus threw "the household" into a state of consternation; and how one of them hastened thereupon to take counsel with a confidential wine-merchant in the city, who quickly allayed his terrors. "Send me," said this ingenious individual, "a bottle of what remains, and I will send you in return as much wine of that description as you want; only you must take care that what I send is drunk immediately." This advice was followed, and the success was complete. The Prince Regent and his distinguished guests (so the story goes) were delighted with this rare old wine, whose peculiar merits had been so long overlooked. Three or four times afterwards the Prince, whose taste in wine was exquisite, ordered some from the same batch; and on every occasion the confidential dealer had recourse to his private vineyard in his cellar, and "the mixture as before" was forthcoming. This process was continued until "the household," fearing a discovery, thought it prudent to inform their royal master that the stock of this favourite beverage was exhausted.

Another suggestive little anecdote, equally well authenticated, was furnished by the late Mr. Porter, secretary of the Board of Trade. We give it in that gentleman's own words, as reported in his evidence delivered before the Committee on Wine Duties. "An acquaintance of mine," he said, "who invented, some years ago, a substitute for corks, which were made with India-rubber stuffed with wool, was asked if he could make some to resemble champagne corks. He undertook to do so, and was desired to make a small quantity by way of trial. Two days after he had sent them in, he had a note from the parties, requesting to see him; he accordingly went, and they produced a bottle of this quasi champagne wine, with the comment that it was in excellent order; he found it very palatable; but he could not make out how the corks, which he had supplied to them only two days before, could possibly have been used for the corking of champagne wine; and there can be no doubt it must have been all made in this country."

Stories of this kind—and there have been many such—floating about in society, have served to strengthen the prevalent impression, that the wine consumed in England is largely adulterated. The result has been, as many respectable wine-merchants complain, not a little injurious to their trade. "It is spoken of," said Mr. Porter, "as a trade very much altered from the respectable character it used to bear; that persons of inferior moral temperament have entered into it, that tricks are played that would not have been countenanced in former times, that the trade is getting a very bad name and repute, and that by such means, and, as he believed, by the restriction of the consumption arising from the high rate of duties, it is a confined and restricted, and by no means a prosperous trade." On the other hand, some wine-dealers of good reputation have strenuously denied the prevalence of objectionable practices in their trade to any important extent. They admit that wines are frequently "blended," and pretty constantly "fortified" with alcohol; but these, they hold, are legitimate, proper, and useful processes. As to the various methods of manufacturing and cooking wines, which are alleged to be practised, these witnesses deny their existence, or affirm that they are confined to a very small and disreputable section of the trade.

At length, however, the public are enabled to arrive at some satisfactory conclusion upon this interesting question. Among the various engines that have at different periods been resorted to for eliciting the truth on any subject, there is none that will compare for efficiency with a Parliamentary committee. A court of the Inquisition was well enough in its way; but it was not infallibly successful. The rack, the thumbscrew, the iron boot, with an auto da fé "looming in the distance," were powerful pieces of machinery; but it is on record that they sometimes failed to loosen a stubborn tongue, and sometimes extracted from an agonised or terrified witness more evidence than the facts would bear out. A jury-trial, managed by practised counsel, is not amiss; but astute witnesses are occasionally found, capable of baffling the most ingenious cross-examination. A committee of Parliament succeeds in getting at the truth simply by not resorting to any means of intimidation or compulsion. The witness, generally speaking, is not required to reply to any question which he would rather not answer. He may tell as many falsehoods as he chooses to invent, with little fear of being legally called to account for perjury. The consequence is, that the witnesses usually answer every question that is put to them, and never wilfully make a mis-statement. The latter offence would, it is true, meet with instant punishment, of a kind which few men would be willing to endure. The false witness would neither be tortured nor imprisoned; he would merely be sent to Coventry. A quiet smile of contempt would circulate through the committee as soon as the attempted deception was perceived; the courteous chairman would suddenly stiffen into rigid sternness, the examination would be brought to an abrupt close, and the witness would slink hurriedly from the committee-room, with the consciousness that he was a disgraced man for life. But, as has been said, this moral penalty is one that is very rarely, if ever, incurred. There are, of course, in the volumes of evidence on various subjects which every session brings forth, plenty of rash assertions, of biassed opinions, of fallacies and delusions; but probably no statement of fact will be found which the person who made it did not at the time believe to be correct; and facts being what are chiefly required in such cases, it is this circumstance which gives to the labours of Parliamentary committees almost all their value.

The "Select Committee on Import Duties on Wines," which sat last session, collected a large mass of evidence, much of it of a highly interesting and valuable character. Forty-one witnesses were examined, of whom thirty were wine-growers, shippers, importers, or agents of much experience in the business; two were British wine manufacturers, two were licensed victuallers, and the remainder were gentlemen who had had peculiar opportunities, either official or private, of making themselves acquainted with the subject under investigation. The witnesses seemed all to have delivered their minds pretty freely, both on matters of opinion and on matters of fact. A good deal of information was obtained that probably would not have been elicited by any other means. A careful review of all this evidence leads to the rather startling conclusion that very little of the wine consumed in this country is in a natural or wholesome condition. Nearly the whole of it is adulterated, and usually with some noxious ingredient, the most common and the most deleterious being brandy. Before proceeding to adduce some of the remarkable evidence bearing upon this point, it will be requisite to explain, in a few words, the injurious effect of the present import-duties, and especially the manner in which they operate to exclude light and pure wines from the English market.

It is a well-known historical fact that, two centuries ago, much more wine was drunk in this country than at present, in proportion to the population, and, at the same time, a much smaller quantity of spirits was consumed. Wine and beer were then the ordinary beverages of all classes of the people. The importation of wine into this country, in the year 1669, for a population of about 5,000,000, was 90,000 pipes of all descriptions, including 40,000 pipes of French wine. This would be at the rate of two gallons, or twelve bottles (reckoning six bottles to the gallon) per head of the population. The duty was then only fourpence per gallon. In the year 1851, the total importation of wine, for a population of 27,000,000, was but 56,000 pipes, or not quite two-thirds of the importation of 1669; and of this quantity only 4,000 pipes were French wine. The annual consumption of wine is, therefore, at present only about three-tenths of a gallon, or one bottle and a half per head of the whole population—just one-eighth of what it was in 1669. The duty is at present 5s. 9d. per gallon. Let not the sincere advocates of total abstinence imagine that this surprising decrease in the consumption of wine has resulted from, or contributed to, the growth of temperate habits in this country. The exact contrary is unfortunately the fact. Two hundred years ago, as has been already stated, though light wines and beer were consumed in much larger quantities than at present, distilled spirits were comparatively little known. They were drunk in coffee-houses and in the lobbies of theatres, under the name of "strong waters;" in fact, much as "liqueurs" are now taken on the Continent. About the commencement of last century, the duties on all wines were raised for revenue purposes; and, at the same time, from a desire to favour our Portuguese allies at the expense of our French opponents, the duty on the light French wines was made more than double that on the fiery wines of Portugal—the latter paying 2s. and the former 4s. 10d. per gallon. These duties were increased from time to time, until, in the year 1782, French wines paid a duty of 9s. 5d. per gallon, and Portuguese of 4s. 10d. The consequence was, that in the last-mentioned year the consumption of all wines had fallen to about 18,000 pipes, being just a fifth part of what it was in 1669. But the consumption of spirits had, in the meantime, frightfully increased. The common people, debarred by the high price from the use of the light, exhilarating, but not intoxicating beverage to which they were previously accustomed, were driven to supply its place by various preparations of ardent spirits, all about equally pernicious to health as well as to morals. "It was given in evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons, in 1743," said Mr. Porter, "that the quantity of spirituous liquors made for consumption in England and Wales was, in 1733, 10,500,000 gallons; in 1734, 13,500,000 gallons; in 1740, 15,250,000 gallons; in 1741, 17,000,000 gallons; and in 1742, 19,000,000 gallons. These quantities were consumed by a population not exceeding 6,000,000, giving three and one-sixth gallons for each individual in 1742. There were then more than 20,000 places within the bills of mortality in which gin was sold by the glass. About that period there were very stringent laws passed for the prohibition of the sale of spirits, which were evaded by a variety of means; in fact, it was found quite impossible to enforce the Gin Act, as it was called. Within less than two years from that measure passing, namely, in March, 1738, there was a proclamation issued to inforce the Gin Act. Within less than those two years, 12,000 people had been convicted under the Act within the bills of mortality; of these, 5000 had been sentenced to pay each a penalty of £100, and 3000 others had paid £10 each to excuse their being sent to Bridewell House of Correction. But these proceedings entirely failed, and, subsequent to and including that period, the consumption of spirits was as I have stated to you. It was considerably greater in 1741 and 1742 than it had been in 1738, when that proclamation was issued."

Such were the consequences which followed the imposition of a duty upon wine so high as to withdraw it from the consumption of the mass of the people. At the present day, owing to the improved habits which prevail, and more especially to the introduction of tea and coffee into common use, the consumption of spirits is less than it was in the middle of the last century. But it is still disgracefully large, amounting to nearly one gallon per annum for every man, woman and child in the United Kingdom. This is five times the quantity of wine that is consumed; and each gallon of spirits, it must be recollected, contains at least seven times the quantity of alcohol which is contained in a gallon of the light wines of France. The effect produced by the high duties which place these wines out of the reach of the common people, in extending the consumption of spirits, has been especially marked in the case of Scotland. That portion of the United Kingdom has, at this time, a bad pre-eminence for the quantity of distilled liquors consumed by its population. Yet, in former days, previous to the union with England, this was not the case. When French wines were admitted at a low duty, they were abundantly imported, and were largely consumed by the very parties who, when prevented from indulging their taste for this favourite cordial, betook themselves to spirits as the only substitute that was to be had. There was a time when it was common to see, in the mansion of a country laird, the cask of claret on tap and free to all comers, like the ale-barrel in an old-fashioned English farmhouse. Mr. Redding says that he "was told by the late poet, Thomas Campbell (his father was born in 1710, and, consequently, the statement goes back a great way), that his grandfather told him they fenced in garden, field and paddock, with claret-staves." Those who deprived the Scottish people of what was once their national beverage are responsible for the serious deterioration of the national morals in point of temperance which afterwards took place."*

Another consequence of the imposition of these high duties is that the consumption of wine in the United Kingdom has been directed almost entirely to the very strong and spirituous descriptions, such as highly-brandied ports, sherries, Madeira, and Marsala. The reason is obvious enough. When wine is made costly, people must buy that kind which will "go farthest." A single bottle of strong port or sherry will serve for four or five persons, who would perhaps consume half a dozen bottles of ordinary French wine. The latter quantity, under the present duty, would cost twenty or thirty shillings, while the bottle of spirituous wine would be obtained for four or five. Of course, most persons prefer the stronger wine, not as a matter of taste, but as a matter of economy. If the light French wines could be obtained in this country, as at Hamburgh and other German seaports, for eighteenpence or a shilling a bottle, they would certainly be preferred to the fiery compounds which are now consumed under the names of port and sherry.

We are thus brought to the causes which lead to such extensive adulteration of wines for the English market. So long as wine is dear, it must be had strong. Consequently, wherever in any part of the world a district is discovered producing wine which is naturally of great strength, it is appropriated to the supply of British consumers. There is one such district in Portugal, in the valley watered by the Upper Douro; another in southern Spain, around the town of Xeres de la Frontera; a third in Madeira, and a fourth on the Western coast of Sicily. Of course the greater the natural strength of the wine, the larger will be the infusion of alcohol which it will bear. Wine-growers and wine-dealers, finding that the demand in Great Britain is for very strong wines—simply because such wines will "go farthest," and thus be cheapest to the buyer—are accustomed to add large quantities of spirits, both before and after the wines are imported into this country. Then, to disguise the flavour of the spirits, other ingredients are added. And, finally, to supply in some measure the demand for cheap wines, various other mixtures are manufactured in which the genuine juice of the grape is only one of the several "raw materials" employed.

* A remarkable example of the effect produced by the opposite system is presented in the case of Liberia. The founders and rulers of that colony have been especially anxious to foster habits of sobriety among the settlers. With this object, a high duty has been imposed upon distilled spirits, while French wines are admitted free. The result has fully answered the expectations of the law-makers. Several writers who have recorded their impressions of the colony, take particular notice of the temperate habits which prevail among all classes of the community. A respectable Liberian colonist, Mr. Roberts (brother of the president) stated at a public meeting at New York, a few weeks ago, that he knew of but two drunkards in the settlement. Of course, higher influences than any mere fiscal regulations have been at work to produce such a state of things. But if, instead of a system which gives them cheap wines and makes spirits costly, the Liberians had adopted such a tariff as exists in Great Britain, it may be doubted whether churches, schools and "temperance societies" would have been more effectual in promoting good habits on the coast of Africa than in this country.

With these preliminary explanations, we may proceed to give some account of the mysterious processes which the liquids by courtesy or custom termed "wines," undergo to prepare them for this market. Taking the several varieties in due order, we commence with that illustrious beverage, "good, honest, old English port," as one of the witnesses affectionately termed it. On this subject we have, in the first place, the evidence of Mr. Joseph Forrester, a gentleman who has been twenty-two years engaged in growing and shipping Port wines, and who is laudably anxious that the duty should be lowered, in order that lighter and more wholesome wine may reach the British consumer, and that the injurious practices of adulteration may be prevented. From this unexceptionable testimony it appears that by the present Portuguese law no unsophisticated port wine is allowed to reach this country! When an Oporto merchant desires to ship a pipe of pure wine, he purchases of a farmer a "permit," which has been obtained for shipping a pipe of the sophisticated wine, and, by a species of what is considered allowable smuggling, substitutes his good wine for the doctored wine, which alone the law allows to be exported. The following are the terms in which Mr. Forrester made this important statement:—"If the wine be unsophisticated, as a matter of course by law that wine is not permitted to come to this market; the law distinctly prohibits its being shipped thence; as the wine is intended by the merchant for this market, he purchases from one whose wines have been allowed a permit, and with that permit substitutes his unsophisticated wine, and loads that down to his stores at Oporto." The purchase of this permit, it is stated, increases the cost of the wine by about £3 a pipe. The prime cost of a pipe of good port wine, in the farmer's hands, is, it appears, on an average, about £11. This wine, at a duty of 1s. a gallon (about £5 10s. a pipe), could be sold in this country at 10d. a bottle. At present, however, it has to pay export-dues in Portugal amounting to about £7 a pipe, and an import-duty in England amounting to about £33 a pipe. The shipper, who pays the export-duty, must, of course, have his profit upon that, as well as upon the original cost of the wine. The wine-merchant, who pays the import-duty, must in like manner obtain a fair return for his money; and the result is that the wine is thus raised in cost to about 4s. the bottle—of which 1s. goes to the Imperial Treasury, and the rest to the Portuguese Wine Company, or into the pockets of the dealers.

Now, to make wine saleable at this excessively high price, it is necessary that it should be an exceedingly strong wine, so that a little of it may go a great way, either when taken unmixed, or when "blended" with other wines. The Portuguese authorities, being aware of this necessity, have established the law that no wines shall be imported from Portugal to England but such as are very "black, sweet, and strong," possessing sufficient body, flavour, colour, and richness, to qualify them for use in doctoring other wines. "The Portuguese Government," says this witness, "consider literally that port wines are not known or drunk as port wines, but really are used simply for making up artificial wines in England." In this opinion the Portuguese Government cannot be very far wrong, if it be the fact, as is stated in another part of these minutes, that although only 20,000 pipes of port wine are imported into this country, 60,000 pipes of what passes for port are consumed by our population. Concerning the manner in which these essential qualities of blackness, sweetness, and strength, are secured, Mr. Forrester gives the following explanation:—"If the fermentation of the grape-juice were allowed to have its full course, sufficient colouring matter would be extracted by that process from the skins or husks of the grapes which are thrown in with the juice. "But," says Mr. Forrester, "in order to produce the other two qualities, namely, the strength and sweetness, the fermentation is sometimes, and very frequently, checked; by which, as the wine is not properly attenuated, the saccharine matter is not converted into its proper alcohol, and the residue of this unconverted saccharine matter remains suspended in the imperfect wine: and hence, to prevent a reaction, when the deposit takes place, brandy must be thrown into it to prevent that reaction, as well as to give it the strength and the body that is ordained by law. If any further colouring matter be absolutely requisite by the speculator—I would not suppose by the merchant (for the merchants generally do not like, unless they are obliged, to sell very common wines, and do not like to have recourse to these practices)—then the elderberry is, I believe, the only dye made use of in this country, and costs an enormous sum of money." Mr. Forrester is naturally disposed to deal tenderly with his friends the merchants; but as the only object of thus colouring the wine is to make it suitable for exportation to England, it is clear that the whole, or nearly the whole, of this large quantity of elderberry juice, for which "an enormous sum of money" is paid, goes down English throats. The sum of Mr. Forrester's evidence on this particular point may be thus stated. By the Portuguese law, there are required to be united in all wine that is exported to England three qualities, namely, blackness, sweetness, and strength, which are rarely found together in the wine in its natural state. To produce these qualities artificial means are resorted to. The necessary sweetness is obtained by checking the fermentation, which, of course, leaves the wine in an imperfect and unwholesome state; the strength is given by the addition of spirit; and the colour is communicated by elderberry. It appears, therefore, that the port which is brought directly from Portugal (leaving out of view that which is manufactured in England) is, in fact, not wine, but a compound of brandy, elderberry, and half-fermented grape-juice. Some wine of a more genuine character is, indeed, exported under the illegal though tolerated system already noticed. But even this has invariably a large infusion of brandy, of which a small proportion is sufficient to spoil the best wine.*

According to the evidence of several witnesses, large quantities of wines from other countries—France, Spain, Sicily, and the Cape—are sold here as the produce of Portugal. Considering the character of the "genuine" port wines, one might be induced to suppose that such a substitution would be rather an advantage than otherwise; but it must be remembered that in order to make these substituted wines pass muster for port, they must be well doctored, and possibly with some deleterious ingredients. The consumer may think himself fortunate if he escapes with nothing worse than elderberry, sloes, or logwood. The substitution of other wines for port was, it seems, practised in the days of our grandfathers quite as extensively as at present. One witness, who has been engaged for many years in importing "Masdeu," a red wine from Roussillon, told the following curious story:—"When I got to the port of shipment (Port Vendres) I found very extensive warehouses constructed; and as it was in a very outlandish place, with not more than two hundred and fifty inhabitants in the port of shipment, that struck me as very remarkable. I inquired why those warehouses were built, and I was told that they had been built by the proprietor's father. (The present proprietor is now in his 84th or 85th year.) I inquired for what purpose the father had built them, and I was informed he had built them in connexion with a countryman of my own, a Mr. Ireland. 'Had I ever heard of Mr. Ireland?' My answer was no. But upon further inquiry I was told Mr. Ireland and his (Monsieur Durand's) father had had large transactions in wine, and that Mr. Ireland stated that he wanted a wine for the supply of the troops and the navy. I inquired if it was fine old wine he wanted, or such wines as were usually supplied to the troops and the navy, and I was told fine old wine. Upon my return to this country I went to the late Mr. George Hathorn, than whom a more respectable man never existed in any trade; being a very old man, I inquired if he had ever heard of Mr. Ireland. He said, 'Yes; he recollected Mr. Ireland had commenced life at Bristol in a very obscure position, and died one of the richest men in it.' 'What course of trade did he follow?' 'He was an importer of red wines.' 'Port wines?' 'Port wines.' 'What reputation had his wines in the market?' 'They were of the highest class.' Yet, he could not tell why—it was not from any want of funds—but all at once the house suspended its operations. I supplied the wanting link: he could get no more Roussillon wines, as the first French revolution hindered him."

Thus our deluded progenitors, while they imagined themselves drinking port, were in fact consuming Roussillon wines, and that in such quantities as to make the fortune of the ingenious importer. What particular means and appliances he employed in the process of transmuting French wines into Portuguese will probably never be known. Whether the elder and the sloe are found to thrive in the neighbourhood of Bristol, or whether there were large importations of Brazil-wood and catechu into that city about a century ago, are delicate points which it is needless to investigate at this time. All that can be said is, that a whole generation of our grandsires went down to their graves under the pleasing impression that they had been drinking port all their lives, and a good many of them were mistaken.

The next wine on our list is, of course, sherry; and in reference to this we have, from an equally competent witness, evidence curiously similar to that which Mr. Forrester has borne respecting the famous produce of the Douro. Dr. J. Gorman, who has resided for many years in Spain, and is "perfectly well acquainted with the produce of the district of Xeres de la Frontera," asserts distinctly and positively, in so many words, that "no natural sherry comes to this country." Even the chairman of the committee, who was tolerably well versed in the mysteries of the trade, was a little startled by this assertion. "None at all?" he exclaimed. "None whatever," replied the experienced doctor; but then, correcting himself, he added, "It rarely happens. No wine-house will send it to you; your demand is for wine to suit an artificial taste, and you send out your orders—that is, the wine-merchants in England—and they confine the exporters there to certain marks, numbers, classes, and qualities of wine, and the article you get is a mixed wine."

* Since the above was written, a decree of the Portuguese Government has been published, making some important alterations in the system by which the export of wine is regulated. The monopoly of the Wine Company is abolished, and the export-duty is reduced from 12,000 reis per pipe (about £2 18s.) to 2,400 reis, or about 10s. 6d. Wines of the "second quality," which were formerly not allowed to be shipped to England, and could only be exported to countries out of Europe, are now placed on an equal footing with wines of the first quality. But an absurd and injurious distinction is still made between exportable wines, and wines which may not be exported. Wines of the "third quality" are included in the latter class; and these are the very wines which the advocates of a low import-duty desire to see introduced into this country. "The third quality," says Mr. Forrester, "is a simple light wine, with little body and colour, but which is admirably adapted for table-drinking, off draught, and may be shipped with little or no brandy at a very cheap rate. This," he adds, "is the only wine used to any extent, from royalty to the peasant, in Portugal." What would be said if the English Government, under pretence of desiring to preserve the high reputation of British cotton, linen, and woollen manufactures abroad, should forbid the exportation of any but the more costly descriptions, and should class as "not exportable" the very kinds which are commonly worn by all classes in this country? A statesman who should propose such a measure would be regarded as insane; yet this is actually the system established or maintained by the improved and "liberal" regulations recently adopted by the present Portuguese Ministry. On the other hand, the Portuguese statesman may retort, and with perfect truth, that until the equally irrational and restrictive wine-duty of England is reduced, no alterations that may be made in the Portuguese system will render it possible to introduce cheap, light, and pure wines into Great Britain.

"What is the difference," asked the chairman, "between the strength of the genuine wine and the strength of the artificial wine?"

"The quantity of natural alcohol," answered Dr. Gorman, "which all good sherry wines contain is about twelve per cent; the strength of the mixed wine will depend upon the quantity of brandy which the exporter may deem necessary to add in addition to the innate spirit. I believe they put as much as six or eight gallons of brandy to a butt of wine—one hundred and eight imperial gallons. There should be none whatever; that is an adulteration."

From this well-informed and outspoken witness we get also the interesting information that "there is a place at Cadiz called the Aguada, where inferior wines are received from various parts of Spain for the purpose of mixing with sherry, to be shipped to this and other countries as sherry wine; but the wine from the Condado de Niebla is preferred to any other class for mixing with it. This is a very inferior wine; a perishable wine. It will generally get decomposed before the third year has passed, unless you throw a large quantity of brandy into it."

Such is the authentic account of sherry, which has been the English favourite wine since George the Fourth brought it into fashion.

The consumption of Madeira has fallen off a good deal, owing, it is commonly supposed, to the social ban under which the "First Gentleman of Europe" was pleased to place it; but Mr. Oliveira, M.P., supplies us with another reason which seems likely to have been more efficient in bringing it into disrepute—namely, the general character of acidity which the wine has gained of late years, and which "arises from prematurely, and by chemical means, turning new wine into old wine through the medium of great heat." This is done "in the establishment called the 'Estafa,'" or hothouse, into which the new wines are placed at once, bricked up, and kept at a temperature of one hundred and thirty degrees for three months. The wine subjected to that operation changes its character, and becomes a spirituous compound, which again is mixed with fine wines, which are shipped (he believed) in large quantities as the regular Madeira wines.

Mr. Maire, a French wine-grower and shipper, gives a similar account of Burgundy. "Whenever science or chemistry have come to our rescue," he affirms, "they have done us more harm than good. The great chemist, Count Chaptal, advised the growers in Burgundy to counteract the inclemency of the seasons by putting sugar upon their vats. He advised them to go on very moderately, for I think the quantity was only 1 lb. per hogshead of grapes. This trial answered so well, that from 1 lb. they had increased to 30 lb. per hogshead; and the effect is, that those wines, being loaded with additional sweetness, and not having the other properties which belong to wine and form wine, there is an excess in the fermenting, and, in fact, they destroy themselves by continual fermentation. That unfortunate discovery has been almost fatal to Burgundy, perhaps, all over the world, except in the northern climates, where the cold weather keeps them together; but in England the climate is exceedingly ungenial to keeping the Burgundy wines, except the best." "This sugar," Mr. Maire explained, "has a double property. First, it increases the fermentation, and by that means increases the colour, and increases the flavour, and gives flavour to the wine. It was opening the door to frauds; there was a fine field for imposing upon the people. The result was, that those wines lost their name everywhere, and with it their consumption."

It is needless to go any farther into this part of the inquiry. The foregoing may be taken as fair samples of the curious disclosures which were made in the course of the investigation. The simple fact is, as has already been stated, that the high price of wine, caused by the excessive import-duty, has created, not a taste, but an economical necessity for a very high-flavoured and stimulating wine. When these qualities cannot be obtained in the natural vintage, which is usually the case, recourse is had to artificial means. The fermentation is checked too soon, or is increased to excess, or the acid of the wine is dissolved by heat; and in all cases, to prevent farther decomposition, and to increase the strength and intoxicating power of the wines, large quantities of alcohol are added to them. What we drink in England is not, properly speaking, wine. It is "brandy-and-wine;" a mixture which differs in nature and effect from the pure juice of the grape almost as widely as brandy-and-water differs from pure water. The light and unsophisticated wines, in the state in which they are ordinarily drunk on the Continent, do not injuriously affect either the stomach or the head. People do not acquire a craving for strong liquors in consequence of drinking them. When taken, as is the common custom, well qualified with water, they are not more stimulating than strong coffee or tea, and, perhaps, are more wholesome than either of those beverages. The natural taste of the inhabitants of the British islands has always inclined to those light, pleasant, and salubrious wines. With a low duty, they would undoubtedly come into general consumption, displacing a large proportion of the highly-brandied wines, and probably some of the spirits that are now consumed. Our ports, sherries, and other strong and fiery wines, are in fact little more than spirituous liquors under a costly and genteel disguise. It is not surprising that many persons, finding their choice confined to a few stimulating liquids, all strongly alcoholic, should select those which are at once the cheapest and the purest, and should prefer plain gin and brandy to the dearer and, perhaps, more deleterious compounds which pass with us for wines. The better way would be, until our legislature allows us to drink genuine wine, to consider all those intoxicating liquors as equally pernicious, and to avoid them all.

The curious developments which were obtained in respect to the custom of vatting or "blending" wines and the manufacture of domestic wines, ought not to be left entirely unnoticed. It appears that it is a common practice, when a merchant has several parcels of different wines in the docks, which separately and under their proper names do not suit the public taste, to have them all started together into a vat, usually with a quantity of brandy added, and see what will come of it. The mixture thus created is sold as port or sherry, according to the character of the predominating ingredients. The following is a specimen of what may be called the "London Dock port-wine vintage of 1850:"—

963	gallons	Sicilian	wine.
1,766½	"	French	"
2,604	"	Spanish	"
1,419	"	Port	"
394	"	Cape	"
1,620	"	Mixed	"
205	"	Brandy	"

Total 8,971½ gallons in one vat.

There is another still more miscellaneous mixture, taken from the books of the same public establishment.

89	gallons	Italian	wine.
28	"	Port	"
557	"	French	"
62	"	Madeira	"
53	"	Marsala	"
14	"	Unenumerated.
371	"	Spanish	"
448	"	Canary	"

Total 1,666 gallons in one vat.

There is a formal rule of the dock companies, making a distinction between wines which are to be blended for home consumption and those which may be mixed for exportation to British colonies and foreign countries. The former must be all the produce of one country, while the latter may be of different countries. Practically, however, the regulation is of little effect. The wines which are mixed for exportation are in many cases merely sent to a short distance, as, for example, to the Channel Islands, or to Hamburgh, and thence reimported under their new names into this country. The committee seemed to take a particular interest in this part of the investigation, which certainly leads to some important conclusions, as will be seen from the following portion of the examination of one of the witnesses.

The Chairman to Mr. Ridley.—"This wine, which you say is vatted for exportation, not for home consumption, is it bonâ fide exported or not?" "The wines mixed in that way must be for exportation; the Custom-house would not admit them for home consumption."

"Is it bonâ fide?" "It is bonâ fide red wine we have spoken of, and it has been exported to the Channel Islands."

"And brought back?" "Yes."

"Then it is not bonâ fide?" "No; not bonâ fide."

"My question is, is it intended for foreign consumption, or for home consumption?" "For home consumption."

"It is exported for the purpose of home consumption?" "Yes."

Mr. Villiers.—"Exported to some place from which it is to be imported?" "Yes."

"And the officer does not take any notice of this stuff called port wine?" "Just so."

Mr. Jackson.—"A witness from the St. Katherine's Dock, Mr. Wright, has stated that eight pipes of port, six from Hamburgh, two from St. John's, and other small parcels of port wine, had been blended in the vatting establishment of the St. Katherine's Dock; that the duty has been paid, and it has gone forth for home consumption as port wine?" "Yes."

"It appears, therefore, that whatever wine comes from any foreign port to this country, and is entered as port wine, is admitted as such, notwithstanding it may have never been in Portugal?" "Just so."

"Any description of red wine, of the same quality and description as red [qu: port] wine, is received by the customs as port wine, suffered to be blended with wine from Oporto, and duty is paid upon it, and it is sold to go to the public as port wine?" "Just so."

"It is by this process that the 20,000 casks suffered to be exported from Oporto to this country became 60,000 casks for the use of the consumer?" "It would give that increase."

According to this statement, the chances are three to one that a person who drinks what he supposes to be port wine, in this country, is, in fact, not drinking even the "sophisticated" produce of Portugal, but a mixture of a great variety of wines, each of which has perhaps been separately doctored in its own country, while the whole compound is "fortified" by an additional infusion of spirits in this country.

The two manufacturers of British wines who were examined gave some interesting evidence concerning that branch of British industry. It appears that the products of this manufacture are of two classes. The first includes what may properly be called domestic cordials, such as ginger, currant, raspberry, cowslip, and elder wines; the second comprises imitations of foreign wines, and more particularly of port, sherry, and champagne. The total annual produce of this home-manufacture is estimated, at present, at 600,000 gallons—a quantity equal to one-tenth of all the wines imported—and it is increasing every year. One of the witnesses stated that about one-third of his sales consisted of British port, sherry, and champagne. He sold them as British wines; but it may be taken for granted that they were afterwards retailed to consumers as foreign wines. Their components were French and Spanish raisins and spirits. The other manufacturer sometimes added a portion of Cape and pontac, or "the bottoms of foreign wines, the Oporto and Spanish wines." Others have used different methods. Mr. Redding quotes from the "Victualler's Guide," a work which has gone through four editions, a valuable receipt for making port wine of the following ingredients—"forty-five gallons of cider, six of brandy, eight of port wine, two gallons of sloes stewed in two gallons of water, and the liquor pressed off." If the colour is not good, tincture of red sanders or cudbear is directed to be added. This may be bottled in a few days. The receipt goes on to say—"A teaspoonful of powder of catechu being added to each, a fine crusted appearance on the bottles will follow quickly." The ends of the corks being soaked in a strong decoction of Brazil wood and a little alum will complete this interesting process, and give them the appearance of age. Oak-bark, elder, Brazil wood, privet, beet, and turnsole (adds Mr. Redding), are all used in making fictitious port wine.

The conclusions which may be drawn from the whole of this very curious and important evidence appear to be, (1), that nearly all the wine imported into this country is previously adulterated with brandy or other deleterious infusions; (2), that most of the liquids consumed as port and sherry in this country are spurious mixtures of various wines and spirits, or else are wholly manufactured in Great Britain; and (3), that the sole cause of these adulterations and frauds is to be found, not in any depraved taste of the English people, nor in the character of the wine-dealers, but in the excessively high import-duty, which prevents the importation of light and genuine wines, suited to the natural taste of the people. Until this obstacle is removed, persons who have a regard for their own health and comfort will do well to abstain altogether from the mixed, spirituous, and noxious beverages which are now commonly vended under the name of wine.

NORMAN HAMILTON.

CHAPTER XXX.

EFFORTS.

Florence Hamilton went in search of her brother, in order to consult with him as to the best method to be followed in carrying out the hint of Mr. Erskine regarding the removal of Buchanan and his servant previous to the day of trial. Henry Hamilton consulted in turn with his fellow-clerk, Torry; and the issue of their deliberation was, that the most eligible party to accompany the young lady in her singular mission would be Character Cook. In the first place, the fidelity of Character could be depended on; in the next place, he was personally acquainted with Buchanan, as well as with his wife and daughter; and as the dogged nature of the publican was well known, it was further conjectured that a party in his own sphere of life was more likely to influence him than one above it. Florence was, in taste and mind, essentially sensitive; and she shrank momentarily from an embassy where so grotesque an individual was to be her sole companion; but the stake at issue was so overwhelming that her doubts were but as a passing hesitation in her own mind, not tangible enough for a verbal utterance. She was soon, also, to ascertain that under an eccentric exterior Character Cook concealed an honest and guileless heart.

Henry undertook to apprise Cook as to the nature of the business he was to be asked to engage in, and to arrange as to what spot the hackney-coach ordered for Florence should take up the leather champion. There was nothing that Character thirsted for more than notoriety; and the mere circumstance of any given act being removed a few points of the compass from the letter of statute law, so far from deterring him from the commission of such act, only incited him to the more speedy perpetration of it, in the hope that it might tend to the producing of the coveted popularity. Henry, fully aware of this peculiarity of his friend, took care to magnify the danger of the object in which he proposed to enlist his services; and this, as a matter of course, whetted the desire of the chafed patriot to engage in the hazardous employment.

"Get Buchanan to leave the country! By jingo, I'll get him to do that by hook or by crook; and, if he doesna, let him look to his ugly lugs. It's the least he can do; he's driven his dochter daft wi' his obstinacy already. Did ye say that the coach was to be at the head o' Leith Walk at three o'clock? Weel, I'll be there. But stop, noo; will it no be better for the like o' me to tramp, instead o' riding in a coach wi' a grand lady like your cousin?"

"Nonsense; you must go in the coach; you would miss each other unless you went together. I shall be waiting you at the foot of Leith Wynd."

"This will astonish Babie," ejaculated Character to himself as Hamilton left him.

Boswell records that when Dr. Johnson was going out to dinner for the purpose of meeting Horne Tooke, he called out to his servant, Black Frank, to get ready a clean shirt for him. Will the classical reader excuse me if I take this indirect method of announcing that certain changes took place in the outer man of Character Cook of a similar description?

"Preserve me!" quoth Babie. "Whaur is the man gau'n to wi' his Sabbath claes on?"

Mr. Cook condescended on no explanation in answer to this interrogatory, save an oracular enunciation of the wise saw, that his helpmate should see what she would behold, and, taking his leave, he was soon at the rendezvous. Having ceremoniously taken his seat in the conveyance, Character was further impressed by Florence as to the vital importance of being able to get rid of the evidence of Buchanan; and he readily assented to the cogency of the reasons on which she urged the accomplishment of the important object, and duly satisfied her that, so far as his co-operation was concerned, she might calculate on it with the utmost certainty.

The coach pulled up at the entrance into Leith, and they walked the rest of the way to Buchanan's tavern.

"It's as well," said Character, "to see that the coast is clear before we gang in. We'll just pass the door, and then look at yon window, because if the house is full it will not be a good opportunity."

Florence had previously placed herself at Cook's disposal, and assented as a matter of course to this small piece of diplomacy, which turned out to be of service in assisting them in breaking ground with the object of their mission. "The house did not appear to be full;" but, true to the arrangement, they passed on and took their places at a window which, being that of a haberdasher, afforded a plausible opportunity for loitering. Mrs. Buchanan came to the door at the moment a ship-captain was passing; indeed, it was probable that she had seen him approaching, and took her station at the door for the express purpose of accosting him.

"I think ye never mean to cross our door noo, Mr. Binnacle?" said she to the weather-beaten son of Neptune.

"I never do," answered the man gruffly.

"What have we done? I'm sure we keep as good drink as ever we did, and we were ay ceevil to you?"

"Hang yer ceevility! Were you civil to my friend?"

"We didna ken that he was your friend."

"Didna ken!" thundered the Captain. "Did I not bring the lad to yer house, and tell ye to be kind to him? And if he had run a little behind, would not I have seen you paid? Or if I had gone to Davy's locker, would the few shillings that he would have been due you been anything to what I have spent in your house for the last ten years?"

"It was a pity that ye hadna spoken to me."

"Speak to you!" replied the angry seaman. "What good would that have done? You are as keen for blunt as your lubberly husband. There is not a true plank in the whole kit, except yer lassie, who is by far too good for either her father or mother."

"Weel, weel, Captain, I'm sorry for it; it was a sad mistak'."

"No mistak'; but jist downright blackguardism on the part o' your husband. Everybody says that the lad did not owe you a penny, but yet he, the sneak, must go and peach; and here's a honester fellow than ever stood on his shoes must go to the gallows. I've been at the jail twice to see the poor fellow, but they won't let me in. I'm sure this lad did not mean to cheat anybody; but maybe he's been hard up. Howsomdever, Mother Buchanan, jist hear you this: if Spencer is hanged, look you to your house; for if there are half a dozen sailors in Leith that day you'll see a blaze."

The irascible tar would maintain no farther parley; and, darting a fierce look at his former landlady, he resumed his walk up the Kirkgate.

"Now's our time!" said Character. "Come away, mem."

Mrs. Buchanan curtsied welcome, and conducted the guests to her best parlour.

"We have some thochts, Mrs. Buchanan," said Cook, who could lie for the nonce as well as a candidate on the hustings, "of sailing to Kirkaldy the nicht; but it's an east wind, and I am a wee thing feared that this leddy may be sick, an' maybe's it will be a better day the morn. Bring here a bottle o' your porter, Mrs. Buchanan, for me, and a gill o' shrub for the leddy."

Florence was horrified, and could not even conceal her surprise from Mrs. Buchanan, who, with professional acquisitiveness, regarded her with displeasure as one likely to damp the ardour of Mr. Cook in giving orders "for the good of the house."

"Here's a fine madam," quoth she of the Kirkgate to her abigail, as she retired to the bar to fulfil the behests of Mr. Cook. "She comes in here wi' the greatest assurance, and sits down till it's her pleasure to see if she can cross to Kirkaldy, aud she may sit here for an hour, or maybe twa; and yet whaun the man proposes to order a driblet o' shrub, she whinges out, 'No, I thank you! Really I beg—I assure you I cannot taste it.' And hoo does madam think we are to keep up a house for her convenience? Hoo are we to pay the rent and the taxes, and coal and candle; and hoo are we to live oursel's, if a' body was to act in this way? I wonder hoo this grand, fine, set-me-up lass wad look if I was to gang into her house and wait for the Kirkaldy boat?"

Mrs. Buchanan was delivering herself of this semi-economic address much about the time that Dr. Adam Smith was composing his immortal tome at this very Kirkaldy now referred to; and as we have lived to be informed by learned professors that snails can mesmerise each other at the Antipodes, it is no great stretch of imagination in a novelist to conceive of the father of political economy acting by sympathy on a shrewd hostess separated from him only by seven miles of the blue waters of the Firth of Forth. Some psychologists may account for the coincidence (if such existed) by the fact that economic considerations spring up in the Scotch mind simultaneously, and therefore do not require to be propagated by sympathy. There have been worse reasons than this assigned for various kinds of phenomena, and we state this explanation without venturing to impugn it.

Mr. Cook, reminding Florence of her promise to submit implicitly to his directions, cautioned her against interfering with his orders.

"The only way that you can get at Luckie Buchanan, mem, is by sending her to the bar, and sending her again and again—that is, if she is sure that ye ha'e siller to pay the lawin'. Faith, it will, maybe, cost twa three bottles o' porter, and twa three gills o' shrub afore we get her in tune."

"But I cannot drink shrub!"

"Whisht, for Heaven's sake! here's her comin. Jist shove the stoup to me, and I'll help you. Aye, Mrs. Buchanan, and hoo's the gudeman and the lassie? I dinna think I've seen ye for a month."

"He's in his ordinar, but Maggie's no weel at a'. I dinna ken what's the matter wi' her; she used to gang aboot the hoose singing like a mavis; but noo she's turned awfu' dowie, and she lies in her bed and doesna speak, and she takes sae little meat it wudna feed a sparrow. I'm real wae Maister Cook; I have but ane, and it would be hard to lose her. The doctor says that there is naething wrang wi' her yet, but that she canna lang gang on if she lives as she is doing."

"That is terrible!" said the sympathising Character. "It will be something on her mind."

"Aye, aye, that's what I jalouse," replied the mother mournfully.

"Weel, and can ye no find out the cause and see and get her round again?"

"We ken the cause o'er weel. I need na keep it frae you, Maister Cook; it's a' owing to that unfortunate business about the forged notes. Ye mind hoo ye tried to keep William frae telling the bailies that the lassie had got the notes in Spencer's room; weel, she's never had a day's health since that time. I some think that Spencer had been speaking to Maggie and turned her head."

Florence started.

"You needna start, mem, for this Spencer, tho' a note-forger, and very likely to be hanged, was a good-looking fellow, and Maggie being young and thoughtless ——"

"My good woman!" exclaimed Florence.

"Weel, weel, mem, it is a hard thing to see ane's ain dochter and only bairn taking up wi' sic folk; but ye're maybe nae aulder than Maggie yoursel', and folks shouldna' be over severe that never were tried themselves."

Character augured no good from this skirmishing; the ground trode upon was exceedingly dangerous, and he was anxious that this department of the subject should be eschewed. He therefore essayed to divert the channel of conversation.

"I doot, Mrs. Buchanan," said the pacificator, "ye've suffered mair ways than ane by this business."

"Aye, Maister Cook, that we have. I have aye said to the gudeman that folks in a public way should keep a calm sough, but he's gey positive; and especially when he taks a thing in his head, ye micht as weel try to move Inchkeith as get him to gi'e up his ain way. I tell't him frae the very beginning that he wad rue this business yet, and ye see it has come true. I spak till him, Maggie spak till him, and ye spak till him; but we a' micht ha'e preached and prayed till Candlemas—to the bailies he wad gang and ha'e oot his say; and what has he made o't? There's the bairn near fritten by hersel', and there's our custom awa' to naething. I have seen us run thro' an anker cask i' the time that it noo takes us to get quit o' a gallon. An a' body has ta'en an ill-will at us; and our windows are aften broken; and I am sure, if there is to be a hangin', I wish it was o'er, for we are sure to get our door dung in that nicht. An' ther's Binnacle, that used to be our best customer, he's awa' to Annie Cheyne's; I met her gaen to the Kirk on Sabbath wi' a new bonnet and shawl, and she ga'e her head a toss as meikle as to say, 'We're up sides wi' you noo,' for ye ken we used to look down on Annie when she first began in the Towboothe Wynd. Oh, sirs, it's an awfu' warld!"

Character, although contrary to his wont, allowed the lady what the Americans call "rope," manifesting no uneasiness at her tendencies to diverge into episodical topics; and she having come to a pause naturally, and without recourse to art, he availed himself of the cessation.

"But do you think that it is too late to men' this matter, Mrs. Buchanan?"

"I doot it is, Maister Cook, and it maun just take its course. Folk will tire speaking about us, and then they'll maybe come back again. When the dirt 's dry ye ken it rubs off. And as for Maggie, whaun the man's awa', she'll maybe forget him, and we'll send her out to her aunt in Cramond for change o' air; but then, ye ken, we've a rent o'er our head a' the time."

"I was thinkin'," replied Character, "that if the gudeman cou'd keep oot o' the road before the trial comes on the case micht brak down; and then, as the lad wad get off, and tak leg bail, the story wad blaw o'er; and, Maggie glad and a' body glad that there was nae hanging, things wad come round to be as they were before."

"But, ye see," rejoined the landlady, "he got a summons no ten minnits afore ye came in to attend the trial on Tuesday, and I dinna see he could get off."

"Is he in himsel'?"

"Aye is he, but I doot it will be nae use speaking to him."

"Jist ca' him in, and we'll see."

"Gudeman!" shrieked Dame Buchanan in her highest falsetto, "here's Maister Cook, of the Luckenbooths, come to see you."

Mr. Buchanan replied in a surly tone, the purport of which, although scarcely articulate, was that he would respond to the summons in due time; and after a brief interval he condescended to make his appearance. At no time over-bland in his manners, the recent depression in trade had wrought on him a change much for the worse. His manner was abrupt, and his countenance harsh and repulsive. Florence trembled as she thought that the fate of Norman was suspended on the good-will of that forbidding man.

"Come away, Mr. Buchanan," was the hearty salutation of Character. "Come away, and gi'es your news. Let's see anither bottle, Mrs. Buchanan: we'll no gang o'er the water the nicht. Dear me! it's turned coarser than ever. Here's to ye, Buchanan!"

Mr. Buchanan pledged in return, but with a dryness of manner which, on any other occasion, would have been mortally resented by Character.

"And hoo is business wi' you?"

"Dull! hanged dull!" answered the laconic Boniface.

"Weel, so the mistress was sayin'."

"And what richt has she to say anything o' the kind? We are bad enough without having her blabbing to everybody, and making things worse."

Mrs. Buchanan pantomimed to the effect that she had prophesied what would be the mood of her lord, and left the room. Character saw that Buchanan was not to be wheedled over like his wife, and he determined to introduce the subject without further parley.

"Now, Buchanan," said he, "would it not have been far better for you to have taken my advice that day, and no ha'e hurt your business by peaching against your lodger?"

"I'm making no complaint," answered the publican doggedly.

"An' I'm not come here to raise a shine wi' you; but jist as an auld friend and customer to advise you to cut your stick before the trial comes on, and no let the lad be hanged; his death can do you no good, and has, and maybe will still, do ye meikle ill."

"It's not me that hangs him; it's the law."

"Yes, yes! but if ye were oot o' the road he couldna be condemned."

"An' am I," answered Buchanan sternly, "to let a fellow off who cam' into my hoose, and made it a howff for forged notes? He had nae siller; and maybe he wad ha'e paid me wi' his trash, and gotten me into trouble as weel as himsel'. I have nae doot the note that he paid his bill wi' was forged, and it was jist a chance that I wasna brocht in. If I had been catched gi'en out forged notes, and then a villain like that found oot wi' a bundle o' them in his room, whaur would I ha e been? And because I bring him to justice, and tell the truth, there's a hue and cry raised against me, as if I had committed murder, and as if I had been the villain, and no Spencer."

"Spencer is no villain, man," retorted Florence, turning suddenly round from her place in the window, to which she had retired on the entrance of Buchanan.

"And what is he, then?" queried the publican in return.

"A gentleman, and incapable of doing injury to any one. He has very unfortunately been placed in circumstances that seem to implicate him, but he is as innocent of the crime laid to his charge as I am; and I am as certain of this as that there is a heaven above."

"A very queer kind o' gentleman," replied Buchanan with a sneer, "that hadna an honest shilling in his pocket, but plenty o' forged notes!"

"I cannot argue with you," said Florence quivering with emotion, "but take money and quit the country before the trial takes place. Name any sum you please, and I shall make sure that you get it. I have rich and powerful friends who will guarantee your safety. Say that you will do it. Do say that you will save his precious life."

"And wha are ye that want to bribe me to brak the laws o' the country by rinnin awa'?"

"My name is of no consequence, but on my knees I implore you, as you would value your own peace of mind here and hereafter, as you would seek to be judged by that God of mercy before whom we must all stand—oh, save him! You are my last hope, and if you cast me off there is no human aid that I can implore."

"Whaur am I to gang and hoo lang am I to stop awa', mistress? Na, na, gae hame again. I've pitten up wi' a great deal already about this business, but I am determined to see it to the end. I ken what becomes o' witnesses when they abscond—Geordie Thow's got banishment for that trick."

"May God forgive you," said Florence as she sorrowfully turned away from the implacable man.

Character darted on him a look of withering contempt and menace and led away his charge. Mrs. Buchanan waited for them at the outer door, and received the reckoning with many tears, and protested "that noo she kent Mr. Spencer was really a gentleman it wad clean brak her heart."

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE TRIAL.

ANOTHER trial in the High Court of Justiciary! During the brief interval that had elapsed since Muir the political martyr had been placed at the bar, many trials had occurred, but without attracting general attention on the part of the citizens. The trial of Myles Spencer excited universal interest. The long mystery connected with the numerous issue of forged notes was expected to be cleared up; and as it had been whispered abroad that the criminal was connected with a noble family, the excitement regarding his fate was considerably enhanced. The galleries and back-benches were crowded with spectators of all ranks, and an unusual silence chained down the packed assembly. Long before the hour appointed for the commencement of the trial, the seats and every available space had been filled; numbers still continued to besiege the entrances and were repelled with difficulty; till at length a strong posse of the town-guard cleared the passages by main force and closed the massive doors, and then the sullen voice of the multitude was heard indistinctly like the far-off murmur of the distant sea.

The resolute band of the prisoner's friends were there, sad and sorrowful, but yet not absolutely despairing. Florence sat between Henry and Arnold—Cook, Armstrong, and Smallbairn were beside them. Mrs. Buchanan and her daughter Maggie were in another part of the court-room. The poor girl was deadly pale, and the fierce lustre of her èye which had previously alarmed Cook had now settled down into a calm apathy, probably more alarming than the other. Near to, and in view of them, was the hag, and, in the same direction, there stood in a passage—oh matchless impudence and hypocrisy—Theodore Reid! And last of all, crushed into a narrow back bench, was Carmichael the banker and his sister Kate.

The hag scanned the crowded tribunal with eager eye, and when her fiendish glance fell on Maggie Buchanan it gleamed with maniacal exultation. The moment that its evil influence fell on the wretched girl, a deadly cold came over her fevered frame, and but for the interposition of her mother, who attributed the sudden indisposition to the heat and excitement of the place, she would have sunk to the floor. Satisfied with this conquest, the beldame continued to enlarge the range of her malignant vision, and soon attracted the notice of Cook. He marked at once the rising scowl, and the hatred of the compressed, thin, withered lips, and he knew their import. He suddenly rose from his seat, and, lifting his finger menacingly, gave her instantly to understand that he was not in a mood to be trifled with—the hag knew his determination of will, and quailed before it. Again that demon eye commences its round—Maggie Buchanan hides behind her mother—Cook defies her—who now? Theodore Reid! Little wot that gentleman that she was there. He has not heard of or seen her for a long time—thought she had been unwell, left the place, or, better still, dead and gone to her account. But there she is; and had he known of her presence, he should not have been one of the spectators. Ill she has indeed been, and she looks old, sick, and jaded; but the devil has his abode there as rampant as ever, and till death opens some outlet in that crazy, tottering body, his reign will be paramount. Theodore Reid liked not the look—it told that there was but a step between him and that judgment-seat, and that the ground felt very hollow underneath his feet.

There is a heaving to and fro in the front benches; that is the prisoner coming to the bar. A hatch-door opens on the floor, one of the guard ascends, and then the criminal! Florence cannot look, Maggie Buchanan casts a furtive glance, and then conceals her face in her skeleton hands. A hum of sympathy runs through the crowd as they behold the youth and noble bearing of the prisoner, who now sits down at the bar. Another bustle, and all rise to their seats, and the judges, preceded by the silver mace, take their places on the bench, and constitute the court.

The area between the bar and bench is filled. The Lord Advocate attends in person, flanked by Sharpnose. Erskine is on the other side, and with him Taylor, Torry, &c. The clerk reads the indictment in a hurried, legal voice, and then the judge speaks.

"Myles Spencer, what say ye to this indictment? Are you guilty or not guilty?"

"Not guilty, my lord."

The jury was then impannelled, who all seemed unexceptionable men, and Erskine exercised no right of challenge.

Mysie, the servant-girl of Buchanan, was called, and gave her evidence with many tears. Her statement was the first link in the chain of guilt; and the spectators ominously drew breath as she retired from the witness-box. Buchanan then entered, and was saluted with an unequivocal demonstration of ill-will.

"Macers, keep order!" cried Judge Braxfield. "Do the folk there think that they are in a play-hoose?"

The oath was administered to Buchanan; and he looked round in trepidation at the countless faces that darted looks of rage upon him.

"Am I safe to tell the truth here?" he asked at the judge.

"Safe, man!" replied the Lord Justice Clerk. "If ye're no safe in the High Koort what wad ye be at? Has onybody been tampering wi' you?"

"Yes."

"Wha?"

"Samuel Cook the shoemaker."

Now, thought Character, I am a public man at last. Here am I brought up jist below Braxfield's very nose; but let him speak to me, and I'll show him daylight. Character, high in the dignity of accusation, rose up, and, first looking gratefully at Buchanan for this mark of friendship, then turned full front to the bench with a bold, inviting face, which seemed to say, I am the man.

Braxfield wore a colossal pair of horn spectacles; and whether their focus did not carry the judicial eye so far as Character Cook, or whether, as is more probable, he reckoned it absurd that a man of leather should interfere with the course of justice, he deemed the statement frivolous, and at once repelled it.

"Harkye, man," said he to the witness, "ye've sworn to tell the truth, the haill truth, and naething bit the truth. Let me see ye prevauricat, and I'll ha'e ye laid by the heels up-stairs. As for the mob (looking graciously at the audience), John Dhu will keep ye in the lock-up till the Koort skails. Gang on wi' your examination, my Lord Advocat."

Character stood dumb with astonishment, and did not resume his seat till a smart blow on the shoulder with the javelin of the foresaid John Dhu reminded him that this, his latest and most noble defiance of the law, had failed; and he had to sit down an inglorious and undistinguished unit amongst the hundreds around him.

Buchanan gave his evidence in terms of the information that has already been communicated to the reader; and this, with some formal testimony from officers of the court, terminated the case for the Crown.

The Lord Advocate claimed a verdict in terms of the indictment, on the ground that the discovery of the forged notes in Norman's apartment indicated, when taken in connexion with the absence of any visible mode of subsistence in the prisoner, a felonious possession and utterance of the unlawful documents.

Henry Erskine replied in a speech of great eloquence and power. He dwelt strongly on the want of direct proof as to positive utterance of notes; and contended that no note-forger would have left counterfeit notes in an exposed part of his lodgings, where they were certain to be detected. He held that they either would have been secreted at first, or destroyed at the approach of danger; and he intreated the jury to give the pannel at all events the benefit of the numerous doubts to which the case, as stated by the Crown, was undeniably chargeable. The peroration was in his highest style, and produced a marked sensation on the audience.

Braxfield followed with his summary. "It's as clear a case o' the kind, gentlemen o' the jury, as ever I saw. When a man commits a capital crime, it's no to be expe'kit that he is to convene the haill toun that they may see him. He does it secretly; and it's only by circumstantial evidence that ony criminal can be convicted—here a little and there a little. As to the presumed innocence o' the pannel, because he left the notes in a place whaur they wad easily be gotten, that only shows that rogues never have a' their wits aboot them. They aye forget something; and that the pannel was destroyin' papers o' some kind is clear, for the lassie said in yer hearing that there was burned paper in the grate. It was the will o' Providence that he should forget the notes on the tap o' the bed. And then look to the tampering wi' the witnesses. Some o' the lower classes had been threatening the man Buchanan; and it was clear that if the case had been good, they wad ha'e done naething o' the kind. Gentlemen o' the jury, I dinna ken if ye want to retire; but if ye do, the macer there will show ye into yer room."

The jury requested permission to retire, which held out a faint gleam of hope, struggling, however, very hard for existence against the dark cloud of Braxfield's charge. Conversation went on freely amongst the audience during the retirement of the jury, and speculations of all descriptions were hazarded during the weary fifteen minutes of their absence. Their bell rang at last, and fel lloudly on the startled ears of the eager expectants. One by one the countenances of the arbiters of fate were scanned as they re-entered their box, but the keenest scrutiny failed to arrive at any certain result by this process.

"Gentlemen of the jury, answer to your names," said the clerk of court.

The names were called over amidst silence deep as death.

"Gentlemen, who is your foreman?"

A person stood up in answer to the question.

"Gentlemen, what is your verdict?"

It seemed as if not one living person breathed, so awful was the suspense of this dread moment.

"My lord, the jury, by a plurality of voices, find the pannel GUILTY as libelled."

The breath so long suspended in so many hearts now returned, and it seemed as if one universal sigh had been uttered by the numerous auditors. The girl Buchanan fainted away, but Florence, although pale and statue-like, and struggling with fearful internal agony, maintained outward composure and tranquillity. All that was now to do was mere form, but on such occasions people remain till the last ceremony has been gone through, and, accordingly, however much those more immediately interested might be disturbed, the mass remained still and orderly.

In accordance with the usual form, the junior body of justiciary moved that the customary capital sentence should be pronounced; and Braxfield was in the act of putting on the black cap for this purpose, when the prisoner at the bar suddenly rose up and addressed the bench.

"My lords," said Norman, "I freely confess that in the matter which has placed me at your lordships' bar I have been guilty of great imprudence, and also of seeming crime, but I deny, as in the face of my Maker, that I wilfully and with the intention of defrauding anyone, have done that which this court ought to consider unlawful. I submit that, in terms of the address of my counsel, no direct proof has been brought to establish my guilt. Bear with me, my lords, as one standing between life and death. I do not know your forms; but consider, I beseech you, who will be benefited by my death? Spare, in mercy, that life which, as yet, is little more than in its commencement, and I pledge myself that the remainder of it shall be dedicated to the public service of the country. Let me be allowed to join any regiment abroad, in any capacity however humble, and you will see that I shall amply atone for any errors that I may have committed."

He resumed his seat after this short address, and the sympathy amongst the spectators was all but universal; had they been consulted, the pardon so earnestly sought for would have at once been conceded; but, however omnipotent in other quarters, public opinion has no voice in law courts.

"It's a' verra fine," said the Lord Justice Clerk, the black cap being now assumed, "but we are only the organs o' the law and have nae discretion; it's the Croon that pardons, we can only condemn. The sentence of the court is, that you, Myles Spencer, be taken from hence back to the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, and there fed on bread and water till Friday the 16th of September next, 1794, on which day, between the hours of ten and twelve noon, ye shall, at the ordinary place of execution, be hanged on a gibbet till ye are dead. And may God have mercy on your soul."

"My lord," said the foreman of the jury, "being very much agitated when I delivered the verdict of the jury, I omitted to state that they unanimously recommended the prisoner to mercy."

A burst of applause ran through the assembly at this announcement.

"It's clear against form," observed the judge, without heeding the demonstration, "to mak' the recommendation noo; but ye can try yer han' wi' the Croon." Saying this, the presiding judge rose, his two brethren did the same; the macer seized the mace, and immediately the bench was vacant. The convict also rose as if eager to leave the court; but Erskine came forward, and, with a tear in his generous eye, extended both hands, and expressed his deep commiseration at the result.

"You are a brave fellow," said the warm-hearted counsel. "Oh that I had Crown influence for your sake! But what is this?"

In the interval between the verdict and the sentence Maggie Buchanan had spontaneously recovered, for carrying her out of the court at the precise juncture was out of the question; and seeing that Norman was about to leave the bar, she rushed wildly forward to address him. Her mother in vain attempted to keep back the agitated girl, who was nerved with supernatural strength; and, yielding to the extraordinary sight, the crowd made way for her till she was within arm's length of Norman. The guards not exactly comprehending the cause of disturbance, and apprehensive that some attempt at rescue was about to be made, they seized the prisoner and hurried him down the trap-stair; the door of which was immediately closed and secured. The girl, finding herself thus suddenly foiled, uttered a loud shriek, and frantically tore her now dishevelled hair.

"The old woman mocked me. Where is she?" was her loud and passionate exclamation. "Where is the old woman that mocked me, and mocked him? Let me see her, that I may tear her limb from limb! She always frightened me before; but I'm mad now, and she shall never frighten me again!"

The hag crouched in a corner, imminently dreading that her hiding-place would be discovered; but, fortunately for her, the avenger's state was too peculiar not to call for instant interference.

"Maister Cook," cried the terrified mother, "will ye no' help me?"

Character went up to the girl, and attempted, by soothing, to induce her to leave the court and go home.

"Home!" she screamed in bitter irony. "Home! with my father, who has killed him! That shall never be my home!"

The case soon was explained; and the crowd, as before, participating in the regrets of the wretched girl, gathered around her, and seconded the efforts of Cook for her removal, which was at last accomplished; and having seen the two females despatched in a hackney-coach, Cook bethought himself of the group of his own friends from whose side he had been summoned by this singular episode. They could not, however, be found; and, uncertain where might be their place of meeting, he lingered amongst the crowd outside. There was an obvious unwillingness to disperse, and knot upon knot adhered together in the evident hope that Buchanan might emerge from the court premises on his way to Leith; but the authorities, wisely acting on Braxfield's advice, had locked him up. And on this being announced to the multitude, they became highly infuriated.

"Let's go down to Leith and break his windows," shouted one.

"What wad be the use of that," said a more reflecting orator, "whaun there is naebody there 'cepts his wife and the lassie?"

"What wad ye say to brak open the jail, lads?" asked Character.

"Hoorah!" was the unanimous response to this appeal.

"Keep your powder dry!" whispered Arnold in his ear. The more reflecting military man saw obstacles in the daylight, in the smallness of the mob, in their want of weapons, in the absence of pre-arrangement. The pear was not ripe; and he dragged Character away.

The mob moved towards the jail, but when they arrived there no leader appeared; and, infirm of purpose, they stood before its ponderous gate irresolute and passive. All mobs are ropes of sand without a leader, but while vacillating in action they are never deficient in loquacity.

"Who spoke about breaking the jail?" cried one.

"Aye, who was it?" echoed another.

"It was Character Cook," answered a third.

"Come away, then, and pull him out of his shop."

"Hoorah!"

But their wayward fancies received a bias in another direction. The hag, with an infatuation which cannot well be explained, had lingered amongst them. First she had seen the girl Buchanan, then she had watched Cook, and, last of all, she had attempted to get hold of Theodore Reid; but that worthy gentleman had anticipated her intention, and he clung closely to a group of brother-shopkeepers, so that she had no opportunity of accosting him separately, as was her intention. Foiled in all these efforts, she lingered about, perhaps from a morbid desire to pick up fragments of conversation from amongst the multitude as to the impossibility of a reprieve; but, be her object what it might, there she was in the midst of the crowd when the attack on Character's premises was moved, seconded, and unanimously agreed to. The conspirators faced about for the purpose of retracing their steps, and thus confronted the hideous old woman.

"A witch! a witch! a witch!" roared dozens of voices till the air rang with their cry.

"Put her below the well, or fling her into the Nor' Loch!" was the second shout.

And an attempt was made to put into immediate execution this gallant proposition. The hag had no time for deliberation; the long line of figures was direct in front of her, and in a few seconds she would be inclosed in their ranks and trampled under-foot. The instinct of self-preservation determined her to instant decision, and, turning round, fear lent swiftness to her crazy limbs and strength to her emaciated frame; and she essayed to escape from her pursuers by flight. The odds were fearfully unequal, a paralytic old wretch pursued by a mob composed for the most part of lads and young men; but for one instant could she have the start of them, and at the next their violent hands would be laid upon her. She however took the venture and fled—the pursuers started in full cry; and just as she was in the act of being seized she descried the form of Theodore Reid passing a lighted window.

"Save me, Reid!" was her imploring shriek as she fell senseless on the street.

Reid recognised that peculiar voice despite its change into a dissonant screech, and the call being one of the commonest humanity, he could not refuse to listen to it. The merchant and his companion turned back and attempted to dissuade the mob from carrying into effect their ferocious purpose.

"She's a witch! She's a witch," was the response."

"Nae doot," replied the wily Theodore, "and we are commanded no to let a witch live, but ye see the like o' them should be tried by the authorities. Is that ane o' the town-guard? Weel, the like o' that! to get ane o' them when they are wanted is really something new. Here you; tak awa' this woman and no let her be felled. Ye canna be dead yet, Luckie, rise up, and gang in till the court-house till the sough blows o'er."

"Is her dead?" asked the city-guard.

"Ower guid news to be true," muttered Theodore while he endeavoured to examine the face. "It will just be a dram, and maybe Dr. Monro will pit her a' to richts."

More municipal assistance having arrived, the hag was carried off, and the mob quietly dispersed.

DANIEL WEBSTER, AND ANGLO-AMERICAN STATESMEN.

Daniel Webster was the last of the second race of eminent Anglo-American statesmen. Not long before his death, two of his contemporaries, great and good men, John C. Calhoun and Henry Clay, preceded him to the tomb. John Quincey Adams, Livingston, Kent, Storey and Marshall, men of mighty intellects, clear sagacity, and sound judgment, all profound lawyers, have likewise disappeared from the world. within the last few years.

The Anglo-American republic and the English colonies differ from all other countries in regard to their population. The inhabitants do not consist of races whose ancestors dwelt during the age of barbarism in the countries which they now inhabit. The first English settlers carried into those countries intelligent minds, vigorous understandings, undaunted courage, and resolute perseverance. They consisted of hardy yeomen, and men of rank, education and enterprise, who left England either to avoid persecution, or to enjoy political freedom in a country to which they were led by that spirit of adventure which has long distinguished the British nation. They forsook their homes and those comforts that are only found in old and rich countries; and the conscientious spirit of religious freedom, and the love of civil and political liberty, tore them away from those attachments which are naturally the dearest to the human bosom.

But those causes are not sufficient to do justice to their endurance, courage and magnanimity. The conquests which they achieved over all the hardships, sufferings, and disappointments that afflict the body, discourage the heart, and enfeeble the spirit of man—their fortitude and their indomitable energies, have exalted them, in the estimation of those who value facts rather than warlike splendour and military victories, to a rank more illustrious than that of the greatest people recorded in history. The hardships which the early colonists endured, and the calamities to which circumstances connected with a wilderness country subjected them, were incomparably more severe than the founders of colonies either in America or Australia can form any conception of at the present day.

They had not only to suffer the miseries of hunger and the want of almost every convenience to which they had been accustomed in England, but they were at all times, with their families, exposed to be massacred or burnt in their dwellings by the savages. It would even appear that the winters were more severe than at present, or that the privations of the first settlers made them describe the snows deeper, the frosts as more intense, and the duration of winter much longer, than during the present century. But that unconquerable spirit of perseverance which surmounts the difficulties connected with all great undertakings, enabled them to succeed and prosper with a solidity and strength that astonished all Europe. Their skilful industry, indefatigable activity and wisdom, alone enabled them to attain and secure wealth, strength and happiness. Their improvements in the useful arts, in agriculture and trade, far surpassed that of the colonies sent forth by all other nations. Nor must it be forgotten that, notwithstanding their difficulties and the occupations which they followed from the first planting of their settlement, they carefully provided for the education of youth. They were ardent and fearless in making new discoveries, and their eagerness in the search of whatever might improve their circumstances and increase their wealth, carried them into almost every country where trade could be transacted, and where the profits of interchange could be realised. They finally secured all the substantial and comfortable enjoyments of life, with many of its elegancies and refinements, and became in reality a rich, flourishing and happy people. It was said, that if ever any country might be considered a paradise of human felicity, it must have been British North America previously to the sad story of colonial oppression.

There were none of them, it is true, who lived in the enervating luxury and magnificent splendour of the few among the many in the more civilised nations of Europe. But when they declared their independence, the people were generally intelligent, their habits industrious and frugal; none possessed great wealth—none were poor. Their occupations were chiefly agriculture, navigation, trade and fisheries; and, unlike the Spanish colonists, they were free from the oppressions of monarchical and the thraldom of priestly and hierarchical tyranny. Their extensive territories, with a generally fertile soil, and with almost every climate under heaven—their numerous navigable harbours, rivers and lakes, with magnificent forests, affording wood for ship-building and other purposes—their minerals and quarries—their abundant fisheries and their wild animals, included nearly all natural resources and advantages.

Their education and language enabled them to enjoy the benefits of the knowledge, literature, history, and laws of England, without the labour or expense of translation, and their intelligence enabled them to take the earliest advantage of European discoveries in science and in art. They had, therefore, the knowledge of all ages and countries to guide them, and the rare good fortune of being governed, down to, and after their independence, by honest men, who conducted their assemblies with abilities, which were solid rather than brilliant, practical rather than theoretical.

On forming their independent government, notwithstanding their separation from Britain, they had the discrimination, sense and judgment to accept as the groundwork of their administrative legislation and justice the constitutional laws of the only limited monarchy at that time in the world, making a royal hereditary chief magistrate, a titled and privileged nobility, and a State Church the only great exceptions. With such extraordinary advantages of intelligence, freedom, and wisdom, they avoided most of the blunders which were committed afterwards by the Spanish-American Republics, that had before their independence been ruled by Governments and judged by laws which, from their birth in the feudal ages, trained up the subjects of the Crown in ignorance, bigotry, intolerance, and a passive obedience to priestly and kingly tyranny. Democracy was, by necessity as well as choice, the chief element of the American Constitution. The riches of the citizens were too equally distributed for any individual to possess the means either of corruption, if that were possible, or of a dangerous share of power. Washington stood the highest, if any one could be invested with hereditary dignity. But he was so truly pure that he soared above all earthly vanity, above being more than a virtuous and just citizen. He surrendered all his power the moment that he had achieved independence for his country, and freedom for his fellow-men. His ambition never was to be the destroyer, but the benefactor of the human race. Titles and stars were indeed baubles in the judgment of a man in whose heart benevolence dwelt, in whose head wisdom and judgment reigned. Far above Alexander or Cæsar, Frederick or Napoleon, will stand the name and rank the fame of George Washington in the judgment of every good man, and in the sentiments of every virtuous heart, in all future ages, so long as the nations of the earth shall have their history written.

At that period there also existed in America a remarkable number of men distinguished for knowledge, wisdom, judgment, and practical ability.

Franklin, Jefferson, Adams, Hamilton, Hancock, Maddison and Jay stood high among the philosophers, lawgivers, and statesmen of the world. They, with some others, were the statesmen of the first race in the great Anglo-Saxon Republic.

Munro, Livingston, Judges Kent, Marshall, and Storey, J. C. Calhoun, Henry Clay, and Daniel Webster were among the most illustrious chiefs of the second.

Several years before 1783, when Great Britain by treaty acknowledged the independence of America, Major Ebenezer Webster, who had served in the war of the conquest of Canada, and afterwards in the war of Independence, settled in the wilds of New Hampshire, at a place near where now stands the town of Salisbury. New Hampshire, with the exception of a few miles of sea-coast, is an inland state, beautifully diversified with hills, mountains, valleys, some lakes, and numerous rivers.

At that period the country was covered with forests, and the soil was in a wilderness state. When Daniel, the youngest of the ten children of Major Webster, was born, on the 18th of January, 1782, his father's farms and lands, at the confluence of the two rivers Pannigewasset and Winnipisiogee, presented those scenes of wild and picturesque nature which, as he grew up, he enthusiastically admired and enjoyed, and to which he in after-life so frequently reverted. He was in that wild but magnificent solitude, with his brothers, trained at the fireside of a wise and practical father, and of a prudent, pious, and virtuous mother. A small school, and the place where the scattered inhabitants assembled to worship, were at that time the only places of instruction.

During the spring, summer, and autumn, the sons of Major Webster toiled with their father on the farm, and during the intervals of leisure, especially during the winter months, they attended the little school where they learned to read and write, and the common rules of arithmetic. They also studied and read during the nights of winter. Daniel was remarkably diligent and ready in acquiring knowledge, and he early aspired to a greater distinction in the world than is to be attained by farming, although that pursuit is not only honourable but followed by the first men in America.

At the age of fourteen, young Daniel left his father's house and the scenes of his youth, and entered an academy at Exeter, a small town in the same State. His father's means being limited, he was received on very moderate terms at the boarding-school of the Rev. Samuel Wood. As it was intended that he should afterwards be sent to college he was assiduous in his studies, and though imperfectly grounded in the rudiments of Latin, he is said to have read 100 verses of Virgil at a lesson, and he soon learned not only to understand but to interpret that poet. It was feared, in consequence of his passion for rambling through the neighbouring forest with his rifle, that he might neglect his studies, and that his example would prove injurious to the other scholars. His master hinted this to him, and the boy, being remarkably sensitive, even of the suspicion of neglecting his studies, at once devoted the whole of that night to Virgil. "On the following day he read," says Professor Sanborn, "his 100 lines without mistake. He was nowhere found tripping in syntax or prosody. As his teacher was preparing to leave, young Daniel requested him to hear a few more lines. Another 100 was read—breakfast was repeatedly announced. The good doctor was impatient to go, and asked his pupil how much further he could go? 'To the end of the 12th Book of the Æneid' was the prompt reply. The doctor never had occasion to reprove him again. His study hours ever after were sacred. In less than a year he read with his teacher Virgil and Cicero, and in private two large Latin works of Grotius and Puffendorf. During the month of July his father called him home to assist on the farm. At this time of life young Daniel had but a slender frame, and was not able to endure much fatigue. The trial of a single half-day brought the boy home with blistered hands and wearied limbs. The next morning his father gave him his little bundle of books and clothes and bade him seek his old teacher again. Dr. Wood met him with a cordial greeting on his return, and assured him that with hard study he might enter college at the next term. He then had two months to devote to Greek, and he had not yet learned the alphabet. With characteristic energy he grappled with the task and achieved a victory of which few can boast. What one of those college idlers who talk so flippantly about the idleness of Daniel Webster, when a student, had prepared himself for a like station in two short months? The students of that day were deprived of many of the comforts and luxuries of life which are now so liberally enjoyed. They usually travelled on horseback. Their dress was entirely of domestic manufacture.

"When Daniel Webster went to college he took the least valuable of his father's horses, which would not be missed from the farm, and depositing his scanty wardrobe and library in a pair of saddle-bags, set out for Hanover. Scarcely had he lost sight of his father's house when a furious north-east storm began to beat upon the solitary traveller. The rain poured down incessantly for two days and nights. A necessity was laid upon him to be present at the commencement of the term. He therefore made such haste as he could with his slow-paced Rozinante, over bad roads, through the pelting storm, and reached the place at the close of the second day, if not a sorrowful knight, at least in a sorrowful condition. He joined his class next day, and at once took the position in it which he has since held in the intellectual world."

At this college he remained for two years, with the exception of passing a vacation at home. He had still to struggle with difficulties. His father having settled upon his farm with moderate means, the expense of bringing up a small family compelled him to encumber his lands with a mortgage, and to retain the eldest brother at home to toil with other labourers on the soil, in order, if possible, to redeem the mortgage, and also to pay the expenses of Daniel at college. Ezekiel, the eldest, submitted to this drudgery; but the fact oppressed the mind of Daniel that he should be maintained at college at the expense of depriving his eldest brother of the opportunity of acquiring that knowledge that was so dear to himself. Dr. Sanborn says, "Ezekiel was a farmer in spirit and practice. He led his labourers in the field, as he afterwards led his class in Greek. Daniel knew and appreciated his superior intellectual endowments. He resolved that his brother should enjoy the same privilege with himself. That night the two brothers retired to bed, but not to sleep. They discoursed of their prospects. Daniel utterly refused to enjoy the fruit of his brother's labour any longer. They were united in sympathy and affection, and they must be united in their pursuits. But how could they leave their beloved parents in age and solitude, with no protector? They talked and wept, and wept and talked till dawn of day. Finally, Daniel resolved to be orator upon the occasion. Judge Webster was then somewhat burdened with debts. He was advanced in age, and had set his heart upon having Ezekiel as his helper. The very thought of separation from both his sons was painful to him. When the proposition was made he felt as did the Patriarch of old, when he exclaimed, 'Joseph is not . . . . and will ye also take Benjamin away?' A family council was called. The mother's opinion was asked. She was a noble-minded woman. With all a mother's partiality, however, she did not estimate their powers. She decided the matter at once. Her reply was, 'I have lived long in the world, and have been happy in my children. If Daniel and Ezekiel will promise to take care of me in my old age, I will consent to the sale of all our property at once, and they may enjoy the benefit of what has remained after our debts are paid.' This was a moment of intense interest to all the parties. Parents and children all mingled their tears together, and sobbed aloud at the thought of separation. The father yielded to the intreaties of the sons and the advice of his wife. Daniel returned to college, and Ezekiel took his little bundle in his hand and sought on foot the scene of his preparatory studies. I once asked the venerable teacher of the department of the younger brother in college. He replied, 'Oh, sir, Daniel was as regular as the sun. He never made a misstep; he never stooped to do a mean act; he never countenanced by his presence or by his conversation any college irregularities.'"

Daniel Webster graduated at the age of nineteen, and, like many of the most eminent men in the United States, commenced gaining a livelihood as a schoolmaster. He procured the appointment of master of a small academy at Fribourg, in Maine, with a salary of 350 dollars, or £90 a-year; and he again left his father's house on horseback, with all his earthly goods in a pair of saddle-bags, and after a tedious journey arrived at the little village to resume his functions of teacher. These were arduous during the day, but the young master resolved to labour every hour that he could spare from the short period that he set apart for sleep. He engrossed deeds in the county records for a very poor remuneration. At this drudgery he laboured during the greater part of the night, and there now exist, engrossed in his handwriting, two large folios as proofs of his labours and industry.

By strict economy, at the end of the first year he was enabled to pay 100 dollars to support his brother at college. Soon after this time Ezekiel taught an evening-school for sailors, at Boston, as well as a large private day-school.

Daniel having resolved to prosecute the study of the law, entered the office of Mr. Gore, afterwards governor of the state; and after the usual course, he was admitted to the bar of the Court of Suffolk, Massachusetts, in the year 1805. But he returned to New Hampshire in order to practise as a lawyer in his native state, where his father had been Judge of the Court of Common Pleas for twelve years, in which office he died in 1806, without enjoying the satisfaction of hearing his son's first speech at the bar.

In 1807 Mr. Webster settled at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, where he soon gained a respectable and extensive practice. In 1812 he was elected one of the representatives of the state in Congress, and he took his seat in the same house in which Calhoun, Clay, Forsyth, Lowndes, and other distinguished men then sat. He soon gained a high reputation in the senate; for Mr. Lowndes said of him, "The South has not his superior, nor the North his equal." Having married some time before, he found his small professional fees, notwithstanding his extensive practice at Portsmouth, insufficient to maintain his family; and he settled in 1816 at Boston. In this city his professional success was rapid; and he was equally fortunate in pleading before the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington in 1817. In 1820, he was chosen a member for revising the constitution of Massachusetts. His reputation now became general; but he refused to be nominated as a senator of the United States.

In 1822, he was elected representative for the city of Boston in Congress by a large majority, for which honour he sacrificed a great part of his professional emoluments. In January, 1823, he delivered a powerful speech on the Greek Revolution. "An occasion," said he, "which calls the attention to a spot so distinguished, so connected with interesting recollections as Greece, may naturally create something of warmth and enthusiasm. In a grave political discussion, however, it is necessary that that feeling should be chastened. I shall endeavour properly to repress it, although it is impossible that it should be altogether extinguished. We must indeed fly beyond the civilised world, we must pass the dominion of law and the boundaries of knowledge, we must more especially withdraw ourselves from this place, and the scenes and objects which here surround us, if we would separate ourselves entirely from the influence of all those memorials which ancient Greece has transmitted for the admiration and the benefit of mankind. This free form of government, this popular assembly, the common council held for the common good, where have we contemplated its earliest models? This practice of free debate and public discussion, the contest of mind with mind, and that popular eloquence which, if it were now here on a subject like this, would move the stones of the Capitol—whose was the language in which all these were first exhibited? Even the edifice in which we assemble, these proportioned columns, this ornamented architecture, all remind us that Greece has existed, and that we, like the rest of mankind, are greatly her debtors!"

He concluded this classic and powerful oration as follows:—

"I think it right, too, not to be unseasonable in the expression of our regard, and as far as that goes, in a ministration of our consolation to a long oppressed and now struggling people. I am not of those who would in the hour of utmost peril withhold such encouragement as might be properly and lawfully given, and when the crisis should be passed, overwhelm the rescued sufferer with kindness and caresses. The Greeks address the civilised world with a pathos not easy to be resisted. They invoke our favour by more moving considerations than can well belong to the condition of any other people. They stretch out their arms to the Christian communities of the earth, beseeching them, by a generous recollection of their ancestors, by the consideration of their own desolated and ruined cities and villages, by their wives and children sold into an accursed slavery, by their own blood, which they seem willing to pour out like water, by the common faith and in the name which unites all Christians, that they would extend to them at least some token of compassionate regard."

In 1839, he visited Europe, and, with the exception of a few weeks on the Continent, spent the greater portion of his time in England, where he was received with great attention and hospitality. On his return to the United States, he became Secretary of State, or head of the Cabinet, which office he filled for two years with great distinction. It was during his administration that the north-eastern boundaries of Maine, New Brunswick, and Canada were adjusted: the late Lord Ashburton representing Great Britain at Washington as Minister Extraordinary. The treaty was signed on the 9th August, 1842, and terminated a dispute at that time which, in consequence of the conduct of a Mr. MacLeod, in setting fire to an American steamship, had threatened the disruption of peace between England and America. At the same time, a joint action for the suppression of the slave-trade was arranged by Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton.

When Mr. Polk was elected president, Mr. Webster resigned and returned to the Senate, of which he continued a member until the death of General Taylor in 1850. He rendered useful services in settling the Oregon dispute; and he was opposed to the invasion of Mexico on the principle that an acquisition of territory would weaken rather than strengthen the Union. But when the war was resolved upon, he considered that it should be carried out efficiently; and he therefore concurred in granting the supplies. His second son, Edward, was afterwards appointed a major in the Massachusetts regiment of volunteers; but he died in consequence of the effects of climate and fatigue in Mexico.

Upon the accession of President Fillmore, Mr. Webster again became Secretary of State, in which office he continued until his death, on the 24th of October last.

Since the death of General Washington, the loss of no man appears to have been so much deplored as that of Daniel Webster. He was not only popular, but he was even much beloved by some of his greatest political opponents. Like many great statesmen of ancient and modern times, he was a practical agriculturist. When not attending as Minister at Washington, his happiness was to reside at Marshfield, Massachusetts, or in his native place near Salisbury, New Hampshire. In both he had extensive farms, herds of the finest cattle and sheep, and his lands were cultivated according to the most improved modes of husbandry. He also delighted to make excursions with his yacht in the fine waters of Massachusetts Bay.

An American writer in 1850 says of Mr. Webster:—

"He is called the expounder of the Constitution. He will be known hereafter as its chief defender. He has been to it during the second period of the Republic what Washington was to its liberty in the first. Vast as were the powers he displayed usually, those who heard his reply to Hayne, in which he surpassed the models of antiquity, felt that there were hidden fountains of elemental fire still unstirred. The majesty of his person, the unfathomable depth and varied intonation of his voice, his manner, always just as excited as needful, the soundness of his mind, and the amazing resources of his learning and imagination, have stamped him the colossal intellect of America."

There was scarcely any subject upon which Mr. Webster could not speak with interesting ability and logical force; and he could always adapt his speeches with remarkable felicity to the occasion. On the 22nd December, 1820, he delivered at Plymouth a speech on the commemoration of the first settlement of New England.

"Let us rejoice," said he, "that we behold this day. Let us be thankful that we have lived to see the bright and happy breaking of the auspicious morn which commences the second century of the History of New England. Auspicious indeed; bringing a happiness beyond the common allotment of Providence to men full of present joy, and gilding with bright beams the prospect of futurity in the dawn that awakens us to the commemoration of the landing of the Pilgrims. Living at an epoch which naturally marks the progress of the history of our native land, we have come hither to celebrate the great event with which that history commenced. For ever honoured be this the place of our fathers' refuge! For ever remembered the day which saw them, weary and distressed, broken in everything but spirit, poor in all but faith and courage, at last secure from the dangers of wintry seas, and impressing this shore with the first footsteps of civilised man! It is a noble faculty of our nature which enables us to connect our thoughts, our sympathies, and our happiness, with what is distant in place or time, and, looking before and after, to hold communion at once with our ancestors and our posterity. Human and mortal as we are, we are nevertheless not mere insulated beings without relation to the past or the future. Standing in this relation to our ancestors and our posterity, we are assembled on this memorable spot to perform the duties which that relation and the present occasion impose upon us. We have come to this rock to record here our homage for our Pilgrim Fathers; our sympathy in their sufferings; our gratitude for their labours; our admiration for their virtues; our veneration for their piety, and our attachment to those principles of civil and religious liberty which they encountered, the dangers of the ocean, the storms of heaven, the violence of savages, disease, exile, and famine, to enjoy and to establish. And we would leave here also, for the generations which are rising up rapidly to fill our places, some proof that we have endeavoured to transmit the great inheritance unimpaired; that in our estimate of public principle and private virtue; in our veneration of religion and piety; in our devotion to civil and religious liberty; in our regard to whatever advances human knowledge, or improves human happiness, we are not altogether unworthy of our origin."

The rest of this long speech is remarkably instructive, and brings down the History of New England to the struggle for Independence, and afterwards to the Second Centenary of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. And then speaking of the future he continued:—

"There is a local feeling connected with this occasion too strong to be resisted; a sort of genius of the place which inspires and moves us. We feel that we are on the spot where the first scene of our history was laid; where the hearths and altars of New England were first placed; where Christianity and civilisation, and letters made their first lodgment, in a vast extent of country covered with a wilderness and peopled by roving barbarians. We are here at the season of the year at which the event took place. The imagination irresistibly and rapidly draws around us the principal features and the leading characters in the original scene. We cast our eyes abroad on the ocean, and we see where the little bark, with the interesting group upon its deck, made its slow progress to the shore. We look around us, and behold the hills and promontories where the anxious eyes of our fathers first saw the places of habitation and rest. We feel the cold which benumbed, and listen to the winds which pierced them. Beneath us is the rock on which New England received the feet of the Pilgrims. We seem even to behold them, as they struggle with the elements, and with toilsome efforts gain the shore. We listen to the chiefs in council; we see the unexampled exhibition of female fortitude and resignation; we hear the whisperings of youthful impatience, and we see what a painter of our own has also represented by his pencil, chilled and shivering childhood, houseless but for a mother's arms, couchless but for a mother's breast, till our own blood almost freezes."

In one hundred years from the day that Daniel Webster delivered this remarkable speech what will America be? If we judge from the past, we may in imagination estimate the power of the mighty empire or empires which will legislate, converse, and carry on all the operations of industry and of commerce, navigation and intercourse, in the language which on the 22nd of December, 1620, was spoken by the Pilgrim Fathers on the dreary shores of Massachusetts Bay.

One hundred and thirty-nine years afterwards, the Anglo-American settlements were still confined to the sea-coasts and rivers east of the Allegany Mountains. The few straggling settlers amounted to a few hundred English families in the province of Nova Scotia; a small colony, planted by Colonel Oglethorpe, had settled in Georgia; but New Brunswick, nearly all of Nova Scotia, all Cape Breton, the greater part of Newfoundland, all the countries watered by the gulf, the rivers, and lakes of the St. Lawrence and Canada; all the vast territories west of the Alleganies, Georgia, Florida, and Louisiana, and all Mexico, were under the dominion of the Kings of France and Spain. The whole British population amounted only to about 1,800,000 souls.

Now, all the vast territories of North America, from the islands and shores of the Atlantic to those of the Pacific—from the Gulf of Mexico to Hudson's Bay, are under the sovereignty of two great Anglo-American Governments. In the probabilities of the future, whether by just or unjust means, it appears the destiny of all America to fall under the dominion of those who speak the language of England. But let it be the policy of the Governments—let it be the sentiment of the people both of the United Kingdom and of the United States, to maintain peace and unrestricted intercourse and friendship between both nations.

Awful, indeed, would be the consequence of involving the British and American powers in the certain calamities of war. Civilisation in America and Europe would for the time be paralysed; and not only the present generation, but succeeding generations, would suffer grievously by an interruption of peace and intercourse between the members of a great family, who, though divided as to their governments, are nevertheless, in spite of their respective prejudices, bound together as one people by the inseparable union of speaking the same language—of being educated in schools in which the same lessons are taught, and trained at firesides where the mothers instil into their children the same virtues; by reading the same literature—by studying similar laws, by professing generally the same religion—by cherishing the same domestic associations, practising, from hereditary and common usage, the same manners; by having, until a very late period, a common history; in short, by inheriting their vices and virtues, and their folly and wisdom in common.

Considering the existing hourly intercourse by sailing-ships—by powerful steam-packets, more frequently than twice a week; by the great amount and value of commerce between the United Kingdom and the United States—the latter receiving in payment for her raw materials used in employing British skill and industry, more than £12,000,000, annually, in value, or one-sixth of the whole declared exports of British manufactures; the great emigration and the social relations between the two countries—surely the time has arrived when every existing difference should be adjusted, whether with regard to the British North American Fisheries, or whether in respect to the impediments to unrestricted navigation, arising out of the bad parts still remaining on the statute books of our navigation laws. It should in this practical age be, in wisdom and for mutual benefit and security, the first policy of the statesmen of England and America to remove all political, social and material causes of restriction and irritation.

It was the earnest wish of Washington, after he had achieved independence for his country, and when he became the first President of the New Republic, to place the relations of every British possession and every part of the United States upon the same freedom of intercourse as if both countries had still remained under one Government. This policy, when offered to the British Government by Mr. Adams, and accepted by Mr. Pitt as Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Shelburne Cabinet, was rejected by the Portland Ministry; and, instead, a war of material interests, of navigation-laws, and fiscal forts, under the name of custom-houses, were rigidly established in both countries. Since the time Mr. Huskisson became President of the Board of Trade, a more rational spirit began to pervade British councils. During the administration of Sir Robert Peel, the boundary disputes between the British possessions and the United States have been for ever settled. The recent commercial legislation of the United Kingdom has been accompanied by a more liberal tariff on the part of the Americans. All the relaxations which have been made in the British Navigation Laws have been met by equal relaxations on the part of the American Government. A Free-trade President has just been elected as the chief of the Executive in the United States. Never was there, after the days of Washington, so fair an opportunity of establishing a perfectly free and glorious social, commercial and maritime intercourse between every part of the British dominions, and every part of the United States of America.

AN UNBORN EPIC POEM.

We are seated in front of a pile of volumes of rather ponderous and bulky proportions, each being two good inches in thickness, of the size known among bibliopoles as super-royal, and substantially enveloped in stout half-russia bindings. So far as the printed contents of each are concerned, they are all precisely alike, seeing that they constitute the entire impression of a work designed by its laborious author to illuminate, delight and bless mankind, but which yet, from circumstances which we may chance to stumble upon in the course of the cursory inspection which it is our design to make, were never submitted to public criticism, and, indeed, may be said never to have seen the light. The work of which these few unwieldy tomes are all the examples which ever existed—at least, if we are to credit the dictum of a writer unknown inscribed on a fly-leaf of each copy—is a grand epic poem upon the subject of the chivalrous exploits of the first Richard. It consists of eighteen books or cantos in the Spenserian stanza, occupying something short of seven hundred pages, and contains altogether, upon a rough calculation, somewhere about eighteen thousand lines!

> Ah, who can tell how hard it is to climb

asks the author of "The Minstrel." We suspect that the writer of this unborn epic could have answered the question to his entire satisfaction. Between fifty and sixty years have rolled away since he consumed the midnight oil—which he had need to have laid in by the hogshead—in the laborious, but, alas! delusive attempt to accomplish a task, success in which would have endowed him with a claim to the perpetual homage of mankind. He struggled hard in the bold undertaking to erect the "monumentum ære perennius" which was to immortalise his memory; but he is gone down to the grave unhonoured and unsung, without even a niche in the airy temple which was the pole-star of his hopes, or a single line in the most comprehensive biography which we have been able to consult.

We have said above, that as to their printed contents the volumes are all alike; but their printed contents have comparatively little claim to our attention—and but for the manuscript comments with which their wide margins are so profusely sprinkled, we should not have disentombed them from the dust of more than half-a-century in which they have so long lain unnoticed. It is from these voluminous manuscript notes and criticisms that whatever information we have to impart concerning the author has been obtained. So far as we can make out from these documents, he figured in literary coteries during the two or three last decades of the last century as a kind of Mæcenas and general Amphytrion, keeping open house for men of literary repute, giving admirable dinners moistened with admirable wine, numbering among his intimate friends most of the choice spirits of the time, and assisting such as required his assistance both with his counsel and his purse. He must have been a staunch adherent of Church and State, a Tory of the good old school, and was, further, a man of first-rate social standing, having inherited a baronetcy and a large fortune. Among the large circle of his acquaintance were some few congenial hearts whom he had selected to be the confidants of his aspiring hopes, and the guides and counsellors in the prosecution of his secret labours. These favoured individuals were Richard Cumberland, the dramatist; Sotheby, the able translator of Wieland's "Oberon;" Mr. Fitzgerald; Pye, the Poet-laureate; Anstey, the author of the "New Bath Guide;" Boscawen, the translator of Horace; and Archdeacon Nares. To each of these gentlemen the indefatigable baronet forwarded a copy of each canto of his grand epic, as it came wet from the press, coupling the communication with an injunction of strict secrecy, and a request for their candid criticism of the work. When the whole eighteen cantos had been thus printed and purified by the fires of criticism, they were returned to the author, who had them bound up in separate volumes, and then collated the critiques of his numerous friends in his own private copy. These volumes now lie upon our table, and a very curious study they present to the connoisseur. The first thing that strikes us in glancing through them seriatim is the different degrees of importance which it is plain the several gentlemen attached to the office they had undertaken, or which, it may well be in the case of some of them, had been thrust into their reluctant hands. Nares, who, though he was not at that time archdeacon, was a prosperous man, well-to-do in the world, and a successful author to boot, paid very little attention to the business, and beyond a few general remarks, a score or two of objections to particular phrases, balanced with an equal number of tame compliments, did nothing. Sotheby, in the true spirit of a translator, confined his remarks to the suggesting of certain emendations calculated to clear up obscure passages, and to intensify various forms of expression in what he considered to be tame ones. The laureate was liberal in his commendations, but rigorous on the score of metre, rythm and cesuræ; he finds few faults, and administers his praise with the instinct of a true lover of the flattering incense. Mr. Fitzgerald returns his volume in a state of almost virgin purity; but appends an epistle on some blank leaves at the end, in which he instals his friend the baronet in the temple of Apollo among the bards of elder time. Anstey, the author of the "Bath Guide," in an independent and gentlemanly spirit, gives his candid judgment and advice, going carefully through the whole enormous poem, and never refraining from the outspoken expression of his sentiments, whatever they may happen to be. Cumberland evidently plays the part of a parasite, flattering his entertainer with eulogiums, and bespattering him with such fulsome laudations as are rarely to be met with out of the region of burlesque. We suspect the author of the "West Indian" must have been a confirmed diner-out, and that his flatulent praises were but the coin with which he purchased the solid pudding of the poetical baronet. Poor Boscawen, however, of all the critical seven, took the most pains, and, to our thinking, brought the best judgment to bear upon the Herculean labour; he seems to have been the most conscientious of critics, ever anxious to award praise where praise is due, and ever cautious lest he should compromise himself by too liberal a use of it.

Before citing the opinions of any of these seven wise men of Gotham in reference to the poem in question, it may be as well first to take a glance at the work itself, that the reader may have some faint idea of an undertaking so alarmingly voluminous. The action of the piece opens in England, at the period when the people are mourning the absence of Richard, who should have returned from the Crusade. It is suspected that he is confined in Austria; and Blondell, at a council at which the queen presides, volunteers to go and seek him out. He sets off on his mission—assumes the garb and profession of a minstrel—discovers him in durance vile in the castle of Henry of Austria—returns with the intelligence, and sets out again with a bevy of knights, backed by the Bishop of Cologne, who demand the freedom of the imprisoned sovereign. The Austrian tyrant refuses to liberate him, on the ground that he is guilty of treason, but consents to a trial before a Diet to be convened for the purpose. The trial takes place. Richard is accused, and called upon for his defence. This gives the captive monarch an opportunity of relating the whole history of the Crusade, which he does to the very minutest particulars, in at least ten thousand lines of Spenserian verse. After which the Bishop of Cologne sums up in a few lines, and acquits him of the charge. The king and his followers return home just in time to quash the rebellion fomented by his brother John. Peace thus restored in England, Richard invades Normandy, and subdues Philip as a matter of course. Blondell wins a bride by the exhibition of extraordinary prudence and valour; and the grand epic is wound up with a wedding according to the rule in such cases made and provided. There is, however, another plot which is hardly so comprehensible as the above. Besides the human actors in the drama, there is a numerous company of devils and infernal spirits, some of them of a complexion entirely original. Belial, Satan, Moloch, and Co. are in league with a firm not to be found upon 'Change, such as "False Philosophy," "Civil Discord," and other smaller fry, who, in the shape of entities with tails and horns, are continually doing business on a petty scale; the upshot of the whole, however, appears to be that the devils, little and big, ultimately get the worst of it—the honesty, moral courage, self-denial, and piety of Richard proving fatal to the whole infernal host. This plot, or plots, appears somewhat ludicrous in the brief summary we have given of it, but there is nothing ludicrous in the working of it out. The poem is a serious and rather majestic composition of the heroic cast, of which it may be as well here to give a few extracts by way of sample.

Blondell has arrived at the castle where he has reason to believe that Richard is imprisoned. The shades of night have descended; and he sees a light in the narrow window of a tower; and he suspects that to be the cell of his lost sovereign.

Impatient the mysterious truth to know,
He caught his harp and struck a gentle note;
The chord, half vibrating, subdued and low,
Scarce on the midnight breezes seemed to float.
Softly it stole along the tranquil moat,
As when amidst some lonely wood's retreat,
Desponding Philomel attunes her throat,
Her melancholy fortunes to repeat
Her song she oft renews with cadence sad and sweet.

He paused . . . . . .
When from the tower was heard a deep and long-drawn sigh.

The mournful sound electrified his soul;
Thoughtful he stood, yet firm and unappalled,
His cherished hope now rose beyond control,
That here his much-loved monarch lay enthralled.
Now to his working fancy he recalled
The scenes of early youth, when on the plain
Of fair Poictou, in princely state installed,
The gallant Richard held his peaceful reign,
And framed the lively song, and raised the tender strain.

The following selections from different parts of the volume may serve to show the author's powers of description, and his use of metaphors and similes.

Richard's faithful barons, during his absence, suddenly take arms against John.

On every side was heard the trump of war;
High in the air unnumbered banners waved,
And showed their rich emblazonments afar.
The generous steed no more his fleet limbs laved
In lake or stream; the conflict rude he braved,
Arched his high neck, and shook his flowing mane;
The Chanfron rich and Poitrinal engraved
Firm and erect he bore; with proud disdain
He climbed the impending cliff, or scoured along the plain.

Blondell and his friends are leaving England intending to bring back the king.

Clear was the sky, and favouring was the gale,
The busy mariners their anchors weighed,
And stretched with dexterous hand the flowing sail·
The curling billows round the vessel played,
While on the top-mast's giddy height displayed,
Courting the breeze, the blood-red pennants flew:
The pilot's skill the gliding barks obeyed,
And as loud carolled the observant crew,
Old England's white-robed coasts receded from their view.

Now sunk the sun beneath the western wave,
While the ascending moon, serenely bright,
From heaven's high arch her silvery lustry gave,
Shedding o'er every soul a calm delight.
The crowded warriors hailed the welcome sight.

The ploughman harnessed now his lusty team,
And slowly o'er the glebe pursued his way;
Now from the horizon glanced the morn's grey beam,
And o'er reposing nature shot its ray:
The early lark, her homage glad to pay,
Carolled her hymn, and poised on outspread wing,
Hailed the resplendent harbinger of day.

The following is a description of a volcanic eruption witnessed by the Crusaders on their passage out:—

Anon, in clouds and murky darkness veiled,
The labouring moon confessed some potent spell;
From suffering spirits who their torments wailed,
Groans seemed to burst, with many a fearful yell
Of fiends escaped from caves of agonising hell.

But soon superior wonders broke around.
Through the deep gloom uprose with dread ascent
A fiery column. With appalling sound
Bursting across the black expanse it sent,
'Mid lightnings fierce, its horrible content.
Myriads of glowing rocks with headlong force
Ploughed up the waves and ocean's cavern rent;
While down the mountain's side, with thunders hoarse
A foaming torrent marked its desolating course.

The City of Acre is thus depicted:—

Of form triangular, and stretching wide
Its ample walls, the town was seen to stand,
With ramparts high and turrets huge supplied,
Which to the north and east, on either hand,
Appeared their strong embattled fronts to expand;
While, on the south and west, old ocean's wave,
As if to guard the far diverging strand,
Majestically rolled, its foes to brave,
And o'er the pebbly beach its foaming torrent drave.

A band of fresh troops coming to the rescue are thus paralleled with a swarm of bees:—

As when at morn's fresh call, the busy swarm
Forth issuing, haste their labours to renew,
Where'er the sun extends his influence warm
The eager race their various task pursue,
And taste the flowery sweets yet moist with dew:
So thronged the warriors of the Christian name,
When at religion's call they dauntless flew,
Their suffering brethren to redeem from shame,
To aid their failing cause and prop their tottering fame.

The arrival of Saladin to take command of his host is compared to the flooding of the Nile:—

As when the sun in fiery Cancer reigns
The Nile, green-mantling, half-exhausted flows,
And gasping Egypt mourns her arid plains;
Soon as the torrents, charged with melting snows,
Swell the glad stream, and far their slime depose,
Plenty and joy her laughing fields adorn,
Nature with vigour renovated glows,
And fruitful Ceres from her copious horn
Scatters her gifts profuse, and gilds the waving corn.

So to the bands midst Acre's ramparts pent
Their valiant king's approach propitious seemed.
As o'er the hills their anxious glance they bent,
A long-drawn line of helms and corslets gleamed,
As if prolific earth with warriors teemed,
And Cadmus till'd again his Theban field.

Of a hundred descriptions of battle-scenes the following may be considered a fair specimen:—

Around confusion, dread and horror reigned;
O'er either host remorseless Ate soared,
And the parched field promiscuous slaughter stained.
Still from their ranks with countless numbers stored,
New bands of combatants the Pagans poured,
Careless of life and prodigal of blood;
Now lance with lance was mixed, and sword with sword—
In onset close the mingled warriors stood,
While from their riven mails fast streamed a gory flood.

Philip of France accuses Lusignan of cowardice:—

"No more in glittering arms thy limbs incase,
Cast off thy nodding helm, thy faulchion break,
And honoured chivalry no more disgrace!
Hence to thy tent! Judea's throne forsake!
Sit at thy loom, Sybilla's distaff take,
Enjoy her treasures, but forego her realm!
When vengeful Pagans its foundations shake,
Let Conrad's powerful hand direct its helm,
His rightful sceptre wield, and Saladin o'erwhelm."

The Crusaders offer up their thanksgivings after a victory, having first attended to the wounded:—

Soon as these needful functions were performed,
Our fervent hearts to heaven's tribunal soared.
With gratitude and with devotion warmed,
To the protecting and eternal Lord
Our souls in prayer and hymns of joy we poured.
Our warriors kneeling on th' ensanguined ground,
The sovereign ruler of the world adored;
And as on high the chorus swell'd around,
Immortal spirits heard, and sanctified the sound.

Richard is favoured at midnight with a visit from the shade of his dead father, who reveals to him the future events of the war, and the domestic treasons at home.

Musing on this, one eve I sought my tent
As the declining sun illumed the west.
There, by fatigue o'ercome, by watchings spent,
My simple couch I not unwilling pressed,
Implor'd th' inspiring grace of Heaven, and sank to rest.

When lo! a mystic vision of the night,
As wrapt in sleep I lay, came o'er my soul.
Methought amid the gloom a glancing light
With undulating radiance gently stole;
A sound confused, like thunder's distant roll,
My ears invaded; straight, with solemn tread,
And mien demonstrative of high control,
A martial form advanced; a casque his head
Enveloped, and around its plumes diverging spread.

With wonder moved, the phantom I beheld,
And, gazing, thrice to hail him I essayed,
But awe my faculties in silence held.
Meantime, his vizor raising, he displayed
To my fixed gaze my father's honoured shade.

The she-demon, False Philosophy, who plays a considerable part in the drama, and whose object it appears to be to disseminate principles precisely akin to the French socialists' of the present day, is thus depicted:—

Imposing was her look, her aspect fair;
Smooth was her brow, and melting was her eye;
Her cheek with smiles was dimpled, and her air
Of all that lured the sense disclosed a semblance rare.

A magic mirror in her hand she reared,
On whose extended surface, polished bright,
The gay temptations of her rule appeared.
There was pourtrayed young reason's dawning light,
Dispersing superstition's gloomy night;
There nations freed from thraldom were beheld,
Restored to liberty and nature's right;
While monarchs, from their falling thrones impelled,
And faith and truth o'erthrown, her impious triumph swelled.

A flowing robe of empyrean blue
Folded around her to conceal her shape,
And shroud her foul and monstrous limbs from view.

The Demon of Discord harangues a London mob with a result thus described:—

Not otherwise than when a tempest hoarse
Tears through the dark recesses of the deep,
Its caverns echo to the boisterous force
Which ploughs its foaming surface; rude and steep
Mount its huge billows, by whose powerful sweep
The navies which triumphant rode are crushed,
And time-worn rocks no more their stations keep;
So, with the hope of spoil and slaughter flushed,
The savage mob as willed the imperious demon rushed.

The above examples may suffice to give the reader a tolerable idea of the style of execution which characterises this unpublished epic. We have not given them precisely as they stand in the printed copies, preferring rather to present them to the public as they were subsequently polished up by the author's adoptions of and improvements upon the critical suggestions of the gentlemen who were in his confidence. We will proceed now to give some specimens of the style of criticism with which the baronet was favoured by his friends, and the effect which it appears to have had upon him in the further prosecution of his labours.

We need not look farther than the very first stanza for a fair sample of the labours of the seven censors. Originally the stanza stood thus:—

Him who on Judah's blood-stained shore displayed
The holy banner of the cross, I sing;
Immortal Muse! impart thy heavenly aid:
From the Aonian mount with rapid wing

Thy potent inspiration deign to bring;
Teach me to trace the effects of Austria's hate,
And the foul wrongs of Gallia's treacherous king;
To tell how Richard, long oppressed by fate,
O'er adverse hell prevailed, and grew by sufferings great.

Against the verse as it thus stood the following objections were made. First Pye, the laureate, objects classically to commencing an epic poem with a pronoun in the objective case; and proposes the following alteration of the first two lines:—

The lion-hearted monarch, who display'd
His banner on Judea's shore I sing.

In the next place Nares, the ecclesiastic, submits that "as the present poem is writ in accordance with Christian theology, the muse cannot with propriety be invoked from the Aonian mount," and proposes that, like Milton's "Urania," she may be called to descend from heaven.

Sotheby finds the fifth line in the verse rather cumbrous, and partaking of the tame and commonplace, and recommends the substitution of this—

Descending heavenly inspiration bring.

Cumberland, without making any remark, corrects the two last lines, and makes them read thus:—

To tell how Richard, midst ye storms of fate,
Triumph'd in Hell's despight, and grew by sufferings great.

Mr. Anstey's remarks, which agree very much with those of Nares, are as follows:—"As the outset is very material, I must take the freedom of remarking that the fifth line must at all events be altered. Considering the subject is connected with religion and history, something more characteristic might be introduced in the address with effect. Milton has therefore chosen 'Urania' for his muse. The passage must be altered, as the fifth line sinks. Something of this kind might perhaps furnish a hint to be improved upon—

Impart, Urania, thy celestial* aid, (* Query.)
And from the Aonian mount with rapid wing,
Light, truth, and heavenly inspiration bring."

Boscawen thus delivers himself. "It is unpleasant to object in limine; but I would recommend the exordium to be revised. The lines do not appear (upon the whole) so good as they ought to be, particularly ye two first and ye sixth. The seventh, too, is rather equivocal in meaning. To the two last lines I have not any objection."

We might, if we chose, quote five hundred verses which underwent similar treatment to the above; but we imagine that one specimen will be quite sufficient for the reader. There is hardly a page which, in one or other of the volumes, is not scribbled over in the margin with critical, commendatory, or disparaging observations, and which does not suggest some supposed improvement. It is difficult to imagine what must have been the feelings of the author as he conned over these numberless attestations of the taste and industry of his friends. One thing, however, is very certain, and that is, that he considered them of some value; for he has taken the incredible pains of collating them all in one separate volume. This volume presents a most curious, and, at first sight, incomprehensible spectacle. It might almost be taken, at a cursory glance, for the old worn-out day-book of a retail tradesman, with all the accounts crossed out, so completely is the print eclipsed by the multitudinous and blotty manuscript; but it is perhaps more suggestive to the mind of a picture of a celebrated Grecian artist, which was hung up in the public place, in company with a pot of paint and a brush, and upon which the people were invited to mark what each considered objectionable; and which was entirely obliterated by the comments of the discriminating republicans. In addition to the suggested emendations and alterations, there are general remarks appended at the end of each canto, and an opinion expressed at some length at the close of the poem. From these more extended critiques we must extract a few passages, characteristic of the writers, and possessing some value as indicative of the prevailing ideas among literary men on the subject of poetical composition. For the sake of brevity we shall confine our extracts to the remarks of Cumberland and Boscawen. The former is prodigal of praise to a degree that renders his sincerity more than suspicious; the latter is honest and candid, and records his unbiassed judgment more faithfully than was perhaps consistent with prudence in the humble intimate of a wealthy aspirant for poetical honours.

In the fifteenth canto Richard is tempted by the devil. The temptation is a scene of unhallowed pleasure, which is very glowingly described in the text. Cumberland's comments upon this canto are as follows:—

"The vision of Richard is exquisitely done. It is conceived and executed on the richest vein of poetry, and will reflect lasting honour upon its author. Warm it certainly is, and highly coloured, but I have not the heart to propose a single criticism that might tend to damp its vigour. The word fruition may perhaps be too strong, but I have not marked it. 'Tis a kind of sacrilege to blot the page that glows with such poetry. Stet in toto."

The following is his letter to the baronet, on returning the concluding canto:—

"I am happy to return into the hands of the author this last volume, which concludes the heroic poem of Richard the First, a work which will confer upon the poet lasting honour. Long and laborious as the work has been, this concluding book is perhaps the most brilliant in the whole work. It abounds with beauties, and, which is above all things desirable, it leaves the mind entirely satisfied with the catastrophe. I am not sure that anything ought more to be wished for, or could well be added. If the author thinks otherwise, I should suggest a stanza or two of the prospective or prophetic cast, in which he might pourtray the farther glories of his country, in which the present times may seem to warrant him.

"I now earnestly repeat my wishes for the fame of my friend, and the good reception of his splendid work, with which view I conjure him to reconsider every page with his most critical and minute attention. He has chosen a stanza which, though familiarity has at last reconciled to my ear, still my severer judgment does not accord to. Difficult in the extreme it is to keep the sense pure and distinct through such a clatter of rhymes; and though it is not very often he wants shelter in that difficulty, I would not wish him to seek it in a single instance if it were possible. I therefore, amongst other things, altogether protest against his participles,* whose jingle is unworthy of his work. I have expressed some discontent at the bottom of the 16th book; I repeat it in this place, and wish him to take it into serious review. I must beg he will not print his verbs in the past tenses without the customary abbreviations, which all poets heretofore have adopted. It will appear affected, and must tend to mislead common readers, disgust others, and edify none. I hope he will not print it in such a style of expense as shall cause it to be the purchase of the few rather than the many; at least, not his first edition.

"I thank him not less for the confidence he has reposed in me than for the pleasure he has bestowed on me; and I wish him all possible success with his contemporaries, and all the fame he merits from posterity.

"Richard Cumberland.

"April 22d, 1800.
Tunbridge Wells."

The remarks of Boscawen, were they transcribed seriatim, would of themselves fill a moderate volume. Although he is as liberal as the others in his verbal criticisms and emendations, he yet appends whole pages of observations at the end of the several cantos. What he mainly insists upon is condensation; he would have the entire poem cut down at least one-third. Richard's long-winded harangue should be broken up, and the devils great and small should either be banished from the scene altogether, or amalgamated into one black gentleman. Boscawen's letter to the baronet, appended to the last canto of the poem, occupies eleven closely-written pages, and is quite a learned and elaborate essay upon the true elements of the epic, which he describes as the grandest of all human achievements, a triumph of art of which the world has never seen more than four or five instances. He professes to shrink from pronouncing upon a labour which ought to be χτημα εις αει, declaring himself incompetent to pronounce judgment; but he does pronounce judgment nevertheless, analysing his friend's performance with much industry and more minuteness, and weighing and measuring it throughout according to the old scholastic standards. He declares it wanting in unity, but asserts that he should not regard that defect much were the poem his, "as it is of much more consequence that it should be a spirited and interesting than a critically regular epic poem." He is rather severe in his strictures on the want of variety in the different characters of the personages of the poem; he animadverts racily upon the machinery, banishing back to Limbo the entire flock of devils, demons, and supernatural creations. He praises the descriptive powers of the writer; but would have their exercise restrained, and would prune the luxuriance of his most successful passages. He commends the style and manner as often good; but considers that both are frequently vitiated through the necessities of the unmanageable stanza, which resembles the bed of Procrustes, and compels tautology and redundancy of expression. Upon the versification he bestows a moderate share of praise; but urgently recommends a careful revision of it in every part, with a view especially to the perfection of the Alexandrines, upon which mainly, according to him, the strength of the verse depends. He concludes his letter in the following words:—

"I have run into far greater length than I intended; but the most important consideration is still behind, and it is one upon which I ought not, perhaps, to decide positively, since friendly partiality for the author may warp me one way, or a jealous anxiety for the full success of his work may draw me too far to the other side. The serious question on this poem is, whether, allowing it to have ever so many beauties, it is, upon the whole, so written as to keep alive the curiosity and rivet the attention of the reader? 'Unhappily,' says Dr. Johnson, 'this pernicious failure is that which our author is least able to discover. We are seldom tiresome to ourselves; and the act of composition fills and delights the mind with change of language and succession of images; every couplet when produced is new; and novelty is the great source of pleasure. Perhaps no man ever thought a line superfluous when he first wrote it, or contracted his work till his ebullitions of invention had subsided.' This admirable passage is worthy the serious attention of every writer of a long poem. The nature of the stanza you have adopted has often led you into a circuitous mode of expression very likely to fatigue an indifferent reader. My curiosity and high opinion of the writer led me pretty well through passages that to others may seem heavy, and details that I cannot help thinking too minute. . . . But the world in general cannot be expected to read the work with the same dispositions; and such is the general indolence and aversion to long works, especially of this kind, that I am convinced Dr. Johnson's observations apply more strongly now than when he wrote them. If he is right, you must not trust your own judgment on this point; but if your friends who have read the poem do but hint that it might be shortened a little, conclude that it ought to be very much so; for it is a delicate subject on which to give an opinion. Some of your friends may fear that if they speak quite out,

* What Cumberland calls "participles," Pye designates as double rhymes—such as "ending" and "bending," "condition" and "position," &c., &c. It is singular that each and all of the critics make a dead set against such rhymes, which they regard as an uncouth innovation by no means to be tolerated. Anstey lays it down as a rule that they can never be used but in burlesque verse. The baronet, however, did not agree with them, and retained his double rhymes, though, in accordance with Cumberland's advice, he altered the past tenses of all his verbs to the number of scores of thousands, abbreviating them by substituting the apostrophe for the letter e, thus printing "employ'd" instead of "employed," &c., &c., through the whole book.

though you must esteem, you may not like them so well in future. For my own part, I throw myself entirely on your candour, when I give it as my sentiments that you cannot exercise too much self-denial in revising this poem; that you should give up some lines and some passages that have given you pleasure in composing, if the rejection of them is conducive to the great object of condensing, and in many parts enlivening and invigorating the work; and that you ought to sit down with a fixed resolution to shorten it by, at least, one third; the effect of which operation, diligently and judiciously performed, would, I am convinced, be highly conducive to the fame and success of your poem.

Vive, Vale!"

Thus much for the counsels of friends. What was their effect upon the hospitable and worthy baronet in the first instance we have no means of ascertaining. It is probable that the process of collating the judgments of the whole seven into one volume, a task which he personally accomplished, had the effect of rendering him less enamoured of his performance than he had been when he first contemplated its virgin pages fresh from the hands of the printer. It is impossible to recall the history of this vast undertaking throughout its never-to-be-accomplished career without a feeling of something like veneration for the chief actor in it. He must have been a hero in some sort; he must have possessed perseverance enough to have laboured for long years steadily in the pursuit of one object, and that confessedly, of all human enterprises, the most difficult of attainment; he must have had sufficient candour to defer to the opinions of counsellors, the major part of whom were by no means indisposed to assert their own superiority by the display of his weakness; and, as the event proved, he must have had such a modest estimation of his own powers as induced him finally to consign to forgetfulness the fruits of many long and laborious years of study, to say nothing of the sacrifice of several hundred pounds of expense. He was plainly a man of a noble spirit; he preferred oblivion to a doubtful reputation; would rather be nothing than not the most worthy. Nihil nisi honorificentissime might have been his motto. He disdained to become a Triton among minnows—aspiring to the summit of Parnassus, and failing, he had no notion of taking a station at the foot of the mount, but abandoned the territory to others. As far as we are qualified to judge, he was a better classic and a better poet than many of his contemporaries, who yet cut a brilliant figure for a time. Had Hayley produced such a work as our modest baronet had the judgment to suppress, all Christendom would have heard of it, and there would have been no end, for a twelvemonth at least, of ovations and glorifications on account of it from all the petty poetasters of the day. It is better as it is. To a noble mind a mushroom reputation is worse than none at all; and it is far better for mankind that great artistic failures should be kept out of view than that they should be paraded to excite the admiration of the untaught and undiscriminating. The baronet went down to the tomb of his fathers some thirty years ago. It is not clear to us that we have any right to publish his name, which he himself never thought fit to print; but there is no reason that the world should not profit by his example, which we recommend to the consideration of the poets and would-be poets of our time, who, as we have good and sufficient reasons for asserting, are but too prone to rush headlong into print and publication whenever the means and the opportunity are in their power. It may be of use to some of our young friends especially to ponder over the above brief history of an Unborn Epic Poem.

PARLEZ VOUS FRANCAIS?

AN ADVENTURE IN ROUEN.

"Parlez vous Francais?"—Many persons to whom this question is put will bluntly answer "No," and that's exactly my predicament. I can't speak French. I don't pretend to do it. I never did; and, in all human probability, I never shall. Don't imagine for one instant that I am a gentleman "whose education has been neglected," as the phrase is. Very far from it. To this day, I have the most vivid recollection of the pains my poor dear mother used to be at with "Cobwebs to Catch Flies" and "L'Ami des Enfants." But the "cobwebs" never caught me; and the stories of "L'Ami," which, when translated for my benefit by a younger sister, I considered infinitely superior in point of brilliancy and interest to "Frank" or "Rosamond," remain to this moment, so far as I am concerned, as undecipherable as a Chaldee manuscript, or an epigram in the Enchorial character.

In due course of time I was consigned to the care of the Reverend Dr. Muddlehead. "French, German, dancing, gymnastics, and the use of the globes," were among the more prominent attractions of his prospectus. The first-mentioned elements of a polite education were imparted by a hairy and gigantic Swiss, of the name of Lafargue. Whether, under his auspices, I should have entered life as an accomplished linguist it is now impossible for me to say. My own comfortable conviction is that I should. But M. Lafargue was no more than man; and the little hand-maiden of our establishment "warn't going to put up with no foreigneerin' impudence—she warn't." What the exact nature of the misunderstanding may have been—whether the brawny Helvetian may have taken a more romantic view of the relation existing between himself and the coy damsel than the handbook of etiquette for gentlemen would have warranted, we were never able to discover. All I know is, that one morning there was a particularly stormy trio in the back-parlour—that the maid, the man, and the master severally explained their respective ideas upon the subject under discussion; and that ultimately the man effected a hasty exit from the premises, apparently with no particular intention of returning in a hurry.

After him came a nice, meek little Parisian, who called himself an Abbé. He was not the sort of man though, for a French master. He wanted energy, both physical and moral, to control the pack of boisterous little savages among whom his lot was cast. His end was not peace. Adjoining the school-room was a long blind passage, used for the purposes of a lumber-closet; it was crammed with ricketty chairs, lame forms, desks, packing-cases, and a second-hand pulpit. The window had been bricked up to save the tax; and a luxuriant crop of cobwebs and a mouldy smell were among the more striking characteristics of the apartment. Generally, the French lesson took place in the parlour; but one fine frosty day Muddlehead gave in to a suggestion that it was warmer there than in the school-room, and appropriated the same to his own division—the French class being accordingly mustered in the latter. Just as the lesson came to a conclusion, I was seized with an uncontrollable impulse to perpetrate a most unwarrantable hoax upon the poor inoffensive little Abbé. "Monsieur!" I shouted, as he picked up his well-worn shovel hat and bowed courteously to the class, "Monsieur, dis door non dat pour takee vous out in de road!" "Ah, c'est ça! Mille remerciments—ne vous dérangez pas, monsieur—je vous en prie!" exclaimed the unsuspecting victim, as I threw open the door of the lumber-closet with a profound salaam. "Merci beaucoup! En face, n'est pas? Adieu, messieurs, adieu!" Of course the door was shut and locked upon him in an instant. For half a minute or so, we heard him breaking his shins over a variety of obstacles, still softly murmuring "Merci beaucoup." Then came a tremendous bang, announcing to our uncontrollable delight that his reverend head had at last come in collision with the second-hand pulpit. We could stand it no longer. Out we rushed into the play-ground, with a roar of laughter which must long have reverberated within those inky walls. Half an hour afterwards the unlucky prisoner was discovered by the Doctor himself, tapping like a woodpecker and earnestly imploring freedom, pour l'amour de Di-eu!

The Abbé having very prudently declined to risk his neck amongst us any longer, the Doctor announced that the modern language department would in future be superintended by himself. A nice mess he made of it! Ultimately, in short, I matriculated at Trinity College, Cambridge, knowing just about as much French as the most illiterate of my cotemporaries; which, as nine out of ten knew none at all, is, I am sure, a sufficiently moderate estimate of my accomplishments.

Some venerable female reader may possibly imagine that I had waived the incalculable advantage of acquiring the modern languages while the organs of speech were still young and flexible, in order to place myself, unembarassed by vicious habits of pronunciation, in the hands of those eminent professors who adorn the halls and cloisters of our glorious Alma Mater. Alas! university-men—none others, probably—will believe me when I say that, from the time of my entering to that of my leaving Trinity, not one word of any living language, barring my own, ever passed my lips. They formed the subject of no lectures—no examinations, that I ever heard of. They were certainly included in no part of our college routine, and were equally ignored for degree. So I left Trinity as ignorant in this respect as I entered it; that is to say, to the question, "Parlez-vous Francais?" I bluntly answered, "No."

I have heard a good many reasons advanced on either side for what appears to me, at this (not very great) distance of time, a most unfortunate educational fallacy. I am not by any means alluding invidiously to our university system, such as it was half a dozen years ago, but to the almost exclusive preference to this day bestowed upon Greek and Latin in nine places of education out of ten; to the fact, in short, that in the aforesaid nine places the modern languages are either burked altogether, or treated as a necessary evil—a flimsy and all but useless adjunct to the more honourable branches of the tree of knowledge.

Of course I am not going to enter here upon the merits or demerits of what is called a classical education. I only aver that, upon arriving at man's estate, I find myself in possession of a great deal of knowledge that I don't want, and totally destitute of a great deal that I do. I have had enough of Homer and Virgil to last my time. I am very unlikely to catch myself again attempting a Greek Iambic; and I cannot help, perhaps peevishly, wishing that, even at the expense of a little Greek, the rudiments, at least, of French and German had been crammed into me before I was too old to be whipped; for that precious season is very brief, and flieth away never to return. And why, when those golden hours were on the wing; when the years were so rapidly vanishing in which the pronunciation of a living language can alone be certainly acquired—my time should have been altogether spent among the dead, is still to me one of the many mysteries of my existence. I was taught to look upon the great languages of the continent as almost beneath the true dignity of a schoolboy. I was encouraged to believe that I studied them, not so much for my own benefit as to find bread and butter for penniless Germans and starving French refugees. As a man of the world, I can now recognise plainly enough the stark absurdity of such an error. I now find myself debarred from half the advantages of travel, without such an expenditure of time and labour as I have neither the leisure nor the inclination to bestow. I am told, indeed, that, having once acquired the dead languages, the path to the living ought to be smooth and easy. What mockery! I now know to my sorrow that I have been ploughing all seed-time, and that the harvest will be exactly such as I had alone a right to expect.

I have been led into the above reflections partly because I rather wanted a vent for my feelings, and partly because they in some degree bear upon my story. Now I've done. Forget that I ever bored you with my rights and my wrongs, and I'll tell you exactly what befel me not six months ago; that is to say, in the month of August in the year of grace one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two.

The bells of Southampton were just chiming twelve one fine starry night in the month and year last aforesaid, when that "fast and commodious steam-ship," Little Wonder, cast off her last lashing, and went paddling down the water, outward-bound for the fair city of Havre-de-Grace. Most of her passengers have turned in for the night; but, if you carefully inspect the deck, you will, I flatter myself, find one object not altogether unworthy of your attention. I allude to a graceful and athletic young man of about five-and-twenty. He is thoughtfully pacing the deck, leaving behind him at every turn a whiff of delicate aroma from one of the most magnificent principes that ever crossed Hudson's counter. His dress is perfectly fashionable, without being in the slightest degree overdone; nothing of the stable about it. No horse-shoe pins in the region of the choker; no silver snaffle-bit to accommodate a cutaway that won't button; no incredible steeplechase performed over a field of cheap calico as the decoration of his shirt. Raise your eyes to his face, and there, I flatter myself, you will find your previous impressions in his favour, if possible, strengthened. It is at once handsome, good-humoured, and intelligent. And did you ever in your life see such a pair of whiskers? None of your short, scrubby, contemptible patches of bristle that too often do duty for what, when properly developed, are among the noblest appendages of a man. His are really a glorious pair, long, luxuriant, and wavy; soft as silk, and in colour the deepest and the richest auburn. Many a duke would offer a hundred pounds a piece for those priceless ornaments, could they only be transferred, uninjured, to thrive upon his sterile and unmanly cheeks.

It is really with a feeling of mingled modesty and pride that I inform the reader that I have all this time been endeavouring to give him some faint idea of myself. If I have drawn a fascinating and brilliant picture, he will, I trust, have the goodness to ascribe it to the candour rather than to the vanity of the artist. I wish to vindicate my claim upon his confidence by proving, at the outset, that I do not shrink from details which I am very well aware may be interpreted to my disadvantage. I shall consider myself now fairly introduced, and proceed without further ceremony to explain who I am, and why, at this particular moment, I find myself on board "the fast and commodious steam-ship" Little Wonder.

I'm not so badly off as times go, considering all things. I've three hundred a-year of my own, and a berth in the Treasury. From the latter I draw something under a hundred and twenty. I accept it as an acknowledgment upon the part of Government that they are bound to find me a Hansom there and back, and admire the delicacy with which it is made. Outside Downing-street I get through my time easily enough. I have a good club, lots of friends, a hospitable circle of acquaintance, and find an invitation on my table for five nights out of six in the season. I likewise assert my claims to respectability through the medium of a small tiger, and a stall at Covent-garden. To fill up leisure-moments, I am also a trifle in love.

The fact is, cousin Lucy is one of the most perfectly bewitching little creatures alive. I took the liberty of mentioning the fact to her last Christmas, at a particularly nice ball, not a hundred miles from Grosvenor-square. The result was, that we parted with a very definite understanding that the matter couldn't by any possibility rest there. Soon afterwards, however, she went to live with some relations of her mother's, who keep a country house a couple of miles out of Rouen. A very slight exertion of diplomacy upon my part was requisite to procure me a sort of general invitation, "whenever I could be spared;" and Government, at my urgent request, having consented to make that sacrifice for a good three weeks last August, the motive which led me on board the Little Wonder is, I suppose, sufficiently explained.

I am not going to exasperate the reader with any detailed account of my sensations upon first arriving in sight of a foreign town. Suffice it, that, at eight of the clock, we found ourselves quietly gliding into Havre, and were saluted with the roar of welcome from the commissionaires on the quay, with which everybody is familiar who has ever landed in France.

Stepping ashore with the air of a veteran traveller, I accepted an hotel card from a grimy gentleman who appeared to speak English with tolerable fluency. I desired him to take me at once to his hotel, order my breakfast, clear my baggage, see to my passport, and have a cab in readiness to take me to the rail in time for the train to Rouen at 12 15; all which he promised punctually to perform. After breakfast, I strolled into the town, changed some money, and made a few trifling purchases with an ease and celerity that perfectly delighted me. Indeed, I returned to my hotel with the flattering conviction strong upon me, that the knowledge of the language of so civil and intelligent a people was, after all, mere matter of curiosity, and perfectly superfluous to the gentleman-tourist.

My commissionaire, whom I had gratified with the present of a five-franc piece, insisted upon accompanying me to the railway, and saving me all trouble in procuring my ticket. Upon his tendering it to me, I perceived at once that it was for Barentin and not for Rouen, and begged him to rectify the mistake without delay.*

"It's quite right, sir," said an Englishman who passed at that moment. "I asked for one to Paris just now; and here it is, just the same as your own. It seems they won't book further than Barentin this morning. You will have to take another ticket when you get there, that's all. There's a screw loose somewhere, evidently; but as they assure me there will be no interruption to our journey, I suppose we may trust to their honour."

"And where is Barentin, pray?" said I; having about as much idea of the geography of France as of that of Arabia Felix.

"Ten miles this side Rouen, according to Bradshaw," returned my companion. "And now suppose we make for the waiting-room, as I see their time's just up."

Five minutes more, and we were bowling smoothly away over the rich glowing pasture land of Normandy. My new companion proved a capital fellow, and chatted freely of France, of Paris, of the glories of the Bal d'Opera, and the brilliant mysteries of the Valentino and the Mobille. I never felt in such spirits; and never did I congratulate myself more upon having made the grand discovery that the French language was a drug in its own country—a showy but altogether useless accomplishment to the traveller. By Harfleur we rushed, and Alvimare, and Yvetot, famous in old story for its rustic king. At half-past one, however, we came to a dead stop.

"Barentin! Descendez, messieurs, s'il vous plait," shouted the guard, flinging open the door of our carriage.

"Now for the mystery!" exclaimed my companion, springing out upon the platform.

The scene immediately around the station was certainly a curious one. Every imaginable description of vehicle that ever went upon wheels—every conceivable species of beast that ever wore a collar, appeared to have been collected in one heterogeneous mass. The ghosts of old, condemned diligences, that seemed coated with the rust and mud of another world—huge, windowless omnibuses, their panels cracked and sprung in every direction—ricketty gigs, gaudy pleasure-vans, country carts, apple-waggons, post-chaises, donkey-drags, had all evidently been awaiting our arrival. Nor were the carriages the most curious part of the scene. The whole neighbourhood must have been ransacked to furnish cattle and postillions for this extraordinary levy. Every galled jade, every sorry beast, every halt, lame, and blind thing that it ever entered into the heart of a knacker to conceive, was there. Tremulous, old mail-coachmen, dragged helplessly from the chimney-corner to cough and wheeze upon the box—sturdy ostlers, professed flymen, and red, clumsy boys, fresh from the plough-tail or the cider-mill, had been pressed alike into the service. I scarcely knew whether to be most amused or horrified at the appearance of the cortége, in which I was evidently to bear a part.

Just as I was inwardly calculating to which crazy vehicle I could intrust my own sacred person with any reasonable prospect of escaping instant dissolution, my railway-acquaintance came up.

"The guard tells me the rails between this and Malaunay, the next station, have been washed away by the rain. Nice, isn't it? You see our conveyance for the next two hours. He says our luggage will follow us all right; but I shall be late for dinner in Paris, and be hanged to them!"

The passengers were now crowding rapidly into the various uncouth machines, one of which broke down summarily before it had got half its complement on board. Having secured a ticket for Rouen, I was looking around for my friend and interpreter, when a few heavy drops of rain from a suspicious-looking cloud overhead produced a frantic scramble for inside places. Frenchmen have the most indescribable horror of a wet skin; and the one pinnacle of politeness to which no one born south of the channel has ever yet attained is that of "riding outside to oblige a lady." For my own part, having no fancy to be left behind altogether, I contrived, with some difficulty, to clamber upon the roof of a huge, unwieldy omnibus; and there, buttoning my great coat close up to my chin, I determined manfully to await the worst.

I hadn't long to wait either. Hardly had the "Hup, allez!" of our driver set his lumbering team into a jog trot, when down came the rain in a perfect deluge. I soon found my umbrella totally useless, since, there being three persons besides myself in a row upon the roof, we simply poured cataracts over each other with very little advantage to ourselves. In fact our seat was soon swimming with water, which also washed backwards and forwards in the most cruel way over our boots. On we went, at first through a long, straggling, barbarous village, whose inhabitants stood staring at their open doors, and saluted us with shouts of laughter as we went by. Presently we got into a labyrinth of deep, sticky cross-roads, where we rolled and pitched like an Admiralty steamer. Then came a rough, tangled patch of woodland, where the streaming trees took part against us, and thrashed our hats off with their sodden branches. My own was picked up and returned to me by the conductor, neatly lined with mud; the good man, in presenting it, making a noise like a clock suddenly run down. To cut the matter short (I wish I could have done it at the time), we arrived at Malaunay in one hour and twenty minutes, splashed, drenched, and miserable; looking, indeed, as if we had been suspended for a similar period in a weak solution of muck.

The omnibus upon which I was seated happened to be about the last of the dripping convoy; and upon descending from my lofty perch, I found my previously-arrived fellow-passengers in a state of the most singular perplexity and dismay. A train was indeed in waiting to convey

* It may be as well to mention that the following anecdote of sharp railway practice in France is merely a narrative of what actually occurred to the writer of this article in the month of September last.

them to their several destinations, but, alas, it had just been gently intimated by the officials on duty that the transport of their luggage was another affair altogether. It was "to follow them, all right," according to the letter of the bond, but when was quite another question. "Sometime in the course of the night—probably the whole would be delivered as directed before 5 A.M. the next morning," was all the answer vouchsafed to some five hundred inquiries, yelled forth in every accent of despair. Fancy our position. Here was I, for instance, here were dozens and dozens of respectable women drenched to the skin, shivering with cold—many with a three hours' journey to Paris before them, and no prospect of a dry change till 5 A.M. the next day! One's money, one's dressing-case, and one's night-shirt, all in the inexorable maw of a French railway-van. And all this to gratify the infernal caprice of an odious Government monopoly, and countenance a lying statement in the Moniteur, that, "in spite of a trifling derangement of the permanent way, the traffic on the Paris and Rouen Railway had proceeded, as usual, without interruption." Bah! it was a sell—a hoax of the most cruel and unjustifiable kind—a swindle, which, putting even its more unfortunate features out of the question, could have been perpetrated only in a country where the men are slaves and where the Times doesn't exist.

"Here's a pretty predicament for an ardent lover!" said I to myself, as I marched indignantly out of the station at Rouen. "Here's a sight for an impassioned maiden! Not a dry stitch to my back!—no chance of a change till to-morrow! Lucky if I get it then"—for I recollected, with a shudder, that my industrious little tiger had, in the exercise of his juvenile zeal, inscribed all my packages with the words, CHARLES PALLMALL, ESQUIRE, PARIS, in dreadfully legible roundhand. "No particular fluency in the French language, and, by Jove! to make the thing perfect, all my money locked up in my writing-desk!"

In confirmation of the last frightful fact, I dived in vain into every separate pocket, and brought up nothing in the shape of coin but a few wet sous. It was my own carelessness, no doubt. I had spent every loose sixpence at Havre, with the exception of the few francs requisite to carry me to Rouen; never, of course, dreaming that I should be unable to draw upon my baggage for a supply. And here was the comfortable result

As I trudged heavily through the strange and busy streets of Rouen, the object of universal curiosity, for, to tell the truth, I looked more like a resuscitated gentleman fresh from the hands of the Royal Humane Society than an intelligent tourist, I instituted a mental court of inquiry as to what was best to be done. Such an adventure would have been nuts to a knight of romance, and invaluable to an adventurer of the middle ages; but, unluckily, we are very prosaic at the Treasury, and well up to the time of day; so the more promising features of my predicament went for nothing. The worst of it was, I had absolutely forgotten the address of M. Constantine, Lucy's present protector; or rather, trusting to a letter of introduction in my portmanteau, had never taken the trouble to get it by heart. Had I been so inclined, therefore, I should have had some difficulty in appealing to him in my distress, whilst the ridiculous figure I should cut, were I to present myself speechless, penniless, and soaking wet at a respectable hotel, became a more vivid conviction at every step. Matters, however, were growing desperate, and after meandering irresolutely for some time among the flower-stalls in front of the cathedral, and inwardly recanting certain heterodox opinions touching the utility of the French language in France, I bent my steps towards a small shop, inscribed Achat d'or et d'argent; intending forthwith, by dint of pantomine, to dispose of my watch, and thus obtain the means of entrance into a creditable hotel, without the very lame excuse of absolute destitution.

I was in the act of crossing the street for this purpose, and had already caught the eye of the hoary old usurer within, who was sitting behind a brass lattice, like a venerable parrot in his cage of golden wire, when, to my inexpressible relief, a well-known face appeared round the corner, within a few yards of me. The owner was a man of the name of Cutler, a quondam college-acquaintance, and, truth to tell, a fellow to whom I should have given a carefully wide berth had I encountered him in Regent-street but three days before. He never had been a friend of mine, nor, indeed, to the best of my knowledge, of any one else. There was a slang, repulsive familiarity about his manner that gave one, at first sight, the idea that he really intended to be agreeable, and would have probably succeeded if he hadn't so unmistakably been born a snob. Those who knew him better, however, told a very different story. He was by nature one of those coarse, selfish, hateful beings, the very texture of whose souls appears inconsistent with the growth of any generous sentiments, with the very existence of any manly thought. Had he been born a sultan, he would have been the most cruel and capricious tyrant that ever signed a death-warrant. Had he been born a vizier, he would have been the most cringing, servile sycophant that ever kissed the rod. He was just one of those men who, to borrow the illustration of Bacon, would have burnt down his neighbour's house in order to roast an egg, could he only have done it with impunity. At school he was universally characterised as a sneak. At college he was noted for vulgar and offensive practical jokes—a species of entertainment which the rarest tact and the nicest judgment can barely render tolerable in the society of gentlemen, and which, in his hands, became of course to the last degree insufferable. In this propensity, however, he was one day brought up with a round turn, as the sailors have it, and received from the right foot of a gigantic Johnian one of those straightforward and impressive hints which generally go such a long way with gentlemen of his description.

Were I writing for effect, I should certainly pique myself not a little upon the artistic manner in which I have brought out the lamentable perplexity of my situation. To be forced, not merely to claim acquaintance with, but to ask a favour of, such a brute, is to me, at this moment, evidence of such a deplorable state of difficulty and misery that, writing from my luxurious easy chair in Piccadilly, I can scarcely realise the fact that I am indeed the drenched and muddy beggarman who so eagerly attracted his notice in the streets of Rouen.

At first, my appearance so completely bewildered him that he stood like a man who has seen the ghost of his great-grandfather, or been unexpectedly tapped on the shoulder by a sheriff's officer. When, however, convinced of my identity, he asked me rather pointedly what I wanted with him?

In as few words as possible I explained the nature of my misfortune—that I was a stranger in the place and totally ignorant of the language. What did I want? Why, good gracious! what was a man in my predicament likely to want? I wanted him to introduce me at some decent hotel—to assure the landlord that I wasn't the illiterate impostor I appeared—to help me, if possible, out of his wardrobe; if not, to lend me a few napoleons until the next morning; and, above all, to assist me in discovering where M. Constantine resided; for the idea of remaining another hour in the same town with Lucy, without imprinting at least one kiss on her delicious lips, racked my brain with that species of longing torment which lovers only know.

At the mention of M. Constantine's name, my companion, who had evinced the most unequivocal symptoms of impatience during the recital of my wants and calamities, suddenly pricked up his ears.

"Ah, my dear fellow, if you only want to know where Constantine lives, I can help you there. I know a little of him myself, and a monstrous good fellow he is. As to an hotel, yes, there's the Hotel d'Angleterre, on the quay—capital house and civil people. I'd lend you any clothes you want with pleasure, but they'd be a mile too big for you; and, most unluckily, I'm out of cash to-day altogether. To-morrow or next day, I expect a remittance from London, and then we'll talk about it. In the mean time, let's turn into this café and have a glass of wine. You look more like a drowned rat than the fellow I remember at Trinity. Now, then," continued he, as the waiter placed a bottle of St. Emilien before us, "fill your glass and tell us what brings you thus en prince to the ancient city of Rouen."

"I am simply here upon a visit," I replied, "to M. Constantine and a cousin of mine, who is at present living in the house."

"A cousin of yours, my dear fellow! Who can you possibly mean?"

"I alluded to a young lady who is now, I understand, residing with his family," returned I as drily as possible, feeling confoundedly vexed at my own indiscretion in bringing Lucy into the conversation at all.

"Why, what an extraordinary coincidence!" exclaimed Cutler, putting down his glass. "To think that Lucy should be a cousin of yours, of all men in the world!"

"I was not aware," said I, looking him steadily in the face, "that you were sufficiently well acquainted with Miss Carlton to be entitled to make use of her Christian name."

"Not acquainted, my dear fellow! Why, I'm getting on like a house on fire in that quarter! Suppose we drink her health, proud little beauty that she is!" continued he, slapping me familiarly upon the knee.

Of course I knew better, theoretically, than to answer a fool according to his folly; but desperately hard indeed did I find it to act, at that moment, in accordance with the wise injunction. Not that a sensation of jealousy for one instant crossed my mind. Had I been informed in an anonymous letter that the Man in the Moon was languishing for Lucy, and had already built a cottage for her somewhere out in the Milky Way, I should have been scarcely more indifferent to the news. But to hear a name which I had taught myself to consider as something almost holy, a name which worked upon me with a soft mysterious power, purifying my whole nature with its gentle influence—to hear this name blurted presumptuously forth by an odious idiot, was within a hair's weight as much as I could bear. I looked at the empty claret-bottle, and I looked at his hateful head, and I saw plainly enough that he understood the glance.

"Come, old fellow, don't look so confoundedly black," he exclaimed, as he paid the waiter. "I meant no harm to you or your cousin. Come along, and I'll see what I can do for you. By Jove! you seem to have swapped hats with a chiffonier," continued he, as I picked up my muddy tile. "Why, your hair is one mass of mud! and as for those magnificent whiskers of yours, they're regularly plastered over your face. Look here; take my advice. Go to the barber's over the way and get yourself regularly combed and cleaned, while I cut across to my lodgings and see what I can do in the way of rigging you out."

Had the suggestion come from anybody else, it would have struck me as both good-natured and sensible; but I knew my man too well for that. I felt convinced that his principal object was to get rid of me at any price. I knew, moreover, that he perfectly appreciated the terms upon which I stood with Lucy, and that to insure my cutting a ridiculous figure in her eyes, there was no piece of rascality which would cost him a moment's hesitation. I therefore rather drily requested him to write down M. Constantine's address in my pocket-book, and told him that if he would have the goodness to act as my interpreter with the barber, and then introduce me to the Hotel d'Angleterre, I would give him no further trouble upon my account.

"Just tell the fellow," I said, taking my seat in the barber's chair, "that I want my hair cut and brushed in the regular Parisian style. Tell him I've let it grow for the last six weeks that he might have full scope for his art. And tell him I want my whiskers very carefully combed; and if he thinks the very least possible turn with the iron would improve them, he may do it, not otherwise. Tell him I rely upon his judgment."

"All right!" replied the traitor. "Monsieur désirerait se faire coiffer à la dernière mode de Paris. Vous voudrez bien ensuite lui couper ses favoris aussi courts que possible."

"Mon Dieu, quel dommage!" replied the barber. "Jamais, pendant tout le cours de ma pratique, je n'ai vu une aussi belle paire de favoris! Quelle pommade divine ces Anglais doivent avoir pour faire croître quelquechose d'aussi magnifique! Du reste, puisque Monsieur le désire, commençons;—la!"

Tear up the page, editor! Stamp on it, printer's devils! Heaven send me patience whilst I write, or I will take a leaf out of Mr. Warren's book, and out-rant the "Lily and the Bee." At one fell snip, the glory of my youth, the proud ornament of my maturer manhood, dropped, a helpless lock of glossy auburn, in reproachful gyrations upon the barber's toe! My right whisker was ruined for ever! True, it might again return; but how? a wretched pollard; its virgin freshness, its wavy silk, gone, gone—beyond redemption gone!

To spring to my feet and knock the astounded perruquier head over heels was the work of an instant. "Curse you!" I shouted, "Get up and I'll drive your daylights in, you infernal miscreant! Get up, I tell you!"

But the miserable victim of my misplaced wrath didn't get up. He wisely contented himself with lying flat upon his back with his eyes shut, murmuring in tremendous tones, "Que dit-il?"

"Il dit, qu'il a dans sa poche une paire de pistolets, avec laquelle il va tirer sur votre femme, derrière le comptoir, lorsqu'elle descendra," shouted Cutler, laughing immoderately.

"Ah, diable! diable!" cried the barber, scuttling out of the room on all-fours and tumbling down stairs. The whole scene, in short, took place in infinitely less time than it takes me to describe it. The result was that I found myself in the custody of a couple of gendarmes, Cutler gone, a crowd round the door, and the hairdresser crying bitterly, and pointing to a deep crimson stain upon the bosom of his dandy shirt. No doubt the pair of scissors, which he was wielding at the time of encountering my onslaught, had inflicted a prick in the region of the ribs, which for the moment bled considerably. It was more like the change in a pantomime than an occurrence in every-day life.

On my way to the police-office, whither I was conducted without the loss of a moment, we were accompanied by an immense crowd, struggling with every expression of horror and curiosity for a peep at the English assassin. Upon our arrival, I was at once handed into a cell which had evidently been constructed for the accommodation of desperadoes of the most formidable description. With the most ridiculous precautions against any supplementary outbreak of violence upon my part, my passport was demanded and taken away, whilst I underwent a rigid personal investigation, with the view of discovering the whereabouts of my "pistolets," which they persisted in believing were concealed somewhere between my shirt and my skin. Having at length satisfied themselves that I was not the well-armed amateur in murder suggested by the barber, they locked me up in the cell and left me to my own reflections.

About a quarter of an hour may have elapsed, and I was just beginning to collect my scattered thoughts, and to wonder what would be the next scene in the drama, when a turnkey made his appearance at my cell-door, and desired me, by a sign, to follow him. After threading what seemed an interminable labyrinth of underground passages, we arrived at the foot of a corkscrew staircase.

"Il faut monter, monsieur," said my conductor.

As I did so, the hum of voices sounded in my ears, and, before I even guessed where I was going, I found myself, for the first time in my life, "the prisoner at the bar!"

The appearance of the presiding police-magistrate was certainly not calculated to delude offenders into the belief that the rigours of justice were likely to be relaxed in their favour. He was a scowling, ferocious-looking little man, with a head as round as a bullet, and a muzzle as black as a bull-dog's. He spoke with such a spasmodic rapidity of utterance as to give one the idea that the words burnt his mouth; and his hand shook so violently when he grew excited that, in spite of my unpleasant position, I longed to ask him to let me look at his notes.

"Comment s'appelle-t-il?" he roared at last, looking as if he wished he could hang me off-hand, without the nonsensical fuss of a trial.

"Vat your name, you?" squeaked the interpreter who had been provided for my benefit.

"John Bull!" bellowed I recklessly; indignant beyond measure at finding that I was to be tried in good earnest.

There was a smothered buzz of "Jean Boule!—c'est Jean Boule lui-même!" the audience evidently imagining that that desperate character had at length been captured in propriâ personâ, while indulging in a murderous foray upon their peaceful city.

"Cela ne s'accorde pas avec son passeport!" shouted the magistrate, convulsively knocking his inkbottle into the eye of the clerk of the court. "Je vois ici le nom de Pallmall! Pourquoi me donne-t-il un autre nom que celui qui est sur le passeport?"

"Tell de troot, Paul Maule!" impressively observed the interpreter.

I have no space at present for the details of the long investigation which succeeded, even did I remember them with sufficient accuracy for the purpose. So far as I recollect, the barber grossly exaggerated in giving his evidence, and, the real cause of my indignation never for one moment having entered his head, made me out a very bloodthirsty scoundrel indeed. In short, what with the judge and what with the interpreter, I soon got so thoroughly bewildered that I gave up the idea of defending myself as a bad job, and resolved to let things take their own course.

What the result would have been—whether I should have been committed for trial by a higher court, or sentenced to the galleys upon the spot, I cannot even conjecture. Most fortunately, however, a second magistrate entered the court while the case was still in progress, and took his seat beside my tormentor. He was a hale, good-looking man, of about five-and-forty, with a fine, open countenance, and a commanding tone, evidently the great gun of the court. He desired the clerk to hand him up my passport, which he rapidly examined and pitched back on the table. He then folded his arms, and listened with evident attention to the remainder of the inquiry.

At the conclusion of the evidence against me, he desired me, through the interpreter, to speak out boldly, if I had anything to urge in my own defence. I did so; and, taking, as I still think, the best course under the circumstances, described in graphic terms the care and pride with which, during the last half-dozen years, I had cultivated the most magnificent pair of whiskers in all England. I then detailed the leading events of my disastrous journey from Havre, which led to my being thrown houseless and penniless upon the streets of Rouen. "Even then, gentlemen," I continued, "I thought not so much of my own misery as of the deplorable condition of my whiskers. Fearing that they might otherwise sustain some irreparable injury from long exposure to damp and mud, I went into a barber's shop to have them carefully combed and dressed. Judge, gentlemen, what my feelings must have been when, owing to some unfortunate mistake, he ruined one of them altogether. I confess that, in a fit of momentary passion, I struck him with my fist. Any other injury which he may have received was quite accidental and unintentional upon my part. I am willing to make him any reparation which the Court may think proper to award."

The good-looking magistrate, who, I could perceive, understood English, though he did not choose to speak it, smiled good-humouredly several times in the course of my narrative. I saw that I had taken the right tone to disarm the severity of a French court of justice, and waited without much apprehension for its decision. After some five minutes' deliberation the bull-dog pronounced my sentence, which, I confess, staggered me considerably. In consideration of "extenuating circumstances," I was merely to be imprisoned for eight days, to pay a fine of twenty francs, and a similar sum by way of indemnity to the wounded barber.

The reader will not, I hope, expect me to regale him with any anecdotes of prison-experience in the Silvio Pellico style. Barring that I was obliged to be always "at home," I was really far from uncomfortable during those eight memorable days. I was neither chained to the floor nor hung up by the leg during the whole time. On the contrary, I had a nice, tidy little whitewashed apartment, with a chair, a deal table, and a turn-up bedstead. I was allowed books, and read the first edition of Boswell's "Life of Johnson," from cover to cover, during my imprisonment. My jailor, too, was an excellent fellow. We couldn't, of course, communicate, except by signs, owing to my defective education; but he never entered my room without a smile on his face, and something or other in his hand which he fancied would serve me to kill time. Now it was a slate and a pencil, now a couple of cigars, and, best of all, on the second day he brought me a kitten, which was the greatest possible kindness he could have done me. Nobody knows what sympathy there is in a kitten till he has been shut up with one in jail for twenty-four hours. Puss didn't insist upon being spoken to in French. She was a regular little polyglot, and knew all languages under the sun. I was positively quite annoyed to have to part with the cat when the morning came for my release.

Precisely as the bells of the cathedral rang at noon on that eventful day, my jailor made his appearance. Flinging the door wide open, he made a low, comical salaam, and signalled to me that I was at liberty to depart in peace. He at the same time placed in my hands a sealed envelope, which I opened in the corridor. It contained two billets de Banque, for 100 francs each, and a note, of which the following is a copy:—

"SIR,—Your fine is already paid, and the barber is satisfied. You are requested to accept, as a loan, the inclosed sum of 200 francs. You need be under no delicacy in doing so, as the money will before long be reclaimed by the writer. Your luggage is awaiting you at the Hotel d'Angleterre.

"To Charles Pallmall, Esq."

I let the paper fall from my hands in uncontrollable astonishment. It was Cutler's handwriting! There was no doubt whatever upon the subject. I had often sat next him at lectures, and recollected perfectly well his old Cambridge scrawl; the letters sloped the wrong way, no dots to his i's, and no topsail yardarms to his t's. Confound it, thought I, can I have been judging this man uncharitably, and giving the devil an extra coat of black paint? It looks like it, really. Have I not brought all my old University prejudices to bear against him? Have I anything specific to lay to his charge? Am I even certain that he desired the barber to cut off my whisker? Assuredly not. On the other hand, may he not have construed the fact of my not having mentioned his name before the magistrates as evidence of a desire to keep him out of a disagreeable scrape? How do I know what position he may hold in Rouen, or what the result might have been to him, had his name appeared in connexion with such a squabble? At all events, let me suspend my judgment upon the man till I hear more, and, meanwhile, make the best of my way to the Hotel d'Angleterre.

Upon my arrival I found that a room had already been prepared for me, and oh, the thrill of delight which electrified me as I perceived a note from Lucy lying upon my dressing-table. It ran as follows:—

"MY DEAREST CHARLES,—How very delightful! M. Constantine tells me that he believes you will be in Rouen this very day. If so, I am to tell you that we dine at six, and you are not to dream of leaving us under a fortnight.

"Your own affectionate

"LUCY.

"Chateau Pavilly, Saturday."

For the first time in my life I literally danced for joy. How shall I describe the load which those few lines took off my mind? During my imprisonment I had scarcely dared to think of Lucy. I had struggled, though in vain, to cover up her image from before my eyes. To think of her was torture, when I reflected that, at that identical moment, she might be perusing some garbled and ill-natured report of my trial; perhaps even mentally discarding me as a headstrong and hateful brute! Now I cared for nothing. Lucy was evidently ignorant of what had befallen me, and would not, at all events, hear of it until I was by to explain. All this was couleur de rose. Rapidly arraying myself as became a happy lover, and brushing my left whisker into as small a compass as possible, so as in some degree to correspond with its mutilated fellow, I sent out for a fiacre, and before half-past five was rattling through the barriers on my way to Chateau Pavilly.

The ponderous iron lodge-gates swayed backward at my approach. Clang, clang, went the bell behind me, as my humble voiture crashed along the noble avenue.

The servant who awaited me at the front door bowed low as I pronounced my name, and with an obsequious whisper of "Par ici, monsieur, s'il vous plait," conducted me to a small beautifully-furnished library upon the ground-floor. While I was in the act of examining the curious specimens of old Norman armour with which the walls were decorated he again threw open the door, and the next moment I was warmly shaking hands with my friend the good-looking magistrate, who turned out to be no less a personage than M. Constantine himself! Rather to my surprise and annoyance, he was accompanied by the amiable Cutler, to whom he introduced me as a compatriot, apparently without the slightest idea that we had ever met before.

"I have received you thus, my dear Mr. Pallmall," he apologised, holding me affectionately by both hands, "because I thought it might be more agreeable for both of us that our first meeting should be in private. People, you know, are sometimes a little unguarded when they are surprised, and you might possibly have been betrayed into letting out a little secret which you would otherwise have wished to keep. I have asked this gentleman to be present, because I speak English with considerable difficulty, and he must help me out if my ignorance of your language prevents my explaining what I wish you clearly to understand. He has been good enough, also, to interest himself in your case, and had the politeness to write a note in English for me this morning, which I hope was delivered to you before you left—before you left home. What I wish you to understand is this. You may have thought that you were harshly d alt with last week, and I confess your sentence was a severe one; but you must remember that France is not England, and that though at home, as I am told, you would have been allowed to inflict any punishment you pleased upon the barber for the sum of 125 francs, that is not so with us. Had you been an entire stranger to me I would have endeavoured to interfere effectually on your behalf; but hoping as I do, that you will be a constant visitor at Pavilly, I should, I assure you, have compromised myself altogether as a magistrate of Rouen, had I shown any marked determination to screen you from justice. As it was, the bête noire, as we call him, wished to give you three weeks. However, I congratulate you with all my heart upon being well out of the scrape; and now suppose we go up stairs."

"Allow me to congratulate you also," said Cutler, coming sheepishly forward to offer his hand. "I wouldn't have left you as I did, old fellow, only I was afraid they'd bring me forward as evidence against you. That was the reason, I give you my honour. Luckily, I had the presence of mind to keep out of the way; and I never even mentioned to M. Constantine that I had the pleasure of seeing you the first day you entered the town."

"I tell you what it is, Mr. Cutler," replied I very warmly, for my indignation absolutely got the better of me at this crowning piece of hypocrisy; "knowing what I did of your character, I well deserved all that has happened for being fool enough to place myself in your hands. That you should have chosen the very moment when I appealed to you for assistance in a very serious difficulty to indulge in a foolish and dangerous practical joke was, no doubt, too great a temptation for you to resist; but that you should come forward now, and, instead of attempting to apologise for the annoyance, not to say disgrace, it has occasioned me, talk to me as if I were an idiot or a child, is a little too much! I am sorry to have to speak in this way before M. Constantine. But you have now fair warning that the first time I meet you outside these gates, I will treat you exactly as I treated the barber, and give you any sort of satisfaction you like to demand into the bargain!"

"Vraiment, mon cher," exclaimed M. Constantine, who, not precisely comprehending the tenor of our discourse, was naturally puzzled to the last degree, "vous êtes l'homme le plus extraordinaire que j'ai jamais rencontré! Vous commencez par assassiner presque un malheureux barbier; puis maintenant, vous voilà menaçant une personne que je m'attendais à vous voir traiter en ami!"

"Stay, sir, pray," interrupted I. "I do not pretend to understand what you are saying, but you may well think me one of the most ill-bred savages that ever existed. Give me two minutes to explain myself, and I think you will agree with me that our friend there had good reason to be shy of telling you what excellent service he did me the other day."

Without further preface, I proceeded to put him in possession of the real facts of the mauvaise plaisanterie which had deprived me of my liberty for a week, and challenged Cutler to deny them if he could. The brute, however, being altogether deficient in the tact and nerve which are essential to the constitution of even a tolerable liar, shuffled, bungled, hesitated, contradicted himself, and ultimately admitted that he had given the fatal order to the barber—"merely by way of a joke; just to see what the fellow'd say. Never thought, of course, he'd suppose I was in earnest; deuced sorry!" and all that sort of thing.

"Stay, gentlemen," interposed M. Constantine, "I am sorry that I should have been the means of bringing about an unpleasant meeting. I do not presume to advise Mr. Pallmall what view he ought to take of the occurrence, now that it is past and over. But I must say, and say very distinctly, that I am sorry my name was not sufficient to secure him every politeness and attention in this town from anyone who had ever been a visitor at Pavilly. And, Mr. Cutler, you will perhaps understand me when I add, that Mr. Pallmall is now the guest in my house, to whom I wish to render it in every way agreeable."

"I understand you, sir," replied Cutler, honouring me with a malignant scowl as he moved towards the door. "You will perhaps have the goodness to make my excuses to madame."

"To tell you the truth, my dear friend," said M. Constantine, as Cutler quitted the room, "I am not sorry to have found an opportunity of getting quit of that young man. He is by no means the person I took him for at first. He is a great deal too familiar, and I could see was fast becoming an insufferable nuisance to your pretty cousin. Now, then, let us join the ladies in the drawing-room."

More, I suppose, is unnecessary, at least to anyone who has ever read a three-volume novel to its conclusion. Lucy did not return me to my relatives as a damaged article; and though she doesn't as yet know the exact secret of my mishap, I think I must let her read it in the January number of TAIT.

GERMANY AT THE ADVENT OF THE GREAT KING.

I.

TEN long years were well-nigh done
Since the weary war begun—
Since the vengeful cannon's roar
Burst o'er rebel Prague, and bore
Doom to citizens, dismay
To their king of yesterday.
Ten long years, and what remains?
Slaughter on a hundred plains;
In a thousand mansions mourning
For the lost and unreturning;
Trusting hearts, now faint and failing,
For the bloodshed unavailing;
Courage bowed, and sage intent
Smit with blank bewilderment;
Doubts 'mid chiefs in council meeting;
Dark mistrust in neighbours' greeting,
Burgher passing burgher by
With a cold suspicious eye,
Moody muttering, curt reply.
And upon th' aspect of things,
As in men's imaginings,
Sombre hues of gloom profound
All the stricken landscape round—
Brooding shadows of despair,
Flung by Rapine, passing there.
Who would sign and token see,
Mark the melancholy lea,
Now with rarer flocks bespread—
View the fields unharvested,
Homesteads standing bleak and lone,
Cheerful house and household gone;
Silent hamlets, wild and waste,
All their olden mirth displaced;
Many a vineyard trampled down,
Many a wide dispeopled town
Thinned beneath the ruthless sword;
Lands that show a stranger lord;
Walls that gape to every breeze
Round the pillaged palaces.
These the signs—the sufferings, these!
And to miserable men,
Numbering years of warfare ten,
This the gain, for them and thee,
O surrendered Liberty!

II.

From mountain Inn and Iser's flow
Poured on the wooded plains below
To Pomerania's wind-swept lea,
With iron hand and stern decree
Ranges triumphant Tyranny.
On Baltic's shore must Dukedoms fall
To deck its new-found Admiral—
Dark Friedland,* whose unsparing steel
Reluctant Swabian cities feel,
As now he points with stake and sword,
His bigot Emperor's award.
Lone mother, upon hill and plain
Bohemia counts her children slain,
Or hears th' adieus of those that fly
From Persecution's fiery eye.
Far from ancestral homes of Rhine
Wanders th' unseated Palatine—
Flying before the Empire's ban,
Without ally or partisan,
He sees where those fair regions tend,

O'er all that purple vale—

And Heidelberg its lords hath changed,
And Amberg's citizens, estranged,
A new allegiance own—
To him who, girt with lawless spoil,
Usurps his kinsman's place and style
Fast by the Cæsar's throne.
Gone are that kinsman's champions—gone!
His hopes evanish'd, one by one.
Descending from their mountain-home
No Transylvanian levies come,
Gathering from plain and moorland dun,
On Austria's flank the restless Hun;
No Gabor* with his trumpet-call
Now frights th' imperial capital,
And who o'er northern Eyder came
To strike a feeble stroke for fame,
Unequal Denmark, fain must yield,
Swept by fierce Tilly from the field.
Grim Death hath still'd the martial zest,
Prison'd the chivalrous unrest,
Tamed the stout arm, and sunk the crest
Of Brunswick's chieftain brave;
And he who like a shooting star

On wild Dalmatian coast afar
Sleeps in his lonely grave.†
Whence shall a rescue rise for thee,
O undefended Liberty!

How oft hath blanch'd th' affrighted swain,
As, wistful gazing o'er the deep,
Sudden he marked the sinuous sweep
Of the fell serpents of the Main,§
And sped with tale of coming woe
And ravage to the vales below:

That smote the heathen slave!
Arcona! on thy lofty steep,
What sight alarms the watchman now?
What barques be they which o'er the deep
He sees approach with lordly sweep
Of sail, and bold-advancing prow?
Aside the yielding waves they fling,
Majestic as the eagle's wing
In the sunlight voyaging;
And as the stately galleys come
Mounts a dim murmur, like the hum

That murmur, as they steer along,
Swells to a clear, sonorous song;
And ever nearer as they draw
Its words, that breathe half cheerfulness, half awe,
To German land the adventurers' greeting pay,
Bid downcast Freedom hope redress; and this the lay.

SONG OF THE SWEDES.

Twice an hundred barques we told,
Twice an hundred barques or more;
Thrice five thousand men of mould
Stood we on Elfnaben's* shore.
These with heart and hand we bring,
Suffering Freedom! at thy call—
These, and in the midst a king,
'Reigneth in the hearts of all.

He, or ere he left the shores
Of the island-city fair,†
Called his trusty counsellors,
Called his gallant nobles there;
And to that assembly high
Spake Gustavus—who but he?
"Swedes! our weary brethren's cry
Comes lamenting o'er the sea.

"Piercing is the voice of woe
That from yonder land resounds,
Where the free-born Faith lies low,
Bleeding from a thousand wounds.
Now, for God and kingly worth,
Let us hasten, ere it die
On the soil that gave it birth—
If we help not—utterly.

"Tyrants stand on yonder coast—
Shall they reach its waters o'er,
And our Baltic be a boast
For their haughty Emperor?
Ours it is by right of Fame,
Chartered in the hero's deed;
And their minions dare to claim
This old heirdom of the Swede!

"Shall we tarry till they come—
Till their impious bands advance
To the threshold of our home,
Trample our inheritance,
Beard us in our fathers' hall?"
Said the king—the nobles heard:—
"Forward!" cried they, one and all,
"Son of Vasa, draw the sword!"

Cheer ye, now, ye mourners sore,
Brethren of the bleeding land,
'Tis no weakling warrior
Paltering with a puny brand;
Ask of him, the vaunting Pole,
Ask the red Livonian plain,
If he war with recreant soul,
If his falchion smite in vain.

Call they him a king of snow*
That shall melt 'neath southern sun?
Ay!—as rivers overflow
When the loosened torrents run
Thundering down from cleft and steep,
Whilst affrighted shepherds fly,
So shall come the swell and sweep
Of his mountain soldiery!

Deeds of danger, deeds of death,
Were the pastime of our sires;
Blest are we whose better faith
Finds unquenched our fathers' fires.
Blest who stands, and blest who falls,
Hoping nobler crowns divine,
Happier homes than Odin's halls,
Light more pure than Freia's eyne.

For our king, by scoffers scorned,
For yon groaning land's appeal,
For the rightful worship spurned
'Neath Oppression's brutal heel,
God of Vengeance, God of Right,
Nerve our arms, and guide our swords!
Fearful is the hero's might—
But the Victory is the Lord's.

Twice an hundred barks we told,
Twice an hundred barks and more,
Fifteen thousand men of mould:
And the mothers that us bore,
And the tender wives we'd wed,
And the maidens we adore,
Saw our parting sails, and said,
"Conquer, or return no more!"

A WOMAN'S RIGHTS CONVENTION.

We must use the same precaution, inviting public attention to the subject we proceed to announce, which the great Weimar arbiter of theatrical proprieties thought necessary, introducing a dramatic representation which had in it something strange and odd, nearly connected with a train of ludicrous associations. "Man lache nicht" was the decree by which he secured the composed regard of a critical audience. We may likewise enter a preliminary protest against any levity in the consideration of our matter, and request every reader to respect the Syracuse Woman's Rights Convention, and the entire "movement" of female emancipation, as an affair that is worth a little sober reflection.

Those of us who are accustomed to watch the proceedings of our American cousins, must have been already aware, two or three years ago, of the bold attitude of actual prominence that has been assumed by the advocates of a practical equality of the sexes. It is the national habit, as it is always the tendency of a purely democratic community, never to pause in the speculative discussion of any new principle, but to plan the scheme of its application, and urge it immediately. With them, it takes the form of an executive committee as soon as it may have won the assent of a sufficient number of persons; and the constituent body of its sympathisers are periodically invited to a congress or convention, to sustain the sectarian interest, and to sanction the direct endeavours to accomplish its object. This straightforward process from the idea to the practical effort, the consequential logic of active mind, has acquired for the English of Britain, as well as for the English of the United States, great advantage in the attainment of their intended results, with a yet more valuable effect in training the national character, not only to intelligence, but to vigorous exertion, promptly complying with a prevailing conviction. It is only when, as it may be in this case, the partisans of a specious theory, so eagerly hasting to procure its realisation as to forget the conditions of its acceptance, parade some proposals which seem to vulgar sense impossible and absurd, that we are obliged to wish they had been content to devote a few more years to mature their notion by tranquil reflection before casting its undeveloped crudity, without due form and limitation, to the ridicule of a world that is too careless to discriminate between the distorted parody and the abused truth.

The true principle of this movement, which has an important place in the esteem of many thinking persons, is the assertion that the feminine nature, by its intellectual and moral capacity, is entitled to as careful and complete an education as that of man. This claim, we think, is not, thus stated, likely to be denied by any except those prejudiced by the materialist heathen notion of sacrificing individual culture to the utility of the commonwealth. It is probable that, with existing conventional arrangements, or rather with the present deficiency of methods for the direction of a woman's intellectual energy, it is not so manifestly profitable to the community to encourage her growth of mind as the academical and professional education of a man. She is not to be an active citizen, a trader, or an artisan; but, as we have intimated, it is an obsolete, a pagan notion to use no other measure of the care which society owes to its members than their proportionate capability of remunerative public usefulness. We learn, in modern times, that the State exists for the good of each; and, except where slavery is at the base, no class may be deprived or hindered of their most full development of humanity; because the culture, for want of which they are inferior, is bestowed upon others in a way supposed more advantageous to the public economy. It is not, however, in the school or domestic teaching of young girls there is a deficiency complained of but in the active occupations of life, in the facilities and inducements to the enterprise of female industry, in that adaptation of circumstances to form in a woman her vigour of thought and will, which only we can dignify with the comprehensive term of education. What can she do in the world, what even can she do in her own home, that will stimulate her with the prospect of an adequate acknowledgment to the perfect mastery and exercise of superior mental powers? We must confess, these advocates of "woman's rights" have, upon this view, a case for inquiry, and an evil to be redressed. A young man is able, years before the legal recognition of his manhood, to begin the effort, in some one out of a hundred ways of activity that may bring him to the objects of his chief worldly ambition; he is able to work for an actual personal advantage. Should he lose the track of his pursuit, or wish to change it, there are many others in which, if he happen to get an introduction, he may be allowed to seek a better success; there is a choice for his inclination, and room for his special faculty. For a woman who is above the need of menial household drudgery, there is, except she possesses rare artistic talent, or unless she be engaged in retail trade, when it is seldom she can have any capital to secure more than the position of an assistant, one single and precarious resource—that of teaching children. It is a most honourable office, worthy of the noblest offerings of mind and heart. But it is one that, for its efficient performance in a professional way, requires more than others a peculiar talent and disposition. It is also one in which the multitude of competitors is enormous, compared with the demand for their services; as an instance of which, let us mention a fact within our own experience:—An advertisement having been published in a provincial journal, offering a very ordinary situation of resident governess, with a salary of £20 a year, it was replied to by no fewer than eighty-five applicants; whose pile of letters we saw, suggesting very sad conjectures of the distress and disappointment of so many young creatures, some homeless ones, whose fair hands had traced the delicate writing and stamped the perfumed wax. We have witnessed the perplexity of families, perhaps left destitute by the death of a parent, where the daughters, having high mental accomplishment and ability, without the favour of influential acquaintance, could find no opportunity of earning their livelihood; and the hopeless anxiety of a young widow, or of the wife of a disabled and poverty-stricken man, looking about in vain for the permission to labour to support those dearest to her. Some part of the cause of this helplessness of women in the world must be attributed to unreasonable custom, and the restraints of unjustifiable prejudice. Every occupation which is not inconsistent with the reserve and delicacy of feminine manners ought to be freely open to women, if they choose to practise it. It will be obvious that all manufacturing operations which require nicety of touch and light dexterity are most fitly committed to them. We cannot perceive any just objection to the employment of women in the task of mercantile clerks and accountants, so far as this may be executed in the seclusion of the counting-house—not on the Exchange. We are not quite sure but there are particular departments of medical practice in which a woman, scientifically educated, as two or three have lately ventured in America, might become an excellent professional adviser to relieve patients of her own sex. There is a range of less regular indefinable occupations, requiring penmanship and arithmetic, with intelligent tact and method, which are usually allotted too exclusively to men. But we do not pretend to indicate a sufficient variety of resources for female industry. Acknowledging the evil, there are certain customs by which ladies do themselves continue it; unless, indeed, we do them wrong in presuming that it is in compliance with the predilections of his gentle customers, the fashionable haberdasher stations a score of young men behind his counter, for duties which, in shops of less pretension, women appropriately discharge.

We have forborne to mention a more difficult point, which should not quite pass without notice; that, besides having scanty facilities for working, if she needs to earn her bread, a woman endowed with genius, and inspired with ambition, has not in the world any recognised sphere of intellectual activity, but only that of literature, for the display of her powers and the reward of her success. She may dazzle and delight a conversational party, and win the praise of an hour; she cannot erect any permanent memorial of her cherished ideas, nor embody her thoughts in a conspicuous result. A masculine mind of this order, in a male person, may persuade the senate, preside in the court of justice, may plead for a great cause or execute with decisive energy the resolutions of sagacious insight. We know a woman may not hold, nor ought to hold, any of those functions in the control of human affairs which are involved in forensic and political contentions. It is here we disagree with the inconsiderate persons who in New England have elected themselves the advocates of female emancipation; and a very few, we believe, are extant in this country. They, starting with the principle, which by us shall be undisputed, that woman is, in her mental and moral nature, not inferior to man, proceed to assume the feminine constitution similar to that of the man. "Mind is of no sex," they say, and we doubt the axiom. By this error they are led to claim for her a participation in all ordinary civil offices and privileges of the other sex, instead of the gradual institution, which we expect, of peculiar methods of activity, fitted to her proper faculties and congenial with her own disposition.

After, in a very general view, defining so the more serious part of this subject—having abstained from allusion to the want of adequate protection for wives and other dependent women against the abuse of domestic authority, as we have also kept aloof from the discussion of their legal disabilities in regard to property, not because we consider these matters incapable of reform, but as they would involve an argument too extensive—we now take leave to look at the proceedings of the "Women's Rights Convention," not in the spirit of a bantering scepticism, for there is a sound reason somewhere at the bottom of this agitation, nor with any disrespect towards the ladies who conduct it; but we cannot forbid a smile at some things they did and said—the practical reductio ad absurdum of that false inference, that "mind" is of the neuter gender.

The whimsicalities of the Syracuse affair in September last, as well as the preceding Convention held last year in the town of Worcester, U.S., were exposed at the date of their occurrence by the rough humour of the Times, and we dare say have not been forgotten yet. They had the more notoriety among us because one incident of the proceedings appeared to be an indignant attack which a lady named Rose levelled against our honourable and learned M.P. for Sheffield, who had been guilty of hesitating at the extension of the electoral franchise to women. He had avowed this scruple in reply to some female constituents of that borough, adding—"There is no man who owes more than I do to woman; there is nothing which, for the honour of the sex, I would not do." And he spoke in a tone of very natural emotion of his "mother, wife, and daughter," as having been to him the happiness of life. "After the severe ire and the sharp disputes of the House of Commons," he said, "I hie me home, that my head may rest upon a bosom that throbs only with affection for me and our child; and I feel a brave, hearty man in the cause of my country the next day, having been soothed in the peace of a gentle mind that no politics have sullied." This very graceful testimony to the blessings of feminine companionship strangely excited Mrs. Rose to a very angry declamation. "What a combination," she called it, "of politics, flattery, and stupid, blind selfishness! I regret that Roebuck is not here that I may arraign him!" There could be no censure, indeed, harder for the unwomanly to endure than a panegyric on womanhood. She seemed to think with Miss Wisk (in the last number of "Bleak House") that "the idea of woman's mission lying chiefly in the narrow sphere of home was an outrageous slander on the part of her tyrant, Man." But we do not think Mr. Roebuck should have been understood to interdict ladies from the formation of political opinion. Few persons did better service, making way for the common understanding of scientific principles of legislation, than was done many years ago by the authoress of those "Illustrations of Political Economy," which entertained the children that are now on the electoral register, and preceded the popular instructions of the Anti-Corn Law League. We need not point to eminent female politicians of the French Revolution for examples of the important place a discerning woman, if she aspire that way, can occasionally fill in national affairs. These prominent cases are exceptional—let them be so; but they disprove the charge of utter incapacity. Mrs. Jones, of Ohio, says, "she wanted to go into the legislative hall, to sit on the judicial bench, and fill the chair of the President." We hesitate. The demand for the right to vote in choosing legislators, which she preferred on the ground that "taxation and representation go together," may seem as worth entertaining as the privilege of voting in the election of parochial officers, actually exercised by female householders in some parts of England. We had the pleasure of knowing a lady in Devonshire who served the offices of churchwarden and overseer of the poor, according to the custom of the parish, and very creditably. In a certain city, under a special jurisdiction, their suffrages go to form the corporate authorities. But as we lately saw at the parliamentary election for Oldham the voters brutally assaulted on their way to the polling-booth, obliged to fight against the cudgels of a ferocious mob, we should for the sake of women themselves defer exposing them to such rude contingencies until our political manners be improved, and our party contests be tempered with civility.

Without going on to echo the ridicule which writers in both countries have cast upon the speeches and manifestos of these American ladies, who doubtless mean very well, despite the oddity of their advances, let us present an historical parallel between their assembly and another, "Woman's Rights Convention," rather similar in its design, which is reported in the veracious chronicles of Aristophanes, as having been held in the city of Athens, ancient Athens, above two thousand years before this one of the other day, in the modern city of transatlantic Syracuse. We are told by St. Luke, those Greeks, in their democratic habit of hunting novelties, resembled the brisk Yankees of this nineteenth century; "for all the Athenians spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or to hear some new thing." To them it must have been as welcome an amusement as this latter-day demonstration has afforded the readers of the New York Herald, to have their jest at the expense of Praxagora and her sisters, on their conspiracy to overthrow the marital supremacy. Not but there are some material differences in the conduct of these comparable transactions to the advantage of our fair Syracusans. Their action was perfectly open and above-board to effect an avowed object by legitimate influences on public opinion. "Miss Wisk's mission, my guardian said" (if we may again quote Dickens), "was to show the world that woman's mission was man's mission; and that the only genuine mission of both man and woman was to be always moving declaratory resolutions about things in general at public meetings." These ladies have the courageous candour to proclaim their revolutionary intentions in the face of a sneering world. The Rev. Antoinette Brown, and Dr. Harriet K. Hunt, have taken bravely to themselves the professional titles so quaintly conjoined with their tender Christian names. Miss Clementina Nichols introduced herself, ironically, as "that monster of womanhood, a female political editor," the Wyndham County Democrat owning her literary control; and another lady was stated to be editor of the Genius of Liberty. It may be well, so especially in that country where a lady-writer has produced the most popular book in the world, and one of the noblest; for either sex of "mind" may claim an equal expression in literature. There were in Greece, too, literary women, but they edited no newspapers. They adopted more insidious means, in the present instance, to effect their political emancipation. Their convention, here recorded, was held in dark nooks and corners of the street, an hour or two before the break of day. The presence of no man was permitted; no Mr. Brigham, of the Mormon persuasion, to insinuate that "the world and the devil often lured women out of their sphere;" no impertinent Mr. Hatch to scatter the blushing assembly with his coarse remarks. It is not till after a brief colloquy with her china-lantern, curious in itself, but unnecessary for us to repeat, the fair President of the Convention decides on tolerating even its beaming eye of light as a dumb and neuter witness of their mysterious consultation. The women, in fact, have plotted a perilous enterprise. Like that lady from Ohio whom we named, this Praxagora, the mistress-mind of the whole concern, is "one of those women who, instead of talking about women's rights, took the rights without saying anything about them." But they do not take common ground with Miss L. A. Jenkins, of Waterloo, who raised the question, "Whether there was any law to prevent women voting in this state? The statute says white male citizens may vote, but does not say that white female citizens cannot." Their stratagem is rather to personate the male character, to attend the political assembly so early as to pre-occupy the majority of seats; and having crowded there, outvoting the odious virile interest, to carry their own measures by numerical strength.

The successful performance of this surprising manœuvre we shall see, and what a culbute genérale there is in consequence of it. Like the celebrated coup d'état of the 2nd of December, the time of its execution is between the nocturnal "small hours" and the moment of sunrise, at which the primary legislative assembly of free and independent citizens is to be summoned in constitutional order. Our valiant dame, Praxagora, appears the earliest arrival, impatiently in the street awaiting her accomplices:—

> Will they be ready? Have they got their beards
> All sewed upon their chins, the way I told them?
> Have they contrived to steal their husband's clothes?

It must be noticed, these ladies, who want to wear the masculine costume for the purpose of disguise, not of mere convenience or majesty, are not content with the romantic fashion of apparel invented by Mrs. Col. Bloomer, and exhibited by Mrs. Dexter last year in all our principal cities; but they literally take possession of the garments of the other sex, and wear the articles that are nameless, and artificially fabricate the hairy ornament which nature gave to man alone, and which custom has shorn from him. A part of their conversation, as they drop into the meeting one by one, turns upon the difficulty of the good wives in this furtive appropriation; for Sostrates tells them her husband was kept awake by his cough all night, and another neighbour has been hindered by little accidents of a different kind, such as "will happen in the best-regulated families." After undergoing a mutual inspection as to the completeness of their male attire, which has been improved on by one zealous person lugging a huge club in her hand, and covering her fair shoulders with a leather jacket in the latest "rowdy" style, to impose upon the populace with the appearance of a swaggering fellow about town, they proceed to business.

Praxagora. Now, ladies, let us settle what to do;
Don't waste the time, while stars are in the sky;
Because you know, the meeting we intend
To go to will commence at break of day.

First Woman. Yes, that it will, by Jove! Well now, I think
You ought to take your place under the rostrum,
Directly opposite the magistrates.

Second Woman. Look here, my dear! I brought my work-bag with me,
To do some knitting, while I sit among them.

Praxagora. Knitting work there, you wretched minx!

Second Woman. Why not?
Yes, by Diana, so I will; for how Shall I not listen to it just as well
Knitting? my bairns at home have naked feet.

Praxagora. Now just look there! you knitting, when you know
We must not show the meeting we are women!
A pretty scrape we should be in! the people
Met in the full assembly, one of us
Rising to make a speech, and in the tribune
Denouncing him we hate, Phormisius,
If we, that sit below on the front benches,
Forget to wear our clothes in a proper way!
While we sit there, you know, then anybody
Looking at us, and seeing the fine whiskers
We've tied upon our cheeks, will think we're men.
So we shall manage, yes, this very day,
By one bold coup of great audacity,
To get the government of all the State;
Then, we'll see how to do some good for the city;
For things, at present, are abominable,
They let us neither run nor drive,* women!

Second Woman. But how shall a party of women, with woman's wit
Address the people?

Praxagora. Better than anyone else.
They say, effeminate young gentlemen
Prove most tremendous speakers; so shall we
It is our portion and our special gift.

Second Woman. Well, I don't know; but sure, it frightens me
Attempting this without experience.

Praxagora. Suppose, then, we rehearse the whole debate
Now, by ourselves, and practise what to say.
Stop! don't go on, till you've put on your beard.
How many other are here, practised in speaking?

Third Woman. Why, bless your heart, who doesn't know how to talk?
I'm sure we all do—

Praxagora. Do you? very well, then,
Tie on your beard, and make yourself a man.
And while I fit you I'll put on my own,
To be ready if I find anything to say.

Fourth Woman. Oh dear! lock here, my dear Praxagora,
See how ridiculous it looks!

Praxagora. No! what?

Fourth Woman. The nasty thing! just like an ugly streak
Of black, with burnt cork drawn all round my cheek.

Praxagora. Never mind that; now ladies, we suppose
The due formalities are done, the usher
Walks round the meeting saying, "Move in front!
Silence in court, you chatterers! now, come
Sit in your places! Any one wish to speak?

Third Woman. Yes, I do!

Praxagora. Take the wreath, and luck be with you!

* If our uninitiated readers do not understand this idiomatic phrase, we cannot better translate it, but refer them to Miss Wisk for an equivalent expression of grievance.

Perhaps we need not explain that it was customary in the public assemblies of Greece for the orator to put on a wreath or garland during the time of his speech. This eager volunteer, whose name is understood to be Geusistrate, the wife of a grocer, commits the error of supposing that, as she is to wear a garland like that worn by convivial guests, she may without impropriety ask for a sip of wine; a jar of which, together with some food, has been provided by Glyce to refresh the members of the Convention after their deliberations. By this offence against the etiquette of the assembly Praxagora is scandalised, and instantly, like a "strong-minded woman" as she is, she falls upon the blunderer, calling her a poor feeble nonentity, bidding her to quit their company for her folly in offering to drink in such a solemn situation. But Geusistrate vindicates her conduct by declaring that the men drink, and are drunken, in their public assemblies; or else what is the cause of their mad shoutings, their quarrels and fury, except they are intoxicated with new wine? The President next invites another member, whom we call Melistiche (the reporter is not always accurate in giving the speakers' names); and she, putting on the wreath, and having been exhorted to speak out lustily, and like a man, flourishing her staff to the cadence of her periods, delivers a brief address. She commences in the way that even Demosthenes occasionally did, and, as our own orators affect to do sometimes, by professing that she had not intended, herself, to take any prominent part in these proceedings, but quietly to listen to others. Her subject is a personal grievance, and rather a petty matter of police—the nuisance of a pond of water close to her shop-door. She is presently interrupted by the severe Praxagora, because she forgets the character of her supposititious audience, and addresses them—"It appears to me, ladies, considering these facts—"

Praxagora. O wretch! you call them ladies, when they're men!
The Speaker. I beg your pardon, gentlemen; I meant
The womanish Epigonus, who sits there;
And, seeing him, I took him for a woman.
Praxagora. Get out! come down, and sit down in your place;
I think I'll speak a bit, for all of you.
I'll take the garland, and I pray the gods
To grant me luck in guiding this debate.
I claim an equal share, my countrymen,
Of this our commonweal which you enjoy;
And I am grieved as you are when I see
The interests of this our native city
Destroyed by wicked rulers.

We regret that our space does not allow us to report the hon. member's eloquent address at full length. It is a statesmanlike analysis of the great political questions of the day, exposing the tergiversation of the ministerial party, the blunders of their foreign polity, unfair class legislation, the inequality of taxation, official abuses, and maladministration of the Admiralty department.

First Woman. By Venus! what you say is true!
Praxagora. You fool,
To name the woman's oath, "By Venus!" What a mess
You'd put us in at the real public meeting!
First Woman. I wouldn't do so there, of course.
Praxagora. But don't,
There's a good soul, give way to such a habit!

After expatiating on the intrigues of the parliamentary parties, satirising the inconsistency and time-serving professions of leading men, Praxagora makes a rhetorical hit, which elicits from the same auditor another complimentary interjection:—

First Woman. Oh, what a clever man!
Praxagora. Now you applaud me rightly.—
You owe these evils to yourselves, my people.
You are to blame; each citizen is craving
To get his profit of the State's revenue,
And so you let the public welfare perish;
But do what I propose, and we are saved.
My counsel is, that we commit the State
To our wives' keeping. 'Tis no strange idea,
For have we not already trusted them
As household stewards and governors at home?
All the Women (cheering.) Hear, hear! that's good! bravo, by Jove! Go on, sir!
Praxagora. I'll show you, gentlemen, why they are wiser
Than we, to rule the State. Firstly, you know,
They still observe old venerable customs,
And hold the wisdom of our ancestors,
Steeping their wool, for instance, in hot water
By the old method; never will you find
The women rash to seize imprudent change.
I ask you now, would not the state of Athens
Be safe and prosperous, if we did so,
If we abstained from hasty novelties?
The women roast their meat, as they used to do;
Bear burdens on their heads, as they used to do;
Perform the Cereal rites, as they used to do;
They bake their bread, just as they used to do:
They plague their husbands, as they used to do,
And hide their amours, as they always did;
Keep tit-bits for themselves, as they used to do;
Sip wine and pleasure, as they used to do.
Then, gentlemen, I say, to such as these
Let us with confidence consign the State;
Not with a jealous fear and scrutiny,
Doubting their management, but frankly leave
To these good wives all cares of government;
Depending on them; for we may consider,
None are so fit as mothers to provide
The army commissariat; for who,
More than a mother, feeds the infantry?
Who, better than a woman, keeps the stores?
And such a ruler never can be cheated,
Because they are all skilful in deception.
I pass by other arguments; I say,
Accept this motion, citizens, and see
Our city ever happy, great and free.

Such is the sophistry by which the Woman's Rights Convention of Athens pretends not only to assume part of the civil sovereignty, but to inaugurate a mere petticoat government. The ladies, after commending this "draft of the Queen's speech," suggest that she may be exposed to insult and attack from the adverse party. She promises to encounter the rudest of them with sarcastic repartee, and slang them down; if they hustle her, she will elbow them off. Having concerted the mode in which they are to vote, by showing a majority of hands in the assembly, when her motion is put, the liberators of their sex march out on their way to the Pnyx, the place of legislative deliberation; with hats fiercely cocked on one side, and clattering on the pavement with their boots and walking-sticks, while they troll a jolly song in roystering chorus.

The next appearance on the scene is that of Blepyrus, the unfortunate husband of the aspiring Praxagora. He comes out of his house, grumbling that he cannot find his wife, but still more vexed that he cannot find his coat and shoes. We know that she has abstracted them while he slumbered, leaving him to wake disconsolate, to grope for them in the dark. While he grumbles, another man, his next-door neighbour, comes out; they talk, and finding each is in the same disagreeable predicament, they condole with each other as ill-used husbands do. Presently they are joined by Chremes, who is either a bachelor or had risen too early to be treated in like manner. He wonders at meeting Blepyrus with his wife's shawl thrown over his back, and the accident of the lost coat is explained to him. Chremes tells them he has just come away from the Legislative Assembly—it is already morning. "What!" says Blepyrus, "has it been dissolved so soon?" They express a little disappointment at missing the customary fee of three oboli, that was paid, in those days of a degrading demagogueism, to each citizen who attended the discussion of public business. Chremes reports that the Pnyx was early crowded with such a multitude of electors as never had been known before; many were strange faces, and, with their general paleness of complexion, they looked like tailors or shoemakers, among the men of less sedentary trades. But no doubt of their qualification to vote had arisen. The order of the day, as announced by the presiding magistrates, was a debate upon the whole question of the government and policy of the republic. This might well have occasioned a greater concourse of persons than ordinary; and, in fact, a large number of citizens had found themselves excluded from the benches, preoccupied before they arrived. In the midst of an unsatisfactory and aimless discussion of public grievances, a fair-complexioned youth, of name unknown, but rather like Nicias in his features, had ascended the rostrum, and, with an able speech, propounded the motion we have anticipated—to constitute the women sole dictators of the troubled city. Then the assembly applauded, and cheered, and shouted consent; there was a party from the suburban districts who clamoured in opposition, but they were overruled by the majority. The resolution was carried; and the triumphant orator (in whom we recognise the daring Praxagora) went on to stigmatise with the severest accusations several of the men she named, and none more harshly than her own liege lord under the former régime, but henceforth her subject vassal. The domestic tyrant is for ever deposed; his wife is the law-giver and the man of business, but on her also shall devolve the earning of the family subsistence.

Such is the report of this memorable revolutionary transaction. We next witness the victorious return of the female politicians. Exulting in their new supremacy, they yet think it prudent to dissimulate the device which attained it. Each happy woman goes quietly to her own home, disencumbers her person of the male attire, and is ready with a plausible fiction to account for her early absence. Praxagora, be sure, can find an excuse on her behalf. When she meets her husband, he demands, with a pitiable affectation of stern authority, while his heart sinks under his conscious disgrace, "Where have you been, madam?" She, like a pert and sulky woman, replies, "What is that to you, sir?" There is a brief matrimonial contest of mutual spite; she protests, with an air of injured innocence, that she was called away in the night to help a female friend in her sudden childbirth, and that she borrowed his great-coat "because it's so cold; and you know, Blepyrus, how delicate my chest is;" but she took his boots and walking-stick as proper accompaniments of the man's coat. The poor husband can no longer contain his raging vexation. "Do you know, ma'am, what the fools at the assembly have done?" She professes, like a stay-at-home housewife, to know nothing of such politics. "Why," he bursts out in agony, "they've resolved to hand over the State to you—you women!" "Oh, to us!" she answers with an exquisite artful simplicity; "what to do with it—to weave or spin with it?" "No, by Jove, but to govern!" "To govern what?" she inquires. "Why, everything—all the affairs of the city." And now the delighted smile breaks over the pretty face of the conspirator, and she cries out, "Yes, by Venus! and it will be a happy city to live in from this time forth. There shall be no more crime, no false-swearing, no calumnies; there shall be no robbers, nobody shall injure his neighbour; nobody shall be poor, or starving, or naked; we shall all live in peace." The astonished Blepyrus becomes almost frantic at this promise of a new era; but the chorus of bystanders admonish him, "Be quiet, there's a good man, and let your wife speak." She goes on to explain her plans of social reform, consisting of the most utter Communism, exceeding any reveries of Louis Blanc or Prudhon:—

> Let all things be in common; let the strife
> Of competition end. I will not have
> Some beggars, others rolling in their wealth;
> One shall not own wide acres, while another
> Cannot possess six feet to be his grave.
> Nor shall the rich man have a train of slaves,
> While he of poor estate is served by none.
> But men shall live out of one common stock.
> The women husband it, and feed them all.

The obvious difficulties of such an economical system are hinted at by Blepyrus, but no more regarded by the versatile logic of the reformer than were the arguments of M. Thiers heeded by the French regenerators of society. We need not follow the Athenian disputants into this old controversy, which is so familiar to our own age. The worst of it is, the communism of Madame Praxagora includes some measures more outré than even the extremest application of the Fourierist theories of passional attraction. As it would be a trite repetition of the usual defence of individual property and free trade principles to give the subsequent conversations of the men obliged by the new laws to deposit their goods in a common fund, so it would also be offensive to our modern delicacy of sentiment if we presumed to describe the licentious confusion that is supposed to result from a sort of inverse polygamy, established by the revolutionary wisdom of the new legislators.

The Woman's Rights Convention of Aristophanes is a farce in jest; the Εκκλησιαζουσαι of America, some critics may think, enacted a farce in earnest. But we respect earnest action so highly, we seek a reasonable motive besides its accidental extravagance. We shall not part from this subject, as we did not come to it, in a mood of derision. There is even yet, in our opinion, an improvement approaching in the ordinary sentiment and manners of this age with respect to the social privileges of women. Most gratefully do we recognise the vast superiority of their position to that in ancient Greek society, which separated the honoured matron, shut up in her household duties, from the intellectual refinements of her nation, stigmatising with immodesty the genius of an Aspasia, driving those of her sex who dared aim at mental accomplishments into an unworthy social abandonment. The modern world is one far nobler in this as in other regards. In the moral atmosphere of Christendom, the life and heart of society, divinely searched with a purifying light, learned the reverence of sex. Marriage has become a sacrament of God; gentleness was ennobled by chivalry. Southern Europe, even where an habitual laxity belies the Catholic profession, was led, by the excessive adoration of a glorified Virgin, into that mystical contemplation of the peculiar glories of feminine excellence, of the implicit devotedness of woman, her elevated strain of feeling, and her compassionate fountains of inexhaustible tenderness, the faith in which inspires with fond extasy the lyrical dreamer of Vaucluse, and charms into finer music the rugged anger of the poet of eternal doom, in presence of the celestial graces of Beatrice. Our northern race, less given to idealise the objects of affection, in the very dimness of a barbarous heathenism saw their way to the true esteem of womanhood. We that claim a Saxon parentage, and our kindred in America, proudly read the testimony of Roman Tacitus, about the chaste, moral austerity of the forest-dwellers of Germania. Amid those indomitable savages, Woman had her "rights" not derided or denied. "Inesse quin etiam sanctum aliquid et providum putant." English domestic manners with our fruitful civilisation are carried over the globe. Wherever they are implanted Englishwomen shall be the companions in equal friendship of Englishmen, not only consoling but admonishing, "neque consilia earum aspernantur, nec responsa negligunt," but never their competitors in the civil strife.

> For woman is not undeveloped man,
> But diverse. Could we make her as the man,
> Sweet love were slain, whose dearest bond is this,
> Not like to like, but like with difference.
> Yet in the long years liker must they grow;
> The man be more of woman, she of man;
> He gain in sweetness and in moral height,
> Nor lose the wrestling thews that throw the world—
> She, mental breadth, nor fail in childward care;
> More of the double-natured poet each:
> Till at the last she set herself to man
> As perfect music unto noble words.
> And so these twain, upon the skirts of Time,
> Sit side by side, full summed in all their powers,
> Self reverent each, and reverencing each;
> Distinct in individualities,
> But like each other even as those who love.
> Then comes the statelier Eden back to men;
> Then reign the world's great bridals, chaste and calm;
> Then springs the crowning race of human kind.

After this harmonious wisdom of Tennyson we conclude with him, adding, "May these things be!"

THE WELLINGTON MEMOIRS.

The Life of the Duke of Wellington is a tempting theme for biographers and essayists. The popularity of the subject is so great, the materials are so abundant and so ready at hand, and the theme itself is so splendid and attractive, that writers of every degree of talent and experience find some inducement to employ their pens upon it. Already, since the Duke's death, half-a-dozen complete biographies, and a multitude of less elaborate memorials, have made their appearance; and this, of course, is only the first crop of such productions, forced into an early and ephemeral existence by the powerful influences of the hour. The works of authors who write, or hope they write, for posterity, will come before the public at a later period, after the national enthusiasm has subsided, or rather has been sublimed into an abiding and discriminating reverence for the memory of the nation's great defender. At length, some fortunate and happily-qualified writer will give us the biography of Wellington which is destined to supersede all others, as Southey's "Life of Nelson" at once cast all other works of the kind into the shade. That such a "lucky hit betwixt wind and water" (to quote Macaulay's curious phrase of laudation) as the "Life of Nelson" should have been the production of a secluded scholar, who confessed and deplored his utter ignorance of sea-life and nautical terms, may at first thought seem surprising; yet there can be no great hazard in predicting that, in like manner, the most popular "Life of Wellington" will be the work, not of a military man or a politician, but of some writer of Southey's class, qualified by natural genius and long practice for the difficult office of interpreting between the world of action and the reading public.

For the present, the public must be content with works of humbler pretensions, produced for the supply of a temporary demand, and designed merely to furnish that amount of information which every Englishman ought to possess on such a subject. Of these works, that of Mr. Stocqueler, so far as a judgment can be formed from the first volume, seems likely to be one of the most readable and useful, if not absolutely the best.* The author's experience as a writer and a traveller, his familiarity with his theme, and his personal acquaintance with the Duke, have been of great advantage to him; and, though the work has evidently been prepared in haste, and is in many parts little more than a compilation, these circumstances detract less from its value than might be supposed. The extracts which are made from a great variety of sources—from the Duke's "Despatches" down to a popular novel—are generally well selected and interesting; and the narrative which combines them is written in an easy and fluent style, with sufficient indications of care and general knowledge to secure the reader's confidence in its accuracy. The illustrations are numerous, and form an attractive feature of the work. The author in his preface claims for them the "unusual advantage of truthfulness in the matter of scenery, costume, and portraiture"—a claim which he fortifies by the statement that some of them were "contributed by the graceful pencil of Colonel John Luard, author of a 'History of the Dress of the British Soldier,' and an actor in the scenes delineated, and the remainder by Messrs. G. and R. Thomas, the eminent artists and engravers."

The first volume of Mr. Stocqueler's work closes with the warlike preparations which followed the return of Napoleon from Elba, and is, consequently, wholly occupied with the history of the Duke's military career. The great events in that history are well known to most readers. The share which the Duke, then Major-General Sir Arthur Wellesley, took in the expedition against Denmark, in 1807, is less generally known; and as it was such as reflected peculiar honour upon him, we select from Mr. Stocqueler's volume the passage in which it is described. After mentioning the dispersion of the hostile army by the force under the Duke's command, the narrator proceeds as follows:—

Sir Arthur then returned to his former head-quarters, and it was now that he exercised that humanity, and displayed that generosity towards the adjacent inhabitants, which always formed such a conspicuous feature in his character. He preserved the utmost regularity and order among his men; no complaint preferred, even by the poorest peasant, against any man, of whatever rank, who had either injured or insulted him, went unnoticed; and the country people, who had been taught to look upon the British as monsters of iniquity, loudly exclaimed that they were better treated by their enemies than they had been by their own people: the former paid for all they had with the utmost liberality; the latter compelled them to furnish them with whatever they required, without offering the least indemnification. The men had been taken away from their homes to fill up the ranks in the militia; thus labourers were wanting to gather in the harvest; distress and ruin would have been the sure consequences, had not Sir Arthur permitted the British troops to assist the farmers. It was a sight not less curious than grateful to see soldiers placed in almost every house, to guard the inhabitants from the insults of such stragglers as might stray from the British camp, from a desire of plunder; nor would Sir Arthur permit his troops to receive any reward for their services in this respect, though the gentlemen farmers and peasants were willing to be liberal towards men whom they looked upon as their protectors. In fact, so attached had they become to our troops, that they anticipated with much uneasiness the day which, by the capitulation of Copenhagen, was fixed upon for the evacuation of Zealand by the British forces. Theft of any kind was punished by Sir Arthur with the utmost severity; but it is just to state that only two complaints of this nature were ever made against any British soldier in Zealand, and then, by the exertion of their officers, the property was restored to its owners.

Such being the manner in which Wellington conducted his warfare, it is not surprising that the atrocities committed by the French armies, in carrying out Napoleon's system of "making war support war," should have excited his indignation. The following passage in one of his despatches, relating to Massena's retreat from Portugal, describes some of these outrages, though by no means the worst, and shows what the English commander thought of them:—

I am concerned (wrote Lord Wellington) to be obliged to add to this account, that their conduct throughout this retreat has been marked by a barbarity seldom equalled, and never surpassed. Even in the towns of Torres Novas, Thomar, and Pernes, in which the head-quarters of some of the corps had been for four months, and in which the inhabitants had been invited, by promises of good treatment, to remain, they were plundered, and many of their houses destroyed on the night the enemy withdrew from their position; and they have since burnt every town and village through which they have passed. The convent of Alcobaça was burnt by order from the French head-quarters. The Bishop's palace, and the whole town of Leyria, in which General Drouet had had his head-quarters, shared the same fate; and there is not an inhabitant of the country, of any class or description, who has had any dealing or communication with the French army, who has not had any reason to repent of it, and to complain of them. This is the mode in which the promises have been performed and the assurances have been fulfilled, which were held out in the proclamation of the French Commander-in-Chief, in which he told the inhabitants of Portugal that he was not come to make war upon them, but with a powerful army of 110,000 men to drive the English into the sea. It is to be hoped that the example of what has occurred in this country will teach the people of this and of other nations what value they ought to place on such promises and assurances; and that there is no security for life, or for anything which makes life valuable, except in decided resistance to the enemy.

It is but just to add that Massena was notoriously the most cruel and rapacious of all the French marshals, not excepting even Davoust; and that some of them, particularly Victor and Mortier, evinced on many occasions chivalrous and humane feelings. It was the inhuman system of Napoleon himself which compelled them to have recourse to oppressive exactions for the maintenance of their troops. Massena, however, appears to have been naturally ferocious and pitiless. Some of the barbarities committed by his soldiers, under his express orders, were of such a shocking nature that nothing but the positive testimony of eye-witnesses would gain belief for the narrative.

* The Life of Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington. By J. H. Stocqueler, Esq., author of "The British Officer," &c. In two volumes, with numerous engravings. Vol. I. London: Ingram, Cooke, and Co. 1852.

One of his own countrymen, writing in the "Biographie Universelle," indignantly condemns his inhuman conduct, and holds him up "to the horror of posterity." He was, however, undeniably one of Napoleon's ablest lieutenants. The Duke of Wellington is said to have declared that no other commander to whom he was opposed caused him so much anxiety as Marshal Massena, whose activity and vigilance made it necessary for his adversary to be constantly on the alert. Probably Mr. Disraeli had in view Massena's military genius when, in one of his novels, he thought fit to claim this famous commander, among other great European celebrities, as a scion of the Judaic stock. His name, if we are to believe Mr. Disraeli, is only a transposition of the Jewish patronymic Manasseh. As far as the evidence of physiognomy goes, it certainly seems to confirm this derivation. Massena's portrait shows us a small, thin, Arab face, with sharp, prominent features, contrasting strongly with the fine, open, soldier-like countenances of most of his fellow-marshals. In reading the history of his campaigns, we seem to be following the career, not of a civilised commander at the head of a European army, but of one of the merciless devastators and despots of the East—a Mahmoud of Ghizni, a Hyder Ali, or a Djezzar Pacha. After perusing the account of Massena's ravages in Portugal, it is with no small sense of gratification that one turns again to the oft-told story of the manner in which Wellington, after holding the baffled invader long in check before the impregnable lines of Torres Vedras, at length sallied in strength from his covert, overtook the retreating enemy, cut off his rear-guard, hunted him from one position after another, and finally drove him, in ignominious flight, beyond the frontier of the ravaged kingdom, with the loss of more than half of his army.

The publishers of Mr. Stocqueler's work have also given to the public two smaller works, of the "shilling" order, which may suffice for readers who cannot spare time or money for octavo volumes.* One of these is a biography of the Duke, purporting to be by a "citizen of the world;" there is, however, nothing particularly cosmopolitan about the work, which is a clear and concise narrative, such as any patriotic English writer might have produced, of the important events in the life of the great soldier and statesman whose exploits and merits happened to form the leading topic of the day. "Wellingtoniana" is an interesting collection of anecdotes and apophthegms, some of which will probably be new even to those who have read a good many volumes about the Duke. In no way could a foreigner so readily acquire a knowledge of the great Duke's character, and of the sources of his greatness, as through this unpretending but valuable little publication.

Wellingtoniana. Anecdotes, Maxims, Opinions, and Characteristics of the Duke of Wellington. Selected by John Timbs, compiler of "Laconics," author of "Popular Errors Explained," &c. Ingram, Cooke and Co. 1852.

The death of the Duke of Wellington naturally afforded an interesting theme to many popular preachers, and several of the sermons delivered on the occasion have been published. One of these, which is brought under our notice at present, treats of the lessons which the life of Wellington affords to young men.* It is an eloquent, patriotic, and martial panegyric, such as a Roman pontiff might have pronounced over the urn of a Cincinnatus or a Camillus. Another sermon, of a somewhat different character, has been expanded by subsequent additions into a small volume, which may be read by old and young with pleasure and instruction.† Anything which Mr. Binney writes is expected, as a matter of course, to contain profound or original thoughts clearly and forcibly expressed. Those who take up this publication with such expectations will certainly not be disappointed; they are more likely to be surprised, as Mr. Binney anticipates in his preface, by the novel arguments and lessons which the author finds in the biography of the warrior-statesman, and which are certainly such as no pagan pontiff could have discovered. Passing over these theological disquisitions, however, as not exactly suitable for citation, we prefer to quote, as a good specimen of the book, the following admirable picture of the Duke of Wellington as he appeared to his fellow-countrymen in the closing years of his life.

The man familiar with death was allowed to linger long among the living; he survived almost all his contemporaries, and stood in the midst of another generation the solitary memorial of a past age. It is interesting to observe how he came to be regarded as he went through the mild evening of his life, having borne the burden and heat of the day. The warrior and the statesman got blended together, each reduced and mellowed by time, so that the stronger and more prominent points in both were softened and subdued, and there was simply left to us a singularly sagacious and wise old man—a man who in his day had done deeds both in camp and cabinet, but who was now thought of not so much as soldier or minister, as something combining the virtues of both, the promptitude of the one, and the caution of the other—a man calm, deep, strong, reliable; a sort of sage or patriarch, looked up to as if elevated above the region of disturbing passions and party animosities; a brave, resolute man, too—a sort of oracle, whom successive sovereigns might send for and consult, to know what was to be done when no one else seemed able to tell, sure of receiving some answer or other, some suggestion as to what was the only or wisest course to get the vessel off the rock, or the carriage on the rail; advice always regulated by a simple regard to the object to be secured, whoever was to have the charge of the ship or train. After being nurtured amid party prejudices; after growing up to idolise prerogative; after fighting, as was supposed, in support of despotism against popular progress, and doing it with earnest and conscious sympathy; after betraying his incompetency to rule an advancing age, from ignorance of its wants and opposition to its will—after all this, he became that wise, honoured, and trusted old man, the last years of whose wonderful life were spent in unlearning the lessons of his youth, or in trying to forget them, and in going with the tide as far as he could, accepting what was done and determined by the nation as a thing settled and not to be disturbed, keeping himself apart from those of his order who still clung to their musty traditions. He was ripened into a fine, noble specimen of the British citizen. Happy in the original soundness of his mind, in the strength, clearness, and integrity of his understanding, he was happy in the length of his protracted day which afforded him the opportunity of becoming what he was. By many of his class the opportunity would have been lost—they would have left the world exactly as they came into it, accompanied to the grave by all the prejudices that met them at their birth.

THE PARISH BEADLE OF FRANCE AND HIS CONGENERS.

FROM THE FRENCH.

It is in the capital and great cities of France only that the parish beadle exists as a permanent functionary. The beadle of a village is some disguised cobbler or weaver, enveloped on Sunday in the red cloak of a dentist, or some rejected garb of the kind, and exposed to the very equivocal admiration, or perhaps the open raillery, of the church-goers. Let the denouncers of pluralities wreak their wrath upon the parish beadle of a country town: he is at one and the same time beadle, sacristan, bell-ringer, grave-digger, and ecclesiastical Jack of all trades to an entire district. At Paris the multiplicity of occupations necessitates the division of labour, and the beadle presides only over the interior police of the temple. He is the first to enter and the last to leave it. Dwelling in some impenetrable recess adjoining the edifice, he enters the church by a side door at half-past five in summer and at half-past six in winter. He walks through the nave, the choir, the aisles, sees that all is in order, and that no sacrilegious thieves have made free with the inclosure confided to his care; then he opens the doors, and commences his daily promenade through the church. At intervals the iron point of his silver-headed cane, or the staff of his halbert, resounds through the sonorous vaults. He pursues with holy wrath the intrusive dogs whose barkings interrupt divine worship, expels disturbers, walks at the head of families whom baptisms, marriages or funerals have assembled beneath the sacred roof; and in the evening, at half-past seven, having duly visited every part of his domain, he closes the doors and returns to his home.

In order that the beadle may not lose sight of his duties, a failing to which human nature is unfortunately exposed, they are enumerated upon a black board appended to the walls of the vestry. The following regulations enacted for his especial monition are copied from the vestry walls of the parish church of St. Eustache:—

1. The beadles are to be two in number.

2. Their functions are to open and shut the gates of the church; watchfully to maintain good order and decency, a charge they are on no account to neglect; to walk at the head of processions and other ceremonies; to precede the curate in all his ecclesiastical functions; to clear the way for the official who makes the collections on Sundays and saints' days; to conduct the members of the fabric to the offertory, and back again to their place; to call the preacher, and re-conduct him to his chamber after the sermon; to introduce the churchwardens and the members of charitable societies at the time of their assemblies, &c.

3. They are enjoined to repress all rising tumult in the church; to prevent anyone from entering with parcels or provisions; to permit no persons to come in with their hair in papers, but gently to admonish such to withdraw for a few minutes, that they may present themselves with more decency.

4. The beadles are not to remain in the vestry, but in the church.

5. The doors of the church are to be open half an hour before the first mass, and shut half an hour after the evening prayer, except on Saturday and on the eve of the festivals, on account of confessions, &c.

It is easy to see by the above that the office of beadle is a post of responsibility. Thus it is never confided to any but men of honesty and good character, whose morality is above suspicion; and the most minute inquiries are made as to the public and private life of a candidate. It is indispensable that he shall have passed the age of inexperience and frivolity, and that he shall be proof against the seductions of the wine-shop.

The clergy, who have a horror of bloodshed, and whose banner bears the word "Pax" for a device—the clergy invariably select their beadle from the ranks of the army! The beadle of the Restoration was a trooper of the old Imperial Guard; he of 1841 equally belonged to a select corps of the Royal Guard, or to the military staff of the exiled Charles X. He passes suddenly from the worldly, tumultuous, and irregular life of a soldier, to the peaceable, devout, and contemplative habits of a clerk. At intervals, when he glances at the rich epaulettes upon his shoulders, he may imagine that he is still in the service and has risen to the rank of a colonel; but the illusion is soon dissipated by the remembrance of the fatal 28th of July, 1830, when, wounded and half-dead with famine, a compassionate citizen gave him shelter and food; some days after he was informed that his regiment was disbanded. Without resource and far from his native country, he went to ask hospitality at the door of a church; they received him, and made the poor soldier a beadle, in consideration of his good character and six feet two inches.

It generally happens that the beadle (called in Paris a Swiss) is a Swiss in reality—a veritable son of Helvetia. If he is called upon to open his mouth, his accent betrays his Tedescan origin fortunately he is essentially a mute personage, and has no demand for eloquence or brilliant capacity. His greatest merit is to rival in stature the drum-majors of the line, and the travelling giants elevated from six to seven feet above the level of the sea. He is a converted Hercules, a demi-pagan subjected to Christian law. He is not a little proud of his figure, which he adorns with gold-lace, galloon, and embroidery. He is the incessant persecutor of the tailor and the laceman, and never believes himself harnessed with sufficient elegance. To be sure, his presence is really imposing, and his martial figure has a brilliant effect at the head of a procession, when he walks between two walls of snowy linen hung with wreaths and bouquets, and treads upon a soil strewn thick with flowers.

If the beadle is proud of his person, every parish is proud of its beadle, and endeavours to eclipse its rivals, in choosing one of irreproachable carriage, and loading him with lavish ornament. On important occasions, a beadle is borrowed and returned like an article of furniture. One pastor writes to another: "The Duke of C—— and the Countess X—— are going to be married; they will receive the nuptial benediction in our parish. Have the goodness to lend me your beadle; ours is grown thin of late, and is, besides, two inches shorter than yours."

At the time of the funeral of the victims of Fieschi, there was a species of rivalry among all the beadles of all the parishes of Paris. The honour of figuring at the sepulchral ceremony fell upon him of Saint Leu, a man remarkable amongst them all for the loftiness of his stature, the regularity of his features, and the nobility of his bearing.

The fixed salary of a beadle does not amount to more than forty francs a month; but the perquisites which he receives at marriages, funerals, and especially at baptisms, raise his emoluments to about twelve hundred francs a year. In the towns adorned with some fine cathedral celebrated for its sculptures, antiquities, and curiosities—as Rouen, Bourges, Chartres, or Amiens—the beadle augments his revenues by acting as cicerone to travellers. That his guidance may not be dispensed with, no sooner is the service over than he shuts up the choir and the principal chapels. Strangers arrive, eager to see the tomb of Georges d'Amboise or of Louis de Brèze—unfortunately it is shut up. The beadle presents himself, complaisant but greedy, polite but interested—a sort of broker's man in possession—an incarnate sine quâ non; he satisfies the curious, and, his task accomplished, he places his corporation at the door, where he stands a living money-box, in such a manner that the travellers have to pass one at a time through the Caudine forks of baksheesh. This race of tax-gatherers is composed, not of Helvetians, but of true sons of the soil. Frenchmen by birth, and Frenchmen in heart, they levy contributions upon foreigners, and upon Englishmen in particular, accounting it as so much spoil taken from the enemy.

The beadle is the most brilliant, the most dazzling, and the most gaudy of the servants of the church. He surpasses in splendour all his colleagues—the verger, the sacristan, the sexton, the giver of holy water, the chorister, and the chanter. In vain they pretend to appear upon a level with him; the public, ever alive to merit, acknowledges the superior quality of the beadle. The verger alone might rival him, if his duties did not comprise the humiliating task of sweeping the church and running on occasional errands.

In the parishes of Paris, the verger formerly carried a whalebone wand, and wore a robe the colour of which varied according as the church was under the invocation of a martyr, a virgin, or a canonised king. At present he is dressed in a plain suit of black, with white cravat, knee-breeches, and silk-stockings. He wears a sword with a brazen hilt, and carries in his hand a little staff of ebony tipped with silver. It is in this gentlemanly costume that the verger attends the processions to prevent their being broken, accompanied by the priest who makes the collection, and on whose behalf he cries out, in a voice whose familiar cadence is known far and wide, "For the necessities of the church, if you please!"

The Sacristan has charge of the lighting, the ornaments, and the vestments, and it is his business to adorn and dismantle the altar. The Ringer gains four hundred francs a year for ringing the Angelus and the signals, and for chiming on fête days. He is said to be fond of wine—but his labour demands a stimulant, some of the bells being enormously heavy. "Boire-à-tire-la Rigaud" is a proverbial expression among the French. La Rigaud is the great bell of the cathedral of Rouen; it is of extraordinary dimensions, and the labour of ringing it doubtless gave rise to the proverb. The provincial ringer has faith in the efficacy of his bells, and will ring them manfully to dissipate a thunder-storm—an experiment which is never known to fail of success.

The giver of holy water is an infirm old man, whose only emoluments are the alms of the faithful. Death would be but an exchange of coffins for this antique ruin of humanity, walled up between four planks, attached to his box like a polypus to the rock, and never moving but to thrust forth a meagre claw armed with a sprinkling-brush.

The chorister, on the contrary, is full of life and juvenility. It is difficult to retain him within bounds; he prefers playing at taw to sol-fa-ing with the music-master or repeating his catechism. The foundation pays for his instruction, and grants him besides a gratification proportioned to his merit. If his musical talent develops itself, the ingrate suddenly abandons the church for the opera. It is true that, grateful to his parish, he often remains attached to it in quality of chanter, singing psalms at the choristers' desk during the day, and warbling of wine and the lasses during the night. Nearly all the chanters of Paris are choristers in the various theatres.

Many of the choristers grow up to be tradesmen, but not a few of them have acquired a reputation in the arts. Duprez made his first début at St. Eustache. A celebrated composer of sacred music, Nicholas Rose, began as a chorister in the college of Beaune at seven years of age, and studied with so much ardour and success, that at ten years of age he had a grand motet of his own composition performed in full orchestra—an example which ought to be held in remembrance by all young students.

With the exception of the Parisian beadle, all the servants of the church whom we have mentioned above have some trade to exercise independent of their clerical functions; some are porters, and confide the door-keeping to their wives while they discharge their duties under the shadow of the gothic arches; others are tailors, cobblers, matmakers, matchmakers, &c., &c.—a race of provident worthies who, having recognised the value of the axiom that it is well to have two strings to your bow, act upon it.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

DOMESTIC.

The great event of the past month has been the downfall of the Derby Ministry. On the 16th of December, after a debate which had lasted through four nights, the resolution for imposing a doubled and extended house-tax, in order to enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remit one-half of the malt-tax, was negatived by a vote of 305 to 286. It pleased Lord Derby and his colleagues to regard this adverse division as equivalent to a vote of want of confidence, and on this ground to throw up their offices—an extraordinary course, which could only be warranted by a consciousness of their incapacity for producing a better budget. Yet it is affirmed that the Cabinet had actually had under consideration a financial scheme of a very different character, and one that might have united a majority of suffrages in its favour, and assured to the Government, if not a greatly-lengthened existence, at least a temporary reprieve. But it was not a "compensation" budget. The very feature of Mr. Disraeli's plan which could have made it acceptable to the country, rendered it odious to the little knot of sincere and bigoted Protectionists with whom he was compelled to take counsel. Having come into power pledged to do something for the relief of the landed interest, they felt bound in honour to make at least an attempt to fulfil their engagement. With this view, they forced upon Mr. Disraeli the reduction of the malt-tax, and, in so doing, spoiled his budget. When the hopelessly impracticable character of their scheme became apparent even to their own apprehensions, the next idea of the Protectionist chiefs was to tie their unpopular budget round the neck of their able first lieutenant, and throw him overboard, as a peace-offering to the offended powers, and then to fill the vacant place with a new adherent who would bring some accession of strength to their crew. Mr. Disraeli, however, was not disposed to play the part of victim in such a sacrifice. He had made the Government, and he determined to unmake it. With one hand on the helm, and a poisoned dagger in the other, he steered the ship straight upon the rocks, and swam ashore, leaving his forlorn companions to their well-deserved fate. The remarkable speech with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer closed the debate on the ministerial side was devoted entirely to an elaborate and successful vindication of his own ability as a financier and an administrator. His colleagues in the Cabinet were left, without a word of support, to sink under the flood of public contempt in which all of them, with one exception, are destined to be speedily submerged. It is a curious fact that, except the Lord Chancellor and Mr. Disraeli, there is not one member of the late Ministry who has not lost, during his brief tenure of office, whatever reputation as a politician he may have previously possessed.

The present condition of public affairs is fraught with great peril to the state. The recent events, which have destroyed the credit of Mr. Disraeli's most conspicuous colleagues, have raised him to an unapproachable and almost despotic pre-eminence in his party. That party is by far the largest and most compact of all the parliamentary sections. With a smaller following than he now possesses, and in a less advantageous position, Mr. Disraeli was able to break up two administrations, numbering among their leaders and supporters all the statesmen and popular leaders of Great Britain. On the other hand, to drag him from office it has been necessary for all those statesmen and popular leaders to unite their efforts and their followers—and even thus, they have owed their success mainly to the blundering arrogance of the Ministers whom he had made, and who assumed to be his masters. This assumption is not likely to occur again. Henceforth the leader of the Opposition will have his party well in hand—obedient to his slightest nod. However unwilling we may be to admit it, there can be no doubt of the discreditable fact, that Mr. Disraeli is at present by far the most influential man in the United Kingdom.

Now, the question for our real statesmen to decide is a very important one. How is the government of the country to be carried on against a powerful Opposition, led by the most astute and unscrupulous politician that ever sat in Parliament? The state of affairs in this country, making allowance for the necessary difference of circumstances, is strikingly similar to that which existed in France just before the coup d'état. On the one side we have a shrewd, inscrutable, and reckless political adventurer, who, by a singular concurrence of events, has secured the unreasoning and devoted adhesion of a vast body of discontented landowners and cultivators of the soil. On the other side are all the great political notabilities, and a majority of the members of the Legislature, possessing much influence in the towns, but divided into several inharmonious factions of almost every political hue. It is idle to suppose, because coups d'état after the French fashion are impossible in this country, that there is therefore no danger in such a state of things as that which has just been described. The danger is twofold. In the first place, there is no reason to doubt that, if any accidental circumstance—such, for example, as a violent no-popery excitement—should at any time render the existing Government unpopular, the vigilant leader of the Opposition will be ready to take advantage of it. There will be a sudden and fierce parliamentary struggle, a defeat of the ministry, a dissolution, and then Mr. Disraeli will be borne back into power at the head of a great majority of ardent supporters. It may be said that, after all, the power of a minister is so closely circumscribed in this country that even such an event could not produce any very injurious result. But it must be recollected that, though the legal power of a minister may be narrowly restricted, the power both for good and for evil which he derives from the support of party-spirit, and even of party-discipline, is very great; too great to be lodged in any but the most patriotic and scrupulous hands. With such support, one British minister drove America, and another Ireland, into rebellion; a third loaded the country with its present burden of debt; a fourth carried Catholic emancipation; and a fifth free-trade. Having no desire to do Mr. Disraeli injustice, we must nevertheless say that the day, if it ever arrive, which shall see such a very lawless and vindictive personage at the head of a reactionary majority of four hundred members in the House of Commons, is likely to prove an unfortunate day for the country.

But there is a far greater and more imminent danger, of another kind, to be dreaded. It must be borne in mind that a still more reckless and vindictive political adventurer, with a large and most efficient army under his control, is constantly watching this country across the narrow strait which a steamer can pass in ninety minutes. One consequence of the present state of parties in our Legislature is, that the Government will be liable at any time to be embarrassed, and even broken up, by a sudden and skilful movement of the Opposition. Such an event, which, under ordinary circumstances, would lead to nothing worse than a mere "ministerial crisis," may now afford a real or fancied opportunity for an unexpected attack from without. The couchant tiger beyond the Channel may seize such an occasion for his long-meditated spring.

Such are the perils against which our statesmen have now to protect the country. Though these dangers may not be considered alarmingly urgent, they are yet probable and evident enough to render a lack of due precaution an inexcusable fault in any ministers or political leaders who have the power of controlling or influencing the government of the country.

COLONIES AND DEPENDENCIES.

The retirement of the Derby Ministry is a most fortunate event for our Colonial Empire, which Sir John Pakington's incompetency and wrongheaded Toryism were seriously endangering. It did not seem possible that at the present day a member of Parliament could be found so little enlightened as to suppose that the intelligent communities inhabiting such colonies as Canada, Australia, and the Cape, could now be governed by the same arbitrary system of Colonial-office interference which was reluctantly endured some twenty years ago. Lord Derby, however, discovered this rare qualification for office in a respectable country gentleman, eminent as a chairman of quarter-sessions, and who has accordingly managed the government of the British colonies exactly in the spirit and temper with which he would have administered "justices' justice" in his county.

This spirit was curiously exhibited on the 3rd of last month, when in reply to a question from Sir William Molesworth, the Colonial Secretary stated that it was not the intention of the Government to concede to the Canadians the power of disposing of their "Clergy Reserves"—notwithstanding that this concession had been promised by the previous Government, and had been once more claimed by the Canadian House of Assembly, in an address to the Crown, adopted by the large majority of 52 to 22 votes. Sir John gives several reasons for refusing to keep this promise, all of which resolved themselves into one—viz., that he, sitting in Downing-street, knew what was good and proper for the Canadians better than the members of their own Legislature. How Sir John Pakington, as a member of the British Legislature, would relish a similar assumption of superior knowledge in a stranger, one may easily imagine. But it is not so easy to understand how Sir John Pakington, as a Minister of the Crown, could reconcile it to his sense of honour and duty to break a promise formally made, in the name of the Crown, to a colony which had done nothing to forfeit the concession.

The case of the Cape colony is remarkably similar. A constitution, as is well known, was promised to the colony by Earl Grey; and it was, in fact, nearly completed, and ready to go into operation, when that minister went out of office. Lord Derby repeated Earl Grey's promise, and gave a positive assurance that there should be no delay in confirming the grant, and no retrenchment of the privileges granted. Yet Sir John Pakington, disapproving of some provisions in the constitution (or, as the report goes, influenced by the secret persuasions of a Cape functionary, now in this country, whose unpopularity in the colony has rendered him naturally averse to the introduction of free institutions into it) coolly repudiated these promises, and withdrew the constitution. On the 14th of last month, in reply to a question from Mr. Adderley, concerning a memorial from the colonists complaining of this treatment, Sir John Pakington replied that "he had a despatch from the Lieutenant-Governor, stating that no excitement prevailed on the subject in Cape Town, and that any attempt to create an excitement was likely to prove unsuccessful." This is the old story. The Lieutenant-Governor of a colony is appointed by the Colonial Minister. From the Colonial Minister he expects promotion. And in nine cases out of ten, the subservient officials who fill these posts will write home whatever they think likely to be most acceptable to their superior. How little the assurances of this particular Lieutenant-Governor are to be depended upon is shown by the following extract from the Cape Town Mail, of November 6, which was copied into the Daily News. It should be stated that the despatch announcing Sir John Pakington's intention of withholding the constitution was only made known in the colony on the previous day:—

At the last moment before the sailing of the steamer, the colonists have become aware of the indefinite postponement of the promised constitution, and virtual revocation of the letters patent of 1850. The surprise and indignation of the public at this monstrous violation of official faith have already been freely expressed; and measures are in contemplation for assembling a convention of delegates from the different districts, to consider the course of action to be pursued under these circumstances.

It is clear that if there was "no excitement," there was something much more dangerous in the minds of the colonists. The case is evidently one which demands the immediate action of the Government, to prevent the mischief which may otherwise result from Sir John Pakington's culpable mismanagement and incredible blindness.

In Australia, the state of affairs is quite as alarming, and from a similar cause. In the last session of Parliament, a petition was presented from the Legislative Council of New South Wales, praying that the colonial taxation and expenditure, the appointment to offices in the colony, and the local legislation in all questions "not affecting the prerogatives of the Crown or the general interests of the empire," might be left to the unfettered action of the Legislature and Governor of the colony. If these reasonable requests were granted, the Legislative Council declared its readiness to "provide for the whole cost of their internal government, civil and military." Such an arrangement, which would retain the allegiance of the colonists, and at the same time relieve the imperial treasury of all expense on account of the colony, is one which any commonly prudent minister would have accepted at once. Yet it would seem that after the lapse of half a year, no answer had been returned. On the 9th of last month, in reply to a question from Sir William Molesworth, Sir John Pakington stated that the Government, "after mature deliberation, had decided upon the extent to which they thought concession to that petition ought to be made," but he could not enter into an explanation on the subject until after the recess. There can be no doubt that if the "explanation" had been of a nature likely to be satisfactory, it would have been given at once. In the mean time, the consequences of the mere delay are already becoming serious. An ominous account of the state of public feeling in the colony is given by the Sydney Morning Herald of September 3, in an article from which the following extract was reprinted, a few days ago, by the Times;—

This day's mail will convey to her Majesty's Government the details and results of the late movement in our Legislative Council. In the speeches delivered, and in the resolutions adopted, Ministers will hardly fail to perceive that the time has come when concessions can no longer be withheld, but at risks which even Ministers ought not to contemplate without alarm. In some of those speeches, it is true, expressions were employed of which sober-minded colonists entirely disapprove. But let Ministers be assured of this—that respecting the political wrongs by which those angry expressions were provoked there is throughout the country but one opinion and one feeling. There is but one opinion among all ranks and all parties as to the necessity of our having the unfettered control of all our own revenues and plenary powers of legislation on subjects purely colonial. The public mind has been so exasperated by the proceedings of the Home Government, that nothing short of a speedy removal of all our just causes of complaint can arrest and put down that spirit of disloyalty which has of late been gaining ground in every direction.

The point which is most deserving of notice in all these cases is that to which we have already adverted, namely, that the demands of the colonists, whether in Canada, at the Cape, or in Australia, are not only reasonable in themselves, but are such as the Home Government ought to be glad to concede. Never before had any country an opportunity of retaining a vast colonial empire at so cheap and easy a rate; and surely, never since the separation of the American colonies has such a splendid heritage of the British Crown been so needlessly imperilled, by official injustice and imbecility, as during the brief career of the Derby Administration.

FOREIGN.

On the 2nd of last month, the anniversary of the day on which the liberties of France were extinguished, the long-expected changes in the government of that country took place, in a way reminding one of the sudden shifting of scenes and characters in a pantomime. A plain "Republic" was suddenly transformed into a gorgeous "Empire," and M. Bonaparte, the Republican President, became Napoleon III., "by the grace of God and the national will Emperor of the French." Such a political phantasmagoria, in which all is unreal, baseless, and ephemeral, hardly awakens a languid curiosity; and, but for the possible danger with which it may be fraught, would be wholly without interest for this country. The mere title of Emperor could, indeed, add nothing to the despotic power which Louis Napoleon before possessed; but it awakens recollections in France, and fears or sympathies in other countries, which may produce important results. All Italy, north and south, is said to be already in a secret ferment, caused by reminiscences and hopes, to which the present hateful tyrannies in Lombardy, Rome, and Naples, lend a double strength. The late Republican party in Italy is said to have disappeared altogether, absorbed in the Imperial party, which looks for deliverance to the armies of France. Such is the result of so governing a people that even a change of masters is welcomed by them as a relief.

The Belgian Chambers, in mortal dread of their powerful and unscrupulous neighbour, have passed a law restricting the freedom of the press, lest its comments should give offence in that quarter. One can hardly blame the Belgian legislators; yet it may be doubted whether their prudence or subserviency will avail them better than a more courageous course. Louis Napoleon is not a man who will lack a pretext whenever it may be convenient for him to carry out the intention now openly proclaimed by his subordinates, and extend the frontiers of his Empire to the Rhine.

The Prussian and Spanish Governments have both been inspired, by the example of France, with the idea of restricting the powers of their respective legislatures, and have both encountered a strong opposition. The avowed object of the rulers, in both cases, is to strengthen their respective Governments. They have not yet learned, or are incapable of appreciating, the simple truth, that the strength of a Government results not from its executive power, but from the attachment of its people.

LITERATURE.

Fulcher's Ladies' Memorandum Book and Poetical Miscellany. 1853. Sudbury: J. W. Fulcher. London: Suttaby and Co.; Longman, Brown, Green and Longmans.

"FULCHER'S Ladies' Pocket Book" has been for so many years a favourite with the public, and has so well deserved the good character it has attained, that we are not surprised to find it, as usual, abounding in good things. Bernard Barton thought it no scorn to make it the vehicle of some of his best pieces, which made their first appearance in its miniature pages. The volume for 1853 is in no respect behind its predecessors. With original sketches by Frances Brown and Thomas Miller, and a long list of contributions from the Poets, to say nothing of the riddles, which it would take us six months to solve, Mr. Fulcher's numerous patrons can hardly fail of being abundantly satisfied.

The Retrospective Review. No. I. November, 1852. London: John Russell Smith, 36, Soho-square.

THIS is the first number of a new quarterly journal devoted to the review of old literature. The plan is not altogether new—a journal under the same title having been attempted nearly thirty years ago, though we believe it remained in existence not more than twelve months. The present work promises well; the table of contents presents a good bill of fare, and the articles are written with spirit. We hope and trust that our new friend will live to become an old one, and prosper in the land.

Second Report of the Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851, to the Right Hon. Spencer Horatio Walpole, &c. &c. Presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of Her Majesty. 1852.

FROM this Report, the importance of which is not to be judged from its size, we gather, for the information of our readers, a few facts which ought to be generally known, as they affect, more or less remotely, all classes of the people. In the first place, the balance remaining in the hands of the Commissioners, after defraying all the expenses of the Exhibition, is stated at £170,000 at least—an amount greater by £20,000 than was reckoned upon. The application of this large surplus formed the chief difficulty of the Commissioners. Without even alluding to the numberless suggestions which have been made upon this subject, we will confine our notice to what it has been proposed to do with the money, and the steps which have already been taken in carrying out the proposition. Considering the acknowledged insufficiency of our home institutions for industrial instruction as compared with those of other nations, the Commissioners state that they did not feel justified in allotting the funds to purposes of a limited, partial, or local character; and they declare their conviction that the "requirement most felt by the country is an institution which should serve to increase the means of industrial education, and extend the influence of science and art upon productive industry." They propose, therefore, the erection of a new institution in the metropolis, "devoted to the purposes of instruction, adequate for the extended wants of industry, and in connexion with similar institutions in the provinces;" an institution that shall be "rendered capable, by scholarships and by other means, of affiliating local establishments over this country, in India, and her Majesty's colonial possessions, whereby the results of its labours might be disseminated as widely as possible, and great advantage derived from a constant interchange of information between the parent institution and the bodies associated with it." For such an institution, which, to be worthy of the nation must necessarily embrace every department of practical science and art, a space of ground, according to the Commissioners, of not less than one hundred and fifty acres in extent, would be desirable, while less than half that amount would certainly be insufficient. It being altogether impossible to obtain land at any price in the centre of the metropolis adequate for the contemplated purpose, the Commissioners availed themselves of the opportunity which offered of purchasing the Gore House estate, which possesses a frontage of five or six hundred feet facing Hyde Park, which contains twenty-one and a half acres, and of which they obtained possession for £60,000. Twenty-one acres, however, would never admit of the complete development of their plan; and therefore, after duly weighing what appeared to them good and sufficient reasons for the bold step, they passed a resolution authorising the outlay of a sum not exceeding £150,000 of the surplus in the purchase of land (including the first purchase), upon condition that her Majesty's Government would engage to recommend to Parliament the contribution of a sum of like amount towards the purchases contemplated. This assurance having been obtained by us, we felt that we were placed in a position which would justify us in proceeding, without an injurious loss of time, to make the further purchases; being at the same time fully aware that we should be doing so at our own risk, but equally convinced that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, it was a duty to the country not to shrink from incurring that responsibility. Accordingly we entered into negotiations with the trustees of the Baron de Villars for the purchase of an estate belonging to him of the extent of forty-eight acres, and adjoining the Gore House estate already purchased by us. The result of these negotiations has been, that we have secured the possession of this estate for the sum of £153,000. Of this amount, the sum of £15,000 has been already paid by us as a deposit.

The Commissioners further recommend that Parliament should obtain possession of the whole of the unoccupied ground adjoining that which they have purchased, and thus secure the whole of the one hundred and fifty acres which they conceive to be necessary for the full development of their plan.

So much for the business done. The Commissioners make light of the weary distance of the locality of the proposed institution from the centre of the metropolis, and argue from the success of the Exhibition on a spot exactly opposite to it, that that part of London is not too remote for visitors. That it is not too remote for visitors appears to us a very equivocal recommendation for the site of an institution avowedly contemplated for the improvement of the industrious classes, the immense majority of whom in London are permanently resident some five or six miles to the east or north-east of it. The armies of artisans and operatives who visited the Exhibition did so for the most part individually but once or twice, and they sacrificed each of them a day's work in order to do so. They must do the same to visit the new institution, if it ever be completed. For all practical purposes, so far as the Spitalfields weaver, and the three or four hundred thousand working-men who reside and must reside east of Temple Bar, are concerned, it might as well be situated on Salisbury Plain, or at the Land's End; they will never see it unless upon some few and infrequent holiday occasions, and they will derive no more benefit from it than they do from the impenetrable print-room of the British Museum, or from breaking their shins in the gloom of the Nineveh Caverns. It appears to us that a piece of ground might have been found purchaseable at one-third of the price paid for the land bought, somewhere to the north of the city, on a part of the district in which Finsbury Park has been projected, and which would have been accessible to hundreds of thousands who cannot afford the time nor the expense of travelling so far westward. But it is too late now perhaps to speculate upon what might have been. The bargain is made, and the public must make the best of it. They will have to pay in some shape or other for the buildings to be erected on the ground; that is the only thing to be predicted with anything like certainty at present; in other words, the profits of the Great Exhibition, which were not the property of the Commissioners, have been expended by them in securing a tax of some tens of thousands a-year, it may be, upon the pockets of the public for a long and indefinite period. We hope, though we can hardly believe, that the institution which is to be, will, in its practical working, compensate the outlay, and that the people who have paid, and will pay for all, will not be asked in addition to pay for a sight of their own property.

The Pronunciation of Greek; Accent and Quantity. A Philological Inquiry. By JOHN STUART BLACKIE. Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh. Edinburgh: Sutherland and Knox. London: Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

Classical Literature in its relation to the Nineteenth Century and Scottish University Education. An inaugural Lecture delivered in the University of Edinburgh, November 2, 1852. By JOHN STUART BLACKIE, Professor of Greek. Edinburgh: Sutherland and Knox. London: Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

THE first of these works is designed to show the propriety of pronouncing the ancient Greek very nearly as the Romaic or modern Greek is pronounced by the subjects of King Otho. The author discusses the question with much vigour of style and copiousness of learning; but he omits, after all, to consider the main point which must be settled before his arguments can produce conviction—namely, the advantage which would arise from the proposed change. We may grant that he has proved—what the best authorities have long been inclined to admit—that the pronunciation of the modern Greeks is in most points similar to that which prevailed among their progenitors two thousand years ago; but that admission goes but very little way towards establishing the principle that we ought to endeavour to pronounce Greek after the fashion of either the moderns or the ancients. The objects for which we learn either Latin or Greek differ in one respect from those that induce us to acquire a modern tongue; we do not expect ever to have occasion to speak either of the ancient languages to a foreigner. Were the French, or German, or Italian, to become a dead language—or were either of them only spoken, in a very corrupt form, by an insignificant community in a remote corner of Europe—the precise pronunciation of that particular language would cease to be a matter of much importance to us. We should learn it, as we now learn the classical tongues, solely for the advantages to be derived from an acquaintance with its literature; and these advantages would probably be just as great, whether our mode of pronouncing the language were accurate or not. In reading poetry, only, would a correct pronunciation of these modern tongues be important. But in regard to the Greek, it is admitted on all hands, curiously enough, that the proper method of reading the poetry of the ancients is altogether lost by the moderns. This loss, however, is really of very slight consequence. We admire Homer and Sophocles, not for their rhythm, but for the poetic beauties of their ideas and their diction. The mere sound of the language is a matter of as little interest to us as the shape of the letters in which we write it.

The "inaugural lecture" has for its object to advocate the claims of the Greek language and literature as a branch of study in our academies. There are few scholars who will not concur in the views which the author propounds on this subject, and which he enforces with great energy and much happiness of expression.

Rhyming Dictionary for the use of Young Poets; with an Essay on English Versification, and Explanatory Observations on the Selection and Use of Rhymes. Edinburgh: J. Hogg. London: R. Groombridge and Sons.

This is a remarkably clever and well-digested little work. The Essay on English Versification, though occupying but a moderate space, is one of the completest treatises on the subject which has yet appeared, and it contains some note-worthy passages, calculated to be of use to prose-writers as well as poets, upon the remarkable powers of the consonants in descriptive writing. From the Explanatory Observations we extract the following passage, which, it appears to us, expresses the common-sense view of the use of such technical aids to poetic art as Rhyming Dictionaries can afford.

Byshe says that as, even in conversation, we often find ourselves at a loss for an apt word to express our meaning; and as similar difficulties must naturally occur still more often in verse-writing, it is reasonable to assume that those engaged in the latter task will scarcely fail to reap some advantage from a Dictionary of Rhymes; since, in a moment, and without trouble, they may there find words which might not suggest themselves for a long time through the mere process of reflection. This is a fair and simple argument. . . . . What the Abbe Dubois once said of the French poets is probably true of not a few English ones; to wit, that, "whatever they might say, they all kept some such book in their private workshops." . . . . Many of the most exquisite fancies of Keats, and, above all, in his "Endymion," have obviously been prompted by the necessities of the rhyme. . . . . Many other poets besides Keats might be shown to have taken suggestions from rhymes, and these both numerous and fine; nor is the circumstance of their having so done in the slightest degree disparaging. If the thoughts were original, they possessed the one characteristic needful in poetry, and it mattered not whence they sprung. Still less mattered it whether the suggestive rhymes occured spontaneously to the mind, or were taken from a book. On this trifling distinction the question really and wholly hangs. Let not the alumni of the muses, then, when they would express the whispers of the "maids divine" in fit terms, either scruple or be ashamed to have recourse to all such aids as lie at their command.

As well might the artist scruple or be ashamed to have recourse to tinted paper, prepared canvas, or any of the numerous contrivances adapted to abbreviate his labour, or render it more effective. The world cares nothing for the mode in which a work of art is achieved, be it a poem, a picture, or a statue; so that it be really a fine work, all will be content to ignore the tools by which it was wrought. The Dictionary before us is compiled on the simplest plan, and fills but a very small space; the rhymes are divided into perfect, nearly perfect, and allowable; the work will be useful, as we said before, to many who have no thought of writing poetry, and its careful perusal would enlarge and improve the vocabulary of most men.

Yr Ynys Unyg; or, the Lonely Island. A Narrative for Young People. London: Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., Stationer's Hall Court; George Routledge and Co., Farringdon street. Newcastle-upon-Tyne: F. and W. Dodsworth. 1852.

It would puzzle the author of this singular narrative, we imagine, to inform us in what latitude the "Lonely Island" is to be found. The tale purports to be the history of a family group, consisting chiefly of ladies and children, who set forth in a well-victualled yacht in search of adventure on the ocean. They are driven by a storm to the island with the ugly name, where they are compelled to take up their abode, while the captain and crew, unloading the damaged yacht, proceed with her to a distant part to get her repaired. During the absence of the crew, the ladies and children lead a sort of Crusoe life in the desert island, where they run the risk of being devoured by a monster snake, who bolts their cow at a meal, but is fortunately killed before he has time to digest it. After the snake come a gang of pirates, who are kept at bay by the valour of the ladies and children. By and by the yacht returns in the hands of pirates who have captured her, bringing back the captain and gamekeeper (!) who contrive to rejoin the ladies. The family party is at length besieged in their refuge on the top of a high rock; but the pirates not being able to get at them, threaten to sweep the surface of the rock with the cannon of the yacht, lying some hundred feet below! However, just as they are all going to be blown to atoms by the cannon, a man-of-war's boat is heard rowing round the point, and the pirates are overpowered by British tars. A happy conclusion winds up the story. This volume is the joint production of an author who cannot write, of an artist who cannot draw, and of a printer who cannot print. The ladies talk slang, and are described as muttering "horrible imprecations" against their adversaries; they are vulgar in manners, and degraded in mind; at the same time they are described as pious and prayerful, and held up as religious examples to the young. The only respectable portion of the book is its binding, which is neat and substantial; all within the covers is rubbish of the first water.

How to make Money. By A Tradesman. How to invest Money. By Harriet Beecher Stowe. Birmingham: J. W. Showell, Temple-street. London: Arthur Hall and Co. 1852.

This little book, which should be in every man's waistcoat-pocket, contains the advice of a father to a son on the subject of money-getting. It briefly but effectually exposes the false morality of many of our commercial maxims, and lays bare the heartless oppression of which they are too often the sources. In this money-hunting age a manual that teaches the young to prefer a pure heart and a clear conscience to a full purse cannot be too widely circulated or too frequently read. The price of this neat little tract is next to nothing compared with the importance of the subject upon which it treats. Upon the story by Mrs. Stowe, "How to invest Money," we need say nothing: the authoress of "Uncle Tom" commands a numerous audience, and never fails to enlist their sympathies. A single envelope will contain this little treatise, which is not too long for a tradesman to read, however deeply engaged in business.

The Unseen Hand; or, Episodes in an Eventful Life. By the Rev. Stopford J. Ram, M.A, Incumbent of Warslow and Elkstone, Staffordshire. Bath: Binns and Goodwin. London: Whittaker and Co.; Hamilton and Co. Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd. Dublin; J. M'Glashan.

This is one of Binns and Goodwin's admirable typographic performances, and, as a specimen of printing, may challenge comparison with anything that ever issued from the press. The sight of it would rejoice the soul of old Hazard, if he could rise from his grave and look at it; he was the best English printer in his day, and he wrought his typographical marvels on the same premises now occupied by his worthy successors, the Messrs. B. and G.; but he never conceived the excellence to which the art could be brought by means of inventions unknown in his time. We are sorry that our praise of the "Unseen Hand" must stop here. As a religious romance, it is the merest milk-and-water twaddle that was ever perpetrated; while, as a work of literature, it is disgraceful to a man who has taken a degree at the university, and fills the position of a clergyman and a scholar. Seduced by the pretentious title, "Episodes in an Eventful Life," we sat down to its perusal, expecting both interest and instruction from its pages. Alas! all the events in this wonderful history may be summed up in a single paragraph. Here they are:—Henry Carlton, a rather soft and lackadaisical young man, loses his mother and inherits her property; he travels through Switzerland, and arrives at Venice, where he spends his evenings, being a dab at the oar, in rowing about in a gondola (!) on the Grand Canal. He comes home, and falls in love with Florence Moultrie, whose parents, seeing that he is not over-steady nor very rich, object to the match. He goes off in a tiff to college, where he smokes cigars and drinks "bishop," but does not otherwise distinguish himself. In the vacation he takes a trip to Ireland, and comes back no wiser than he went. Hearing that Florence is about to be married to a Mr. Sandford, he resolves to quit the country; and, dressing himself like a common sailor, takes a passage on board an American liner. The vessel sticks in the mud on leaving dock, and Henry goes ashore to pass an hour or two with a friend. His friend dissuades him from the voyage, and he returns to college, mends his manners, leaves off "bishop," boat-racing, and cigars, and, in reward of his virtue, marries the maiden of his choice, who had never forsaken him all the while, Mr. Sandford being nothing more than a blunder of Henry's sister's. But if there are no events, the want of them is compensated by abundance of preaching; all of it, we have no doubt, with a pious and charitable intention; but all of it, too, of the most tame, trite, and unintellectual character. The author denounces oratorios on the ground that people go to hear them from motives of amusement; but he leads his hero into a gin-shop for no other reason than that he may have the opportunity of describing the scene, which he does very stupidly, as the following extract will show.

> One half of the persons present were in a state of partial intoxication; a few were in the act of leaving the room, supporting themselves by means of tables and benches. There were individuals there of all ages—the old hoary-headed sinner, who appeared as if he must be within a week of death—the strong man of forty rushing into the arms of a premature termination of life—the young man of five-and-twenty, whose young wife and helpless babe were pining in desolate loneliness on the cold, fireless hearth. Nor was it men only who were to be observed in this miserable scene; there were females also, &c. &c.—pouring down glass after glass, &c.

A word or two on the above precious piece of rubbish. The Rev. Stopford Ram tells us in his preface that the events of this book are true, and that names only are changed; and he refers especially to the description of the gin-shop, on which he seems to pride himself, as being true also. Doubtless such scenes are but too frequent, and their demoralising effect can never be sufficiently exposed; but a man who professes to write the truth should be able at least to steer clear of the ridiculous and the impossible. Think of a man "rushing into the arms of a premature termination!" Is this the sort of imagery cultivated at college? or worthy of a Master of Arts? Then how did Mr. Ram know that the young man of five-and-twenty had a wife and child? And we want to know how they could be "pining in desolate loneliness on a cold, fireless hearth," seeing that it was in the middle of summer when the father was found in the gin-shop—Henry, who saw them there, having just dined off green peas? The reader will place what reliance he chooses on Mr. Ram's professions of truthfulness, which, however, we have no intention of impeaching. One word more and we have done. Henry's friend, a clergyman at Liverpool, takes him to the dying bed of an old man, whom they find cursing and swearing at the doctor for not being quick in attendance. The poor blaspheming wretch is transformed into a saint by the talismanic treatment of the clergyman in the course, as it would appear, of some twenty minutes, and dies that night in a "joyful hope," &c. This needs no comment: the tremendous mischief resulting from the publication of such awful delusions as these must be apparent to every thinking mind. Let Mr. Ram weigh well his responsibilities; whatever he may think of it, he is no conjuror, and his book will do little good to himself or any one else. In a humble parish, in some very uncultivated district, he may find a sphere of usefulness, but to the walks of literature he has no vocation.

Scotch County Courts. Twelve Articles reprinted from the Edinburgh Evening Courant. Edinburgh: Paton and Ritchie. 1852.

Sheriff Courts of Scotland. Remarks on the proposed Changes on the Constitution, Jurisdiction, and Procedure of these Courts. By an Advocate, not a Sheriff. Edinburgh and London: Blackwood and Sons. 1852.

These two pamphlets may perhaps be regarded as the exponents of public opinion divided just now on the question of the Sheriff Courts in Scotland. The first, setting forth the evils and abuses of the present system, insists upon the necessity of a sweeping measure of reform, and advocates the extension of the Sheriff's summary jurisdiction to all cases under £50, by which the abnormal expenses of litigation would be reduced to something within the bounds of reason and justice, and courts of law, no longer existing as mere mantraps, from the meshes of which it is impossible to escape without being fleeced, would be for the benefit of the public, and not wholly and solely for the advantage of the lawyers. The other pamphlet, by an Advocate, takes a conservative view of the question, admitting the necessity and desirableness of a certain amount of reform, especially as to lessening the delays and expenses of procedure, but dissents strongly from the extension of the jurisdiction in the manner proposed, alleging that all that is necessary are a few minor modifications in the constitution of the Sheriff-courts, the fundamental principles of which are excellent, and would be thus rendered admirably adapted to the due independent and satisfactory administration of justice. We have no pretensions to a right to interfere in this question. We know, however, that Englishmen have benefited largely by the late reform in the County-courts; and we could wish our friends around "Auld Reekie" to share in like advantages. That they may be enabled to judge as to the desirableness of a change by which most of them are likely to be affected some day or other, we recommend the perusal of these pamphlets, in which the question appears to be thoroughly handled in all its bearings.

The Highlanders; the Scottish Martyrs; and other Poems. By the Rev. James G. Small, Bervie. Third Edition. Edinburgh: Johnstone and Hunter. London: J. Nisbet and Co.; and R. Theobald. Glasgow: J. R. Macnair and Co. 1852.

The words, "third edition," upon the title-page of a volume of poems, are themselves a guarantee of more than ordinary merit. Mr. Small writes well, and versifies elegantly and correctly; and if he rarely rises to sublimity or emulates the bold flights of some of his country's bards, he never sinks to the level of mediocrity. His volume is a pleasing companion for a quiet hour; and the perusal of it will recall many a picturesque and agreeable scene to the recollection of the Highland tourist as well as to the student of Scottish history. We would advise the summer-traveller in Scotland to bring away the volume in his pocket, and to recur to it when he would re-awaken the most interesting associations of his journey.

Ireland, considered as a Field for Investment or Residence. By William Bullock Webster, Esq. Dublin: Hodges and Smith. 1852.

The author of this work having visited every county in Ireland except two, and thus had opportunities extending over some years of estimating both the capabilities of the soil and the character of the people, has come to the conclusion that Englishmen are labouring under a misapprehension as to these most important points. He seeks therefore to dispel their unfounded prejudices, and to lay before them a statement of the advantages that Ireland at the present moment offers to capitalists as a field for investment. We have private reasons for believing that Mr. Webster is right in his assertion that the vast amount of capital now seeking investment may be employed as securely and more profitably in Ireland at the present moment than in any part of Great Britain. The facts which he has industriously collected together in his book all go to prove the truth of his statement; but we can do no more here than refer the reader to his little work, which will amply repay the cost of purchase and the pains of perusal.

Facts and Observations on the Physical Education of Children, especially as regards the Prevention of Spinal and other Deformities. By Samuel Hare, Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons, &c. London: J. Churchill, 46, Princes-street, Leicester-square. 1852.

Mr. Hare's work on the prevention, causes, and treatment of curvatures of the spine is well known in the medical world, and has run through several editions. His contributions to that peculiar part of medical science to which he has devoted his energies have been highly spoken of by those who have better qualifications for judging of their merits than we can pretend to. He is known as a clear and intelligible writer and a successful practitioner; and his testimony on the subject of the personal deformities and personal sufferings which a preposterous fashion has inflicted upon the female sex will carry, perhaps, as much weight as that of any member of the faculty. It is for this reason that we look upon the little work before us as a valuable boon to parents, and all who have the care and custody of female children. It has been written and published by a practical man, with the view of preventing the very diseases which it has been the business of his life to alleviate and to cure. It is probable that among the hundreds or thousands of cases that have passed through his hands, only a very small per-centage indeed were such that a little timely care on the part of the parents or guardians of the patients might not have prevented; and it may be that this little volume owes its existence to the recognition of that fact. There are few parents who will read these pages without having their eyes opened to some blunder in their management of their offspring; and yet they will learn nothing that the plainest common-sense, with the trouble of a little reflection, might not have taught them. The truths here inculcated are such as no mother would think of questioning—the mischief is that few deem them of sufficient importance as to adopt them practically in rearing and educating their children.

When a man uniting in his own person the possession of good literary capabilities and first-rate talent as an artist sets forth on a travelling-expedition with the intention of perpetuating, both by pencil and pen, the scenes, the incidents, and the impressions of his journey, we are justified in expecting something more than an ordinary book as the result of his labours. It would seem that Mr. Bartlett, while engaged in the preparation of the present volume, had been fully aware that great things were expected of him. At any rate, he has done what very few men could do; he has surpassed himself on this occasion, and produced a series of pictures which, now that Turner is gone, none of our artists, with the exception, perhaps, of Pyne, could be found to equal. He has painted the atmosphere with a truth and delicacy which in some of these southern landscapes gives the eye a range of thirty or forty miles in the space of a few square inches; the exquisite feeling shown in the management of the distances is, in fact, worthy of the highest praise. In matters of architectural detail he is equally successful, as a single glance at the frontispiece, the interior of the Chapel Royal at Palermo, will show—that engraving presenting as near an approach to the effect of colour as it is perhaps possible to give in black and white alone. Again, the effect of time upon the crumbling columns of many a Grecian temple, which has stood the storms and wrecks of twenty centuries, is so happily rendered that one might almost swear to their date without recurring to their history. Mr. Bartlett has been fortunate in his engravers, who have entered into the spirit of the artist and done justice both to themselves and him. The literary portion of the work is in no way unworthy of the pictorial—in one sense even that is pictorial, for the author paints, and must paint, whether he handles the pencil or the pen. One or two of his pen-pictures we will transfer to our columns. The following is a description of the population of Naples:—

Our way lay along the sea-shore, through the noisiest quarter of Naples, and of what that is nothing but experience can convey an adequate idea. The noise of London is caused by the monotonous roar of thousands of vehicles incessantly rolling over the pavement; the sound of the human voice seems rarely heard. But here it is the very reverse. To hear for the first time the confused babble of innumerable voices which arises from Naples, you would suppose that it could be caused by nothing less than a general insurrection. The most ordinary transaction is accompanied by an infinity of passionate outcries, ludicrous superlatives, and almost frenzied gesticulation. The voice is pitched in a high shrill note, which the least excitement exalts into a downright scream, and the Neapolitan is thrown into a state of excitement even upon the most trivial cause. Where that is wanting I have heard them yell for the mere pleasure of exercising the lungs. Clamour, in short, is to this people a necessity of existence. In this climate, moreover, among the poorer classes, half the avocations of life are carried on almost or wholly in the street, where they work at their respective trades—cook, wash, eat, scold, fight, and perform almost all the suggestions of appetite and the functions of nature in the sight of every passenger. Such a burrow of filth as the lower part of Naples is hardly to be paralleled elsewhere; the fry of its population may be likened to the maggots with which a decayed cheese is all in a ferment—as nasty, as closely packed, as busy and as happy.

We must accompany the author and artist in his descent from Mount Vesuvius, after having a peep into the crater.

We had now to descend the mountain upon the side facing Pompeii, opposite to that by which we came up, and utterly unlike it, being, in fact, a long and steep inclined plane of deep, loose volcanic dust, without a single block of lava or impediment whatever; so that we might have rolled a ball nearly from the top to the bottom. By the guide's direction, we therefore adopted a suitable style of descent. Driving his heels into the sand, and leaning back to preserve his equilibrium, he darted forwards, or rather downwards, at railroad speed, disappearing amidst a cloud of dust, which seemed to roll after him down the side of the mountain. A moment's hesitation, and we dashed after him in like manner, and speedily found, that, once committed to the descent, it required the utmost exertion of the muscles, like those of an unhappy victim on the treadmill, or the traveller when the bottom of his chaise fell out and he had to run for his life, to keep on with unfaltering velocity and increasing momentum to the goal. A single pause or hitch in the flying descent, and we should have flung off at a tangent, heels over head, performing endless gyrations and summersaults, till abruptly pulled up by the first obstacle to our headlong career, with the breath beaten out of our bodies. Tremendous was the excitement of the race. Our coat-tails flew out behind; our hair streamed in the wind; our straw hats, threatening to take flight, were wildly grasped by one hand, while with the other we controlled our movements as with a rudder; our legs going like the strokes of a piston, and our lungs in a perfect roar of laughter; albeit, half suffocated with the dust of our own raising, we happily achieved the descent without a single trip or tumble, in a space of time which seemed quite ridiculous compared to that which it had taken us to climb up.

Mr. Bartlett falls in with some Germans.

Of all travelling companions, commend me (says he) to the Germans; there is about them a plainness and heartiness congenial to John Bull. And then the economy of the thing! only leave them to manage the expenses, to do battle with the innkeepers, and you will come off at least a third cheaper than in your own character of an Englishman. . . . One of these gentlemen was a savant from Berlin, a man of immense information, but of almost child-like simplicity of manner, and as full of animal spirits as a schoolboy broke loose for a holiday. . . . When the account was presented, it was his custom to pore over it long and intently; then, pointing to it with his finger, he slowly lifted up his eyes to those of the trembling waiter, with a solemn intensity of stare, as if to petrify the wretch who could dare to present so infamous and extortionate a demand. The battle then began in earnest, every item being disputed with the utmost fierceness and tenacity, the conflict ending in a considerable reduction; the innkeeper, knowing that if he charged the articles at less than prime cost he would have to take something off, having prudently put down more than he expected to get, although not more than he would have been perfectly contented to receive.

the summit of Mount Etna; we question if the pencil could have painted it better:—

> It was between three and four; the stars were rapidly disappearing from the paling sky, while the eastern horizon began to redden faintly with the dawn. Everything in the vast gulf below was dark and formless—the sea barely distinguishable from the land—vast, whitish clouds, like wool-sacks, floating solemnly above it. A few bars of crimson soon appeared in the eastern horizon, the sea-line became defined, the jagged edges of the distant mountains of Apulia cut against the sky. At this moment our guides shouted to us to stand upon the edge of the crater, and look out over the interior of the island, which stretched away to the westward like a sea of rugged summits, blended in the shadowy mists of dawn. Just as the sun rose, an immense shadow of the most exquisite purple was projected from the volcano half over the island, while without its range the light struck with magic suddenness upon the tops of the mountains below—a phenomenon so admirably beautiful that it would more than have repaid us for the labour of the ascent.

But we have trespassed upon our space, and must forbear any further extracts. The relation of the author's tour is preceded by an historical summary, by means of which the reader may renew, at a very small expense of labour, his knowledge on the subject of ancient and classical Sicily, and trace the principal events which have happened upon the island from the time of its first colonisation by the Athenians down to the massacres of the brutal and bloody Bomba. He may then, in the company of the lively and intelligent author and artist, visit every place worthy of note, and become intimately acquainted as well with the eminently picturesque aspect of the island, abounding in Grecian and Norman antiquities, as with the social and domestic life of its modern inhabitants. The volume is in all respects admirably got up, and fitted for what it is designed for—a really handsome present.

The Case of the Manchester Educationists. A Review of the Evidence taken before a Committee of the House of Commons, in relation to the state of Education in Manchester and Salford. By J. H. Hinton, M.A. London: Snow, Paternoster-row, Manchester: Fletcher and Tubbs.

Mr. Hinton has here made out a very strong case against the Manchester Local Bill, which, as our readers will remember, sought to establish a system of education designed ultimately to become national, which should be paid for out of local rates to be assessed, after the manner of the poor-rates, by the inhabitants themselves. It is asserted, and with some show of reason, that such a bill would entail Government control, create a religious endowment, and violate liberty of conscience both in the child and the rate-payer. Other objections are advanced against the measure, but these are enough, if fairly established, to justify its rejection. In fairness, however, it must not be forgotten that the portraiture here drawn of the Manchester Local Bill is limned by a strenuous advocate of the voluntary system; and that, with the same materials at his command, a writer with a different bias might, with equal candour, produce a very different picture. We have no wish to see the voluntary system—if system it can be called—supplanted, nor do we see how it can possibly be done. Benevolence is strong as death and will have its way, and proselytism is stronger, and both together constitute the bone and sinew of voluntaryism; we do not venture to state in what proportion these two elements exist together—those who wish to ascertain can easily make the experiment for themselves. But though not wishing to see voluntary efforts supplanted, we do object, and that strongly, to relying for education solely upon them. It appears to us unjust that private benevolence should be taxed with the expense and labour of attempting what it never can adequately perform, and further, that in performing what it does it is likely to work as much mischief in one direction as good in another. He must be blind to the existing state of education in this country who does not see that, leaving religious doctrinal dogmas out of the question, the principal result of the voluntary efforts is a very low and beggarly rate of instruction diffused among a very extensive class—the fact being, that tens of thousands of lads and young girls, who would have been well-educated had their parents been compelled to pay, as they could have paid, for a practically useful education, are sent to make their way in the world with nothing better than a miserable smattering of such mere elements of knowledge as voluntaryism affords—and thus the good effected by imparting a little instruction to those who would have had none, is counterbalanced by giving but a little to those who without eleemosynary assistance would have had more. Would it not work much better for the ignorant if the voluntaries would countenance a comprehensive plan for the diffusion of what is called "Secular" education alone, and limit their exertions to the supply of religious instruction at regular and stated seasons?

Religion and Education in relation to the People. By John Alfred Langford. London: John Chapman, 142, Strand. 1852.

Premising that we have no intention of endorsing the whole of this very eloquent writer's opinions on the subject of religion and education, we shall let him speak for himself to the extent of a few short paragraphs, which appear to us so perfectly apropos to the present state of the question, so admirably expressed, and based so irresistibly upon the spirit of truth and candour, that we cannot do better than reprint them for the benefit of our readers.

> Accepting for myself the historic and an ideal Christ, and having a firm faith in the power of His spirit and example to regenerate the world, I am a Christian; but it seems to me that it would be to deny my Master if I failed to see that it is not necessary to accept him after this fashion, or to believe in him according to this doctrine of divinity, to enable me or any man to lead a holy and a divine life. In this has been the great error of the Christian world; and until men see that religion consists, not in striving after an impossible unanimity of belief, but 'in doing the will of my Father who is in heaven,' the evils we deplore will remain, and the education of the people be retarded.
> My particular religious belief is an individual truth; that is, it is true to me; but if I were to make it an universal truth, and insist on its being taught to and accepted by all, I injure the higher and the absolute truth, and commit a wrong to society.

Men let the people grow up in ignorance and almost consequent sin, because they insist that questions on which they cannot agree, and never will agree, shall form a part of education.

For myself, I very much doubt the wisdom of teaching doctrinal religion to children at all. The young mind is incapable of seeing the minute metaphysical distinctions on which some of our theological differences rest; and to teach them as they are now taught, as simple and abstract truths, is an injustice which is sure to recoil on the teaching. Sectarianism has made it a sin to teach two sides of a question; and, as a child grows up, he learns that those things which he was taught to look upon as so many essential and infallible doctrines, have not only their opposite readings, but are even openly denied and disbelieved. What is the consequence? A distrust of all truth, and a repudiation of all inquiry...... The child thus taught either becomes a narrow-minded fanatic or a scoffing unbeliever. No man would lay before a child the many theories of life which science and philosophy have formed, and ask him to adopt this one and reject the others....... Would it not be wise to adopt this plan in religious culture? We should have more sincere religion if we did. Men would not be the stereotyped doubles of one another—the son the new edition of the father from generation to generation—as they are now, but large-minded, charitable, strong in their own faith, and respecters of the faith of others.

We need not comment upon these passages. The same manly feeling pervades the whole book, which demands the attention of all interested in the educational question.

A Four Months' Tour in the East. By J. R. Andrews, Esq. Dublin: J. M'Glashan. London: Orr and Co. 1853.

Mr. Andrews is quite an original traveller in his way. He wanders through Egypt, the Desert, Jerusalem, the shores of the Dead Sea, and the plains of Syria, in the spirit of an auctioneer's porter drawing up a catalogue. He omits nothing, but he sees everything with the eyes that are in his head, and through a plain matter-of-fact medium, uninfluenced by poetry or sentiment, religion or antiquity. He puts down all things in his journal at what they are worth at the present moment, and nothing more, and has no notion of valuing things by association which in themselves are worth little. With him the catacombs at Alexandria and Cleopatra's bath are "not worth the trouble of a visit"—the Pyramids are "not equal to expectation," and disappoint him to an extent which he had never felt before—the mosques are shabby, the island of Elephanta is a stupid place, and not worth the plague of getting to it, &c. &c. He warns his readers, if they wish to preserve their reverence for the Holy Land, not to set foot in Jerusalem, and denounces Palestine as a "mockery, a snare, and a delusion," declaring his conviction that the whole country "is one of great disappointment in every point of view." He is at Jerusalem during the annual concourse of pilgrims, whose religious fervour, however, he does not participate—and at the grotto of the Nativity, says he, "the attendant made a sign for me to kneel down and kiss the pavement, but I declined." In a word, he is not to be done into enthusiasm of any kind, but prefers his own opinion, and publishes it too, in spite of Lamartine and all his followers. There is something naïve in this mode of writing on the East; and Mr. Andrews's book may be admired as a sort of lusus naturæ, and quoted as an example to writers whose imagination carries them beyond the limits of veracity. The following extract is worth reading:—

Our Church Missionary Society has had a station in Cairo for several years, but they have never yet made a single convert from the Mahommedan faith. The reply of an enlightened Mahommedan (?) to a missionary is characteristic of the race of Moslems: "Your religion," said he, "gives me three Gods and one wife: mine gives me three wives and one God; I prefer my own."

Preciosa. A Tale. John Chapman, 142, Strand. 1852.

This very singular and deeply-interesting story is conceived and wrought out in a manner which has scarcely a precedent or parallel in the whole range of the romantic literature of this country. Whether the idea be an original one, or borrowed from something similar to be met with among the German romancists, is more than we can pretend to determine; but the details are managed with admirable skill, and the interest of the narrative, though it is altogether connected with one event, which never takes place, never slackens, but deepens and accumulates up to the very last page and paragraph, which consigns the unfortunate hero to the embrace of a grim fortitude as his last and only resource against a hopeless destiny. Preciosa is an exquisitely-drawn character, but one, we humbly conceive, whom a merciful Providence has never permitted to exist save in the capacious brain of a man of genius. She is at once more and less than woman, a ministering angel and a torturing fiend, the former from innate goodness, the latter from circumstance. Lovely, affectionate, accomplished and unselfish, she wants the one element of passion to make her human, and, wanting that, works the life-ruin of her best friend, who is doomed to wear out his days in the miserable proof that—

Nessun maggior dolore
Che ricordarsi del tempo felice
Nella miseria.

The plot of the tale is extremely simple, and might be comprised in a short paragraph, which we forbear to write because it would mar the effect of the careful perusal of the volume, which we warmly recommend to the reader.

Two Historical Dramas or Tragedies. By Juvenis. London: Saunders and Otley, Conduit-street. 1852.

There is no need of the word "Juvenis" on the title of this volume to inform us that it is the production of a very young writer. The fact is evident in every line; and it is further evident that he has made a tremendous mistake as to the extent and proper application of his powers. The drama requires an experience of human character in the writer as well as a knowledge of historic events. Who ever heard a cobler talk in this strain?

1st Cit. Solicitor, attorney, beggar, all the same to me, and but expedient terms, the which I occupy not one nor all—and can anyone, from cobler to crowned head, tell us what he means? Then we have Manlius and his wife talking in the following fashion:—

Man. My gentle lady, who did thus disturb
The sunshine of your peace?
Cor. There was no sun;
But all was dark within my kenn'd horizon.
Man. No sun! Your gentle spirit is the sun;
Illumining, as from a centre, all
The motions of your bodily disguise,
And fair emotions of your sensitive heart.
Cor. Thou art my sun; and lighting other worlds
Between us, wast to me an orb opaque.
Man. Two suns are needless, for one lights all heaven;
The second were redundant.
Cor. But being both
Of the same distance, temperature and use,
In unison are found but one vast radiation.
Man. So let us live without a ray dissentient—&c. &c.

Now we are ready to swear that out of the atmosphere of a lunatic asylum such rubbish was never spoken by man and wife, and never will be. We will give Juvenis a word of advice. Let him forswear pedantry, and not garnish his pages with learned notes which have nothing to do with the text. Let him forswear plagiarism too, nor, while he modestly disclaims an obligation to Juvenal for an idea which has not the most distant similarity with his own, suffer himself to be caught again clumsily paraphrasing a speech in Shakspeare's "Julius Cæsar" without acknowledgment. Lastly, let him get down as soon as possible from the tall stilts on which he now walks the earth with his head above the clouds, and look about him and see what the world are really doing, and take cognizance of that true ideal which is ever clinging round the skirts of fact, and, seizing all he can, lay up treasure for future use. He is not a blockhead, and may one day find work to do—and do it—if he will sweat himself in time of vain and flatulent conceits.

The Pársis; or, Modern Zerdusthians. A Sketch. By George Henry Briggs. Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd. London: Simpkin and Marshall. Bombay: Andrew Dunlop. 1852.

The Pársís, or Parsees, sometimes called the Fire-worshippers, are the scattered remnant of that mighty nation who, five hundred years before the Christian era, had spread their dominion from the Hellespont to the Indus. After flourishing for more than a thousand years, they fell beneath the Mohammedan sword at the decisive battle of Navahand, and the Persian monarchy was overthrown. Those who would not conform to the creed of Mahomet were driven forth as fugitives from their native country, and became in the course of centuries scattered among the various nations of the East, and through the islands of the Indian seas. They have preserved, however, their customs, their form of worship, and their distinguishing characteristics. What these are, and wherein they differ from those of other races, we have not space at present to set forth, but must refer the reader to Mr. Briggs' book, where he will find a pleasant and agreeably-written summary of all that is known with certainty respecting them, drawn up by one who from long personal intimacy with them has the best qualifications for the task he has undertaken.

Heart Discipline. By James Cooper; with a Preface by the Rev. J. A. James. London: Hamilton, Adams & Co. Norwich: J. Fletcher. 1852.

This is the work of a meditative Christian philosopher, who, having retired from a life of labour in the capacity of a minister of religion, has sat down in the evening of his days to the deliberate consideration of a subject the most important and comprehensive that a man can deal with. The discipline of the heart is the grand object of all Christian teaching; and as it is the first difficulty which the young Christian has to encounter, and the last which the oldest overcomes, it forms an appropriate theme for one the business of whose life it has been to encourage his fellows to persevere in the struggle and the strife without which the victory is not to be won. This legacy of Mr. Cooper to his congregation is well conceived and well written, and will form an excellent and useful addition to the family library.

The Dictionary of Domestic Medicine and Household Surgery. By Spencer Thompson, M.D., &c. Part XII. London: Groombridge and Sons. 1852.

We are glad to see that this excellent and most useful work is at length completed. It has been compiled with the utmost care and attention, and forms, to our thinking, by far the best and cheapest compendium of domestic teaching on medical and surgical subjects with which the public have yet been favoured. It is, further, well and clearly printed, and makes a handsome volume, which in case of emergency can be referred to without a moment's loss of time—the subjects being arranged in alphabetical order, with leading letters at the head of each column.

The Traveller's Library. Parts XXXIV and XXXV. Sir Edward Seaward's Narrative of his Shipwreck, &c. Abridged from the Third Edition. London: Longman and Co. 1852.

The principal scene of the marvellous adventures here recorded are some rocky islets lying in the Mozambique Gulf, and marked in the chart as the Saranha Cays. Sir Edward's narrative of his early life, his impromptu marriage, his voyage to the West Indies and his shipwreck on the rocky island, he and his wife being the sole survivors from the wreck, is given with remarkable simplicity and yet vigour, reminding us continually of Robinson Crusoe. The subsequent history of the shifts and contrivances of the solitary pair—the gradual approaches they make to ease and comfort—the discovery of an inexhaustible treasure of gold and silver coin in a cavern, supposed to be the hoard of pirates long since dead—the colonisation of the island by free settlers—the voyage home—the interview with Sir Robert Walpole—the knighting of the hero by the Queen—his return to Seaward Island—capture by the Spaniards —his release by the successful attack of Vernon upon Portobello—these are but a few of the events and incidents that impart a continuous interest to the story, which beguiles the reader and forbids him to lay down the book until he has fairly arrived at the close of the history. The manners and customs of fashionable life in London a century back, moreover, form a pleasant chapter or two, and vary the story in an agreeable way. These volumes merit and will be pretty sure to find a large circulation.

The Museum of Classical Antiquities. A Quarterly Journal of Ancient Art. Vol. II. Part II. London: T. Richards, Great Queen-street. 1852.

The present number of this work is one of rich and varied interest. The "Notes upon Obelisks," which forms the leading paper, and is from the pen of Mr. Samuel Birch, is a masterly and scholar-like essay upon a subject which comparatively few writers are competent to treat, and will well repay the careful study of the student of classical antiquities. Besides this, there are three other valuable papers, one on the theatre, Odeum, and other monuments of Acræ, in the south of Sicily, by J. Hogg, M.A.; the antiquities of Candia, by E. Falkener; and a translation of "La Descrizione dell' Isola di Candia," a manuscript of the sixteenth century. The illustrations are in the usual finished style.

A Cyclopædia of Poetical Quotations. Edited by H. G. Adams. Part V. London: Groombridge and Sons. Edinburgh: James Hogg. 1852.

This very useful work fully justifies the opinion we expressed concerning it in a former number. The poetical selections, classified and arranged in alphabetical order, are invariably such as a fine taste and correct judgment would sanction. The volume or volumes, when finished, bid fair to supply a desideratum which the readers of poetry must long have felt.

The Six Days. By Captain Charles Knox. London; Hatchard, Piccadilly. 1853.

The object of this neat little volume is to show the harmony of science with revelation. The late Mr. Sharon Turner, in the third volume of his "Sacred History of the World," briefly adopts the same line of argument which Mr. Knox has pursued to a satisfactory conclusion. The six days of the Genesis are six several periods of time, each indefinite in duration, and the operations of which are traceable to scientific investigation. The author has shown the perfect harmony existing between the details of the Mosaic narrative and the facts which the discoveries of modern science have established upon an impregnable basis. We have but one fault to find with this little work—and that is its brevity; one feels loth to dismiss a subject of such importance, and which the writer handles in so discriminating and suggestive a manner, without a more deliberate consideration of the various parts of the subject. Mr. Knox will do well to amplify largely in a second edition.

The Burial of Wellington. An Elegiac Tributary Poem. By N. Michell, Author of "Ruins of Many Lands," &c. London: Tegg, Cheapside. 1852.

It would be looked upon almost as invidious in us to pronounce a positive decision upon the merits of any one of the numerous poetical effusions which have been forwarded to us on the death of the great Duke; we prefer, therefore, to let Mr. Michell speak for himself in a couple of brief extracts, which will give a fair sample of his elegy.

> The arm that scattered England's foes
> Must rest in honoured long repose;
> No more unsheathed the sword shall be,
> Whose flash was hope and victory!
> The shield is shivered, bulwark broken,
> The last sage word of counsel spoken;
> Set is the sun of martial power,
> Stars now but gild our sombre hour.
> Death speaks to dust the mighty one,
> And conquers conquering Wellington.
> * * * * * *
> The dust may moulder cold in death,
> But from his memory shines a light,
> Changeless, enduring as the ray
> Some fixed star sheds through skies of night,
> While frailer meteors melt away;
> A light that through the spacious earth
> Shall still beam on, and dazzle men,
> Shall show how greatness wedded worth,
> And gild the page for History's pen—
> The light of glory and of fame,
> To flash for ever round his name.

The profits arising from the sale of Mr. Michell's poem will go towards the erection of a monument to the memory of the late Thomas Hood.

Lewchew and the Lewchewans; being a narrative of a visit to Lewchew, or Loo Choo, in October, 1850. By George Smith, D.D., Lord Bishop of Victoria, London: T. Hatchard, Piccadilly. 1853.

The island of Lewchew has long been regarded by our missionaries as the portal of Japan, and it has been thought by commencing the work of Christianising this far-away people among the Lewchewans, who are supposed to be descendants of a colony of Japanese, an ingress might eventually be found to Japan itself. With some such object in view, a Dr. Bettelheim and family were left upon the island in 1846, by way of commencing the business of evangelisation. The Doctor, however, soon became an object of suspicion to the natives, who shortly began to show that they had but one wish concerning him, and that was, to get rid of him as fast as possible. He proved an unmanageable subject, neither to be starved, bullied, nor frightened from his position. The Lewchewans, who seemed to regard him as a sort of ogre, finding they could not send him home to England, sent him to Coventry, and that so effectually, that he could not even get speech of the natives; and after residing four years and a half in a manner cut off from all communication with them, he is visited by the Bishop of Victoria, who, armed with an admonitory protest from Lord Palmerston to the authorities of Lewchew, comes to reconnoitre. The little work before us is the Bishop's narative of his visit, and it describes, in an agreeable and interesting way, many of the manners and customs of this simple people, and details the steps which, in conjunction with Captain Cracroft, who represented her Majesty on the occasion, he thought fit to take in order to establish Dr. Bettelheim on a more respectable and social footing. One cannot help being amused with the perplexity of these poor islanders, seated as they were between the horns of a very ugly dilemma—it being equally fatal to their prospects either to affront the Japanese, their protectors, by harbouring strangers, or to exasperate the British by sending the Doctor adrift. The Bishop, it appears, succeeded in the end in obtaining better terms for the forlorn missionary, and parted amicably with the Lewchewans after entertaining them hospitably on board the steamer—the first "fire-ship" they had ever seen—and which they devoutly prayed might be the last. The population of Loo Choo is divided into three classes: the highest are a species of oligarchical literati, consisting of several grades, from the chief of which the governors have their origin; the second class are the Hakoo-sho, nearly corresponding with our middle-classes; and the third are the Oo-bang, or public slaves, who possess neither civil rights nor personal freedom. They call their sovereign Tsung-li; but the good bishop appears to have a suspicion that said sovereign is a hoax altogether, a sort of regal Mrs. Harris whom it would be difficult to produce in propria persona. We had marked several extracts from this well-written narrative, but are compelled to omit them from want of space.

Thoughts on Man in his relations to God and to External Nature; with Minor Poems. London: William Pickering. 1852.

The principal poem in this volume is a devotional and didactic piece in six cantos of blank verse. It is a composition of very considerable merit, containing many passages of real poetry; the versification is fluent, varied, harmonious, and often grand, and is evidently the work of one well practised in the art. The minor poems are by no means so much to our taste; from the nature of the subjects chosen, or it may be from the predominant religious feelings of the author, they strike us as being somewhat common-place in sentiment, as well as inferior in execution, to the blank verse poem.

Love in the Moon, a Poem; with some Remarks on that Luminary. By Patrick Scott, author of "Lelio." London: Taylor, Walton, and Maberley. 1853.

Mr. Scott has a vivid and glowing imagination, a fluency of versification, fine descriptive powers, and a genial humour—of each and all of which the present poem affords sufficient evidence. The lovers in this lunar romance are Lunari and Argentine, whose lot is cast on that hemisphere of the moon which is never turned towards the earth, of whose existence they are consequently ignorant. Their several families, like the Shaksperian Capulets and Montagues, are at deadly feud together, and the prospects of the young couple are anything but flattering. Lunari, in his perplexity, has recourse to a celebrated wizard, who, in answer to his invocation, utters the following oracular prophecy:—

> Whene'er upon the open skies
> A living globe of fire, in size
> Than planet, star, or sun more vast,
> Shall still and motionless be seen,
> Then shall these ancient feuds be past,
> And thou shalt wed thy Argentine.

And he directs him to the summit of a certain high mountain as the only place whence he may hope to discover the celestial phenomenon. Lunari, with a great deal of difficulty, persuades the rival houses to accompany him in the search. They set out together at length, though with no great cordiality—for, in his secret heart,

> Each took a vow—'twas sure to bind—
> That if he failed this sign to find,
> He never would again be cross'd,
> But make up for the time he'd lost
> In this absurdly good endeavour,
> And hate his neighbour more than ever.

They form a singular travelling-caravan, and, from the peculiarity of their lunar constitutions, are compared to mesmerised beings among us—a comparison which gives the author occasion to suggest—

> How bright the era which would rise
> With true millennial smile
> On Britain, should Fate mesmerise
> The universal isle!
> How blest to find in life, that when
> One power were tired or dead,
> Its brother sense would kindly then
> Do duty in its stead!
> No poor-rates need we then advance
> To keep our paupers well—
> Fed cheaply with an easy glance,
> And drunken with a smell.
> None would be deaf when all might hear
> With open mouth in place of ear;
> While on the blind new light by dint
> Of this new power would shine;
> They'd sit upon the smallest print
> And read it with the spine!

The party accomplish their long journey safely under the guidance of the young lover, who leads them into a cavern on the mountain's top, and, by the utterance of a single talismanic word, throws open the rocky portal that bars their view of the sky beyond. In an instant, before their eyes—

> Like a Sun of mightier birth
> Glittered the majestic Earth.
> Around its orb the constellations passed
> Like subject worlds with reverential pace
> Treading the empyreal height,
> Where calm, and motionless, and vast
> It sat, like the Divinity of Space,
> Upon the throne of Night.

The unlooked-for vision banishes the "ancient hatreds" of the rival houses—their offspring, the happy lovers, are united in marriage, and a most glorious bridal-feast is held in honour of the occasion.

> And from that time to this, whene'er
> A marriage in the Moon takes place,
> Joined soul to soul, the grateful pair,
> To give the ritual of their race
> A more than ceremonial worth,
> Look up to Heaven and bless the Earth.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES.

Trafalgar Life Assurance Association.—From the Second Annual Report of this Society, made on the 30th of November last, we extract the following particulars:—The directors announce a very large increase to the income, the formation and consolidation of many very valuable agencies in various parts of the country, and the continually increasing confidence of the public in its principles and management. From a comparison of the first with the second year's business, it is shown that new premiums amounting to £6381 1s. 7d. have been added during the last twelve months to the former income of the Association, the total of which is now in this, the second year of its existence, £9473 17s. 4d., arising from 892 policies, assuring £292,646—a circumstance in itself so encouraging that the directors abstain from making any comment upon it. The directors were enabled at their last annual meeting to announce to the shareholders that the whole number of the shares—namely, twenty-five thousand, representing the entire capital of £250,000 (of which £237,500 remains untouched, but is at all times available for the purposes of the Association, should occasion require), had been subscribed for in the short period of seven months by a most extensive and influential proprietary; and the confidence entertained by the shareholders and public generally will be best understood from the fact, that the shares are not now to be obtained, except at a large premium. The number of policies lapsed by death is six, assuring, in the aggregate, three thousand three hundred pounds; which sum, being deducted from the premiums received, leaves a large balance in favour of the Association. The directors, with a view to place before the meeting the correct financial position of the Association, have had a balance-sheet prepared, showing the transactions from the 24th of June, 1851, to the 24th of June, 1852; and also a supplemental one, extending from the 25th of June, 1852, to the 30th of September last. Those statements which are given in the report will, the directors feel convinced, afford the greatest satisfaction to the shareholders, since they exhibit clearly the growing influence and sound financial position of the institution. The directors recommend a dividend, after the rate of five per cent. per annum, to be paid on the paid-up capital, and which they propose shall be made payable on and after the 15th of December next ensuing. The directors refer with peculiar satisfaction to the formation of the Unity Fire Insurance Association, the establishment of which has added vastly to the energies and efficiency of the several agencies, and by stimulating them into new channels of usefulness has necessarily enlarged the sphere of operations of the Trafalgar.

Medical, Invalid, and General Life Assurance Society.—The annual general meeting of this society was held at the chief office of the society, 25, Pall Mall, London, on Thursday, the 25th day of November, 1852, Benjamin Phillips, Esq., F.R.S., in the chair, when a report by the directors, showing the amount of business done during the last year, and the annual progress of the society, from its establishment to the 30th of September, 1852, was read. The following are the principal items of the report:—"Hitherto the directors have been able at each annual meeting to announce a considerable increase in the business transacted; but in the present year the increase is much larger in amount than on any previous occasion—a convincing proof of the estimation in which the society is held by the public. By a table exhibiting the amount of new business in each year since the establishment of the society it was shown, that during the past year the number of policies issued has been 778; the amount of assurances effected, £361,300 8s. 4d.; and yielding annual premiums to the extent of £15,480 17s. 10d. At the same time that the business has thus largely increased, the mortality has not exceeded the tabular expectation, and when it is borne in mind that the mortality of the last two years was so favourable, that is a result that could hardly have been expected. The directors are happy to state that the investments of the funds of the society during the year have been very favourably made; and are glad to be enabled to state that the invalid branch of the business continues to afford similar satisfactory results to those which have been formerly experienced. In accordance with the terms of the deed of settlement, the investigation into the society's affairs will be proceeded with on the 30th of June next, in order to determine the bonus which may then belong to the proprietors and policy-holders. The very rapid progress made by the society since the last division of profits, renders it probable that the participating policies will receive a large addition by way of bonus next year, and the directors would therefore beg to call the attention of the shareholders and the public to this circumstance, as every policy effected prior to the 30th of June, 1853, will be entitled to share in the profits which may be cleared up to that date.

MOLIÈRE.

CORNEILLE, Racine, and Voltaire, are great names in the dramatic literature of France, but Molière is greater than any of them, if popularity be taken as a test of their merits. The "Cid," "Athalie," and "Mérope," may be more praised, but "Le Tartuffe," and "Le Malade Imaginaire," we suspect are more read and better remembered. To what is this to be ascribed? Is it to any superiority of genius in the comic writer, or to the greater popularity of that department of the drama to which he devoted himself—or to both? Or has popular estimation placed Molière in a higher rank in the dramatic art than he is entitled to hold? We do not think that it has, but we attribute the preference rather to the more universal attractiveness of the comic muse, than to any superiority of genius on the part of the favourite, in comparison with the great tragic writers of the French stage.

As poetry of the very highest rank, tragedy will always be read with the utmost interest by the few capable of appreciating it, and even upon the stage the pomp and circumstance which usually attend it, will have great attractions for that more numerous class who delight in theatrical spectacles. But withal, if we are not greatly mistaken, comedy, generally speaking, is much more universally attractive than her buskined sister, and even in the closet, and certainly upon the stage, has more admirers, and these by no means of the least polished and enlightened classes. Dryden, in his Dedicatory Epistle, prefixed to the "Spanish Friar," observes: "The truth is, the audience are grown weary of continued melancholy scenes, and I dare venture to prophesy that few tragedies, except those in verse, shall succeed in this age, if they are not lightened with a course of mirth; for the feast is too dull and solemn without the fiddles." (Works, vol. vi. p. 380.) But we suspect that if the truth were always told, it would be found that the taste of Dryden's contemporaries is not singular, and that in all ages not even "a course of mirth," for relieving the melancholy scenes, has pleased so well as a course of mirth without melancholy at all. The solemn scenes of the Greek tragedy were invariably relieved by music and dancing. Yet, after all, it required an effort in the Athenians to affect, for any considerable length of time, the gravity and decorum requisite to comport with the lofty sadness of such plays as the "Electra," or the "Medea;" and we know that the performances were often interrupted by calls for the exhibitions of shows; we can scarcely imagine such a call to emanate from the amphitheatre of Broad Grins, that paid willing homage to the jests of Aristophanes. The Roman "Exodia" were farces, played by the youths after the regular players had left the stage, for the purpose, as we are told, of removing the painful impressions of tragedy. So it was in France during the reign of Louïs XIV., if we can believe Molière, who puts the following confession in the mouth of a great admirer of tragedy, and despiser of comedy, one of the Dramatis Personæ in "La Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes:" "Il y a une grande différence de toutes ces bagatelles à la beauté des pièces sérieuses. Cependant tout le monde donne là-dedans aujourd'hui; on ne court plus qu'à cela; et l'on voit une solitude effroyable aux grands ouvrages, lorsque des sottises ont tout Paris. Je vous avoue que le cœur m'en saigne quelquefois, et cela est honteux pour la France."

We do not think that the causes of this preference lie very deep. It is quite proverbial that we are more disposed to rejoice with them that rejoice, than to weep with them that weep; and it is not to be wondered at that we carry this predilection into our amusements. Certainly all the play-goers, and nearly all the readers of plays, look upon the drama merely as a source of entertainment; and it is nothing but a natural feeling that prompts us to seek entertainment in scenes of cheerfulness and mirth, although as a temporary relief from the cares and inquietudes of real life. He must be either more intellectual, or more morose than his neighbours, who relaxes himself more agreeably with the "sceptred pall," than with the

> "Quips, and cranks, and wanton wiles, > Nods, and becks, and wreathed smiles," of the more sportive muse.

The effect of scenical representation upon this preference is great; it is highly favourable to the enjoyment of comedy, but detracts from rather than enhances that of tragedy. There are not a few to whom the tinsel glitter of the kings and queens of the latter is an attraction, but it shares the admiration of these persons with exhibitions which have little relation to the drama, and on principles with which its intellectual character has no concern; whereas all the means and appliances of the stage fall short of producing such an impression upon the mind, as the unassisted imagination can do. It is true that the genius of a great actor can mightily enhance the enjoyment of one particular part, but he stands so much alone in his glory that the effect of the whole is often rather injured than improved by his transcendent acting. There is nothing more dangerous to poetry than to reduce it to a material form, for it is apt to lose the spirituality which constitutes much of its charm, and unless the genius of the poet is equalled by that of the artist, whose means, it is to be observed, are generally much more limited, the effect of the operation is to disappoint the mind, rather than to satisfy it. In comedy, on the other hand, poetry is not an essential element, and when it does occur there it is of a much less intellectual and lofty character, and consequently more easily materialized. The characters, and the scenic accompaniments, are all more within the sphere of ordinary observation, and therefore more easily reproduced upon the stage, where the conflict with the preconceptions of the imagination is less. A piece of fine poetry gains little, if anything, by being declaimed from the stage; but a joke, a witticism, or a repartee gains immensely when spoken with the usual accompaniments of the comic scene. It is evident, too, that many more actors are fitted for comedy than for tragedy, and we can therefore see a whole piece more perfectly represented in the former than in the latter.

Besides, if it be the object of the drama to hold the mirror up to nature, the one has advantages over the other, which render it a more perfect instrument of art. Tragedy,

> "High actions and high passions best describing," must explore recesses in the human heart equally remote from common occurrence and from common appreciation. It is very questionable whether there ever was a time when men existed whose actual thoughts, words, and actions, reproduced on the stage, would furnish materials for a proper tragedy. The Greek tragedians, next to Shakspere, by far the best writers of that species of dramatic composition, profess to give pictures of the heroic ages; but that these are not correct we know, for they are far below the verisimilitude of Homer, who painted more from the life, as they are far above the classical portraits of the French school, which have no pretensions of that kind. But it may well be doubted if even the graphic pictures of Homer convey a very correct idea of the times and characters which he describes. Can the same be said of Aristophanes, or of Molière? Of the latter more anon, but that the former painted the latter to the life is well known. Plato, a great admirer of comedy and of Aristophanes, sent the plays of the latter to Dionysius of Syracuse, as the best pictures that could be given of his countrymen. To what tragedian was such a compliment ever paid? We do not treat even Shakspere's Historical Plays as faithful portraits of our Tudors and Plantagenets.

Tragedy owes much of its material inefficiency, as an instrument of scenical art, to its being necessarily imaginative, and to a great extent abstract—qualities which add much to its intellectual grandeur, but which cannot be adequately represented on the stage. A mighty genius indeed, such as Shakspere, may imagine such a conception as will command our sympathies, in spite of its abstraction, and embody the highest poetry in palpable forms; but to do so is the greatest achievement of the poetic art, and can be accomplished only by the utmost genius and skill. And after all, to take two characters the most dissimilar in intellectual conception, with whom do we most cordially and freely sympathise—with Hamlet, or with George Dandin? For our parts we say with the latter. The simple peasant is one, or at least one of a class with whom we have long been on terms of intimacy, and we enter at once into his feelings, though we laugh at his simplicity when he is duped by his lady spouse. But the Danish prince is a gentleman whose acquaintance we have never had an opportunity of making, although we have frequently heard him well spoken of; and however much we are disposed to condole with him on his misfortunes, we have some difficulty in treating them exactly as he does; and yet the one is the noblest creation of Shakspere, and the other is among the meanest of Molière. Abstractions are not altogether unknown to comedy, but they are always dangerous. It was into this error that the new comedy of Greece fell, when the vigour and raciness of the old school was repressed. So long as the comic writers were permitted to paint men as they lived, moved, and had their being around them, their art flourished; but when that liberty was denied to them, and they were obliged to have recourse to characters and plots of history, and of their own invention, it declined. If Molière had followed in the track of Corneille, and attempted—we will not say classical comedies—but imitations of Aristophanes or Menander, or had shut his eyes to what was going on around him, and given us ideal pictures of the ridiculous, instead of graphic pictures of the men and women of the court of Louis XIV., and the Parisian bourgeoisie, we will venture to say that his name would not have stood so high in dramatic literature as it has always done. But he had too much good sense and too correct a knowledge of his art, to fall into this error. Nothing can better exemplify both than the following exquisite observations on the two departments of the art, which occur in the piece from which we have already quoted, "La Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes," a play abounding in sound criticism and sensible remarks on the drama: "Lorsque vous peignez des héros, vous faites ce que vous voulez; ce sont des portraits à plaisir, où l'on ne cherche point de ressemblance, et vous n'avez qu'à suivre les traits d'une imagination qui se donne l'essor, et qui souvent laisse les vrais pour attraper le merveilleux. Mais, lorsque vous peignez les hommes, il faut peindre d'après nature; on veut que ces portraits ressemblent; et vous n'avez rien fait, si vous n'y faites reconnoître les gens de votre siècle. En un mot, dans les pièces sérieuses, il suffit pour n'être point blâmé, de dire des choses qui soient de bon sens et bien écrites; mais ce n'est pas assez dans les autres: il y faut plaisanter; et c'est une étrange entreprise que celle de faire rire les honnêtes gens."

The conclusion we draw from these observations is, that comedy is essentially more dramatic than tragedy, although the latter is more intellectual and poetic. The former will please more on the stage, and the latter in the closet. The former will be more popular among the mass, the latter will be more appreciated by the few. But a great tragedy will be appreciated rather as a poem than as a play, and will gain comparatively little by the best acting, scarcely at all by the best scenical appliances; while a good comedy will both read well and play well, and its enjoyment will be mightily enhanced by the arts of the theatre.

Hitherto we have been speaking of tragedy and comedy, strictly so called; but to prevent misconception, we must add a few words on that mixed species of dramatic composition, of which Shakspere is the great master. We have seen that melancholy alone will not please upon the stage, and the reason is, that continued scenes of sadness are neither pleasing nor natural. Whatever excuse may be found for the immortal sorrow of the Greek tragedy in its devotional origin and purpose, certain it is, that the drama, to be effective, must above all things be natural; it must do neither more nor less than hold the mirror up to nature, and it is in the skilful reproduction of natural scenes that its art consists. Most dramatists, and especially the French, with the regular Greek models, and the Aristotelian rules in their view, have set themselves to compose works which strictly belong to one or other of the two great classes of dramatic composition, but that excludes from the picture a considerable part of the original; it is studying Aristotle more than nature, for the scenes of real life are not either wholly grave or wholly gay. In comedy, indeed, the grave, or at least the sad, may safely be excluded. Happily, little of what is purely melancholy, and at the same time fitted for dramatic representation, occurs in real life, chequered as it is, and the continued mirth is too pleasing to induce us to regret its absence. Occasional scenes of tragic interest, however, are not altogether inconsistent with the character of comedy. In one of Molière's pieces, and not one of his worst, "Le Festin de Pierre," the hero Don Juan, after running the round of all those villanies which are associated with his name, is carried off the stage after a fashion uniting those of the exits of Dr. Faust and Manfred. This play is called "Comédie en cinq actes," and it is essentially a comedy. But in tragedy both requisites of the drama not only admit but call for the union of melancholy and gaiety. The one without the other is not natural, and although it were so it is not pleasing. Shakspere knew this, for no one had a more correct idea of the principles of his art. He was besides, above all others, the poet—the grammarian of nature, as the ancient quoted by Suidas prophetically expresses it—dipping his pen in the human heart. He conceived a character, or invented a plot, and developed it through varied scenes, without regarding whether the result was a tragedy or a comedy,—he thought only of presenting a picture of human life. His plays, in short, are less tragedies or comedies, than sections of that mirror which in his own breast reflected with infinite truth, and, therefore, with infinite variety, the scenes and characters of actual life. Our polite neighbours the French call, or rather used to call, this bizarre, and so it is,—and eminently so is human nature.

To return to comedy, the very characteristics which render it more efficient and complete as an instrument of art, seem to tend to limit the sphere of its production. It is rather a remarkable fact in the history of the drama, that there have been many more great writers of tragedy than of comedy, notwithstanding the higher intellectual character of the former. In Greece, there were three to one; for we suspect that the prægrandis senex of the school was the only comedian entitled to rank with the great tragic writers. In France there has been the same proportion. The classic age of Italian poetry did not afford a single comic dramatist, though no people have a keener perception of the ludicrous and the grotesque than the Italians. We do not attribute much importance to such facts, because speculations upon the causes of the progress of art are apt to be chimerical and generally are unprofitable. It is obvious, however, that comedy, which should must be much limited to the age and country, the manners of which it professes to depict, and that unless these are adapted to comic delineation, the art must languish for want of matériel. The perfection of comedy does not consist in the mere reproduction of the scenes of common life, whatever may be its character. These must have something comic in themselves, and the art of the dramatist is shewn in his selection of the ludicrous traits so as to develop with greatest effect a character or a plot. It has often been asserted that the proper end of comedy is to expose vice and folly by means of ridicule. But we conceive that its primary end is to excite mirth, and the exposure of vice and folly is often well calculated to do so, though that is rather a secondary end, (however, morally speaking, it may be the highest,) and many admirable comedies have been written with no such object, or without having any such effect. Besides, such a definition of the object of comedy confounds it with satire, from which it essentially differs.

Comedy may be, and often is the vehicle of the most exquisite satire, but it is not necessarily so. It has a distinctive character of its own, of which the ridiculous is the essence; but virtue may be rendered ridiculous as well as vice and folly. The satire of Aristophanes directed against Socrates, was not legitimate because it wanted a legitimate object; it was, in fact, founded on a misapprehension, which when dissipated disarmed the satire. But the ridicule was genuine, because it put the sage in a view so laughable when contrasted with his character, real or assumed, (for it matters not which,) that our mirth is excited whether we believe in the justness of the satire or not.

The ridiculous—the matériel of comedy—has existed more or less in all ages, and always will exist, so long as human nature remains the same. Boccaccio found it in an age of the darkest superstition, and chiefly among its ministers and devotees. Butler traced it even in the acrimonious contentions of civil war. There must, however, be times and circumstances more favourable than others to its production, and it may well be doubted if they would have produced so laughable comedies, had Aristophanes been a contemporary of Cadmus, or Molière written under the stern tyranny of the League. In our own country, comedy has at no period flourished more than in the merry times of the Restoration, when a reaction took place in the national mind, from the severe discipline of republicanism and its sister puritanism. Probably, as a general rule, though liable to many exceptions, it may be said, that the most favourable circumstances for comic delineation are when nature has been softened from barbarism into civilization,—where that civilization has not degenerated from the follies of luxury and fashion into unpalliated crime—where the manners of the age and political institutions give full scope to the complete development of natural character—and especially where a keen sense of the ridiculous, and a turn for humour are national characteristics, and make each individual to some extent, as Falstaff describes himself, not only witty themselves, but the cause of wit in other men. The age and country of Aristophanes had some of these characteristics in an eminent degree. Let us examine how far Molière lived under similar propitious circumstances.

Born in 1622, his youth was contemporaneous with the administrations of Cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin, the despotic tyranny of which would have been little calculated to relax the severity of character which the French people had acquired in the preceding age, under the terrors of the League, had its effect not been in some measure counteracted by the peculiar character of the opposition. The minority of Louis XIV. was agitated by a struggle for power between contending parties, who mixed with their ambition much of the levity supposed to be characteristic of their country. The gratification of personal vanity, more than the passion for power, influenced the leaders, who changed sides with their mistresses, and not unfrequently, at their dictation. The queen-mother was lampooned while her minister was outlawed, and battles were fought to gain the favour of the libertine Duchesse de Longueville. A body of lawyers aping the English Parliament, to which their only resemblance lay in their common name, raised the standard of revolt, and while a cardinal headed the party of the court, an archbishop fomented the jealousies of the opposition. The people, following the frivolity of their leaders, alternately adored them as their deliverers, and lighted bonfires on their disgrace.

This state of things was in some measure put an end to when Louis assumed the reins of government in 1654. Foreign conquests succeeded civil dissensions, and a gay but libertine court set the example of polished manners, and diffused refinement along with licentiousness. At this period, the people of France were divided into three classes, the distinctions of which were prominent and well marked: the aristocracy, whose focus was the Court; the tradesmen and craftsmen, who inhabited the towns; and the peasantry. The last class vegetated in a state of simplicity and ignorance, which gave little scope for the development of individual character, though probably the trempe of the mass did not want archness and vivacity. Their manners, however, were gross as well as simple. The men spent much of their time in the cabarets, while their wives were alternately kissed and beaten. It is very questionable whether female virtue was better preserved among this class than in the higher ranks; probably it was less so: and certainly it was better preserved among the middle class. But conjugal infidelity was in all ranks reckoned more a foible than a crime, and a good beating of his frail spouse, at once restored the peasant's temper, and vindicated his honour. The bourgeoisie were a plain and well-conditioned class, retaining much of their ancient simplicity of manners, with as little of the licentious refinement of those above them, as of the grossness of those below. Devoted to their boutiques, they were easy in their circumstances, and many of them ultimately obtained such a competency as enabled them to retire from trade and live in independence. Occasionally, one of these, forgetting his position, would affect the gentleman, like Monsieur Jourdain, who was no ideal portrait, but drawn from life. The original was a hat manufacturer of the name of Gaudoin, who lavished a large fortune, left him by his father, on needy people of fashion, who, like Dorante and Dorimène, made him their dupe. Ultimately he was confined at Charenton as a madman. Little removed from the condition of shopkeepers were the professional men, whom real ignorance and an affectation of deep learning rendered eminently ridiculous. The professors of medicine affected much gravity, wore a robe when they went abroad, and generally rode through the streets on mules. They delighted in specifics, and a multiplicity of medicines, talked in bad Latin and scholastic terms; and as each had a theory of his own to support, their vanity and dogmatism rendered their consultations rather distracting to their patients, the nature of whose diseases, far less their remedies, they could not agree upon. The result of the famous consultation on Cardinal Mazarin is well known. The four most eminent physicians of the day were called in, when after much dispute each adhered to his own opinion, one maintaining that the seat of the disease was the liver, another the lungs, a third the spleen, and a fourth the mesentery. It is not improbable that Molière had personal wrongs to avenge in ridiculing the physicians, for his habitual bad health must have given him much unfavourable experience of them. The lawyers were probably little less ridiculous, though we know not so much of them, Molière having scarcely touched upon that class. He introduces the avocats only once, viz., in the "Malade Imaginaire," and it is to pay them a compliment. It is in the same piece that he gives a rôle of some importance to a notary, though according to the prescriptive usage of the stage that functionary is seldom absent when a marriage is in hand, but only pour dresser le contrat. The lawyers however did not escape the lash. During Molière's lifetime they were severely handled by Racine in the "Plaideurs." Their pleadings savoured much of the ignorance and scholasticism of the age. Deficient both in dignity and solidity, they displayed an indigested erudition, citing promiscuously the Bible, the fathers of the church, the Roman and canon laws, and occasionally the classics. The university of Paris, which in 1624 had obtained an arrêt, prohibiting on pain of death the publication of any work impugning the authority of Aristotle, could not fail to supply much of the ridiculous. There were scholars of that time who, armed at all points with syllogisms, professed to dispute de omni scibili, maintaining their positions with a fury quite proportionate to their pretensions. One of them, the original of the philosopher in the Bourgeois Gentilhomme, who delivered a course of lectures on eloquence and philosophy, in a room in Paris which he called "L'académie des philosophes orateurs," and himself the "moderateur" thereof. When these pedants fell in love the picture was complete. One of Racine's lawyers proposes to take his mistress to see the torture inflicted, — "donner la question,"— and Molière makes Thomas Diaforus desirous to treat Angelique with a sight of the dissection of a woman! These pictures were not overcharged. Of Molière's literary contemporaries, he has left us too exquisite a sketch to be omitted. In the play from which we have already more than once quoted, "La Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes," Dorante, the sensible critic of the piece, thus describes them: "La cour a quelques ridicules, j'en demeure d'accord; et je suis, comme on voit, le premier à les fronder; mais, ma foi, il y en a un grand nombre parmis les beaux esprits de profession; et, si l'on joue quelques marquis, je trouve qu'il y a bien plus de quoi jouer les auteurs, et que ce seroit une chose plaisante à mettre sur le théâtre, que leurs grimaces savantes, et leurs raffinemens ridicules, leur vicieuse coutume d'assassiner les gens de leurs ouvrages, leur friandise de louanges, leurs ménagements de pensées, leur trafic de réputation, et leur ligues offensives et défensives, aussi bien que leurs guerres d'esprits, et leurs combats de prose et de vers."

CHAPTER XXXII.

SOME OLD FRIENDS.

People with large families seldom think (the reason is that they have not time to do so)—if they did, one of their uppermost thoughts, morning, noon, and night, would be how to dispose of their progeny. A scion of oligarchy never has much trouble in this way—the oldest gets the coronet, as a matter of course; number two enters the army; number three, the navy; number four, the church; number five, the civil service; number six, the bar; number seven—what for him? When a nobleman has seven sons, even in a corrupt country like our own, he is, for a time, puzzled what to do with the last; and so we do not venture to predict the fate of Septimus. The writers of fiction are sometimes troubled after a similar fashion, as to the disposal of their literary offspring; painters may crowd their canvas with ever so many figures, they are there from first to last, and cause no trouble; musicians may introduce whatever notes they list at the commencement of a symphony, without coming under any obligations to reproduce these original sounds, attenuated or deepened, at the conclusion of the piece; but the miserable romancist must give an account of every character that happens to figure on his insignificant stage. He is like a boatswain to whom a score of tars is delivered over for a shore excursion, the whole complement must be searched for in lane and alley, the roll called on the surf-beaten sand, and every man and mother's son duly re-delivered on board the gallant bark that rolls at anchor in the offing. We do not approve of the custom—there be some characters who figure in our pages, of whom, and of whose ultimate destiny, the less that could be said, so much the better—but custom is inflexible, and how much soever against any canon of our own institution, we must comply with it, and afford some insight into the after career of certain worthies, regarding whom recent chapters have been silent.

There is a personage descending the High-street of Edinburgh, on an autumnal afternoon, who has the air of an old acquaintance, and yet his costume belies the suspicion. He is whiskerless, but has a large grey moustache, with hair to match; green spectacles prevent his eyes from being seen, while a large cloak conceals exact details of outline. We must have seen that man before, and, to satisfy curiosity, although the indulgence of the virtue may not imply over-much politeness, we shall make bold to follow him. He passes downwards, and is beyond the Tron Church —down still—pshaw! Some old military man going to visit a brother officer in St. John's or New-street (aristocratic in those days). No—he passes both openings! Then he is a stranger, bound for Holyrood; let us return and think no more of him. Nay, not so fast—see, he slackens pace, he is examining doors, and will earth immediately. He enters Theodore Reid's shop! That settles the point—he must not now be lost sight of.

The unknown finds Theodore at his little desk.

"I understand, sir," says he, in a hoarse voice, "that you keep some very nice, fine, old cheese. I am a connoisseur in the article, and grudge no price. Just let me go down into your cellar, will you, that I may taste some of your rarest."

"A gormandizing Englisher," thought Theodore; "but they aye pay." And, so saying, the merchant shut his bank pass-book, which he was in the act of summing, and, locking it in his desk, prepared to attend the fastidious destroyer of maggots. "Oor cellar is no very weel rid up," said Theodore, as he conducted his customer to the trap-door already known to the reader, "and tak' care o' yer claes, as ye come down the stair."

"No apology," replied the stranger, "the stair is better than the one leading down to the state-cabin of the last seventy-four that I commanded."

Theodore bowed obeisance at this remark, which implied a naval hero, and peradventure an admiral. The unknown having accomplished the descent in safety, he looked briskly round the premises, which were still faintly illuminated by the sun, and making a sudden spring, he seated himself on the top of a puncheon cask, with an agility of which his aged appearance gave no indication; and ere Theodore had time to recover from his surprise at this gymnastic feat, the naval hero had seized a bottle of Theodore's best port, and striking off the neck by a blow on the edge of the cask, he applied the stump to his lips with a deliberation that evinced a predisposition on the part of the operator to discuss the greater portion of the entire contents.

Theodore stared in dumb astonishment.

"Rather sour and harsh," remarked the intruder; "but the truth is, you Scotch do not know how to keep wine; there is no liquor to be had in this cursed country except whiskey, and it aint gentlemanly. However, what can't be helped, needn't be lamented;—come, hand me some of your fromage, old feller! Bedad, if I think you know me!"

"Know you, sir!" roared Theodore, quivering with indignation, as he discovered that the Colonel was the fictitious maritime hero. "I know you too well. What in the name o' the auld fiend himsel' has brought you here?"

"Don't use strong language," replied Mr. Flint, "it hurts my feelings."

"What do you want with me, sir?"

"Patience, my dear sir, patience."

"I will have no patience, wi' the like o' you—in one word, what do you want?"

The Colonel motioned to the trap-door, and Theodore went and secured it, and having performed this service, he leaned against a cask, sullenly waiting till his unwelcome visitor should condescend to unburden the object of his mission. Mr. Flint did not appear to notice Reid's impatience, and taking up the now half-empty bottle, he amused himself by tossing it in the air—a pastime which only incensed the trafficker the more.

"Leave off this fooling and tell me what you want with me," growled Theodore, advancing hastily, as if with the intention of doing bodily harm to the Colonel. That worthy was, however, too nimble, and he adroitly eluded his grasp.

"Don't put me in a passion, sir," vociferated Theodore; "it is not often that I get into a rage, but if you do rouse me, ye'll repent it. I have not forgotten the trick that ye played me last time ye were here wi' Copley."

"Ah! do not mention that name!" cried Flint, pathetically, "it recalls associations that at this precise moment are peculiarly unpleasant."

"Is he hanged?"

"No, not exactly."

"He deserves it," replied Reid, sarcastically, "and so do you."

"We shall not speculate as to deserts, as Portia says, in that passage with which you are no doubt familiar, it would be 'up' with the whole of us if we got them; even you, my sweet sir, pure and spotless as you are, like a lily hanging on a delicate stem, even you, if viewed through a microscope, might not present an aspect wholly faultless."

"Man! you'll drive me mad—say in one word, what do you want?"

"Well, since you insist on knowing the cause, I shall tell you; but allow me to remark how much a counter blunts one's sensibilities. We gentlemen are never in the habit of opening business abruptly, we prefer a little of what the French call badinage, in order to fill up with curves those angular vacancies which grosser natures leave absurdly open."

"What do you want? if you don't be quick I'll go up stairs."

"Pray do; I shall in that case finish my wine all the more comfortably."

Theodore's dark visage became livid with passion at the continued trifling of his visitor, and, approaching him in a menacing attitude, he addressed him for the last time.

"Harkye, sir! I'm in no humour for your nonsense. I never liked you in all my life, and never less so than at this moment. Say at once what you want, or I'll soon end the matter. You know that there is a door leads into the passage; I'm rather auld, but I think I have pith enough to take you by the neck and toss you out at that door, if I find it necessary. Do you understand me?"

During this address, Theodore had slowly approached the Colonel, and suddenly seizing him by the collar, he shook the officer with such force and freedom that the latter was quite satisfied as to the ability of Reid to carry the proposed threat into execution. The Colonel, therefore, prudently dropped further levity, and, so far as it was possible for one of his character to speak without circumlocution, he delivered his message in a form comparatively plain and straightforward.

"Now, then, Mr. Reid, that we understand each other," resumed the champion, "you will please to observe that the present juncture is peculiarly unpropitious for me, and that desirous of a change of air and scene, I wish to go abroad. There is Copley, he is to be tried before the Old Bailey, where it may run hard with him—he will get the best certificates, as to character, from his present employer, but it is questionable how far they may avail him. Copley had not what I may call an artistic mind, but still I shall miss his society—it will cause a decided blank, such as I felt when my friend General Pigeon was killed in his duel with Major What-d'ye-callum of Thingummy."

"Well, sir, and what hiv I to do wi' your going abroad?"

"Nothing except that I expect you to furnish the means."

"Means! me furnish you! I'll see you—."

"Nay, my dear sir, keep your temper. Abroad I must go, and furnish me with the means you must and shall."

"Must and shall," growled Theodore, ironically, "we'll see."

"Of course we will. There is a young man to be executed here to-morrow morning. It was I who caused his apprehension. That makes you start. I set the Bow-street officers on this young man in London; I then thought he had knowingly cheated me, but Copley satisfied me that he had not. I afterwards set the Edinburgh authorities on his track."

"Why did you do that if he was innocent?"

"To save myself," replied the Colonel, coolly. "Now if I had the power to bring him to the scaffold reluctantly, I certainly have it within my means, if I am so determined, to pay you a similar compliment, Master Reid. So take your chance, the small trifle in money, or—the gibbet. I observe you are not looking pleasant, but pray do not meditate any violence. I have the implements of self-defence, and I would rather do business with you agreeably than otherwise."

"I'm not to be frightened," said Reid, doggedly.

"I have no wish to frighten you—but just consider exactly what your position is. I have only to go to your mayor here, and secure to myself a free pardon, and the reward offered for the apprehension of those connected with the issue of—."

"Wheesht, sir—ther's no use in speaking the name o' things that we ken about. But hear you this, oor Scotch law needs twa witnesses—do ye think that oor koorts wud tak the evidence o' a habit and repute blackguard like yoursel' against a man like me, that has never been kent to brak the law in the smallest jot or tittle? Flint, yo've mista'en your man."

"Not so fast, my excellent friend," replied the adroit Colonel; "there is a certain old lady residing in your city, who has had transactions with you as well as Mr. Copley, and for the sake of confirming any statement that may procure for her the elegant gratification of seeing you die with your shoes on, I have no doubt—indeed I have positively ascertained—that she is prepared and willing to aid me in carrying out my little plot."

"The cursed auld limmer, I thocht she had been killed by the mob the ither week."

"Some persons have the tenacity of cats, and my venerable and amiable friend belongs to that species; but even supposing that the old lady had met with the fate that you gallantly hint at, she has a son, an interesting invalid, who would have been equally prepared to supply the place of his excellent relative, in the small negotiation that I have in my eye. Now as time presses, may I beg that you will favour me with an answer to my proposal?"

"How much do ye want?" inquired Theodore, musing.

"Well, having every disposition to be lenient, I have fixed the amount at a mere trifle, say five hundred pounds."

"Five hundred devils!" exclaimed Theodore, swelling with indignation. "If ye had said a five or even a ten pound note, I wadna hae minded that, jist for the sake o' getting quit o' you—but five hunder—pooh! the man's in a creel."

"I do not exactly comprehend your last observation, Mr. Reid, but if you do not think me in earnest, you are very much mistaken, never, indeed, I take it, more thoroughly mistaken in all your life. I shall call at your shop to-morrow forenoon, at twelve to a minute, and if you have not the sum mentioned ready for me in Bank of England notes or gold, just take your chance of a few fathoms of rope—that's all. I can joke with my friends, and have joked a good deal in my time, but at present I am in no joking mood. Good afternoon, Master Reid."

And so saying the Colonel proceeded to the trapstair, and having withdrawn the bolt of the hatch-door he disappeared and left Theodore to his own meditations. The merchant took no heed of the departure of his visitor, but continued long and sullenly to lean against a post of his cellar, wrapt apparently in deep thought at the consideration of the alternative placed before him by his associate in crime. The shadows lengthened on the damp and greasy walls of the cellar, and finally the sun disappeared behind the tall houses of the Canongate, and was seen no more, but Theodore stood in his old position, still absorbed in reverie.

"Maister! what about the herrin' for Stettin?" screamed one of Theodore's lean assistants, from the top of the rickety trap-stair.

At the familiar call of business Reid instantly became himself again, and he at once proceeded to the shop to answer the interrogatory of the lad.

"Whaun does the brig sail?"

"At twal the morn's nicht."

"Weel," replied Theodore, "if ye get the casks sent down to Leith wi the carts the nicht, ye may gang and see that ne'er-do-weel hanged i' the mornin'—but mind it's only a privelege, and unless the things are down ye canna gang—it would be a pity for your ain sakes that ye should lose the sicht, it's a grand example to thochtless young fellows."

The fellows bestirred themselves, not so much we must do them the justice of saying, on account of the motive held out by their master, as for the prospect of a partial holiday, a luxury to which they were rarely accustomed. They accordingly bustled about, and did gallant service among the barrels in the cellar—while Theodore took his station at his little desk near the door, ostensibly for the purpose of examining the herring invoices, but in reality he stood at that little desk with his thoughts far otherwise employed. He compressed his lips, knitted his brows, and otherwise looked so sternly reflective, that if like Mrs. Siddons when studying Lady Macbeth, he had seen his own features in a mirror, he very likely would have been startled at the representation. Theodore was, however, too earnestly engrossed with his own reflections to take heed of changes in physiognomical expression, and so he thought on.

"She sails the morn at twal at nicht," he said aloud to himself, and then he sunk into his former reverie, and there we shall leave him, in order to take note of the further proceedings of the Colonel.

The bully sauntered up the street with the air of a fine gentleman, and he had not left Theodore's shop a distance of a few hundred yards till by a singular coincidence he encountered the hag. The old woman looked pale and sickly, and her withered face was enveloped in a dirty handkerchief, which only served to make her pinched features more ghastly.

"Ah, my dear Madam, truly glad to see you," exclaimed the officer; "this is a felicity not more unexpected than agreeable. I wished to have an interview with you, and was about to return to my hotel and call for a directory in order that I might discover your residence, but your personal appearance at this interesting juncture will save me the trouble."

"Give me some money, fool, I'm starving."

"My dear madam! that is precisely my own situation, and I have come to Scotland for the very purpose of negotiating a small loan with our tender-hearted friend in the Canongate here. I shall take care not to squeeze the orange quite dry, and so you may have a few drippings as well as me. Ladies, I know, should always have the priority; but in this case, 'first come, first served,' is one of those proverbial sayings which, in my reverence for antiquity, I should wish to preserve intact."

"Peace, jackanapes! if you rouse me, I may sacrifice him and you too. Let me have some money. I am starving, I tell you, and a trifle which you would throw away, may save me and my sick boy, who is dying."

"Upon my honour, good mother, save and excepting a few pence—"

"Pence!" shrieked the hag, "I have not seen any for many a day. The boy and I have been starving, and coppers would be a boon. I was nearly killed by a savage mob, and I thought my son and I would have died together; nobody came near us. At this moment I have not so much as would purchase a single meal."

"Very distressing, indeed, my dear madam: and since matters have come to such a pass, I shall not scruple, trusting always that it will not offend your pride, to make offer of my purse to the extent of half-a-crown, or say three-and-six."

"Give me the money," exclaimed the old woman, eagerly clutching the proffered coins. "Give me the money. Hurt my pride! do you say, fool? Yes, it does hurt my pride, that I should require to stoop so low as to take charity from you. I meant to have gone to the fellow Reid, but I am not able to walk further. Away! out of my sight; I cannot bear to look on you!"

"My dear madam, whence the fury? It is quite true that I was at one time the apprentice of your lamented husband; but it does not thence legitimately follow that I should be obnoxious to your sweet society. But I see you are chafed; so adieu, my ancient sprig of rosemary!"

The Colonel made a gallant flourish with his hand, and left the angry beldame: who, after allowing him to go off for a few minutes, cautiously set herself to work to track his footsteps: but this, to one of her age and condition, was a hopeless undertaking. She, indeed, hobbled after him as fast as her sickly and emaciated frame would permit; but the Colonel was rapidly disappearing from her sight, when Character Cook suddenly crossed her path.

"Dost see that man in the long cloak?" asked the hag eagerly.

"No, I see no man in a cloak," answered Cook, testily.

"Dolt! that is the man who betrayed the boy who is to be hanged to-morrow! After him, but use no violence; only tell me where he goes to, and, if you can, where he lives. Away!"

Character clenched his fist, and vigorously making for himself a path amongst the crowded passengers, he sped forth like an arrow from a bow, in quest of the hated object. The Colonel, who had from the first been seen by Character, was too remarkable in his idiosyncrasy to escape the keen eye of the scout, and he was closely, but not conspicuously followed—the careless, saturnine gait of the man of leather being exceedingly unlike one who was playing the spy. The bully was traced to a field in the suburbs, and afterwards to a low lodging-house in the City. Character took note of a particular portion of hedge visited by his victim, and subsequent events proved the importance of the tracking suggested by the hag.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE HEAD OF LIBBERTON'S WYND.

When an execution takes place in modern Edinburgh, the gallows is stealthily erected at dead of night. Those in the vicinity are appalled,

> As they hear upon the scaffold floor,
> The midnight hammer sound.

And although thus warned of the impending catastrophe, they still gaze with mingled fear and dread on the grim machinery of death that greets them at the dawn of day. To those, again, who are beyond that terrible "midnight sound," the dread apparatus bursts upon their sight as a tree of ill-omen, that has reared its ungainly branches in a single night, and which, spectre-like, appears and disappears with supernatural-like celerity, whenever its work is called for and performed. This is the custom in modern Edinburgh, but it was otherwise in old Edinburgh; meaning, by that phrase, old Edinburgh, as contradistinguished from ancient Edinburgh, regarding which latter-named city, we are not at present called on to pronounce any opinion. In the times, then, of old Edinburgh, the gibbet was not an instrument so rare as it now is. We do not now, in Edinburgh, hear of its dismal existence oftener than once in five years: but at the commencement of the present century, penal death took place, in the Scotch metropolis, somewhere about twelve times in the year, if not oftener; and suitable accommodation had, in consequence, to be provided for the frequency of such tragedies. The west-end of the famous Old Tolbooth, called the "Heart of Mid-Lothian," had a projecting ground-story, on whose flat roof executions took place. A permanent horizontal beam daily flung out its dark shadows, as the setting-sun darted its parting rays down the picturesque street, with its fantastic air-built houses; while underneath there was a row of bustling shops, the owners of which busily plied their vocation under the literal roof of death. Custom deadens the keenest sensibilities. Merchants trafficked in the Market-place—burghers cracked their jokes—school-boys played their games—all immediately underneath this place of doom; and yet every one of them were unconscious of anything in the least degree approaching to levity or indecorum. But in our time, when capital punishments have happily turned out to be so infrequent, no traces of the implements of destruction are permitted to be seen before the time of their employment, or allowed to remain for a single moment after their object has been accomplished. This sensitiveness on such a subject is creditable to our humanity, but it suggests an important question as to the aspects in which these matters were viewed by preceding generations.

Nothing can strike the thoughtful student of past times more forcibly than the reckless expenditure of human life, as compared with the merciful practice, in regard to capital punishments, that obtains in our day. We do not merely refer to the amelioration of our criminal code, although that of itself is very remarkable: for who can now think, without shuddering, of blood being shed in torrents for mere personal assaults, for house-breakings above the value of five shillings, for petty trespasses, for purloining cattle, for forging notes, or for the many other offences for which the life given by God was wantonly sacrificed? The capital crimes recorded in the British statute-book could, at one time, be counted in hundreds; and who, we again ask, can now think of such a state of things without horror? But, we repeat, it is not in connection with such offences that we wish to call attention to the low estimate of the sacredness or value of human life, that passed current in times preceding our own. The law of treason, so flexible in its construction as to represent the caprice either of a sovereign, a minister, or a judge, has, times without number, consigned the bravest hearts of England to the ignominy of judicial murder. Sir Thomas More is one day fondled by his king, the royal fingers playfully encircle the neck of the Chancellor; but, in a brief space, these same fingers sign the death-warrant, and other, although probably not more rude fingers, turn up the grey hairs that cover that venerable neck, in order that it may be bared for the descent of the axe. And all for what? Just because the author of "Utopia" will insist that the Crown has no jurisdiction in spiritual matters; a dogma which any Baptist drysalter may proclaim aloud with impunity in the very streets, in this the reign of Queen Victoria. Need we refer to the infamous execution of Sir Walter Raleigh, by order of the buffoon James I., in virtue of a sentence passed on account of a trumpery charge of treason, incurred fourteen years before the consummation of his doom? or to the equally infamous fate of Sir Harry Vane, after the royal word of the libertine Charles II. had been pledged for his safety? or, lastly, to the wholesale butcheries of Jeffreys, committed at the instigation of the tyrant James II.? We need not dwell on these, for they are notorious matters in history familiar to all. But there were many humble victims to these sanguinary codes, whose feeble cries were never heard above the turmoil and din of their day, and the echoes of whose stifled groans were not caught up by written story or popular tradition, so as to be handed down to after generations. But though human ear heard them not, a great Eye looked down on earth, and One above heard the groaning of the prisoner and of those who were doomed to die; and we know assuredly, that a day of retribution will yet come.

Thus reckoned of such slender value, human life was liable to be invaded at all times and seasons,—the joy of existence apt in one moment to be hushed in the despair of death, the laughing child of the morning to become the orphan of the night, the joyous bride of to-day changed into the distracted widow of to-morrow, the minister converted into the outcast, the judge into the felon, the court exchanged for the dungeon, the ball-room for the scaffold—how could the play of the domestic and social affections be maintained, when exposed to the chance of such cruel reversions? Were the relations of husband and wife, of father and child, of brother and sister, of friend and friend maintained on the same footing that they are now? We think not. Perennial as is the tie that links such together, there must in these rude days have existed a holier intensity of love than our more prosaic because more peaceful times can possibly develop. No daughter among us can be tried as the noble-minded daughter of Sir Thomas More was tried; and no peasant's wife can now be called on to pass through the ordeal endured by the spouse of John Brown, of Priesthill. We have our social evils, and sore and deep they are; but judicial slaughter cannot be said to be included amongst the number.

We stand at present at the foot of a scaffold whereon a convict, charged with uttering forged notes, is to expiate his crime, or supposed crime, by a public death. And what a blot were these laws on the British Statute-book! From the years 1803 to 1818, there were more persons executed for forging notes, than were respectively put to death for the crimes of murder, burglary, or robbery from the person, committed within the same period. Two hundred and seven human beings were prematurely hurried into eternity for forging notes, during these thirteen years of blood; while the number of minor punishments, and the futility of the gallows in diminishing crime, may be estimated from the fact, that two years subsequent to the last-mentioned date, there were obtained within the compass of twelve months, upwards of one hundred convictions for forging notes, and nearly three hundred for having forged notes in possession. The crime was unknown previous to 1758, the date of the first execution for its perpetration; and it may be said to have ceased in 1825, when the voice of an indignant public was so lifted up, that the ignorant and selfish policy which had led to such extensive and fatal commission of the offence, had to be abandoned once and for ever. The Bank of England stopped payment, and had to issue notes of the value of one pound, and these were so easily imitated, as to create singular facilities for the manufacture of counterfeits; as these multiplied, the Bank obtained an act rendering them free from all liability connected with forged notes, and thus removed from themselves a principal inducement to stop the traffic. People were barbarously transported for having forged notes in their custody, and yet intelligent men often could not tell the difference between the real and the spurious note; and even the bank-clerks themselves failed sometimes to recognise their own notes, and refused to exchange them for coin. Juries resisted this unnatural state of things, and demanded that the Bank should disclose its secret marks: and, continuing to refuse convictions, the Bank at last resumed cash payments, suppressed notes of lower denomination than five pounds; the legislature made the offence non-capital, and now forging notes is a crime comparatively rare. Would that the lesson of this wise policy had been learned sooner. As it is, it stands for ever a crimson-stained page in our social history.

The morning fixed for the execution of Norman Hamilton was cold and wet, but yet a considerable crowd had collected; for although the judicial sacrifice of human life was much more frequent than it is now, still the death of a criminal always had its attractions for the populace; and, in this instance, the morbid feeling was enhanced by a general curiosity to discover how a gentleman would demean himself at the last hour. The whole space in front of the jail was filled by a throng of faces, gazing with visible anxiety on the apparatus of death; while every window in the tall grotesque buildings of the Lawnmarket had its animated occupants walling, as it might have been said, the boundaries of the moving circles below. Fine ladies and gentlemen had paid for eligible seats on the evening previous, and with the ease which affluence alone confers, were calmly awaiting the appearance of the principal actor in this open-air tragedy. As the slow but sure hand of the church-clock pointed towards the hour of destiny, muscular men pushed the crowds backwards or forwards, according as the movement seemed to facilitate the acquisition of good places. Children were whisked on the shoulders of parents, in order that they might lose no part of the spectacle; while other children, females and dogs, who were unable to resist these ground-swells and upheavings of the mob, yielded to their influence with shrieks, oaths, and howlings. Anon some coarse jest would be made, and the crowd, pleased for the time with a temporary lull in the jostling, would laugh long and loud with a chorus of some hundred voices. Beggars, mountebanks, and pickpockets stood around on all sides, ready to ply their several vocations, whenever the smallest opportunity afforded a chance of success. All was mirth, jocularity, and excitement: and but for that grim, noosed cord that dangled ominously from the projecting beam—that piece of twisted flax which now hangs so passively in the drizzling rain, as to yield to every breath of wind that passes along the street—but for that significant object, the assemblage might have met at an election, or a fair-day, or a menagerie exhibition. That elastic loop will, in a few minutes, encircle the vital part of a brave and generous youth, and, pressing it with unyielding gripe, will separate soul from body, and will convert that form, which the moment before had its life in every limb, into a shivering, struggling, dying man. The noose dangles passively in the air, and in a brief space, when it suspends its misshapen, distorted, mortal burden, it will dangle as listlessly as before; for life will then be quite extinct, and the muscles that fought so hard for life, will then be as inanimate as the rope that has been the instrument of destruction. All this is to take place in a few minutes, and yet the mob laughs and shouts, kicks and presses, gives and receives jokes, and treats the whole affair as if it were the most joyous, laughter-moving carnival that the sports of the country could produce. Whence this cold-blooded inconsistency? These must be human beings, and as such, they must have some human sympathies. That bold, impudent-looking woman turns to the child in her arms with a look of maternal fondness, and caresses it the moment that her quick ear hears its sickly wail; and there must be humanity in that pale-faced mechanic, who, amidst the jostling of the crowd and several attempts to the direct contrary, has contrived to keep his impish son on his shoulder for the last half-hour. The fiercest and darkest of human kind have their mitigating qualities; and although the scum of society, the dregs of the populace, undoubtedly drift loose at execution-times, yet we are not prepared to admit that fiends and demons alone surround the scaffold. Our solution of the mystery is this. The ignorant and depraved attend executions in order to gratify their morbid feelings. The sight itself, at the critical moment, awes them (except in the case of notorious criminals); but as all extreme emotions lie close beside each other in the human bosom, the sense of the terrible readily gives way to the spirit of levity, and hence the anomalous conduct displayed on such occasions. Could any one, no matter how degraded, be suddenly brought to a place of execution, he would become spell-bound under a subduing sense of the appalling character of the spectacle; but when the masses congregate hours before an execution takes place, the mind has time to divest itself of all solemn associations, and the gregarious principle operates so talismanically on crowds, that the slightest impulse communicated to the passions, immediately acts on the motley throng, and sets all further restraints at defiance.

Theodore Reid stood at the circumference of the living circle, with his journeymen and 'prentices reverentially standing beside him. An old sailor, with a wooden leg, was in their quiet vicinity, as the tar had, from experience, been satisfied that, in his dismembered state, he was not able to resist the surges that rose up amongst the inner circles. Theodore shared in the universal impatience, at the lagging pace of the minute-hand of St. Giles'. Hours have never been one second longer or shorter since the world began (mean and apparent time excepted): but people will speak of long and short hours, just as if the speed or slowness were in clock and watch and not in their own sensations. Divers persons may say with Rosalind, that time ambles, trots, gallops, or stands still with them, but, nevertheless, the sand descends in the glass and the shadows lengthen on the wall with certain and unfailing regularity, and the curtain falls at last, but not a whit before or after its time.

"I wish they would look sharp," said Theodore Reid to the old sailor. "Do ye think they will be long after eight o'clock, freen? I promised to let the shop-lads see the hanging, by way o' example; but we canna stan' here a' day."

"I don't know as how you land-lubbers do," replied the man; "but I know this, vhen ve strapped a feller, we kept time, and no mistake. In the navy, a chap is sent to glory vithout one alf that are noise that you makes. There's Jack Crab, as tould the Capting that he couldn't nor wouldn't take the vane-staff out on the mizen-truck. Says the Capting, 'Crab, do you see that are sun? Vell, look at him, for you'll never see him set!' And the Capting kept his word. By three o'clock the court-martial wis over, and Jack got the ribbon round his neck, and he was runned up to the mainyard-arm as fast as fun."

It is impossible to say in what spirit Mr. Reid might have listened to this narrative, had his mind been perfectly free to listen to its details; as it was, the figure of the hag caught his alarmed eye just as the sailor commenced his story. The old woman had crawled to the scene of action with evident difficulty, and, pale and exhausted, she was leaning her tottering frame against the wall for support. The consummation of her malignant hopes was at hand, and she gazed with a triumphant scowl on the scaffold and its terrible appendages; and she was so intent on looking at the apparatus of death, that she did not appear to be aware of the presence of Reid, although he was in her immediate vicinity. Reid, however, could not take his eye off her. Prudence would have dictated a change of position, when so unpleasant a person was at hand; but he stood riveted to the spot, and stirred not—his apathy evidently exciting the surprise of the old seaman, who obviously expected that his marvellous relation should have transfixed the trafficker with astonishment.

Theodore was not allowed to continue his reverie undisturbed; a smart tap was administered to his shoulder, and, turning round, he beheld the Colonel.

"I trust, my dear sir," said Flint, "that you are duly impressed with a sense of the solemnity of the scene. I was afraid that I might have to paint it from my own fancy; and, in truth, although my friends are pleased to flatter me by ascribing to your humble servant considerable powers in that way; yet, I assure you, I would rather that people should see and judge for themselves, than that they should rely on my powers of description. It is a very interesting sight, you will observe, Mr. Reid; and if you have any wish to act the part of chief performer on any future occasion of a similar kind, you have just to shape your twelve o'clock answer to the proper angle. That's all, Mr. Reid. There's our acquaintance, the aged gentlewoman, over the way there; she would be exceedingly glad to behold you in that elevated situation that your virtues deserve, and I plead guilty to a slight inclination in that way myself. But you will, of course, take your choice, Mr. Reid; take your choice in any way that your taste may direct you."

"Silence, you babbling fool," replied Reid, hoarsely; "this is no a time for jocularity."

"To a mind happily constituted, and on which the sun shines, all seasons are alike, Mr. Reid; and, as to jocularity, as you call it, Mr. Reid, pray when may it be a proper season for your vinegar, greasy chops to relax into mirth. Copley says, you never were known to laugh in your life."

"Haud ye'r lang idiot tongue, will ye; there's the hour ga'in to strik."

The hour of doom had at last come, and the hammers of St. Giles sullenly struck the fatal number. The crowd was hushed into momentary silence, and a feeling of suspense pervaded the vast assemblage. The small iron-grated door at the back of the scaffold opened, and four javelin-men stepped out and took their places at the several corners. The executioner followed next, but no one followed him. Again the crowd breathed heavily, if not audibly; and a cry of surprise burst from them, as the last officer of the law dexterously untied the cord from the beam, and again retired within the precincts of the prison. The javelin-men did the same; the grated-door closed after them, and it then became evident to all that there was to be no execution.

The hag now turned round to Theodore, and, lifting her skeleton hand menacingly, she cast on him a look of maddened hate, which seemed to express a determination that, when his day came, he should not get off so easily. The Colonel slipped off, and was seen no more; and the crowd, after looking on for a few minutes in mute surprise, gradually dispersed.

"I was sure," roared out a bricklayer, "that a gentleman wad never be nickit; it was a' a sham fra' the very first."

"An' us here for three hours," said another.

"It's a queer country," added a third.

But, in spite of objurgation, the dispersion went on; for people soon tire of grumbling, when their complaints have to be made to one another.

No execution! None, gentle reader. I have brought you as near the gallows as I could conscientiously do; but I have no desire to cater for prurient appetites. Some stimulant is required by novel readers; but there are certain limits beyond which no writer who cares for self-respect will seek to trespass, and to describe the hangman's work is little better than doing the hangman's duty. If you desire a solution of the mystery, please apply to the next chapter or two.

A copy of a weekly newspaper, published on board a steamship on a voyage to Australia, has lately been received; and as the contents afford considerable information as well as amusement, a few extracts from its columns may be interesting to readers on shore. It will be necessary first to give a brief account of the origin of this curiosity of newspaper literature. On the 21st of August last, the steamer Great Britain—whose singular history and vast proportions serve equally to render her the most remarkable vessel now afloat—quitted Liverpool for the antipodes, having on board no less than 630 passengers, besides a crew numbering 130 men. Two recent voyages across the Atlantic had proved that she was really as good and safe a sea-boat as she had been deemed before she made her unaccountable plunge beneath the waters of Dundrum Bay. Nominally rated as of 3500 tons burthen, her real capacity below her upper deck is stated to be nearly 7000 tons. Her new fittings were on a scale of corresponding magnificence. Besides the main internal divisions of aft and fore saloons, midships, second cabins aft, and second cabins forward, she had a music room, with an elegant piano and other instruments, three ladies' boudoirs, a smoking-room, four ice-houses, two hot and cold water baths, and, in short, all the comfortable arrangements of a first-class hotel. In reading the description of the vessel, one begins to look upon a voyage to Australia in such a floating palace as an undertaking little more formidable than a jaunt to Paris, and decidedly less unpleasant than a day's journey in an old fashioned stage-coach. On the whole, the journal of the voyage, so far as we have it in the paper before us, rather confirms this impression. The passengers seem to have had more enjoyment and fewer annoyances, than are usually found at sea. We are only enabled at present to follow them as far as the Cape, where the Great Britain arrived on the 10th of October, and whence she departed on the 17th of the same month. But possibly by the time these words meet the reader's eye, we shall have had news of the steamer's safe arrival at Port Phillip.

Judging from their names, of which a list is published, the passengers seem to have formed altogether a very fair epitome of the nation from which they were derived. All the three kingdoms, as well as the principality of Wales, had numerous representatives; and there was a due proportion of those luckless strangers whom distracted Europe is continually casting on our shores, to swell the mass of our motley population. Such names as Sizumbanski, Bibienauski, and Fiezkiewics, may be said to speak for themselves. It is satisfactory to find that the most perfect religious toleration prevailed on board the Great Britain, which would otherwise not have been worthy of her name. The form of government on board seems to have been a combination of despotism and democracy—Captain Matthews reigning supreme in his department, and the passengers doing pretty much as they liked in theirs.

As many will remember, the departure of the Great Britain from Liverpool, with her multitudinous human freight, made at the time a considerable sensation. "Never, in the remembrance of all who saw it," writes a passenger, "did a vessel leave Liverpool attended with the éclat which followed the departure of this leviathan steamer. The applauding and cheering shouts of the good friends we have left behind us hailed us as we steamed majestically down the stream; and the loud hurrahs of the assembled thousands who lined the shores on either side were to us an earnest of their good wishes and hearty hopes for our success. Steamer after steamer freighted with a living load, sailed around us as we journeyed on our way; and one after another, with a farewell cheer, left us and turned back—snapping as they went the last material links which bound us to old England. Like the brave Old Romans, we are a little inclined to observe omens and auspices, particularly if they augur success; and we observed, and noted it, that the name of the vessel which cheered us most, and stayed by us to the last, was the Independence. The omen was good: it appeared on the right hand. May it be a prestige of what we will achieve, and of the country we are going to."

After this propitious commencement, everything went on, for a time, in a satisfactory manner. Steering triumphantly past Dundrum Bay, the vessel held her course down the Bristol Channel. The last glimpse of land which the passengers gained was in the bright moonlight, which glistened on the blue precipitous mountains of Wales. On the following morning nothing but sky and sea met their view. They were in the Bay of Biscay. As usual, a long and heavy swell came rolling in from the wide Atlantic, with consequences disagreeable to many of the passengers, who seem to have considered themselves rather ill-used, in being made sea-sick on board such a vessel as the Great Britain. "We were much astonished at her behaviour," one of them writes; "for though under the circumstances she must have rolled, still from her size and heavy cargo of merchandise and coal, we did not expect her to roll as she did." However, the two following days brought pleasant weather and a calm sea; the passengers regained their good humour, but began to find the voyage, with so much unoccupied time at their disposal, rather monotonous and tiresome. Like practical men they set about remedying this inconvenience without delay. On the evening of the 29th, a meeting was held in the fore saloon, for the purpose of organising amusements of a useful and entertaining kind. Various suggestions were made; and it was finally arranged, in true British fashion, that committees should be elected for carrying the proposed plans into effect. Accordingly, parties were chosen who readily volunteered their services for making the necessary arrangements in the musical department, in regulating dances, and the more quiet amusements of chess, draughts, and backgammon, in instituting lectures and readings from Shakspere, Scott, and works of an instructive as well as an entertaining kind,—and last, but not least, in establishing a newspaper. As in such a crowd of people, so closely congregated, some disorderly proceedings might arise, to the annoyance of the well-disposed majority, a valuable suggestion was made by Captain Matthews, and at once adopted, for forming an efficient police force, from among the passengers themselves.

All these projects were carried into effect with great promptitude, and on Saturday, the 4th of September, the first number of the "Great Britain Times" made its appearance,—six copies being written and circulated through the ship. The publication was kept up in this manner with much industry and spirit until the steamer reached the Cape. There the most interesting articles were collected and neatly printed in a handsome double sheet, which the passengers could send home for the gratification of their friends. Such are the conveniences which now attend a steam voyage to Australia!

The "leading article" of this newspaper is a regular journal or diary of the voyage, apparently kept by the editor. As it was probably written from day to day, and was certainly published from week to week, and thus submitted to the criticism of all the passengers, we may feel assured of its correctness. Under such circumstances, a writer could "nothing extenuate nor set down aught in malice," without immediate detection and exposure. But the journal bears intrinsic marks of being a plain, unvarnished narrative, and accordingly it has considerable interest as a trustworthy account of the various adventures, the pleasures, and the troubles, which are to be expected in a voyage of this kind. On the 25th of September, for example, the musical committee, appointed on the previous evening, had been so active, and so successful that they were able to put forth a "notice," announcing that arrangements had been effected for a concert that evening, at eight o'clock, on the midships deck. The programme of the performances is given as follows:—

Glee.—"Now pray we for our country."
Solo.—Cornet à piston: "The Adieu," by Koenig.
Duet.—"I'll not beguile thee from thy home."
Solo.—Flute: "Deh! con te."
Song.—Comic; "Lord Lovell."
Duet.—Flutes: "Fleur de Marie."
Medley.—Cornet à piston.
Duet.—Flutes.
Solo.—Marseilles Hymn, by Polish Refugees.
Finale.—"GOD SAVE THE QUEEN."

The concert, as the journalist assures us, went off very well, reflecting great credit on the committee. In particular, as was to be expected, the "Marseilles Hymn" was admirably sung. On the same evening, we are informed, Shakspere's admired play of "Romeo and Juliet," was read to an attentive audience, in the fore-saloon, by a gentleman who kindly volunteered his services,—and whose reading evinced great talent for personification. The manner in which he represented the various different characters gave very great satisfaction.

This was pretty well for one evening. On the next an incident of a different kind occurred. A few minutes after the gong sounded for tea, some of the passengers who had assembled at the summons were seen rushing out of the fore-saloon, with faces indicative of some horrible sensation. Each, with a full mouth and distended cheeks, made the best of his way to the bulwarks, where "the sea received what the stomach would not." A general cry of "salt tea" explained the motive of this singular proceeding. The cook, by an unlucky mistake had made the tea with salt water. The mistake, however, was "satisfactorily explained," and the commotion subsided. If any unpleasant feeling remained, it was soothed by the musical committee, who by some "delightful music," brought all again into harmony. Then the ship's band played a few popular airs; and the evening's proceedings were once more "wound up with the national anthem."

This was certainly pleasant voyaging; but it must be borne in mind that the Great Britain, besides being an excellent sea-boat, had remarkably good luck. She crossed the much-dreaded Bay of Biscay with gentle breezes and under a serene sky. Two months afterwards, the steamer Melbourne was dismasted in this same part of the ocean, and had to put into the Tagus in a miserably leaky and uncomfortable state. A month later, the steamer Geelong (then under sail) foundered in a tempest hereabouts, going down so suddenly that the passengers, in escaping to another vessel which was near at hand, had no time to save any of their property.

Continuing her smooth and rapid course, the Great Britain, early on the morning of the 29th of August, passed the island of Palma, one of the Canaries. A contributor to the Great Britain Times gives a description of the picturesque view in highly artistical language. There was a bright moonlight; and shortly after midnight, the watchers, who were on the look-out for the spectacle, saw the lovely landscape rise before them. They beheld the high mountain, with its purple summit, reflecting back the moon's rays in variegated tints; the convent mid-way up its side, with every window seemingly illumined; the village at its foot hushed in repose; the little church, with the cottages clustering round, as if for protection; whilst here and there glittered a light. The passengers (or, at least, the contributor to the Great Britain Times) gazed with delight upon the scene, peopling in imagination the convent, with monks and nuns engaged in some sacred vigil, and the cottages with fond mothers or devoted wives, each trimming the lonely lamp to light the fisher's boat safely home. A squall sprung up and interrupted these sentimental musings, and the beautiful island of Palma faded into the misty distance. A few hours afterwards, they saw the island of Ferro, the westernmost of the group, rising like an immense bank of clouds on their left. The next day, they entered the torrid zone. The heat now daily increased, its effects being visible in the form of profuse perspiration. It did not, however, put a stop to their music and dancing, which were kept up with great spirit in the moonlight evenings. Many interesting objects now began to attract the attention of the voyagers; for those tepid seas are prolific of animal life. Porpoises swam round the vessel, or bounded after one another, "like a pack of hounds in full cry;" albicore were seen leaping six or seven feet in the air; and shoals of flying-fish began to appear. One evening, a porpoise, about five feet long, was harpooned and drawn on board, amid the shouts of the passengers. A few days afterwards, two land-birds, evidently driven off the coast of Africa, alighted, in an exhausted state, on the rigging, and were caught; one of them is described as not unlike an English water-rail. The next day, an immense number of flies, evidently from the same quarter as the birds, were blown about the ship, and many were seen alighting on the passengers; they were about three-quarters of an inch long, striped with blue lines across the lower half of the body, and covered with a reddish coloured hair; their bite was rather severe. The wind, at the time, (naturalists may be glad to learn) was blowing from the south-south-east, off the coast of Sierra Leone.

By this time, the voyage had lasted long enough for some grievances to make their appearance. No sooner were they discovered, than the genuine British remedy was applied. A "meeting" was held in the fore-saloon, and a remonstrance was drawn up and presented to the prime minister—or, in other words, to the chief officer, Mr. Cox, who seems to have been personally very popular. The exact nature of the grievance is not stated, the report being extremely concise. All that we learn is that "the meeting went off most amicably," and that Mr. Cox "was loudly applauded during the course of his moderate and substantial remarks." Promises of amendment were made, and were, "to a certain extent," fulfilled.

The following may be taken as specimens of the jocose paragraphs which appeared at this time in the newspaper:—

Our intelligent readers will, no doubt, observe we are rapidly nearing the line; we therefore recommend all whose inquisitiveness would urge them to obtain a peep at the said line, and who are fortunate enough to have very good telescopes, to get their glasses cleaned, and, on Monday evening, to keep a sharp look-out under the bows of the vessel; and if their glasses can distinguish objects in the dark of a nature like this "line," we positively assure them they will obtain a sight which few have seen among the many who have crossed it.

Important Notice.—His Serene Highness King Neptune has communicated to his clerk on board, his intention of visiting the Great Britain, on Monday, the 6th instant, when he trusts he will have the pleasure of giving audience, at his levee, to many of the distinguished foreigners at present visiting his dominions.

P.S. White kids and white chokers are not requisite, as his barber will be in attendance, in the smoking-room, to dress gentlemen appropriately for the occasion. Genuine tar-soap and hoop-razors only employed.

Notice.—Sea-Serpent.—The sea-serpent was (supposed to be) seen, on Monday last, chasing us astern. We are informed it was very like a whale.

Correspondence.—The suggestion of John Frost, to place a stove in the fore-saloon, will be considered when icebergs are seen. We would recommend him to fill up his spare time in assisting the stokers.

Whist recommends all hungry gentlemen to visit the fore-saloon any evening, where there is always a good supply of stakes upon the table, and where they may be assured they will be well cooked.

Grog is rejoiced at the great flow of spirits which characterizes the passengers in his department of the vessel.

In the "poet's corner," we find a spirited address from Neptune to the Great Britain, of which the following lines will show the quality:—

King Neptune would a visit pay to Britons bold and brave.
And welcome you to my domains, my ruling right to save,
You sweep my kingdom far and wide, my billowy foaming tide;
You are my glorious children born, my gems and ocean pride.
In lightning and in thunder, while Euroclydon rides high,
We welcome you with all our might, and all our foes defy.
From east to west, and north to south, we kiss your bows with spray,
And cheer you with our whistling wind, to aid you on your way.

The ceremonies which took place on crossing the line seem to have been conducted with much good humour, and to have formed an amusing episode in the voyage. At noon, on the 6th of September, when they were eighty miles from the equator, the following notice from "his Sultanic Majesty," King Neptune, was posted on the mainmast. It displays a truly majestic disregard of grammar, the personal pronouns being combined in a very despotic manner:—

His Sultanic Majesty Neptune, begs to inform the captain of the steamship Great Britain, that he is fast approaching his territories, and, by indicator, finds he has upwards of 800 children on board, who are cultivating mustaches,—a privilege I claim on the equator; and all who dare to infringe, lay themselves liable to have the wrong side of the razor used on their faces. I beg you to acquaint them of the fact. I will, however, forego harsh measures with them on your account, having been so kindly treated by you in the Catherine, in 1847. I fear my duties to the westward will prevent my making a long visit to your ship this evening, at which time I will see that the line is opened for your passing through unmolested.—Yours, &c.,

NEPTUNE.

The subsequent ceremonial is appropriately described in The Great Britain Times, by Mr. Freshwater, whom we believe to be a relative of our old acquaintance, Mr. Jolly Green. After some preliminary remarks, displaying his classical learning and his personal anxiety, Mr. Freshwater proceeds as follows:—

About nine o'clock, a loud shout informed me of the approach of His Majesty. Rockets immediately flew up, blue lights were burned, which threw a most unearthly appearance around the ship; the captain seized his trumpet, the men flew about, consternation seized the passengers, trepidation seized me, and, in short, sir, the King of Denmark, as Hamlet says, could not have been received with more grandeur. He seemed very well to know where the jolliest fellows on board usually met, for he made his appearance first on the forecastle. I was standing directly above him in the strangers' gallery, and a more noble looking fellow I never saw. Colossal, like a second Hercules, he marched with stately step to his throne. When I gazed on his old crown, so dreaded by the storm demons as it popped above the billows, I felt awed; when I looked on his grizzly grey beard, I fancied he must be afraid of his much-dreaded razor; and when I beheld his noble face and prominent nose, I felt I was in the presence of royalty. His wife accompanied him; but, sir, these ocean goddesses are not like the human race, for her ladyship had a noble pair of whiskers from one ear to the other. The barber was a terrific personage; and what a shudder ran through the audience when he opened up his five-foot razor, and felt its saw-toothed edge! Operations commenced, and several were submitted to the shaving operation, under King Neptune's superintendence. Sundry questions were put, and their character investigated, which determined what edge of the razor was to be applied. Of course, they had to be washed; and when shaving was over, they were plunged into a large tub, and to keep them company and further the views, sanitary commissioners, and several lookers-on were also shoved in, and there they tumbled about gloriously, like so many porpoises in a tea-kettle. By-and-bye, I heard a pump thumping away at a great rate; and in a moment, a grim-looking fellow played the hose on me with a most serene face, fancying (he must have been mad) that I was on fire. By-and-bye the tub was upset, the water was played promiscuously everywhere, and on everybody. Neptune swore; his wife danced a jig; his barber flourished his razor among the crowd; the attendant demons got elevated; everybody was amused, alarmed, and thoroughly ducked. I ran off to bed, and—sic transit gloria maris—next morning all was serene.

At this point of the voyage, as may be supposed, the weather became excessively warm; and the decks, during the day-time, were nearly deserted. A few indefatigable smokers, whom the regulations of the ship obliged to remain on deck, persisted in encountering the rays of the vertical sun. Among these was a group of Hungarian refugees, who smoked the pipe of friendship together, doubtless indulging in many reminiscences of their lost country. They were a fine set of fellows, and seem to have awakened much interest on board. As the vessel drew into the southern regions, many sea-birds hitherto unknown to the voyagers began to make their appearance. The stately albatross wheeled, on outstretched wings, about the ship, or settled majestically down on the surface of the waves. The Cape-hen, dark in hue and rapid in flight, and the beautifully mottled Cape-pigeon, were among these new companions. At night, too, the brilliancy of the southern constellations, and the wonderful splendour of the phosphorescent sea, excited great admiration. About this time, (Sept. 14,) a religious ceremony, of considerable interest to some of the passengers, took place.

It should have been before stated, that Sunday services were regularly performed, in different parts of the ship, according to the usages of various Christian denominations. The Captain read prayers in the after-saloon; and in the fore-saloon, a Methodist lay-preacher conducted a meeting very impressively and with good effect. On the day above mentioned, a Jewish congregation assembled for an important solemnity. One of the members, Mr. Nahum Salamon, subsequently furnished a well-written account of it to the newspaper. He was of opinion that this was probably the first time a Jewish congregation had ever assembled for devotional purposes on board any vessel. "It may not be generally known," he observes, "that the minimum number of male adults required for that purpose is ten; that with less the meeting would be incomplete, and public prayers durst not be proceeded with; and we believe we are correct in stating, that so many of the chosen people of God were never before collected on board ship." This opinion, however, can hardly be correct, as the Jews in all ages, since their dispersion, have been noted voyagers. According to Mr. Salamon, the occasion of their meeting on the 14th of Sept. 1852, was to commemorate the beginning of the year 5613 since the world's creation. "The fundamental doctrine of the Jewish religion," he states, "is essentially predestinarianism; and their teachings incline them to the belief that, on the anniversary of the day when, from chaos, the world was called into existence, their Almighty Father, Lord of the universal world, sits on his throne on high, in awful judgment upon man, his thoughts and deeds; the great Book of Life is open, where every man's act is recorded; and the dread fiat goes forth. It is a moment of solemn prayer with them. Soul and body are alike prostrate at the footstool of their Maker; a moment fraught with their happiness or misery, adversity or prosperity, sickness or health, life or death; but 'penitence, prayer, and charity' avert the evil decree." It should be mentioned that when it was made known that the rites of this congregation could only be performed in an apartment specially fitted up for them, Mr. Cox, the liberal prime minister of that floating realm, at once removed this "disability," by preparing a state-room for the services, in a manner that called forth the warm gratitude of the congregation.

Two days afterwards, a meeting of a different character took place in the aft-saloon. The owners and commander of the Great Britain gave a ball that evening to a large party of the passengers. The saloon presented a very gay appearance, the light-coloured dresses of the ladies being (according to the editor of the Great Britain Times) particularly appropriate and becoming. Unluckily, the weather was not so appropriate, being squally, with a high sea, which brought out the rolling propensities of the vessel in a manner very inconvenient to the dancers. Ladies and gentlemen were continually executing movements not warranted by the figure of the dance. On several occasions, the whole company unexpectedly united in performing a precipitate galop, with many new steps, towards the lower side of the saloon. But what was wanting in gravity was made up in mirth; and, when the music ceased, it was "much to the sorrow of many." The dancing was followed by singing. The "Beautiful Boy" was sung in a most amusing manner, "in costume." A "most capital comic song, sung comically by a comical Irishman," excited roars of laughter, combined with thunders of applause. "We admired," continues the reporter, "the songs sung by the ladies, whose presence contributed so much to the pleasure all felt. Altogether, the evening passed off in a pleasant and harmonious manner."

In this agreeable way, the steamer had passed the latitude of St. Helena, and was steering for the Cape, when the discovery was made, that the stock of coals was too small to carry the vessel as far as Table Bay. The captain thereupon determined to turn back and call at St. Helena for a fresh supply. This necessity, though unwelcome to him, was by no means disagreeable to the passengers, who were delighted at the prospect of once more touching the firm land, after a month's confinement to the ship. They reached the anchorage late in the evening of the 22nd of September, and left it on the afternoon of the 29th. A stay of nearly a week, gave ample time for exploring the island, of which the editor of the newspaper has given a detailed description, for the satisfaction of his floating circle of readers. The place which was once the tomb of Napoleon, was, of course, the object of greatest interest to the voyagers. "The tomb stands in a small square, paled in, within which grows the famous willow tree, of which nearly all procured bits. A railing of iron encloses the grave, to which you descend by a flight of steps, where you stand in what was once the resting-place of the hero of Austerlitz, Lodi, and Marengo." From the vacant tomb, they proceeded to Longwood, and "were much disappointed to find the dwelling-house of the once great chief of France turned into a farm-house, in a most dilapidated condition. The room in which the spirit of Napoleon left this scene of things, in which it had acted such a conspicuous part, is now disfigured with the machinery of a threshing mill; his bed-room is a stable, and his sitting-room is a rubbish corner. In short, by-and-bye, Time will make, as he is fast doing, a ruin of the dwelling-place of him who once dwelt in the magnificent palaces of the finest city of the world; who compelled the destruction of the capital of Russia, who dictated laws to Austria, and gave a king to Rome. Close to old Longwood is the new house, which the government built for Napoleon to reside in. It was not finished at his death, but would have been a more suitable residence for him than the one he inhabited previous to his death."

From this serious subject, we make a sudden transition to the fortunes of a cricket match, played by a party of the "Great Britainers," against the "St. Helena garrison." As was to be expected, the military players, being in good practice and familiar with the ground, won the day; but the Great Britainers made a respectable score, viz. 65, to 103 scored by their adversaries.

As there was not coal enough at St. Helena to enable the vessel to make the voyage to the Cape, it was necessary to take on board a quantity of wood for this purpose. But wood, also, is scarce at St. Helena, and to make up the requisite supply of fuel, a quantity of old staves, roots, green oaks, and furze trees was taken in. When the steamer was again under weigh, the passengers were a little startled at the sight of the brilliant sparks, or burning wood-flakes, which issued from the funnel. Some of these sparks alighted on the rigging and glowed brightly there, awakening serious apprehensions of fire. The danger, however, was, probably, much less than was supposed. Almost all the river steamers in America burn only wood, and send forth incessant showers of these fiery flakes from their funnels; but we have never heard of any accident to one of those steamers being attributed to that practice. At all events, the Great Britain, after a quick run of ten days from St. Helena, arrived safely in Table Bay, on the 10th of October. Nothing worth noting seems to have occurred in this part of the passage, if we except the formation of a "choral society," the members of which gave a concert, on the night before the steamer reached the Cape, and "displayed a great amount of vocal and instrumental talent." The diary in the Great Britain Times closes here; but from other sources we learn that the arrival of the steamer produced a great sensation in Cape Town. "The gigantic proportions of this noble vessel," observes a colonial paper, "overtopping the other shipping as much in proportion as they exceed the ordinary cargo boats, have excited general wonder and admiration. Her voyage, but for the unfortunate deficiency of fuel, and consequent detention at St. Helena, would have been unquestionably the fastest on record; and the fact of her having conveyed so many as 630 passengers, besides a crew of 130 men, for such a distance, without a single death, or a case of severe sickness, is a proof of the excellence of the general arrangements for securing the health and comfort of the passengers."

The emigrants seem to have made an equally favourable impression. "During the last few days," says the same paper, "the town has been enlivened by the presence of great numbers of the passengers, who appear to be generally a very different class of men from those formerly brought to our shores in emigrant vessels. Mostly intelligent men, of respectable connections, full of spirits and hope in their undertaking, the 'Great Britainers' seem to carry with them the elements of successful emigration; and there can be no reasonable doubt entertained that a few thousand men of this stamp, planting themselves voluntarily in a country of such boundless resources as Australia now discloses, would lay the foundation of an empire state, capable, before many generations are gone by, of ranking with the mightiest nations of the older world." While the passengers wandered about on shore, the townspeople, with equal curiosity poured off in crowds to the steamer, seriously impeding for a time the process of taking in the coals. In four or five days, however, this work was completed; and on the 17th of October, the Great Britain left the Cape for Australia. She was expected to reach Port Phillip about the close of November; and we may therefore look to get news of her arrival, and perhaps to receive the concluding number of the Great Britain Times, before the end of February.* Meanwhile the extracts which we have given from that curious publication will serve for something more than mere amusement, since they certainly show that by proper arrangements and care, a voyage to Australia may be made safe, comfortable, and pleasant, to a remarkable degree. They also afford a striking evidence of a truth which our legislators seem to be singularly slow in appreciating—namely, that the newspaper is fast becoming, at least to all men of British race, one of the necessaries of civilized life.

THE SALMON AND ITS FOES.

No member of the finny tribe has been the subject of so much discussion as the Salmon. Naturalists, poachers, anglers, fishmongers, landed proprietors, epicures, and members of Parliament, all write and talk about this famous fish. But ink and speech have apparently been wasted to little purpose, as, at the present moment, there are more vexed questions about it than about any other denizen of the deep.

Men of science are still divided as to whether male and female salmon travel to the spawning-ground in company, whether the spawning-bed is formed by the snout or tail; and as to embryology and the successive stages that intervene between it and adolescence, there are more theories than we can take the trouble of enumerating. River poachers are as little convinced about salmon preservation, as their moorland brethren are about the justice of giving the lords of the soil a monopoly in hares and pheasants. Anglers are perpetually crying out that their sport is curtailed by stake and bag nets, leisters or spears; and eke, they might add, by common garden-spades; for we have a poet in our eye, who, at flood-times, goes down at night to the bottom of his garden with a lantern and the horticultural implement aforesaid. The light is so disposed as to attract the notice of the fish, which springs upward in the required direction, and then the poet comes down upon it with such tremendous force, that the vitality of the spine is gone in a single moment, and the noble animal becomes the prey of the spoiler. Such doings with iron and cord must, in many localities, abbreviate the pastime of the sportsman; for we know that fishers, legitimate and illegitimate, carry on their operations to a wholesale extent. Fishmongers, again, are annoyed, like all other tradesmen who deal in an article whose supply is scanty or capricious; they have to contend with a surplusage at one time of a fish which is soon out of season, and a scarcity at other periods, when aldermanic feasts and club dinners call for triple supplies. The fishmonger must have his article, and he deals with fair and foul venders indiscriminately: but as demand and supply regulate price, and as Billingsgate gets prices regulated by the state of the market, we have not the same sympathy for the members of its incorporation that we are bound to maintain for lessees, tacksmen, and landed proprietors. These parties invest annual sums in the prospect of obtaining something like a return for their money; and as labourers and capitalists are worthy of the hire or gain that legitimately pertains to them, so we are decidedly of opinion, that legislation should be so squared as to admit of free scope for such return being obtained. Epicures, too, are entitled to have their fears respected; for to those who relish the superior flavour of the salmon, the possibility of the extinction or comparative diminution of supplies, must force unpleasant anticipations as to how far trouts, mackerels, or herrings would compensate for the deprivation. And let no sanguine lover of good things sneer at such a possible consummation of misery. Over-fishing has driven the whales of the Arctic Seas into latitudes beyond the harpoons of the most daring Blowhards of modern times; and in vegetable nature, over-cultivation, or something else, has driven the potato almost out of existence. We do not ourselves imagine that we ever shall have occasion to sing the coronach over salmon, as an extinct species in the animal kingdom; but the actual state of affairs, and still more the cry that has been raised regarding them, compel us to take up the subject and deal with it as a topic deserving attention.

Last of all in the roll of interested parties, we have members of Parliament. Many senators are proprietors of salmon-fishings; but we do not refer to legislators in that capacity, nor allude to them just now in their province as makers and menders of laws; in the discharge of which function the salmon and its decline and fall are often obtruded on their notice, and from the extent and diversified character of the interests involved, the salmon and its concerns must and will receive attention. Of course, a neophyte of St. Stephen's, before deciding on what is to be done, must inform himself as to what has already been accomplished in the way of previous inquiry and legislation. Well, that will at least cause the reading of three "Blue Books," issued in 1824-5, and of one large "Blue Book," issued in 1836; and it will, also, as shewing the cause and result of these tomes, be further imperative that he should peruse some dozen Acts of Parliament. Hansard, in this instance, need not be looked into; as although the question has been discussed in Parliament, the debates thereon have thrown little additional light upon the subject. Besides Reports and Acts Parliamentary, numerous Review and Magazine articles and Pamphlets have appeared; but except a paper in the "Edinburgh Review," about two years ago, a tract by the Rev. Mr. Williamson, of Tongland, and the papers of Mr. Shaw, of all of which we shall avail ourselves, none of the other multitudinous lucubrations, that have come under our notice, are deserving of much attention.

The whole difficulties connected with property in the salmon consist in its peculiar mode of reproduction. The animal must leave the salt water and ascend, it may be hundreds of miles, to the top of a river, in order that it may deposit its spawn in fresh water. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" tells us in thrilling language of the adventurous mother who to save her child from American slavery, boldly carried him over the cracking treacherous ice, but this feat is as nothing to what is accomplished by the female salmon. It defies wind and tide, and even the cascade presents its vertical walls and its thundering foam in vain; man, it is true, sometimes comes in, and with his lethal weapons and contrivances often arrests the progress and takes the life of the poor wanderer; but give it fair play at this stage of its existence, and it will not only multiply itself indefinitely, but will year after year return for the performance of this same reproductive function. But so far from giving this fair play, the proprietor, or the tacksman, or the poacher, or the angler at the mouth of the river, despises the moderate counsel involved in such a course. "I can transfix or halter this fish with certainty at present, but she or her progeny may never come my way again—and I shall therefore sacrifice a future problematical good to myself, and a general good to those who do business farther up the river, by appropriating the prize on the instant. I know that in many cases the upper fishers kill salmon immediately after they have spawned, and when they are still foul, and why should I respect the rights of those who pay no respect to my interests?" The salmon is taken, and a sorry sight it is to see the quantity of roe that is embedded within it. Every one deplores this result when it is written or spoken about, but where is the fisherman or sportsman who, when opportunity presents itself, will have the self-denial to let the breeding fish alone? —at all events it is well known that about four-fifths are killed during their first ascent of our rivers. The natives at the top of the water are equally murderous and unprincipled, and they scruple not, as we have mentioned, to slay the fish when they are in the foul condition of having newly spawned —a proceeding which not only affects prospectively the interests of the lower fishers, but palms unwholesome food on the community—a misdemeanour of which the law is as much entitled to take cognizance as it is to punish for the sale of unwholesome flesh. But the upper men do not confine themselves to the slaughter of the infirm aged, they also capture fish in early youth when they are comparatively valueless, and when if spared to take their seaward trip, they would return larger, and heavier, and more marketable commodities. There is nothing then for it, but that upper and lower should agree and make one common interest of the fishings of a river. The first authority whom we have quoted recommends as a full and satisfactory measure of salmon reform that the net system, moveable and staked, should be abolished, that the rod should be legalized all the year round, and that a stationary engine should be placed at some convenient part of the river, of such construction that when in operation every fish passing up may be caught, or which when not in operation every fish passing up may pursue its journey unmolested. The proceeds of the fishing, as conducted in this way, would fall to be divided amongst the different proprietors, according to the average fishings of former seasons, or according to any other principle of allocation that might be amicably agreed on.

It is some time since this bold but unquestionably desirable and effective measure was proposed, but as yet we have heard of no steps being taken on any river for its adoption; although the parties interested are still as potent in grumbling as ever. Let us proceed to consider this scheme, and for this purpose we shall assume in the meantime that over-fishing, and non-regulated fishing are two evils that jeopardize the capital invested in the salmon fisheries, (which is about £100,000 per annum for Scotland alone,) and then let us inquire how far these are likely to be obviated by the reformatory measure proposed. Other causes, doubtless, contribute to the diminution of the salmon, and at these we shall glance in due time, but of preventible causes we consider excess and mode of fishing to be the chief, and on this assumption, all who know the subject will grant that we may safely proceed.

Stake and bag nets are placed in salt water, not only outside the mouth of a river, but for miles on either side of the opening; and it is obvious, that constructed as they are, they must catch almost every fish that comes against them. The trout has a keen sense of the danger of this net, and whenever it comes upon the outrigging, it pursues a lateral course, till it escapes the danger; but not so the salmon, which goes plump against the obstruction, despite of premonitory warnings, and is speedily entangled in the fisher's snare. In the use of the net and coble, or moveable nets, the case is precisely the reverse: these have less power over the salmon, but intercept the trout in large quantities. A stake is fixed on the banks of the river, and the net is loosely placed in the stern of the coble, the fisherman pulls in a curve suited to the run of the water, and the dodging of the trout is rewarded by capture; while the adventurous march of the salmon is rewarded by escape. We do not pretend to know by what instinctive principle the two fishes act in these parallel cases, and having no substantial ground to go upon, we offer no theory on the point. It is sufficient for our purpose to remark, that the fixed salt water net does, as statistics amply prove, intercept too many fish; whilst it is not only mechanically difficult to reduce its destructive tendencies, but it is also, supposing the mechanical difficulty were overcome, extremely inconvenient to ascertain whether any relaxing arrangement has been carried into effect. It is well known, that French men-of-war have to superintend the French fishermen who prosecute the herring fishery on our coast, and that our own fishermen also require to be watched; and yet it is matter of notoriety, that notwithstanding naval surveillance, both Gallicans and Anglicans evade the piscatorial codes of their respective countries. The Frenchman gets bounty on herrings which he never caught, and the Englishman still employs illegal nets, and destroys herrings in infant innocence. The fixed net may catch too many, and the moveable one may catch too few, in which case it is obvious, that the proprietors of the one have too much profit, and those of the second have too little; and this inequality and consequent unfairness of return, affords, in itself, a satisfactory argument for the substitution of one central machine for each river.

But not only does equity point to this improvement, but the future prosperity of the fishings demands it. The fixed nets cannot be regulated; whereas, a machine can be adapted with the most nice regularity to the exact observance of whatever close time may be thought necessary. All or none may be caught, according to pleasure. If the old-fashioned plan be adopted, of allowing Sunday excursionists to ascend the heights with impunity, then a few turns of a crank winds up the labour of the week, and the fisher may go to his holiday, and allow his victims to go to theirs, and there is no farther care necessary on the part of man or beast. Economy, too, whose potent claims should be listened to on a question like this, also lifts up its voice on behalf of the projected alteration. Net fishing involves considerable expense; the original cost of boats, nets, and their appurtenances is heavy, the tear and wear is incessant; and above and beyond all, the wages of fishermen greatly swell the expenditure of proprietor and tacksman. On the other hand, let it be observed, that the original cost of a stationary machine would fall short of the expense of the net plant of any given river; the maintenance would, undoubtedly, be less, whilst the staff of operators would unquestionably be diminished.

It may possibly however be whispered, that one single machine might not be so effective in catching, as the vast array of netting that is presently in operation; but to this we answer, that the physiological economy of the salmon compels it to find a fresh-water deposit for its spawn, and that it cannot, without a flagrant and fatal violation of the laws of its physical being, do otherwise than proceed inland for the discharge of the generative function. And Nature, as if it held that the mere presence of roe within the animal might, in some wayward member of the species, be insufficient to cause it to prosecute its journey landward, has added another incentive to the performance of duty. If it remains too long in the salt water, it becomes covered with a sea insect, of which it can only get rid by wholesome immersion in fresh-water pools; and on the other hand, as if to make sure that its shuttlecock career should be duly performed, it has been further ascertained, that if the unfortunate fish lingers too long in the smooth waters that glisten under the greenwood tree, it is besieged by armies of fresh-water insects, of which it can only get rid by striking its fins towards old father ocean. There is nothing capricious in either of these dispensations, for before the sea tormentors commence the exercise of their vocation, the myriads of ova are ready to be discharged; and before the fresh-water visitors become cutaneous irritants, the reproductive process has been performed, and the relaxed tissues and altered colour of the skin proclaim to the invalid, that sea-air and sea-bathing can alone bring back health and strength.

But a querulous river-proprietor may say this: Your proposed machine if opened backwards will let the salmon-mother and her mate back to the German Ocean, may it not be that like the desponding emigrant, they forsake Lochaber and its braes to return no more? Thereby, we must candidly admit, hangs a mystery. There be some who avow that the salmon, with unerring instinct, goes back to its native river, when its physical necessities compel it to revisit the fresh water; and there are others who deny the certainty of return to the place of its birth. We have given some attention to the controversy, but after patient consideration of the whole subject we are unwilling to pronounce dogmatically concerning it. Probably it will return to its native stream; but the experiments of Mr. Shaw and the Duke of Athol have not yet definitely settled the question, and we are loth to hold out any prospects which farther experiments may not realize. But, still, admitting that certain fish descend certain rivers and return not thither again, what boots it? Every year the land sportsman spares hares, pheasants, and woodcocks, but he has no certainty that these will again breed on the very property where he has spared them. If some leave, others will come—and so, in like manner, with the salmon. If some denizens of the Forth take a trip northwards, and ascend the Tay for a change of air and scene, is it not equally probable, that some Tay salmon, after satisfying themselves with the verdant beauties of the inches of "St. Johnstoune" and the beauties of "bonny Dundee," may direct their nostrils southwards, and passing the Bass Rock, and skirting "Largo Bay," and coming "within a mile of Edinburgh," may choose to die game under the shelter of the guns of Stirling Castle? The probability, it appears to us, admits of no doubt, and therefore we have no sympathy with these fears.

But come we now to the rod. Our salmon reformer would legalize its use from January to December, and if this innovation appear startling, let its merits be duly considered before sentence of condemnation be passed. The number of fish caught by rod, as compared with those caught by nets, is utterly insignificant—the proportion being that of 700 to 90,000. The mass of rod-fishers ply the gentle art more for amusement than for commercial purposes—and they belong to a class of the community whose circumstances enable them to pay for their recreation, and whose avocations prevent them from exercising their amusements with anything like destructive frequency. At present the leister transfixes the salmon in the very act of spawning, but at that season the rod-fisher cannot molest the fish even if he had the will. Besides, as the conservation of the spawning beds must depend very much, if not exclusively, on the co-operation of upper proprietors and tenants, it is but fair and politic that they should receive some encouragement to persevere in well-doing. It has been proposed to abolish spears as well as nets, and in the propriety of this we concur, but as poaching cannot be put down unless you have the support of all around, we would not only legalize rod-fishing for the whole year to those who are willing to pay for the sport, but we would gratuitously extend the privilege to all proprietors and tenants whose grounds are intersected by a river. This extension of the franchise would enlist a band of volunteers, who would do more to protect the fish than any system of river police that has yet been tried.

We have referred to the minister of Tongland as an authority on salmon, but we are more pleased with his facts than his proposals; more satisfied with him as an observer than as a legislator. He agrees, as we do, in the propriety of the suggestions of the Edinburgh reviewer, but he makes the monstrous amendment that Government should buy up the salmon fisheries, and carry them on for behoof of the nation. Now our reverend friend ought to know, that excepting administering justice and carrying letters, Government never does anything well. It cannot grow timber, build ships, publish books, or conduct traffic of any kind, without blundering at every footstep—and sure we are that Downing-street, with all its wisdom, never could catch salmon. Why first of all, we should have a salmon board; then boards for each river; then we should have flash engineers performing all imaginable tricks with the construction of the proposed machine; we should have jobbing in the appointment of fishery officers; peculation of such animals as were caught, and cooking of accounts of such animals as were sold; while, to crown all, we should have hordes of Walpole's militia-men squatting down as protectors of the fishes, but who, in reality, would be devourers of the loaves of the district. No, no, Mr. Williamson, if the fishings of your favourite animal are to go down, let them be ruined in the hands of the present proprietors, as it is a solemn fact that Government not only ruins every trade which it undertakes to protect, but it also involves some three or four allied interests in the same disastrous fate.

Rejecting Mr. Williamson's assistance in guiding us as to what things should be, we gladly accept of his aid when he comes to speak of things as they are. He is evidently an accurate and trustworthy observer, and in his company we shall be able to form a tolerably clear estimate of the numerous enemies of the salmon, and of the multifarious agencies which are perpetually at work for its destruction. Fixed nets are but of yesterday, and over-fishing scarcely could be said to be a crime prior to their introduction; but the disabilities which we are now about to catalogue, were in operation before Izaak Walton began to hold forth, (with all his quaintness, Izaak talks a deal of nonsense, and so far as the salmon is concerned he is often thoroughly unsound), ay, and were in operation centuries before he and his brethren saw the light.

All animals live on, and in turn are eaten by their fellows—and the salmon, of course, forms no exception to the rule. The great fecundity of this fish indicates a trebly hazardous life, as insurance offices would say—for Nature is never prodigal in her supplies without design. According to Sir Humphry Davy, if a salmon produces 17,000 roe, only 800 will arrive at maturity. A destruction so great as this must have been intentional, and we shall accordingly find that the roe, and even the advanced salmon, furnishes a constituent portion of the diet of numerous other animals. Frost, floods, the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, the fish in sea, lake and river, and, last of all, man wages war against the salmon.

But let us look at this antagonism somewhat in detail. The salmon is assailed in infancy and in maturity. In the first stage, of course, its foes are those of fresh-water origin; but, in the second, both fresh and salt-water depths send forth their representative hosts to effect its destruction. "The chief destroyer of roe and embryo are water ouzels, gulls, wild-ducks, and river-trouts. The water-ouzel watches the female salmon depositing her spawn, dives after her, and swallows the roe immediately after it has made its appearance. Gulls observe the fry when just about to disengage themselves from the bed, and devour them in a sort of intermediate state between the embryo and the active fish. Wild-ducks gobble up the roe in all its stages; and if they once discover a bed, they utterly destroy it. Trouts, too, of various descriptions, feed both upon roe and fry; and, perhaps, are more destructive than all the above animals put together."

The salmon which has escaped the dangers incident to the "chrysalis" stage, must prepare to contend with those foes who lie in wait for adult flesh. And, in the van, comes the otter, who charges in all parts of the river, and in all seasons, except when the fish is foul. The otter's general tactics is to hover about during spawning-time, when he finds his victims on the shallow fords; and he there seizes them in large numbers, drags them on shore, and, after helping himself to favourite slices from the head, contemptuously abandons the rest of the body to epicures who are less fastidious. In some rivers, farm servants and others go down at early dawn, and are glad to get the fish which the otter so conveniently leaves on terra firma for their use. Mr. Williamson refers to one case, where a beautiful male fish, weighing upwards of fourteen pounds, and in fine condition, was left in this extraordinary manner.

The next foe is the pike, whose antagonism presents some curious features. It is a fair passage of arms between the two animals; if the salmon is strong he may escape, if he is young or weak he falls a victim to the pike. Frequently, the salmon finds discretion to be the better part of valour, and that safety consists in flight; and, as the pike frequents deep, sluggish pools and lairs, while the salmon prefers clear and lively streams or pools, free from mud and rather shallow, the two do not come in contact, except when, in the course of its upward or downward peregrination, the salmon happens to pass through the territories of the pike, and then the latter bristles up like the Duke of Athol, when a tourist passes through Glen Tilt. One great receptacle of the pike is Loch Ken, upon the Dee, and here we must quote Mr. Williamson:—"It is about nine miles in length and abounds with pike, some of which are of enormous size. We have seen the jaws and skull of one taken many years ago in this loch, and still preserved in Kenmure Castle, which weighed seventy-five pounds. The salmon route lies through this inhospitable region, peopled with hungry, lank-bellied monsters. That multitudes perish in traversing it is pretty certain; but it is impossible to ascertain, or even in the remotest degree to approximate the amount of havoc. One fact, however, is well known; that although numerous salmon appear in the streams that feed the loch, not one salmon-trout or herling was ever seen among them. All disappear in their passage through Loch Ken; and the inference seems a fair one, that they are devoured by the pike. We confess that an obvious question is suggested by this inference. If salmon-trout and herlings are all destroyed in this manner, how do fry and par happen to escape? if the pike manages to kill all the stronger fish, when ascending the loch in autumn, how does he permit the smaller fish to get away, when descending it in spring? Our answer is, that spring is the season when the pike spawns. At the very time when the fry, emancipated from their beds, are in the freshest and most nimble enjoyment of newly-acquired life, the pike is in the most sluggish and exhausted condition, ill-fitted to pursue and seize prey which, even in his livelier hours, would at least be a match for him."

Another and the last enemy that we shall refer to is the eel. He is rather a cowardly opponent, not daring to attack the strong and healthy salmon, but assailing and eating up without mercy such as happen to be weak or wounded. Unlike the otter, which is eclectic in the gratification of its appetite, the eel devours everything except bone, and leaves the skeleton as bare of flesh as if it were preparing specimens of osteology for a museum. The eel is also disposed to prey on roe, but by a wise provision of nature, somewhat similar but even more complete than what obtains in the case of the pike, limits are set to the predatory habits of the eel. The salmon produces in fresh water, the eel produces in salt water—and as both exercise the productive function about the same season, the salmon descends, while the eel ascends, and thus they pass each other in the journey of life. Were it not for this, the eel in all probability would extirpate the salmon tribe.

Again, agricultural improvement and manufacturing progress contribute their quota of annoyance to the salmon. Mr. Mechi and other cunning tillers of the ground drain their lands and discharge their final pipe into the nearest river and this washes away spawn. Then your chemical works, and other artistic operations necessitate obstructions, and cause such villanous liquids to be poured down our fairest streams that the salmon's dainty taste is offended, and it seeks asylums where no such pollutions are tolerated.

But finally one other enemy remains, which of itself, and supposing all other foes were removed from the field would work fearful havoc amongst salmon—and this last foe is frost. This mighty agent, which rends the most gigantic rocks, and hurls them with impetuous fury over the distant precipice, is the same potent power which collapses and dries up the life principle in myriads of animated beings in the early stages of existence. A premature or long-continued frost may be so fatal as to affect the supply of salmon for a series of years, and therefore in speculating on the decrease of the fish and of our supposed power to keep up its numbers, we must bear in mind that we have no control over the seasons or over its marine companions. But, nevertheless, seeing that the physical functions of the different kinds of animals are so exquisitely adapted to the habits and perpetuity of each other, and that the seasons however severe always spare a remnant and something more, there can be no fear of extirpation, or perhaps even of serious diminution, provided only that man withholds his blundering and murderous hand. The cause of scarcity is obvious, and the cure is evident. Down with nets and leisters, up with the central machine, and in anti-pedagogic phraseology—spare the rod! If these conservative measures are adopted the salmon may yet be saved, and all classes from the prince to the executioner,* may still be able to enjoy the glorious vocation of the angler.

* It may perhaps be interesting to those who have prurient curiosity regarding such a notorious personage as Mr. Calcraft to know that he is a fisher. When he was corresponded with about the execution of two criminals in Cupar, he inquired if there was any fishing in the neighbourhood, and on being answered in the affirmative he brought his tackle with him, and had some sport in the Eden. Mr. C. ought to be dexterous in casting the line, but we never heard what success attended his piscatorial efforts.

THE POPULAR POETRY OF BRITTANY.

The heroes of an age, as well as the characteristics of a nation, have their ascendency and pass away. Odin, Thor, and in comparatively later times, Arthur, Merlin, and the poetical Roland and Charlemagne, endured while the tastes and feelings of the people assimilated with the fictions and literature, the schald, or the saga-man, or the romance writer had created. The popular minstrel, whether bard, troubadour, or educated poet, starts up from time to time, and among many failures strikes at last some chord which vibrates to the hearts of the people. He tells them their woes; he exaggerates their wrongs; he flatters their pride of conquest: at all events, he expresses their wishes and their hopes in language which has an echo within them, but which they all wanted the ability to utter. Song itself becomes a part of their intellectual and emotional existence. In a rude age, the minstrel is heard with rapture and devotion, while even in a civilized one the ballad frequently becomes the leading chord to which the thoughts and tendencies of a nation vibrate.

The poetry of a remote age, and of a semi-barbarous people, expressed the ideas and sentiments then most prevailing. The earliest songs relating to the half mythic heroes of antiquity, were in a great degree the inspired histories of these men. They were indeed posthumous, but the actors had not so long passed away from the scene of life, but that their names and achievements were familiar to their countrymen. Their poetical histories, however, underwent great changes. The bard or minstrel adapted in some degree their actions and sentiments to the notions prevailing around him; he heightened and brought out what was doubtful and obscure: the slightest hint from tradition served to enlarge the dimensions of his subject; the spirit of the marvellous lent him her spells, and the successful warrior became idealized into the hero or the divinity.

We might inquire, but the question would be a difficult one to determine, how long would the popular hero survive in the oral songs of the people? We do not, however, consider the present state of the literary world as at all analogous to the case in point. Modern writers select their heroes through the whole range of literature, and seek indifferently their inspiration from a remote, or a recent era, from a real, or an ideal subject. This is because the tendencies of literature have become universal, and the minstrel, instead of addressing his verses to an uneducated auditory, with whom a few simple and primitive ideas are the key-notes on which alone he can successfully strike to touch the heart, or to interest the fancy, has now to gratify the tastes and feelings of a public whose studies and pursuits are daily becoming more extensive and diversified.

To the poetry of Scandinavia, the wild and stormy odes of the Goths, has been assigned a Grecian origin; whilst even the fictions of Ireland have been said to have been transplanted from Phœnicia and from Troy. The earliest germs of Celtic minstrelsy, the lays of those master bards who shook the religious and political world in which they lived, with such appalling influence, have also been sought to be traced to classical originals, for no better reasons, perhaps, than because the Druids were said to have worshipped Hermes, and the use of Greek characters, according to Cæsar, prevailed among a tribe of the Gauls. Surely, the elements of poetry exist among every people, savage or civilized. They may indeed be modified by external circumstances; rendered joyous and exhilarant by success, or solemnized and deepened by national misfortune. The imagination, however, is as much a component element of the mind as the understanding, and wherever the stars come out nightly to gladden the firmament, or golden clouds gather round the departing sun; wherever there is vale, and wood, and mountain, the rush of waters, or the melodious song of birds, the seasons to work their changing spells in the green tributes of spring, the beauty and luxuriance of summer, the gorgeous hues of autumn; nay, wherever the empire of thought extends, or the affections prevail, poëtry is there with her spells and aspirations, waiting only the touch of genius to kindle and exalt the soul!

We have been too much accustomed to underrate the influence of every association but those which we call classical, and to consider our Gothic or Celtic progenitors as a species of unlettered barbarians, to whom not only all artistic skill, but even poetical imagination was denied. Yet, judging by the effects produced, no Roman or Grecian poets, not even their most celebrated lyrists, ever swayed the passions, the wills, or the feelings of their auditory, like our old Gothic bards. Nor have we any reason to consider these men as barbarians, in comparison to other nations. When Canute invaded England, on the sterns of his ships were emblazoned lions of gold, and on the top-masts were distributed birds and dragons, dolphins, centaurs, and other monsters, in such profusion, that they excited the wonder of the beholders; whilst the size of the vessels, and their capability to brave the stormy waters of the Northern Ocean, were proofs of considerable advancement in the arts of civilization. The Goths had, likewise, a literature, embracing history, theology, poetry, and some of the mechanical sciences, when many of the continental nations were immersed in the deepest mental obscurity; and yet we have, until lately, been accustomed to consider the North-men as little better than piratical rovers, and their minstrelsy, wild as it was, and characteristic of the scenery by which they were surrounded, but as a rude and overstrained copy of the south.

Much has been said respecting the material tendencies of the age; yet lyrical poetry, as exemplified in our songs and ballads, is still the most popular species of literature we have. Its character, indeed, has changed in some respects. There is little in it of the heroic. It has lost its influence upon the manners of a people; although often, unexpectedly, a simple song, pitched to a note which vibrates to the memory of some emotion of younger, perhaps happier days, at once subdues and holds us captive. As an art, lyrical poetry has, undoubtedly, lost some of its power, perhaps because it has become more purely an art; perhaps because poetry itself is no longer comprised in one mode of expression, but is illustrated in a variety of ways. In an age when education and literature have made comparatively great progress, poetry appeals to man by a hundred influences it never or but rarely exercised in simpler times. The stage, the sculpture-hall, and the picture-gallery; the scenery of far lands, the sublimity of distant oceans, nay, even sunset over the village-hamlet, and the tangled rose-wreath around the cottage-porch, each and all have spells and gentle and peace-breathing emotions to tens and hundreds of thousands, to whose humble homes and workshops a cheap and wide-spread literature has brought the richest stores of English song and eloquence, and awakened a taste and an appreciation for the beautiful, enjoyed in a rude age only by a few gifted minds.

The recent publication of a collection of the popular "Songs of Brittany," by M. T. H. de la Villèmarqué, has introduced the national poetry of that country to the literary world. These remains have deservedly excited considerable attention; and, however reluctant we may be to adopt all the views of their Editor, in reference to the antiquity which he claims for them, we cannot deny but that many of them exhibit traces of an inspiration alike simple and beautiful. With passages abounding with deep feeling and pathos, there is withal a graphic simplicity that recalls the manners and sentiments of a primitive time. Like all national melodies, the lays of Brittany have their peculiarities. In these specimens, the prevailing tone is one of mournfulness, blended with a religious feeling. At times, also, there is a harsher note, one which falls forcibly, though jarringly, upon the ear; especially in those outbursts of national hatred and vengeance, in which the people of this province expressed their hostility to tyranny, whether exercised by the Franks, the soldiers of the French monarchy, or the revolutionary armies.

The older songs exhibit a strange mixture of Druidism and Christianity; a blending of Pagan practices, such as the earlier inhabitants, the half-converted heathens might have exhibited, in connection with the rites of a more enlightened creed. Thus the Bretons have always evinced a superstitious predilection for the Cairn, the half-ruined Cromlech, or the all but defaced circle of the old Sabæan worship; and at their national fêtes and festivities, in spite of ecclesiastical decrees and the censure of their priests, these localities still remained consecrated objects in their regards.* Their national songs are an additional proof, if any were required, of the identity of the Celts of Armorica with those of Wales.

The names and histories of Arthur, Merlin, Taliesin, and many of the Welsh bards, are as familiar as household words; while the half-heathen practices of the peasantry attest at the present day how unchanged has remained the national character of the Breton, through the lapse of eighteen centuries.

With few exceptions the specimens of the national songs given by M. Villèmarqué as the most ancient, are also the best. They are more concentrated, graphic, and poetical; even the most trivial subjects conclude with emphasis and point, whilst the interest excited by the superstitious agency of the fairy Korrigan, or the wizard Merlin, is far more elevated than that which is de-

* This feeling even yet prevails, though as long ago as A.D. 658, a council held at Nantes denounced to the people of Brittany their veneration of certain fountains, ancient stones, and other Celtic remains.

rived from the Romish church as it prevailed in a corrupted form in many of the later ballads.

"The Lord of Nann and the Fairy," one of the most ancient of the specimens, though recording a superstition ingrafted into the legendary remains of Sweden, Finland, and Ireland, and very similar to the tale of "Sir Olaf and the Elves," in the Danish tradition, exemplifying the fatal affection of a water nymph for a mortal lover, is described in the specimen before us with circumstances of increased interest and pathos :—

"THE LORD OF NANN AND THE FAIRY."

The Lord of Nann and his fair bride
 Wed young, were young when parted,
A fond and gentle dame was she,
 And he was gallant-hearted.
The lady bore two smiling twins,
 As white as virgin snow;
"What may you wish for your fair gift,
 Dear wife, I fain would know?"
"A woodcock from the vale afar,
 Or venison from the grove:
The last I like; yet go not there,
 Lest danger meet you, love!"
The Lord of Nann at danger smiled,
 He seized his lance of oak,
Upon his steed he sprang: his way
 Towards the grove he took.
There, 'neath the boughs, a milk-white deer,
 Shot through the forest brake;
He cried, pursuit! he rode so fast,
 The very earth did shake.
The dew upon his forehead stood,
 His horse's flanks were foam,
When suddenly the night closed in,
 And he was far from home.
He heard a little rustling brook,
 With velvet round its brink,
Dismounting by the soft green turf,
 He knelt him down to drink:
There sat the "Korrigan" alone—
 She parts her waving hair
With comb of gold. She smiles on him,
 And she is wondrous fair!
"You've drank, Sir Knight, my fountain's wave,
 A thing that few may dare;
Now you are mine, or else must pine,
 For seven long years away;
Now you are mine, or from this hour
 Shall count your dying day!"
"I am not your's—I ne'er will be,
 I have been wed a year;
I may not pine away nor die,
 Save when God's will appear."
The knight felt sick, the knight felt faint,
 As home he sought to ride:
"O, make my bed, my mother dear,
 Tell not my gentle bride;
Within three days I sleep in earth,
 'That false and fairy thing——"
He said no more. Within three days
 How slow those death-bells swing.
"Why toll those bells so solemn now?"
 His sweet wife asked awhile;
"Why chant those priests in vestments white,
 Adown the lone church aisle?"
"For some poor man," his mother said,
 "Who long had lodging here."
"For some poor man! O, when will he,
 My noble Lord, appear?"
"He's gone, my child, he'll soon return,
 His wife at least to view."
"O, mother, haste! to church we'll go,
 I'll wear my robe of blue!"
"Of blue, my child? the fashion's changed,
 We must wear black to-day."
"O, mother, dear! whose grave is that Yon new-turned sods display?"
"Alas! the truth 'twere vain to hide,
 From our own house went He!"
The poor young wife gave one low sob,
 And sank upon her knee:
One sob; she sleeps with him she loved.
 Ah! see, beside their grave,
Two fair young oaks aloft in air
 Their rustling branches wave;
Amid their boughs, two milk-white doves,
 In mercy surely given,
They sing from morn till set of sun,
 Then take their flight to heaven!

The belief in the existence of water-spirits prevailed extensively among the Teutonic and Celtic nations. The "Kelpie," or river-horse of Scotland, and the Demherst of Denmark, a steed which unless restrained by some pious exclamation, bears his rider into the sea, are exemplifications of this superstition. The Icelandic "Nikr," and the water-demon of the Scandinavian mythologies, nay, even the Scottish Kelpie, who is known by his neighing or "nicher," are nearly identical. Under the term "Nichus," Grimm mentions the Swedish "Stromkard," and the Norwegian "Fossegrim," but these appear in a human form like the Nick or Neck of Germany, and are fond of dancing and music. Kindred forms with the Kelpie are the "Shelley Colt," and the "Water Bull." The "Water Horse," of Shetland, is represented as a beautiful animal, which, when mounted, carries his rider into the waves. "The Water Shelley," of the Scottish coast, as described by Dalyell, is "a hairy monster, somewhat like a foal, but entirely covered with sea weed." "Le Lupin," of France, is a kindred superstition.

Merlin appears as the hero of many of these legends. He is invested with a wild unearthly power, a sort of loneliness and dreaminess, a potency strange, though ever in keeping with his half human, half demon, nature.

"The Changeling," "L'Enfant Supposée," is one of the most popular in this selection. The incident of the decrepit wayward little elf, deposited in the cradle of the mother's last born and most beloved child, who has been spirited away to fairy land, is a superstition deeply implanted in the popular belief. The peasants of Glamorganshire recount a similar tale, the charm for the expulsion of the changeling being suggested by a sorceress instead of the virgin. The Breton ballad, a translation of which we subjoin, is traced back by the Editor to a period previous to the separation of the insular and continental Bretons, which must have been as early as the seventh century.

"THE CHANGELING."

Sweet Mary bows her head and weeps, her little child is lost,
That fearful thing, the Korrigan, has o'er her threshold crossed;
She left her son and went to draw some water from the spring,
And in his cradle when returned, she found the elflike thing,
A monster with a toad frecked face, that scratched and restless stirred,
And munched and mumped, and stared at her, but never spoke a word;

Constant he sucked for seven long years; the brat she could not wean,
Then knelt sweet Mary in her tears, before heaven's gentle queen—
"O holy lady, on thy throne, as white as virgin snow,
With your sweet son within your arms, you ne'er may sorrow know,
Your blessed son, by angels served, and sheltered from all wrong,
O Queen of mercy! pity me, my grief is deep and strong."
"My daughter," breathed a murmur soft, "do not thus vainly mourn,
Your son, your little Laoik lives, and shortly shall return,
But you must feign to make a feast, your ten house servants seek,
In one egg shell to be served all, and then the elf will speak,
And when it speaks chastise it well, 'twill cry with wailings wild,
And those who brought it there will come, and fetch away their child."
The sweet voice ceased, the mother heard, and homeward gladly hied.
"Mamma! what's that you do, mamma?" the wondering creature cried,—
"A feast for my house servants ten, this egg-shell must provide,"— "For ten, mamma, within a shell? O, that can never be!
I've seen the egg before the bird; the bird so wild and free!
I've seen the acorn well matured, and I have seen the tree!
The acorn and the sapling too! the oak in forests green!
But such a thing as you prepare, mamma, was never seen."
"You've seen and know full many things, you've something else to tell,
With 'flip and flàp,' with 'flip and flàp,' I must chastise you well."
"O spare your hand! I will submit," then cried the elfin small,
"Within my country I'm a king, a king before them all!"
When Mary looked within the cot, where oft she turned to weep,
With its small arm above its head, she saw her infant sleep;
She kissed his brow, he gently smiled, his blue eyes opened clear,
His hand outstretched, he waked and cried, "Long slept I, mother dear!"

The "Submersion of the Town of Is" is a legend common to all Celtic nations, and is founded upon similar traditions to those which are localised in Wales, or which, in the Irish fairy tales, inspire visions, in which the peasant fancies he sees in Lough Neah, and other lakes, the towers and regal structures of a time of splendour long since departed. This, though but a fragment, is peculiarly wild and striking, and we give it in triplets, the metrical form of the original.

"THE SUBMERSION OF THE TOWN OF IS."

Hast heard, O Grandlon, King of Is,
Who said, "All love is bitter bliss,
All joy a pang as sharp as this?"

Who eats of fish, doth vainly sup,
By fish shall he be eaten up,
And wine hath poison in the cup!"

Then spake King Grandlon, "Guests, I go
To sleep awhile; but you, I know,
All watchful, will your rest forego."

Then soft, with honeyed words, drew near
The lover. Sweetly in her ear
He cried, "Dahù, my princess dear!
Get me the key—the fountains' key?"
"'Tis thine!" she said, "the unlocked sea, Wild as our revels then shall be!"

Ah now, there sleeps the king, his head
Is pillowed on his purple bed,
His white hair o'er his shoulders spread,

Around his neck, the key is there,
And chain of gold; ah, soft and fair,
She comes with feet and àncles bare.

He dreams, he mutters!—Ah, in vain,
She stoops, she takes the key and chain.
He sleeps! when will he wake again?

"Rise, rise, King Grandlon! wake and fly!
The fountains spring, the waves run high,
The sea rolls in, thy people die!

"O cursed be she, so fair, so young,
Who as the revels ceased upsprung,
And wide the ocean's portals flung!"

"Ah, who goes there, where waters sweep?
What steed comes foaming from the deep,
And springs o'er strand and rocky steep?"

"I see no steed; but I can tell,
'Trip trip,' 'trip trip,' 'trip trip,' too well—
Those voices of the ocean's swell!"

"O fisher! didst thou not behold
The sea-maid as the billows rolled,
Array her hair with comb of gold?"

"I saw the maid, her song was low,
And sad as ocean's softest flow,
A song of Fate, and coming woe!"

The remains of song connected with the deeds of Morvan, Vicomte de Leon, called otherwise "Lez Briez," celebrated in the ninth century, are somewhat similar, though comparatively scanty in incidents to those of the Cid, in the legendary poetry of Spain; but they are deficient in those higher attributes connected with the courtesy and peerless chivalry of the Gothic hero, which bestow so great a charm on that poetic narrative. The legends consist of five fragments; the first recounts the mysterious departure of the young boy from his mother: the second describes his return as a belted knight, when he finds no relative surviving in the old home, but his lovely and disconsolate sister, whom he had left as a helpless child. The remaining fragments, record his exploits, his sufferings, and his death. The disappearance of "Lez Briez" from the field of his last battle, where his followers bewail his loss, still hopeful of his return, recals not only the fate of Arthur, but the similar disappearance of Barbarossa in the German and the Sclavonic legends.

In the legend of "Heloise and Abelard," the fair nun of the Paraclete appears in a somewhat repulsive guise; divested of all lovely and attractive attributes, she becomes a sorceress, or second Canidia. There is a resemblance in this ballad to certain attributes assigned to Taliesin, the Druidic bard of the sixth century. The legendary Heloise and her lover reside near Nantes, a locality said to be haunted by wizards even down to the fourteenth century, and against whose practices the church constantly launched her excommunications. The ancient historians tell us also, that in the islands at the north of the Loire, the Druids, in the days of their supremacy, founded and long supported a college of priestesses,

"The Falcon," is a war-song, singularly illustrating the bitter hatred of the seignorial oppression, which, though often long restrained, bursts at last suddenly into flame and stimulates universal insurrection.

The "Foster Brother" and "Les Chants des Noces," illustrate various phases of the national manners and sentiments, while the "Three Red Monks," presents a bitter exposition of the popular indignation, and perhaps popular prejudice, against the priestly order of the Knights Templars.

The "Nightingale," in its humorous pathos, exhibits a trait rather unusual in these songs.

"THE NIGHTINGALE."

The young wife at the window now her sorrows murmurs o'er,
"Alas, alas, my nightingale! I ne'er shall hear thee more."
"O why, dear spouse," her husband said, "do you so often rise,
And leave me in the deep midnight, and breathe such heavy sighs,
Bare foot, bare head, at midnight hour, O why so often rise?"
"Leave you, dear husband, in the night! Ah, only 'tis to view
The vessels sailing to and fro, upon the ocean blue."
"The vessels sailing to and fro! for this you leave me, love?
'Tis for no vessel, any more than moon or stars above—
Madam, I ask, why quit my side?"—
"Your side! O 'tis to peep,
At our dear child, within his cot, and watch his tranquil sleep."
"At our dear child! These are but tales, more idle ne'er I heard."
"My little, deary husband, now, you're getting quite absurd.
I'll tell you—there's a nightingale, within your garden bower,
And O! so gaily sings he—thrills he, through the midnight hour,
So soft; the distant sea is lulled, I ne'er could miss his song,
So sweetly, wonderfully soft! and all the dear night long."
The aged husband mused at this—it seemed a curious tale—
"Now be it true, or false," he cried, "I'll catch that nightingale."
Then to his gardener hied, he said, "Of late, a foolish bird,
A nightingale, has been, each night, beneath my window heard,
I cannot rest, he must be caught—your fee shall be this gold."
The gardener heard: the snare was set, and truly be it told,
Before the dawn a nightingale was taken in the trap.—
Then loudly laughed the ancient knight, at such a lucky hap,
He killed the bird, and rudely cast it in his lady's lap.
"Ah, ah, my little, deary wife, we've got your friend at last,
I've ta'en some pains to please you now, so prithee, keep him fast."
"Alas, alas," then murmured one, to whom the rumour past,
"We're caught—my lady love and I—O, never more, 'tis plain, Beneath the moon, her nightingale may tell his grief again!"

In the more ancient ballad of "Les Nains," however, the hero, an unfortunate little tailor, is pursued by the fairies, whose treasures he had purloined, and the supernatural becomes strangely grotesque. It is like a French version of one of "Grimm's Tales." "Dear little tailor! only show us the tip of your dear little nose," exclaim the satirical imps as they pour into his house, through the windows, the boardings, and even through the tiles; while the thief vainly thinking to conceal both himself and his spoil, creeps under the bedclothes.

To some of the ballads in his collection M. de la Villèmarquè assigns an antiquity referring back to the tenth, seventh, and even sixth century of our era. One indeed he attributes to the end of the fourth or the commencement of the fifth century; it is called, "The Series," and embraces some of the leading tenets of the druidical creed. Although rude in its construction, it exhibits in the alternation or repetition of the progressive Series, a form of composition which certainly prevailed at a very early period of rhythmical literature. It were difficult, however, to conceive that an oral poem should have survived so many years through rude and barbarous times, when Brittany, and every country which spoke the Celtic tongue, must have been subjected to frequent revolutions. The poetic Edda, and some remains of the Irish and Welsh bards, are the only known specimens for which such high antiquity has been claimed among European literature, but even these venerable fragments must have seen many changes before they reached us in the present form.

Sir Walter Scott, in reference to ancient minstrelsy, has asserted, "That the popular singers resembled the Alchemists of old, who changed gold into lead, and purposely corrupted the verses of the author which they transmitted in their songs to posterity." M. de la Villèmarquè, on the contrary, opposes to this opinion the authority of M. Grimm, who says, "That a people have too much love for their popular poetry to permit it to be deteriorated." As some confirmation of the latter assertion, we cannot deny but that the specimens given by the Editor of the Breton ballads as the earliest, are also the best. Thus the "Lord of Nann and the Fairy," "The Submersion of the Town of Is," and "Merlin," bear marks of considerable antiquity, and whether they be the identical songs sung to their countrymen by the ancient bards of Brittany in the distant ages assigned them by the Editor, or are but the poetised legends of a more recent period, they are worthy of the attention of every lover of ballad minstrelsy.

We are, however, scarcely capable, under the altered circumstances in which, through the means of printing, literature is now imparted to us, of forming an adequate idea of the fidelity with which the productions of the bards and rhapsodists might be transmitted orally from age to age. The mind, for vigour of intellect and the display of intellectual capabilities, had its examples in every age. The memory is a faculty which by cultivation may be almost indefinitely enlarged, and it naturally would be so among an intelligent people, who had few other means of publishing to the world and to posterity, the works of their most cherished sons of genius. Hence we find in ancient history many allusions to the cultivation of this power. The Saxon Wilfrid, we are informed, while a youth in the convent of Lindisfarne, could recite the whole book of Psalms, and Alfred was made at an early age to commit to memory the poetry of his country; while we have it in evidence that even in the twelfth century, when the literature of the Anglo-Saxons was rapidly falling into neglect, many political songs and poems of all ages, and even some verses composed by Aldhelm, four centuries previous, were still preserved in the memories of the people.

Many of the songs in the specimens before us, are found to possess a mournful character, the earliest, however, are mythological and heroic; while the majority of the more modern ones record the exploits of personal heroes, such as "Jeanne de Montfort," "Du Gueslin," and "Jean le Conquerant." There are also religious pieces, and fragments connected with popular superstitions, mingled with stories of domestic interest and affections.

We must find room here for "Jeanne La Flamme," or "De Montfort," one of the most spirited chansons in the collection.

"JEANNE LA FLAMME."

Black flocks of sheep, behold they climb
The mountain steep afar!
No flocks of sheep, but horse and men,
And all the pomp of war!

The Franks, they march to Hennebont,
To assail its lofty walls;
Then Jeanne La Flamme, the Duchess bold,
Upon her people calls;
And while each bell peals loud and long,
Around the town rides she
On her white steed, her little son
Before her on her knee.
Fierce in response, her subjects shout,
Of every age and rank,
"God save the mother and her son!
Perdition to the Frank!"

But hark! the answering yell without,—
"Ere ruddy day shall dawn,
We'll trap the white Hart in our lair,
The mother and her fawn;
We've chains of gold to bind them fast,
Such chains are rarely rent!"
Then back, bold Jeanne, from her high tower,
Their shouts all scornful sent:

"'Tis not the Hart that shall be ta'en,
But Wolf with crimson feet;
Though cold his den to-night, ere morn
'Twill glow with ruddy heat!"
Then furious plunged she 'mid her friends,
Armed with a gleaming brand;
With helm of steel upon her head,
She leads a trusty band.
A torch she lit, and furious sped,
What foe might her withstand!

The Franks, all unsuspecting, feast,
In revels deep they share,
Within their tents they sang of love,
And pleasures passing fair;
When hark! they heard a song so wild
That each one started there!

"Who laughs this night, shall, long ere morn,
His mirth untimely rue;
Who eats white bread, ere break of day,
The cold, black earth shall chew!
Though red may be the wine he pours,
There's a ruddier liquor still,
And pale shall be the boasters yet,
Though high their cups they fill,
And deadlier means than wine itself,
Their senses drown and kill!"

Away! what cry was that, what shout?
That fire! that fearful light?
'Tis Jeanne La Flamme comes thundering down,
Through darkness and the night.
A roaring wind sweeps through the camp,
With terror and amaze,
Yes, torch in hand, 'tis Jeanne La Flamme,
And all their tents ablaze:
Yes, all their tents are blazing wide,
She grills the Frenchman well,
Of full three thousand, scarcely ten
Escape their loss to tell.

Then loudly laughed bold Jeanne La Flamme,
As, from her casement high,
She saw the foe, and smouldering tents,
In ashes round her lie,
Loud laughed, "By Heaven, a harvest good
For one grain ten I spy;
There's nothing yet, as legends say,
That half such produce yields,
As when the bones of Frankish-men
Manure our Breton fields!"

A few of the specimens, both of an early age and of a comparatively modern one, are interwoven with the fairy machinery, a superstition widely rooted in the belief of the Celtic nations. Thus we recognise the "Clauricane" of Ireland in the "Korrigan" of Brittany; the latter word being compounded of two Celtic terms, "Gan" or "Gwen," "Korr," or "Korrig," which united gives "Korrigan," or "Korrigwen." The Persian word "Ginn," and the Latin "Genius," are almost synonymous.

Since the sixteenth century, at least, Brittany has been said to have produced neither orators nor philosophers, nay, not even poetry itself in the strictest acceptation of the term, except what was circulated at the fêtes and village gatherings, by the popular minstrel. This might be owing to the isolated position of the province itself, a position in some degree perpetuated by the distaste and contempt expressed by foreign nations for the inhabitants of this country. On the other hand, the Breton has ever exhibited an attachment to his national customs, language, and opinions, which has combined to separate him from the rest of the world, and in some degree from its progress and civilization. So, likewise, has it been with the Welsh, the Irish, and the Gael. Yet a deep poetical temperament has always characterised the Celtic nations; and the earliest wanderers of the world, perhaps, have exhibited the strongest love of country, and the most romantic attachments to certain localities. So also, in Armorica, much of the primitive respect for the minstrel is still retained, and the itinerant poet or singer is sure to find a welcome nook, knock when he will, at the door of the chateau, the grange, or the cottage. Here, after receiving such refreshment as the means of his host can supply, he is provided with a seat by the hearth in winter, and by the porch or on the green-sward in summer, where he repeats to the delighted circle around him, the songs in his collection; or should he be an original composer, recites some new lay in commemoration of such stirring events as may be still fresh in the memories of his auditors.

At the fairs, "The Pardons," or religious fêtes, at "The Linières," assemblies where the flax is spun; at baptisms, funerals, or at marriage feasts, the services of the bard are still in request. Song in Brittany, as once among the older northern nations, still welcomes the young child into the world, follows him in every memorable step he takes through life, and leaves him not till it has deposited a garland on his grave.

The manner, however, in which these songs are recited is peculiar, and indicates the simple tastes, and perhaps somewhat dull perceptions, of a comparatively uneducated people. There is repetition not only in the substance but in the method of the delivery. Thus the second line is often repeated, and then the third taken up. The fourth undergoes the same process, until the subject is well impressed upon the perceptions of the auditor, and the sense thoroughly acquired before the attention is directed to a new object.

In the specimens which we have given of the Breton national poetry, we have endeavoured to afford as much variety as possible. One of the most curious, "Merlin the Bard," we regret to be obliged to omit, owing to its length; whilst we can only allude in passing to many characteristic songs, illustrative of national manners and sentiments, such as, "The Marriage Girdle," "The Leper," and others. Of "The Demand," a piece illustrative of the peculiarities of Breton courtship among the peasantry, we must afford a short description.

The village tailor performs in Brittany a most important part; and as he is generally the poet, so is he frequently selected as the negotiator of the rustic marriages of the district. When the preliminaries have been arranged, the tailor, then called the "Baz-valan," or "messenger of love," from the young man to his fiancée, proceeds to the residence of the parents of the latter, bearing with him a branch of broom in his hand, as a symbol characteristic of his mission. Here he is introduced to the Brentaer, or advocate or defender on the part of the young girl, whose duty it is to baffle the importunity of the lover's missionary as long as possible. The Baz-valan, after the usual courtesies of greeting, replies to the Brentaer, respecting the purpose of his visit, and informs him that, "a certain pigeon and a beautiful white dove were wont to consort together, but that the latter having been scared away by a sparrow-hawk, he is now seeking for her in every direction." The Brentaer replies, "that he has seen neither dove nor pigeon."

"Young man, you lie," responds the Baz-valan, rather unceremoniously; "our people beheld the white dove in her flight descend into your very orchard."

The Brentaer still denies all knowledge of the lost one; upon which the messenger of the young man declares "that his pigeon will surely die, and that he must depart to seek the dove elsewhere." "Stop, friend," the other replies, "I will go and search the house; perhaps I may find your white dove."

He retires, and shortly returns with a little girl. "No, no, that is not my dove—yet, charming little flower, if my pigeon were a drop of dew he would descend upon thee!" then, after a pause, he adds, "I shall ascend to your granary, perhaps she has entered it in her flight."

"Wait a while, friend," says the Brentaer, and retiring he again returns with the mistress of the house. "I have been into the granary," he cries, "I could not find your dove, only this ear of corn, abandoned by the harvesters." "As many grains as has the ear of corn," replies the young man's advocate, "so should my white dove when seated in her nest, have of little ones under her wings." Again the Brentaer departs; he returns with the grandmother.

"I cannot find your dove," he says, "but I have found an over-ripe apple; an apple wrinkled by the sun and the wind, that has hung a long time on the tree among the leaves; put it into your pocket and give it to your pigeon to eat, and he will mourn no more."

"I want not your ear of corn, nor your wrinkled apple, but my little dove, and seek her I will."

"Good heavens! have patience, friend," replies the young lady's advocate, "your little dove is not lost; she is well taken care of in my chamber, in cage of ivory, with bars of gold and silver; so gay, so sweet, so beautiful, my little dove!"

At length after this awful delay the fair betrothed is produced. The father of the family also makes his appearance, and brings a horse's girth; while he fastens this rude appendage, the Brentaer sings an appropriate but by no means delicate song.

Other ceremonies and songs follow, and it is long after the marriage is concluded before the exactions on the wedded pair cease. In parts of Brittany, in Leon, for example, the bride and the bridegroom are the subjects of the "fête of the cupboard," a piece of furniture of that description being presented to them as a bridal gift. It is commonly made of walnut-tree, highly polished and ornamented. Decorated with garlands, it is conveyed to the house of the newly-married pair, in a car drawn by horses, whose manes and tails are adorned with glittering ribbons. The mistress of the house covers the cupboard with a linen cloth, upon which she places two piles of pancakes, a jug of wine, and a drinking cup. The oldest member of the family of the husband fills the cup and presents it to the eldest of the parents of his bride. After still further ceremonies, all present partake of the wine and eatables, and the cupboard, amid the cheers of the assembled guests, is placed in the most conspicuous situation in the mansion. The day after the marriage the poor of the parish, or rather the mendicants, wait upon the bride and bridegroom, and divide the remnants of the marriage feast. The young wife with her petticoats tucked up attends upon the females, and her husband upon the male portion of their guests. At the conclusion of the repast the husband offers his arm to the most respectable of the women, and his wife following his example gives her hand to the best dressed beggar, and the entertainment ends with a dance and a song. The latter, "Le Chant des Pauvres," is addressed for the most part in praise of the newly constituted mistress of the house, who is extolled as the most beautiful creature in the parish: "as amiable as pretty, with feet light as those of the fawn, and eyes bright as two drops of dew."

The Breton minstrel, like the lyric poet of old, attends these meetings, and frequently accompanies his songs with music; the rote or rebek, an instrument with three strings, and somewhat similar to the violin, being in most general use for that purpose. The rote or rebek is very similar, perhaps identical, with that denominated the crout or chrotta of the Cambro-British bards. The Abbè Gerbert gives a description of one in the second volume of his "Histoire de la Musique Sacrée." In a MS. of the eleventh century, given in the third volume of the "Archæologia," there is a drawing of a crout of six strings. It is an instrument composed of an oblong sonorous box, having the key-board in the middle. In another MS. of the same era, is a figure of an instrument consisting of three strings, performed upon with a bow. Brittany has likewise a native music, which, however, indicates no very marked character, its chief attraction being a certain soft plaintiveness, that speaks the language more of dejection than of hope, and, perhaps, dimly outshadows the fortunes of a people often oppressed for a long series of years, and scarcely ever long in the enjoyment of either tranquillity or independence.

One of the most striking characteristics of the Breton people is, the fidelity with which the inhabitants of the various districts adhere to their peculiar costume. At their grand fêtes or festivals, where many assemble from distant provinces, the varieties of vestment and appearance afford a pleasing sight and awaken various emotions. M. de la Villèmarquè has thus sketched their peculiarities. He is describing a religious fête:—

"At the commencement of vespers, the procession sets out. The pilgrims range according to dialects: the peasant of Leon is recognised by his superior stature, his vestments of black, green, or brown, his legs being naked and tawny hued. The Tregorais, whose garments exhibit nothing peculiar, are famed above all for their musical voices; the Cornouaillais, for the richness and elegance of their blue or violet-coloured dress, which is ornamented with lace; likewise, for their wide-swelling trousers, and floating hair. The Vannetais, on the contrary, are remarkable for the sombre colour of their garments; while from the calm yet cold expression of their countenances, we should never divine that Cæsar and the revolutionary armies had ever sought in vain to break the courage and energy of their spirits.

"Thus do we continually err, when we judge from mere appearances. 'Frames of iron, hearts of steel,' said Napoleon, in speaking of these men. There is no doubt that the peculiar character, the uncouth manners, the isolated position of the Bretons, and their scorn of, and peculiar distaste for, the foreigner and the stranger, fostered a spirit of rude independence, when other nations, comparatively civilized, were held in bondage; and thus too does ballad minstrelsy and song seem peculiarly adapted to express the simple wants and feelings of man, and the deep attachment of ancient tribes to the manners and customs of their forefathers. Hence, communities living in mountainous districts and isolated localities possess generally the most romantic literature; and carefully avoiding contact with other nations preserve longest their independence, for, in reference to Lower Brittany, it has been distinctly proved, that at a period when the feudal law oppressed the most powerful nations of Europe, there was no such thing as a serf, either in name or substance, known among the commonalty."

GOSSIP ON NEWSPAPERS, CRITICISM, AND THE FREE LIST.

Criticism has undergone a change since Samuel Johnson wrote literary notices in the "Gentleman's Magazine," and Oliver Goldsmith or poor Ned Purdon wrote petty critiques in the "Ledger," or more effeminate "Lady's Magazine." Then they praised or condemned a work, say Bryant's "System of Ancient Mythology," in three words—"Learned, critical, and ingenious;" or Harrington's "Science Improved"—"Crude, obscure, and bombastic;" and there could be no mistaking the critical imprimatur or veto. Strutt's "Legal Antiquities," a most important work, is "Curious, useful, and pleasing;" and a work on dancing, is "Apt, concise, and sufficient." Critics, in fact, Johnsonian, without authority, and dogmatic without judgment, seemed to rely upon three smart words; other "Elements of Criticism" than those insisted upon by Lord Kames.

If the critics were a thought too arbitrary on books, what were they upon pictures, and on the theatres? One bold spirit pronounces on a picture these memorable words, which we assure the reader are extracted from his paper:—"A h——h bad subject and d——d bad painted;" and from Hogarth to Richard Wilson, our painters suffered from such pretenders. But the theatre was the glory of the critic; there was his throne—

Hic illius arma—hic currus fuit.

One has only to read a paper or so in the "Spectator," or a prologue or two of Harry Fielding's, written before he was the great author which "Tom Jones" made him, and he will realise the prodigious power the critic had there. There was but one "Volunteer Laureate." Savage had the boldness to grasp that title, a title of his own invention, and to which, such as it was, he had best right; but there were thousands of volunteer critics, as needs must be, when the theatre was the lounging-place of the young men of the day, and the art of the player formed so large and so universal a topic of conversation. In Fielding's farce of the "Temple Beau," and in a dozen others beside, we shall find his character sketched to the life. If a "mob of gentlemen" of the time "wrote with ease," some noun of multitude, ten times as numerous as a mob, ought to be applied to the shoal of very flat fish who criticised with fluency. Sometimes these critics had weight with them. We all recollect Goldsmith's story of the poor player, whom a London lady, who had seen Mr. Garrick, entirely snuffed out in a country town, by utterly ignoring altogether; "the whole audience had"—of course they had—"their eyes upon the lady who had been nine months in London; from her they expected the decision which was to secure the General's truncheon in my hands, or sink me down to a theatrical letter carrier. . . . . The lady came to be displeased," says the unhappy narrator, "and displeased she was; my fame expired."

Yes, an adverse breath could sometimes extinguish, and a favourable puff, (the word rises naturally,) could fan a flame to power and duration; and the actors seem early to have been aware of this. Hence they tried, when the theatre began to tire and to pall upon men's appetites, and even before that, to get their own little band of critics—claqueurs, who would lead the unready, or who would frown down the incipient hiss; and if so that any critic of such stamp had some weight in a coffee-house circle, or elsewhere, they wished to have him ready to perform his part. Success lay not only behind but before the curtain; and a free admission was forwarded to that critic and his friends. Hence arose the Free List; and as papers arose in importance, and were a means of advertising the pieces as well as vehicles of criticism, free admissions were forwarded to them, but not, it would seem, till some time afterwards, there being so early as the time we are writing of, scarcely any regular critics, and the notices mainly depending upon the casual correspondents, who wrote under the name of Philo-Dramaticus, Censor, Bickerstaff, Scenicus, or other names equally fanciful and ingenious.

This arrangement of free admissions, then, it must be confessed, was one of mutual obligation. The critic saw the play for nothing, and, in return, it must be said, generally praised it; the newspaper which published the critique obtained by it theatrical readers, and, of course, those subscribers whose tastes lay that way; but, in accepting the free list, the critic laid himself, so most will think, under some sort of obligation; he could scarcely abuse the house which gave him entertainment. The majority of critics were and are dramatic authors, and the truth was but too often untold; so to the public an evil arose, which is only to-day about to be done away.

Mr. Charles Mathews, who keeps an open house of entertainment at the Lyceum Theatre, where pieces of very unquestionable French origin and of very questionable morality are acted, found, like his brother lessees, that the legacy of the free lists had descended to him. Indeed, this free admission had in time become a property of the papers, was advertised as a property, looked upon as a very saleable commodity, and by some as one of the great advantages of newspaper proprietorship. Small theatrical papers were established expressly for the purpose of the free admission, and this admission extending only to the boxes, a portion of the theatre the least full, and the least likely to fill, few of the lessees complained against it. The press was wooed, in the first instance, into the theatre, when that wanted popularity and advertising; and these freely-granted admissions at last got abused. What editor has enough friends to send "two" per night (his right or complement) to every theatre and public exhibition in London? Surely none. And so the proprietors, soon possibly getting tired themselves, used the papers for a profitable purpose and as an inducement to advertisers. The more popular the theatre, and the sooner filled, the greater the inducement. Mr. Mathews' pieces being of a sort to please the aristocracy, his house filled, and he wanted space. So did the entertainment of Mr. Albert Smith; and both gentlemen took steps to relieve themselves. Mr. Smith sketches his situation so well that we will let him speak first, especially as he describes the process of order-giving, which will soon pass into history.

> Were the whole of the newspapers claiming a right to admission to send in their orders early in the evening, they would monopolise every seat. . . . . Of the holders of these admissions, it is fair to assume that not one in a dozen is, in the slightest degree, connected with either the editorial, critical, or general literary department of the paper. In fact, the chief cause of this determination on my part to stop for the future all press orders, is found in the fact that a few evenings since, I know, upon excellent authority, a newspaper admission, admitting the usual two to my room, was sold for a shilling to an acquaintance of one of the people I employ about the building. Again, the lower the standard of the paper, and the smaller its circulation, the more plentifully are its orders distributed. Connected myself with the press for some time, I also know that these orders are frequently used as baits for wavering advertisers. For example: the proprietor of a new poncho, or shirt, or sauce, is applied to for one or more insertions. Now, the spirited discoverers or inventors of these articles know perfectly well which papers have the greatest influence, and do not require to be told that such and such a print "from its large circulation amongst all classes of society offers a desirable medium for advertisements;" and therefore they hesitate in spending their money on a questionable return. But the agent says, "Oh, come; give us the advertisement, and here is an order for the Holy Land, or the Adelphi," (as the case may be,) and the consequence is, that instead of the intelligent critic, who is supposed to represent the paper, with his friend, the two seats are occupied with the poncho, the shirt, or the sauce, who has just as much a right to pay as any of the public.

There is no disputing the truth of this; and therefore the respectable papers are as anxious as

Mr. Smith to put an end to the nuisance. Let it be further understood, that the higher-class papers, the Times, the Athenæum, the Literary Gazette, &c., had not sent in to Mr. Smith's exhibition one single order. Mr. Smith determined to put a stop to the press orders, and therefore addressed to the various papers the circular which we have, in part, quoted above; and the manner in which he did it was manly and honest. Mr. Charles James Mathews proceeded in a different manner; and, the least we can say is, that his manner is directly opposed to Mr. Smith's in every possible way.

In the first place Mr. Mathews having produced a new piece for the Christmas holidays, was anxious to have it praised loudly in every paper, so that he should draw good houses. The desire was natural enough, and the critics one and all came. It is but fair to say, that all save one spoke good-naturedly of Mr. Mathews' pieces; but that one, a gentleman attached to the Morning Chronicle, chose to declare that the burlesque was by no means brilliant, the singing vapid and nonsensical, and one of the afterpieces, a production of, we beg pardon, a translation by Mr. Mathews himself, was "rickety." This term appears to have given mortal offence to the tetchy translator; he immediately set down the authorship of the critique to Angus Reach, cut that gentleman from the free list, and denied to the Morning Chronicle the privilege of sending in two orders per night. More than this, he reprinted the critique, with furious remarks of his own on the side of the play bill, and ended by calling the press orders an "ill-requited privilege;" the plain construction of which words was that if any critic was allowed to go into the house, he was expected to praise the pieces there represented. Anything more base or degrading for the literary man than such a position, can scarcely be conceived. But managers act frequently thus. A few seasons ago Jules Janin was struck off the free list by a Parisian stage autocrat, but his brother critics resented the affront by not noticing the theatre, and the manager soon was obliged to "sing small." What would Mr. Mathews say if the press universally refused his advertisements, and ignored his theatre? Such a proceeding would be no worse than that of reckoning a critic at 10*s*. per night, and declaring that since he has had the theatre he has lost £25,000 by orders being admitted. Both the Times and Athenæum have placed his behaviour in the true light; and the quarrel is a very pretty one as it stands. But such as it is, it is a marked step in the history of the drama. Critiques will possibly be a little more outspoken, when the orders are abolished, and the drama itself will be benefited thereby. Already one paper has answered a circular sent by Mr. Mathews by a declaration that it will not any more send in orders, and no doubt others will follow. And the review system will be perhaps remodelled, a very desirable thing, when pet critics have pet theatres, and never abuse anything which comes out at their house.

Coming back to where we began, with the books, it is no doubt desirable to reform that system also; but it has its benefits as well as its evils. To send books to be reviewed, perhaps some two hundred of expensive magazines, a copy monthly, to various country newspapers, is a heavy tax upon the publishers, which is hardly compensated for by the critical notices which those papers make. Yet the proprietors of papers cannot well be expected to purchase all the new works which come out; and, on the other hand, the publicity is really worth something: but unfortunately with the great majority of these papers, the reviewers show little if any more judgment and appreciation than the old reviewers quoted above. All sorts of books are "sincerely recommended;" and there is hardly one of a hundred but which "nobody should be without."

> "It is an easy thing to praise or blame,
> The hard task and the virtue to do both,"

says the poet, and very wisely too; but when these do both, they, of course, do it not judiciously; the blame comes en masse, like a charge of Ney's horsemen, and then the praise bursts on one like a shower-bath; an excellent arrangement for the enterprising publisher, who extracts the praise and not the blame, by which the public suffers. Macaulay's review of Gladstone's "Church and State," contains a specimen of this kind of reviewing, which any dishonest person might lay hold of. Macaulay declares, "that it abounds in eloquent and ingenious passages. It bears the signs of much patient thought. It is written throughout with excellent taste and excellent temper, nor does it contain one expression unworthy of a gentleman, a scholar, and a Christian." Now comes the contra. "The doctrines put forward in it are in the highest degree pernicious; and, if followed out in practice, would inevitably lead to the dissolution of society."

Let the publisher, in his advertisement, quote the former, and who would not buy the book?—the latter, and who would?

The remedy is not very hard of suggestion; but if Macaulay can be quoted, how many nameless reviewers can also be brought to the bar? One certain remedy for the public is, to buy and read and judge for themselves. There is reason to expect, that the exposure of the free-list system may benefit the drama through the agency of unvenial criticism; and perhaps, some reform in the matter of books may follow.

Let it be also understood that many, very many, papers and reviews of high class, are not included in these strictures on that sheet

> Which not e'en critics criticise.

THE GOVERNMENTS OF CONTINENTAL EUROPE.

XI. FRANCE.

Those statesmen, or rather those men who fancy themselves statesmen, and whose erroneous conceptions lead them to dupe others into the belief that the French people are capable of enduring a republican form of government, have not profited by the history of mankind, and especially the history of France. Can any sagacious man expect that a great people, whose traditions are all blended, and whose history records little that is not connected with feudal, military, and ecclesiastical grandeur—with the magnificence of courts,—the pomp of an hierarchical church,—the attractions of the drama, and the splendour of public spectacles, should ever live practically in a state of liberty, equality, and fraternity? From the period, during the reigns of Charles VII. and Louis XI., when the feudal power was nearly destroyed and a standing army instituted, an absolute monarchy seems to have been the government most congenial to the French nation. Since the reign of Francis I., who may be considered the founder of learning, arts, and science in France, no other country has produced men more distinguished in jurisprudence, in erudition, in science, art, and war; nor is there any other people who more thoroughly constitute one nation than the French, notwithstanding the original diversity of races, disastrous changes, civil wars and revolutions, which are so eventful in their history. Monarchical absolutism attained its maximum power and tyranny under Richelieu and Louis XIV.; it advanced, if possible, in corruption, immorality, and injustice under Louis XV. With those defects and the agency of internal disturbances and convulsions, occasioned by profligate expenditure and excessive taxation, the power to maintain tyranny began to exhibit symptoms of decay. The aristocracy and clergy were not taxed; the revenue was extorted from the low people (bas peuple), as all who were not noble nor clerical were ignominiously termed. As supplicants the "low people," it is true, were admitted into the States-General as the Tiers Etat, to be taxed on their knees, in mercy and in pity. Louis XIV., in his riding-boots and whip in hand, declared en cavalier, that he would have no such miserable assemblies as parliaments. From that moment he reigned alone. "I am the State!" said he, (L'Etat c'est moi.) The whole world was dazzled by the fame of his campaigns, the magnificence of his palaces, the gorgeousness of his retinues, and by the literature, arts, and sciences of the age to which he gave a name. But the consequences were fatal to his race and to his dynasty.

Some twenty years ago, while in Paris, the writer of this article was astonished at the variety of French coins he received when changing a note or English gold; and on one occasion, made the following memoranda of a conversation with a money-changer:—

On changing a five pound Bank of England note for me, M. B—— counted over various pieces of money, coined at different times during the last fifty years.

"You have here," said he, "a key to French history in its most eventful periods."

"Are they medals?" I asked.

"You may consider them as such," he replied; "and I sometimes amuse myself by taking whatever loose money I may chance to have in my purse, and by making each piece an index to the history of the time in which it was coined, it refreshes my recollection of all the good and bad deeds of that period.

"Here," continued he, "is a piece coined in 1785; it has on one side the head of Louis XVI., with the inscription, Ludov. XVI., D. Gratia. On the other are the Fleur de Lis and crown of France, with the inscription on the reverse continued, Franciæ et Navarr. Rex. At this period, the nobility and clergy alone were privileged from paying taxes; but even they, through a court favourite, might send, by lettre de cachét, each other, in jealousy or hatred, to the Bastille or Vincennes, or any other prison, never to be again heard of. At this very time, Mirabeau was in the donjon of Vincennes, merely to satisfy a father's anger. Yes, during the mild days of Louis XV. and XVI. more than 30,000 persons were immured by lettres de cachét for private nameless offences, not known to those arrested; but such as withholding a wife, a daughter, or sister, from the embraces of a man of rank, or even for having received favours from a previous minister.

"After this period, Turgot might have saved the monarchy and possibly France. The nobles and the clergy, because he would not countenance corrupt expenditure, drove him from the administration of the finances. Disorder followed, and Necker, who was called in, persuaded the king that nothing would save him and his kingdom except justice in taxing the people, and economy in the expenditure. He, also, was disgraced. A fatality hung over the king, queen, the nobles, and the church, and they seemed to resolve that no one should save them from their perils, until the revolution delivered them in its own stern and terrible way.

"The next piece has the date of 1792, the head of Louis, and the inscription Louis XVI. Roi des Francois, is on one side. On the other, the bloody cap of liberty, the revolutionary wreath, and the inscription, La Nation—La Loi—Le Roi, An 4 de la Liberté.

"This piece is base coin, it is still known, though current, as la vilaine monnaie de la Revolution. It has little silver in it, and consists chiefly of a portion of the bells of Notre Dame, St. Denis, and other churches, melted down on the eve of the most violent transition that Europe has witnessed.

"But the third piece tells the terrible story more fully. In place of the head of Louis, it has a plain field, with the inscription, République Francais l'an 2, on one side, and on the reverse are, the wreath, the bloody cap, the scales of (in)justice, and the inscription Liberté, Egalité. It was coined in 1794, and reveals to us that between the coining of this and the last piece there were slaughtered by the guillotine, or drowned in boats-full, Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, and thousands and tens of thousands of the good and bad at Paris, Lyons, Nantes, and all parts of France. Yes, this piece of metal reminds us of the harangues of the revolutionary demons and of the eloquence of the good men who also perished, of the processions to Versailles and to St. Denis, of the mob disentombing and scattering the dust of their long line of kings to the winds of the earth, of making a foot-ball of the skull of Henry the Great, and actually beating the drum with the shin-bones of Louis XIV.

"The fourth coin bears a date nine years later. On the one side it retains the wreath, and the inscription, République Francais, added to which are, 5 francs and L'an 11. On the reverse stand three figures, representing the inscription underneath, Union et Force. Round the rim are the words Garantie Nationale. At this period the revolutionary atrocities, liberty, and equality, had submitted quietly to military despotism. Yes! this coin affords admirable instruction to those who make revolutions.

"The fifth piece of silver has on the one side the head of Napoleon, surrounded by the inscription, Bonaparte Premier Consul. On the reverse is the well-known wreath, within which are the words 5 francs, and around which are the words République de la France. The nation in that year willingly submitted to a dictator.

"The sixth piece," continued M. B——, "bears the same date as the last, and only differs in having two words instead of three which appear on the other. The two words are, Napoleon Empereur, on the side opposite to that on which still appears République Francais! The nation having, in the course of a few months, submitted to absolute monarchy!

"The seventh piece was coined the following year. The only change is, adjusting the date and transforming one word—République! become of cobweb importance, into one of stern iron authority —Empire.

"Here," continued he, "is a little piece that tells great things. It has on it the head of Napoleon, surrounded with, Napoleon Imperatore e re 1812. On the reverse you behold the crown of Charlemagne, and Regno D'Italia, 10 Soldi. How much does this bit of silver tell! But the following tells more.

"It does not represent the head of a Napoleon, but that of a Bourbon, with the inscription, Louis XVIII. Roi de France, and on the reverse are the fleurs-de-lis, the ancient arms of France; Pièce de cinq francs; and on the rim, Domine Salvum fac Regem. The date is 1814.

"In 1815 the coins of France have two impressions, each bearing the same year's date. This is like that of the early part of the previous year. It has on it the imperial inscriptions, Napoleon's profile, and 1815.

"The other has also 1815, but another head, that of Louis, and the armorial bearings and mottoes of the Restoration. For eleven years there is no further change in the coinage of France.

"In 1826, as appears by this coin, the head of Louis is replaced by that of Charles X. This alteration was not then important.

"But in 1830," concluded M. B——, "we have again two coinages, that of the Bourbons, with the profile of Charles; and that of the second revolution, with the wreaths and all the inscriptions and impressions of 1813, excepting the word empire, and a head very different in outline from Napoleon's, and also the words Louis Philippe Roi des Français.

"In 1833 the coins of France and Belgium are the same; for, look at this piece, and what has it on it?"

I replied, "It has on it certainly not the head of William of Nassau, but that of another Prince also of Germanic race, as appears by the words Leopold Premier Roi des Belges; and it has on the reverse and on the rim exactly the same impressions, one word only excepted, as that of France, the wreath, 5 francs, and Dieu protège la Belgique."

"What think you," said M. B——, "of the philosophy of the fifteen coins?"

"That useful instruction is to be gained from them by private persons; and that from such study kings and ministers may learn wisdom."

What changes are next in the volume of destiny for France God alone can tell; and M. B——'s directing my attention to her coins, has certainly not impressed me with a stronger confidence in the stability of her present administration.

For eighteen years Louis Philippe reigned as king of the French, although his life had frequently been attempted by assassins during that period. Had he permitted gradual reforms it is believed that he might have died king at home in peace. The elective franchise was so limited in its basis that the patronage of the minister of the interior could always command a majority of deputies at the election. Reform was demanded, but, infected with the curse of his race, Louis Philippe refused to concede the just rights of the people. The liberty of the press had been destroyed for fourteen years; public deliberation was declared illegal; arrests, imprisonments, fines for political accusations had been frequent during the whole reign of the Citizen King. There never was a Habeas Corpus Act in France, and punishments were inflicted by long imprisonments without trial whenever it was believed that the tribunals would not condemn the accused. Instead of resorting to those tribunals, the Procureur General transferred the trial of the editors of the press and other persons charged with political offences to the Chamber of Peers: to that Court which Armand Carrel, in its presence, characterized as the judicial assassins of Marshal Ney. The representation of the people was a mockery; and the dictum of Chatham, that "taxation without representation is tyranny," could be applied to no country more appropriately than to France. The expulsion of the royal family, and the revolution of February 1848 were the consequences. Universal suffrage was then established. A republic was declared: the palaces and all the public edifices were seized as public property, and the words, Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité, were inscribed on every public office, and on every national building. There is much credit due to Lamartine, and afterwards to General Cavaignac and others, for the order which they preserved, until by universal suffrage Louis Napoleon, the nephew of the Emperor, was elected President of the French Republic, under a constitution which he swore to maintain, and which still retained the motto, Liberté, Egalité, and Fraternité. The new coinage bore these words as the motto. Some little time after a nobleman, who was a member of the Chamber of Peers under Louis Philippe observed to us, "Nous avons Liberté de mal faire — Egalité dans la misère,—Fraternité comme Cain et son frère."— We have liberty to do wrong, equality in misery, and fraternity like Cain and his brother! Paris, it is true, was then tranquil, the city bristled in every street with bayonets, and in many places there were pieces of artillery loaded with grape-shot. The deliberations of the National Assembly itself, which included numerous Socialists and men of the Mountain, were guarded by an enormous military force. That Assembly were resolved to put an end to the Presidency of Louis Napoleon. But he anticipated them on the 2nd December, 1851, by a coup d'état, contrived with a secrecy and executed with such vigour and success, as would not have been surpassed by his renowned uncle. The constitution was abolished; every vestige of the republic was extirpated; military force enabled Louis Napoleon to prostrate all the civil, political, and religious liberties of the nation, and by the agency of the priesthood and the ignorance of those who are invested with universal suffrage, he has ascended the throne of France, as Emperor, with as much power, splendour, and ceremony, as was ever manifested by Louis XIV., or Napoleon the First. Let it not be forgotten, that the Pope and the priesthood have sanctified the subversion of all liberty in France.

A sham constitutional government, but in reality without any legislative power, has been substituted for the national assembly. The liberty of the press, liberty of speech, freedom of deliberation no longer exist. Instead of a constitution, and in place of political, civil, and religious liberty, there are an Emperor, a Senate, and the formidable power of an Ecclesiastical Hierarchy re-established. When we consider the education, or rather, the want of education,—the employments, the habits and character of the great majority of the French people, we are hardly surprised that they consider themselves happier under an absolute imperial government, than under a liberal constitutional monarchy; and, with the influence of the Catholic priesthood, and the power of the Romish hierarchy, we are not astonished that instead of maintaining a republic they have re-established the Empire. Considering the manifestations made by the National Assembly, it would appear, that had they succeeded against the President, France again would, throughout the length and breadth of the land, have been subjected to the calamities of civil war, to the interruption of all agricultural and manufacturing industry, commerce, and navigation, until Changarnier, or some other military leader would have succeeded in establishing a military despotism, which would probably terminate in a breach of the peace between France and neighbouring nations. Unjustifiable, therefore, as the coup d'état must ever be considered, it has, no doubt, for a time at least, saved France from the calamities of civil war; and if Louis Napoleon carries out the policy that the Empire means peace, if he chooses ministers who will honestly manage the administration of the finances, and observe economy in the expenditure, he may secure the throne during his lifetime, establish the credit of the Empire, and maintain friendly relations with all foreign powers.

The question of peace in preference to war is admirably put in the following extract from the Constitutionel, of the 7th January:—

"'When France is satisfied, the world is tranquil!' Thus Napoleon III. expressed himself at Bourdeaux, in that magnificent harangue which was the programme of the second Empire. Facts now confirm this natural and prophetic language, which, while promising peace to Europe, raised the nation of France so high. France is satisfied, because she no longer fears the spectacle of Communism, because she has morally recovered from the disasters of 1814 and 1815, because she has crowned the man of her choice, because she has re-established a popular dynasty on the throne and raised on its basis a patriotic Government; and she is satisfied, because the world is tranquil. Let a glance be thrown over the map of Europe, and let us be told on what point of the horizon the slightest cloud can be seen. Across the strait which separates them, England extends a friendly hand to France; a reciprocal esteem has replaced their feelings of enmity, their rivalry has become emulation. Now, as formerly, France and England dream of fresh conquests and of new struggles; but these conquests and these struggles are not those which entail ruin upon nations and decimate the people. All the ardour and the intelligence of the two nations are turned towards the pacific battles which civilization wages against barbarism in the vast fields of science and industry. Doubtless the vessels of England and of France may meet on the same seas and on the same shores, but it will be no longer to combat and to destroy each other. To explore seas, to colonize countries, to civilize people, to work mines, to clear land, and to open markets—that is what the fleets which leave the ports of the Channel will henceforth seek to effect; they will carry more workmen than soldiers, they will be less laden with arms and ammunition than with instruments of labour and bales of merchandise. On this ground, the victory will belong not to the strongest but to the most intelligent and the most active; and what will result from this competition will be no longer the ravages and misfortunes of war, but the advantages of industry and the conquests of civilization, which always turn to the profit of the human race. In the south and in the north there is nothing that threatens Europe with those complications which are calculated to excite a fear that the peace of the world may be disturbed. We everywhere see the most profound repose—a repose which each Government employs to consolidate order and strengthen authority, and which each nation devotes to develop the sources of its riches and to increase the sum of its intelligence. Spain, Portugal, and Italy, under different characters and with different means, exert all their efforts to this twofold object, to conciliate at home the spirit of conservatism with the spirit of progress, and to ally abroad the national honour with European peace. Thus Prussia, Austria, and Russia, after the example of the powers of the second rank, hail in the Emperor the elect of a great nation, and the saviour of Christian civilization. It is no longer looks of terror, but of benediction, which Prussia, Austria, and Russia direct toward the Government of France; for they well know that this Government has spared them from one of those terrible struggles which no one is ever sure of surviving. Europe is neither so blind nor so ungrateful as not to hail with sympathy the Government which preserves it and the man who saves it; it is, on the contrary, as clear-sighted as grateful, and it proves it by the sincerity of the marks of esteem and of friendship which it gives to France in the person of her sovereign. There is, therefore, not the slightest germ of war, either in the present or in the future; and, except in the case of one of those unforeseen events which disconcert all the provisions of human wisdom, civilized Europe is assured of one of those durable periods of peace which give time for great ideas to ripen and for great things to be accomplished, for grand works to be completed, and for grand enterprises to fructify."

The Queen of England has recognised the French Emperor, in the language and according to the terms of courtesy which have long been established between the Sovereigns of Europe. The King of Prussia and Emperor of Austria have done the same; and we believe that the other Sovereigns, on their ambassadors delivering their credentials at the Tuilleries, have followed the example of England, Austria, and Prussia, with the exception of the Emperor of Russia, who has absolutely refused to acknowledge Napoleon III. as Mon Frere (My Brother). He has merely addressed him Sire, Majesty; but the good sense of the French Emperor has induced him to receive the ambassador of the Czar with credentials which designedly mark an inferiority in the rank of Napoleon III.

Considering the financial condition of France at the present time, and the magnitude of various speculative undertakings in that country, the departure of the ambassador of the Czar from Paris might have involved the country in a panic, which would be attended with the most disastrous results to public and private credit, ruinous to industry and trade, and probably lead to a disturbance of the tranquillity of Europe.

Peace above all things is necessary for the stability of the French Empire, and for the maintenance of public and private credit. Napoleon I. never succeeded in establishing national credit upon a firm foundation; although England, while carrying on the most expensive war which the world ever experienced, and expending more money in maintaining fleets and armies than all the four first continental states of Europe, maintained also her national integrity and honour unsullied; and, notwithstanding the burdens of oppressive taxation, concluded that war with unimpaired strength and with unexampled triumph. Napoleon persisted in his continental system, in the vain hope that he could exclude the manufactures of England from the markets of the world; but in defiance of the Berlin and Milan decrees, the contrabandists of every state in Europe, aided by the very men who were appointed to execute his mandate, imported British manufactures largely into every state of the Continent, and British woven fabrics were, to a great extent, used in clothing the soldiers of our enemies.

The resources of France are great; her soil and climate are highly favourable to agriculture and pasturage; her natural advantages for manufactures are numerous and varied; but her anti-commercial system, for a long period down to the present day, has been pernicious and oppressive. The high and almost prohibitive duties upon iron, constitute a tax upon all agricultural implements — forms a tax on land, which is incalculable — woven manufactures, especially those of cotton, linen, and wool, are altogether prohibited, with the exception of some mixed cloths. Even raw materials for the purpose of giving employment to the people of France, are highly taxed. Coal, which has become so necessary in all industrial establishments, is only admitted at enormous duties; and the whole net revenue of the customs of France scarcely yields the amount which is, in the United Kingdom, derived from the single article of tea. In 1851, the duty received on tea, consumed in the United Kingdom, amounted to £5,900,624; the net revenue from the customs in France was under that amount.

It is often, but not justly, asserted that Colbert introduced the prohibitive system. The first general tariff introduced by that minister, laid down, as principles, first the reduction of duty on the exportation of products and manufactures of the kingdom; second, on all articles required for home manufactures; and third, an increase of duties on all foreign manufactures.

Mr. Pitt negotiated a liberal treaty with France. A famed protectionist, M. St. Ferreol, denounced it as the "fatal treaty of 1786, which abolished the prohibitions applying in France to the products of England and her colonies. It is true," he continues, "that this treaty established reciprocity duties, but its advantages were insignificant compared with the superiority already obtained by the manufactures of this kingdom. But the tariff of 1791 laid down the absolute prohibition of manufactures which compete with ours. The tariff of the restoration, in 1816, established double the rate of duties imposed by that of 1810, on a number of articles stated; and on other articles, an augmentation of the duties of 1791."

Such has been the anti-commercial policy of France, which, in order to protect her own manufacturers at the expense of all other classes, imposes prohibitive duties on nearly all the manufactures, and most of the produce of other nations. We do not consider it possible that so intelligent a person as Napoleon III. can be prejudiced in favour of such a fallacious system; and if ever a time could be more favourable than another to the freedom of commerce, it is the present, when a more liberal system would yield a large additional sum to the treasury, and prove highly beneficial to France. A more free commercial intercourse between Great Britain and France would also constitute the firmest bond of union and the surest guarantee for peace. We admit a vast number of articles produced in France duty free; we have lowered the duties upon French brandies one-third; we have reduced the duties to a low rate upon all articles of Parisian industry and upon all articles of French manufacture not admitted duty free. Let us, for our own advantage, as well as upon principle, reduce the duties upon French wines to a mere revenue rate. Let us reduce the duty upon French spirits to the same rate as the duty upon British Colonial spirits; and if the Government of France meets us in a liberal way, the benefit which must follow would be an inestimable gain to both countries, but especially to France.

We hope that the present Government of France may endure. But we hope also that it may become as liberal as will be practicable in its administration. But we mistrust the Romish hierarchy, while ignorance and superstition are as yet the general characteristics of the masses. We have no confidence in a church, the ceremonies and doctrines of which are incompatible with civil, political, and religious liberty.

The Emperor knows and appreciates this fact; and in truth while he makes tools of them, they take full advantage of him for their own aggrandizement. Both have succeeded.

LONDON EXPERIENCES.

"DRAW the table nearer the fire, lieutenant, and mix yourself some punch."

It was thus that a merry-faced elderly gentleman addressed a good-looking youth, in a smart military uniform, seated opposite to him at his hospitable board, immediately after a luxurious dinner.

"I'll trouble you for the rum and the lemons —there—thank you," said the person addressed, showing the most resolute determination to do as he was bid.

"Now, lieutenant," said the old gentleman, "that we have got 'planted unco right,' as the poet has it, with full glasses, suppose you favour me with a yarn, as the sailors say, while we enjoy our tumblers."

"With pleasure," said the lieutenant. "Let me see! Did I ever tell you that story about the drunken sentry; or, stop, I have a better one even than that. There was a rollicking young Irishman in our corps, newly joined as ensign. But, hang it, no! military scenes and anecdotes have lost their interest, there have been so many of them. The Peninsula is used up long ago; so I shall give you, in preference, an adventure that happened to me in London, some time after I went to reside there."

"Ah! London's a great place," interrupted the host, "and I could tell a tale of London too, and perhaps I may; but let me hear your's first."

"I intend," said the youth, "to stir you up with a long pole, as they do the bear at the Zoological Gardens. It was when I first went to London that the affair happened. It was an affair of outposts, as we say in the army, or rather I should say, of bedposts. At that time I boarded with a very respectable family named Mopton, who lived in a neat cottage in the neighbourhood of Kensington. They belonged to the Moptons of Mumpus."

"Oh! I know," remarked the old gentleman, "cousins to the Fogos of Fog-hall."

"Just so," responded the lieutenant. "Well, the house which the Moptons inhabited was rather large for the family, consisting of the master and mistress—the latter, a bustling, managing little woman, somewhat fond of cards and the theatre, when she could get any body to take her there, but otherwise inoffensive enough—a son, and two daughters. The husband was a quiet domestic sort of mortal, whose most marked characteristic was a fondness for foreigners, particularly if they were of the refugee order; and he usually had one of these hirsute monsters in shabby-genteel clothes and fearfully foul linen, whose prate was all of revolutions, liberty, equality, and fraternity, républiques sociales et démocratiques, &c., at table with him. His pet bore of this description, when I boarded with him, was one Count Crackyernutski, as he styled himself, a marvellously ill-favoured Pole—tall and thin as a lath—Pole by name and pole by nature, whose natural ugliness had been rendered ten thousand times more hideous by the scar of a great slashing sword-cut which he had got across his nose at the battle of Warsaw, at least, so he said, though I question very much if he ever war saw either in Poland or anywhere else. Be this as it may, there he was, a constant and welcome guest, although, as you Scotch say, he looked more like a ghaist than a living man. What the worthy people could see in him to admire, I never could find out. He seldom opened his mouth but to put something into it; although he was useful in taking a hand at whist, when there was no one else to do so, and as we never played higher than for sixpenny points, his risk was not great, and he sometimes rose the winner of a shilling or two, on which occasions he would grin horribly a ghastly smile of satisfaction, and growl out his delight as he pocketed his gains."

"When, however, he had, instead, to pocket his losses," interrupted the host, "I suppose the result would be pretty much the same, barring the satisfaction, as Paddy's dinner was like his friend's, of beef and potatoes, barring the beef."

"Just so," replied the lieutenant, "when he lost, like the monkey that was teased by the boy, he had to grin—and bear it. Well, one evening when he was there at tea, an ugly old woman of fifty —humpbacked, wrinkled, and dumpy, who had taken the first floor, unfurnished, arrived with her plenishing, as you Scotch folks call it, in two vans, and as many brawny porters, and immediately began to unpack. It was summer-time, and there was, of course, plenty of light to let them see what they were about. We were seated in the parlour on the ground-floor, and after a while the door opened, and the servant girl appeared, and addressing her mistress, said:—'Please, ma'am, the lady in the first floor wants the Pole.'

'Vants me!' said Count Crackyernutski, in amazement, 'I don't know de lady.'

'It's a mistake, surely,' said Mrs. Mopton, who was employed pouring out the tea at the moment, 'she must mean somebody else, she cannot know the Count, or if she does, how did she know that he was here?'

'The girl had better go up stairs and ask our new lodger who it is she wants,' said the husband in his quiet way. The girl accordingly disappeared.

'Mopton, how can you be so vulgar?' exclaimed his wife. 'Our new lodger, indeed! Why, she has her own apartments, and does not lodge with us. It would be more respectful to her, and certainly is more respectable to ourselves to call her by her name. She has got a name, I suppose.'

'Well,' said the husband, meekly, 'I suppose she has, but I have forgotten it, if, indeed, I ever heard it.'

"In the midst of this domestic altercation the girl again entered and said, 'Yes! ma'am, it is the Pole she wants. She is crying for the Pole.'

'Crying for me, poor ting,' exclaimed the Count, 'vy should she cry for me?'

'Perhaps she knows you, after all,' said Mrs. Mopton. 'She may be an old acquaintance of yours. You had better step up stairs and see her.'

'But still,' said the husband, 'the question occurs, How does she know that the Count is here?'

'Please, sir,' said the servant, 'I told her the Pole was down stairs.'

'But how did that come about? How did you know that she knew him?'

'Please, sir, she was asking for the Pole.'

'We are just where we were,' said the placid Mopton, shrugging his shoulders.

'Your best plan, Count,' said Mrs. Mopton, 'is to step up stairs, and see the lady. She appears to be some friend of yours, and must have seen you when she passed the window.'

"As Crackyernutski rose to obey, Mopton bantering him, remarked, 'If she were young and pretty now I would suspect her to be some sweetheart of yours, but there's no accounting for tastes, you know, eh! Count.'

"With some degree of trepidation, the Pole retired, very much with the feelings of one about to encounter some unknown but formidable enemy.

'I shouldn't wonder,' said Mopton, as soon as the door was shut, 'but it will turn out to be some old landlady of the Count's from whom he has taken French leave, without paying off his score. Such things have been done in the olden time, as well as now. If so, the recognition will be somewhat awkward, I should say.'

'For shame, Mopton,' interposed his wife, 'you are always so censorious.'

"We were not long left to conjecture, for almost immediately the door opened, and Crackyernutski entered, looking grimmer than ever, and as pale and affrighted as Priam, when his curtains were withdrawn at dead of night, and he was informed that Troy was taken, or as if he had been condemned by the autocrat of all the Russias, first to be knouted, and then sent to Siberia.

'Well, what is the matter?' said Mrs. Mopton, as soon as he returned, and so indeed did we all. 'Do you know her, and what did she say?'

'Say, madame!' cried the Count. 'Ugh! ugh! She most vulgar woman. She vant something else dan me. I not know her at all. She vant vat she call de pole of de bed.'

"Mrs. Mopton now deemed it necessary to leave the room, to seek an explanation. It was soon and somewhat wrathfully given, and amounted to this: When the Count made his appearance on the first floor, which had been taken by the old lady, and which she was now busily filling with her furniture, he heard a loud and angry voice exclaiming, 'Bring me the pole, why don't you bring me the pole? I cannot get on without the pole!' He, therefore, hearing himself, as he thought, thus called, followed the sound, and entered an apartment, which proved to be a bed-room, and in which he found a little old, wrinkled, humpbacked, and dumpy woman on her knees on a bed, holding up the curtains thereof, red in the face and out of breath, calling lustily out for the pole.

'Please, ma'am,' said the Count, 'vat you vant vith me?'

'With you, you ugly brute!' said the old woman, popping out her little wizened face from between the bed curtains, 'Who the dickens are you?'

'I am de Pole,' said he.

'You the pole!' said she. 'Oh! go along! It's the pole of the bed that I want.'"

"Ha! ha!" laughed the host. "A capital equivoque! I suppose it is an invention for the nonce, for the amusement of the moment, eh, lieutenant?"

"No, on my honour," said the military youth, "it is quite true, I assure you, and I was present myself at the time—that is, in the parlour, when the odd mistake occurred."

"Well, well, wet t'other eye, and take a cigar, and I shall tell you one of my London experiences in return for yours."

Both gentlemen replenished their tumblers, and having lighted cigars, the elder of the two said, "You have tasted sheep's-head broth, haven't you?"

"I should rather think I have," answered the youth, "and like it famously. It is one of the simplest, yet one of the best of your Scotch dishes that I know of."

"Well, thereby hangs a tale, as is natural where a sheep is concerned. After I had gone to London, and had resided there for some time, I took a great longing for sheep's-head broth. But I found it a far more difficult matter to have it gratified than I had any conception of. My housekeeper spoke to the butcher with whom we usually dealt to get me a good sheep's head, with the wool on, and trotters to correspond, as they are sold in Scotland. The man stared, but promised to comply with the request on an early day. You are aware, I suppose, that sheep's heads and trotters in London are usually skinned and baked, and therefore of no use whatever in concocting a dish of that delectable stuff, sheep's-head broth?"

The lieutenant nodded an assent.

"Well, on the day fixed my housekeeper, whom I had brought with me from Scotland, took with her a clean towel, and set off to the flesher's—"

"I beg your pardon," interrupted the youth, "that I rather think is a name peculiar to Scotland, and corresponds, I believe, to the English meat-salesman."

"Precisely; it means one who sells meat, and, properly speaking, does not kill. I remember some two dozen years ago, in the days before railways were in use, and the heavy coach was all the go, of being on the top of one of those lumbering machines entering Edinburgh, when a genuine unadulterated cockney, who sat beside me, and had never been in Scotland before, and who was amusing himself by reading the signs over the shop doors, as we rattled along the streets, all of a sudden exclaimed, 'Flesher! flesher! pray, sir,' turning to me, 'what on earth sort of trade is flesher?'"

"And of course you told him something quite different from what it really is."

"Of course I did, though I forget precisely what explanation of the term I gave at the time. But revenons à nos moutons, let us return to our mutton, that is, the sheep's head. No sooner had my housekeeper secured the woolly head, to the great wonderment of the butcher, as to what she was going to do with it, than she hied with her treasure to a blacksmith in the neighbourhood, and asked him if he would 'sing' it for her, speaking as she had been accustomed to do in Scotland. 'Sing it! ma'am,' said Vulcan, looking at it, and turning it over and over, as a natural curiosity of its kind, and sorely puzzled as to her meaning.

'Aye, sing it,' said she, on sheep's-head broth intent. 'You know what singing a sheep's head is, I suppose?'

'Can't say, ma'am, as I do,' replied the knight of the anvil, or the demon of the forge, or whatever high-sounding name your romance-writers choose to confer on a great vulgar, coarse, and lubberly monster, who spends his whole life amid fire and smoke and the eternal clatter of his sledge-hammer.

'Well, well, pity your ignorance. Singe is the word which I believe you use in England. You know what that is, don't you?'

'Singe, did you say, ma'am? Yes, ma'am, O yes! I daysay it might be done!' For a London tradesman will confess to anything, except a bloody murder or a highway robbery, rather than not "do business." 'Yes, ma'am, O yes! it might sartainly be done; not a doubt of it, ma'am'—not knowing all the time how, in reality, it could be done.

'Surely you can sing the head,' said she, beginning to have some doubts about the matter.

'Of course, ma'am, of course;' though (sotto voce to himself) how the deuce I can make the head of a dead sheep sing, as she calls it, or that of a living one either for that matter—that is, warble like a bird, or the tea-kettle at the boil, passes my comprehension to say. The woman is evidently insane, an enthusiast of some kind or other, and must be humoured, poor thing. 'Tis the quietest way of getting rid of her, else I might stand a chance of being had up to the police about her, if anything goes wrong, or if she were to commit suicide. There's something very unsettled in her eyes; I might be summoned before the coroner.

'Well,' asked my housekeeper, 'how much will you charge for doing it?'

"The man put his right hand to his head, as people in a quandary, or, as the Yankees say, a fix, generally do, and drawing it desperately through his hair, as if in deep cogitation, slowly responded, 'It will depend, ma'am, on the nature of the work, and the time it will take. I should say, ma'am, it could not be done for less than a matter of—say, three shillings.'

'THREE SHILLINGS! Mercy on us!' screamed the astounded woman, 'Why, you stupid! in Scotland it only costs one halfpenny!'

'Perhaps so, ma'am,' said the smith, now more than ever convinced of her insanity, and anxious to get rid of her; 'but you are not in Scotland but in London, which makes all the difference. Besides, to tell you the candid truth, I never saw or heard of such an operation being performed on a sheep's head before.'

"The housekeeper brought home the unlucky head, resolving, as it cost so much, and, naturally enough, having doubts as to its being properly done, when such an enormous sum was charged for it, to singe it herself. But here a new annoyance awaited her."

"As how?" inquired the lieutenant. "It is a very easy operation, I should think, the singeing of a sheep's head; only, it creates such an intolerable and detestable stench."

"Precisely so, and hence her new troublement. She had the tub placed in the middle of the kitchen floor, full of boiling water, and, with red-hot poker in hand, like Bailie Nicol Jarvie, in the Highland inn, was, with the aid of the servant, an English girl, busily employed in applying it to the woolly-head, when, lo! a ring at the door-bell, with a peal as loud as the Tron on a Sunday. The girl hastened to answer it, when she found the servant next door on the right, with her missus' compliments, and she was sent to see if the kitchen-vent was not on fire, there was such a smell of burning?"

"No wonder," remarked the military youth. "Egad! I am surprised that the whole street was not alarmed."

"Our girl assured her it was nothing but the singing of a sheep's-head, and she went away as wise as she came. On her departure, the singeing was resumed with increased vigour, when another dreadful pull at the bell, accompanied by a violent rat-tat at the knocker—it was 'knock and ring' with a vengeance, I assure you: and this time it was the gentleman, our neighbour on the left, sent to inquire what the devil was ado in our house, that such an abominable stink was coming out of it. After getting rid of this interruption, the important business, on which our dinner depended, was proceeded with, and was no sooner finished, and the head, now completely sung, made ready to be boiled, than a pull at the bell and a knock at the door, ten times louder than before, was heard, and the housekeeper deemed it necessary to answer the summons herself this time. As she proceeded up stairs to do so, a din of many voices saluted her ear; and, on opening the lobby-door, there stood half the neighbourhood, all threatening to indict the house as a nuisance.

'Get away with you,' said she. 'One would think that a murder had been committed, instead of only a sheep's-head being sung.' The crowd, thinking she was making fun of them, only grew the more vociferous; and a policeman having arrived, they insisted that he should search the house, for they were certain that some illicit work was going on within, such as soap-making or the like.

"Fortunately, the policeman was himself 'a native,' no long time caught, and smelled what-was-what at once. He bade the crowd disperse, remarking to the housekeeper, after they had done so, that the English were 'puir, ignorant, benighted creatures, that ken naething aboot the singing o' a sheep's-head, God help them;' and then, in a lower and more confidential tone, 'Od, woman, I haena tasted sheep's-head broth since I left Glasgow, twa year ago.' This was a hint too broad to be misunderstood—a shot too direct not to hit the mark—especially after the service he had rendered her. Of course, she could not do less than invite him to come back and get a platefull, when ready, of the delectable stuff which, altogether unknown to English palates, is even more than the haggis itself, the 'wale of Scotia's food.'"

THE MOUNTAIN SPIRIT.

A GERMAN LEGEND.

Among the lofty summits of the Mount Parnassus of Silesia, dwells in peaceful accord with Apollo and his nine Muses, the far-famed mountain-spirit, known to mortals by the name of Rubezahl, whose renown the Silesian poets, one and all, conspire to spread far and wide. 'Tis true this prince of the gnomes rules but a very small portion of the earth's surface—his superficial domains being but a few miles in extent, and enclosed in a chain of lofty mountains; and even this is divided between two earthly potentates, who are far from acknowledging any other participation in their dominion. Nevertheless, there is not a fathom of this land but forms a part of his peculiar monarchy, which all the quarrels and subdivisions of meddling mortals would not avail to diminish one inch, and which, moreover, extends down, down, down, four thousand miles beneath the surface, to the middle point of the old world's centre. At times, this subterranean sovereign takes it into his head to make the tour of his abysmal kingdom, to gloat over the inexhaustible riches of his dark treasure-house—to muster his army of subservient gnomes, and set them to work—then the solid earth heaves with the force of fire and flame, and the rich vapours rising through the barren rocks, impregnate them with mineral matter, and change their formless masses to living and glistening ore. At times, he leaves his underground dominions, and pursues his pastime upon the surface, sporting with the terrors of mankind, with whom his sympathies are of a very doubtful nature.

Far, far back in the distant days of yore, before the descendants of Japhet had penetrated so far to the north as the seat of his dominions, Rubezahl was accustomed to amuse himself with the battles of the bear and wild bull, which it was his pastime to hound on to the combat; or he would arouse the savage beasts from their mountain-recesses, with a horrible roaring, and drive them over the precipitous rocks to perish in the gorge below. Weary with this sport, at length, he would dive, like the mole, through the crannies of his dark domain, down to the regions of the underground world, where he would occupy himself for a century or two, till again the desire arose to see the face of the sun, and enjoy the aspect of the outer creation. How amazed was he, at one of his returning visits to the outside of his realm, to see the whole face of his territory changed beyond recognition! The tangled and impenetrable forests were hewn down, and in their place rich golden harvests waved o'er fertile fields. Between the rows of fruit-bearing trees, glimmered the straw-thatched roofs of happy villages, from whose hospitable chimneys the peaceful smoke curled up to the quiet clouds. Here and there stood a solitary watch-tower, upon a jutting crag, for defence and protection to the land. Flocks and herds wandered through the green pastures, and the melody of the shepherd's pipe rose in the summer air.

The novelty of the thing, and the pleasantness of the sight, so delighted the astonished proprietor of the territory, that he forgot to be angry with the arbitrary proceedings of the squatters who had so unceremoniously taken possession of his domain. He, moreover, felt mightily curious to examine the mode of life and action of these new tenants; so he left them in the enjoyment of their usurped possessions, much as the worthy housekeeper of our day suffers the swallow or the sparrow to build his nest unmolested under the eaves of his roof. At length he was seized with a fancy to make an acquaintance with mankind, whom he took for a sort of bastard creation, half-brute, half-spirit; and, in order to become better acquainted with their natures and propensities, resolved to put himself in contact with them. He assumed the form of a stalwart farm-labourer, and hired himself out to the first landlord he met with. All that he undertook prospered under his hand, and Ripps the plowman was celebrated as the first workman in the village. But his master was a selfish and dissipated debauchee, who squandered the produce of his labour, without rewarding his efforts with even a single expression of satisfaction; so he left him and engaged himself to a neighbour, who gave him the charge of his flocks and herds. These he faithfully guarded and tended, guided them to sweet pastures, and led them to the mountain-passes, where the greenest herbage grew. The herds prospered under his care and multiplied fast—no lambs ever fell from the precipice, and none became the prey of the wolf. But this second master was an unprincipled scamp, who never rewarded his faithful servant as he ought to have done; but he secretly stole the best wether from the flock, and then deducted its value from the shepherd's wages. Therefore, Ripps left the skin-flint, entered the service of the judge as beadle, became the scourge of evil-doers, and the indefatigable drudge of the portly magistrate. But the judge was an unrighteous man, who corrupted the law, sold his decrees for bribes, and made a mock of integrity. As Ripps did not choose to be the instrument of unrighteousness, he gave warning to the judge, and was cast into prison for his pains, out of which, according to the custom of spirits, he found a commodious exit through the key-hole.

This first essay in the study of mankind could not possibly have any powerful effect in exciting his philanthropy; he returned with feelings of contempt to his rocky eminence, whence he surveyed the wide and smiling region beautified by human industry; and wondering that Nature should condescend to lavish her bounties upon such a bastard brood, he abandoned his experiments in the study of the human character.

There was a peasant in the bailiwick of Reichenberg, who had been robbed of all his little property by the chicanery of a litigious neighbour, and who had parted with his last cow to satisfy the claims of the judge; nothing now remained to him but a pining wife and half-a-dozen children, some of whom he would have willingly made over to the judge in pledge for the cow. True he yet possessed a pair of stout arms, but all their labour would not suffice to maintain his family. It cut him to the heart when his young ravens cried for bread, and he had nothing to give them to appease the pangs of hunger. "Had we a hundred crowns," he said to his disconsolate wife, "we might again restore our ruined household, we would remove out of the way of these quarrelsome neighbours, and strive by industry to gain a property of our own. You have rich relations on the other side of the mountains; I will go to them, and explain our sad condition, perhaps one of them may take compassion on us, and charitably lend us from his superfluity as much as will supply our present wants."

The dejected wife, though with but faint hopes of a happy result, consented to this proposition, because she saw no other chance. The husband prepared for his journey, and as he left his wife and children, thus endeavoured to comfort them: "Weep not! my heart tells me I shall find a benefactor who will succour us, and that my journey will not be in vain." Hereupon he thrust a hard crust into his pocket for subsistence on the road, and went on his way. Faint and weary with the heat of the day, and the distance he had travelled, he arrived in the evening at the town where the rich relations resided; but none of them would recognise him, not one would give him a lodging. With hot and bitter tears he related his misfortunes, but the hard-hearted wretches, instead of assisting him, tormented the poor man with reproaches and offensive proverbs. One said, "He that would thrive, must labour and strive;" another, "Pride goes before a fall;" a third, "As you brew so you must bake;" a fourth, "Every man is the maker of his own fortune." Thus they scoffed and jested with his misery, called him an impostor and lazy scamp, and at length shouldered him out of the house. The poor fellow had not looked for such a reception at the hands of his wife's wealthy relations; downcast and melancholy, he slunk away from them, and not possessing money to pay for a lodging, he was compelled to pass the night in the fields under a hay-stack. Here he remained, sleepless with sorrow and indignation, till the dawn, when he resumed his journey homewards.

When he came again into the mountains the sense of his miserable condition so overcame him that he was nearly driven to despair. "Two days' wages lost," thought he to himself, as he wandered on, faint and exhausted with pain and hunger, "and six famishing babes awaiting thy return in expectation of food, to whom, when they stretch out their hands for bread, thou canst offer nothing. O heart, heart, how canst thou bear it?—better hadst thou broken before this agony came upon thee." Hereupon he threw himself upon the ground under a sloe-bush to collect his terror-stricken thoughts.

But as upon the verge of destruction, the soul arouses her utmost powers, and tasks every fibre of the brain to seek out some means of escape from the impending ruin, or delaying the inevitable stroke, like some luckless mariner whose ship is fast sinking beneath the waves, who swiftly climbs the rigging, and takes refuge at the top of the mast; or, being below decks, starts suddenly through the port-hole, in hope of meeting with some floating plank or empty cask, to bear him safe upon the billows—so, after revolving a thousand vain and hopeless suggestions, it at length occurred to poor Guy that he would seek out the mountain spirit, acquaint him with his misery, and petition for succour at the hands of Rubezahl himself. He had heard many strange and romantic stories concerning his treatment of travellers—some he was said to have beaten and bantered in cruel sport—some had been the victims of his malicious tricks—and some, so report ran, had reaped good at his hands. Our poor fellow knew well enough that the mountain king never suffered himself to be called with impunity by his nickname "Rubezahl," but as he knew no other mode of getting at him, he made up his mind for a cudgelling, and called "Rubezahl! Rubezahl!" with all his might.

The words were hardly uttered, when a fearful form appeared, black and sooty as a coal-miner, with a red beard that reached down to his girdle, and staring fiery eyes, and armed with a bar of iron like a weaver's beam, which he brandished with furious gestures, threatening to annihilate the rash intruder. "With your favour, Mr. Rubezahl," said poor Guy, quite undaunted, ("pardon me if I do not address you rightly,) only hear me out, and then do with me as you shall think proper." These bold words, coupled with the care-worn aspect of the man, which seemed to indicate neither wantonness nor curiosity, somewhat soothed the anger of the spirit. "Earthworm," said he, "what leads you to disturb my repose? Know you not that you must atone with your life for your insolent presumption?" "Sir," answered Guy, "want has driven me to you; I have a request to make, which it will cost you nothing to grant; I pray you to lend me a hundred crowns, which I will pay you again with the usual interest in three years' time, as sure as I am an honest man." "Fool," said the spirit, "am I a usurer or a Jew, that I should lend money at interest? Go hence to thy brother-man, and borrow as much as you choose, but leave me at peace." "Ah," replied Guy, "there is an end of human brotherhood in my case. There is no friendship in matters of lending and borrowing." Hereupon he recounted his whole history at length, and drew such an affecting picture of his misery, that the spirit knew not how to refuse his request; and though the poor wretch might not deserve his compassion, he thought the design of borrowing a capital from himself so extraordinary, that he felt inclined to requite the man's confidence by acceding to his wishes. "Come, follow me," said he, and led the way towards the forest, where in a sequestered dell, some thick underwood shrouded the base of a rugged rock.

When Guy had succeeded, with much labour, in struggling through the bushes, they came to the entrance of a gloomy cavern. Poor Guy was not much at his ease while groping along in the dark; a cold shudder ran through his veins, and his hair stood on end. "Rubezahl has deceived many a man," thought he, "who knows but some horrid abyss may lie in my path, down which I may fall headlong at the next step." At that moment he heard a fearful noise, like the rushing of a cataract through the abyss. The further he went, the more was his heart oppressed with fear and horror. But soon, to his comfort, he saw a blue flame dancing in the distance; the roof of the cavern widened by degrees into a spacious saloon, and the bright flame swayed from the centre like a chandelier, in the middle of the hall of rock. Upon the floor he saw a huge copper vessel, as large as a brewer's vat, filled to the rim with hard dollars. When Guy beheld this immense treasure, all his fears vanished at once, and his heart leaped for joy. "Take," said the spirit, "what you want, be it little or much, but write me out a bond,—that is if you know how to write." The debtor consented to the proposal, and counted out the hundred crowns precisely, not one more nor one less. The spirit appeared to pay no regard to the reckoning, turned himself away, and in the meantime produced the writing materials. Guy wrote the bond in his best possible style; the spirit locked up the same in an iron chest, and said to him: "Go hence, my friend, in peace, and use thy money with an industrious hand. Forget not that thou art my debtor, and mark the entrance of the valley and the door of this rock, that you may know where to come, when the day of payment arrives. When the three years are expired you must repay me capital and interest—I am a severe creditor; if you break your word, I will require it at your hands with a vengeance." The honest Guy promised to keep the day of payment honourably—promised it with earnestness, but without an oath; (he would not pledge his life and salvation, as unprincipled borrowers are accustomed to do;) and with thankful heart he took leave of his benefactor in the cavern, from which he easily found an outlet.

The hundred crowns had such a magical effect upon his spirits and bodily frame, that by the time he had emerged again to daylight he felt as cheerful and active as if in the gloom of the cavern he had imbibed the elixir of life. Joyous and vigorous in every limb, he strode away towards his dwelling, and arrived at the miserable hut just as the day began to decline. So soon as the wretched little starvelings caught sight of him, they ran to meet him, crying with one voice, "Bread, father! a bit of bread; we have been hungry so long." The disconsolate wife sat in a corner weeping; like all weak and oppressed persons, she feared the worst, and had no doubt but the new-comer was about to rehearse some sorrowful litany. He, however, took her cheerfully by the hand, and bade her kindle a fire upon the hearth; for he had brought from Reichenberg groats and millet in his wallet, which she could soon transform to a wholesome family porridge. Then he gave her an account of the fortunate result of his expedition. "Your relations," said he, "are the right sort of people; they did not repulse my poverty, or deny my acquaintance, or thrust me shamefully from their doors—not they!—but received me hospitably, with open heart and hand, and told down a hundred good crowns, as a pledge of kinship." These words relieved the good wife of a heavy trouble which had long oppressed her heart. "If we had gone to that quarter before," said she, "we should have saved ourselves many sorrows." Then she began to boast of her connections, (in whom when Guy set out to seek them she had not a shadow of hope,) and soon became right proud on the score of her wealthy relations.

The good man suffered her to enjoy, after so many afflictions, this innocent conceit, which was so flattering to her vanity. As, however, she never ceased prating of her rich cousin, in a very few days Guy got heartily sick of her trumpetings in praise of such a heartless hunks; and he said to his wife, "Do you know what I brought home with me besides the money?" "No," said she, "what was it?" "A little advice for our future guidance, which your cousin gave me, and it is this,—'Every man is the maker of his own fortune,'—'Strike while the iron is hot.' So let us bestir ourselves, and ply our calling industriously, that we may have the means in three years' time to repay the loan with interest, and get rid of the debt." Thereupon he set to work, bought a field of arable land, and a small patch of pasture; then another, and another, and then a whole hide of land; there was a blessing in Rubezahl's money, which seemed to prosper magically. Guy sowed and reaped, and was soon known in the village as a man well to do in the world, who had always capital in his purse for the completion of a prudent purchase. In the third summer, besides his own land, he farmed a manor which brought him a famous profit; in short, he was a man with whom everything he took in hand succeeded to perfection.

The appointed pay-day now came round, and Guy had saved so much that he could spare the amount of his debt without inconvenience; he laid the money apart, and on the morning agreed upon he rose early, awoke his wife and children, told them to get washed and combed, and to put on their Sunday clothes, and their new shoes, and scarlet boddices and tippets, which they had never yet worn. He himself put on his sacramental coat, and bawled out of the window, "Jack, put the horses to!" "Why husband, what is in the wind now?" asked the wife, "to-day is neither feast-day nor anniversary; what makes you so merry as to surprise us with a holiday, and where are you going to take us?" He replied, "I am going to take you to your rich cousin over the mountains, and to repay to the creditor, whose loan has been the means of our well-doing, both principal and interest, for to-day is the day agreed upon." This pleased the wife very well; she decked out the children charmingly, and in order to give her relations a good opinion of her prosperity, and to do credit to their household, she wore herself a necklace of crooked ducats. Guy shook his heavy purse till it chinked again, put it in his pocket, and when all was in readiness, set off with wife and children. Jack whipped the four horses into a good pace, and they trotted merrily over the flat country towards the mountains.

Guy commanded the driver to halt before a rugged hollow-way, where he alighted, and bade the others do the same; then he said to his serving-man, "Jack, drive slowly round the foot of the mountain, and wait for us at the three Linden trees, and if you should wait a long while, don't be uneasy; let the horses take breath, and graze awhile; I am acquainted with a footpath hereabouts, which is somewhat winding, but pleasant to walk in." Then he struck into the forest with his wife and children, and as they made but slow progress through the tangled underwood, he began to look about him in every direction, till at length the wife supposed her husband had lost his way, and recommended him to turn back and follow the road. But Guy suddenly stood still, collected his six children around him, and spoke as follows:—"You are thinking, my dear wife, that we are journeying to your relatives; I assure you that is not my intention. Your wealthy cousins are skinflints and scoundrels, who, when I formerly in my affliction sought refuge and comfort among them, derided my misery and spurned me from their doors with insult.—Here, on this spot, dwells our true cousin to whom we owe our good fortune, and who on my bare word lent me the money which has prospered so well in my hand. By his appointment I am here to-day to return him principal and interest. Do you know now who is our creditor? it is the lord of the mountain, Rubezahl!" At these words his wife was horribly afraid, and made the sign of the cross in her defence, and the children shook with terror and apprehension lest their father should deliver them over to Rubezahl, of whom they had often heard dismal accounts in the winter evenings—and whom they regarded as a hideous giant and man-eating monster. Guy detailed to them his whole adventure, how at his call the spirit appeared to him in the form of a coal-miner—and what had transpired in the interior of the cavern; and he praised the benevolence of the spirit, with such a grateful heart and such profound emotion that the warm tears trickled down his honest sunburnt cheeks. "Remain here," he continued, "while I go into the cave and transact my business. Fear nothing, I will not be long away, and if I can prevail upon him to come I will bring the Mountain Spirit back with me. Be not afraid to shake him heartily by the hand, though it is a black and rough one; he will do you no harm, for he is pleased, I doubt not, with his own benevolent act and our gratitude! only keep up your courage and you will receive no harm at his hands."

As his terrified wife was much opposed to this subterranean expedition, and the children wept and clamoured around him, and when he attempted to leave them pulled him back again by the skirts of his coat, he was obliged to break away from them by main force, and hurry through the thick underwood to the appointed spot. He found all the tokens of the place unchanged, as he had imprinted them upon his memory. The old half-decayed oak at the root of which was the opening in the rock, stood there as it had stood three years before, but of the opening no trace could be found. Guy tried every means to gain an entrance to the mountain; he took a large stone, and hammered upon the rock, thinking the spirit might choose to open at the summons; he drew forth the heavy purse, jingled the hard cash, and cried out at the top of his voice, "Spirit of the mountain, take what is thine;" but the spirit answered not by word nor sign. Thus the honest fellow was compelled to carry back the money that he was so desirous to repay. As soon as the family caught sight of him returning, they ran joyfully to meet him; but he, being sad and depressed that he could not discharge his debt to his benefactor, sat thoughtfully down upon the grass to consider what was to be done. At length, he remembered his hardihood when he first called upon the spirit by the offensive nickname, and resolved to have recourse again to the same expedient—"if he is offended," said he to himself, "he may beat and bruise me at his pleasure, so that he answers to my call." Thereupon he cried with all his might, "Rubezahl! Rubezahl!" His anxious wife prayed him to be silent, and tried to stop his mouth; he would not be persuaded, but bawled louder and louder. Suddenly the youngest boy ran to his mother's side in terror, crying "Ah, the black man, the black man!" "Where? where?" asked Guy, and his hopes revived. "Yonder, he is hiding under that dark tree," and all the children crept into a cluster together, crying bitterly. The father searched in every direction, but saw nothing: it was an illusion, perhaps a passing shadow; in short, the spirit did not choose to appear, and all his calling was in vain.

The whole family now set out to return, and father Guy walked sad and sorrowful towards the broad highway they had left. Then there arose a gentle rustling among the trees of the forest, the slender birches bowed their leafy heads, and the shimmering foliage of the aspens chattered in the breeze; which now came nearer and shook the outstretched arms of the old oaks, and scattered around the party a drift of withered leaves and dry grass; little clouds of dust rolled in the pathway, at which funny spectacle the children, who thought no more of Rubezahl, were much amused, and ran after the dried leaves, with which the whirlwind played at gambols. Among the withered leaves there was a piece of white paper blown across the road, after which the young ghost-seer made chase; but when he had almost got it, the wind caught it up again, and away it went out of his grasp. Thereon he threw his hat after it, which, at length, by good luck, fairly covered it. As it was a fair white sheet of paper, and the economical father had taught them all never to waste anything, however trifling, the little fellow brought it to him, expecting a word of praise and a smile of approval. When Guy had opened the folded paper to see what it might be, he found it was the bond which he had signed in the cavern for the hundred crowns, The paper was torn from top to bottom, and under the sum total was written the word "Received."

What a moment was that for poor Guy! His emotion was almost too much for him. At length he cried out with delight, "Rejoice, dear wife and children, rejoice! He has seen us, he has witnessed our gratitude; our benefactor is with us, though we cannot see him, and he knows that Guy is an honest man. I am free from debt; now let us return home with thankful hearts." Parents and children wept many tears of joy and thankfulness, before they came up with their waggon; and as the wife had a great desire to visit her connections, in order, by the display of their prosperity, to shame the shabby knaves against whom her husband's accounts had excited her warmest indignation, they turned the horses' heads in that direction, and rolled merrily down the mountain-side—arrived at the town as the sun was setting, and stopped at the very house from which, three years before, poor Guy had been thrust forth neck and shoulders. He knocked boldly this time, and asked for the master of the house. An entire stranger came towards him, in nowise related to the family; from him Guy heard that the once wealthy cousins had succumbed to misfortune. One was dead, another was ruined, a third had been obliged to run away; all, in short, had disappeared, and their name was no more heard in the town. The parties passed the night with the hospitable stranger, who detailed these affairs circumstantially to man and wife at the evening board. The next day, Guy returned with his family to their home and occupation, resumed his honest industry, continued to increase in wealth and goods, and remained an honest, respectable and prosperous man all his life long.

THE COALITION MINISTRY.—THE CABINET.

Lord Derby, although supported by the largest and most thoroughly united party in the House of Commons, has fallen from power, by the financial incapacity of his cabinet. Never were greater blunders committed than the attempt, first, to cast away £2,500,000, (the burden of which nobody complained of,) by abolishing one half of the malt tax; and second, to extend the area, and double the rate of the house tax. We will not stop now to consider the other parts, some of which were really good and practical, of Mr. Disraeli's famous budget. We do not believe that that budget was his own. We appreciate his ability and sagacity so favourably, that we cannot help thinking that the bad parts of it were forced upon him by Lord Derby and his other colleagues. Besides we also consider it just to say that Mr. Disraeli resigned office with the well-earned reputation of an able leader and powerful debater.

We have now a coalition ministry. Who are the members of this new Government? We will take them alternately from the Peelite and Whig list. We will begin with Lords Aberdeen and Lansdowne, statesmen whose high administrative reputation, great experience, and unimpeachable purity of private as well as public character, are alone sufficient to justify the greatest public confidence.

George Hamilton Gordon, Earl of Aberdeen, was born in the year 1784, and married in 1805 the daughter of the first Marquis of Abercorn, who died in 1812. He married secondly Harriett, daughter of the Hon. John Douglas, who died in 1833; since which time his lordship has remained a widower.

We believe that few men possess more useful administrative, legislative, and diplomatic knowledge than the Earl of Aberdeen. We believe, although we may have differed from some of his political views, that there never was a more pure-minded statesman, or that any man is more deservedly esteemed for the virtues which have adorned his private life.

During the Wellington Administration, and when that office was vacated by Lord Dudley, a short time after the death of Mr. Canning, he filled with great ability, judgment, and reputation the office of Secretary of State for the Foreign Department. Nor must it be forgotten that he administered the affairs of that difficult and delicate office during the French Revolution of 1830, when instead of interfering with the internal affairs of Europe, he cordially joined with the Duke of Wellington in recognising the new government of France.

When the Duke of Wellington in 1834 became First Lord of the Treasury, the Earl of Aberdeen was chosen Secretary of State for the Colonies, in which office he continued until the 14th of April, 1835, when Sir Robert Peel's ministry resigned. During this brief period his Colonial administration was wise and just, and he restored much of the harmony between the Home Government and the Colonies, which had been recklessly disturbed during the administration of Mr. Stanley, now Lord Derby.

On the formation of the Peel Ministry, in September, 1841, the administration of Foreign Affairs was intrusted to the Earl of Aberdeen; and we are enabled to say, with confidence, that he conducted the policy of the United Kingdom towards foreign states, with that wisdom and dignity which should always distinguish the British statesman who is intrusted with that department. It was during his term of office that those two perplexing and difficult questions, the Boundary Dispute between America and England, were finally and satisfactorily adjusted. Lord Ashburton was intrusted by him to settle the Boundary line between the State of Maine and the Provinces of Canada and New Brunswick. Lord Ashburton carried out the instructions of Lord Aberdeen, and negotiated with the late Daniel Webster the treaty which adjusted and terminated that Boundary Dispute, which had lasted, until then, since the Independence of the American Union.

The Oregon or North West Boundary, still continued a question of the most difficult nature. The British Minister at Washington refused, in 1844, to accept of the American ultimatum of the parallel of 49 degrees N. lat., as the boundary line west of the Rocky Mountains, between British America and the United States, on the Pacific. But Sir R. Peel and Lord Aberdeen, after taking all the perplexing difficulties of this dispute into their consideration, accepted the Washington ultimatum, retaining the whole of Vancouver's Island for the British Crown.

The Oregon Boundary was, by Lord Aberdeen, settled in 1845: the consequence of which is, that there does not remain any real ground of misunderstanding, although Lord Malmesbury acted very rashly with respect to American vessels frequenting the fishing grounds of British America. We wish a liberal arrangement was concluded with the Government of Washington, in order that these fisheries might be engaged in common, providing that British caught and cured fish were admitted duty free in the United States, and the coasting trade of the British Colonies, and of the United States, were freely thrown open to the vessels of both countries.

During Lord Aberdeen's administration of the Foreign Office, the shipping interests of Great Britain complained loudly against the amount of tolls exacted by the King of Hanover, on the Elbe, at Staade, and against those exacted by the King of Denmark, in the navigation of the Baltic, at Elsinore. The settlement of the Staade Duties was confided to Commissioners, and a moderate scale was adopted instead of the previous high rates, and embodied in a treaty accordingly, in 1842. The Sound Duties were, at the same period, in like manner adjusted, and a moderate tariff substituted for the former unequal and grievous scale.

In the whole commercial legislation of Sir R. Peel, and in our commercial relations with foreign states, he was constantly supported by the Earl of Aberdeen; and the course which the latter has pursued since the resignation of the Peel Ministry of 1846, as well as during the whole of his previous life, may justly inspire the greatest confidence in him, with regard to every question that bears on the security and dignity of the Crown and Government of the United Kingdom, or the civil, religious, and political liberty of her Majesty's subjects. Therefore, in every sense of the word, Lord Aberdeen is "a safe minister."

Henry William Fitzmaurice Petty, Marquis of Lansdowne, born in 1780, is a descendant of the celebrated Sir William Petty, author of "Political Arithmetic," and whose Reports on Ireland, if they had been attended to when he wrote, would probably have saved that country from most of the calamities which she has undergone since the reign of James II. The present Marquis is second son of the first Marquis, more conspicuously known as the Earl of Shelburne. He received his education first at Westminster, and afterwards at Edinburgh, under the roof of Dugald Stewart. He also graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge. At Edinburgh, he was one of the leading members of the "Speculative Debating Society;" and he there acquired the practice as well as the power of debating, which distinguished him after entering the House of Commons. He entered Parliament in 1802, as member for Calne; and, on the death of Mr. Pitt, became Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1807. He devoted much of his attention to the affairs of Ireland, in the intelligent and sagacious spirit of his celebrated ancestor; and on his first appearance in the House of Commons, Mr. Fox compared him to Mr. Pitt when at the same age. He avoided imitating the tumultuous language of those violent debates which were occasioned by the wars of the French Revolution. He represented the University of Cambridge on his becoming Chancellor of the Exchequer; while, at the same time, Lord Palmerston, at the early age of twenty-two, was returned as his colleague. On resigning office, he ceased to represent the University; but he afterwards sat as Member for Camelford, until the death of his elder brother without issue, in 1809, when he succeeded to the estates and title of his father, the Marquis of Lansdowne.

He married Louisa, daughter of the second Earl of Ilchester, who died in 1851.

During the Regency Debate, he supported the party of the Prince of Wales: and it was supposed that, after the assassination of Mr. Perceval, that party would have been called into office, but for certain conditions which they proposed, and which were rejected by the Prince whom they had supported.

In 1814 he moved an address declaratory that the attempts to abolish the Slave Trade had not been attended with complete success, and praying that more efficient means should be employed for that purpose. Although always liberal, he was not a violent opponent of the Liverpool Ministry.

In 1824 he moved the house to declare for the immediate recognition of the independence of the South American States. On this occasion he said, "He might ask their lordships if they could contemplate any course of events by which the independence of the Spanish Colonies could be finally prevented?"

He adverted to the feeble condition, financially and morally, of Spain; the occupation of that kingdom in 1824, by a French army, and the consequent impossibility of Spain reconquering her former colonies. He, as well as Mr. Canning, rejoiced in believing that the Spanish-American Colonies would become great when they became free—would become wise, and institute liberal and practical administrations; and that the people would become intelligent, prosperous, rich and happy. Unhappily those ardent and liberal aspirations of the noble Lord have not been realized. Had those countries been peopled by Anglo-Saxons, who would at once have introduced the free institutions of England into their boundless regions, not only would the expectations of the Marquis of Lansdowne have been realized, but the sanguine hopes of Mr. Canning would have been carried into glorious and practical effect.

But the inhabitants of the countries conquered and colonised by Spain, had no traditions except those which flowed from, and were merged in, despotism; while their minds were fettered by the darkening power of an ecclesiastical priesthood, ever unfavourable to the useful and enlightened education and liberties of mankind.

Soon after the formation of Mr. Canning's Ministry, in 1827, the Marquis of Lansdowne accepted the seals of the Home Department, but on finding that Mr. Herries had been appointed Chancellor, and not being able to introduce his friend Lord John Russell into the Cabinet he tendered the seals to his Majesty, and was only induced to retain them on being informed that Mr. Herries was recommended to the king by Viscount Goderich.

On the death of Mr. Canning on the formation of the Goderich Administration, Lord Lansdowne remained in office until January 1828, when the late Sir R. Peel, under the Wellington Ministry, accepted the seals of the Home Office.

On the formation of the Ministry of Earl Grey, in 1830, the Marquis of Lansdowne became President of the Council, in which office he continued until the abrupt dismissal of the Melbourne Ministry in 1834. But, on the return of Lord Melbourne to power, the noble Marquis again became President of the Council, and continued in office until 1841, when that Cabinet resigned. In July, 1846, he for the third time became President of the Council, in the Ministry of Lord John Russell.

During the whole of Lord Lansdowne's public life no man has been more conscientiously liberal and no statesman more practical. In no man's judgment has there been more reliance placed. In the House of Peers he has always been distinguished as a sound, clear, moderate, and practical speaker; and those who heard him taking leave, as it were, of public life, in the year 1852, could not but admire the dignity, and, at the same time, the moderation of language, which graced the high reputation of his Lordship.

The advocate of the abolition of Slavery and the Slave Trade—of Catholic Emancipation—of the redress of the grievances of Ireland—of the education of the people—of the Reform Bill—of reforms in the administration of the law, and of all ecclesiastical abuses—must be a man highly gifted by education and by acquirements, and at all times the patron of learning, art, and science, and one of the most amiable and courteous gentlemen in the relations of private society, consequently he must be considered a statesman of sound and safe principles, as well as one of the greatest ornaments of the peerage.

Such are the two statesmen to whom her Majesty confided the formation of the present Coalition Ministry. Lord Lansdowne, although the adviser, has not, however, taken office, but he will not the less give his support to the present Government.

We will now come to the Secretaries of State.

The Foreign Department is now administered, we believe, temporarily,* by LORD JOHN RUSSELL. Differing, as many do, on various questions from this statesman, we at once admit that he is one of the most practical administrators in the United Kingdom, we may say in Europe. At the present time no other man can be found so eminently qualified to lead the House of Commons, nor should the nation forget the early advocacy of the Reform of abuses by Lord John Russell.

His lordship was born in Hertford-street, London, on the 19th August, 1792, and is the third son of the Duke of Bedford by his first marriage. He was educated first at a private school, near Sandwich, and afterwards at Westminster, and at the university of Edinburgh. He married first, in 1835, Adelaide, eldest daughter of Thomas Lister, of Armitage Park; and secondly, in 1841, Lady Francis Anne Maria, second daughter of the second Earl of Minto. He entered Parliament in 1813 as member for Tavistock, for which with a short interruption he sat until the year 1819. His first speech was in favour of repealing the alien act, and he argued against continuing the war with France.

In 1819, on Sir Francis Burdett's motion for reform, he declared himself favourable to triennial parliaments, but would not pledge himself to support any inquiry into the general state of the representation, as such an inquiry would fill the minds of the people with indefinite and vague alarms. During the same year he in an able and temperate speech submitted four resolutions, declaratory of the expediency of disfranchising corrupt boroughs, of compensating pure electors, of transferring the right of representation, so taken away, to large towns, and for preventing bribery at elections. But on the suggestion of Lord Castlereagh his lordship considered it prudent to withdraw those resolutions, and gave notice of a motion for the disfranchising of Granpound, which he finally carried in 1821, and the vacancy caused by the disfranchisement was filled up by giving an additional member to the county of York.

In 1821 he brought forward without success a measure for disfranchising several corrupt boroughs, and transferring the seats to be declared vacant to large towns.

In 1822—23—26 he brought forward resolutions to the effect that the state of the representation called for the serious attention of the house.

In 1826 he moved a series of resolutions against bribery at elections, which were carried by the casting vote of the Speaker. At this time his lordship sat for the county of Huntingdon, but he was rejected for his advocacy of Catholic Emancipation.

He was, however, returned for the Irish borough of Bandon Bridge; and his next Parliamentary movement, in 1828, was one which should ever render the country grateful for his services: for he was fortunately enabled to carry the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts in that year; since which, those obnoxious statutes have for ever disappeared from among the written laws of the United Kingdom.

On the 28th May, 1830, he made a very powerful and logical speech against Mr. O'Connell's anarchical motion for universal suffrage, advocating, at the same time, moderate reforms, and declaring his opposition to sweeping measures. The part which he took in supporting Sir R. Peel in the removal of Catholic disabilities; and his exertions afterwards, in 1832, in favour of passing the Reform Bill, and in carrying many liberal measures, are all highly creditable to him as a statesman; although he has, no doubt, like other statesmen, committed some blunders, such as his letter to the electors of Stroud, respecting the finality of Parliamentary reform.

He came into office with Lord Grey's Ministry, in the subordinate place of Paymaster of the Forces, which he filled from 1830 to November, 1834. On the return of Lord Melbourne, in 1835, he became Secretary of State for the Home Department, in which office he administered with industry, skill, and success the numerous difficulties attending the New Poor Law Act. In August, 1839, he succeeded the Marquis of Normanby as Secretary of State for the Colonies; which office, we have no hesitation to say, and we shall be borne out by the Colonists far and wide, he administered with probably more satisfaction to the Colonists, than any previous Colonial Minister; and

* Lord John will, out of office, but with a seat in the Cabinet, continue to lead the House of Commons. He will be succeeded by the Earl of Clarendon, who has had great foreign as well as administrative experience, first, in our commercial relations with France, then as British Ambassador in Spain, then as Lord Privy Seal, in the Melbourne Ministry, afterwards as a most efficient President of the Board of Trade, and lastly as a most successful and popular Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

it was with no small consternation to his Majesty's subjects in the Colonies that he was replaced, in 1841, by Lord Stanley, the present Earl of Derby, whose former mal-administration is considered to have originated all the discontents which led to the Canadian rebellion.

On the fall of the Peel Ministry, Lord John became Prime Minister, in July, 1846, and continued at the head of the Government until March, 1852. It is remarkable, that one of the first acts of his administration was the introduction of a Bill nearly similar to that which aided in driving Sir R. Peel from office; in carrying which, Lord John had the magnanimous support of his great predecessor.

The Government of Lord John Russell is distinguished for having repealed the most obnoxious parts of the Navigation Laws—for reducing the Sugar Duties, and some others, including Stamps —for repealing the Window Tax—for extending the Irish Representative Franchise—and for preserving peace with foreign states, and tranquillity at home, amidst the revolutions of Europe in 1848. He had also to grapple with the calamities of an Irish famine and the commercial crisis of 1847-8. In the House of Commons, however, he governed by sufferance and not by a Parliamentary majority; and, notwithstanding his own great abilities and the able assistance of Lord Palmerston, and the indefatigable industry of Sir Chas. Wood, his Ministry in that House was remarkably weak. Until the deplorable death of Sir Robert Peel, he had the consistent support of that statesman. He had also the support of Sir James Graham, who, it is supposed, had early entertained the view of taking office with the Noble Lord.

From the day, however, on which Lord Palmerston was dismissed from power, it became evident to all but men of shallow mind, that the Ministry of Lord John Russell would not, as then constituted, be much longer endured by the House of Commons.

Lord John Russell is a man of great industry and acquirements. He is author of a very interesting life of his patriotic ancestor, Lord William Russell, also of an "Essay on the British Constitution," and of "Don Carlos," a tragedy. It is said that he has also written an "Essay on, or an account of, the Introduction of the Turks into Europe." But a work which he has written, although it does not bear his lordship's name, entitled, "A History of the principal States of Europe, from the Peace of Utrecht," in 2 vols. 8vo., is undoubtedly a work which deserves a much higher reputation than it has obtained. A new edition, with the noble author's name, would acquire deserved credit. He has besides consented to edit the works of Thomas Moore, we believe for the benefit of the poet's family.

As an orator Lord John Russell, with rather a weak, but clear voice, is a remarkably distinct speaker. He arranges his facts with great skill; and although occasionally cold and inanimate, he rises on important occasions with surprising spirit, force, and effect. The "modern Timon," describing the coldness of Lord John's eloquence on ordinary occasions, concludes—

> "But see the statesman, when the steam is on,
> And languid Johnny glows in glorious John."

Henry Pelham Clinton, fifth Duke of Newcastle, and Secretary of State for the Colonies, was born in London, 1811, and married the daughter of the tenth Duke of Hamilton, from whom he was divorced (1850). He graduated at Christ's Church, Oxford; and he entered the House of Commons, as Earl of Lincoln, in 1831, and was a Lord of the Treasury during the Wellington and Peel administration of 1834-5, at which time his friend Mr. Gladstone was also one of the Lords of the Treasury. In 1841 Lord Lincoln was appointed First Commissioner of Woods and Forests, Land Revenue, Works and Buildings, an office which he resigned the 2nd of March, 1846. In this department, which affords but a limited area for administrative statesmanship, Lord Lincoln was attentive, and in regard to the public parks and buildings his arrangements uniformly manifested good taste, and were always satisfactory to the public. He was Chief Secretary for Ireland, and a Cabinet Minister from January to July 1846.

To those who are unacquainted with the Duke of Newcastle, it may seem that his administrative knowledge may not be sufficient to enable him to undertake the great and responsible duties of the office which he now holds, with the prospect of giving satisfaction to the colonists. We do not join in that opinion. We have known him, for many years, as a laborious statesman, and one who has acquired a full knowledge of the affairs of the British empire, by travelling in the principal States of Europe. He has greatly profited by the experience afforded him while associated with the Ministry of Sir R. Peel, and by several years' close attendance in the House of Commons, in which he was a pleasing and successful speaker. He has been equally successful in the House of Peers. He is a thorough Free-trader and an honest friend of civil and religious freedom. He is sagacious, and his judgment is usually sound and practical; and although intrusted with one of the most important departments under the Crown, we shall be greatly disappointed if he does not succeed to the entire satisfaction of the United Kingdom, and of those who are most interested, the colonists; no man, we believe, can be more anxious to do that which is right, and few men are more able to do so than the Duke of Newcastle.

Henry John Temple, Viscount Palmerston, was born in 1784, and is collaterally descended from the celebrated Sir William Temple, of whom Lord Chesterfield says, he was the first man who wrote the English language with purity and elegance.

His lordship entered Parliament as Member for the University of Cambridge, in 1806, and almost immediately after became Secretary at War, an office which he administered with masterly ability until the year 1828, when he resigned in consequence of the dismissal of his friend, Mr. Huskisson, by the Duke of Wellington.

On the formation of the Grey Cabinet he was chosen as the most able man to fill the delicate, difficult, and perplexing office of Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The negotiations carried on at London, for the settlement of the kingdom of Belgium after the revolution of 1830, devolved nearly altogether upon, and were finally arranged chiefly through the perseverance and judgment of the noble Lord. He held office until the dismissal of the Melbourne Ministry, December, 1834, and returned on the resignation of Sir R. Peel, in 1835, when he continued in the Foreign Department until the resignation of that Ministry in 1841.

During this period of six years, he had many difficulties to contend with. In his negotiations he was not only eminently successful with continental Europe, but with Mexico and the South American States; countries where, formerly, British subjects were frequently exposed to great injustice. He was greatly blamed with regard to the Syrian war; but those who are acquainted with Turkey and the Government of the Porte, and of the power at that time of Mehemet Ali and Ibrahim Pacha, will arrive at the conclusion, that although interference in the affairs of other countries is scarcely, under any circumstances, to be justified on the part of England; yet had not the Turkish-Syrian question been settled at that time by force, in all probability a dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire would have been the consequence; and the further effect would be a war as to who should share in its partition.

Under these circumstances, it became a vital policy, on the part of England, to settle the position of Mehemet Ali in Egypt; a country with the Government of which it will be impossible for us to allow any other power to interfere, so long as we possess any dominion in India or Australia.

When the Russell administration was formed, he again became Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and, notwithstanding all that has been said against his lordship's interference with the affairs of foreign countries, and especially in the affairs of Greece, we are firmly of opinion that he was always truly the patriotic Minister and Statesman of the British Empire, and not of Austria, Russia, France, or of any other power.

There is no doubt that his dismissal led to the downfall of the Government of Lord John Russell. Although we regret that he is not now Foreign Minister, yet we believe, from his wonderful business-powers and indefatigable industry, that there is no man, unless it be Lord John Russell or Sir James Graham, who could so efficiently administer the Home Department as Lord Palmerston. Nor is there any man so great a favourite in the House of Commons.

Robert Monsey Rolfe, Lord Cranworth, Lord High Chancellor, son of the late Rev. Edward Rolfe, was born at Cranworth, Norfolk, in 1790; married the daughter of the late Thomas William Carr, Esq., of Frognell. Educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. Has been Solicitor General. On petition as member for Penryn from 1832 to 1839, when he became Baron of the Exchequer, and Vice Chancellor, in 1850.

George John Douglas Campbell, eighth Duke of Argyll, &c., and Lord Privy Seal, was born at Ardrimple Castle, Dumbartonshire, in 1822, and married 1844 the eldest daughter of the second Duke of Sutherland. He is hereditary Master of the Queen's household in Scotland, and hereditary Sheriff of Argyllshire. This young nobleman has written a very able "Essay on the Ecclesiastical History of Scotland since the Union," and in 1851 was elected Chancellor of the University of St. Andrews. He is much esteemed by those who personally know him, and he will, no doubt, fulfil the expectation which is entertained of his becoming useful and able in public life.

Granville George Leveson Gower, second Earl Granville, President of the Council, was born in London in 1815. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and married, in 1840, the only daughter and heiress of the Duke Dalberg, and relict of Sir Ferdinand Richard Edward Acton, Baronet. He succeeded his father, who was long our able, kind, and accomplished ambassador at Paris, in 1846. He was attaché for some time to our British Embassy at the Court of Louis Philippe, where he for some years acquired an intimate knowledge of the French people and their language. He had the happiness and advantage of having for his mother a lady of great acquirements, highly beloved and esteemed by the French Court, by all diplomatic circles, and especially as the lady of the British Ambassador. Lord Granville was appointed a Railway Commissioner (Board of Trade) in 1846; Master of the Buck Hounds, July, 1846, to May, 1848; Vice President of the Board of Trade and Paymaster-General to the Forces in 1848 to Dec., 1851; Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, from Dec., 1851, to Feb., 1852. He was also one of the most able and active Commissioners of the Great Industrial Exhibition, in 1851. He sat in Parliament as Lord Leveson, first for Morpeth, from 1837 to 1843, and for Lichfield, from Sept., 1841, to Jan., 1846. He is nephew of the Dukes of Devonshire and Sutherland, and first cousin to the Earl of Carlisle. In public life he has been, and is, very popular, and we know of no man more beloved and respected in private society.

Sir James Graham has been so long and so well known to the public, that our sketch of him will be brief.

He was born in 1792, married in 1819 Fanny Callendar, daughter of Sir James Campbell of Ardinglant. He sat first for Carlisle, 1826-9; for East Cumberland, 1830-37; Pembroke District, 1838-41; Dorchester, 1841-47; Ripon, 1847-52; and in the latter year was again returned for Carlisle, where he was re-elected a few days ago. As member for Carlisle, he advocated almost Radical measures. He has written one pamphlet of a very liberal tendency, which he has acknowledged; and he is said to have written another, proposing still more sweeping measures. As Member for East Cumberland he was introduced into Lord Grey's ministry in 1830, and administered the Admiralty with very great ability, although in some instances, with probably an injudicious economy, and he resigned in 1834, in consequence of what he considered Lord Melbourne's too great an extension of reform in the Irish Church. He was elected on high Protectionist principles for Dorchester, in 1841, and became a Member of Sir Robert Peel's Government, in which he aided, we have no doubt, honestly, in abolishing the Corn Laws, and in carrying all the Free Trade measures of that Government. As Minister for the Home Department his administration was conspicuous for its ability, energy, and justice. In office there is probably not a more efficient administrator in whatever department he may fill, than the Right Hon. Baronet.

It is true that he has frequently changed his political, commercial, and financial opinions; but this he frankly avows, and no man could be more liberal than he in his late speeches at Carlisle. He is certainly a powerful Minister in any Government.

The Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exchequer, is the third son of the late Sir John Gladstone, Bart., of Fasque. He was born at Liverpool in 1809, and was educated at Eton, and Christ Church, Oxford, where he acquired a double first class in 1831. He sat for Newark from 1832 until December, 1845. He was a Lord of the Treasury in 1834, and Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, during a short period, in 1835, when he resigned along with Sir Robert Peel's Ministry. He was President of the Board of Trade and Master of the Mint from Sept., 1841, to May, 1843, when he was appointed President of the Board of Trade, retaining the Mastership of the Mint. He resigned both offices in February, 1845; probably for no other cause but, conscientiously, in order that it might not be said, or even suspected, that his vote, soon after, on the Maynooth Grant, could be influenced by his holding office.

He accepted the seals of Secretary of State for the Colonies, in Dec., 1845; when, not being returned for Newark, he remained without a seat in Parliament until returned for the University of Oxford, at the general election, 1847: for which he was re-elected in 1852, and lately, after a most unjustifiable and protracted opposition, highly discreditable to the illiberal and intolerant members of Convocation.

Mr. Gladstone's parliamentary career and his official life have been remarkably effective. His application and industry at the Board of Trade and the Colonial Office, have justly distinguished him as a statesman and administrator. He was one of the most efficient colleagues of Sir Robert Peel, and he managed the affairs of the colonies with prudence and sagacity. In truth, the new Chancellor of the Exchequer is one of the most remarkable men of the age. As an orator, for which nature, study, and knowledge have eminently qualified him, he is the most ready speaker in the House of Commons. Never was there a more effective speech than his withering reply to Mr. Disraeli's closing speech on the Budget.

We believe that he is eminently qualified to fulfil the difficult duties of his present office; at all times a department which is most likely to render a minister unpopular. There is great truth in the dictum of Emery, Surintendant des Finances under Mazarin, "Que les Ministres des Finances n'etaient faits que pour être maudits."—"That Ministers of Finance were only made to be cursed." He meant in a popular sense. We are of opinion, however, that Mr. Gladstone, with his undoubted strict integrity, skill, and financial knowledge, will bring forward, if not the best and most equitable budget, the best and most equitable that can be rendered practicable under existing circumstances, with the present House of Commons, and with that sacred regard which he is bound to maintain for the national credit and dignity. We say thus from a perfect knowledge of him as a statesman, as well as of his private character.

It would be superfluous to say that Mr. Gladstone is an accomplished scholar. He is author of the "State in its Relations with the Church;" "Church Principles Considered in their Results;" a small but very able work on "Recent Commercial Legislation;" besides other works. His two Letters to the Earl of Aberdeen, on the atrocious political imprisonments and cruelties committed in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, do the highest credit to his heart as a man, and to his mind as a statesman. Mr. Gladstone married, in 1839, Catherine, eldest daughter of Sir Stephen Richard Glynne, of Hawarden Castle, Flintshire.

The Right Hon. Sir Charles Wood, Bart., President of the Board of Control for the Affairs of India, is the son of the late Sir Francis Lindley, and was born at Pontefract, in 1800. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, where he obtained a double first class degree in 1821. He sat for Great Grimsby from 1826 to 1831. He married in 1829 Lady Mary, the fourth daughter of the second Earl Grey, and was returned for Wareham in 1831. He was private Secretary to the latter, when Prime Minister; Secretary to the Treasury 1832 to 1834; Secretary to the Admiralty 1835 to 1839, when he resigned. He was Chancellor of the Exchequer from July 1846 to February 1852. He has been returned for Halifax at every election since 1832.

Sir Charles Wood is a most laborious man of business. Mr. Disraeli's first budget and estimates, on which such extraordinary praise has been lavished, were Sir Charles Wood's, without the least alteration, and passed in the exact shape in which they were left by him, on resigning office in February 1852. It is remarkable that while Sir Charles was somewhat unpopular, we think very unfairly, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, no man was ever more popular or efficient, as Secretary, both at the Treasury and the Admiralty. His knowledge of all public business is, we may say so confidently, extensive. He is high-minded, and his principles and character are strictly honourable in private as well as in public life. We believe that he will prove the ablest Minister of the India Board that has ever presided over that department. He will have to grapple with all the responsibilities and difficulties of renewing or modifying in 1853-4 the Government of the British Indian Empire. A task of stupendous magnitude.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIDNEY HERBERT, son of the eleventh Earl of Pembroke, by his second wife, only daughter of the late Count Woronzow, was born at Richmond, in 1810. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, where he was in the fourth class classics, in 1831. He has sat for Wiltshire since 1832. In 1846 he married the daughter of Major General A'Court, niece of the first Lord Heytesbury. He was Secretary of the Admiralty from September 1841 to February 1845, and Secretary at War from February 1845 to July 1846. In both he proved an efficient man of business. In Parliament he is a clear, fluent, and logical speaker. Personally he is much esteemed, and his benevolence is worthy of great praise, in promoting the emigration of poor females to Australia, where they now live in great comfort and happiness. In the Cabinet, in office, and in Parliament, Mr. Sidney Herbert will prove one of the ablest Members of the Government. His views are liberal, and he is an honest and thorough free-trader.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR WM. MOLESWORTH, BART., son of the seventh Baronet, born in London in 1810, succeeded his father 1823, was M.P. for Cornwall 1832 to 1837, for Leeds, 1837 to 1841, and since 1845 for Southwark, and was High Sheriff for Cornwall in 1832. In 1844, he married the only daughter of Bruce Carstairs, relict of Temple West, Esq. He was formerly, we believe, proprietor of the Westminster Review, and he has edited the works of Hobbes. He has always been returned to Parliament as a "Radical Reformer," and "in favour of complete religious liberty and equality, and the removal of the disabilities of the Jews." As he has had no administrative experience, we cannot, as yet, say anything of the First Commissioner of Works, &c., as an administrator. There is much expected from him, and at his recent election his speech was bold and frank. In Parliament, the subject of his speeches was chiefly the Colonies, on which his views were comprehensive, and illustrated by statistics.

Such are her Majesty's present advisers. Never has there been brought together in one British Cabinet so many experienced and able men—will they hold together? will they continue in power? We sincerely hope they will—we believe they can. There may be some differences of opinion between them. But each must give way, in some reasonable degree, to his colleagues. If ever there could be a time when unity in a Government was more necessary than at another, for the good of the whole empire, the present is that time. We trust that every member of the Cabinet will entertain towards his colleagues the sentiment of bearance and forbearance, on all differences.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

DOMESTIC.

THE new year commenced with a new Administration. The Ministry was formed before the close of December, but too late to allow us an opportunity of giving a list of the Cabinet in our last month's Register. It is therefore inserted here:—

First Lord of the Treasury	The Earl of Aberdeen.
Lord Chancellor	Lord Cranworth.
Chancellor of the Exchequer	Mr. W. E. Gladstone.
Home Secretary	Lord Palmerston.
Foreign Secretary	Lord John Russell.
Colonial Secretary	The Duke of Newcastle.
First Lord of the Admiralty	Sir James Graham.
President of the Council	Earl Granville.
Lord Privy Seal	The Duke of Argyll.
Secretary at War	Mr. Sydney Herbert.
First Commissioner of Works	Sir William Molesworth.
Without office	The Marquis of Lansdowne.

As regards the Foreign Office, the present arrangement is understood to be only a temporary one. Lord John Russell will hold the seals till Parliament meets, when he will hand them over to the Earl of Clarendon, retaining, however, his seat in the Cabinet, with the leadership of the House of Commons.

If the strength of a ministry were in proportion to the reputation and abilities of its members, the present, as every one admits, would be one of the strongest ministries that have ever conducted the government of the country. Moreover, it is now affirmed that Lord Aberdeen will have a larger body of supporters in Parliament than was at first supposed. He can count upon a good majority in the House of Lords, including "the whole bench of bishops," and some forty or fifty supporters of the late administration are said to have already given in their adhesion to the new combination. From all these circumstances the conclusion has been drawn by sanguine partisans, that the present government is likely to be not only a strong, but a stable one,—a conclusion which seems to be, to say the least of it, premature. A political party, like an army, requires something more than able leaders and well-filled ranks to ensure success. There must be concert, discipline, and enthusiasm; and of none of these is the Aberdeen administration yet assured. The ministry is made up of members of different parties, who have frequently been arrayed on opposite sides, and who still hold, on some important questions, widely different views.

Moreover, though they are doubtless all to a certain extent Liberal in their opinions, it is nevertheless true, that the leading ministers, with one or two exceptions, are less ardent in their desire for progress than the great body of their followers. This state of things is perhaps a necessity in the present condition of politics; but it is certainly destructive of that popular enthusiasm which is the motive power of a Liberal Administration. The ministerial party will probably present to its opponents an array not much more orderly or formidable than that of the Etruscan army, described by Macaulay, when

> Those behind cried "Forward!"
> And those before cried "back!"

The favourable result of the re-elections has, indeed, been regarded as a proof that the new Ministry is really a popular one. To a certain extent, the inference is fair enough: but the test, under present circumstances, is not altogether satisfactory. The recent general election had nearly exhausted the energies and the funds of the opposite party. The budget of the late Ministry, unpalatable alike to friend and foe, has been a great help to their successors. And after all, it must be admitted that if these appeals to the constituencies have aroused little opposition, they have, on the other hand, called forth few very warm manifestations of favour. The amount of popular support which the present Ministry may expect to enjoy, will depend entirely upon the character of the measures which may be brought forward by the Government.

The general policy of the Administration has been vaguely indicated by Lord Aberdeen, in his formal declaration made on assuming office, and by other Members of the Ministry, in their addresses to their constituents. From these manifestoes the public have learned that the intentions of the Government are—

To maintain a pacific but independent foreign policy;
To carry out free-trade principles;
To extend education;
To reform the representative system;
To secure the freedom and purity of elections;
To promote law reform;
To remove the Jewish disabilities;
To reform the customs department; and
To establish self-government in the colonies.

This is certainly an imposing array of Liberal professions; but it has not escaped notice that only one specific measure is promised, namely, the alteration of the oath which excludes Jews from Parliament. In all other departments of reform, the new Ministers have left themselves free to do as much or as little as they choose, provided only that they attempt to do something. It may be said that an announcement of specific measures could not reasonably be expected at this moment, and that the public must necessarily be contented for the time with general assurances of good intentions. Unfortunately, however, it happens that the leading ministers have declared against one highly important measure, in such a manner as to awaken some doubt concerning the real character of their general intentions. The ballot is not to form a part of the new Reform Bill. The reasons given for excluding it are so weak and unsatisfactory as to lead irresistibly to the conjecture that the true reason is purposely kept back. Lord John Russell, for example, objects to the ballot because he is "against secrecy in everything." Why, then, are not meetings of the Cabinet and of the Privy Council held with open doors? And why are not all foreign despatches published without delay? The truth is, of course, that publicity is only desirable as a means to an end—the end being good government; and when it ceases to be conducive to that end, it ceases to be desirable. Sir James Graham, again, urges that it would be impossible, in this free country, to make secret voting compulsory. Yet, in this free country, open voting is now made compulsory. The interference with the electors' freedom of action must be exactly the same under either law; but in the one case the compulsion would be for his benefit and for the public good, while in the other it injures alike the voter and the country.

One can hardly resist the conclusion, that these sagacious Ministers do not really oppose the ballot for such feeble and untenable reasons, but rather because they have no hope of carrying it through the House of Lords, except by means of a popular agitation which they are unwilling to arouse. It may, consequently, be inferred, that no measure is likely to be proposed by the present Government, which they cannot hope to carry without an appeal to the country. A majority of the House of Lords will support the Administration so long as no really large and important measure of political reform is brought forward; but no longer. And who expects that a system of education, which would satisfy the country, will be sanctioned by the bench of bishops?

Indeed it is evident, that no very beneficial legislation on these points can be expected from a Government which declines to resort to popular enthusiasm for the momentum necessary to overcome the dead-weight of the obstructive branch of the legislature. Such being the case, some may be inclined to ask, and not without apparent reason, what benefit the nation is likely to gain from the change of Ministry, beyond the merely negative advantage of getting rid of a bad budget. The answer is easy, if not entirely satisfactory. The country will have, in the first place, the advantage of good administration. It is something to know that every department of the public service is likely to be well-conducted, and that if any great emergency should arise, the ablest and most experienced statesmen in the country will be ready to meet it. We may also have the satisfaction, such as it is, of knowing that the sympathies of the present Ministry are with the people. We shall be no longer annoyed by denunciations of "the rabble," and by proclamations of the necessity of resisting the progress of democracy.

But popular sympathies and good administration will not alone satisfy the country. The defects of our representative system are so great and glaring, and public feeling has become so keenly alive to them, that any Government which is not prepared to make a serious and determined effort for their removal, cannot expect long to retain the confidence of the people. While the present critical state of affairs on the Continent endures, it must tend to repress political excitement in this country. But as soon as this peculiar "pressure from without" ceases to keep the present Government in place, its lack of genuine reforming zeal will become apparent, and will, probably, lead either to its early modification or to its downfall.

COLONIES AND DEPENDENCIES.

One of the most important subjects which will come under the consideration of Parliament this year, is the question of the renewal of the East India Company's Charter, or, more properly speaking, of the constitution under which India is governed. Our vast possessions in the East have been hitherto regarded as little more than the private property of a joint-stock association. They have been treated as a great patronage-preserve, maintained chiefly for the purpose of enabling the directors and shareholders of the East India Company to provide comfortable and respectable situations for their relatives and friends. The natural rights of the natives of India, though not altogether forgotten, have been little respected. A new feeling, however, is beginning to prevail, which will not allow this state of things much longer to continue. It is beginning to be felt that the main principle on which our system of Indian government has been based is not the right one. Hereafter, to satisfy the national sense of justice, it will be necessary to govern India, not for the advantage of any class of persons in this country, but mainly with a view to the benefit of the native inhabitants. This change of system is demanded not only by the requirements of justice, but by a regard for the interests of the empire. The natives of our Indian territories are awakening to a conciousness of their rights as subjects of the British Crown. It is in vain that we establish despotic governments in any region of the earth; the principles of British liberty, sown everywhere by our open courts of justice, our unfettered press, and even by the free speech and manners of the very officials who administer the arbitrary system, will in time take root, spring up, and produce their fruit. Already one petition has been received in this country, signed by three thousand native inhabitants of the Bombay Presidency, who, among other reasonable demands, ask that natives, when properly qualified, may be admitted to a share in the local administration. This petition may be regarded as only the herald of many similar claims, from different portions of our Eastern dominions. And the fact, rightly viewed, is a most encouraging indication, since it shows that, with a fair and conciliatory system of government, we may expect to hold those countries by ties of gratitude and affection, infinitely stronger and more durable than the fetters of military force.

Even now, our Government in India, such as it is, is naturally enough preferred by the natives of Pegu to the tyranny of the Burmese autocrat. It is not surprising, therefore, that, having been compelled to conquer this portion of Burmah, our Indian authorities should have come to the determination of retaining it. The whole coast region, from Prome southwards, is to be annexed to our former conquests in that country, thus shutting up the sovereign of Ava in the interior region watered by the upper branches of the Irawaddy. This determination may be judicious under present circumstances, though strong doubts are entertained on that point; but the arrangement is certainly not likely to be a permanent one. It is not to be supposed that the Burmese king, even if quieted for the present, will long refrain from repeating the offences which have twice led to the dismemberment of his kingdom. A third war will complete the absorption of his dominions; and as this consummation may be considered inevitable, many persons are of opinion that it might as well be completed at once. But the established etiquette of Indian conquest is opposed to such summary proceedings; and the system of gradual extension has at least the advantage of allowing to the native rulers repeated opportunities of amending their government and their manners, if they choose to do so. As the sovereign of Burmah is not one of those from whom any self-improvement of this kind can be expected, the ultimate destiny of his dominions may be foretold with certainty.

The Kaffir war has survived its official termination. The last mail brought reports of renewed depredations and conflicts along the eastern frontiers of the Cape colony; and fresh disturbances seem to have arisen in the interior country beyond the Orange River, whither General Cathcart had repaired, with a force of 2000 men, to overawe the unruly tribes. In the meantime, the colonists, left without any organization for self-defence and self-government, were electing delegates to a convention which was to be held for the purpose of securing this advantage. The new Colonial Minister will have ample room for the exercise of his talents, and the display of his conciliatory views, in the settlement of these South African difficulties, so needlessly prolonged by the indecision of the late Government.

In Australia, prompt action and a liberal policy on the part of our Government are not less required. The local administrations in all the colonies appear to be more or less unpopular; and considering their nature, this circumstance is not at all surprising. The Governors and the other chief officials, holding offices similar to those of our ministers, are all appointed by the authorities in Downing Street, and are in no way responsible to the colonists, whose affairs they manage, and whose revenues they spend. Each colony, it is true, has a Legislative Council; but the salaries of all the colonial officials are withdrawn, by an Act of the Imperial Parliament, from the control of these Councils. Moreover, in each Council, one-third of the members are nominees of the Governor; and though the remaining two-thirds are elected by the people, it appears that in New South Wales at least, if not in the other colonies, an unfair arrangement of the electoral districts has been made, enabling a minority of the electors to choose a majority of the members. It is not surprising that the colonists should be discontented with a legislature of this kind. In Van Diemen's Land, the continuance of convict transportation has already brought the public administration to a "dead lock," by producing a vote of want of confidence in the Governor. In the new colony of Victoria, the neglect of the measures necessary for the protection of life and property was likely to lead to the same result. In that colony, moreover, as well as in New South Wales, a large portion of the public land is monopolized by a small number of wealthy squatters, or leaseholders, under a system with which the colonial legislatures have no power to interfere. "Tens of thousands of successful miners," says the Melbourne Argus, "are willing and anxious to invest their profits in the most natural mode—the purchase of a farm or garden near the scene of their successful labours as gold-diggers. By the absurd system, however, of locking up the lands in the hands of the squatters, this most natural and necessary process appears to be surrounded with sufficient difficulties to prevent our Executive from taking any means to give a settled character to our population, or remove the very great evils necessarily resulting from continuing to place nearly the whole adult population of the colony in the position of mere reckless and scrambling adventurers. But, while all sorts of difficulties are thrown in the way of the miners' investing their newly-gained wealth in the soil, or in the erection of houses for themselves and their families, our Government can distort the Land Sales Act so far as to alienate large tracts for the gratification and enrichment of their friends the squatters; and the monstrous anomaly is thereby exhibited of land being withheld from the people to be given to the personal friends or political supporters of the Government."

A considerable quantity of land, however, must have been sold, as the amount received for land-sales during the last quarter, was nearly £270,000. The total income of the colony for the present year was estimated at £1,733,000, to be levied from a population numbering about a hundred thousand souls. The expenditure was set down at £1,749,000. "Of this latter sum," says the journal just quoted, "not less than £412,715 is for the police establishments, £94,449 for penal establishments, the administration of justice £42,280, military £67,489, making a total of £616,933 to be spent in protecting life and property, and repressing crime. That such a sum should be deemed necessary for the purpose in so limited a community, is sufficiently significant of the blessings to be reaped from close proximity to a penal colony."

FOREIGN.

The history of the new French Empire during the past month has been rendered remarkable chiefly by the rebuffs which the Emperor has had to stomach from the military potentates of Eastern Europe, and by the sudden resolution which has raised a young Spanish lady to the Imperial throne. The "legitimate" despotisms refuse to fraternize with the parvenu tyranny, and only recognise it under protest, and in the most ungracious manner possible. It is not surprising that, under these circumstances, Louis Napoleon should be disposed to pay little regard to courtly prejudices in the choice of a consort. It is equally natural that, at such a time, finding his advances repelled in the East, and fearing a financial crisis at home, he should be anxious to make it appear that he is on the best terms with his neighbours of the West, and, above all, with Great Britain. Quaking Belgium is reassured: and, as for this country, the cordial sentiments of the Emperor are proclaimed by the highest authority in the columns of the Moniteur. Indignant complaints are, at the same time, made of the little credit given by the English press to previous declarations of the kind. Unfortunately, the impression which might be made by these friendly professions is greatly weakened by the simultaneous publication of a list of vessels of war now building in the French dock-yards, comprising twenty ships of the line, all to be fitted up with screw propellers, eighteen frigates, and fifteen other screw steamships. There is but one power in the world, for assailing which such a naval armament could be needed by France. The publication of this list does more to arouse suspicion against Louis Napoleon, than all the leading articles which he seems so much to dread.

The Prussian Chambers have been in session during the past month, and have evinced sufficient freedom of action to show that the parliamentary system has taken firm root in northern Germany. The two most striking results of the late European convulsions appear to be, that France has lost constitutional liberty and Prussia has gained it. France is indebted for her present tyrannical Government to her uneducated peasantry and her ignorant soldiery. Prussia, like France, has an army of conscripts; but they are drawn from an educated population, and, consequently cannot be employed as unreasoning instruments for the suppression of their country's liberties.

LITERATURE.

The Adventures of a Bear, and a Great Bear too. By ALFRED ELWES. With Nine Illustrations by Harrison Weir. London: Addey and Co., 21, Old Bond-street. 1853.

IF it be any recommendation to a book that it excites, at the same time, both the risible and the thinking faculties—that when one has done laughing aloud at the broad fun it contains, one begins laughing again in one's sleeve at its covert satire—then this story of a bear has substantial claims to merit. Whoever shall sit down to read it, be he man or boy, makes sure of one hour's amusement at least, and will, most probably, wish that the bear, blackguard as he was, had lived a little longer, nor come so soon to his untimely bier. But should the reader have any pictorial predilections, and be capable of judging upon a question of art, he will find here, not merely amusement for an hour, but a source of lasting interest and admiration. The illustrations, by Mr. Weir, are of the very highest order, and such as will be rarely surpassed by any effort of his own or another man's pencil. They constitute a series of noble drawings, every one of which might be made the subject of a finished picture by Landseer, without derogating an atom from his reputation. As specimens for the portfolio of the collector, they are alone worth five times the cost of the book. We might instance, as especially characterized by breadth of drawing and quiet humour of expression, "Selling the Natives," in p. 63, or "Cheap Harmony," at page 69; but, in fact, the merit of the whole series is so great, that it is almost invidious to make a selection.

A Practical Introduction to English Composition. By ROBERT ARMSTRONG and THOMAS ARMSTRONG. Part II. Edinburgh: Sutherland and Knox. London: Simpkin and Marshall. 1853.

THE former part of this work, of which the present volume forms the completion, has already met, as it deserved, the approbation of the public. This second part has been prepared with equal care, and at a greater cost of labour. The two together form an excellent series of practical lessons in the art of English composition; and it might be difficult to find a better work, irrespective of its low price, to put into the hands of a young student desirous of learning to express his thoughts in correct and elegant language. The work has an additional recommendation, inasmuch as no young man can work his way honestly through it, without adding considerably to his stock of knowledge.

The Poetical Works of Edgar Allan Poe; with a Notice of his Life and Genius. By JAMES HANNAY, Esq. With Twenty Illustrations. London: Addey and Co., 21, Old Bond-street. 1852.

IN a late number of "Tait's Magazine," we gave a biographical sketch of Edgar Poe, to which the reader can turn, if he choose, for our notions on the subject of this semi-insane, irregular, and, in some senses, prodigious genius. We cannot but think that Mr. Hannay, in the life prefixed to this volume, has adhered too much to the maxim, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum." Poe may have loved the beautiful in some way peculiar to himself; but he neither cultivated it in his own mind nor recognised or paid homage to it elsewhere, save in those dreamy abstractions which were the subjects of his musings and his muse. He did his worst to injure, and to render miserable all with whom he was connected, no matter by what ties. Without principle, and a stranger to the feelings either of honour or gratitude, he was yet the idol of his countrymen from his original and extraordinary talents. His works are as little like those of other writers as he was like other men. He was a meteor that blazed with a portentous light for a short time, and was as suddenly extinguished in darkness. As a poet he would have been far greater, had three-fourths of his poems never seen the light. His "Raven," has no parallel in the whole domain of literature, and there is little worthy to rank with it even in his own works. We quote for the benefit of our readers the following short poem, written in early youth, and which is, perhaps, worthy of the unqualified praise which his biographer awards it.

TO HELEN.

Helen, thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicéan barks of yore,
That gently o'er a perfumed sea,
The weary way-worn wanderer bore,
To his own native shore.

On desperate seas long wont to roam,
Thy hyacinth air, thy classic face,
Thy Naiad airs have brought me home
To the glory that was Greece,
And the grandeur that was Rome.

Lo! in yon brilliant window-niche,
How statue-like I see thee stand,
The agate lamp within thy hand!
Ah, Psyche, from the regions which Are Holy-land!

The present volume is a neat and well-printed edition of the collected poems of this strange erratic genius, and the illustrations are most of them well executed.

The Key to the Mystery; or the Book of Revelation Translated. By EDWARD RICHER, of Nantes. Belfast: J. Simms. London: John Chapman. 1853.

THIS work professes to contain a familiar exposition of the explanation of the emblematic language of the Apocalypse, first promulgated by Emanuel Swedenborg. At a time when the authority of the Bible is so strenuously assaulted by some parties, and so zealously vindicated by others, we need not be surprised to see the teachings of the renowned visionary, who, and whose followers, stand up for the plenary inspiration of every word and syllable of the sacred text, brought again into prominence; and the present volume is but one of a series of publications, which, under the title of the "Spiritual Library," seeks to disseminate and to popularize the opinions which they hold. The promoters of this series profess to war against the worship of creeds, which has made Infidelity, under the garb of hypocrisy, or Rationalism, all but universal, and in the pursuit of that desirable object we wish them all success. With regard to the contents of this volume, however, we confess ourselves in no condition to pronounce a judgment; seeing that we have not read it, and could not read it if we would, there being a dozen pages wanting in the first sheet of the copy sent us for review. This, in the present instance, happens to be of no importance; we have never read a commentary on the Revelations, and never intend to—having a presentiment that our wits would inevitably go a wool-gathering if we did. It was the remark of a celebrated divine, yet living, that of all the commentators on the Apocalypse, there were few who were perfectly sane before they commenced the undertaking, but not one who was not mad upon that subject, at least, before he had done with it. Without going the length of a certain old monk, who, in denouncing all such intermeddlers, declared that they invoked upon themselves the curses threatened in chap. xxii. verse 18, we are inclined to think that the world is neither wiser nor better for all the time and talent consumed in endeavouring to find a "Key to the Mystery."

The Church Before the Flood. By the Rev. JOHN CUMMING, D.D. London: Arthur Hall, Virtue, and Co. 1853.

LIKE all the works of Dr. Cumming, and they would almost form a library of themselves, this book is characterized by a fluent, readable, and occasionally eloquent style, which carries the reader agreeably along to the end. In this peculiarity, we should imagine the reverend Doctor is unrivalled; his works, more than those of any author we could mention, are the light-reading of sacred literature, and it is this, probably, which constitutes one great element of their popularity. The present volume, though an admirable specimen of the style of the author, cannot be looked upon as a fair sample of his talents; it is more like the unpremeditated fireside conversation of an intelligent man, elicited by a social circle of friends, than the thoughtful conclusions of a Christian philosopher, pondered in the seclusion of the closet. Probably these several chapters are little more than a series of discourses pronounced, with or without notes, from the pulpit, and afterwards written hastily for the press; at any rate they would be the better for a careful revision and a liberal curtailment — revision with regard to assertions not to be supported, and curtailment of common-places, in which it does not become Dr. Cumming to deal so largely in print. The best portion of the work is the second chapter, entitled, "Genesis and Geology," in which the author reconciles the narrative of Moses with the facts which science has evolved in our day; but this has been done before, and, to say the least, quite as well, by the writers to whom the Doctor is indebted for his information, and by others besides. In dealing with the great difficulty which geology threw in the teeth of theologians, namely, the indisputable fact that death existed in the world thousands and tens of thousands of years before Adam's sin, Dr. Cumming rejects the theories of Hitchcock, of Pye Smith, and of Jeremy Taylor, and adopts that of Milton, in the Paradise Lost. He does not believe that man originally was intended to die, but yet he believes that certain animals were created with carnivorous teeth, for the purpose of inflicting death upon others—the Creator anticipating that Adam would sin, and the brutes participating his fall, be reduced to devour one another. Candidly, we don't relish this way of settling the question at all, and think either of the rejected theories preferable to this. To our minds it is as far from the truth, as the assertion which the writer makes relative to the patriarchs, some of whom he says "lived a thousand years;" having never heard of these millenarians, we should like to have chapter and verse for the statement. From the fifth chapter, on "the Curse," we extract the following eloquent and suggestive passage:

> Since we discover the great fact, that death is the effect of sin, and secondly, the other fact, that death existed before Adam's sin was committed, how do we reconcile the latter discovery with revelation? I answer, we have evidence in the Word of God, as well as in the world of God, that sin existed before Adam's sin. We read of angels that revolted against God, of "angels which kept not their first estate," and are now plunged into everlasting darkness. We thus discover a great fact, that sin existed somewhere prior to the creation of man. Is it therefore improbable—I submit the thought for study—is it improbable that this earth was the habitation of angels in a long prior, and it may be, still more glorious state? May it not be, that the havoc and disorganization which geologists discover as occurrences in distant ages, are the wrecks of an angel Paradise, existing long prior to the garden of Eden, and the creation of man. I do not say that it is so. I throw out the conjecture for study. It is not written, it is merely guessed. Angels fell, and they committed sin, a greater sin than Adam and Eve. Who knows the height and depth and extent to which this sin of theirs may have gone? Who knows what havoc it may have brought upon creation all around them, and how high towards heaven it may have reached, how deep towards earth's centre it may have shot? Who knows but that these subterranean traces of ruin, of disorganization, and of death, may not be the issues of angels' sin, long prior to Adam's creation, and that the havoc and death that we see now is only the transference, not the first application of a sentence, executed millions of years before, to a new dynasty introduced in new circumstances, and of which Adam was the federal head, who sinned and brought upon his race what angels brought upon theirs—death, with all its misery, and all its woe. If this be the case, then the sentence of death pronounced upon Adam was not the creation of a new law, but the application of an old one; it was not the occurrence of a first fact, but the repetition of a long prior existent fact.

This is very clever and ingenious, but it is not in accordance with the theory of Milton, who sung

> Man's first disobedience, and the fruit
> Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
> Brought death into the world;

nor does it agree any better with the assertion of St. Paul, who tells us in 1 Cor. xv. 21, that by man came death; or with the evident belief of other inspired writers, who taught the same doctrine in the same plain way. It appears to us, that the way out of this "great difficulty," does not lie in the direction Dr. C. has pointed at, —though a way there undoubtedly is.

Those who have fears on the subject of an approaching Papal hierarchy in this country, will relish the latter part at least of the following confident prophecy from one who is esteemed so competent an authority as our author.

Very solemn is the period at which we stand. Very soon, in all likelihood, Europe will be blazing around us, its cities the volcanic mouths and craters of the pent-up elements of ruin. Very soon, days of trial and trouble, such as have not been since the beginning, will overtake us. . . . That very earthquake that will disorganize kingdoms, bury proud capitals, and agitate the world, carries with it, like a millstone into the sea, great Babylon that pollutes the earth. I have no more fear that the Romish apostacy will gain the supremacy in this land, than I have that Mahometanism will. I believe that it is now plunging in its last spasmodic convulsions. It will, like a dying maniac, put forth its most tremendous energies in its last struggle, but its fury is the evidence of its last moments; in spite of all it will go down like a millstone into the sea, and shall be heard and seen no more at all.

If building new cathedrals, new colleges and new schools—if buying new estates and making thousands of new proselytes among all classes of our countrymen, from the highest to the lowest, are really nothing more than so many "last spasmodic convulsions," then has the doctor good grounds for his prophecy—though in our ignorance we should have been led to a different style of vaticination, looking to the aspect of affairs as they stand at present.

Were it not foreign to the general purpose of our columns, we should be tempted to quote further and to comment a little more; but we must forbear, leaving the Church before the Flood to the consideration of our readers, who will find a deal of suggestive matter in it, though somewhat wearily drawn out and mingled with much that is trite and common-place.

The Little Drummer; or, Filial Affection. A Story of the Russian Campaign. Translated from the German, by W. H. Dulcken. With Illustrations. London: Addey and Co., Old Bond-street. 1852.

It is very unusual to meet with a story written for the amusement of children which combines the merits and attractions of this charming little volume. The hero, a son of a German tradesman, enlists as a drummer boy, as the only means of releasing his father from a prison. He joins the grand army, travels to Moscow, and returns through the horrors of the retreat. He makes friends by his humanity and good conduct, and is eventually restored to his parents. The wretched practices of war, and their horrible results are portrayed in graphic colours; and the youthful reader in imbibing lessons of morality and kindness, learns at the same time a portion of European history fraught with the deepest interest. The illustrations are in the first style of art both in design and execution.

This volume appears to be made up of a set of random sketches, selected from a pile of unused notes and memoranda rejected in the preparation of former works. It is written throughout with much more vivacity than humour; but containing a good many curious scenes and lively descriptions, it will afford pleasant occupation for an idle hour. There is, however, a flavour of something about it not altogether to our taste, and which, were it not the work of a lady of acknowledged fashion, we might characterize by the term "vulgarity:" perhaps it may be extra gentility after all, and it is our discrimination alone that is at fault. The subjects of the volume are as various as the whims of the authoress, who jumps from steam to yellow fever, and from America to Tunis, and back again, without prelude or preparation. She has, however, something to say, go where she will, and carries a fund of animal spirits along with her which makes her society agreeable. The following is a specimen of the lady's Tunisian experience:—

One thing at Tunis which we became reconciled to without much effort or difficulty, was the admirable national dish called kouskousoo; it is a delicious kind of food, made of a great variety of ingredients, and is supposed to be highly nutritious and wholesome. The Moorish women eat enormous quantities of this, in hopes of making themselves corpulent, which is reckoned here a great beauty. They seem to succeed, from some specimens I have seen; and a friend told me of one famed beauty, who, by all accounts, had certainly crammed herself with kouskousoo to some purpose; "For," said my informant, "her huge double chin, or rather chins, hung almost down to her waist." Imagine those stair-like flights of chins descending in lines of wavy wagging to that waist, which to be in any proportion of pinguidity, must be of such a size as would take one a week to walk round it. When this fair Moorish Lambert moved from one end of the room to another (and she seldom or never attempted to go beyond the boundaries of her own chamber), or walked a single step, she was invariably seen, like a patrician coat of arms, between two supporters—in fact she was absolutely obliged to be assisted along and sustained by two strong persons; and had she lived in the days of the great prophet and paid her respects to him, Mahomet might have triumphed in having the mountain come to him after all.

Another of these voluminous beauties is described as resembling a "constellation of feather-beds:"—

She gave one the idea of being lost in her own immensity; and when she spoke, her choked, suffocated voice seemed to come from the centre of the earth almost; her eyes appeared buried in vast protuberances of plumpness, and she must have had incessantly a fine prospect of gently undulating hills of cheeks before her. Methought she could see a great deal of her vasty face without the help of a looking-glass— . . . . But her hands struck me with the most utter astonishment; the fingers were exceedingly taper at the points, and very nearly down to those taper tips swelled immense cushions of fat, so that each finger had a little the appearance of a thick round pincushion, terminating in a single pin, and that a black one, for, as I frequently remarked in Tunis, the henna, or whatever other other composition they make use of there, is black.

The chapter on the subject of steam in America is well worth reading. From it we learn that travelling on the Hudson, at the rate of twenty miles an hour, may be done at the cost of about six miles a penny; so cheap, indeed, is the travelling, and so good the fare, that many people locate themselves on board these boats in the summer, running backwards and forwards, at a daily expense of 10*s.* 10*d.* Some of the vessels have honeymoon cabins fitted up for the reception of new-married couples, few of whom it appears are too sheep-faced to parade their conjugal felicity on board. On the subject of explosions the authoress of &c. is both serious and jocose. The following specimens are quite American:

A surgeon of a celebrated racing-boat was blown in a fearful explosion right through the slight roof of an artisan's dwelling, and deposited with a crash on the table. Without moving from his occupation the person invaded observed philosophically, "I reckon, stranger, you'll pay me thirty dollars for this here." "I reckon I won't," responded the invader; "I never paid more'n ten dollars for the same thing, and ain't a going to begin now."

Once when a keen race was taking place, the captain courteously begged those passengers who had not yet paid their fares to transfer themselves and pockets to the part of the boat farthest removed from the boilers and danger; "and you," he added, with equal politeness, to those near the machinery who had booked up, "may all stay here, for it doesn't matter in the least."

We had marked for extract one or two passages from the chapter on "Rescued Slaves," but we have not room for them. The above quotations must suffice for the present.

A Day of Pleasure. A Simple Story for young children. By Mrs. Harriet Myrtle. With eight Illustrations by Hablot K. Browne. London: Addey and Co., 21, Old Bond-street. 1853.

The subject of this clever and useful little book is the history of one day in the life of a spirited, wayward, but loving child of four years old; and we presume that it is written to be read by parents and nurses in the hearing of children about the same age. The difficulty of writing a good book for such a purpose is far greater than any one who has not tried it can imagine; even the attempt is honourable; and success, which in this case is complete, is a triumph of no common occurrence. This work, trifling as some may think it, could only have been written by a mother impressed with the sacredness of her responsibility, and endowed with sufficient wisdom to read the inmost heart of her child. The illustrations are graceful designs from the pencil of one whose works are familiar to the public, and they are etched in a superior and effective style. The mother and child at page 26 is a delightful domestic picture, and the drawing of the whole series is admirable.

The Family Economist; a Penny Monthly Magazine, for the Industrious Classes. Vol. V. London: Groombridge and Sons. 1852.

The proprietors of this magazine seem impressed with the very proper notion that since they teach economy they are bound to set a practical example of it, and hence the volume before us presents one of the cheapest shilling's-worths to be met with in the market. Two hundred and forty pages of excellent print and paper, crammed with useful information of every sort, illustrated with engravings, and interspersed with tales and light reading—surely here is enough for the closest shaver that ever looked at both sides of a shilling before parting with it. To the cottager and inexperienced housekeeper, the shilling spent upon this book may be the saving of fifty others in the course of the year.

A Hero. Philip's Book. By the Author of "Olive," &c. With Illustrations by Godwin. London; Addey and Co. 1853.

This is the work of a lover of boys, who has studied them well, and paints them to the life—no easy task. The Hero is a quiet-tempered Scotch youth, and his heroism is of the truest sort, consisting in the practice of self-abnegation and the preference of the happiness of others to his own advantage. To those of our readers who remember the delightful story of Cola Monti, we need only mention that this is by the same writer, and illustrated with engravings of equal merit, to ensure it a ready reception.

The Australian and Californian Gold Discoveries, and their probable Consequences, &c. In a series of Letters. By James Patrick Stirling, F.R.S.E. Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd. London: Simpkin and Marshall, 1853.

Mr. Stirling, in this work, sounds a note of alarm in reference to the Diggings and their produce. He differs altogether in opinion from the writers in the "Economist" and their followers, who see no cause for immediate apprehension on the score of an immense influx of gold. According to him, we are not to imagine that because the operation of the discovery of the Potosi mines of silver was very tardy in its effects upon the value of money—the same thing will take place in relation to gold. He shows what is doubtless the fact, that the two cases are widely different, silver being obtained from the mine in a state somewhat analogous to that of iron-ore, and requiring much expensive labour to prepare it for the market or the mint—whereas gold is no sooner rescued from the earth than it is fit for use. The following brief extracts from the last chapter of the work will show some of the conclusions to which the author has been led:

It is during the progress of the consequent change from low to high prices, that the chief benefits of those new sources of wealth which Providence has opened up to us will be experienced by the producing classes. . . . The increase of money, consequent on the diminished cost of the metals, will not raise the price of labour only, but the prices of all things. The enhancement of money wages will probably be preceded by the enhancement of the money value of commodities, and after the rise of wages and prices has become general, the labourer will be no better off than before. . . . . He gets more money, but he acquires no additional command over the goods which that money will purchase. . . . . Nor will the capitalist ultimately be in a better situation. His profits depend upon the proportion between his outgoings and his returns. Increase the amount of money in general circulation, and his returns will be raised in pecuniary value; but if his outgoings are raised, as ultimately they must be in the same proportion, the rate of his profits will not be increased. The amount of his profits will be greater, but he will in reality be no richer than before, because the increased amount will purchase no more of the necessaries of life than the smaller nominal amount which he now receives. . . . . As regards the agricultural interest, the change will affect landlords and tenants variously. By the proprietor who cultivates his own lands an improvement will be instantly experienced. . . . Rent and profits will increase in money value, but after the change has been fully effected, the increased amount will go no farther than the present amount in the purchase of commodities and the expense of living. To the tenant who has just entered upon a lease, for suppose twenty-one years, at a fixed money rent, the change will bring twenty-one years of increasing wealth and prosperity. To the landlord, who must wait until the expiration of this term for an increase of rent, and who must in the interval pay double for everything he consumes, with increased rates and taxes, and interest and jointures not diminished, the change will bring twenty-one years of hardship and privation. After the lapse of this period neither party will be a gainer. In the case of the clergy, whose incomes rise and fall with the average money price of corn, the change will be little felt. Not so with naval and military officers, judges, civil functionaries, and all who have fixed pecuniary incomes, &c., &c. . . . In a word, during the progress of the change, the producing classes will be the gainers, and consumers will be the losers. The former will benefit temporarily—the latter, at least those of them who live upon fixed incomes, will suffer in perpetuity. Debtors will get richer, creditors will get poorer. Production, in all the departments of industry, agricultural, and manufacturing, will be powerfully excited and stimulated. The creation and accumulation of capital, meaning by capital not gold and silver, but materials, provisions, &c., ... will be the ultimate consequence of the gold discoveries; and in this, rather than in the direct and immediate effects, the true value of these discoveries will be found to consist.

To the question, "Why not put an end to all doubts and anxiety on this subject, and obviate all future difficulties, by making silver the sole standard of our money?"—our author replies, that this question involves:

Not considerations of expediency alone, but the far higher considerations of equity and good faith. The legislature has now the power to a great extent simply by letting things alone, without violating any principle of justice, or trenching upon any law of God or man, to free the over-burdened industry and resources of England from the incubus by which they have been so long and so grievously oppressed. Would Parliament be justified then, in stepping in to prevent things from taking that course which nature and Providence appear to have beneficently determined they should take? or, assuming that all questions in connection with our public and national burdens are to be resolved by an appeal to expediency alone, would it be just to oblige private individuals, who have contracted pecuniary engagements under stipulations adjusted with reference to one standard of money, to liquidate and fulfil their obligations according to another standard?

This is a very eloquent disclaimer, and sounds well: but what becomes of equity and good faith if nature and Providence should combine to make gold as plentiful as the commonest of metals? Is the creditor and the mortgagee to accept of mere rubbish in payment of his claim, because that happened to be the standard of value when the debts were contracted? No man will reply in the affirmative to such a question. In reference to a recurrence to a silver standard, it may very well be that England shall be forced into such a measure. If other nations adopt it, and gold, as there is every reason to expect, depreciates in value, it is not very clear how foreign commerce is to be carried on unless we follow their example.

Mr. Stirling's book, be it remembered, deals comprehensively with the whole question, and may be read with profit by all who are desirous of obtaining a complete view of the subject. Though we cannot endorse the whole of his opinions, we can commend his work to the thoughtful consideration of our readers.

Uncle Tom's Cabin. By H. B. STOWE. With Twenty-seven Illustrations by George Cruikshank, Esq. London: John Cassell, Ludgate-hill. 1852.

GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, in the illustration of this edition of "Uncle Tom," has displayed his usual talents. He is excellent in his delineations of the humorous and comic scenes, but not so successful in those of a sober and pathetic character; there is vigour, life, action, however, in them all, and they would tell the story almost without the text. This volume is enriched with an account of the authoress and her family, and being handsomely got up, will be a favourite with the public.

Katie Stewart. A True Story. Blackwood and Sons, Edinburgh and London. 1853.

WE have here a singular and characteristic Scottish story, most agreeable to read, and pleasant to recollect. Katie, the heroine, is the lively, merry-hearted, wayward, and fascinating pet child of a Scotch farmer. Everybody loves and humours her, and she has her own way always, and a delightful way it is. She is taken from home to reside with the Lady Anne at Kellie Castle, where she grows from a beautiful child to a lovely woman, and where she has admirers among the occasional visitors to the castle. She turns a cold eye, however, upon them all, and true to the instinct of her nature and her humble class, waits for the inevitable he, who comes at last in the person of Willie Morison, a sailor, whom she finally marries, as she says, to save both their hearts from breaking, and who makes her a good husband, as in duty bound. The charm of this story lies in the faithful and life-like pictures it presents of Scottish character, and customs, and manners, and modes of life. Many of the individuals introduced are, no doubt, accurately sketched from nature; and their prototypes are to be found at the present hour in the rural districts of the north. The volume is handsomely printed.

Aladdin; or, the Wonderful Lamp, and Sinbad the Sailor; and Far Famed Tales from the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. With Illustrations. London: Addey and Co. 1853.

THESE are a couple of neat little pictorial editions of stories with which children of all ages are tolerably well acquainted. They have been selected with judgment, and are perfectly unobjectionable in every respect, and may be put into the hands of children with the certainty that they will afford them amusement, and excite the imagination without corrupting it.

Paris after Waterloo. Notes taken at the time and hitherto unpublished. Including a revised edition of "A Visit to Flanders and the Field." By J. Simpson, Esq., Advocate. William Blackwood and Sons, Edinburgh and London. 1853.

The interest excited just now by the decease of the great Duke, with regard to everything respecting him, has no doubt led to the publication of this volume. There is no denying that it contains matter of deep and permanent concern to Englishmen, and such as is not likely soon to be forgotten; indeed, the fact that ten editions of the work, in a less voluminous form, have already passed through the press, is a sufficient guarantee of its popularity. The Introduction gives a graphic picture of the state of public feeling in Edinburgh in 1815, where all the world were breathless with expectation of news from the seat of war, and where, at length, the announcement of the victory created a general holiday. Some six weeks after the battle, Mr. Simpson visits the field, and while on the spot with the reader, recounts the history of that day's work in a manner so clear, so comprehensible, and at the same time so spirited, that the dullest head may understand the details of the strife. The state of the game too, at its commencement, and at its fatal crisis, is shown by two excellent maps of the field, marking the position of the combatants both at the commencement and the virtual termination of the contest. As a history of the battle of Waterloo, perhaps this is, considering its laudable brevity, the most intelligible, the most animated and patriotic that has ever appeared; and at the same time, we see no reason to question the authenticity of anything related. Unfortunately the interest of Mr. Simpson's book slackens wofully so soon as he gets away from the field of battle. Pictures of Paris during the period of the occupation by the Allies are far from what they might have been had the author, with such opportunities, had his eyes open and his wits about him; and they smack more of the dry descriptions of the guide-books, to which we suspect no small portion of the bulk of this volume is owing, than of actual impressions derived on the spot. They are further disfigured by the display of silly anti-gallic prejudices worthy only of the period when John Bull hated the French, and felt it his duty to hate them "because they ate frogs and wore wooden shoes." Mr. Simpson is not content with beating the enemy, but he must abuse them afterwards; thus the military are all monsters of treachery and cruelty; among the citizens "domestic pleasure is never heard of, all the virtues, public as well as private which an English home founds and rears, exist not in volatile" Paris. Again, the ladies are such dowdies in dress "that I never looked twice at any of them," and that, it appears, because they have more sense than to squeeze their waists by tight lacing into the form of combined ugliness and disease. Further, "the Parisian mother is a perfect ostrich. The duties and cares of a nursery are her aversion, she boards her children out, that she may frequent the theatres, cafés, and the Boulevards. This is a monstrous evil." It would be a monstrous evil if it were not a monstrous calumny, as every one who has been domiciliated for any length of time in French families will at once declare it to be—and which Mr. Simpson ought to have known by this time, having had above thirty-seven years in which to correct the blunders of his first impressions. Of the accuracy of these impressions, by the way, a curious instance is afforded in page 238; at the plate-glass manufactory, "I saw," says he, "the process of silverising (he means silvering). The mercury is allowed to flow over the glass, and to remain to adhere for twenty-four hours." Now the fact is, the mercury is not allowed to flow over the glass, and if it were, and were allowed to remain till doomsday not a particle of it would ever adhere, as everybody knows perfectly well who knows anything at all of the nature of mercury. Of course such a mistake as this is of little consequence, but it shows us that the statements of Mr. S. must be received cum grano. Another blemish in this work, which we recommend the author to correct in the next edition, is the useless repetitions of the same thing with which it abounds. Thus we are distinctly informed three several times that "the British are the only troops in Europe that attack the head of a column without regarding its depth;" and there are a dozen at least of other good things (we suppose they must be called) which the author repeats again and again, as though imbued with the notion that the reader could never have too much of them. While giving advice, we may as well add that we should like to see the whole of the seven visits to the Louvre deleted from the volume, as being palpably de trop.

The Society of Friends. A Domestic Narrative; illustrating the Peculiar Doctrines held by the Disciples of George Fox. By Mrs. Greer, Author of "Quakerism; or, the Story of My Life." In Two Vols. London: Saunders and Otley, 1852.

This work, in which the very slight plot of a domestic romance is ponderously overloaded with the incomprehensible doctrinal rubbish of certain fanatical blockheads, who had or are supposed to have had a great deal to do in the establishment of quakerism, is not nearly so amusing as Mrs. Greer's former work. The story is little more than the narrative of a course of very pardonable hypocrisy on the part of a lovely young quakeress who, to escape a forced marriage with a drab and broadbrim suitor for whom she has no liking, conspires with a good-natured brother to deceive papa, mamma, and sister Jenever, and marry an officer in his majesty's service. The tale serves very well, however, as a peg upon which to hang the whole body, soul, and spirit of quakerism, as it exists in Mrs. Greer's imagination, and to exhibit all its imperfections to the light, with no very flattering comments. The authoress, it appears, passed some forty years of her life in the Society of Friends, and in her preface to the present work, she states that "a personal event, comparatively trifling, was, thanks be to God, made instrumental to my deliverance from this delusion." The event referred to was the discovery on her part that certain "faithful weighty Friends" were guilty of flagrantly dishonourable conduct, for which, so far from being censured, she found them upon investigation, sanctioned in their proceedings by the practices of George Fox himself, their founder—and "that the conduct which true Christians would instantly have reprobated as dishonest and false, was perfectly in accordance with the teachings and practices of the primitive quakers," who, it is said, held the doctrine that "it is expedient to hush up complaints when they touch persons eminent in the ministry." So Mrs. Greer abandoned the Society of Friends, and seeks to draw others after her by the publication of their errors, delusions, and hypocrisies, which it took her forty years to discover. "Friends," she says, > profess to worship God—they worship only "nothingness," and a silent meeting, without Bible, prayer, praise, or thanksgiving, is most appropriate homage to that idol. They profess to be Christians—they bow before no Saviour, but only something they call Christ, in themselves. They profess to be guided by the Holy Spirit—they are guided by a miserable substitute, which they call "best wisdom." They profess to honour the Bible—they dishonour it by setting their own writings above it. They profess to hold the truth—for truth they have substituted the delusions of George Fox.

Of these delusions, if the extracts from the works of that renowned enthusiast are true, fair, and ungarbled ones, and which we do not mean to question, some rather singular specimens are given in the pages of this narrative. Thus on one occasion, George had an immediate revelation from the Lord how he should wear his hair; and on another, he preached professedly from the Lord about the slits a woman should have in her waistcoat. He is said to assert that Quakers "are in the same power, understanding, knowledge, and immediate revelation from heaven, that the apostles were in," and that they can discern who are saints, who are devils, and who apostates, without speaking even a word. They have the Word of God, Christ, which is eternal and infallible in their heart, to judge persons and things. Writing to Richard Baxter he says, "Writing paper and ink is not infallible, nor the Scripture is not the ground of faith," &c. In the appendix is a copy of George Fox's will, copied from one in his own hand-writing, yet to be seen in the Prerogative Office, which appears to be the work of one of the most illiterate oafs that ever made the mistake of wielding a pen instead of a pitchfork. William Penn appears to but little more advantage; he believes in the infallibility of George Fox, and supports the pretensions of the shoemaker prophet, in a style of equal fanaticism; he nicknamed the Bible "John Faldo's Word of God," and declares that all who believe in it, in preference to quaker teaching, are anti-revelation adversaries. We might multiply such samples as the above, to the length of several columns; but the reader has already had enough. We candidly confess that we do not relish the spirit which has dictated the portraiture of quakerism which these volumes supply. Notwithstanding the pious prayer with which Mrs. Greer closes her preface, we suspect that malice and resentment rather than Christian charity have furnished the impetus to her labours. They bear far too vindictive a tone ever to be useful, and are more likely to bring herself, rather than the Society of Friends, into bad odour. For our part, we would infinitely rather accept the picture of quakerism from the pen of Bernard Barton, as it may be found in his letters to Mrs. Sutton, contained in the posthumous edition of his works, than any delineation from the pencil of an angry seceder, who having her long-delayed secession to justify, is necessarily open to suspicion. In the mean time we would recommend our Quaker friends to revise their antiquated Scriptures—rules and minute-books, and purge them of the nonsensical rubbish of a fanatical period.

The Vale of Lanherne, and other Poems. By H. Sewell Stokes. A New Edition with Additions, and Illustrations drawn on Stone, by C. Haghe, from Designs by J. G. Philp. London: Longman, Brown, Green, and Longmans. 1853.

The principal poem in this volume is a carefully polished production of no everyday order. Being chiefly descriptive of local scenery, it is possible that it may have but a local celebrity, as the general reader who is a stranger to the exquisitely romantic district which has inspired these strains, cannot test the accuracy of the pictures they so forcibly paint. But the work from its intrinsic merits is worthy of a wide circulation, and will be read with pleasure by all lovers of thoughtful and melodious verse. The following is a specimen of the author's descriptive powers:—

> 'Tis now the hour when o'er the eastern hills
> Morn, like a blushing bride, her pearls put on,
> While the proud lark at heaven's high lattice trills;
> Now milkmaids blithe their quilted kirtles don,
> And the rough ploughman gapes, and growls anon
> As the cock's clarion pierces his dull ear;
> Down the green lane the lowing kine are gone
> To where the noisy brooklet bubbles clear,
> And in the folds the flock their shaggy guardian fear.
> Now may be heard, under the vantage eave
> Of trellis'd villa in smooth-shaven lawn,
> The twittering swallow that seems loth to leave
> Her procreant cradle for the breezy dawn;
> At that soft, sweet reveillée, half withdrawn
> The muslin from the casement's jealous bar,
> Shows a fair form more timid than the fawn,
> But with an eye that, like the morning star,
> Gleams through its lashes long, which black as midnight are.
> . . . .
> Hark! 'tis the thunder of the early wain
> Down the paved streets, shaking the very walls,
> As the stout team their swelling muscles strain,
> While with a lusty voice the driver calls
> His long-maned comrades by their names, and falls
> His sounding thong innocuous in the air:
> The white-capt housemaids, in their dusty halls,
> Pause at the ponderous caravan to stare,
> And for the comely man a casual glance may spare.

A number of minor poems of considerable merit conclude the volume. Want of room compels us to confine our selections from these to

THE WINTER MARRIAGE MORN.

Merrily, merrily, ring the bells,
Down Farry's winding vale,
And o'er the moorland's floods and fells
Repeat a happy tale;
But who hath wed this wintry morn
No flower a maiden to adorn?

Merrily, merrily, still they ring,
Folks wonder who will marry:
The nightingale she waits for spring,
Till spring the turtles tarry;
And Hymen shivers as he sees
The icicles festoon the trees.

Merrily, merrily, still they chime,
The old pronounce it queer,
The young declare that any time
Will do throughout the year;
And Cupid laughs and says the same,
And seems to like the yule log's flame.

Love will not wait the vernal hour,
To love all months are May;
Old Christmas leaves his holly bower,
To give the bride away:
No lilies twine sweet Marian's hair.
But then her cheeks the roses wear.

The illustrations of the volume, which are large and in the first style of lithography, add much to its attractions.

An Introduction to Mental Philosophy. In two Parts. Intended especially for the use of Students in Universities. By George Ramsay, B.M. Edinburgh: Adam and Charles Black. London: Longman, Brown, Green, and Longmans. Rugby: Cropley and Billington. 1853.

We have only space at present to draw attention to this work, which will be found worthy of a careful perusal. The first part is devoted to a very clever and considerate examination of certain terms such as Substance, Quality, Quantity, Relation, Cause and Effect, &c., &c., which constantly occur in the vocabulary of philosophers. The explanations of Mr. Ramsay are clear, succinct, and intelligible, and leave the reader in no doubt as to the signification which he at least assigns to the terms in question—which is more than we would say for some writers on the same subjects. In Part the Second, in a comprehensive chapter under the head of reasoning, Mr. Ramsay attacks with more boldness and vigour than any of his precursors, the virtue and value of the syllogism. Giving six instances of regular syllogisms, in the first figure, to which, according to Aristotle, all legitimate syllogisms may be reduced—but of which we need quote but one familiar to all, and which runs as follows—"Whatever exhibits marks of design had an intelligent author. The world exhibits marks of design; therefore the world had an intelligent author" —he asks the question:—

Do men actually reason thus? That they do not openly or apparently so reason, every one's experience may convince him. . . . . In order to prove that the world had an intelligent author, none but a dialectician would begin by stating "whatever exhibits marks of design had an intelligent author;" but an ordinary reasoner would say, "The world exhibits marks of design; therefore it had an intelligent author." And so in other cases. But, though not expressed, is not the first or major proposition understood? Mentally embraced, though not stated in words? There lies all the question. When we examine (this syllogism) we find that the major is a universal proposition, and this, in fact, is one of the laws of the first figure, as it is of syllogisms in general, that one of the premises must be universal. Unless this be the case, no infallible inference can be drawn. If the major proposition be universal, it must embrace the conclusion, for this is only a particular instance of the same. Consequently by assuming the major we assume the conclusion; or, in other words, our first proposition takes for granted the very thing to be proved. And this, we are told, is the legitimate, nay, the only legitimate mode of reasoning! Certainly, of all the delusions that ever passed current in the world, this is the greatest; for it is a delusion not peculiar to the vulgar, but shared, even now, by some of the highest names in philosophy. It is engendered between reverence for antiquity and respect for Aristotle and Greek, and in many instances it has proved too strong, not only for common sense, but for high intellectual power. On that account it is the more important that the delusion should be expelled. . . . . Who, I would ask, starting from the major proposition of the syllogism, would think of proving that Cæsar, as a tyrant, deserved death, because all tyrants deserve death? That is the very thing to be proved. Whether we use the singular or the plural, it makes no difference, for the general term Tyrant comprehends as many particulars as the phrase all Tyrants. What can be more silly than the statement, a tyrant, any tyrant, deserves death, because all tyrants deserves death? But such, and no other, is the proof afforded us in this syllogism. These two propositions are in reality identical; they differ only in form. We conclude that what, instead of proving anything, begins by taking for granted the very thing to be proved, cannot be the natural mode of reasoning.

Mr. Ramsay follows up these hard blows by others equally severe, and shows that the appearance of perfect proof in the syllogism is nothing but a fiction, and that only where the premises are undeniable is the conclusion necessarily true. He observes:

The grand mistake of the syllogistic theory, then, is the notion that we can ever arrive at demonstration in reasonings about matters of fact; and in carrying out this notion, a form of reasoning was invented, (for invented is the word) whereby the appearance, and only the appearance of infallibility, was given to an argument. The very perfection of the proof in a regular syllogism shows the futility of the argument; for we know that, except in mathematics, there is no perfect proof; and consequently, the perfection can only be apparent, and therefore, the result of a trick. This trick, we have seen is assuming the conclusion in the premises. That a system of logic raised on such a basis, should so long have stood its ground, and that even at the present day it should have eminent supporters, is certainly one of the most extraordinary facts in the history of the human mind.

The above few extracts will suffice to show that the author of this book thinks for himself, and is not afraid of diverging from old and beaten paths. We may perhaps recur to this subject at an early opportunity.

Traveller's Library, Part 36. Swift and Richardson. By Lord Jeffrey. Reprinted from Contributions to the Edinburgh Review. London: Longman, Brown, Green, and Longmans. 1853.

These reviews of Walter Scott's Life of Swift and Mrs. Barbauld's Life and Correspondence of Richardson are well known to a good portion of the reading public. To say that they are admirably written, and form in themselves excellent biographical sketches of the celebrated men of whom they treat, is saying no more than the name of the author of them would guarantee to the reader. The unprincipled seducer and moral monster Swift is here painted in his true colours; and the cautious and self-complacent Richardson has more justice done him than he ever dreamed of in his day—or would have relished if he had.—We are glad to see, from an advertisement on the wrapper of this volume that the "Memoirs of a Maitre d'Arms," by Alexander Dumas, is announced for speedy publication in the same cheap series.

Letters from Ireland. By HARRIET MARTINEAU. Reprinted from the Daily News. London: J. Chapman, 142, Strand. 1852.

WE are glad to see these letters collected and printed in a permanent form. We believe them to be true and faithful pictures of the present condition of Ireland, and as such well adapted for circulation at the present time. We have faith in the ultimate prosperity of the Emerald Isle—believing with Miss Martineau that there are elements in the Irish character as well as in the Irish soil, which may be turned to a good account. The good time will come again when the storms of adversity have blown past, and old Ireland resume her lost station. Let those who fear the contrary read these letters and come to a more hopeful conclusion.

The Drama of Life, and Lyrical Breathings. By J. H. R. BAILEY, M.R.C.P. London: Simpkin, Marshall, and Co. Wolverhampton: Williams. 1852.

IF, as we are at liberty to suppose from the Horatian maxim on the title-page of this book, Mr. Bayley be a doubtful aspirant for poetic fame "qui timuit ne non succederet," he might have done better to have listened to the suggestions of his timidity than to have courted the verdict of the public by an appearance in print. We cannot compliment him upon the performances in this volume, which appears to be made up altogether of the milk-and-water stuff that constitutes the staple ware in the poets' corners of provincial newspapers. The writer wants the most common of all qualifications for a versifier, viz., a musical ear and sense of the harmony of rhythm. What can be said to such lines as the following, which are intended to serve as Alexandrines, in a poem written in the Spenserian stanza?—

> That make the satellite sparkle, than the planet shine,
> So unlike the duplicity of elder years.
> Binds poor humanity still ever since the fall.

We always prefer, if possible, by quoting a short piece entire, to let a young poet speak for himself; but we have looked in vain through this volume for a specimen likely to interest our readers. There is a good poetic idea in the last piece, "The King of the Tide"—but unfortunately that is borrowed from Lord Byron.

The Scottish Review. A Quarterly Review of Social Progress and General Literature. Glasgow: Scottish Temperance League. Edinburgh: J. B. Robertson. 1852.

A QUARTERLY review conducted on total abstinence principles, is a novelty in literature. We hope it will have fair play, and live and prosper. Without being total abstainers ourselves, we can recognise the beauty of the pledge in certain cases, and see no harm in persuading people to forswear alcohol, who are not to be trusted with the use of it. Much good has been done by the followers of Father Matthew—that we are in a condition to testify—and no harm that we ever heard of. Our good friends of the League are too much alarmed on the score of "Pale Ale;" a man might almost as soon get drunk on Camomile tea; and we think they are too hard on poor dear Robbie Burns, who never had the chance of turning tee-totaller.

The Synoptical Euclid; being the First Four Books of Euclid's Elements of Geometry, from the Edition of Dr. Robert Simson; with a peculiar typographical arrangement, by which is exhibited, without abridgment of the text, a perspicuous outline of each Demonstration, to facilitate teaching in classes and private study. With Exercises. By SAMUEL A. GOOD. London: C. H. Law, 131, Fleet-street. 1853.

THE plan here adopted is that of numbering the conclusions in every demonstration, and printing them in italics indented. The effect is palpably to assist the memory of the learner, and to prevent the embarrassment which is the great stumbling-block in the way of the young student. A tyro with a problem to master would gladly make use of this book in preference to any other.

Arbell, a Tale for Young People. By JANE WINNARD HOOPER. With Illustrations by James Godwin. London: Addey and Co., 21, Old Bond-street. 1853.

ARBELL is the only child of an unhappy wife driven by ill-treatment from the home of her husband, an East Indian officer, whom she had married against the consent of her relatives, and by whom she is disowned. She finds her way to England, where she soon dies, leaving the child to the care of an old friend, a schoolmistress, who adopts and brings her up. At thirteen, she accidentally discovers her rich relations, and finds that she is heiress in expectancy to Glenara Castle, and a fine estate; but her old grandfather, who is the only bar to her inheritance, will not acknowledge her, unless she will dissolve the ties that bind her to the benefactress of her whole life. The child refuses, and returns to the school, where she learns to practise economy in the face of a cloudy fortune. But the old grandfather repents on his death-bed, dies, and leaves her his wealth after all, and everything is wound up happily, as it ought to be. The plot, it will be seen, is little more than a stereotyped formulary; but the merit of the book—and it has very considerable merits—consists in the truth of the delineations of character which it contains, and the generous sentiments it inculcates. It is eminently a girl's book, and well adapted for a young lady's library. The engravings are first-rate.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES.

Prince of Wales Life and Educational Assurance Company.—The first annual meeting of this Company was held on the 5th ult., at the Company's chief office, 105, Regent-street. Sir Thomas Howland Roberts, Bart., Chairman of the Company, presided. The report of the Directors was to the effect, "that they have received 513 proposals for assurances amounting to £116,367 8s. 3d.; and that they have issued 373 policies assuring £74,520 3s. 7d., and producing premiums amounting to £3,014 14s. 2d. (out of this sum £1,574 0s. 4d. has been received in the last three months). That acting on their original determination, they have secured this amount of premiums on a very small paid-up capital, and their having a few shares unsold, is entirely owing to their never having advertised them, or in any way attempted to force a sale. That their income, as compared with their current expenditure, shows a surplus (not a profit) of £624 18s. 4d. which will be transferred to an account to be called Life Premiums in Reserve; the sum sunk out of capital in establishing the Company, they propose should be paid off out of the Life Premiums in Reserve, at four intervals; such intervals being the four next valuations of the Company's liabilities and assets; they have determined on this course, in order that no present policy-holder may suffer for the benefit of the future assured. That they have established several excellent agencies, and at Manchester a large local office. They have also established branches at Buenos Ayres, Monte Video, Lisbon, Guernsey, Jersey, and Alderney; and have one in course of formation at Hambro'. That with a view to popularize life assurance, and render its benefits accessible to all, they have issued tables for weekly payments, also tables for securing superannuation allowances in old age, in the same manner. Further, they have commenced the system of assuring relief in sickness; and generally for affording all those advantages, now imperfectly offered by benefit clubs. The Report concludes by recommending a dividend of 5 per cent. on the paid-up capital.

Rent Guarantee Society.—The annual meeting of this Society was held at the offices, Charlotte-row, Mansion-house, on Thursday, the 6th of January, Mr. Cuthbert W. Johnson, presiding. "The directors, in their second annual report, congratulate the shareholders upon the present aspect of the affairs of the society, which fully confirms the opinion originally entertained of the importance of its operations, and leaves no doubt of future success. The experience of the past two years has proved the soundness of the principles upon which the society was established, and gives evidence that, ere long, it will be highly remunerative to the shareholders, and at the same time, equally beneficial to the owners of house property. During the past year, the sum of £1,230 2s. 4d, has been received for commission; but this, although more than treble that of the year 1851, does not represent the actual amount of business now in the hands of the society, as the commission on rents entrusted to them for collection during one quarter does not become receivable until the succeeding one. On the 5th January, the amount of commission receivable by the society amounted to £1,717 10s. 11d., in respect of business then in the office. The directors have continued to exercise the caution they used during the previous year, which is evidenced by the fact that of the proposals submitted to them since the establishment of the society, £81,179 8s. 8d., they have only accepted £28,333 4s. 6d. They have had numerous applications for agencies in the principal towns, but they have not made any appointment beyond that at Birmingham, which they announced at the last general meeting, nor do they contemplate doing so for the present, believing that an ample field for the successful operations of the society exists in and around London. During the past year several additions have been made to the tithe-rent charge department, and at the present time the collection of the tithes of 15 parishes is in the hands of the society, and incumbents whose engagements had terminated have renewed their arrangements, and they and others have expressed themselves in high terms of approbation of the management of the society, and of the comfort and advantage to be derived to the clergy availing themselves of its agency. Considerable inconvenience having been found to arise from the annual accounts being made up to the 30th November, the directors recommend that, in future, they should be closed on the 24th December in each year." From the observations of the chairman, it appears that the difficulties experienced during the first two years of this society's operations are nearly overcome, and that there is now every prospect of ultimate and decided success.

Sovereign Life Assurance Company.—At the seventh annual meeting of this Company the Secretary read the Report, which congratulated the shareholders on the satisfactory progress of the Company. Since its establishment, the Directors had received proposals to the amount of £1,059,820, out of which 1268 policies, covering assurances for £561,374 7s. had been selected and completed, and in respect thereof £13,587 8s. 6d. had been received for premiums. On the other hand, the claims during the same period had been only £6,683 10s., being at a smaller ratio than 24s. per cent. on the amount. The Directors had minutely and carefully considered the exact position of the Society with reference to the bonus to be divided, and upon that subject called upon Mr. Neison, the actuary, to read his report as to the result of the investigation he had made for the guidance of the Board. The usual dividend of five per cent. on the paid-up capital was again recommended. Mr. Neison read his report, from which we extract the following:—"Gentlemen,—I have examined the various documents submitted to me, showing the progress of the Company since its establishment in 1846, and I consider the results highly satisfactory. The assurances effected within the last three years exceed in amount those of the first four years by about 23 per cent. From the detailed statement of the valuation of the assets and liabilities of the Company, made in terms of the deed of settlement, it will be found that, without anticipating a single farthing of the profits to be received on the future business of the Company, either in respect to premiums on existing policies, or on those which may be hereafter effected, there has arisen on the past monetary transactions of the Life Assurance fund, a surplus which would enable the Directors to make an addition to the general fund at the rate of about 3s.6d. per share, and a bonus on the profit policies of about £1 13s. 4d. per cent. per annum. The result of the survey of the present position of the Company is most encouraging, and cannot fail to be satisfactory to all parties interested in the progress of the Institution."

Edinburgh Life Assurance Company.—The twenty-ninth annual general court was held on the 14th December last, within the Company's office, No. 22, George-street, Ediburgh, (Sir Graham Graham Montgomery, Bart. M.P., Vice-President, in the chair), when a highly satisfactory report, by the directors, for the year ending 31st of August last, was read to the meeting, containing the gratifying announcement of a large increase both in the number and amount of new insurances, and the progressive improvement in all the branches of the company's business. The report was unanimously approved of, and the following resolutions were announced as having been adopted by the directors, by which the present and future policy-holders shall enjoy the following privileges:—"First. All policies that have subsisted for five years, shall thereafter be free from objection on the ground of any informal or incorrect statements in regard to the health or habits of the parties assured.—Second. All persons engaged in military or naval service, and all persons serving in the militia, shall be at liberty so to serve without extra premium, and without the necessity of obtaining licenses, so long as they remain within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.—Third. In all assurances held bona fide upon the lives of others, policies shall be free from forfeiture on account of acts or deeds of the parties whose lives are assured, provided the ordinary premiums be duly paid, and the premiums for extra risks, whenever these are ascertained."

National Mercantile Fire Assurance.—At the annual meeting of the above Society at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, the Secretary read the following report:—"Gentlemen,—Your directors in accordance with the deed of settlement have to submit to you a report of the progress of the Society during the past year, and of its pecuniary condition, on the 30th ult., the day on which the current year expired. The statement of receipts and disbursements in which these are shewn has been made out as heretofore, shewing the progress of the Society, as regards receipts, claims paid, and expenditure for each year, by which its present pecuniary position, and the relative progress made, can be seen by inspection. The Society has now been in operation four years, during which period it has assured £8,440,550, or an average annual sum of £2,110,138. During the same period, as set forth in the statement of receipts and disbursements, the Society has paid in claims £18,732 15s. or an average annual sum of £4,683 3s. 9d. being at the rate of 4s. 5d. per cent. on the sums insured. This per centage is greater than that reported last year, which is attributable entirely to four or five heavy losses which the Society suddenly sustained in a few days during the month of October last. The progress of the Society in respect to new insurances will be evidenced by the following comparative statement.

showing a steady increase each year."

National Provident Institution.—The following are a few extracts from the Report read at the annual meeting of the members of this Institution, held at the London Tavern in December last. The Directors report the continued prosperity of the affairs of the Institution, and a large accession of members during the past year. In the year ending the 20th November last, 1127 policies have been issued, the annual premiums on which amount to £17,726 4s. 1d. The annual income is now £206,700 11s. 3d. The number of deaths since the last report has been [illegible] exceeding only by four the number reported the preceding year, notwithstanding the great increase in the number of members since that period; the Directors trust they may refer to this favourable rate of mortality as evidence of due caution in the acceptance of proposals for assurance. In the exercise of their best judgment in this respect, aided by the valuable advice of their medical officers, the Directors have considered it prudent to decline 94 proposals during the last twelve months. The claims arising on account of the deaths now reported amount, together with the bonuses thereon, to £48,897. The accounts for the year ending the 20th November last have been duly audited. The balance of receipts over disbursements is £137,198 7s. 3d., by which the capital stock of the Institution is increased to £875,686 5s. 7d., which is invested in real and Government Securities, with the exception of £14,739, advanced on loan to members on security of their respective policies, in accordance with the Act of Parliament passed in 1850.

The character of the aristocracy who figured in the Court of Louis, is too well known to require much description. It was formed very much upon the character of the sovereign himself. Louis had the art, probably without having one really great quality, to make himself adored while he lived, and he has even drawn upon the admiration of posterity. He knew well the value of ceremony, for the purpose of securing the respect of those who surrounded him. Governed throughout his whole reign by his mistresses, one of whom he had the weakness to marry when both were past the middle age, he was, nevertheless, as absolute in the management of his court, as they were of his kingdom. He never appeared even to his domestics but in full dress; and he would keep his ministers in waiting, however urgent might be their business, until he had adjusted his peruke. He carried his politeness so far, as to lift his hat to his female domestics, when he met them in his palace; and if he met a lady, he would not replace it until he had passed her. He has been said to have been fond of the arts; but with such men as Racine, Molière, and Le Brun around him, he could scarcely have been otherwise; as with such captains as Turenne and the great Condé, there was no great merit in being victorious. His taste we are much disposed to doubt. He was fond of show, which, like Napoleon, he used as an instrument of empire, and he was fond of the arts so far as they contributed to the splendour of the pageant. He looked on Le Brun in the light of a superb gilder; and on Molière as an ingenious contriver of spectacles. If ever he dreamed of their immortality, it was when he thought of his own. In a list of pensions which he gave to the littérateurs of his reign, we find one thousand francs awarded to Molière, and three thousand to Chapelaine, now known only for his wretched "La Pucelle," but for which, as a French wit once observed, he might have had some fame. The one is described as "excellente poète comique," the other as, "le plus grand poète Français, qui ait jamais été, et du plus solide jugement." And yet in this list occur the names of Corneille and Racine, to the latter of whom is given eight hundred francs. Boileau is altogether omitted. The truth is, that Louis affected a love of literature and art as necessary to complete his character, without feeling much of it. As Frederick of Prussia said of him, "Ayant plus de jugement que d'esprit, il cherchoit plutôt l'un que l'autre."

The Court followed closely in his footsteps. A love of show and ceremony gave a stiff and artificial tone to the manners, which was relaxed somewhat only by the flexibility of morals. There was much politeness, but it was pushed to extravagance. The courtier professed the most profound respect and esteem for people scarcely known to him. "Theognis," says Le Bruyère, "embrasse un homme qu'il trouve sous sa main; il lui presse la tête contre sa poitrine; il demande ensuite quel est celui qu'il a embrassé;" and Molière well describes this fashionable hypocrisy—"les convulsions de civilité"—in the "Misanthrope."

"Je vous vois accabler un homme de caresses
Et témoigner pour lui les dernières tendresses,
De protestations, d'offres, et de sermens
Vous chargez la fureur de vos embrassemens;
Et quand je vous demande après quel est cet homme,
A peine pouvez vous dire comme il se nomme;
Votre chaleur pour lui tombe en vous séparant,
Et vous me le traitez, à moi, d'indifférent!
Morbleu! c'est une chose indigne, lâche, infame,
De s'abaisser ainsi, jusqu'à trahir son ame."

Gallantry was the prevailing passion, but it was not that of Bayard. It was a sensual and licentious amour carried on by intrigue, and in defiance of common decency. Its grossness was ill-disguised by an affectation of romance, vented in sonnets and madrigals. Many of the gallants of the period were professed beaux esprits; but their taste was as affected as their manners, and as corrupted as their morals. This literary affectation gave rise to a celebrated sect of female pretenders to literature, whom Molière at once extinguished and immortalized, under the name of les Précieuses,—an association of Blues, who met in Paris, at the Hotel Rambouillet, to discuss literary affairs; and affected to take particular cognizance of the French language and grammar.

It must be allowed that such a state of society as we have described exhibits not an inconsiderable field for the writer of comedy. But its general features were too artificial to permit nature to appear much under other than conventional forms, and a writer who like Molière painted men as he found them, wanted those universal models, the study of which leads to the highest perfection of art. He copied nature, but it was nature in disguise, and under forms by which it was cribbed, cabined, and confined. Instead of studying the naked figure, he drew it as it appeared under the stiff and formal costume of the age. We cannot blame him for this, though with higher genius he would have penetrated deeper. The fault lay chiefly in his models, and there is no reason to suppose that had they been of a less artificial character, he would have failed in copying them. This must be kept in view in every estimate of the literary character of Molière, otherwise we will be apt to consider as a peculiarity of his genius what was more owing to the factitious characteristics of the subjects which he studied.

Of his contemporaries, such as they were, Molière had full opportunity for observation; and never was there a more industrious or accurate observer. The son of a Parisian upholsterer, he spent his youth among the bourgeosie, and he had scarcely embraced the profession of player, at the age of twenty-three, when the troubles of the Regency drove him to the provinces, where he acted for thirteen years. The rest of his life was spent at Court, where he united the profession of comedian to the duties of valet de chambre to Louis, a post to which he had hereditary claims. The fidelity of his portraits of character, (for many of his parts were drawn from living originals,) and his merciless exposure of folly and hypocrisy, raised him many enemies, but it is only doing justice to his patron to say, that he ever found a steady friend and protector in the king. It was in the latter part of his life that he produced almost the whole of his pieces. Many of them were written with extraordinary rapidity, some of them having been composed and acted within a few days. They were in general made to order of Louis, who commanded their exhibition, as he did that of fireworks or triumphal arches, as parts of the gorgeous fêtes given at Versailles, to celebrate his victories,—or, "à la Reine et à la Reine-mère selon l'histoire,—à mademoiselle de la Vallière selon la chronique." There, like a magnificent picture in a tawdry frame, appeared the immortal delineations of Molière, among Floras and Zephyrs, and satyrs and naiads, and shepherds and shepherdesses, with hooks and crooks, and artificial rocks, cascades, and jets d'eau. Occasionally this buckram was manufactured by the great comedian himself, but he never appears to advantage in it. Take for example the following from the Prologue to "Le Malade Imaginaire."

Poetry was not what Molière excelled in, for he had more judgment than imagination, and more humour than wit. But his sentiment was apt to become verbose, and his humour to degenerate into farce. His forte lay in the delineation of character rather than in the expression of passion, and of his characters those are the best which depart from native simplicity the least; when they affect gravity they are apt to become dull, and affected when they would be thought wise. Their simplicity often borders upon facility, and the ease with which they can be duped represses our sympathy, and disarms our resentment. Many of them are too unintellectual to be interesting, and more too clever to be beloved. But whatever be their character, their modes of expressing passion are much the same. Feux and yeux are in the mouths of every lover, and if the piece be in verse they are sure to meet in rhyme. He generally accomplishes most when he labours least, and hence the short speeches are better than the long, and the prose than the verse. His variety of passion is exceedingly limited, and within these limits it is seldom profound. Love is the universal agent in his plays, sometimes superinduced upon some other passion, but generally unmixed, and almost always the ruling one. When it is determined that the lover shall not obtain his object, he submits to his fate with the most becoming resignation; and the raptures of his more fortunate rival may be conceived, but are neither expressed nor described. There is more humour in his situations than fable in his plots. But an intricate plot is little indispensable to good comedy; it is sufficient that the plot affords a vehicle for the dialogue, and furnishes as much incident as prevents it from becoming languid. Many of his plots and incidents are borrowed from other writers, but he seldom fails to improve upon them. He does not much study the probability of occurrences, in which he is right, for the drama is a fairy-land where we willingly submit to the wand of the enchanter, rather expecting what is wonderful, than requiring what is true. His style cannot always be recommended as a model of composition, but its apology is to be found in the rapidity with which he was often compelled to write, and in the necessity incidental to every writer of comedy, of adapting his language to the character. Many of his plays were not published until after his death, and several he had expressed his intention to revise. He has been accused of indelicacy, but we think unjustly. Although love in one phasis or another is the ruling passion in all his plays, there scarcely occurs an instance of obscenity. There are indeed expressions which are rejected by modern decorum, but there can be no doubt that they were current in the best society of his age. These expressions are not confined to any particular class of persons. Le mot expressif which denotes the dishonoured husband is constantly used by his characters of every rank, and occurs in the title of one of his plays. But it also occurs frequently in Madame de Sévigné's Letters, even in those to her daughter. Molière painted too correctly to put a word into the mouth of a fine lady, which fine ladies of the day did not use; and he had too much respect for his patron to offend him by any breach of that external decorum which it was the policy of Louis to preserve. In plays where so much gallantry prevails, it was impossible to exclude incidents and situations of an immoral character; but there is none of them so equivocal as the admired screen scene in the "School for Scandal," and many other exhibitions of the English stage.

With all his faults, Molière is yet one of the most entertaining of dramatists. His acuteness of observation and power of discrimination, his knowledge of the human heart and accuracy in painting it, and above all his good sense and exquisite perception of the ridiculous, carried him triumphantly through the dangers from bad taste and artificial manners by which he was surrounded. Though many of his portraits are sketches, the character is generally complete, and the features are seldom inconsistent. Whatever defects may be in the conception of the part, there are seldom any in the execution. He sometimes fails to place virtue in its proper light, and more often overlooks vice when it ought to have been reproved; but he never renders ridiculous what is not so in itself. Every stroke tells, and tells in the proper place. We are apt at first sight to think some of his pictures overdrawn, but the more we come to know of the originals, the more we find that the portraits are correct. It is an inconvenience common to all writers on manners, that what illustrates their meaning to their contemporaries, tends to obscure it to posterity. To judge of the comic literature of any age, we require to know in minute detail its habits, customs, domestic history, and generally those circumstances to which allusion, and merely allusion, is made, more constantly in comedy than in any other department of literature. Now these things have generally been reckoned beneath the dignity of history, and thus there is comparatively little record of what is absolutely requisite to explain the comedy of any past age. What in the hands of Aristophanes or Molière would have set Athens in a roar, or upset the decorous gravity of the court of Louis XIV., probably by the most distant allusion to it, now appears to us to be uninteresting, if it does not altogether escape our observation. No past age, however, has been more copiously illustrated than that of Molière, on which contemporary memoirs and letters, and ultimately, the brilliant sketch of Voltaire, have thrown much light, though nothing has done so more than his own comedies themselves. And judging from all these lights, we are compelled to form the highest opinion of the fidelity with which he has reflected in his characters, if not human nature in its more general forms, as Shakspere has done, at least, the modes of acting and thinking of those who came within the sphere of his observation.

Of his vis comica, or the peculiarity of his comic genius, it is not easy to convey an idea by description, and as little by comparison, for it did not much resemble that of any other writer of comedy, ancient or modern. He is neither so bold, so daring, nor so grotesque, as Aristophanes, and as little does he soar into those regions of poetry and lofty intellect which go far to redeem all the faults of that extraordinary man. There is in the Frenchman, as in the Athenian, Πολλὰ μὲν γέλοια, πολλὰ δὲ σπουδαῖα, much of jest, and much of earnest; but there is much less breadth in the character of either. If, however, the mirth of Molière is less boisterous than that of Aristophanes, it is much less frigid than that of Menander. He is more natural than Terence, and more dignified and refined than Plautus. He is said to have studied both of those Latin writers in his youth, but when he had tried his own strength he renounced them and betook himself to the study of living models, though his mannerism always retained much of the tone of his juvenile studies. There is no comic writer of the English school whom he much resembles, for, except Shakspere, our writers of comedy have excelled more in the brilliancy of the dialogue than in the development of character, and the middle path between what we call genteel comedy and farce has been little trod, though that is the most legitimate sphere of the comic muse. To our great dramatist he is much inferior in ideality and in wit, but he is equal in humour, and superior in regularity and correctness, meaning by the latter term the consistent reproduction of character according to conventional rules. To our writers of the Restoration he bears little resemblance, many of his pieces being far more elaborate as works of art, and, it must be admitted, far superior in their moral tone and in their development of character, but inferior in point, repartee, and comicality of situation; though in these the French are seldom deficient. The best comedies of Farquhar, Vanburgh, or Congreve, are mere sketches in comparison with "Le Tartuffe" or "Le Misanthrope," to match which, with any approach to resemblance, we must go back to "The Alchymist" or "The Volpone" of Ben Jonson, or come down to "The Rivals" or "The School for Scandal" of Sheridan. The truth is, that the comedies of Molière were formed in a great degree upon the strict rules which regulated French tragedy, and hence they are more stiff and formal than comports with our notions of the sock. They are, indeed, in general, elaborate specimens of art, and, thanks to the genius of Molière, not inferior in real value, while they are superior in interest, to the best productions of Corneille or Racine. They are dignified by an eminently didactic tone, and making fair allowance for the manners of the age, and the levities incidental to comedy, their composition is, on the whole, not unworthy of the object they profess to have in view.

"Le Tartuffe" has, in public opinion, been commonly reckoned his chef d'œuvre, and we are by no means about to dispute the justice of the fiat, though we think that it must be received with considerable reservations. There can be no doubt that it owes much of its fame to the opposition which it encountered from the powerful party in the church, against whose hypocrisy it was directed. It indeed carried on the same warfare that Pascal's "Provincial Letters" had begun, and ultimately with similar success. When it was first represented before the Court at Versailles, such was the fury of those whom it assailed, that even the king, though sensible of the good intentions of the author, was obliged to yield for a time, by prohibiting its public representation; and this interdict continued until after Pope Clement IX. had interposed, to arrange the disputes which agitated the French Church. Meantime, the piece continued to be acted at the Court, and its prohibition elsewhere, while it enhanced the enjoyment of those who were privileged to be present, served to sharpen the desire of those who were not. When Molière ultimately triumphed, by the representation in public being permitted, it was received with the most unbounded applause, by audiences which probably did not number many of the dévots, whether false or true. The piece has, however, retained its popularity both on the stage and elsewhere, and not without great claims to high consideration. The chief character is most elaborately drawn, and with great originality of conception. The oily, sanctimonious, sensual hypocrite, the consummate villain under the disguise of religion, though frequently portrayed by painters of character, has by none been depicted in more brilliant colours than in this piece. But it must be allowed that it is brought out somewhat undramatically; it is rather described than reproduced. During the first two acts, we only hear of the great hypocrite, and he does not appear till the third, and scarcely at all in the fifth. Our anxiety is on the stretch to get a glimpse of a person we hear so much about, and though when he does come we are not disappointed, we would rather have formed our idea of him from our own observation, than have taken the description, however good, of Dorine. Of the other characters Marianne is the most interesting. There are few scenes in any of the author's plays better than that in the second act between her and Valère, where she struggles between duty to her father and love for her betrothed, her abhorrence of Tartuffe not being allowed to share in the conflict. Orgon, like many others of Molière's dupes, is too credulous to be interesting. He is quite "à mener par nez," as his guest says, and this simplicity not only spoils his own dramatic character, but detracts from that of Tartuffe, since a much less clever villain would have sufficed to impose upon so easy a dupe. His wife, Madame Elmire, is too cool for our taste; we cannot admire a woman who, even in France, in the age of Molière, takes as she does, a declaration of love from another than her husband, and we do not understand the discretion which makes her when urged to disclose it, say

> Ce n'est point mon humeur de faire des éclats;
> Une femme se rit de sottises pareilles,
> Et jamais d'un mari n'en trouble les oreilles.

Of "Le Misanthrope," we cannot join so cordially in the common estimation. It seems to us to be one of those pieces which the author has spoiled by making too elaborate. Alceste is morose without being philosophic, and melancholy without being amiable. At first, he is somewhat sensible in exposing the false politeness which presented the same silken aspect to virtue and to vice; but he speedily falls into extravagance and repulsive peevishness. His misanthropy is that of a man of fashion, with as much sense as enables him to observe character with acuteness, but not enough to make a good use of his observations. He is not even, as Dr. Johnson would have said, a good hater. He falls in love with a woman the least likely to please to him, an inveterate flirt, with his eyes open to her faults, and relying on the forlorn hope of his being able to cure them.

> L'amour que je sens pour cette jeune veuve
> Ne ferme point mes yeux aux défauts qu'on lui trouve;
> Et je suis, quelque ardeur qu'elle m'ait pu donner,
> Le premier à les voir, comme à les condamner.
> Mais avec tout cela, quoique je puisse faire,
> Je confesse mon foible; elle a l'art de me plaire:
> J'ai beau voir ses défauts, et j'ai beau l'en blâmer,
> En dépit qu'on en ait elle se fait aimer,
> Sa grace est la plus forte; et sans doute ma flamme
> De ces vices du temps pourra purger son ame.
> Acte I. Sc. 1.

Yet he throws her off when she refuses to renounce the world, and go with him into the desert: a plan of life for a new-married couple of which no one would have become sooner tired than himself. This character marks the limit of Molière's mind in original conception. He fails when he does not draw from the life, which he did not do in this instance. The French Court did not contain a genuine misanthrope. There might, indeed, be some worn-out fop, tired of the follies of his youth, and disposed to show his wisdom by his sourness; but there was no Timon, no man-hater, whose misanthropy was formed by that morbid philosophy which works upon a mind originally generous. Molière may have aimed at such a character, but he has drawn a coxcomb. The other characters of the piece are better conceived. Célimène's remarks upon her acquaintances, in the second act, are spirited and graphic; but the dialogue, upon the whole, is rather tiresome. The long declamations in verse are altogether intolerable to any one who has not been drilled into such exercises by the serious productions of the French stage. The dénouement, also, is most undramatic; and, upon the whole, we are not disposed to rank this piece very high, though it is one of the most elaborate of Molière's works.

He has, we think, been more successful in "L'Avare," in superinducing love upon a stronger and opposing passion. An old miser in love, and in love with his son's mistress, is a character worthy of the author, and he has made the most of it. Harpagon is one of the best-drawn misers in any literature; perhaps the best, after Trapbois. The conflict between his love of money and of Marianne—the all-powerful reason for marrying his daughter to one she detested, because he would take her "sans dot!"—the double-entendre between himself and Valère, when the one refers to his money-box and the other to the daughter—the conditions of the loan by the father to the son, (unknown to each other,) to enable the latter to cheat the old miser of his mistress—and many other passages in this play, are admirable, and in the very best style of Molière. It is not one of its least recommendations to our taste, that, though elaborate and in five acts, it is in prose.

In Agnès, in "L'Ecole des Femmes," we have another character in love under extraordinary circumstances. A child of Nature, jealously secluded from intercourse with the world from her infancy, is trained up to be the future wife of an absurd but not unamiable man, much older than herself, to whose kindness she owes everything. She never feels the tender passion, nor even knows what it is, until she sees a youth more to her taste, with whom she instantly falls in love, without being aware that in receiving his addresses she is giving the least cause of offence to her benefactor. There is a degree of simplicity in this certainly not very credible—we may say, not very possible, and therefore not very natural. If there be any doubt of this, consult the High Priest. What says Miranda?

> I do not know
> One of my sex; no woman's face remember,
> Save from my glass, mine own; nor have I seen
> More that I may call men, than you, good friend,
> And my dear father; how features are abroad,
> I am skill-less of; but by my modesty,
> (The jewel in my dower,) I would not wish
> Any companion in the world but you;
> Nor can imagination form a shape,
> Besides yourself, to like of; but I prattle
> Something too wildly, and my father's precepts
> I therein do forget.

Compare this with Agnès, after she has made considerable progress in the passion; we quote from a scene between her and her benefactor, in the last act.

> Agnès.
> Mais, à vous parler franchement entre nous,
> Il est plus pour cela selon mon goût que vous.
> Chez vous le mariage est fâcheux et pénible,
> Et vos discours en font une image terrible;
> Mais, las! il le fait, lui, si rempli de plaisirs
> Que de se marier il donne des désirs.
> Arnolphe.
> Ah! c'est que vous l'aimez, traîtresse!
> Agnès.
> Oui, je l'aime.
> Arnolphe.
> Et vous avez les front de le dire à moi-meme!
> Agnès.
> Et pourquoi, s'il est vrai, ne le dirois-je pas?
> Arnolphe.
> Le deviez-vous aimer, impertinente?
> Agnès.
> Hélas!
> Est-ce que j'en puis mais? Lui seul en est la cause,
> Et je n'y songeois pas lorsque se fit la chose.
> Arnolphe.
> Mais il falloit chasser cet amoureux désir.
> Agnès.
> Le moyen de chasser ce qui fait du plaisir?
> Arnolphe.
> Et ne savez-vous pas que c'étoit me déplaire?
> Agnès.
> Moi? point du tout. Quel mal cela vous peut-il faire?

We must, however, wink at many such things in Molière, and, after all, the conception belongs not to him, but to Cervantes. As it is, it is admirably maintained, and nothing but this radical defect prevents this piece from being one of the best. The simplicity of Agnès is so naïve that we are sometimes led to believe it to be affected. There are several equivoques in this piece, which were much criticised at the time, and are admirably handled in "La Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes," to which we have already more than once referred.

The piece which, next to "Tartuffe," created the greatest sensation is, "Les Précieuses Ridicules," the first that Molière wrote after his return to Paris, and certainly the most effective of his shorter pieces. It is in only one act, and has scarcely any plot, but abounds in exquisite ridicule of the celebrated précieuses of the Hotel de Rambouillet. The best test of such a piece is its success, which in this instance was immense, and like the "Mæviad and Bæviad" of Gifford, in later times, broke up a coterie of conceited people of both sexes, who took upon themselves to control the literature of the day. Driven from literature by Molière's pungent ridicule, a remnant of them betook themselves to science, from which, also, he dislodged them by another piece, "Les Femmes Savantes," a much more elaborate production, but much less amusing and effective. The two first acts, in particular, are intolerably tiresome, from want of incident and interminable declamations in verse. The same may be said of "Les Facheux," a piece written to expose the bores of the court, but the author forgets that they are as much so to the reader as to Eraste. The piece, however, had considerable success, and vastly pleased the king, who pointed out a bore that had been overlooked by the author, referring to the Marquis de Soyecourt, the grand-veneur of the Court, who was forthwith transferred to the canvas, and proved to be, as Molière, with courtly flattery, says in his dedication, "le plus beau morceau de l'ouvrage." La Fontaine, who assisted at the representation before the Court, at Vaux, in writing to his friend Mancroix, a few days afterwards, says of the author, "c'est mon homme." Yet this play was little more than an impromptu, having been written and acted within a fortnight.

Of all the smaller pieces, "Le Malade Imaginaire" is most to our taste. There is too much farce in the interludes, particularly the last; but the humour of the whole is exquisite. The dialogue is sparkling and natural. Angélique is one of the best of Molière's female characters; she interests us from the first. Toinette, the waiting-maid, is admirable; though, like Dorine, in "Le Tartuffe," more pert than servants are allowed to be in our days, even on the stage. Never were pedants painted more ludicrously than Monsieur Diaforus and his son. "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" is another excellent little piece; but Monsieur Jourdain, like Sganarelle, George Dandin, and too many others of Molière's characters, are by far too easily duped to be very interesting. As Corneille shrewdly remarks of the ambitious cit: "Avec lui on peut hazarder toute chose."

On the whole, these delineations are admirable portraits of the men and women of the age of Louis XIV., and their execution entitles Molière to the position of a great French classic, if not to an eminent place among the most illustrious minds of all ages. He is second to them only because his art reached no further than to copy what was set before him, and he wanted the creative ideality which bodies forth the forms of things unknown. But within his own sphere, no one ever painted more truthfully individual character, or grouped it on the canvas with more dramatic effect. If his scenes want the impress of nature, it is because his models were artificial, and his principles of composition too much subjected to rules drawn from the other branch of the dramatic art, and there misapplied. He did not pretend to generalize, but he observed accurately and reproduced faithfully and skilfully; and though he cannot be ranked as a great poet, he is entitled to the praise of being a truly great artist, second only to Aristophanes and Shakspere, in the comic literature of the stage.

Molière was as good a man as he was a dramatist, though he was but scurvily treated by the world. Born for love, as he himself expressed it, "Né avec la dernière disposition à la tendresse,"—domestic happiness was denied to him. Yet he loved on, with his eyes open to the infidelities of one who could not or would not love him. Gifted with the most amiable disposition, the enemy of nothing but folly and vice, he had, nevertheless, many enemies, from whose persecution, it must be admitted to the honour of Louis, he found a refuge, not merely in the patronage, but in the friendship of his sovereign. Nor did their hate end with his life. Despised while he lived for a profession which the prejudices of his time, not unknown to our own, stigmatized as disreputable, the same prejudice denied him the last offices of religion, and with difficulty conceded him a grave. But the prophecy of Bouhours,* that France would one day blush for her ingratitude, has been fulfilled. Nearly a century after his death, the empty honour of an éloge was accorded to his manes by the Academy which had refused him admission as a member, unless he would renounce his profession. At the same time his bust was placed in its halls, with the appropriate inscription:

Rien ne manque à sa gloire, il manquait à la nôtre.

Still later, after his bones had become scarcely distinguishable from the vulgar heap, they, or what were supposed to be they, were transported to a more honoured mausoleum, in the cemetery of Père-la-Chaise. But, as if to remind his countrymen of the popular neglect in which he lived, the inscription which points out the spot to this day, errs, by not less than six years, in stating his age!

* Tu reformas et la ville et la cour;
Mais quelle en fut ta recompense?
Les François rougiront un jour
De leur peu de recognisance.
Il fallut un comédien,
Qui mit à les polir sa gloire et son étude;
Mais, Molière, à ta gloire il ne manquait rien,
Si parmi les défauts que tu peignis si bien,
Tu les avois repris de leur ingratitude.

NORMAN HAMILTON.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

EXPLANATIONS.

There are men on whom persuasions of every kind are wasted, on whom threats have no influence, and who are deaf to all sorts of remonstrance and entreaty. They have a stubborn will of their own, and to attempt to bend that will were an experiment as bootless as to cast a mountain into the sea. But yet it sometimes happens in the case of such men, that if they are left for a season to the freedom of their own will, they are so led to think on the fruits of their own doings, that ultimately they become ashamed of them; and often, when it is too late, endeavour to undo the evil consequences of their obstinacy and self-will. To this class of opinionative persons belonged the publican Buchanan; and, as the period fixed for the execution of Norman Hamilton drew near, he began to have misgivings as to the propriety of the course which he had adopted. The state of his daughter's mind (of whom as far as a boorish nature would admit, he was fond), was daily becoming more critical—the upbraidings of his wife were incessant—customers one by one deserted his premises—acquaintances shunned him on the street—and no one seemed inclined to justify the part which he had taken as a crown witness at the trial. Men may profess to brave it, but there is nothing so thoroughly difficult to do, as to stem the tide of public opinion. It is uphill work when one has co-operation and sympathy; but when a man stands alone in any question or cause, and has the world for his foes, he must, sooner or later, quail before the storm. Affection was against Buchanan, trade was against him—friendship was against him, and that large abstraction which we call the world was also against him. Remorse, sullen, consuming remorse, preyed upon him night and day. He sat in his bar from morn till night, for as his trade had disappeared he had little to do; and when night came on he went to bed, as if for repose, but the morning revealed a wild and restless eye, which had been divorced from sleep.

His wife at last began to take pity on him; for wives, although amongst the first to condemn, are, after all, good souls, the first also to excuse and palliate.

"Willie," said his spouse, "we maun just bundle up and gang till America; this kind o' wark will never do. We had to send Haig's traveller awa' without an order, and that's what we havend done for mony a year. And there's the rent due neist month. I used to hae as mony guineas or pund-notes gathered in the auld teapot as put ower the rent; but noo, wae's me, ye'll hae to gang up to Sir William's bank, and draw oot oor sair-won earnings. The gable o' the hoose sud be whitewashed aboot this time; but what's the use o' doing onything when oor run's gane? We may as well lay doun the barrow at aince; and there's Maggie. Oh, I'm wae for the bairn. She's a puir, white-faced thing; and she neither eats, drinks, nor sleeps. I doot, I doot the lassie's wrang a' thegither. Willie, my ain Willie, dinna look at me that way. Although the warld's against ye, I'll never again say an ill word to ye."

Buchanan sat, as usual, in his sulky corner. Angry invective and imprecation had been liberally bestowed on him, but kind looks or kind words had long been stranger to him, and his iron soul yielded to their gentle influence; for they came upon him at a time when he least expected them. He started to his feet, and dashed a half-formed tear from his heavy eye.

"Jean, I'm sorry aboot the lad, an' I think I can save him yet."

"Na, na, Willie," replied the wife mournfully, "that's ower late noo. He's to be hanged the morn. Ye micht hae saved him afore the trial, but its nae use casting that up noo; its past and dune, and canna be recalled. Ye had better just slip o'er to Fife for twa three days, till its a' ower, and then we'll start for America. Maybe the change will do Maggie good; God grant that it may."

"Jean," said Buchanan earnestly, "go up to Cook, and tell him to be on the watch, him and some o' his friens, at the jail this nicht at twal o'clock; for as I am a living man, I'll try to save him, although I sud be killed mysel."

"You are mad, Willie, perfectly mad."

"I must and will do it. If I do not try, I will never hae peace i' the world again, although I gang to America or ony ither place. Its maybe the last request I may ever mak. Go up, Jean, to Cook, and tell him to hae a chaise ready, say at the Tron-kirk, at twal o'clock, and let the lad himsel be in readiness. I havena slept a wink for the last week, and I'll lie doun till ten o'clock, for I'll sleep noo that I see what I am to do. Come back again, and be sure to wauken me up at ten. I'm a desperate man, Jean, and if ye dinna do my biddin, ye little rek what may happen."

Jean began to have doubts as to her husband's sanity; but his determined air satisfied her that to delay or mince his commands would be perilous work, so she set out on what appeared to her to be a Quixotic errand.

Character Cook received her message in a spirit equally sceptical, and he refused point-blank to co-operate in any scheme originating with Buchanan.

"If your bull-headed husband had done his duty as a witness, all this business might have been spared," said the patriot; "but here, noo, the very nicht afore the hanging, he pretends to be sorry and wants a chaise at the Tron-kirk, to carry off Mr. Spencer. How can he carry him off? Lieutenant Arnold, and Harry, and me, havena been able to carry him off, and hoo can he doo it, I wad like to ken? If a' body has failed in that, is it likely that Willie Buchanan is to succeed? Puir fellow! puir fellow, his days are numbered; he'll hae to hang the morn, come o't what will. The very poisoning business has failed. I smuggled in as mickle as wad hae done the business o' an elephant, but the governor discovered it; and I say again, there's naething for't but the gallows. What will become o' that lassie Florence, Providence only kens. They say women's hearts, for a' the fracas they mak, are no easily broken. I ken Babie raised an awfu' din when the doctors said I was gaun to dee; but as I didna dee, there's no sayin'."

"Ye maun try and do something, Mr. Cook; my man's in an awfu' state," said Mrs. Buchanan, imploringly.

"He'll be waur before he's better. The Judas-rascal, he could hae saved the haill thing, but for his confounded positiveness."

"Weel, but he is sorry, very sorry for that, and he'll do all he can to mak it richt."

"Him sorry! I think I see it. But ye see, mistress, Sammy Cook is nane o' your folk that work wi' pigs in a poke. What security hae I that this is no a trap laid to catch some o' us? or, if it is no that, what is the kind o' plan that your husband has in his dogged-head. Do ye think that the like o' me, that has been hand and glove wi Muir, and a' the friends o' the great cause, am to haud the candle to Willie Buchanan, the Leith publican? It was a' very weel for me to preach and pray to him before the mischief was done; but its quite different noo that the evil's been committed and by his black tongue."

"On my soul, Mr. Cook, he means you, fairly; and I am sure that unless he had something in his mind that was feasible, he wadna speak as he did."

"Weel, weel, Lucky, as his unhappy wife, ye're richt to stick to him; but I am under nae obligation to haud on by his coat-tails; sae ye can jist try the young leddy, Miss Florence, or Arnold, or any o' them; and if they like to send a noddy, weel and good. I'll no say that I'll oppose them; but if I tak a share in the business, it will be in the same way as Moses saw the land o' Canaan—namely, afar off."

Mrs. Buchanan, finding that Character was inflexible, had no resource but to make application to Florence, as Character had suggested. It was with very great reluctance that she made up her mind to propose any overture in that quarter; for her confidence in the probable success of the unknown scheme of her husband, which, from the moment of its first announcement had never been great, was now much lessened by the irritating distrust of Cook; while she felt no small repugnance at coming into contact with Miss Hamilton, from a consideration of the angry, if not scornful, feeling which her appearance was sure to excite in the mind of the unfortunate young lady. But yet the attempt, she felt, must be made; for she had left Buchanan in such a mood, that to return to him without having fairly exhausted every available means of complying with his request, would, she well knew, only exasperate him the more, and very likely confirm in him that permanent moroseness of temper which had so unexpectedly given way, and which, if not taken advantage of, in its state of temporary thaw, might again and for ever relapse into its stony obduracy. With no sanguine prospect of success, and indeed with less of the expectation than is often found to animate the leader of a forlorn hope, Mrs. Buchanan proceeded to deliver her singular message to Miss Hamilton.

The young lady, as might naturally have been anticipated, could not be seen by a stranger; and the misgiving wife of the repentant publican hesitated much about sending up her unwelcome name; but there was no help for it.

"Tell Miss Hamilton," said she to our old acquaintance Dolly Dimsdale, "not to be frightened at my name—Mrs. Buchanan, of the Kirkgate in Leith; for things are changed since she called upon us, and I want to tell her something, that if it can do no good, can at least do no ill."

"Buchanan?" queried Dolly, "it was your husband as peached on good Mister Norman. No, no! Go away, my good voman; you looks as if you were sorrowful; but my missus would be much more sorrowfuler, if she saw you. It would clean break her heart, and she has hardly so much on that left as will carry her over to-morrow."

"For the love of Heaven, let me see the young lady. I come to her with no other errand than to try and save the gentleman. If she will not hear me, I cannot help it; but at any rate, let me try."

"I will see," replied the reluctant Dolly; and leaving Mrs. Buchanan, she went to consult her ill-fated mistress. In a brief space, she returned, and beckoned the visitor to follow her.

Mrs. Buchanan expected to find a great change in Florence, but the reality exceeded the anticipation, for the bloom of youth had for ever passed away, and the sharp-pinched features of settled despair, had taken its place instead. Good old Mrs. Porter sat at a little distance from her, and it was but too evident, that grief had drawn his deep furrows across her cheek, and that the shock which had so thoroughly prostrated her niece, had also descended with heavy force on her enfeebled frame, and that the day was not far distant, when her grey hairs would be brought in sorrow to the grave.

Florence gazed with a troubled eye on Mrs. Buchanan, for impressed with the appearance of the two ladies, the latter had not yet ventured to speak. She in vain essayed to do so, but her tongue refused to do its office, and Florence keenly observing her embarrassment commenced the dialogue herself.

"Your husband has sent you, has he not?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Then something may come of it, yet."

"Would to God it may, ma'am."

"It is strange how I should have dreamt so; but I did dream that your husband would yet relent. Pray Heaven it may not be too late—and may Heaven grant him that forgiveness which I am afraid I cannot."

"He sent me, ma'am, to say——"

"Nay, say nothing here; there is life and death in this matter, and stones have ears: come with me."

On reaching another apartment, Mrs. Buchanan communicated the request of her husband to Florence, and the young lady pondered gravely on the singular character of the proposal.

"Your husband gave you no hint, and you yourself have no conception of the means he proposes to employ?"

"None, ma'am."

"And you believe that he is sincerely sorry for the infamous part he has already played in this tragedy, and that he is honestly desirous of attempting some amends?"

"As my Maker is in Heaven I believe he is."

"Well; I shall cause Mr. Arnold and my brother to give him the assistance that he requires, and I, myself, shall also be near the spot, as, if this last effort fails us, all will be lost, and I shall then be as one dead to the world; or rather, I shall court death, for where death is, misery hath lost its power."

Mrs. Buchanan hurried home with the tidings to her husband—she could not call them joyful, for where the probabilities of success were so narrowed, and the means to be employed so shrouded in mystery, there was little in the carrying of one preliminary item in the scheme to inspire confidence as to the final result. The evening was far advanced before she reached the Kirkgate, and on entering the house, she found that Buchanan was still asleep. She was struck by the deep repose that characterized his slumber; and especially by the contrast which it presented to the restlessness which he had exhibited for so many nights past. It seemed as if the rest so long denied, was now about to be compensated for, and that he would awake with renewed strength, as if to fit him for the approaching enterprise which he was about to undertake; and in this she could not help inferring an omen for good. The hour was not yet at hand, and there was time for still more sleep, and she quietly left him in the enjoyment of his slumber. No sound was heard in that once busy hold, till the silence was disturbed by a wild chant from poor Maggie

Buchanan, the daughter of the ill-starred pair. She sang occasional snatches from an olden ditty.

> O! what is death, but parting breath,
> On many a bloody plain;
> I have dared his face, and in this place,
> I scorn him yet again.
> I've lived a life of start and strife,
> I die by treacherie;
> It burns my heart—I must depart,
> And not avenged be.
> Sae rantingly, sae wantonly,
> Sae dauntingly gaed he:
> He played a spring, and danced it round
> Below the gallows tree.

The low pensive tone in which the lines were sung, and the subject to which they obviously referred, brought tears into the eyes of the mother, for she sorrowed as one who had no hope when she thought of the growing wildness observable in the demeanour of her daughter, and of the probable impulse it might be expected to receive from the consummation of to-morrow. Still, she was a woman of the world; and she tried to drown her many troublesome reflections by the performance of household duties—eager, meanwhile, that the time should arrive for the wakening of her husband, in order to his departure on his self-imposed mission of reparation. Happy Mrs. Buchanan, if thy household cares can kill that torturing, gnawing heart-ache, which all of us see at times in others, and which oftener we feel in ourselves; and from which even that lightest of all pastimes, novel-writing, does not always free the sons of Adam! Mrs. Buchanan looked into her larder, and cogitated on the supper for the night, and penetrating into futurity, she bestowed a thought on the dinner of to-morrow; and various considerations, known only to prudent housewives, passed through her sagacious mind, which considerations, being of a nature that we are not thoroughly capable of appreciating, we shall not allude to more particularly; but her occupation, with these and similar household duties, sufficed to fill up time; and at length, the season arrived when it seemed expedient to rouse her husband from his slumbers, and prepare him for his midnight embassy.

On proceeding to the bar, she found Maggie stooping over the prostrate form of her father; and to the horror of the wife and mother, she discovered that the girl held a large knife in her hand.

> I die by treacherie;
> It burns my heart—I must depart,
> And not avenged be!

"Ay, that man was not avenged, but this one who also dies by 'treacherie,' he shall be avenged. His innocent blood shall not cry for vengeance in vain. It's in the Bible, and cannot be wrong—'Skin for skin, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, blood for blood.' Although he were twice my father, and twice that over again, he must die. I'll go to Spencer's grave and tell him what I have done, and I am sure he will be glad. Now!"

Mrs. Buchanan sprang forward, and caught the uplifted hand ere it could descend for the accomplishment of its terrible purpose.

"I will do it, mother!" cried the excited girl. "He deserves it; and Spencer himself appeared to me in a dream, and told me to do it."

"Aye, Maggie," replied the mother with a quick adaptation of her reasoning to the shattered intellect of the poor girl, "but then Spencer is not dead yet, and to kill the one before the other would be murder—don't you see that, my child."

"Yes, I do—I do—it's very curious how I did not think of that before, mother. Here, put you past the knife till we need it; or no, I'll better keep it myself, in case it should not be at hand."

The distracted mother, content with defeating the danger of the moment, contented herself with motioning that the weapon should be laid aside, and then she took her husband by the arm, and awoke him.

Buchanan hastily dispatched the repast that was put before him, and shrouding himself in a large cloak, which concealed some bulky article, prepared to take his leave.

"Maggie looks strange the nicht, Jean, tak care o' her."

"Aye," replied the wife, with a long drawn sigh, "she's far frae being weel. Whaun will ye be back?"

"Whenever the thing's done, or not done."

"I'll be eerie, terrible eerie till ye come back, Willie. I canna gang to my bed till I hear about you; and I am feared to be left alone wi' Maggie."

"Mysie can sit up wi' you, but let nae licht appear frae the outside."

"I dinna ken how it is, but I sair doot this is to be a black night. God be wi' you, Willie."

"Where is he gone to, mother?" inquired Maggie.

"To Edinburgh."

"What is he going to do there?"

"Oh, Maggie! do ye like me noo as ye did, when you was a bairn in my lap, and will ye try to understand me?"

"I will, mother, every word that you say; it's only sometimes that I don't know what people are speaking about."

"Weel, then, he's going up to try and save the gentleman!"

Maggie did not express the surprise which, under the circumstances, her mother expected that she would have done; but she was not the less attentive to the importance of the information which had been communicated.

Half-an-hour afterwards, Maggie was not to be found.

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE ATTEMPT.

A CRIMINAL was to die next morning—and although on the evening preceding the execution the streets were crowded with passengers, each doubtless having in his own person enough and more than enough to think about, yet death is one of those penetrating subjects that will obtrude itself on notice, in defiance of time and circumstance; and so as each passer-by approached the old jail he instinctively, and not without a shudder, lifted his eye towards the window of the condemned cell. Many were dying on sick-beds that night—many sinking under poverty, crushed hopes and disappointments; but these being everyday occurrences were not thought of—the time on earth of such might be short, whereas the time of this convict was not merely brief in span, but the exact limit of its duration was fixed. He was to die in so many hours. These or similar considerations induced small knots of passengers to congregate in the vicinity of the jail, and their communings were protracted to a late hour; but as midnight approached, the streets became more and more deserted; the most pertinacious talkers found themselves at last to be without listeners, and before the birth of the new day, no one was to be seen in the whole thoroughfare, save an occasional watchman. A thick mist enveloped the city, and against it the dim oil lamps of the olden time, struggled hard to discharge their illuminating function—it was, in fact, such a night as eminently favoured any enterprise where secresy was an indispensable element. Darkness had flung her sable mantle over the sleeping street, and the conspirators had but to be daring, and their attempt had every chance of success on its side.

A coach was stealthily drawn up in an angle of the church adjoining the prison, and several persons were seen passing up and down the street. They were muffled up, and apparently were suspicious as to one of their number.

"That's about his size," whispered Character Cook to Arnold; "but he is so disguised with that plaid, and the nicht is so thick, that I can't make him out. Shall I hail him?"

"Aye, do—its past twelve, and if anything is to be done, it must be done quickly."

Character crossed the street and tapped the figure on the shoulder.

"Buchanan, eh?"

"Yes—is that your coach?"

"Aye—its our coach, but harkee, frien' after your fair fiddlin' I have no great brew o' your honesty; if, however, ye mean to play fause, just look at this rung, I'll apply it wi' a force that will mak your upper storey ring to some purpose."

"There's no time for fooling," replied Buchanan, in his usual blunt tone; "when the door opens and the prisoner comes out my work is over; you get him into the coach and carry him where you like."

"Aye, of course," answered Arnold; "his brother, Cook and I will carry him off fast enough, if you can only succeed in getting him out. But what are your plans? do you know the jail? are we to go with you?"

"My plans are my own, I know the jail, and I want no one to assist me."

"He's daft," whispered Cook, "daft as a March hare, or as his ain dochter. I wadna be for trusting him."

"Silence, sir," said Buchanan, "there's the watchman."

They crept back into a corner, and the guardian of the night passed on without observing them.

The aged sentinel proclaimed the hour and its meteorology, in a harsh, broken voice; and when the announcement died away in retreating repetitions, which indicated the safe distance of the speaker, the four emerged from their hiding-place.

"I see you don't trust me, gentlemen," said Buchanan, "but you need not be afraid. I run all risks, you run none. Keep back, and make no noise, and do nothing till he comes out."

With considerable misgivings, but yet not without much curiosity, accompanied with a latent stifled hope that seemed to struggle for vitality, they silently yielded consent to the directions of the publican.

Buchanan cautiously knocked at the prison door.

"Wha's tat?" queried an inner voice.

"It's me."

"And wha be's me?"

"Mercy, Rory Maclaren, d'ye no' ken Willie Buchanan?"

"Och, an' is it you Williams, but hov te teevil can Rory hear threw te tam thick doors, and te pig iron nails. Its lang since she did not saw you Mister Buchanans."

"Open the door and let me in—its awfu' cauld here."

"She daurna does it, for the souls that's in her podies—the shentlemans is to be hanged to morn's morning, and nobodies can get in."

"I ken that," replied Buchanan; "I have been awa at Gorgie for some o' Johnny Gordon's Ferntosh, and I jist thocht on my road hame that a wee drap micht do ye good; it's an awfu' thing sitting by yoursel the haill nicht."

"It is all dat, Mister Buchanans; I don't like to be shailor in tis place o' bad smells. I wish I vas a smuggler again, Mister Buchanans. Is it Shon Gordon's best?"

"His very best, and has been three years below the grun'—man it's fine—jist ae moufou' wad mak ye greet for very joy. It gaes down a body's throat like a lighted peat. But there's nae use flingin' pearls afore swine, I thocht ye wad hae been ower glad to tak' it. A gude nicht wi' you."

"Stop, Mister Buchanans, would she give one drop to te watchers as well as to Rory?"

"Well, I don't mind."

"Come in ten, Mister Buchanans."

To the great joy of the other watchers outside, who partly heard the above interesting colloquy; the ponderous door of the Heart of Mid-Lothian was opened, and Buchanan admitted within its gloomy portals. All was then silent, and continued so for nearly an hour; and the time was passed by the friends without in an agony of suspense; but as we have the privilege of entrée as well as Mr. Buchanan, we shall detail what happened within the precincts of durance vile.

It appeared that Buchanan's friend, Mr. Roderick Maclaren, was an inveterate smuggler—or rather smuggler's assistant, for he lacked the necessary providence to accumulate capital in order to set up as a contraband trader—and having an unlucky facility for getting entangled in the meshes of the law, he had, at the expiration of one of his terms of imprisonment, offered his services to the jail authorities, and they, willing to afford the repentant offender an opportunity for amendment, and perhaps thinking that one of his habits would be an efficient terror to evil-doers, had been graciously pleased to accept his tender of assistance. Buchanan knew of the appointment, and he also had a perfect knowledge of Rory's predilection for strong waters, and of the small probability which existed that this predilection could at all times be gratified within the walls of the prison, for about the time we now speak of Howard had ended his illustrious career, and jail canteens were not in vogue as in the days of Jonathan Wild and Captain Macheath; and accordingly, acting on Walpole's great theory, that every man has his price, the publican shrewdly and correctly guessed that the fiery distillation of Ferntosh was the bribe underneath which the virtue of the Celtic sentinel was likely to fade into thin air. In addition to Rory, the only other waking inmates of the jail, or at all events, the only other inmates officially bound to be awake were two turnkeys, whose province it was to remain in the condemned cell along with the prisoner. Rory was anxious, as we have seen, that they should be partakers of his sin, for the very obvious reason that they might not be denouncers of his guilt—and although his fellow-officials were lowland, while he was highland, yet as each genus of the family of Scotchmen possess in common a love of alcoholic mixtures, they yielded, as we shall find, to the national temptation.

Rory sat by a light as dim as the lantern which poetry supposes to have been used at the obsequies of the hero of Corunna, and he trimmed it with difficulty, alleging, by way of apology, that "it vas goods enough for te place."

Buchanan willingly accepted this explanation, and produced a huge bladder filled with the liquor, which, according to Boswell's statement to Dr. Johnson, alone can make a Caledonian happy, and he also produced a wooden quaigh, or drinking-cup, so that in all respects the equipment was complete. Rory eagerly seized the proffered vessel, held it up to the light that he might inspect the colour of the fluid—that being satisfactorily green, he next gently sniffed the odour, and it in turn being duly redolent of the peat, he then adventured on a preliminary taste, and pronounced it "Bale Shon Gordon's," and finally swallowed the entire contents.

"Och, Williams, mine breaths! and te tears of mine eyes! it goes down like one hot poker! Cot pless Shon Gordons for tat same! And pless you, Mister Buchanans, an' pless the provosts, and the baillies, and the magistrates, an' pless every podies! Give me one other, Williams—I'm going to lose te test of it alreadys."

Buchanan was nothing loth, and Rory had imbibed three quaighs before he recollected his coadjutors in the upper room. Signalling Buchanan that he should remain where he was, the door-keeper took the precious liquid up-stairs, and, having filled another quaigh, he knocked at the door of the fatal cell. The fragrance of the usquebagh was unmistakeable, and equally welcome as it was distinct; but it was proffered too obviously, and virtue, as usual, had to act her part.

"What is this, Rory Maclaren?" exclaimed turnkey A—— (we speak algebraically). "Ardent spirits in the very condemned cell; I must put a stop to this."

And so motioning Rory backwards into a corner, the indignant moralist seized the wooden receptacle and absorbed the contents in double-quick time.

A—— returned, and B—— caught the perfume also.

"I must see what he means," said B——, solemnly, and he marched out, but not to return so quickly.

"I hope, sir," remarked A——, to the prisoner, "that that unfortunate man is not tampering with my comrade." And so A—— went out de novo.

These different embassies on behalf of purity occupied time, and Mr. Buchanan, calculating with the precision of a Greenwich observer how long it should take to eclipse three turnkeys, when an orb of whiskey was interposed between them and their duty, at length deemed it safe for him to venture on a reconnoitering expedition.

"Hollo, strangers here," cried A——.

"Clear agin rule," echoed B——.

"It's onlies Mister Buchanans," answered Rory, "do ye thinks the Ferntosh could comes doune to lum?"

"Now, gentlemen, I must be off—I jist looked in to gie Rory a tastin' for auld lang syne," added Buchanan, "I hope you have baith got a drop."

Messrs. A—— and B—— solemnly declared that they had not, but graciously added that if it was Mr. Buchanan's pleasure they would taste with him, but nothing more—on that point they were most emphatic. Mr. Buchanan proceeded to help them, and finding that the bladder had decreased in weight and bulk to an extent that no ordinary theory of natural evaporation could account for, he made bold to advance another stage in his mission.

"It's a cauld nicht, gentlemen," whispered the wily vintner, "the prisoner owes me a grudge—let him hae a dram—it will let him see that I hae nae ill-will to him."

"Can't be done," said A——.

"Clear agin rule," echoed B——.

"Dat's one of te clock," said Rory, "in sheven hours mores, she will be in kingdoms come—let him have te tram, it will make him tie like one shentlemans, and not like one tam lowlanders."

The latter remark was likely to provoke an ethnographic discussion, indeed both A—— and B—— applied expletives to the Gaelic notion, which we do not care about repeating; but Buchanan felt that this was a time for action and not controversy, and seeing that the turnkeys were opposed more in form than in reality to the civility proposed to be extended to the prisoner, he walked into the cell glass in hand.

"Please take a dram, Mr. Spencer," said Buchanan to Norman, who was busy reading.

"Wretch!" exclaimed Hamilton, starting to his feet, "what means this folly?"

"I am come to save you," whispered Buchanan.

Ah! there be many aids in this life that come late. Riches may come to the poor, food to the starved, medicine to the dying, justice to the oppressed, liberty to the captive, escape to the doomed; but how often do they come when hope has given up all for lost, when life's forces have ebbed to their lowest throb, and when the desire for again beholding the pleasant sun has ceased to be an instinct of nature. It was so with Norman Hamilton. Everything had failed and he had made up his mind to die: he had taken his last farewell of all that were near and dear to him; for him the bitterness of death was past, for over him the fear of mere physical destruction had no power. Yet this offer so strangely, so suddenly made! and by him who, above all men, was his bitterest enemy! The hand of Providence was apparently in it, and for the moment he felt as if he inhaled once more the free breath of heaven.

"I forgive you, Buchanan, and I wish happiness and a better fate than mine to you and yours." And so saying the prisoner put the liquor to his lips.

A—— declared that this feeling of forgiveness was quite affecting, and apparently as if from absence of mind he took the vessel from Norman's yielding hand and drank it off with continued appearance of unconsciousness. B—— did the same, but it was evident that he drank with a relish, as he loudly smacked his lips. Buchanan felt that the crisis was close at hand, and he again intimated his intention to depart—a resolution which the prison functionaries had less desire to oppose now that the contents of the bladder were so sensibly diminished. Rory was ordered to see him out, and Buchanan having privately made a significant gesture to Hamilton, formally took leave of the whole company. Rory escorted him through the various passages which led to the outer door of the building, but from his tottering steps and garrulity it was evident that the Celt was in that passive state which indicated that any opposition proceeding from him would be wholly inoperative. Indeed his passiveness had reached an extremity that was not at all convenient, for Mr. Maclaren seemed so talkative that there was a prospect of his doing nothing else save talking.

"I wunt oot, you stupid Hieland blockhead," said Buchanan angrily.

"Och, and to be shurely; an' whens did she sees Tugal Cameron—Tugal was one big rogues, but she danced weel—and did Neil M'Vittie play on hims bagpipes, noo? Och, Mr. Buchanans, but you are one fine mans—a petterer mans than Rory ever thocht you was."

"Let me oot, I tell ye."

"To be surely."

The getting out, however, was a difficult matter. Mr. Maclaren had left the keys in his own apartment, then when he went for them, he brought the wrong bunch, finding the right bunch he could not lay hold of the right key, getting the right key he seemed unable to apply it to the key-hole. Buchanan's mortification was extreme.

"Here it will be day licht before this stupid, blundering Highland ass lets me out, and then it will be too late."

He took the keys from the infirm finger of the sentinel, and at last accomplished the unlocking of the massive door himself. Keeping hold of them, he cautiously peered out and saw that assistance was at hand.

"This rascal is quite drunk, but still he may raise an alarm, take him by the throat and keep him quiet; and get one of your comrades to stand in this passage and seize the person that comes out next."

Character Cook volunteered to guard the enervated person of Rory, while Arnold (who had by this time resigned his militia commission) undertook the more formidable task of collaring the next descending individual—it being arranged that Cook and his charge should remain outside, while Arnold was to take his station within—keeping the door closed by way of preventing suspicion. Cook with characteristic restlessness did not long remain satisfied with the plan as originally adjusted—he did not think his external position was likely to afford sufficient scope for his warlike tendencies, and he petitioned to be allowed to share in the more adventurous glories of the internal conflict.

"Open the door, lieutenant," said the pugnacious man of leather, "there is no use in my watching a man that is clean mortal wi drink—he can nae mair stand than if he was an empty sack. If I lay him down in the gutter, he'll lie as soun' as the Bass Rock till it's time for the hangman. Let me in—I may be of use to you."

Arnold was nothing loath to have a coadjutor when he considered the dangers incident to a dark passage in a jail—the hour being midnight—and the object the escape of a condemned convict; but he suggested that the prostrate turnkey should be brought within doors also, and to this Cook assented, and Rory who still was emitting incoherent sentences of Celtic origin, was again deposited within the precincts of his professional abode.

"It is an awfu' thing drink, lieutenant!" ejaculated Cook, adding, however, by way of precaution—"that is when no ta'en in moderation."

Buchanan, meanwhile, had groped his way back to the cell, and then and there evolved another item of his scheme.

"I say you there, that cratur Rory is sae far gane he canna let me oot."

"The bladder fellow must be put out," said A——.

"His being here is clean agin rule," echoed B——.

"The Captain may come in upon us," added A——.

"Then go and open the door," rejoined B——.

A—— proceeded to discharge this mission, and ordered Buchanan to follow him, an advice which the latter obeyed, but whenever he ascertained that A—— was according to agreement safely in custody, he returned to the cell and knocked at the door, and B—— having no conception that any one could by any possibility knock except his associate A——, at once undid the fastenings. Mr. Buchanan allowed no time for reflection.

"Take the fetters off the prisoner,"—the command being accompanied by a shake illustrative of the present tense, and the display of a bludgeon equally descriptive of the future. "Both your comrades are secured—bear a hand."

"Clean agin—."

The bludgeon rose in the air, but B—— did not wait its descent—he undid the chains of the prisoner.

"Now, sir," said Buchanan, who appeared to have laid his plans with consummate skill, (for, like Rory, he had been engaged in the smuggling trade,) "I remain here for a few minutes to keep this chiel quiet; you make off, your friends have possession of the door. If I appeared to take your life—I've now saved it."

Norman grasped the hand of his deliverer, and immediately rushed out; the path, from a previous attempt at escape, was quite familiar to him, and he had no difficulty in making his way to the passage where his friends were in waiting for him. His voice was instantly recognised, and the door was flung open and he found himself a free man, and once more breathing the blessed air of liberty.

He was beyond the portal, but not a step more, when one of the town-guard suddenly appeared and made a thrust at him with his bayonet; a female figure, perceiving the intention, darted forward and received the blow in her own person. The guard next fired his pistol, and the fugitive staggered; but the guard was overpowered, and the prisoner was hurried into the coach, which drove rapidly off with him and the conspirators.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE GUDE-WIFE O' WAUCHOPE; AND MEMORABILIA.

To readers of the Poems of Robert Burns, "The Gude-wife o' Wauchope" needs no introduction: but in presenting the two following (hitherto) unpublished Letters, addressed to her by Sir Gilbert Elliot, Bart., afterwards Earl of Minto, it may add to their interest, perhaps, if we give a few notes from our private annotated copy of Burns.

Mrs. Scott of Wauchope, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Rutherfurd, (she was niece of Mrs. Cockburn, authoress of a very touching and beautiful variation of "The Flowers o' the Forest,") appears to have been born in Edinburgh in 1729. She was the eldest daughter of David Rutherfurd, Esq., of Cape-hope, Advocate, by —— Dundas, daughter of Robert Dundas, Lord Arniston. Mr. Rutherfurd was, it is believed, a younger son of the family of Rutherfurd, of Fairnalie in Selkirkshire. In 1768, Miss Elizabeth Rutherfurd married Walter Scott, Esq., then younger of Wauchope, Roxburghshire. She died childless in 1789. The Wauchope Scotts are descended from "The Laird's Wat," celebrated in "The Raid of Redswyre." Several considerable estates in the western part of Roxburghshire had passed through the hands of various branches of the family previous to the acquisition of Wauchope. Their tastes seem to have been far otherwise than literary.* A "versifier" herself, Mrs. Scott in 1787 on the publication of Burns' volume addressed to him a rhyming epistle, entitled, "The Guidwife of Wauchope-house to Robert Burns," expressing her admiration of his poems, and her doubts as to the correctness of the report, that they were the production of a "ploughman." . . . . But it may be as well to let her tell her own tale, and thus afford a specimen of her poetic powers:—

My canty, witty, rhyming ploughman
I hafflins doubt, it is na true, man,
That ye between the stilts were bred,
Wi' ploughmen school'd, wi' ploughmen fed.
I doubt it sair, ye've drawn your knowledge
Either fra grammar-school or college.
Gude troth, your saul and body baith,
Was better fed, I'd gie my aith,
Than theirs, wha sup sour-milk and parritch,
An' cummil thro' the single Carritch.
Wha ever heard the ploughman speak,
Could tell gif Homer was a Greek?
He'd flee as soon upon a cudgel,
As get a single line o' Virgil.
An' then sae slee ye crack your jokes
O' Willie Pitt, and Charlie Fox,
Our great men a' sae weel descrive,
An' how to gar the nation thrive,
Ane maist wad swear ye dwelt amang them,
An' as ye saw them sae ye sang them.
But be ye ploughman, be ye peer,
Ye are a funny blade, I swear;
An' though the cauld I ill can bide,
Yet twenty miles and mair I'd ride,

* The present "Laird" of Wauchope, J. MacMillan Scott, Esq., of Harwood, to whom we are indebted for the present letters and the preceding memorabilia, informs us that he has in his possession an unpublished poem of the "Guidwife's," bearing the somewhat ominous title of the "Diaboliad." . . . . Mr. Scott continues, "Some few years since in looking over an old book-stall I chanced to light upon a volume entitled, 'Alonzo and Cora, with other original poems. By Elizabeth Scot, a native of Edinburgh.' On examining this volume I found that the poems were those of my relative. The poems bear to have been published by subscription, and have prefixed to them a preface giving a not very accurate account of their authoress, dated at Northampton, June 1801." See Sir Gilbert's Letters, now first published.

O'er moss an' muir, an' never grumble,
Though my old yad shou'd gie a stumble,
To crack a winter-night wi' thee,
An' hear thy songs and sonnets slee.
A guid saut herring, an' a cake,
Wi' sic a chiel, a feast wad make;
I'd rather scour your reaming gill,
Or eat o' cheese and bread my fill,
Than wi' dull lairds on turtle dine,
An' ferlie at their wit and wine.
O, gif I kenn'd but where ye bade,
I'd send to you a marled plaid;
'Twad haud your shouthers warm an' braw,
An' douse at kirk or market shaw.
For south, as weel as north, my lad,
A' honest Scotchmen loe the maud [plaid.]
Right wae that we're sae far frae ither:
Yet proud I am to ca' ye brither.
Your most obedient,
E. S.

Burns replied, as all the world knows, in that peerless epistle, in which he bodies forth those first indefinite stirrings of immortal ambition, which, as Lockhart and Christopher North have in eloquent words remarked, he had before shadowed out under the magnificent image of "the blind groping of Homer's Cyclops around the walls of the cave."

Smelling of sunny autumnal "Harst's" and the dewy freshness of the goldening "Fields," one cannot read verses such as these too frequently:—

Guidwife,
I mind it weel, in early date,
When I was beardless, young, and blate,
An' first could thresh the barn;
Or haud a yokin' at the pleugh,
An' tho' forfoughten sair eneugh,
Yet unco' proud to learn;
When first amang the yellow corn
A man I reckon'd was,
And wi' the lave ilk merry morn
Could rank my rig and lass,
Still shearing, and clearing,
The tither stooked raw,
Wi' claivers, an' haivers,
Wearin' the day awa.

E'en then a wish (I mind its power)
A wish, that to my latest hour
Shall strongly heave my breast;
That I for poor auld Scotland's sake,
Some usefu' plan, or book could make,
Or sing a sang at least.
The rough burr-thistle spreading wide
Amang the bearded bear,
I turn'd the weeding-clips aside,
And spared the symbol dear;
No nation, no station,
My envy e'er could raise,
A Scot still, but blot still,
I knew no higher praise.

In his famous border tour Burns visited Wauchope: regarding its inmates we find the following entry in his journal.

"Wauchope:—Mr. Scott, exactly the figure and face commonly given to Sancho Pança—very shrewd in his farming matters, and not unfrequently stumbles on what may be called a strong thing, rather than a good thing. Mrs. Scott, all the sense, taste, intrepidity of face and bold critical decision which usually distinguish female authors."

And now for the letters of Sir Gilbert Elliot, addressed to the "Guidwife." All such morsels are of moment and interest, as reflecting the habits and casting light on the relations of the period: and are always so many little contributions towards the yet unwritten history of the literature of Scotland:—

No. 3, Pall Mall Court, London,
31st Dec., 1787.

Dear Madam,—I fear I must adopt the apology you have been so considerate as to suggest for me, and plead the occupations of my last two months as a slight excuse for the delay which you have too much reason to impute to me, as well as others, in executing the commission you was [were] so good as to intrust me with. My admiration of your two poems is certainly not inferior to that proferred by Mr. Logan.* My offers of service on the occasion were as forward and as voluntary as his; and I fear my performance must fairly appear as backward and as dilatory, so that I must, in justice, claim my share in the blame, and in any displeasure which you might so naturally feel on our double failure. As reformation is the better part of penitence, I will lose no time in telling you that as soon as my holydays began, I applied to Mr. Logan, and was informed by him that "Alonzo" was actually in the hands of a bookseller, who had undertaken to publish it on his own account: and that it would appear soon after Christmas. I then showed him "Edwin and Edith," and desired his opinion, whether it might not be advisable to add that very beautiful poem to the former. He has returned it to me to-day, with the strongest expressions of admiration; and with his advice to publish the two together. I am, therefore, to request that you will forward to me, as soon as convenient, a correct copy of "Edwin and Edith," in the form in which you wish it to appear. It only remains that I should say a word on the different modes of publication. My own opinion (confirmed by that of Mr. Logan and several other good judges) of the extraordinary merit and beauty of these performances, rendered still more conspicuous (if I may say so without incivility) by the situation and circumstances in which they have been produced, is much too high to leave me satisfied with the only terms on which a first publication is undertaken by a bookseller, namely, to take the profit for the risk. I am, therefore, induced to submit to you two other methods, either of which appear to me better suited to the occasion than that I have mentioned; but I must request that you will decide freely for either or neither of them, according to your own judgment and inclination; begging only that if both my proposals should appear to you objectionable on any account, you will excuse my officiousness in favour of my zeal. The first method is to print these poems ourselves; I mean at our own expense, and to reimburse ourselves by the sale. I know that your modesty will suggest the risk of this expedient, as greater than may suit a rural poet. But as I am not bound to any modesty on this subject, I have only to desire that you will allow me to take both the advances and the risk on myself. I will repay myself honestly out of the first produce, and account to the author for the rest; and I have no doubt of convincing you by the event that I am making you a tender which is more gallant than hazardous. The other mode is a subscription, which I am quite sure would succeed far beyond the expense of publication. That expense would not exceed £30, and I should think £100 a very moderate subscription. If you should see no objection to the latter proposal, I need hardly assure you of my best exertions to promote this, as I shall be happy to do any other means of accomplishing this publication, both for the gratification of the world, the honour of the borders, and still more for that of the rapture-giving sex, which I profess as much to worship, though not so well qualified to celebrate as your friend, our other Scottish bard. [i.e. Burns.]

* See remarks at the close of this paper.

May I beg the favour of your orders on this subject as soon as convenient, and that you will believe me, with best respects to Wauchope, my dear Madam, most sincerely,

Your faithful humble servant,

GILBERT ELLIOT.

P.S.—I have been prevented by the snow from my intended journey to Minto, and must therefore defer my hopes of receiving you there till the summer. I need not say, however, that Lady Elliot will at all times be happy in the honour of seeing you.

II.

Minto, Friday, 27 June, 1788.

DEAR MADAM,—I hope the engagements I have had this winter in London will be considered as some excuse for the appearance of neglect you will I fear have observed in the management of the business which you intrusted me with. It was not till very lately that it was at all in my power to give it the attention which I wished, and although I did not lose two days after I was at liberty, in taking steps towards accomplishing our affair, I was, however, unwilling to write to you on a subject which had suffered so many delays, till I could inform you of its being finally settled. I have now the pleasure of telling you that it is so, and I have only to hope that you will not disapprove of the manner and terms on which I have agreed for the publication of your two poems. Mr. Debrett, bookseller in Piccadilly, has bought the copy for £20; and although I certainly think this a very small sum, when compared with my opinion of the work, yet as it is just £20 more than is almost ever given for the first work of any author in that line, especially when it is to be published without a name, I was induced to accept of it: and I was indeed the more unwilling to refuse this offer, as I was strongly advised not to take the method formerly proposed, of printing it for the author, because a thousand difficulties are thrown in the way of such publications by the booksellers, who have opportunity enough to do mischief. What I regret most is, that the poems will not appear till next winter;—Mr. Debrett, and indeed several other booksellers, whom I consulted on the subject, thinking it by no means advisable to bring it out at the close of the season, when people were retiring to the country. The business is, however, in the meanwhile concluded: and I have Mr. Debrett's written engagement on the terms I have mentioned. As soon as my principal occupation in Parliament was over, Mr. Elliot of Wells and I transcribed the poem of Edwin and Edith: and took the liberty of inserting one or two little alterations, principally in those passages which had occasioned doubt or difficulty at our last consultations at Minto. These, however, will of course be submitted to your review and decision. The grand stumbling-block of all, "A Bracelet say," is I think happily got over, and I take the liberty of enclosing you two versions of that stanza for your choice. It will, however, be extremely advisable that you consider attentively during the summer the whole of our last copy, that it may not go to the press without your sanction. I imagine you will also think it right to bestow the same attention on Alonzo which was given last year to Edwin and Edith, as I do not know that it has ever yet undergone any revision with a view to its publication. I attempted to see Mr. Logan on the subject, but he had unfortunately gone a few miles out of London for the recovery of his health: and as he came to town occasionally but for a few hours at a time, we were not able to meet. He has returned me, however, the copy which he had of Alonzo, and I have brought back that and all other papers relating to your poems, along with me. It will be necessary to think of some little introduction in the way of preface or advertisement, and in short to settle exactly the form in which the work is to appear. I mention these things now, that the summer may not be suffered to slip away, and the season for printing catch us unprepared. I propose to have the pleasure of waiting on you in a few days, with the two poems, when we may talk over this matter more satisfactorily than can well be done in writing.

Believe me, Dear Madam, with Lady Elliot's best compliments,

Your affectionate and humble Servant,

GILBERT ELLIOT.

P.S.—I arrived from London yesterday.

Somewhat curious is it to think of Sir Gilbert, afterwards Lord Justice Clerk and Earl of Minto, "copying out" a poem whose stanzas must be reckoned by hundreds and its totality nearly (we suppose) a thousand. Well, the author of "My apron dearie" and "Amynta" was certainly much better thus employed than his degenerate representative, the present Pope-toe-kissing, Italy-ambassadoring, Earl Minto!

The "Mr. Logan" to whom allusion is made in the preceding Letters, is the famous (or infamous) Rev. John Logan, the mean stealer of poor Michael Bruce's "Ode to the Cuckoo" and "Paraphrases." His is a tainted name: and yet requiescat in pace he repented him, as the death-valley fore-casted its shadows, of much of his obliquities.

We have placed under the heading of this Paper, "Memorabilia:" but these are but (in addition to what we have annotated) slight. However, the present is as good and acceptable an opportunity of giving them to the public as can occur.

The little "Memorabilia" referred to are hardly related to the preceding: and yet, were it needful to establish a relation, it might be done, inasmuch as the first is by Burns, and the second refers to a relative of another Scottish poet, Robert Ferguson.

Appended to a contemporary copy of that most daringly witty and sarcastic of all Burns's poems, "Holy Willie's Prayer," in our possession, is the following graphic hand-sketch (in a single stanza) of the mode in which poor Will Fisher, the hero of the poem, (alas, that he should have been found "dead-drunk" in a ditch, after all his austerity and punctiliousness,) was wont to "make his face in his prayers." It is a serious subject no doubt: but the individual is to be detached from the subject: and then (to make Pascal speak English) "I persuade myself that the ridiculing of the errors and extravagances of mankind is not acting contrary to the general conduct of the saints."

Here then is the Hogarthian limning,—

> "Gar your e'en reel, [turn up the white of your eyes]
> Circumflex your mouth,
> Haud your upper lip North,
> And your under South,
> Half grane, half squeel."

It bears the broad-arrow mark of Burns upon it.

Our next little "Memorabilia," is a pass granted by President Duncan Forbes to the uncle of the Poet Ferguson (by the mother's side). It sheds a side-light upon the state of the country at the period. We copy the original verbatim, which has been placed at our disposal (with other papers) by John Forbes, Esq., Writer, Old Meldrum, the representative (maternally) of Ferguson.*

THE PORT OF LONDON.

Did we, as they of old, our gods attend
With festive pomp, before the city's view,
COMMERCE! adown this watery avenue
At each returning feast thy train should wend,
With richer circumstance than e'er did send Athenian Pallas forth, or to the dome
Of favourite Jove,* amidst applauding Rome,
Proceed with trophies, treasures without end,
In that one homage—Less than should be thine,
Borne in thy sumptuous bark these ranks between,
Where from all winds thy votaries combine,
Centres all skill, all enterprise:—a scene
More wondrous far than did her progress line
When Cydnus' wave received th' Egyptian Queen.

REMINISCENCES OF A FRENCH LADY.

Madame de Bawr is an amiably garrulous old lady, well known and appreciated in an extensive circle of Parisian society. Enjoying the double blessing of a green old age and a good memory, she writes in the evening of her days, and for the public's benefit, a volume consisting of those incidents and recollections of a not uneventful life, with whose verbal narration she has been wont to gratify her friends. She has lived through three French revolutions. No more need be said to prove that she has seen much worth the telling. Twice, she intimates, she has been precipitated from the height of opulence, to the depths of adversity. That she has borne her cares and sorrows in the meek and resigned spirit of a Christian, the tone and tenor of her book affords sufficient evidence. In her day of disaster, she was not wanting in that moral courage which persons, suddenly overtaken by ill-fortune, are often unable to muster. Of good family and connections, she yet found herself, in the course of the many political convulsions through which she passed, compelled to rely upon her own exertions for a competency. Literature was the occupation to which she turned her attention, and not without success. Besides several plays, she has written a number of novels and tales, which, although they may not stand forth so strikingly from amongst the multitude of works of that kind which the present century has produced, as to hand down her name to a remote posterity, yet deserve favourable mention, on account of their amusing qualities, amiable tendencies, and unobjectionable character. Her present work, entitled "Mes Souvenirs," is, we presume, intended to be her last, since she already announced, in a novel that preceded it by two or three years, her final retirement from the field of literature. Unless, indeed, she should be tempted, by the success this new volume has already obtained in Paris, especially amongst female readers, to add to it another, for which she would surely still find ample materials in the recollections of a career extending over a number of years, which it is unnecessary, as it would be ungallant, here to specify. Without, however, speculating on what she may hereafter do, we will occupy ourselves with what she has already done. Her amusingly desultory volume courts and rewards examination. It matters little where we open it, for it is full of lively sketches and characteristic traits. We take, at random, an anecdote of Queen Marie Antoinette, illustrating the kindness of heart of that unfortunate princess. The person who told it to Madame de Bawr, had it from M. de Chalabre, who abstained from naming the culprit.

"M. de Chalabre held the bank in the Queen's apartments, when faro was played at Court. One night, when collecting the money of the players who had just lost, the great habit he had of holding rouleaus of fifty louis in his hand, convinced him that one he had just taken up, and which he had seen staked by a very young man, was false. Fearful lest he should unwittingly again circulate it, he availed himself of a moment when no one was looking, and put it hastily into his pocket.

"The Queen alone remarked the action. Surprised that M. de Chalabre, whose extreme delicacy at play was well known, should allow himself to subtract even the smallest sum from his bank, she waited till the company retired, and made sign to him to remain behind.

"As soon as they were alone, 'Monsieur de Chalabre,' said the Queen, 'I wish to know why you this evening took out of your bank, a rouleau of fifty louis d'ors?'

"'A rouleau, Madam?'

"'Yes,' replied the Queen; 'you put it in the right hand pocket of your waistcoat.'

"'Since your Majesty saw me do it,' replied M. de Chalabre, 'I am compelled to confess that I took the rouleau from the bank, because it is false.'

"'False!' repeated the Queen.

"M. de Chalabre took the rouleau from his pocket, tore the paper, and exhibited its contents —a piece of lead cut in the requisite form.

"'Were you able to detect the person who placed this upon the table?' said Marie Antoinette, pale from sudden emotion.

"M. de Chalabre answered this question with such manifest embarrassment, that the Queen pressed him hard, and at last said, in a tone permitting no further evasion:

"'I will know who it was.'

"'Well, Madam! it was the young Count de * * *.'

"Upon hearing the name of one of the best families in France, the Queen heaved a deep sigh.

"'I request, Monsieur de Chalabre,' said she, after a moment's reflection, 'that you will keep this sad business a profound secret.' And she dismissed him.

"At the next of the Queen's receptions, the young Count, whose father was then ambassador at a foreign court, made his appearance as usual. When Marie Antoinette saw him approach the faro-table,

"'Monsieur le Comte,' said she, smiling, 'I promised your mother to take you under my guardianship during her absence; our play is too high for so young a man, and you shall not play faro any more at Court.'

"The Count blushed crimson; he had no means of testifying his gratitude for such great goodness, otherwise than by a profound bow, but it is probable that thenceforward, Count de * * * gambled no more."

Madame de Bawr's personal reminiscences carry us very far back, but by the introduction of a third person she sometimes puts us in communication with a period incredibly remote. "Dining one day at the Chateau de Guermande," she says,

"a lady, who was seated near the master of the house, and who did not look very old, suddenly said, in a quiet confident way, 'In 1715, Louis XIV. told my husband that. . . . .' 'That lady is mad!' said I to my neighbour. 'No,' he replied, 'she is widow of Marshal Richelieu.' At the age of eighty-four, Marshal Richelieu had married a third wife, Madame de Roth, then young. So that at this present time of writing, in 1851, one person has formed the link between myself, still living, and him who conversed with Louis XIV. in 1715. The grandmother of Madame de Pastoret, who was still living when I was a girl, remembered to have heard Madame de Maintenon, going out for a drive with the king, give her orders to the coachman, saying, 'A Trianon, légèrement.'" Madame de Bawr's own recollections relate chiefly to the court, to eccentric contemporaries, to the theatre, art, and literature. Herself a successful dramatist and thereby brought into personal acquaintance with several distinguished actors, notably with Mademoiselle Mars, who took the principal part in several of her pieces—she takes a natural interest in matters histrionic, and especially in the lyric drama. Her sketch of the character and genius of Bellini is calculated to inspire deep regret at the premature death of so amiable a man and promising a composer.

"Bellini," she says, "combined with his rare talent, all those qualities that win the heart. Nature had endowed him with the happiest and most amiable character. His enjoyment of life was keen; he was unspoiled by his successes of all kinds. With a strong feeling of emulation, he knew not envy: he would not even believe in the existence of envious persons. Thus it was that he suffered nothing from the numerous intrigues formed against him, for he was incapable of suspecting them. Content with his own success, he sincerely applauded that of others, which, he would say, rubbing his hands, excited his ambition for the future. The fact is that he considered himself far from having arrived at the apogee of his talent, and in that I believe him to have been perfectly right. It is easy to perceive, by observing the date of his works, that he daily took more pains to vary his melodies, and perfect the instrumental portions of his operas. His death robbed the world of more than one masterpiece, of a music full of grace, charm, and sentiment.

"Bellini had a great deal of natural sense and ability, and was eager in his acquisition of all kinds of knowledge. An indescribable tinge of youthfulness and artlessness gave a peculiar originality to his conversation. Features whose regularity was combined with expression, and a most elegant figure, would have recommended him in any society; how much more so, then, when their possessor was the author of the 'Puritani,' the 'Somnambula,' and 'Norma?'

"When Bellini's first opera was composed, Rossini, although still in the prime of life, and without any apparent motive, seemed disposed to compete no longer for the laurels of which he had had so large a share. The first appearances of his young successor were brilliant. All the theatres in Italy competed for a composition of Bellini's; in the towns he successively inhabited, he was sought and feasted by the highest society. At Milan, the first ladies in the place combined to work an immense carpet, which they presented to him. The music of Norma had raised enthusiasm to the highest point, when he yielded to his desire to visit Paris, where, it may said, artistic reputations become consolidated. The welcome he here found inspired him with such a partiality to France, that he proposed passing his life there. Alas! that pleasant and fortunate life was destined to be very brief. Bellini, born in 1802, died in 1835."

We find, in this olla podrida of gossip and souvenirs, an anecdote of another composer, who preceded Grétry as purveyor of the French opera, but who is now far less remembered for his musical skill than for his excellence as a chess-player. As a young man, Philidor exercised this remarkable talent as a means of making money. In Germany, England and Holland, he beat all the best players, although he gave them advantages. More than once he was known to direct the game of a person placed out of his sight, whilst he himself was playing another game; but efforts of that kind fatigued his head so much that he discontinued them. The Count d'Artois, however, having heard of the feat, greatly desired to witness it, and sent word to Philidor that he would play him in that manner for a hundred louis d'ors. Philidor, after duly warning the prince that he was sure to beat him, at last yielded to his wish, and accepted the bet. When the Count d'Artois had selected the two players who were to conduct his game,—and as he was quite decided to pay the hundred louis, however the thing turned out, he secretly prevailed upon Philidor's second falsely to execute one of the orders given to him. This understanding effected, the game began, and had proceeded but a very short while, when Philidor having told his player to move a knight, the player moved a bishop, and, twenty moves afterwards, informed him that his adversary checked his king with his queen. "That is impossible," cried Philidor, "our knight would take her." "But the knight is not there," replied the prince's accomplice; "it is the bishop." "How so, the bishop!" Resting his head upon his hands, Philidor sat buried in reflection, until he recalled to his memory, the whole progress of the game.

"At the fifth move," he at last said, "when I told you to advance the knight, you made a mistake, and advanced the bishop."

At these words the Count d'Artois, seized with wonder and admiration, rose from his seat, confessed the trick and asked Philidor's pardon. Next morning he sent him his hundred louis in a gold box, bearing his initials in diamonds.

An amusing section of Madame de Bawr's volume is devoted to celebrated punsters, and especially to the Marquis de Bièvre, so renowned for his proficiency in that branch of wit, that a collection of his bon mots was published, under the title of "Bièvriana." Spoiled by popularity, he overdid the thing, and at last his habit became so deplorably confirmed that he could not speak for five minutes to any one—not even to the queen—without punning. He had another accomplishment, equally elevated and desirable; he was a proficient in the noble game of cup and ball. He would throw the ball to the ceiling or to a distance, and never fail to catch it upon the point. The natural consequence of these two strangely-selected accomplishments was that the Marquis was dreaded by his friends and not unfrequently "trotted out" for the amusement of strangers.

It chanced one day that a diplomatist with whom M. de Bièvre was very intimate, was intrusted by the cabinet of Versailles with an important mission to the Pope, and went to wish him good-bye before starting for Rome. M. de Bièvre, who had never been in Italy, conceived a sudden desire to visit that country, and proposed to accompany his friend. The diplomatist at first refused, with an embarrassed air. Pressed by the Marquis to explain his refusal, he at last frankly avowed that his friend's rage for punning and passion for cup and ball rendered him an unfit companion for a plenipotentiary. "And if I pledge you my word," said the Marquis, "not to make a single pun, or to touch a cup and ball before returning to France." "You could not keep it." "Try me. If I break it, I leave you the very next day." This agreed, the two friends set out. Of course the Marquis took no cup and ball with him, but it was hard work to repress the puns that every moment started to his lips, and he suffered greatly on the road. He reached Lyons, however, without accident. They were to halt there two days. The intendant of the province invited the two friends to dinner, and asked a number of distinguished persons to meet them.

When the diplomatist and the marquis arrived, the drawing-room was already pretty full. The first thing that caught M. de Bièvre's eye, was a cup and ball upon the chimney-piece. Determined not to go near it, he was conversing with some of the guests, when one of them took the fatal instrument and made very clumsy use of it. M. de Bièvre could not stand this. He darted forward, snatched the toy from the novice's hands, and, as if to make up for recent abstinence, executed a succession of feats which excited general admiration. A circle formed around him, he was loudly applauded and overwhelmed with compliments.

"Ah! Monsieur le Marquis," cried one of the spectators, "how I wish I had your address (skill)!"

"My address, sir!" was the punster's reply; "it is Place des Terreaux, Hotel of the Three Kings."

One may imagine how the plenipotentiary looked, at this double relapse of his incorrigible companion.

"I knew, in his old age, and when I was hardly sixteen," continues Madame de Bawr, "a great artist, who, like the Marquis de Bièvre, had a passion for puns. It was Joseph Vernet, the marine painter, the same who, during a voyage, wishing to take a sketch of a tempest, had himself lashed to the ship's mainmast. Notwithstanding this remarkable trait, and the two hundred pictures, all esteemed by connoisseurs, which Vernet left behind him, one often met, after his death, persons who only spoke of him to quote his most celebrated puns, of which a considerable collection might be made. His son, Carl Vernet, inherited this passion, and as I knew him much longer than I did his father, I confess that the rolling fire of puns sometimes perplexed me to such a degree that I no longer understood a word of what he was saying.

"The Vernet family is, I believe, the only one which, from father to son, has produced in three successive generations, three men, distinguished in the same profession. Joseph has enriched all the galleries in Europe with his pictures. Carl, his son, acquired celebrity as a painter of horses; and it is unnecessary here to speak of the works we owe, and of those which I hope we still shall owe, to Horace Vernet, his grandson."

We would prolong our examination of this pleasant book, did space allow it. As it is, we must refer our readers to the original. It is not often one stumbles upon French memoirs that can be recommended to English ladies as entirely unexceptionable. After an attentive perusal, we can call to mind no page of the present volume from which the most fastidious need recoil.

THE LITTLE HUNCHBACK.

A TALE OF CASGAR.

CASGAR. Turbans everywhere. Turbans I say.
Upstairs and downstairs and over the way.
Turbans of every conceivable hue,
(To start à la Dickens,) old turbans and new,
Scarlet and orange and indigo blue.
Come, don't contradict me! Because if you do,
I'll multiply every Turk's turban by two.

In a certain snug street that I know very well,—
For I lived in Casgar once, a year at a spell,
And dashed off one morning, myself, in a hurry,
The "plan of the city" that's published in "Murray,"—

There lives, or did live, Anno Domini Fifty;
A Tailor called Mustapha, civil and thrifty;
So merry withal,
You never could call
But you'd hear him strike up like the band at a ball,
Till everything rattled all over the stall!
Such fun was his music that people would stop
And form quite a crowd round the door of the shop;
Till many a Turk, irresistibly pleasured,
Who stayed there to listen stepped in to be measured.

One fine afternoon,
Towards the middle of June,
Our friend was as usual humming a tune
And singing some verses he'd made on the moon,
As cross-legged he cosily squatted at work,
In his double capacity, Tailor and Turk,
When a queer little figure
As black as a nigger
Peeped in at the door with a wink and a snigger;
On his backbone a hunch
Had grown such a bunch
That he looked very much like an African Punch,
And Mustapha's heart gave a leap to his throat
Lest this rum little devil had called for a coat.

But he hadn't: he sat
Plump down on the mat,
And drummed a few chords on the crown of his hat,
Then struck up a ballad so brimful of fun
That Snip rolled about on his board like a tun,
Shouting, "Stop there—you grinning young son of a gun!
Don't burst a man's biler, adone lad, adone!"
But stop?—not a bit!
He rattled his wit
Till Mustapha's ribs were just ready to split,
It's a mercy he didn't go off in a fit!
John Parry, I'll swear,
Had he only been there,
Would have thumped out his musical brains in despair,
And each "Brother Brough,"
As, in sympathy gruff,
The optic fraternal he wiped with his cuff,
Would have sobbed, "Brother, brother,—we've lived long enough!"
The words I can't copy—because, in a ramble,
My pockets were picked by a bandit of Stambol,
Who prigged all my papers and pounded my head,—
Walked off in my breeches, and left me for dead.
I only remember it closed with a wink,
And a pointed request for "a trifle to drink."

"Drink? dear little black,
With a hump on your back,"
Cried Mustapha, "come along home for a snack!
The cut of your jib
Will tickle my 'rib,'
We'll hang you out supper and liquor ad lib.
By Jove, you deserve it. Come, jump off the floor,
And shove up the shutters whilst I lock the door:
Early closing for ever, and Mental Improvement!
I say, little dog, it's an excellent movement."

Not far down the road
Lay the Tailor's abode,
His "cot" as he termed it when turning an ode,
Where the fondest of wives, with a kiss on her lips,
Stood ready to welcome the fondest of Snips.

With a start and a stare,
The Tailoress fair
Exclaimed, "Oh, my goodness, who have you got there?
A little black Blackamoor, well I declare!"
"Pray, wife," said the Tailor, "some supper prepare:
Don't snub little Hunchback, but set him a chair;
If he doesn't surprise you when once his tongue's loose,
By the bones of the Prophet, I'll swallow my goose."

Alas and alack
For our dear little Black,
His manners were almost as queer as his back:
For he never said, "thank you," and never said "please,"
But ate with his knife, and began with his cheese,
And snored as he chewed,
Which is perfectly rude,
When in civilized company taking your food:
Till his host and his hostess exclaimed, "What a glutton
This low little Hunchback is, over his mutton!"

At length a great crab
He snatched with a grab,
And down his black throttle attempted to dab;
But, frightful to say,
It "went the wrong way,"
And there, it's crustaceous ill-will to display,
Perversely stuck fast—
"Oh, I'm diddled at last!"
Gasped Blacky. "Gulp—guggle. It . . . cannot . . . get . . . past.
Quick! Slap my back somebody—Oh, try a spoon!
A long one—a longer! Oh, I'm a gone 'coon!"

To paint the despair
Of our kind-hearted pair,
When the poor little nigger rolled out of his chair,
I give you my honour is more than I dare:
For besides all the croaking
Folks make when they're choking,
And the trouble they give, which is vastly provoking
In the midst of a meal,
They couldn't but feel
They'd lost a fine crab which had cost a great deal;
And that wasn't all, for I'm sorry to state,
They were doubly perplexed by their visitor's fate,
The laws in Casgar being cruelly queer,
(In fact one might almost pronounce them severe, Compared with our mild little statute-book here,)
Announcing outright,
In plain black and white,

'You must mind what you're at when your friends
you invite,
For, if any true Mussulman dies in your house, You'll be hung the next day,'—which seems rather a chouse.
So it's clear that our couple had reasons a few
For bringing their crooked young visitor to.

They ran off directly for 'Hints on Emergencies,'
To see what the author, (an eminent surgeon,) says;
Then both fell to thump
The detestable hump,
As if such a process would make the crab jump:
They opened his jaw,
And fished in his maw
With hook-sticks and scissors, and stammered
"oh law!"
When they couldn't so much as catch hold of a claw.
"Its all of no use,"
Said the Tailor, "the deuce
Take the hunch and the boy! they'll be cooking
my goose,
I expect, with a stock that ain't easy to loose,
To-morrow at six;
It's rather a fix,
At my time of life to be in for the kicks.
Come, what's to be done wife, eh?—chop him up little,
And sell him for sav'loys and poor people's victual?
Or, stay! Lug him off to our neighbour the Saw-bones,
And swear that he killed him, in handling his jaw-bones!
That's better! yes, bundle him up on my back:
I'll leave him next door and be home in a crack!"

'Ding ding' at the bell:
"This gemman ain't well,"
Says the Tailor, "his backbone's beginnin' to swell.
Tell your master, my lad: say he's wrigglin' with pain,
And sends up this guinea his case to explain:
And tell him he'd better come down pretty slick,
Or he'll find his poor patient as dead as a brick."

Our doctor—a Jew,
Had but little to do,
Because all his patients were luckily few;
So he sat in his room, looking hungry and blue,
Writing fancy prescriptions and fabulous letters,
And wishing himself better known to his betters.
And, of course, when his boy
Burst in, full of joy,
"Oh master—oh master—oh master, ahoy!
Here's a cove and a pound!
And, oh, isn't he round!
And the little chap squeaks as he sits on the ground!
And he can't come upstairs, 'cause he's bad I'll be bound!"
He jumped off his chair,
Six feet in the air,
And taking, alas, neither candle nor care,
Went hop skip and jump to the top of the stair—
Where, just in the way,
Poor Blackamoor lay,
Very little expecting such nimble display—
Kicked him head over heels—oh it's painful to say
How he banged like a ball
On the stairs and the wall,
And how thump after thump you might hear in his fall,
Till at last you might hear him roll into the hall.

"O! O! Vat ish here?
I've killed him I fear!
O! fetch down the candlesh! O Moses, ma tear, Pleash help us,—I vould not have kicked on his rear
If I'd known vere he lay,
O! vot a bad day,
To valk on von's patient that comes with his pay!"
So shrieked the physician as down stairs he ran
In frantic pursuit of the poor little man:
He did all he could,
But he did no more good
Than if he'd been coaxing a doll made of wood;
For every appliance
Of surgical science
He found that his customer held at defiance,
And still perseveringly lay on the floor,
Precisely as ugly and dead as before.

And then, in despair,
The Jew tore his hair,
(Our Hebrews have commonly plenty to spare,)
And cried on the 'prophetsh' to 'make it all square,'
And vowed he'd continue to sob and to swear
Till they did: but it seems that they didn't much care,
Or else couldn't help him and laugh'd at his prayer.
But outcries and 'groans
Which might soften the stones,'
Are things which my muse altogether disowns,
And begs you'll not fancy she's going to 'harrow,'
Or 'freeze' you, or play any tricks with your 'marrow;'
But simply imagine a Jew giving tongue,
Crying, "O vat a pity it is to be hung!"
It was well for this Jew that his little foot page,
Though small, was extremely discreet for his age;
He never with lollipop made himself ill,
Nor cribbed from the counter, nor stole from the till,
Nor whistled on Sunday, but sat by the cook,
Improving her mind with some good little book:
And he often would say,—"See I never get whacked,
And I never say nothing that isn't a fact,
And in minding my work, O I'm always exact,
And perhaps, when I die, I'll be put in a tract;
That's 'cause I'm so good, cook: indeed I don't see
As the Little Blind Dustman was better than me."

"Oh master, oh master!" the prodigy said,
"O don't go a-twistin' the hair off your head,
If so be as the poor little gemman is dead!
And please not to swear—'cause I'll quote you a text—"
"Text be blowed," said the Jew, "you young devil, what next?

I've killed him, I tellsh you!—He's dead as de door,
And if de polishemen shall find him, oh lor!
De Judgsh and John Ketch vill be only two stages—"
"Boo-hoo!" cried the youth, "shall I lose my week's wages?
Oh master, hooray!
I've thought of a way;
You need not be hung, for I'm sure it will pay,—
And I'll tell you for sixpence! come, what do you say?
Old Cofi, the grocer,
Lives next door, you know, sir,
Well! wouldn't it just be a regular poser
To slip him down chimney? We'll soon shove him through,
And Cofi's cock-sure to get hung 'stead of you!
If you swear that he never came into your house,
Though I can't tell a lie—I'll be dumb as a mouse!"

"Oh, Mosesh!" the Jew said, "dis queer leetle brute,
Dear boy, down the chimnesh we surely will shoot;
And, for fear in de vay he should shmut all his clothes,
Ve'd mush better keep dem ourshelves, I suppose.
I'll pull off his coat vich, ma tear, is quite new,
And a great deal too goot for to vear in a flue;
You pick off de breeshes and shoes from his fork,
He vont vant again to go out for a valk!"
So the poor little Black, being stripped on the spot,
Down the chimney of Cofi, the grocer, was shot.

Now Cofi, the grocer, though upright as any,
Except in the matter of turning a penny,
Was given to practise, I'm sadly afraid,
What are mildly described as 'the tricks of the trade.'
At least, people said,
With a shake of the head,
That he primed his 'prime congo' with sloes and black-lead:
And, worse a great deal, that, unpleasantly often,
With him, 'ripe old coffee' meant 'rotten old coffin;'
A dodge which they tell me, to this very day,
Is practised in London—don't mention it, pray—
And that people quite like, if they'd only but speak up,
A dash of their grandmamma whisked in the tea-cup.
His sugar, they added, was sandy and damp,
And his oil only fit for a 'wonderful lamp;'
And in fact, all agreed, if he wasn't a scamp,
The Grocer was certainly one of that stamp.
Of course on such gossip I'd gladly be dumb,
But it bears on my story,—so out it must come.

For there lived in the city a well-meaning man,
Who'd found out a plan
Such rogues to trepan,
And rolls from the oven and milk from the can
Would buy on the sly,
On purpose to try,
As he sat at his breakfast with nobody by,
And a thumping great microscope screwed in his eye,
If the bread was quite nice,
And hadn't a spice
Of something that wouldn't be cheap at the price,
And the milk just the thing that the real cow carries,
Unslushed with pump-water and plaster of Paris:
Until, when he'd quite made the tour of the table,
He'd slash off an article caustic and able,
In a work of his own,
Where all would be shown,
And horrified spinsters would read it and groan,
"Oh why don't he let people's victuals alone?
Oh, why did he tell us? No wonder one's thin!
Oh dear, what a state must our stomachs be in!"

Of course, all the tradespeople termed him a spy;
And gloomily said, "they'd catch him by an' by,
And they'd leave the great microscope tight in his eye!
And he'd better look out, 'cause as how they were blessed
If his facts or his food he'd much longer digest;"
And, by way of a soubriquet, christened him "Whack-Lie,"
A name all agreed that described him exactly.

After this you may guess
That Cofi no less
Went walking in bodily fear of "the press,"
Than of some one who signs with a capital S,
And an A, and a T, and an A, and an N,
Whenever his majesty handles a pen,
And passed all his time in an exquisite funk,
Or only felt passably valiant when drunk.

That evening, however, he'd been to a ball,
And came singing home by the help of the wall,
Declaring he didn't feel frightened at all.
He entered his shop
With a rollicking hop,
That proved, pretty plainly, he'd "just had a drop,"
And, waving his glim,
Cried, "Let me catch him—
That Whack-Lie! I'll mangle him, body and limb!
Who says I'm afeard?
If old Bogey appeared,
This minute, I'd take him, like this, by the beard,
Give him one for his tail, sir, and two for his nob,
—Great Allah defend us! Who's that on the hob?
It's black, and it grins!
Oh mercy! my sins—
(No, it can't be the Devil—he's hoofs to his pins,)
I know him, the villain! It's Whack-Lie, stark naked!
Here's a chance at his noddle!—by jingo, I'll take it!"
Whack—bang, "take another! You came for a sample?
Oh, did you?" bang—whack,—"you shall have it and ample."

Crack—bang, "Do you like it? Oh dear, it's no trouble,
Not even," bang—crack, "if I gave it you double!
You rascal, to say that I water my cocoa;
I don't think you'll hint I've diluted your toco!
Come, bolt, sir, and own
The forbearance I've shown!
You won't? O, I'll make you! Don't think you'll atone
For . . . . oh, my good gracious, he's cold as a stone!
Oh crikey! why couldn't I let him alone?
Ah, wretch that I am, may I ne'er smoke tobacco more
If I ain't been and done it—I've murdered the Blackamoor!"

In a moment he saw
The fiends of the Law
Popping up from till, canister, counter, and drawer,
Scowling, howling, and growling, with halter in claw!
The candle burnt blue
And the gibbering crew
Screamed, "Cofi—come Cofi, we're waiting for you;
Don't keep us all night!"
In short such a sight
As 'powerful writers,' who doubtless are right,
Persist in purveying for circles polite,
Whenever for murder they chance to indite:
All which made the matter prodigiously black,
And took the poor Grocer completely aback.
And, sobered of course,
He roared with remorse,
So loud that it almost attracted 'the force,'
Whose sympathy's rather a doubtful resource;—
Since—even in Bow-street—those gemmen in blue
Are apt to think less of your victim than you.

He snatched up the body—ran out in the street—
(A 50 was, luckily, grubbing cold meat
Adown the Jew's 'airey,' that lay on his beat,
And trying his hand at improving the cook,
Though not, I'm afraid, with a 'good little book,')
Stuck him fast by the wall,
Ran back with a squall,
And jumped into bed, breeches, turban, and all;
Where, all the long night through, he lay on the rack,
And squealed through the sheets like a pig in a sack.

That night, it so happened, the 'Friends of the Vicious,'
A clique in Casgar then extremely officious,
Had held High Palaver in 'Brotherhood Hall,'
To prove that the heathen weren't vicious at all:
That all men were brothers, and all men should hug,
Or, as they expressed it, drink out of one mug;
Going on to proclaim
That, if 'twas your aim
To make shaggy savages humble and tame,
Twasn't powder and ball would accomplish that same.

"You should first catch a Tartar,
And coax him to barter,"
Said they, "and the moment he finds what you're arter,
He'll say with a grin,
Extending his fin,
'My dear Preachee-Teachee, now don't take me in!
I'm backward at figures, you'll find, I'm afraid,
But I and my nation will joyfully trade.'"

"It merely," they said, "wanted skilful caressing
To make the poor Kaffir a positive blessing:
We should bear with his freaks—if he did in the night,
Drive your cattle and leave half your haystacks alight,
Should you for that reason—yes, you—better taught,
Humanity's precepts hold likewise at nought?
If he did shoot your shepherds and try to bag you,
A pretty example—to bang at him too!
No: joke with him, court him, implore he'll repent,
And Friendship, then Trade, with the bargain cement;
You'll send him clocks, calico, tweezers, and rum,
In return for scalps,* elephants, banjos, and gum:
Won't that be a triumph—a glory withal,
To the nation that boasts of a Brotherhood Hall!"

'Twas thus, from the platform, with unction and zest,
Sneeki-Peeki, the Quaker, that conclave addressed.
'Twas thrilling, they tell me, to hear him, as 'cheers'—
Condensed in 'sensation,'—subsided in 'tears;'
And heavy old women and hazy old cits,
Were heard through the darkness, exploding in fits,—
At length, having fairly disburdened his mind,
Proved that battles were sinful and blows were unkind,
Sneeki-Peeki, the Quaker—first pouching his fee,
Went smiling benignantly home to his tea.

I wonder why Fate
Lies always in wait,
Such excellent people to catch in a strait,
And why I've this dismal mishap to relate?
In crossing the Grocer's respectable street,
Where little dead Hunchback stood stiff on his feet,
Just outside the shop,
The Quaker ran flop,
Against the poor body, which caused it to drop,
Tripping up Sneeki-Peeki, who gave a great hop,
Crying, "Thieves! here, policemen!—hoy, watchmen—patrol!
I'm robbed—I'm assaulted! I am 'pon my soul!
Come, somebody, come! I'm in fear of my life!
Come, some one, before he jumps up with a knife."
But then, when he found
His foe on the ground

* Our perruquiers are not usually behind the rest of their brethren, either in enterprise, or the art of puff. Why don't they invest in a shipload of these exuviæ, and offer to the public what they might conscientiously announce as the "Gentleman's real head of hair?"

Didn't look very large, and was crooked and round,
He bravely ran back
And hit him a whack,
Shouting, "Shamming's no use, you detestable Black!
I'll teach you a peaceable man to attack!
Oh, you don't mean to rise! you're afraid of my stick?
Very well, then you're all the more handy to kick!
Ha, here come the watch! They shall hear what you've done!"
Says the Watch, "Hollo, Quaker, it's useless to run!
No gammon, we saw you—we watched the whole tussle, man;
And saw you knock over and pound this 'ere Mussulman.
If he's dead—and he is too! we wouldn't be you,
When, the first thing to-morrow, you're catching your due!"

Of course it was vain
The facts to explain,
Such flimsy evasions where autocrats reign
Universally meeting with simple disdain:
And poor Sneeki-Peeki, with great consternation,
In five minutes found himself tight in the Station.

It seems in Casgar, where but slenderly thrives
The noble Profession that somehow contrives
To run rather to seed in our Westminster hives,
The County-Court Judges try folks for their lives;
And it's found that this practice, in dealing with crime,
Effects both a saving of money and time.

They call on the cause,
And nobody jaws
About 'alibis,' 'proofs,' and absurd little 'flaws,'
Which would argue a great disrespect for the laws.
"Now then," roars the Judge, "where's the Quaker? who—that?
That sheep-stealing, snuff-coloured hound in a hat?
Knock it off, sirrah Tipstaff! now then—what's the charge?
'Broke a Mussulman's head and the Statutes at Large?'
Of course he did! Look at him—guilty and dumb—
Not an answer to make!—Tell the hangman to come!
Hold your tongue, sir, this moment! D'ye think I sit here
To hear fellows chatter whose guilt is quite clear?"

"Jack Ketch, my Lord, waits.
"Oh, that's lucky; away!
Tie him up—tie him up, lying rascal! but stay,
Set a chair for the Court, outside, under a tree,
That the end of this villain myself I may see."

Loud roared Sneeki-Peeki, on finding his case
Assume such a sudden and shocking bad face;
(Any practical man could have told him 'twas vain
His private antipathies thus to explain.)

The rope was made fast,
The moment was past,
Which florid reporters describe as one's 'last;'
When somebody shouted, "Stop, hangman! avast!
You've got the wrong cove;
Don't let him be hove!
He isn't the villain—I did it, by Jove!
I'm Cofi—the Grocer! I caught him last night
Making mouths on my hob, and I smashed him outright,
And I can't go to sleep 'cause I'm jumping with fright,
And I wish to be hanged, and oh! please tie me tight!"

"Lor' bless me," the Judge said, "if this be the case,
You'd better step up in the gentleman's place.
I'll be bound, if the facts are at all as you say,
That thief, Sneeki-Peeki, won't stand in your way!"

So, up went the Grocer:—his head's through the noose,
In a precious fair way to be cured of the blues;
When hark, there's a cry,
"Ma tear, it vash I,
And I cannot permit de pore Grosher to die!
Don't hang him, I ask, and I vish to tell vy."

"Good heavens," the Judge said, "suppose it were you,
Why keep the Court waiting, you snivelling Jew?
Jump up and be hanged without further to-do!"

"But I vish to speak vords—may I? only a few?"

"No, YOU MAYN'T!" roared the Judge, "for they wouldn't be true!
Pitch over the Grocer there, hangman, and stifle
This beggar who'd thus with our dignity trifle."

"Ay, ay, sir," the hangman said, "how many more?
Here's three to begin with,—and here's number Four!
My stars, merry Mustapha! well, I am blessed!
If he isn't as great a tom-fool as the rest!"

"My Lord," cried the Tailor, "one word in your ear!"
But, just as he spoke, people shouted, "Stand clear!
Make way there—make way for our Lord the Vizier!"

Bang, bang, go the kettle-drums, twelve on a side,
That roll for his Greatness where'er he may ride;
Flap, flap, go the standards of Mussulmen green,
That flutter wherever his Greatness is seen;
'Hooray,' go the people, who always hooray
At aught that's unwontedly noisy or gay;
And down goes the Court in a servile salaam,
As much as to say, 'Oh, how flatter'd I am!
I hope you don't mean to play Wolf to my Lamb!'

"Rise, Judge, to your feet;
Your worship I greet
From one who esteems you both just and discreet.
The Lord of the Faithful, who sits all alone,
And rules the wide world upon Solomon's throne,
Commands your attendance; and bids me require
Both Tailor and Doctor, and Grocer and Liar:
It seeming that one of them's murdered his Laureate,
A dark and disloyal performance to glory at:—
He hears they all own it, and swears by the moon
He'll teach them to bully a Royal Buffoon!"

Now, just at this point,
My tale to disjoint,
I bid all at once lesser actors 'aroint!'—
Now for a goose-quill, round and clean,—
Back flats and flies, and change the scene!

That morning at eight,
From his pillow of state
And couch of spun-gold, Caliph Haroun the Great
Woke, yawning extremely and scratching his pate.
"Go, some one," said he, "for our funny Buffoon,
And bid him come hither and strike up a tune:
We're seedy this morning,—yes, rather so-so;
Our Hunchback alone can inspirit us.—Go!"

"Great Prince of the Earth, and the Air, and the Wave, Live long and for ever!" made answer the slave.
"His Royal Buffoonship, sir, yesterday night,
Alas, closed his eyes on your majesty's light:
He went for a walk, and O, shocking to tell,
Strolled into some place where the tradespeople dwell;
They caught him—they killed him, and, stranger than all,
They're cutting like fun to the County-court Hall,
Each swearing, 'I did it! 'tis I that should squeak,'
Which looks like a dodge, sir, to diddle the beak."

Upstarted in wrath from his pillow of state
And couch of spun-gold Caliph Haroun the Great;
For dearer than all
In the Caliphat hall
Was the blithe little Hunchback so funny and small;
"Is it thus," he exclaimed, "that these worms of the dust
Dare—dare to insult Caliph Haroun the Just?
Must he mourn the pet boy that delighted him so,
And the girls of his Harem their little black beau,
And mourn unrevenged? no, by Mahomet, no!
Command our Vizier
To bring every one here,
Before our tribunal at once to appear;
For, by Heaven, the ears of all ages shall ring
With the sentence they'll hear from the lips of their King!"

'Tis done, as we know;
And, bowing quite low,
They front the stern judgment-seat, all in a row,
Sneeki-Peeki included—the picture of woe,
With his eloquent mouth like a capital O.

"Curst wretches!" the Caliph said, "which of ye four Slew this poor little fellow that lies on the floor,
The pet of our Palace, the joy of our wives?
Beware how ye answer: ye plead for your lives."

Then the Tailor spoke first, and the Jew, in his turn,
Gave the tale to the Grocer, and then, 'wretched kern,'
The Quaker, who sorely mistrusted such parley,
Contrived, with loud sobs, to blurt out the finale.

When all had been heard,
"It's rather absurd,"
Said the Caliph. "We think the first, second, and third
May pass without censure:—the crab and the kick
Were accidents purely, and, as for the stick,
Master Grocer, next time you must mind who you lick.
But, as for the last," he resumed with a smile,
"Sneeki-Peeki, your head must come out of its tile;
For, of course, when we look on this poor little dumb body,
We want consolation for this out of somebody!
Ho, headsman!"
The words were scarce uttered when, lo!
With a queer little kick and a queer little crow,
The queer little man
Sat up, and began
To sneeze and crack jokes and his visage to fan,
Saying, "Fetch me some beer, please, as soon as you can!
I'm faint and I'm dry as the dust in the pan;
Do, there's a good Caliph! now don't look so cross!
I know that, last night, I took too much—fish sauce!"

To paint the good Caliph's excessive delight
Would fill a great volume, too bulky to write;
He let off the steam in a waltz round the garden,
And wound up the pas with a general pardon.

And then—to conclude—that their fortunate lot,
Like Gunpowder Treason, might ne'er be forgot,
And that all men, for ever and ever, might learn
How difficult sometimes is Truth to discern—
That all one can see of a case may be small,
And black may be white, if one did but know all,
He sent out and bought a great Pillar of Brass,
To stand by the gate where the magistrates pass;
And bade, on its face,
From the crown to the base,
A famous Historian write the whole case:
Which he did, with great skill,
And its legible still,
And I own I shall take it prodigiously ill,
If, treating a poet's assertion as nil,
You whip your red 'Murray' down out of the shelf,
And rudely demand if I've seen it myself?

THE GOVERNMENTS OF CONTINENTAL EUROPE.

XII. THE TWO SICILIES.

Under a wise government, the countries comprised within the kingdom of the Two Sicilies might become not only great and powerful, but the inhabitants might also become as civilized, prosperous, and happy as those of any nation in the world. The continental kingdom possesses all the natural advantages of a most favourable geographical position, with numerous and excellent harbours, a delicious climate, and a fertile soil.

Anciently, as Apulia and Magna Græcia, these countries were greatly renowned. Parthenope, Herculaneum, Pompeii, Capri, and other places within the Bay of Naples, were the favourite and luxurious resorts of the ancient Romans. But few countries have undergone greater vicissitudes of war, conquest, rapine, and oppression.

In the fifth century it was wrested from the Romans by the Goths, who were conquered by the Lombards. The latter held possession of the country until Charlemagne vanquished Didier, the last of the Lombard kings.

After the death of the great Emperor, the Greeks seized a large portion of the kingdom. Towards the end of the ninth century and the beginning of the tenth, the country was overrun and taken possession of by the Saracens, who continued its masters until they were driven out by the descendants of Tancred, the Norman, under whose power the country remained until the death of William III., who left no heirs.

Constantia, a posthumous daughter of Roger, Duke of Apulia, conveyed by her marriage the countries of Naples, Abruzzi, and Calabria to the Emperor Henry VI. The tragical murder, at Naples, of her grandson Conrad, in 1257, and the investiture of the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily by Pope Clement IV., 1265, in Charles, Count of Anjou, brother of St. Louis, was followed by the defeat of Manfred, a natural brother of Conrad, the assassination of whose son, Conraddin, deprived the legitimate heirs of the crowns of Naples and Sicily.

In 1282, Peter III., King of Arragon, having caused the Sicilians to rise suddenly at the feast of Easter, on the sound of the vesper bells, they massacred the whole French on the island in one night; an event which in history has become famous under the name of the "Sicilian vespers."

Jean, Queen of Naples, bequeathed the kingdom by testament, in 1380, to Louis, Duke of Anjou, whose daughter, to revive her pretensions in Arragon, went to war with Alphonso V., and in 1420, completely defeated that monarch.

Charles VIII. and Louis XII. of France, governed with various success; and the kingdom, after having been twice handed over to the two branches of the house of Anjou, fell, with all the other Spanish dominions, in 1700, under Philip of Bourbon, who made his public entry into Naples, 1702. The kingdom was next invaded by the Emperor Charles VI., who held possession of it until the Peace of Utrecht. Several disorders followed, when the two kingdoms were fully vested in the sovereignty of the Emperor by the Treaty of London. But the Austrian power had lasted only a few years, when Don Carlos of Spain acquired the sovereignty, first of Sicily and afterwards of Naples; since which period the crown has remained in possession of the Bourbons, with the exception of the last occupation of Naples by the French, when Joseph Bonaparte, and afterwards Murat, were successively placed on the throne.

Sicily was conquered from the Greeks by the Saracens early in the ninth century; and to this day many interesting traces of their occupations, industry, and splendour remain. They irrigated and cultivated its soil, embellished its cities, and carried on an extensive commerce for 245 years, until 1072, when it was conquered by the Normans. The authority of the latter was supplanted by the Swabian emperors, under whom it remained until 1265, when its government fell into the hands of the Duke of Anjou, whose power was exterminated shortly after by the massacre of "the Sicilian vespers."

From 1285 to 1706 it was held under the dominion of Spanish sovereigns; for five years it was held by Austria; for nine years by the Duke of Savoy, when again it was exchanged to Austria, for the island of Sardinia. It was ruled over by the House of Hapsburg, from 1720 to 1734, when the Bourbons expelled the Austrians from the island; and their government ever since has been one of the most arbitrary cruelty.

The tyranny of the present government of Naples, and many of the acts of cruelty of which it has been guilty, are now notorious, and are looked upon with horror by the inhabitants of all free states. But the Neapolitan writers, who are nearly all the mercenary slaves of the Government, have with great industry endeavoured to prove that magnificent improvements in agriculture and in the condition of the people have taken place since the accession of the Bourbons. But the only period of great improvement that we can discover is that of the French occupation, and when the English held possession of the island of Sicily.

Some years ago while travelling over the continental and insular portions of this Kingdom, we found every town and village presenting an aspect which led to the presumption that they were formerly in a far better and happier condition. We found scarcely a town that did not contain a greater number of houses than were necessary to lodge the inhabitants. In Sicily especially we discovered some towns nearly deserted. We found that even Naples, with the exception of the Chiaya, the Toledo, and a few other streets, presented a similar aspect. We could discover no improvements but such as were introduced when the Bourbons had not a shadow of power. The abolition of the feudal system, so frequently the boast of the Neapolitan writers, was the work of Joseph Bonaparte, in 1806. He passed a law which decreed that the feudal system and feudal jurisdictions should from that period cease; and that the towns, villages, and hamlets should be subjected to the general laws of the Kingdom, that personal services and dues exacted from individuals should henceforth cease, without compensation, together with all prohibitive rights and monopolies, which were antagonistic to the liberties and rights of the public at large. Monastic and convent lands were then decreed public property. Laws relative to the succession to and distribution of property were passed.

On the restoration of the Bourbons it was attempted to restore also the old laws and institutions; and especially those regarding ecclesiastical property and the church. To a great extent this has been effected with success. But the law for the division of property has not been abolished, although majorats have been established.

Previously to the occupation by the French, the people were little else than adscripti glebæ: the lands belonged to the king, church, barons, and corporations; game and forest laws of the most severe kind, and the feudal courts, were in absolute force. The country was infested by bandits consisting of persons who were outlawed by the tyranny of the Courts; famines were frequent; trade was despised; monopolies were restored.

In consequence of the superior character and greater boldness of the inhabitants of the Two Sicilies causing just fear, the government was carried on with extraordinary despotism and cruelty. The cavern prisons of the small islands of Maritimo and Favignana have always been crowded with untried persons accused of political offences. In other prisons on the Continent and in Sicily suspected men are now lingering out their lives without any prospect of ever being brought to a trial.

The swords, bayonets, artillery, and soldiery of Austria have ever been ready to assist the Bourbons in suppressing either the spirit or practice of civil or religious liberty. Several regiments of mercenary Swiss are the guards of the king.

In 1820, partially in consequence of the effect produced by the proclamation of the constitution of 1812 in Spain, and the disposition of the army under General Pepé, a junta was assembled at Naples, and at the same time the king's son, the Duke of Calabria, who had been viceroy in Sicily since the Restoration, arrived in the Bay of Naples, to act as vicar of the kingdom. The Junta framed a constitution similar to that adopted in 1812 by Spain. The king swore to this constitution, and turning round to General Pepé, he said weeping, "I have now sworn from the very bottom of my heart," pressing his hand on his breast at the same time. This was but one of the many perjuries of the faithless old Ferdinand. The whole army, including the militia, took an oath of fidelity to the constitution. Mistrust of the King, however, prevailed; some disorders occurred, and blood was shed among the troops. Disturbances broke out at Palermo, where a provisional government was formed, and to which all the towns of Sicily were invited to send representatives, in order to complete the revolution. Messina, Catania, Trapani, and other cities refused.

Skirmishes took place; the city of Palermo was besieged, but the prudent and conciliatory proposals of the brother of the Commander-in-chief led to a capitulation; which, had the terms only been observed afterwards by the faithless Ferdinand, would have led to happy consequences.

Meantime, a national congress assembled at Naples; but, although the King assumed an appearance of fidelity, he from the first carried on a treacherous correspondence with Vienna.

The Duke of Calabria, who had made a most open and extraordinary declaration of his love of liberty, was as insincere as the King, his father. Never was there a greater dissembler, unless it be the present king. "I cannot conceive," said he one day to General Pepé, "how a king who was free to give a constitution to his people, should not hasten to grant them such a blessing. With a constitutional government there is no responsibility either towards God or man. The king has not the power of injuring any one man, while he has many opportunities of doing good, and, finally, is enabled to live in the enjoyment of peace and security."

The multitude believed in the sincerity of the Duke, and so did the army, in consequence of the publication of a letter addressed by him to the Commander-in-chief, in which he expressed a "desire to see the constitutional system established by his august parent more and more consolidated." On the receipt of this letter, General Pepé says, "I had concentrated the whole army between Castellamare and Gaeta, with the twofold intention of accustoming the troops, and the provinces, to remain quiet without the usual garrisons."

At the meeting of the Parliament, or Congress, it was discovered that the King, instead of taking the oath to preserve the Constitution, intended only to allow his son to take it in his stead. Several of the members in consequence persisted, in the name of the public, that General Pepé would not give up the command of the army. The General, disgusted with the treachery of the King, and of his son and heir, threatened, on the following day, to resign the command of the army, in presence of the representatives of the nation; a resolution which an urgent and flattering letter of the Duke of Calabria did not deter him from carrying into effect. But, in consequence of the alarms which immediately followed, General Pepé consented to accept the appointment of inspector-general of the militia, from the Duke of Calabria, who had now become vicar-general of the kingdom.

Meantime, the Emperors of Russia and Austria, and the King of Prussia, had decided, at the Congress of Laybach, that the liberties of Naples should be suppressed. The old King, Ferdinand, had gone by invitation to the congress.

Simultaneously with the second meeting of the Congress, an Austrian army crossed the Po; and, by a proclamation of Cardinal Gonsalvi, head of the Papal Government, it was intimated that the Austrians, with the permission of the King of Naples, were to enter that kingdom. General Pepé was invested with the chief command of the second division of the army, in order to protect the Abruzzi: and with eighty battalions of militia and legions, he occupied the most important points.

At this time, the Duke of Calabria, who had previously been appointed Regent, and now commanded the first corps of the army, was secretly treating with the Austrians. The reinforcements promised to General Pepé, as well as the necessary commissariat, were withheld. General Pepé had to fight the battle of Rieti against greatly superior numbers; and although at last compelled to retreat, the victors could not boast of the capture of a single prisoner, nor of a single piece of cannon.

This was, however, a fatal day for the liberties of the Two Sicilies. The traitors at Naples took advantage of this retreat, and utterly betrayed their country. There is no doubt that had General Pepé been supported by the Regent and the Congress, he could have defended the kingdom against the whole Austrian force.

After reorganizing his remaining troops, he marched towards Naples; where the Regent made many promises, not one of which he ever fulfilled. The first corps of the army was without difficulty dispersed by the Austrians, the Constitution was destroyed, and an absolute Government was then established. General Pepé escaped from Castellamare, and landed first in Sardinia, and by way of Barcelona and Lisbon arrived in London.

The revolutions of 1848 in Sicily and Naples have not been more successful, and the people are now held in subjection by one of the most absolute of tyrannies. Probably no punishments could be devised more arbitrary thăn those which are inflicted upon persons accused, very often without foundation, of political offences. Let us hear what General Pepé says of himself:—

He had joined the liberal standard as a volunteer when he was only sixteen years of age—he had the misfortune to have been taken prisoner, and he was chained by a brutal judge and immured in a dungeon with criminals. He was then sent in chains to the caverns of the rocky island of Maritimo, west of Trapani in Sicily.

From that prison he was removed to another island, Favignana, where he was confined in a cell with several prisoners charged with murder and robbery. It was a dreadful dungeon, at the bottom of a castle, excavated in a rock, but the keeper being poor, he was induced to allow them open-air exercise; for which he was paid. Here he remained for three years. The prisoners were chained two and two, and daily at sunset were locked up in the same dungeon. The keeper being given to drinking, several of the prisoners, at the instigation of Pepé, made an attempt to seize his person and to overcome the guard. But the experiment was unsuccessful, and Pepé and the other prisoners of state were taken for greater security to La Columbaja, a small island close to Trapani, where they remained until the arrival of the English forces in Sicily, when he was set at liberty.

While we were travelling over the island of Sicily in 1839, the country was under martial law, and we were horrified with the sight of carts loaded with prisoners who were going to be tried by martial law at Trapani, where they were summarily condemned and executed. The dungeons of Trapani and Maritimo were at that time crammed with persons who had never been tried. The cholera had raged during the previous year, and in consequence disturbances broke forth among the people, from the belief that the Neapolitan government had poisoned the wells. The military executions of persons of all ages were frequent in most of the towns, and we could record acts of regal brutality which would make the most hardened shudder, were their recital not too disgusting for moral and virtuous readers.

The Neapolitan tribunals are notorious for corruption; while the criminal courts are mere instruments for executing the policy of the government. One species of punishment which has been long exercised by the present King is that of ordering men who may displease him while in office into banishment, not from the country, but to some secluded stronghold. One of the most able and faithful ministers the present King ever had is the Prince di Cassaro, who on account of his wishing justice done to British subjects who had incurred heavy losses by a sulphur monopoly in which more than one illustrious person was believed to have had an interest,—was banished to the unhealthy and miserable, yet strong fortification of Foggia.

A statesman whose sincerity no one will doubt, has boldly and ably narrated to the world that the present practices of the Government of Naples towards supposed political offenders are outrages on civilization, on humanity, and upon decency.

"That these practices are certainly and even rapidly doing the work of republicanism in that country, a political creed, which has little natural or habitual root in the character of the people." This remark we can, from an intimate knowledge of the country and the people, affirm to be perfectly true: for neither the Neapolitans nor the Sicilians have any traditional or educational sympathy with republicanism. On the contrary, all their traditionary and historical sympathies are monarchical, but the Neapolitan Government has in its imbecility persevered in practices which would even in a more intelligent nation, undermine all the sentiments as well as the principles of loyalty.

"I shall assume," says Mr. Gladstone, "that the constitution of January, 1848, spontaneously given, sworn to as irrevocable with every circumstance of solemnity, and never to this day, either legally or even ostensibly revoked, (although contravened by almost every act of the Government,) never existed, and is a pure fiction. I will not even appeal to it, because such an appeal might give colour to the idea that my desire was to meddle with the form of government, and might thus interfere with the purposes of humanity which, and which alone in the first instance, I propose to myself." This was a wise resolution on the part of the right honourable gentleman, and truly has he abided by it.

After some further remarks he observes, "there is a general impression that the organization of the government of Southern Italy is defective, that the administration of justice is tainted with corruption, that instances of abuse or cruelty among subordinate public functionaries are not uncommon, and that political offences are punished with severity, and with no regard to the forms of justice. The difference between the faintest outline that a moment's handling of the pencil sketches and the deepest colouring of the most elaborately finished portrait, but feebly illustrates the relation of these vague suppositions to the actual truth of the Neapolitan case. It is incessant, systematic, deliberative, violation of the law by the Power appointed to watch over and maintain it. Such violation of human and written law as this, carried on for the purpose of violating every other law, unwritten and eternal, human and divine. It is the wholesale persecution of virtue when united with intelligence, operating upon such a scale that entire classes may be said to be its object, so that the Government is in bitter and cruel, as well as utterly illegal, hostility to whatever in the nation really lives and moves, and forms the mainspring of practical improvement and progress. It is the awful profanation of public religion, by its notorious alliance, in the governing powers, with the violation of every moral law under the stimulant of fear and vengeance: it is the perfect prostitution of the judicial office, which has made it, under veils only too thread-bare and transparent, the degraded recipient of the vilest and clumsiest forgeries, got up wilfully and deliberatively, by the immediate advisers of the Crown, for the purpose of destroying the peace, the freedom, aye, and if not by capital sentences, the life of men among the most virtuous, upright, intelligent, distinguished and refined of the whole community; it is the savage and cowardly system of moral as well as, in a lower degree, of physical torture, through which the sentences obtained through debased courts of justice are carried into effect!" What an awful picture of abominable injustice and tyranny!

In this and in all other proceedings the Government of Naples since 1848 has utterly defied the laws of the country; houses are ransacked, and floors torn up, under the pretence of searching for arms, and men are imprisoned by thousands without any warrant whatever, nor any statement of the nature of the offence. Men are arrested, not because they may have committed an offence, or are believed to be offenders, but because they are persons whom it is thought convenient to get rid of, and against whom some charge must be found or fabricated. Many are imprisoned, their effects seized, and afterwards kept in confinement for life, without any trial taking place.

When Mr. Gladstone was in Naples the numbers thus confined in dungeons (for those prisons are loathsome and horrid dungeons) were estimated at from 15,000 to 30,000. At present we believe the number much greater. If Mr. Burke had lived to the present day he would have found a Government which had succeeded in "framing an indictment against a whole people." In the Government catechism, taught by the church, and in the schools at Naples, civilization and barbarism are, though at extreme points, equally represented as vicious, and that happiness and virtue lie midway between them.

Among the prisoners are more than a majority of the deputies, which assembled under the Constitution sworn to by the King. When after two or three years of imprisonment, any of them are brought to trial, they are inevitably condemned on the false evidence of hired perjurers; and if not executed secretly, are immured in prisons of darkness, horror, filth, and vermin. In these are crowded indiscriminately murderers, robbers, debtors, and the best and most worthy of the country. "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord!"—but that vengeance is mercy and charity. No! says the Government of Naples, vengeance is mine, and that vengeance is not mercy, but the persecution, imprisonment, degradation, and death of all who dare to be good and virtuous.

MANIFESTATIONS OF THE SPIRIT!

"Rap, rap, rap."—Bürger.

MOST of our readers must have had their attention aroused in a greater or less degree to the mysterious demonstrations known as "spirit-rappings," which, beginning about four or five years ago to attract notice in the city of Rochester, in the United States, have gone on from that time to this increasing in interest and spreading in extent, until they have become familiar to Americans throughout the entire length and breadth of the Union. In this country they have excited but comparatively little observation; and what notice the press has accorded them, has been chiefly for the sake of affording food for ridicule, or at least matter for amusement. Consider it in what light we may, the subject is a curious one; and seeing that an opportunity is offered us of viewing it in all its bearings, by the publication of a work professing to comprise its entire history,* we propose to avail ourselves of the revelations contained in Mr. Spicer's volume, in order to put the reader, so far as our limits will allow, in possession of the facts of the matter as it stands at present. We cannot do this better than by glancing seriatim at such of the contents of the volume before us as may serve to afford us the readiest clue to the conclusions at which the author arrives; from each and all of these conclusions, however, we must beg for the present to stand aloof, seeing that we are not in the condition of Mr. Spicer, or empowered to judge upon any other evidence than that of hearsay or documentary reports. The reader must arrive at a judgment on his own responsibility, from the facts we shall adduce; or he may suspend it till further testimony may warrant his verdict.

The writer sets out by declaring himself to have been as much an infidel in regard to "spirit-rapping," as a man need be; but not being proof against evidence, and finding that men whose intelligence and truthfulness were not to be questioned had been compelled to give in their adherence to the new faith, he was led to investigate the matter personally, and drawn to believe with others. When he found that one man had learned a secret which he imagined confined to his own breast from the "rapping-spirit"—that another had witnessed a pas seul danced by one of the heaviest dining-tables in New York, proprio motu, with other marvels of the sort—he was induced to investigate closely for his own satisfaction, and was finally forced irresistibly against his will to the conviction that the mystery in question has its origin in no mechanical skill, in no human intelligence, in no hitherto recognised law of physics, in no material organism whatsoever. All he demands of the public is that they should judge the new philosophy on fair grounds, not from exparte statements, like the malicious revelations of Mrs. Culver, whom he considers to have been purposely deceived by the "medium" in whose confidence she had really no place, nor by the representations of Messrs. Brown and Thompson, in "Household Words," who, he intimates, went to Mrs. Hayden's "circle" with the intention of exploding a prejudged imposture, and not of inquiring into the truth. While he admits that the aptitude to degenerate into fanaticism is the most distressing feature in this spiritual manifestation, he looks upon that only as an additional reason why its true character and powers should be ascertained and defined; submitting that it is not for us to doubt that a channel of communication with the spirit-world may, at some period of time, be found, or to prescribe the consequences that shall follow.

Before entering upon the details of modern American "Manifestations," Mr. Spicer briefly recapitulates the recorded particulars of phenomena of a similar or analogous nature, which have occurred in various parts of the world, and at various periods. Among these the most remarkable were the exploits of the once famous drummer of Tedworth; the whimsically unaccountable knockings and bangings of "Old Jeffery," that disturbed the family of John Wesley's father, at Epworth, in Lincolnshire, a "full, true, and particular" account of which are to be found in Wesley's Journal; the invisible ghost which swallowed the red wine of Counsellor Hahn, at Slawensick, in Silesia; the hard-working demon of Mr. Dods, in Penobscot county; the prophetic vision of a Mademoiselle F. Lamb, recorded in the "Arcanes de la Vie future devoilés" of Cahagnets; the case of the celebrated French actress, Mademoiselle Clairon, elaborately attempted to be explained, on the hypothesis of a trick, in the first number of "Household Words;" and that of Angelique Cottin, which excited attention in Paris so late as 1846. Most of the above-named instances are too well known to require more than a passing reference, and they are only cited by the author to show that the subject under consideration is not altogether a new thing in the world.

It was in March, 1848, in the village of Hydesville, Wayne County, New York, that the peculiar disturbances attributed to spiritual agency commenced in the house of Mr. John D. Fox—a previous indication of something of the kind having been noticed during the occupancy of a former tenant. The noise resembled that of a person knocking on the floor of an up-stairs room; but on searching no one could be found. It continued for several nights before the neighbours were called in by the family to notice it. Becoming in time familiar with these strange sounds, Mrs. Fox and her daughters spoke to the supposed spirit, and, partly aided by the suggestions of a neighbour, succeeded in establishing a mode of intelligible communication by means of successive raps and an alphabet. Extraordinary revelations speedily followed—a murder was declared to have been formerly committed in the house, and the body of one Charles Ryan to be buried in the cellar. It is noteworthy that no effectual steps were taken to prove the truth or falsehood of this communication. Other revelations, however, more easily verified or disproved were found to be true. Public attention was drawn to the proceedings at Mr. Fox's house, and the most rigid examination could detect no imposture, although considerable prejudice existed against the inmates. The Fox's soon after removed from their dwelling, but wherever they went the "rappings" followed them. It was soon discovered that they were the so-called media of the spiritual communications—by a medium the reader will understand us to mean a person who under certain circumstances is favoured with responses from the invisible world, such responses consisting for the most part of "rapping" or "table-tipping," the signification of which will be more apparent as we proceed. Very soon new media made their appearance, the demonstration spread rapidly on all sides; magnetic circles —for the medium only acts effectively when seated in a circle of assembled persons—were formed in various towns, and more extraordinary manifestations were elicited. At the present time there are above thirty thousand media scattered throughout the United States; the responses they elicit from their accommodating genii are relied on as absolute truth by a large section of the inhabitants; and they are consulted as confidingly as is the physician by the patient, and used as regularly as the post-office or the electric telegraph.

But we must not anticipate. Early in 1850, Mrs. Fish and the Misses Fox visited New York, and as spiritual media, were of course immediately subjected to the test. In order to prevent the possibility of trick or collusion, the reunion was appointed at the dwelling of Dr. Griswold, which the ladies had never entered. Here follows one part of the proceedings: Several remarkable revelations having been "rapped" out—

Mr. J. Fenimore Cooper was then requested to enter into the supramundane sphere, and proceeded to interrogate the spirits, with the most imperturbable self-possession and deliberation. After several desultory questions, from which no satisfactory answers were obtained, Mr. C. commenced a new series of inquiries. "Is the person I inquire about a relative?" Yes, was at once indicated by the knocks. "A near relative?" Yes. "A man?" No answer. "A woman?" Yes. "A daughter? a mother? a wife?" No answer. "A sister?" Yes. Mr. C. then asked the number of years since her death. To this an answer was given in rapid and indistinct raps, some counting 45, others 49, 54, &c. After considerable parleying as to the manner in which the question should be answered, the consent of the invisible interlocutor was given to knock the years so slowly that they might be distinctly counted. This was done—knock, knock, knock —for what seemed over a minute, till the number amounted to fifty, and was unanimously announced by the company. Mr. C. now asked, "Did she die of consumption?" naming several diseases, to which no answer was given. "Did she die by accident?" Yes. "Was she killed by lightning? Was she shot? Was she lost at sea? Did she fall from a carriage? Was she thrown from a horse?" Yes. Mr. Cooper did not pursue his inquiries any further, and stated to the company that the answers were correct, the person alluded to by him being a sister, who, just fifty years ago the present month, was killed by being thrown from a horse.

The meeting at Dr. Griswold's took place prior to the "peaching" of Mrs. Culver, a soi-disant accomplice, whose evidence, Mr. Spicer, for reasons we have already mentioned, considers unworthy of credit: that it had little or no effect in America is shown by the fact that the Misses Fox have continued their manifestations up to the present time.

In March, 1850, some astounding manifestations made the dwelling of the Rev. Dr. Phelps, of Stratford, Connecticut, not a very comfortable abode. These were violent rappings, bangings, and window breakings, the removal of various articles of dress and domestic use from their places without hands—the hurling of brushes, tumblers, candlesticks, snuffers, &c., against the windows, which were dashed to pieces before the Doctor's own eyes, while he could see no physical cause for the motion of the missiles: tables were lifted from the floor and dashed down again with all their dishes; the Doctor's son, a boy of eleven, was the chief object of persecution; his clothes were spirited away, and he himself was lifted from the ground and violently borne about. Dr. P. questioned the spirit in the usual mode, and obtained responses; but he does not appear to have had any other wish on the subject than to get rid of the manifestations, and as far as we can learn, turned them to no profitable account.

Among the most noted of the media is the hon. Judge Edmonds, who, once violently opposed to the pretensions of the new philosophy, became through inquiry, a convert, and subsequently a most powerful medium. Some alarming particulars of manifestations in which he bore a part, are given by the author; but we pass them over in order that we may have space for a brief visit to a "circle" assembled at the house of Mr. Ward Cheney, where Mr. D. Hume, a member of the New York Conference, and a clairvoyant of extraordinary power, was the medium. After sundry rapping responses, and other demonstrations—

The medium was then (apparently) thrown into a spiritually magnetic state, discovering great rigidity of muscle and the ordinary phenomena of the psycho-magnetic condition, including a magnetic locking of the jaws, in which an iron-like hardness of the muscles was apparent. He then spelt out (with his eyes closely bandaged) some remarkable and interesting messages to one or two of the company, the personal nature of which precludes their publication, but which were declared by those interested to be perfect tests. He did this by pointing, with almost incredible rapidity, to the different letters of an alphabet arranged on a 7 by 9 card, and thus spelling out the necessary words. A rapid writer had difficulty in keeping up with him. . . . . . Among other (messages) came one from two sailors lost at sea, relatives to one of the company, a stranger to most of those present. These spirits announced themselves somewhat unexpectedly, by canting over the solid and ponderous table, and rolling it in the manner of a vessel in a violent tempest. Accompanying this demonstration came a violent creaking, as of the cables of a ship when strained in a gale; then came the loud sound of a prolonged wailing, shrieking blast of wind, precisely such a noise as the wind makes in the rigging of a ship in a storm at sea; and the creaking of the timbers and masts, as the vessel surged from one side to the other, was distinctly heard by all. Next came the regular, sullen shocks of the waves, as they struck the bows of the doomed vessel. All this time the table kept up the rocking motion. And now the table was capsized on the floor! All this was done with no one touching the table, as a close and constant scrutiny was kept up by two at least of our party. These two sailors (whose names and ages were given) it seems lost their lives by the capsizing of a vessel, as represented; although this fact, I have the best reasons for knowing, was not previously known to the medium or the company. Demonstrations now increased in force and number. The table was actually lifted up from the floor, without the application of a human hand or foot. A table, weighing (I should judge) one hundred pounds, was lifted up a foot from the floor, the legs touching nothing! I jumped upon it, and it came up again! It then commenced rocking, without, however, allowing me to slide off, although it canted at least to an angle of 45 degrees. Finally, an almost perpendicular inclination slid me off, and another of the company tried it with the same results. These things all happened in a room which was light enough to allow of our seeing under and over and all around the table, which was touched by no one except the two persons who respectively got upon it to keep it down. . . . We went into a darkened room to see the spiritual flashes of light said to have been vouchsafed to some investigators. Instead of this we were greeted with tremendous rappings all about us. Some of the blows on the walls, floor, and tables, within three inches of myself, were astounding. I could hardly produce such violent demonstrations with my fist, though I were to strike with all my might. The very walls shook. Answers to questions were given by concussions of varying force and intonation, according to the character of the spirits communicating. A favourite little daughter of one of the gentlemen present, a stranger from a remote state—who had left the earth in the fourth year of her age, announced her presence by a thick pattering rain of eager and joyful little raps; and in answer to an inward request of her father, she laid her baby hand upon his forehead! This was a man who was not a believer in these things; he had never before seen them; but he could not mistake the thrilling feeling of that spirit touch. I also had a similar manifestation, in the character of which I am not deceived. . . . Suddenly and without any expectation on the part of the company, the medium, Mr. Hume, was taken up in the air! I had hold of his hand at the time, and I felt his feet; they were lifted a foot from the floor! He palpitated from head to foot with the contending emotions of joy and fear which choked his utterance. Again and again he was taken from the floor, and the third time he was carried to the lofty ceiling of the apartment, with which his hands and head came in gentle contact. I felt the distance from the soles of his boots to the floor, and it was nearly three feet. Others touched his feet to satisfy themselves.

These are wonderful things; but greater wonders are to come. As the new philosophy spread, its marvels and miracles grew more astonishing. The media, who hitherto had acted but as the privileged organs through whom the rapping, sighing, wailing, and table-tipping demonstrations were elicited, now became supernaturally possessed, and under the spiritual influence wrote with their own hands, messages poetical and prosaic from persons who had been long dead, amongst whom were some of the most remarkable geniuses the world has ever known. The most extraordinary of all the writing media appears to be a Mrs. Lydia Tenney, of George-town, Massachusetts, a lady who repudiates all claim to poetic fire, averring positively that she is unable to write a line uninfluenced by another will than her own; and that her hand in the act of writing is entirely beyond her own control. Yet when under the sub-terrestrial influence, in the magnetic circle, she pens such lines as the following, purporting to be a communication from the spirit of the deceased Edgar Poe, and certainly embodying a most striking and unaccountable resemblance to the very peculiar strains of that singular genius.

"O, the dark, the awful chasm!
O, the fearful spirit spasm!
Wrought by unresisted passion
In my heart.
Fancies joyous but alluring,
Love pure, but unenduring,
From time to time securing,
Each a part.

Then embraced by seraph bands—
Drawn by tender loving hands—
From these treacherous, hateful sands
Of despair,
How my soul was waked to gladness,
And cast off the deadening sadness,
And the soul-devouring madness
Writhing there.

Then came dreams so soft and holy,
Over roses wandering slowly,
With sweet music stealing lowly
To my ear.
Hark! I hear—I hear her calling,
In tones no more of wailing,
But in dewy sweetness falling—
Here—up here.

Thanks, great heaven, I am stronger—
Slave to earthly lusts no longer,
I am free.
O, this lightness! O, this brightness!
O, this pure and heavenly whiteness,
Marking thee!
Freed from earth and sin for ever—
Death can us no more dissever,
Humbly thank great God together—
Thou and we."

Mrs. Tenney summons other spirits at her will from the paradise of the Poets, and they respond to her call. In the case of Robert Southey, who is cited to appear, it would seem that in his hurry to obey the lady's command, he had caught up the harp of a brother bard instead of his own—seeing that he sings to a very different tune to any we have been accustomed to hear from him. The following is the poem:—

POEM

Dictated by the Spirit of Robert Southey, March 25, 1851.

I.

Night overtook me ere my race was run,
And mind, which is the chariot of the soul,
Whose wheels revolve in radiance like the sun,
And utter glorious music, as they roll
To the eternal goal,
With sudden shock stood still. She heard the boom
Of thunders; many cataracts seemed to pour
From the invisible mountains; through the gloom
Flowed the great waters; then I knew no more
But this, that thought was o'er.

II.

As one, who, drowning feels his anguish cease,
And clasps his doom, a pale but gentle bride,
And gives his soul to slumber and sweet peace,
Yet thrills when living shapes the waves divide,
And moveth with the tide;
So sinking deep beneath the unknown sea
Of intellectual sleep, I rested there:
I knew I was not dead, though soon to be,
But still alive to love, to loving care,
To sunshine and to prayer.

III.

And life, and death, and immortality,
Each of my being held a separate part:
Life there, as sap within an o'erblown tree;
Death there, as frost, with intermitting smart;
But in the secret heart
The sense of immortality, the breath
Of being indestructible, the trust
In Christ, of final triumph over death,
And spiritual blossoming from dust,
And heaven with the just.

IV.

The soul, like some sweet flower-bud yet unblown,
Lay tranced in beauty in its silent cell;

The spirit slept, but dreamed of worlds unknown,
As dreams the chrysalis within its shell,
Ere summer breathes its spell.
But slumber grew more deep till morning broke,
The Sabbath morning of the holy skies,—
An angel touched my eyelids and I woke;
A voice of tenderest love said, "Spirit, rise"—
I lifted up mine eyes,

V.

And lo, I was in Paradise. The beams
Of morning shone o'er landscapes green and gold,
O'er trees with star-like clusters, o'er the streams
Of crystal, and o'er many a tented fold.
A patriarch, as of old,
Melchisedec might have approached a guest,
Drew near me, as in reverent awe I bent,
And bade me welcome to the land of rest,
And led me upward, wondering as I went,
Into his milk-white tent.

If all the written manifestations obtained had been of so pleasant a character as the above, we, for one, should have voted for their multiplication ad infinitum: it is but fair to state, however, that though many ghosts of august presence were summoned by the various writing media, some of them cut but a very poor figure in their compositions. Besides several poets, whose strains are not worth quoting, we have Washington, Jefferson, Calvin, Fenelon, Franklin, and others of less note. These communications strike us as not being very much to the purpose, or as likely to add much to the credibility of the new philosophy. Some of the written manifestations were made in languages not understood by the party who wrote them—a fact, if it be a fact, guaranteed by the testimony of a sufficient number of witnesses to the good and truthful character of the medium.

The reader is probably by this time desirous of knowing what was the opinion of disinterested persons on the spot in reference to these strange doings. We will quote for his satisfaction some of the current criticisms of the pulpit and the press. In December, 1851, the Rev. J. P. Stewart announced a series of lectures on the communications between men and spiritual beings in another sphere. The series came off, greatly to the satisfaction of the hearers; but we must, for want of space, refer our readers to the volume before us, for a resumé of their substance; they were followed by a supplementary lecture, from which we extract the following passage as explanatory of the lecturer's opinions on the subject—and unless we are much mistaken, it may be regarded as the exponent also of Mr. Spicer's own views.

"It is supposed by many that whatever is disclosed by spirits who are in the other life, must be true; that spirits, good or evil, alike know the truth, and are disposed to speak it; that none are ignorant, none believe in lies; while all are capable of instructing the very wisest of the sons of men. In consequence of this erroneous belief in the wisdom, and even the infallibility, of spirits, great interest is felt in what they utter. People who regard not the wisdom of Solomon, or Socrates, or Confucius, are quite obedient to any voice speaking from the spiritual world. There are those who will turn away from the sacred pages of the Holy Word, wherein are the arcana of the Divine wisdom of the Lord, to listen to messages that are reeled from the spiritual telegraph, whether the utterances are given from an angel, a spirit, or a devil." The lecturer said, however, that he was glad these things had taken place; for he would confide in Divine Providence. "We might see for ourselves that we are gaining a most glorious result in the demonstrations of the spiritual world that are given to men of every class; for whether declarations of men who have passed into the other life are true or false, weighty or worthless, wise or nonsensical, one thing is gained by them. Henceforth the world shall know that death is neither a temporary nor an eternal sleep; but when stripped of his mortal coil,

'A man's a man for a' that.'

From henceforth it shall be known that the sphere of immortal life is contiguous to the sphere of mortal life, and that millions of spiritual beings, unseen and unknown,

'Throng the air and tread the earth.'

He had seen much of clairvoyant communications with the spirit world, and had heard much of similar communications by means of rappings—and his deliberate conclusion was, that we may trust the spirit that gives utterance from within the veil, as far as we can see him: as far as we know the truth of what he utters from other sources; as far as we can confirm his testimony from other evidence, but no farther. We shall do well," concluded the lecturer, "never to surrender either our rationality of thought, or freedom of action, to the fantastic delusions that may be poured upon us from the spirit world. Angels, and spirits who speak to us by permission from the Lord, never speak of anything that deprives man of the freedom of reason; and they never teach; for the Lord alone teaches man, through the medium of his word."

From the above it appears that the spirits may "rap" out a lie as well as the truth. The admission is unfortunate for the value and efficacy of the new philosophy; but this disadvantage is compensated to all true believers by its prodigious utility as a safety-valve through which may blow off all the opprobrium which might otherwise be heaped upon the spiritual science, by sham media, humbug professors and unprincipled speculators in the appetite for mystery everywhere prevailing.

Another reverend lecturer took a widely different view of the subject, and denounced the manifestations as the work of lying spirits, ministers of the Prince of Darkness. The press, in America a veritable many-headed monster, took up the subject with its usual readiness—and not a few of the newspaper editors turned it, as in duty bound, to an amusing account. The following lucid explanation of the spiritual phenomena, extracted from the Georgia Chronicle, is a queer sample of transatlantic jocoseness:—

The only true and legitimate manner of accounting for the taps is the physiological defects of the membranaceous system. The obtuseness of the abdominal indicator causes the cartilaginous compressor to coagulate into the diaphragm, and depresses the duodenum into the flandango. Now if the taps were caused by the vogation of the electricity from the extremities, the tympanum would dissolve into the spiritual sinctum, and become identical with the pigmentum. Now, this is not the case; in order to produce the taps the spiritual rotundum must be elevated down to the spiritual spero. But, as I said before, the inferior ligaments must not subtend over the digitorum sufficiently to disorganize the stertioletum.

A friend of ours, who graduated with "distinguished honours" at one of the northern universities, says that he must dissent in toto from the idea that the "depression of the duodenum into the flandango" could, by any possibility, cause the olfactory ossificator to ferment, and become identical with the pigmentum. He says the thing cannot be done; and after quoting several learned authorities on the subject, winds up his argument with the remark that—"the vibratory motion communicated to the tunica albugenia by the parturition of the alveola process, effectually disintegrates the pericardiac influences of the epigastrium, and produces a compound corpuscular movement of the lymphatic glands; which abnormal and diagnostical state of the nervous system deteriorates a preponderance of the lacteal fluid to the posterior portion of the cerebellum, and predisposes the patient to preternatural distension of the auricular membraneous orifice; in which case the rappings become painfully and distinctly audible."

Now, whether this is or is not so, we will not undertake to say, but will leave the whole matter in the hands of the learned savans, in the full confidence that little can be added to the above triumphant and incontrovertible exposition.

Mr. Spicer informs us that his personal acquaintance with these tricksy spirits did not commence until March last, and that he sought them out rather from motives of curiosity as to the modus operandi than from any interest in the subject itself. Having resolved upon making trial of their efficacy, he sought out a respectable medium, and engaged her to take the chair at a magnetic circle to be formed at the house of a friend of his own. When at the appointed time he proceeded to the rendezvous it was with the predominant impression on his mind that he was about to countenance an absurd deception. He found the party assembled, all with the exception of the medium and her husband, before his arrival. These soon came, and then the circle, consisting of eleven persons in all, were arranged in a position dictated by the spirit around a dull, unhealthy, cadaverous-looking table innocent of castors. It having first been ascertained, by the usual signals, that numerous spirits were in attendance, and communications might be expected, the persons present commenced interrogating them, each in his turn. We leap over the revelations elicited by others, and pass on to those afforded to our author, when his turn came, because he states implicitly that to this experiment his conversion to the faith of the new philosophy is due—"De ce jour," says he, "tomba mon incredulité."

I recollected that I had in my pocket a packet of letters, eight or ten in number, most of them from Europe, and not of very recent date. . . . . From these, without looking at them, I selected two of the smaller, the size and form of which had no effect in refreshing my remembrance as to the writers. On its coming to my turn to converse with the "powers invisible," I asked, as usual—"Will any spirit communicate with me?"

Rap.

"On any subject?"

Rap.

"Will you tell me the names of the writers of any two letters I have here?"

Rap.

Accordingly I placed the two letters on the table, the addresses downwards, and the seals removed, covering them besides with my hand in such a manner as to conceal them entirely. With the other hand I passed the pencil over the alphabet, and the raps spelled out "George Holland."

Having no correspondent of the latter name (the former, I believe proved to be correct), I passed, without comment, to the second letter, with every expectation of a similar result. The name now spelled out was that of a gentleman from whom, in the course of our acquaintance, I have certainly not received more than three letters, and these at distant and irregular intervals. I turned the letter up. It was as the raps had indicated.

Now, granting that all present were cognisant of my acquaintance with the person in question, how could they possibly divine what I myself did not know? First, that I had the letter with me; and secondly that I had selected it from eight or ten others? If this be guessing, it is of a nature too complicated for my comprehension. Granting nothing, here were four things to be decided correctly: the acquaintance, the correspondence, the possession of the letter, and its selection, two of which points were unknown to myself. Thus, the assumption that my mind might have been placed en rapport with that of the medium, would have been insufficient to produce this result. And the failure of the first reply only serves to make the mystery more mysterious without neutralizing the extraordinary success of the second.

It is too much the fashion among cursory inquirers to overlook the importance of what is done, in the failure of what is not. This is not fair. If you place twenty sealed letters on the table, with a different line written in each, and the "spirits," after failing in the first nineteen, read the twentieth, surely the wonder, in respect to that success, is as great, the mode of compassing it as unaccountable, as though nineteen failures had not preceded it.

We are not called on to remark upon the author's credulity on this occasion. It is more than probable that most unprejudiced persons, under similar circumstances, would have come away from such a demonstration with the same convictions as he now began to entertain. Of course his experiments did not end here. He attended at other assemblies of the kind, and reports candidly not only the success, but the ridiculous failures of which he was a witness. Some of the manifestations are diverting enough. A certain Colonel Fiske, who had left the land of the living for a considerable time, is one of the spiritual revenants; he was in the habit of announcing his presence by drumming hysterically a martial kind of air. It would appear that he bore but an indifferent character before he had gone to the other side, and had not much mended it since: he had the reputation of the Parolles of the invisible world, and his communications were by no means to be relied on; he got into disgrace, in fact, by fibbing and equivocation, and at length became ashamed to respond when called upon, as if conscious that his manifestations were not worth a "rap."

From the chapter headed "Latest Incidents" we learn that the excitement in regard to this curious subject has continued unabated up to the present time. For the many extraordinary narratives there given at length, we must refer our readers to the volume itself; but we shall, by the following extract give Mr. Spicer an opportunity of putting in a word on the other side of a question already familiar to the public through the medium of Dickens's amusing paper in the "Household Words."

With a few words respecting the manifestations in England, I will conclude this chapter. Mrs. Hayden, a medium of no great celebrity, whom I met in the States (and who is mentioned in the introductory chapter as having been made the subject of a somewhat scurrilous(?) article in the Household Words), arrived in England three months since. I have before me a list of fourteen houses of the first distinction, at which she has attended by invitation; meeting at each a circle of from ten to fifteen persons, chiefly from the ranks of fashion and nobility, the Guards and Turf Club supplying a liberal quota, and the savans being in a decided minority. With circles thus constituted, wherein no other harmony than that of a disposition to jest could possibly be found, it is not surprising that (apart from the ever-puzzling sounds) the results obtained were few and unconvincing. The gentlemen deputed from Household Words to collect materials for a funny article, appear to have fulfilled their duty with the happiest success. Regarded, however, as an inquisitorial visit, in protection of an innocent public, it must be viewed as an equally signal failure. Grinning faces, the buffoonery of assumed names, exchange of gestures, proposal of absurd questions, &c., are the most certain means of retarding that discovery which silence, harmony, and a determination to give full scope to the theory, might possibly enable us to make.

Even, however, under the disadvantages alluded to, some singular results have not unfrequently been obtained. A circumstance, for example, occurred in a circle assembled at the house of a lady, not far from Park Lane, to the correctness of which, as stated below by one of the party present, I can myself bear personal testimony.

"Until I received an invitation to join the circle in —— Street, a few hours only before it assembled, I had never heard of the 'manifestations,' nor did I then clearly understand what I was to witness. However, believing that some jugglery was to be practised, I placed in my pocket a curious autograph letter of considerable date. During the sitting, I took the letter out, still rolled up scroll-wise, the outside blank, and placed it on the table, no one present but myself cognisant of its nature, and none being suffered to examine it. The 'spirit' having undertaken to name the writer, a gentleman present, a stranger to me, took the alphabet, and the rappings spelled out without hesitation, 'King William.' It was an autograph letter of William the Third."—E. de St. Croix.

The course and result of the experiment were precisely as this gentleman has stated.

The latter part of this volume is devoted to an inquiry instituted for the sake of the sceptical reader, into all the supposedly practicable modes by which the strange and unaccountable sounds attending the rapping circles are produced, and the revelations elicited. That these phenomena do exist, and that up to the present moment no mortal agency has been detectable in their production, is, according to Mr. Spicer, indisputable. If they are not what the media assert them to be, it is incumbent upon those who deny them credit, at least to show that they are producible by some known and recognised means. Neither have opponents been wanting who have boldly attributed the noises to mechanical means, and the manifestations to clairvoyance. A Dr. Lee affirmed that sounds, similar to those of the magnetic circles, might be produced by a partial dislocation of the bones, and he produced a lady who could rattle her knee-cap in a very edifying way, in proof of his theory. A Mr. Chauncey Burr, assisted by his brother, also produced sounds something similar from his own person; and one Shadrach Barnes published illustrations of the rapping science, and proved that he himself possessed the power of rapping with his toes. The credit of the Burrs, however, fell to the ground when their performances were impeached by the confession of an accomplice, who stated that he had been expressly engaged by them for the purpose of practising the deception; and it having been shown by the faculty that any such use of knee-pans and great-toe joints, as were attributed to the rappers, would speedily destroy them, the knee-pan theory became a ne-gation, and the toe-ology failed in to-to.

Other partisans there were who attributed the audible phenomena and the table-tipping to electricity; and they talked very learnedly on the subject, all the more so, perhaps, as our author hints, as they knew little or nothing of the properties of that subtle agent. One discovered that slight electric shocks accompanied the raps; another, that just before the rappings commence, a crackling, hissing sound is distinguishable, precisely like the escape of electricity from the prime conductor, or from an overcharged Leyden jar; and individuals were found who had electricity enough in their knuckles to strike fire from another's head, &c., &c. It happened, however, unfortunately, that when experiments were made with a view to detect the presence of electricity during the operations of the different media, they were altogether void of success, not the slightest deflection being perceptible in a delicately-poised magnetic needle placed directly in the current of the sounds, or even when handled by the media themselves during the rapping. One learned professor has a notion that the nervo-electric fluid is at the bottom of the whole business: "Force," says he, "is matter in motion, and electric matter only moves on the law of equilibrium, or when moved by mind. Intelligence can take hold of it, as found in our bodies. . . . . A diseased nervous condition develops this state of our brain and nerves, and the mind, freed from the gross body, acts with greater power," &c.; and he denounces rapping as a diseased condition, and all "spirit-manifestations" to be the work of spirits in the body. Among the disciples of mesmerism, not a few have declared their belief that the medium of the rapping-spirits is nothing more than an unconscious clairvoyante: that the sounds are produced by her will from the electric atmosphere encircling her; that she possesses an inner consciousness of what is passing in the minds of those at a distance with whom their wishes place her in communication; and that her extraordinary answers are given by means of her clairvoyance, unknown to herself!

Rejecting all such lucid expositions of the puzzling phenomena, the author is thrown back upon the popular theory, to wit, that the rappings are bonâ fide spiritual manifestations; and seeing that the recent developments, though new in detail are old in principle, and have been known to exist in all ages of the world; that they have been recognised by Old Testament writers, and inferentially sanctioned by one apostle at least; and that great and good men have at various periods admitted the possibility of commerce with spirits, he, too, is disposed to accept the popular belief. "Proofs," he says, "that these phenomena are not produced or controlled by any agency on the hither side of nature have been adduced in sufficient numbers to awaken the interest, or at least secure the attention, of all who do not purposely close their ears, or steel their reason, against the matter in dipute; and to those who do, I have not the remotest intention of appealing." Among the proofs here alluded to, are some most extraordinary and well-attested narratives of strange and supernatural facts which have occurred at different times, in different families, for which, as we have not room for them here, we must refer the reader to Mr. Spicer's volume.

In summing up, in his last chapter, our author declares that he has set forth the subject in every possible aspect, favourable and unfavourable, and that all he wishes to secure for it is fair play. We are bound to bear testimony to his candour throughout the whole of his narrative, in which, if he has boldly vindicated what he conceives to be the truth, he has with equal boldness poured contempt upon the pretensions of humbug and imposture. The following is his summary of what he considers to have been proved:—

First.—That manifestations of an extraordinary character are rife in the United States, and are becoming familiar in England.

Secondly.—That demonstrations of a similar kind have been known almost from time immemorial, in civilized and barbarous countries alike; their true origin, as in the present instance, never having been ascertained.

Thirdly.—That the American manifestations have been closely watched, carefully investigated, and submitted to every conceivable test, by persons eminently qualified to conduct such inquiries, and whose characters entitle them to the fullest credit. These have decided—

Fourthly.—That the phenomena present features which render the theory of the employment of mechanic art wholly inadmissible.

Fifthly.—That the recognised laws of electricity are utterly insufficient to account for, and the properties of that agent inapplicable to, the results obtained.

Lastly.—That the theories of animal electricity, magnetoid currents, nerve-spirit, &c., will not suffice to explain the whole phenomena, while unconnected with some independent intelligence; though where that intelligence is to be sought, and how explained, there is no satisfactory evidence to prove.

At these conclusions, so many enlightened and liberal minds have already arrived, that we recognise the last and most favourable feature of the whole strange history in the fact of the question being permitted to halt and remain stationary, exactly at the point where profound and anxious interest, for the first time, really attaches to it!

* * * * *

A wonder, whatever its agency, has no doubt been wrought in the land. Considered . . . . in the light of an undiscovered hoax, its marvellous ingenuity, and the incomparable fidelity with which a secret that must be known to many thousands among the neediest and most purchaseable of the community has been preserved, raise it beyond dispute to the dignity of what it has been styled—a wonder. In spite of the hostility and denunciation of the greater portion of the press—the warning tone of the clergy—the ridicule and insouciance of the non-reflecting portion of society, the subject has gradually won its way through all opposition; and, up to the present instant, added thousands, almost daily, to the number of those who deem it worthy of zealous inquiry.

But—the question naturally arises—supposing these rapping spirits to be actual disembodied entities, and willing to come and to drum at the call of the media, what use are we mortals to make of them, if, as Mr. Spicer seems to allow, they are as often deceivers or deceived themselves as they are wise and true? It was this uncertain and in part disreputable character of the rapping gentry, it may be, that prompted the New York Times to publish the bravado, "Who cares?—supposing these rappings are the work of spirits—who cares?" In answer to this editorial inquiry the author replies with much solemnity, and quotes the following sentences from an American writer in reference to the manifestations:—

"To every mind that has kept itself so free from absorption in worldly pursuits, that it can cultivate a rational interest in the inquiry—Where are the Dead? this maligned topic cannot be without its claims to candid investigation. Surely the great problem which has pressed so heavily upon so many noble minds through all ages, is not, in this, to be regarded with a callous, or what is worse, audacious indifference.

"That these developments accord rather with the instincts of the vulgar through all time, than with the theories of the learned at the present day, is no good reason that we should turn with supercilious scorn from the inquiry. Look at the writers of two or three centuries ago—at Baxter, Henry Moore, and many others; and observe how much of their argument in favour of the immortality of the soul was founded on phenomena precisely similar to those now exciting our astonishment—phenomena which modern science proudly ignores; but which nevertheless occur, as surely as the earth goes round the sun, in spite of the adverse opinion of the men of the church in Galileo's time."

Such is the language of an enlightened expositor of honest convictions, and it would be infinitely more to the credit of those whose calling places them for the time, in the position of "custodes morum" of the people, did they adopt a similar tone; or at least refrain from insulting the better feelings of their readers by ribaldry, or affected indifference to a subject which is clearly not susceptible of such a view.

Here we must take leave of "Sights and Sounds." The reader has by this time a tolerable idea of the American Rapping manifestations, and if he have any inclinations of a supernatural tendency, he may gratify them to a prodigious extent for the cost of Mr. Spicer's volume. The subject is a curious and interesting one, considered from any point of view; the author has treated it fairly, and in so doing has presented a singular aspect of human (something) for the study of the psychologist. We can commend his work to the attention of our friends, feeling pretty sure that, be their faith what it may, they will find in it abundant matter for interesting speculation.

THE NIGHT-SIDE OF CIVILIZATION.

There is no doubt that the present age is distinguished above all that have preceded it by an amazingly rapid progress in science and the useful arts, in morals, manners, government, and all that constitutes what is known under the general term of civilization. On this point we have the evidence of history to prove that the suggestions of self-esteem do not lead us into the common error of exaggerating our own advantages. We know that there have been long periods, reckoned by centuries—like that, for example, which intervened between the Norman conquest and the invention of printing—when society seemed to be, as it were, lying fallow, and slowly gathering the elements of future fertility. In general knowledge and in habits of life there was barely a perceptible improvement from one generation to another. Not only the same fashion of dress, but the same identical raiment, often descended from father to son, a fact indicating, as at this day in the east, an unchanging condition of society. In the fourteenth century, the furniture in ordinary dwellings, as shown by the tax-gatherer's returns, was almost as scanty and as mean as in the days of Alfred the Great. It seldom exceeded (according to Sir Frederick Eden) the following brief list of articles: a wooden drinking bowl, a cup, dish, and pot of brass; a gridiron, a tripod, an andiron, a bed, and a rug or coverlet. Similar articles, it is well known, were in use in the Saxon times. There is no better test of civilization than that which is afforded by the quality and variety of clothing and household furniture in common use. Judging from this test alone, we should be justified in believing that society has advanced more during the last hundred years than in all the previous centuries since the downfall of the Roman empire.

But there are other and more striking evidences within the experience of every one. It is only necessary, for our present purpose, to allude to the fact that most of the social comforts and public conveniences which we now enjoy have originated, or been rendered common, within the memory of living men. Our coal fires, gas-lights, well-paved streets, good roads, canals, railways, steamboats, post-offices, and nearly all the other improvements which distinguish the England of this day from the England of the Plantagenets, are the product of a single century. When we add the evidences of mental and moral activity of another description—the improved and immensely extended literature, the schools of various novel descriptions—infant, Sunday, industrial, reformatory,—the scientific, and artistic societies, the mechanics' institutes, the missionary associations, the savings' banks, the numerous charitable institutions, the hospitals for almost every ailment that can afflict humanity—is it not natural that we should be deeply impressed with a sense of the peculiar advantage which we enjoy in living in an age so eminently enlightened, virtuous, and prosperous?

But in the midst of our self-congratulations, some startling facts are forced upon our attention, which certainly tend to diminish our satisfaction at the prospect of this high civilization and rapid social progress in the midst of which we live. We learn that there is a class among us which not only does not share in these advantages, but actually sinks as the scale of refined society rises. We find that the number of criminal commitments in England and Wales, which in 1805 was only 4,605, has increased to an annual average amount of 27,000 during the last ten years. We find that of this number no less than 10,000, in every year, have been boys under seventeen years of age. We discover that in the midst of every one of our large cities there are districts inhabited by a population more ignorant, debased, and heathenish—more utterly removed from all good influences—than has probably existed at any former time since Britain became a Christian country. On seeking for the causes of this fearful phenomenon, we are still more startled at discovering them apparently in those very improvements which we had regarded as at once the sources and evidences of modern civilization. It is to good roads and well-lighted streets, to stage-coaches, canals, railways, and omnibuses, to steamboats, docks, artificial harbours, and other creations of modern skill and industry, that we owe the sudden and vast extension of our cities, and the wide separation of the classes which inhabit them. The consequences have been clearly described by Mr. Matthew Davenport Hill, Recorder of Birmingham, in his evidence given before the Select Committee of the House of Commons on "Criminal and Destitute Juveniles:"—

A century and a half ago, as far as I have been able to ascertain, there was scarcely a large town in the island except London. When I use the term—large town, I use it with reference to the subject under hand, I mean where an inhabitant of the humbler classes is unknown to the majority of the inhabitants of that town. By a small town, I mean a town where, à converso every inhabitant is more or less known to the mass of the people of the town. I think it will not require any long train of reflection to show that in small towns there must be a sort of natural police, of a very wholesome kind, operating upon the conduct of each individual, who lives, as it were, under the public eye. But in a large town he lives, as it were, in absolute obscurity; and we know that large towns are sought by way of refuge, because of that obscurity, which, to a certain extent gives impunity. Again, there is another cause, which I have never seen much noticed, but which, having observed its operation for many years, I am disposed to consider very important; and that is, the gradual separation of classes which takes place in towns by a custom which has gradually grown up, that every person who can afford it lives out of town, and at a spot distant from his place of business. Now, this was not so formerly; it is a habit which has, practically speaking, grown up within the last half-century. The result of the old habit was, that rich and poor lived in proximity, and the superior classes exercised that species of silent but very efficient control over their neighbours, to which I have already referred. They are now gone, and the consequence is, that large masses of the population are gathered together without those wholesome influences which operated upon them when their congregation was more mixed, when they were divided, so to speak, by having persons of a different class of life, better educated, among them. Those two causes, namely, the magnitude of towns and the separation of classes, have acted concurrently, and the effect has been, that we find in very large towns, which I am acquainted with, that in certain quarters there is a public opinion and a public standard of morals very different from what we are accustomed to, and very different from what we should desire to see. Then the children who are born amongst those masses grow up under that opinion, and make that standard of morals their own; and with them the best lad, or the best man, is he who can obtain subsistence, or satisfy the wants of life, with the least labour, by begging or by stealing, and who shows the greatest dexterity in accomplishing his object, and the greatest wariness in escaping the penalties of the law; and lastly, the greatest power of endurance and defiance, when he comes under the lash of the law.

Under such influences, this isolated population retrogrades into a barbarous state. From its midst come those swarms of juvenile vagabonds who infest the thoroughfares, worry the police, perplex the law-courts, and sadden the mind of every benevolent person who considers their condition and probable fate. The name of "City Arabs" has been given to them; a term, as Mr. Hill remarks, certainly expressive of their character, which combines all the vices and some of the virtues of savages. That experienced and philanthropic magistrate describes the genuine City Arab in the following graphic manner: "He is indolent, averse from any settled or steady employment, averse from restraint of any kind; on the other hand, he is patient of hunger, and thirst, and cold; and as to dirt, he rather delights in it than otherwise. It is by no means an evil in his estimation; and he would much rather be permitted to roam about at large, even suffering at times great privation, than he would be at school or at work, under the restraints which belong to civilized society."

Miss Mary Carpenter, of Bristol, whose benevolent efforts in favour of the children of the "perishing and dangerous classes" are well known, gave evidence which strikingly confirms that of Mr. Hill, with regard to the increasing separation of classes in large towns, and its effect in debasing the lowest class of all, depriving its members even of the protection of the law, and excluding them from the advantages of the humblest schools. On these points, Miss Carpenter observed—

I have noticed myself that districts which were formerly inhabited by a number of respectable inhabitants, are now almost exclusively inhabited by the lowest class; —the respectable inhabitants moving from them, and avoiding even entering into them, if they possibly can. Those districts are therefore, in Bristol, left absolutely and avowedly in possession of the lowest inhabitants. The district to which I particularly allude is in St. James's parish. There is an immense number of courts and alleys branching out of the principal streets. I have been in the habit, during the whole of the seventeen years, of visiting at different parts of the day, and on different days, this district, and I have never once, during the whole course of the time, met a single policeman in any one of the by-streets or courts; I have not on an average once a month met one in the principal streets. Even a few Sundays ago a scene occurred, which perhaps I ought to mention. Just before divine worship, as I was passing through Lewin's Mead, the principal street, I found the whole street, within two minutes' walk of a large chapel, filled with a low crowd. I perceived that there was a fight going on in the middle of it, between a soldier and a civilian. I with difficulty penetrated through it, (I was not afraid to penetrate, because I have never in any way been molested in those parts,) and at once sent to the station for help. They were actually obliged to send nine policemen in order to quell the disturbance; and yet, if I had not sent to the station, the place would have been left as it was. I mention this fact merely for the purpose of showing what the inhabitants consider to be the ordinary state of the street on Sunday evening. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at that districts remaining in such a condition are the nests of crime. With respect to the fact of these classes being increasingly uninfluenced by the schools intended for the respectable portion, I would say that about twenty-five years ago a Sunday school was instituted, which I have ever since attended very closely. At that time the Sunday school was entirely filled with those who would now be considered the ragged class,—so much so that it was considered an annoyance to the attendants of the chapel for them to be introduced. At present, the Sunday school does not receive any of those children. Even if it would receive them, the children would not come. Another, and even a more striking fact is, that one of the first British schools in Bristol, the Red Cross Street school, which has been inspected by Her Majesty's Inspector, and considered one of the best in Bristol, was established originally for what is now termed the "ragged" class. The district was selected for the school expressly because it was very low and degraded. Now the school does not in any way touch the ragged class. The district is still quite degraded, yet none of those children are admitted into that school. This class is without the pale of such schools.

Miss Carpenter added the expression of an opinion, in which all the witnesses seem to agree, that the education of this lowest and most degraded class can only be effected "by such police regulations and such authority from the magistrates as will apply a certain degree of compulsion." All who have paid attention to the subject are united in affirming that the purely "voluntary system" of education necessarily fails to embrace the children of parents belonging to the utterly destitute, ignorant, and vicious classes. Various methods are suggested for the purpose of bringing them within the scope of elevating influences; but all imply some recourse to legal compulsion, exercised either upon the parents or upon the children.

Glasgow is a city in which, for the reasons already mentioned, a large criminal population might be expected to exist. Its growth from a small town to a city of the first order has been wonderfully rapid. A "mixed multitude" of strangers of the poorest class, has been flocking to it during the last half-century, from all parts of the United Kingdom, but chiefly from Ireland and the Scottish Highlands. There is, at the same time, a wealthy, intellectual, and refined class, forming a society apart, and hardly conscious of the existence of any other. The result is that Glasgow ranks next to the metropolis and Liverpool in the amount of misery and degradation which it shelters. An account of a visit to the heathen portion of the city was given by Mr. F. Hill, Inspector of Prisons, in his report for 1837.

As the narrative is reprinted in his recently published work, it may be presumed that there has since been no material change in the condition of that quarter of the town. The district which he visited is described as "a compact mass of building, intersected only by narrow wynds,—bounded on the north by the Trongate, on the east by King Street, on the south by the Bridgegate, and on the west by Stockwell Street:"

On all sides there were appearances of discomfort; families crowded into dark ill-ventilated rooms, with dirty children at the doors, and heaps of steaming manure before the windows. Though it was the middle of the day, we found many of the inhabitants in bed, the night having probably been passed in crime or debauchery. In several instances I observed persons of different sexes sleeping in considerable numbers in the same room. In one case I remarked a child lying on a heap of shavings, and looking very ill. On inquiry, I was told that it had the typhus fever; and I was not at all surprised at this, for I had been previously informed by Dr. Cowan, one of the physicians of the Fever Hospital, and a writer on the medical statistics of Glasgow, that this district is never free from fever. Indeed, in passing through the place, the sources of fever are but too conspicuous. On descending the stairs of one of the old frail tenements that we examined, I was told that the place is known by the significant name of "Flea Hall." Most of the shops in these wynds, Captain Miller informed me, are kept by receivers of stolen goods. The inhabitants of one of the wynds, indeed, have so bad a character, that Captain Miller finds it necessary to keep a police-officer constantly stationed in it. Our progress through this abode of crime, of course, made a commotion among the occupants, and we soon had a crowd of attendants, among whom Captain Miller and Mr. Brebner recognised many who were but too well known to them. In some instances, there was a hesitation about admitting us; but the, to them, familiar cry of "Police," was instantly followed by the turning of the lock and opening of the door. In one place, we found a party of housebreakers. Captain Miller showed me a room in another house, in which a murder had been committed about a fortnight before. "He arrived at the spot," he said, "very soon after the deed had been perpetrated, and found the body of the murdered woman still warm, and lying across the bedstead. In the same room, in one corner of the floor, were two girls, seventeen or eighteen years old, who did not seem even to have been sufficiently roused by the circumstance of the murder to quit their bed!"

The work* from which the preceding extract is quoted, is one which should be read by all who take an interest in the important subject of which it treats. The author has had the advantage of great practical experience, gained during the efficient performance of his duties as Inspector of Prisons, first in Scotland, and afterwards in England. On him, moreover, official experience has not produced its too common effect, of narrowing the mind and restricting the ideas within the limits of established routine. The work exhibits the clear intellect and conscientious frankness of a sagacious and independent thinker, who having proved or corrected his theories by his experience, now gives the results with natural confidence to the world. At the present time, when our Government is about to deal boldly and comprehensively with the whole system of "secondary punishments," Mr. Hill's work will be peculiarly valuable.

An Inspector of Prisons might, perhaps, be expected to laud, or at least to apologise for, the system of prison management which he has been engaged in administering. Mr. Hill, however,—to his credit be it said,—does nothing of the kind. He admits, indeed, that considerable improvements have of late years been made,—some of which, it may be added, have evidently been due to his own influence, particularly in the prisons of Scotland. He points out numerous other amendments, of which the system is susceptible. But, in his opinion, the system itself is based on a wrong principle. Its object is the punishment of the criminal, not his reformation. Mr. Hill holds that the aim of prison discipline should be, not to punish the offender, (in a vindictive sense,) but to restrain and reform him. The restraint should last until the reformation is complete, or is, at all events, so far advanced that the prisoner may be safely liberated. A criminal who cannot be reformed should be confined for life. A prison should be regarded as a hospital for the morally diseased. The means of cure should be modified according to the character of the patient,—but in general should consist of regular, healthful, and useful labour, moral and intellectual instruction, and kind treatment. These propositions which were once the bold suggestions of theorists, are now the well-weighed conclusions of an eminently practical and clear-headed man—a barrister-at-law and late prison inspector.

Like all sensible physicians of the body politic, Mr. Hill considers prevention to be infinitely preferable to cure. The means of prevention, he holds, consist chiefly of "good education and the general spread of knowledge; the cultivation of habits of forethought, sobriety, and frugality, with the control of the passions; the promotion of habits of industry and self-reliance, and the adoption of all other practicable means for raising every class of society beyond the sphere of destitution, and into that of comfort and moderate wealth; such a remodelling of our laws as shall bring the statute-book as nearly as possible into coincidence with the eternal principles of justice,—so that while it is a code of municipal law, it may also serve as a manual of morality; and lastly, the adoption of such means for the apprehension, trial, and punishment of offenders, as shall secure, as far as practicable, that every offence shall be followed by immediate detection and certain conviction, and that the criminal shall be placed in such a position as shall make him sincerely and deeply regret the wrong he has committed, and bring him to labour earnestly in the work of his reformation, and in obtaining the means for making restitution to the person injured." To each of these heads the author devotes a chapter, comprising many important facts and suggestions,—of which only a few can be noticed here.

With regard to the effects of education, he states that "even the mere powers of reading and writing, without reference to exercise in their intelligent use, are comparatively rare among criminals." Of 16,000 persons in Scotland (where education is more general than in England) received into the prisons in one year, less than 1200, or one in thirteen, could both read and write well, —and only 312, or one in fifty, had learnt more than mere reading and writing. A still more significant fact is mentioned in the following paragraph:—

* Crime: its Amount, Causes, and Remedies. By Frederick Hill, Barrister-at-Law, late Inspector of Prisons. London: John Murray, Albemarle Street. 1853.

To what an extent the simple power of reading fluently is often a protection from habits of crime, may be judged of from the fact that a home missionary in Edinburgh, in whom I had full confidence (the present worthy and able governor of the prison of that city, Mr. Smith) told me that in all his visits to the poor, he never met with a single person who was at the same time addicted to crime and in the habit of reading.

Well might Lord John Russell say,—in his recent statement of ministerial policy,—that the determination of the Government to put an end to convict transportation gives additional importance to the great question of popular education —"because, in proposing measures to supersede the punishment of transportation, and in devising other means to deter men from crime, it becomes, if possible, the more necessary that we should plant in their minds motives sufficiently strong to induce them to avoid crime altogether." And it may be added that if this pernicious system of convict colonization had been earlier discontinued —or, better still, had never been commenced,— our Government would before this time have been compelled to adopt a system of national education, which would have relieved us from the reproach of being far behind every other Protestant country in the world—behind even Roman Catholic Belgium —in the amount of instruction afforded to our people.

It is satisfactory to find that in Mr. Hill's opinion, not only should convict transportation be at once discontinued as a matter of justice to the colonies, but its cessation may be made, by the adoption of a proper system, an advantage, instead of an injury, to this country. We quote his remarks on this subject with the more pleasure, as they include a well-deserved tribute to a gentleman whose efforts have been especially instrumental in bringing about this gratifying result:—

Of transportation, in the ordinary sense of the term, few can have a lower opinion than myself; indeed, I am convinced that the system has generated monstrous evils. Nor is the evil confined to the penal colonies alone, for the convicts soon find their way into other colonies; indeed, it is stated that in Van Diemen's Land a society has been formed expressly to aid them in so doing; and it appears that most of the crimes in South Australia (though one principle in the foundation of that colony was exemption from the convict system) are committed by released convicts. Fortunately,—for so I regard it,— ordinary transportation is very expensive; whereas it has been demonstrated, both in this country and in America, that, under good arrangements, imprisonment may be made self-supporting.

Those who object to the discontinuance of transportation often ask how the criminals are to be disposed of, and where so large a number is to be kept, if none are sent out of the country? the reply, one would suppose, might be readily suggested by looking at America, Belgium, Switzerland, and other countries, which have no penal colonies; but no one who has calmly considered the subject can doubt that there is room for all our criminals on a small portion of the unoccupied land in this country, even though they were far more numerous.

It is a good omen of the state of a nation, when a country gentleman like Mr. Adderley devotes a considerable portion of his time and talent to such questions as these; and calls on his countrymen to join him in efforts for the moral improvement of the degraded and criminal, even at the sacrifice of some of their own pleasures and pastimes.

It is cheering to find that the Queen, in her speech on the opening of the present Parliament, recommends an important step towards the discontinuance of transportation. I sincerely hope that her majesty's advice will be adopted, and that this step will soon be followed by the total disuse of the whole system; and that— although after an interval of more than two hundred years—we shall, as a people, cease in transportation, as in all other kinds of colonization, to be liable to the charge contained in the declaration of the great Bacon, that "it is a shameful and unblessed thing to take the scum of people, and wicked condemned men, to be the people with whom you plant."

Among the most valuable influences subsidiary to education, Mr. Hill mentions cheap literature and cheap postage. The former, he considers, should be relieved from the imposts which still press upon it. The latter has already produced great benefit in this and other countries by keeping up family ties, and as a potent means of disseminating knowledge. In the course of three or four years after the penny postage had been established, Mr. Hill found, on a visit to the Shetland Isles, (the inhabitants of which are remarkable for the strength of their parental feelings,) that the number of letters in that remote part of the country had increased thirteen-fold,—fathers and mothers being no longer averse, as formerly, (now that they could correspond by letter,) to allow their sons to seek profitable employment at a distance from home. "When it is remembered," adds the author, "that altogether there are now more than a million of letters posted in the British Isles every day, it will at once be admitted that the business of letter writing must act powerfully on the general education of the inhabitants." We may add that great additional advantages would accrue from extending the system of cheap postage to the communications between this country and the colonies. Thousands of poor persons are prevented from maintaining a correspondence with their relatives in other parts of the empire by the present heavy tax of a shilling on every letter.

Mr. Hill enumerates various faulty laws which occasion much of the existing criminality. Among the worst, if not the very worst, of these are the laws which determine the condition of married women—depriving them of all protection, and reducing them frequently to a state of helpless and miserable slavery. "The married woman, in the lower classes, is in effect so indissolubly bound to the man whom she has once received as her husband, that, whatever may be his offences against conjugal fidelity, sobriety, honesty, kindness, or duty of any kind, so long as they do not place him immediately within the grasp of the law, she has no protection either for herself or her children against any wrongs he may think proper to inflict. How many poor wives are there who would most cheerfully and effectually maintain themselves and their children—in other words, do their husband's whole duty—if they could but be guaranteed against his violence and dishonesty! Application for legal redress avails little or nothing. To obtain divorce, or even separation, involves an expense beyond the total earnings of years—perhaps of a whole life; and complaint to a magistrate, the only process open, obtains at best but a temporary relief, followed, in all probability, by more malicious, if less open ill treatment." Mr. Hill adds, that during the time of his inspection in Scotland, many—he believes the majority—of the murders that were committed were those of wives and husbands; most of which would probably have been prevented, could the suffering party have obtained a separation; and he observes that the State of New York has set a good example in its legislation on this subject, by decreeing that the property of a married woman shall, without special covenant, be at her own disposal, instead of being handed over to her husband.

Mr. Hill, it should be observed, is decidedly of opinion, as the result of many years' inquiry and observation, that crime in this country is steadily decreasing in amount, and taking a milder and milder form. As regards the last twelve years, the returns of criminal commitments fully bear out this opinion. But when the author adds that the amount of crime "is less than at any previous period of our history, even without reference to the increase of wealth and population," and questions the correctness of the returns which tell a different story, it becomes apparent that some stronger grounds than those given by him are required to support this conclusion. Mr. Hill enumerates, indeed, with great clearness and force, many causes which must have led to the gradual diminution of offences; and he mentions whole classes of crimes which have almost entirely disappeared in our day; such, for example, as piracy, kidnapping, wholesale cattle stealing, robbing of mail coaches and other public conveyances, and the like. But he forgets the important source of augmented crime which his brother, Mr. M. D. Hill, has pointed out, in the growth of our cities and the formation of a pariah class in their midst. It is deserving of notice, that the fluctuations of the criminal returns, during the last forty years, have been in strict accordance with the changes in the social condition of the people. In the fifteen years subsequent to the general peace—from 1816 to 1830 inclusive—the number of commitments was doubled, rising from 9,091 to 18,107, while the population only increased by about one-fifth, or from 11,200,000 to 13,800,000. This is exactly the result which one would expect to find. At that period, all the causes which produce crime were in active operation, while those which have since been found in some degree effectual for its repression, hardly existed. At that time, the growth of the principal cities, and the separation of the different classes, proceeded rapidly. The Government was oppressive and unpopular. The criminal laws were frightfully cruel, and badly administered. The Corn Laws enhanced the price of food. Great masses of the people were ignorant, turbulent, and miserable. The higher classes had lost that species of supervision and restraining influence which they had exercised over their humbler neighbours before the large towns withdrew the latter from their control. There were then few schools for the poor. What cheap literature existed was of a worthless or corrupting kind. The amusements of the people were coarse, brutal, and demoralising. Under such circumstances, a great increase of crime would naturally be expected. Had the official returns not shown evidence of such an increase, their correctness might with reason have been doubted. But there seems to be no sufficient ground for impugning them, while they agree so accurately with the conclusions derived from historical evidence.

About the year 1830, as is well known, a great change took place in the aspect of society and the feelings of the people. A popular administration came into power. The Reform Bill brought the governing body more nearly into harmony with the people. The barbarous criminal code was greatly ameliorated. The Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge prosecuted its invaluable labours with great activity and success. The first grant of public money for schools was made in 1833. The British and Foreign School Society and the National School Society, founded about twenty years before, now first became important and efficient institutions. Infant schools became common; Sunday schools almost universal. The New Poor Law, Municipal Reform, and the reduction of the Newspaper Stamp, all had a salutary effect. Thus, although many of the causes which produce crime remained in full vigour, we are not surprised to find that these counteracting influences had a sensible effect, and that during the eight or nine years following 1830, the increase of offences did but little more than keep pace with the increase of the population. In 1831, the commitments were 19,647, while the population was 13,900,000. In 1839, the commitments had increased to 24,443, and the population to 15,500,000.

In 1840, a scarcity produced by a succession of bad harvests, accompanied with great commercial depression and political excitement, served to raise the number of criminal commitments to 27,187. From that time, with some fluctuations, their tendency has been to diminish in number. In 1850, though the population had increased by two millions, the number of offences was less by several hundreds than in 1840, being only 26,813. We see in this decrease, the growing effect of the favourable influences which have been brought into operation of late years. The result is cheering, as it gives reason for hoping that with extended education, and other means of improvement, the reduction in the amount of crime will continue, until it is finally brought within an easily manageable compass.

But before this result can be attained the great difficulty has to be overcome. We have yet to find the means of dealing successfully with the augmenting criminal population of our large cities. Education, the police, the railways, and other agencies, have, doubtless, greatly diminished, of late years, the number of criminals in small towns, and in most rural districts. But the diminution is, to some extent, only apparent. The criminals have not been reformed or restrained, but simply expelled, and driven to safer haunts. The weeds have not been eradicated altogether from the rural fields, but only transplanted into the more congenial seed-plots of crime in the cities. The class of juvenile delinquents in particular—including the whole tribe of "City Arabs,"—has continued to flourish in spite of all reformatory and repressive influences. Of the 10,000 male offenders under seventeen years of age, annually convicted in England and Wales, the two metropolitan counties of Middlesex and Surrey supply more than one-fourth, (in 1851 no less than 2940,) though they contain only one-seventh of the population of the country. The cities of Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Birmingham, Edinburgh, and Bristol, and a few others, furnish a large proportion of the remainder. "That the penal laws are inefficient of themselves to check this disorder," observes Captain Williams, inspector of prisons, in his Report, dated December 13, 1851, "is proved by the unabating prevalence of the evil, and the almost countless recommittals of children to prison." These facts, moreover, prove, that "ragged schools," industrial schools, and other similar institutions, though excellent in their purpose and management, and doubtless beneficial in many ways, have as yet made no sensible impression on the mass of the criminal population in our cities. Mr. Locke, the Honorary Secretary of the London Ragged School Union, after giving a very gratifying account of the increasing usefulness of those schools, expressed the opinion that without some direct interference of the law, for the purpose of prevention, "we shall never get the great evil of vagrancy and juvenile delinquency remedied. If by law we can compel a parent to give his children food," added Mr. Locke, "I think we should do the same as to instruction." Should the parent be unable to pay for the child's instruction and maintenance, the parish, he considered, should fulfil the duty, and exercise the authority of the parent for the child's education.

A "Conference on Juvenile Delinquency," was held at Birmingham, in December 1851,—having been convened mainly through the exertions of Miss Carpenter. As the ladies and gentlemen, who attended the conference, had all been volunteer workers in the benevolent cause, they must have had thorough experience of the efficiency of purely voluntary agency for the prevention of this evil. The result of their deliberations was, however, that they came unanimously to the following important conclusions:—

That though "ragged schools," and similar institutions, were doing a vast amount of good to the neglected class, yet in most localities they were cramped and hindered from want of funds; and that all the agencies yet at work were totally inadequate to check the increase of juvenile crime.

That voluntary agency was not equal to the work, and that support was needed from some regular and adequate source.

That where parents neglected or perverted their offspring the public should interfere and see justice done; but that parents who could pay should not be permitted to escape doing so.

That there were large numbers of children in our large towns, of the vagrant class, who needed food and some industrial training (to fit them for future life) as well as moral and religious teaching.

That for such children book learning should be secondary to moral training and instruction in some trade or handicraft.

That no great good would ever be done to this class until some power were given to the police or parish officers to enforce attendance at a school of some kind, and until street-begging should be effectually put down.

That it is a great mistake to treat juvenile delinquents, especially those under twelve years, in the same manner as hardened criminals; and that correctional or reformatory schools were needed for such classes, rather than prisons.

That the present treatment of this class, through means of prisons, &c., was radically bad, and in every case doing more harm than good—tending to increase and perpetuate crime, rather than to repress or diminish it; the re-commitments being in most cases forty or fifty per cent., and in some seventy per cent., on the commitments.

That reformatories (the few that exist) were doing much good; the reformations being forty or fifty per cent., and in one case eighty per cent. on the admissions.

That prisons were far more expensive than ragged schools, industrial schools, or reformatories, merely considering the current annual expense; and

That in every respect, prevention was better than cure.

Some remarkable facts may be mentioned in confirmation of these views, and none are more striking than the history of the Aberdeen "Industrial Feeding Schools," which may be said to have first drawn attention to the necessity and the proper means for repressing the growth of juvenile destitution and crime. About the year 1840, the alarming increase in the number of young vagrants and criminals in that rapidly growing city attracted the attention of some of the principal inhabitants, who combined to adopt measures for remedying the evil. They first established, in 1841, a school in which destitute boys were received during the daytime, fed, instructed in the common branches of school education and in religious knowledge, and trained in some useful labour, such as tailoring, shoemaking, picking hair for upholsterers, and net-making. Afterwards, two schools for girls were established, by ladies, on a similar plan,—sewing and knitting being the descriptions of work in which the children were instructed. The food given in these schools consisted of oatmeal porridge and milk for breakfast and supper,—and for dinner, usually soup made of ox-heads,—the kind of soup commonly in use in prisons and such institutions. It was found that the children could be fed at the cost of a penny or a penny farthing a day. The total annual expense of each boy, after deducting the amount of his earnings, was found to be £3 15s.; that of each girl, £2 8s. 6d. Comparing this expense with that of maintaining a criminal in prison—which averages £16 in Scotland, and £24 in England—it will be seen that it is much cheaper, as the Birmingham Conference declared, to prevent crime than to punish it.

These schools were highly successful in improving the character and condition of the children who attended them. But they had little effect in diminishing the general amount of vagrancy in the city. In 1841, there were 328 vagrants in the county of Aberdeen; in 1844, there were 345 vagrants, a larger number, though the Feeding Schools had been nearly three years in operation. At length, in 1845, the magistrates resolved upon a decided and effective measure, extremely beneficial in its result, but, as one of them frankly admits, of a "highly illegal character. The illegality, however, was in the direction of leniency, as the proceeding was based on a local act for the prevention of begging. On a certain day, a general razzia was made upon the 'city Arabs' of Aberdeen. Orders were given to the police that morning to lay hold of every little begging boy and girl in the town." Seventy-five were thus captured at one swoop, and were borne off in triumph to an Industrial Feeding School, which had been established expressly for their benefit. On the first day there was great difficulty with them. The little savages rebelled violently against the discipline of the school, and especially against the unwonted operation of washing their faces and hands. On the other hand, the three substantial meals with which they were provided had a pacifying effect. In the evening they were dismissed to their homes with the information that they might return to school or not, the next day, as they pleased; but that if they were caught begging they would be immediately apprehended, and conveyed, not to the school, but to prison. Of the seventy-five, seventy-two returned; and the school has gone on most successfully ever since. The average number attending it has been, of late years, from 115 to 120.

The effect of this method of procedure upon the vagrant and criminal population of Aberdeen has exceeded expectation. In 1844, as has been seen, the number of vagrants in the county was 345. The compulsory action began in May, 1845. In that year the number of vagrants fell to 105; in the next year to 14; and in 1850, only two could be found throughout the county! As regards crime, it is stated that the number of juvenile commitments to the gaol of Aberdeen in 1841 was 61; and in 1851 it had fallen to five! The magistrates, however, find that there is still a class of neglected children whom, in the present state of the law, they cannot reach. These are "the children of parents who are perfectly able to support them and educate them, but who, from their own bad principles and bad conduct, will not take charge of their children, but leave them to grow up a torment to themselves and their neighbours." Mr. Alex. Thompson, the gentleman from whose evidence the foregoing facts have been principally derived, observes:—"We have no power of dealing with such a class, and we have proposed once or twice to have a slight alteration made in the law of Scotland, which would enable us to treat them as we think they ought to be treated. I admit that there is a very great difficulty in the question of compulsory education, but the view I am inclined to take of the matter is this,—that if the parent wilfully and deliberately neglects his child, the state is entitled to come forward in the place of the parent, and to say,—'You shall not bring up your child to a life of crime. If you will not do your duty to your child, we will do that duty for you.'"

The conclusion which Mr. Thompson here enunciates is undoubtedly that to which the country will come at last. It rests on the great principle which lies at the foundation of civilization itself. In a barbarous condition of society, the government is conducted by chiefs, or influential men, who exercise a personal supervision over their inferiors, and prevent the growth of a criminal class by the summary process of knocking all offenders on the head, or otherwise putting them out of the way. As society improves, the power of the chiefs declines, and is gradually superseded by the united will of the community. Thus arises the system of government by the State. The very term civilization, derived from a word signifying citizen, indicates the nature of the new system. The citizen owns no superior but the State; and the State owes to every citizen, rich or poor, young or old, equal protection and all needful superintendence. The laws of the State are obeyed without hesitation by the citizen, because he sees in them only the embodied will of himself and his fellow-citizens. Hence the strict educational laws of several of the American States, which some persons in this country regard as gross infringements of personal liberty, are cheerfully observed and jealously maintained by those sturdy republicans. Our own country is at present in a transition state. We have just outgrown the semi-barbarous system of feudalism, which was only the latest form of government by chiefs; and we have not yet learned to appreciate the complete method of government by the State. The ignorant masses are consequently left at this period more entirely without control than they have ever been before, or than they are likely to be hereafter. Some may, perhaps, regard their condition as one of enviable freedom. It is, in fact, the lamentable condition of exclusion from the most valuable privileges of citizenship. They are now little better than outcasts. Those who were once their feudal lords and protectors have lost all control over them; and the State has not yet begun to recognise their claims upon it. As the State thus fails in its duty towards them, its neglect is naturally and inevitably punished by the growth of a degraded and dangerous class, which is to the community what a disease is to the human body—an indication of a bad regimen. The only effectual remedy for the evil will be found in the discharge, by the State, of its duties of guardianship and instruction towards this hitherto neglected class of its citizens.

UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

The public are indebted to Mr. Heywood for a useful digest of the Report of the Oxford University Commissioners.* Were blue books more available for circulation, he might have spared his editorial labours; but those uncomfortable, unwieldy volumes, which form the text books of Mr. Hume and the "independent members," are so obviously intended to lock up the treasures they profess to reveal, that we are glad indeed to obtain the substance of Mr. Stanley's labours, in a readable shape. It is only by giving vent and circulation to the truth, that any of these recommendations are ever likely to make head against the tide of opposition they will have to encounter; and that object, we hope, will be furthered by the publication now before us.

Mr. Heywood has confined himself chiefly to the learned city on the banks of the Isis, leaving her younger sister for the present in undisturbed repose. And rightly so; for Oxford is the stronghold of the system—the very symbol and citadel of college supremacy and university grievance. Manifestly the country was entitled to know the truth about Oxford; and to get it in some authentic shape, clear and credible, this commission was appointed. We had enough of flying rumours and floating suspicions, eulogy and obloquy, the rodomontade of enthusiastic bachelors, and the withering contempt of utilitarian philosophers. No previous information had sufficient guarantee for its unbiassed accuracy. Huber's was a good book; but his German stand-point was enough to damage his general credit; while the light artillery of flippant pamphlets, and the fond reminiscences of country rectors made neither a general nor wholesome impression on the public mind. Thus left with no acknowledged authority to which we might appeal, men judged of Oxford differently according as they viewed it from a different angle; and the cameleon disputation was not more varied, dogmatic, and honest. To the learned it was simply the seat of the Bodleian and the Radcliffe—to the student it was the type of lettered ease and cloistered seclusion—to the archæologist it was a monumental history of mediæval architecture—to the high-churchman, it was the grand ecclesiastical nursery—to the evangelical, a hot-bed of Puseyisms—to the dissenter, a nest of unclean birds—to fathers, it was a rueful emblem of unconscionable bills, and ne'er-do-well spendthrifts, who mingled Greek and slang with champagne and cigars—to the "fast man," it was redolent of boating, betting, prayers, and rustications—to the fellow, it was the dispenser of fat livings—to the conservative M.P.'s, it was the bulwark of the constitution, and to the new school of economists, it was a sheer waste of £150,000 a year. One would have it to be a fountain of living water, irrigating the country with purest streams of learning and piety; while another deemed it no better than a dead stagnant pool, not fit for a beast to drink at, and gendering nothing but mental agues, cramps, and fevers of the worst type. Besides these, indeed, there were some few who did not think that England was quite prepared to turn those ancient seminaries either into spinning mills, or mechanics' institutes, and who, at the same time, had a shrewd suspicion that they were not exactly keeping pace either with the educational progress or intellectual wants of the age. These men admitted, that like their fine old halls and colleges, there was something antique and inconvenient in their teachings; that there was need of scientific ventilation in their cloisters; only they would have it done daintily, lovingly, and by no profane hand of laic or revolutionist. Alma Mater might be getting old-fashioned; but let the dear old mother be reformed with reverence: and surely they were right. A university should keep pace with the wants of the time; but it should not be a mere creature of the time. Cotton-spinning Lancashire may get on without Greek; but not so all England; and it were a pity that the temporary prevalence of any class of opinions should hurry the calm and tranquil march that ought to characterise these institutes of learning. For these reasons, therefore, it was meet to examine well, ere we proceeded to act; and hence this commission to inquire into the alleged evils of our university system, and to learn whether they be chronic or curable by legislative enactment.

It were hardly possible, with a Bramah press of ingenious condensation, to give even a tolerable idea of the various materials now submitted to us in this Report. The Commissioners went about their work, we think, with a creditable patience and courtesy; yet several of the Colleges, Magdalen especially, returned to their questions only a cartel of indignant defiance. Magdalen had played the martyr in the days of the tyrant James; and her "dons" were still prepared to show that "even in her ashes lived their wonted fires." Unhappily they were born a century and a half too late. The age is in too great a hurry, and has no time to put the learned doctor into "the boots," or to squeeze out answers with the blood from under his finger nails. It is really a pity for modern hagiology; but one way or other, enough has oozed out for our purpose, without applying the torture to any one member of the devoted hebdomadal board.

The bill of fare we have thus got is by no means inviting; almost it will justify the sneers of the most sardonic, and all the lamentations of the orthodox. Everybody knew before that these institutions were so wofully exclusive that they could not be called national, but rather ecclesiastical establishments. But we are sure it will astonish more than one to learn that, while we have many colleges, we have really no such thing as a university in England. The university, in fact, has been utterly swamped by the schools, and the professors swallowed by the tutors; like the fat kine in Pharaoh's vision, devoured by their lean successors, who remained for all their repast just as lean as they were. We confess that this is, in our estimation, one of the worst features of the case. The Scotch Universities, diverging from their original character in the opposite direction, are now little other than "lecture-rooms," as Coleridge was wont to style the Gower-street academy. This is to be regretted, especially when we consider the manifold imperfections of the preliminary grammar schools. But, on the other hand, with such admirable foundations as Eton, and Rugby, and Harrow, to ground our English youth in elementary knowledge, it is quite evident that the tutorial system is miserably incompetent to interest our studious lads, or carry them forward to those new fields of inquiry on which their ardent minds are longing to enter. An university, in fact, is the very thing we require, and the very thing we have not. We have good schools of the higher class over all England, as well as in Oxford and Cambridge; but we have no seat of learning, where scholars, divines, and philosophers can promulgate to an intelligent audience the lofty results of their reading and their thought. In fact, the only thing of this kind we have had in England these many years, has been the literary coteries—the groups of wondering admirers who listened to the Coleridge monodies drawled out by him of the godlike forehead, as he sat in Mr. Gilman's front parlour at Highgate; or the bold revolutionary spirits who surround the uneasy chair of the grim, sardonic, eloquent prophet who preaches in camel's hair girdle in the region about Chelsea. Clearly it is not meet that England should have nothing but these very private and perilous universities. This is too great a power to be idly thrown away. The tutorial system goes like a gin-horse along the old beaten path of examination-papers; good in itself, doubtless, but not the whole, and not nearly all that a man needs in his daily working life. Learning, as tutors teach it, is cramped within an outer shell and makes no growth, or at least not easily; it is fixed by the tradition of the schools, and use and wont of examiners; ending, sooner or later, in gross cramming, not digested, nor digestible. This is plainly visible in the Commissioners' Report, sometimes in their recommendations, as often in their significant silence. We are glad, therefore, to find them urging the revival of the University—the appointment of four different faculties—the independence of students, so that they shall not be obliged to enter any college or hall; and we trust that an attendance on these lectures will be enforced, so that we may no longer find Bucklands discoursing to empty benches, and Stephenses prelecting to the vacant air.

This absorption of the University in the Colleges accounts in part for the lamentable falling off in the number of students. It is not that learning is in disrepute, but that a lad going from any of our preparatory schools finds the work of the College so easy or so uninteresting that he is led often into loose habits which the proctor cannot prevent unless he provide some occupation for his mind. Tavern bills, tradesmen's bills, long credits, and police courts, have made fathers chary; and so the thirty thousand students who haunted Oxford in the days of Wycliffe have sunk to a mere fraction, to the general detriment of professional learning. Another cause of this, too, is no doubt the malversation of moneys devoted originally to the maintenance of poor scholars in the Colleges. Now, the Colleges in fact educate very few; what teaching there is, is done mainly in the Halls. Magdalen, with all its wealth, had in 1842 only thirteen undergraduates, and All Souls four. Though destined originally for poor scholars, these rich foundations are almost entirely appropriated by commoners, their surplus funds being either divided at the year's end, or going to purchase advowsons for behoof of the fellows, and for increasing the power of Oxford over the Church. The Commissioners admit that only a mere moiety of the College income is appropriated to the objects for which it was left by the founder, and thus the poor are defrauded, and learning is stunted, and a plain man is puzzled to find a reason for supporting fourteen learned divines in order to instruct four students in letters and good morals. Even Mr. Gladstone must be ready to admit that this needs to be amended; even Sir R. H. Inglis will hardly say that all the splendid names of the Athenæ Oxonienses can cover with their mantle this time-honoured abuse—nay, we could almost vouch for it that Col. Sibthorpe himself will grant that the Hyde Park Bazaar was hardly a greater sin against the honour of Old England.

What then is to be done? what does the Commission recommend? They certainly do not propose any very sweeping revolutionary measure; and on the whole we are glad they do not; for though there are many cobwebs to brush away, yet a partial measure of reform is more likely to be carried than one whose very excellence would defeat its own object. Oxford is hedged round with many sacred prejudices. She has many devoted sons sworn to maintain her statutes inviolable. We must therefore be aware how we arouse their antagonism. Let us take what we can get now; it will be a sure earnest of more hereafter. If reformers will be moderate they will get, some day, all their hearts' desire. And the best proof of this is the fact that the Commission of reverends, very reverends, and right reverends, have not shrunk from pointing the finger of observation to the great origo mali, the excessive ecclesiastical influence that pervades every branch of these learned institutions. This, it is honestly and manfully admitted, has turned Oxford into an ecclesiastical seminary instead of a national university. This has cramped the spirit of freedom which, as Huber justly says, is the very essence of mental life. We do not say that among our learned divines we shall not find on the whole the best teachers of youth—we do not say that the Church of England should not have in Oxford a thorough faculty of theology for training her ministry according to her articles—nay, we are not even disposed to urge, for the present at least, the entire abolition of tests as applied to the teachers in our Universities. But why should dons and fellows, professors and tutors, be all in deacon's or priestly orders, as if none but the clergy were fit to teach the elements of Euclid or to construe a classic author? Why should a generous student who feels no call to the ministry be denied all the benefit of that lettered leisure and independence which the fellowships were intended to afford? Why should these prizes of good scholarship be turned into a porch for our Protestant Temple? And above all, why should a lad sixteen years old be required to sign a formula of forty-two stiff and disputed articles, ere you will undertake to instruct him in his Greek accidence? This is the nightmare of Oxford, which is riding her to death. With all the exclusiveness of Romanism, the University was more free in the middle ages than ever it has been since. Wycliffe might be a heretic, but he was still head of his College, and a teacher there for years. There was freedom, at least, for every youth to study there, whatever his creed might be, down to the times of our English Solomon and "the Holy Father," as Oxford was wont to address her Chancellor Laud. Whitgift, indeed, had already begun the warfare against Puritans; but the system was still, on the whole, such as a free spirit could breathe in till the close, sultry days of the last Canterbury martyr, whose head, of all things, was the last that the Commonwealth should have grudged him. Since those days the city of Wykeham and Anthony A. Wood has been "thirled," as they say in Scotland, to bring all her grist to the episcopal mill. Surely of all monopolies this is the most disgraceful and nonsensical; for even granting that dissent is a very wicked thing, it can surely be none the worse of Oxford commons and patristic Greek. If ignorance be the mother of schism, why not heal breaches by vouchsafing the requisite learning? Or must we first be converted, and then hear the reasons? Is it fair or wise to put every raw Etonian or Christ-church boy into this Procrustes' bed of Anglican orthodoxy? Good men, I dare say, may be afraid of Puritan professors and Jesuit tutors; but surely those racing, boating, or reading lads, brimful of animal spirits, college dignity, or "bishop," may be trusted for any dangerous theological opinions that can possibly lurk under their square skull-caps. Perhaps Dissenters would not avail themselves of the privilege —perhaps in existing circumstances they should not; but, at all events, our universities must get rid of this wretched exclusiveness, which savours more of old ecclesiastical bigotries than is meet for the nineteenth century. Until these narrow limitations be removed, it is hopeless to expect that they can regain their ancient fame, or see their cloisters thronged by a concourse of aspiring youths. That the commission has not applied a very stringent principle to those grievances is true; but they have not overlooked them. They propose to open these seminaries absolutely to every youth under nineteen, so that all shall be equally entitled to their scholarships and honours —they recommend that fellows should be freed from any obligation to enter into holy orders—that similar restrictions on the appointment of professors should also be removed; and, altogether, we think there is a combined wisdom and moderation in their proposed reforms, which should commend them to the good sense of the country, and to which the Universities, if they be wise, will give their assent now, lest other and ruder hands may be laid to the work. If Parliament and the country sanction their labours, we shall once more have a free and national University, a quiet retreat for learning amid the din of railways and spinning jennies; and we shall be freed also from the old reproach, that with all our practical science we had no philosophical instructors except the peripatetic sages who perambulate our Athenæums with a black board and a bit of chalk, and a fluent facility to astonish the shop-boys.

ON CANT.

Few persons who are accustomed to watch the progress of human thought as exhibited in the page of history, can have failed to notice the embarrassment into which the supporters of conflicting opinions are ever and anon involved, and the summary way in which a beaten antagonist sometimes endeavours to relieve himself of any further share in an argumentative contest, by proclaiming his victor unworthy or unfit to be reasoned with. For instance, the dormant intellect of the middle ages, regarded it as an unquestionable truth, that the globe we inhabit was the fixed centre round which all the heavenly bodies performed their diurnal revolutions: and as the philosophical and religious teachers of those days were one and the same class of persons, and whose opinions were subject to the revisal of a supposed infallible head, that head being the Pope, it required no small courage on the part of those who detected the absurdity of the ancient hypothesis to make known their new convictions. Nevertheless, the astronomical phenomena daily passing under their observation, were utterly inexplicable on that hypothesis, while on the other hand, a rational explanation of those phenomena was daily becoming more imperatively necessary. Hence, some of the bolder spirits of the time determined on the adoption of a new hypothesis, wherein the idea of central immobility was transferred from the earth to the sun. This was in direct contradiction to the decrees of the mediæval church, and, as might be expected, fierce was the consequent struggle that ensued. At length, the philosophers having fortified their new position with argument upon argument, observation upon observation, experiment upon experiment, and finding no necessity, nor feeling any inclination, for a surrender, their spiritual antagonists resolved upon availing themselves of the only remaining expedient by which they could hope to retire from the arena with any consciousness of honour, and, at the same time, exhibit their unwavering devotion to their Alma Mater:—with heart and voice they shouted "Heresy!"

And when in a later age the spirit of inquiry had pushed itself so far as to question the propriety of confining within the limits usually assigned to it the period of the world's existence; and demanded the addition of geological ages all but infinite in extent, as a basis on which to found an explanation of the phenomena which every ravine, rock, and ripple, unceasingly presented to its view, many who had followed the light of science thus far, resolved to go no farther. Hereupon another division ensued, the one party taking its stand on the common and limited interpretation of the Mosaic record; the other on an interpretation more liberal. Here, again, the philosophic party won the day: and as it was clear to their more conservative opponents, that the Divine authenticity of that record was thereby impugned, they took to themselves on their retreat such satisfaction as they could find, in bespattering their intellectual victors with the slush of "Deism."

But the time came when the philosophers in their turn were to experience a discomfiture; at least in so far as a large section of them may be taken to represent all who are included under that generic name. They had rushed boldly into the obscure recesses of Nature, and that complaisant old lady had, in answer to their touts and solicitations, yielded up her secrets one after another in rapid succession. Such abundant rewards encouraged further researches, till at length these enthusiastic explorers of the regions of physical science grew weary of that limited field of operation, and dashed forward into the realms of metaphysics and religion, and invaded those territories with whose occupants they had hitherto acted only on the defensive. And here they received a check; the very weakest of their opponents—such as they thought to have crushed more easily than a moth—received their winged and brilliant missiles, without the slightest trepidation, and turned them askant with a calm and dignified "I know." In these regions the most unlettered peasant shrunk not from a volley of philosophic thunderbolts, were he but armed with an "I am persuaded;" nor the weakest woman from legions of sophists if fortified with the "inward witness of the Spirit." So that the invaders have long had their patience and perseverance exhausted, and failing the joys of conquest, solace themselves by annoying the enemy with cries of "Cant!"

Now, singularly enough, we have come to regard much that passes current in these days under the odious cognomen of cant with a very high degree of respect. Not that we like to hear it from the mouths of hypocrites and self-deceivers, or see it made the means of ostentatious display in the hands of the would-be-thought pious; nothing could be more revolting to our taste. But we have a profound conviction that cant in itself consists simply of short practical formulas, by which illiterate and unsophisticated persons regulate their moral life, and excite their religious feeling. That it should be abused and misapplied is only to share the fate of all good things; and those arguments which justify the right use of good things in general, justify the right use of this also. Before this question can be profitably discussed, however, it will be necessary to ascertain and define clearly, what is understood by the term in question; for it is certain that during the last few years the word has been most unscrupulously used as a closure to almost every species of argument in philosophy and religion, in which either party felt himself too weak or too lazy to engage or to protract an intellectual contest. This precaution is the more necessary from the fact, that in gravely sitting down to write a vindication of cant, we cannot but feel we are placing ourselves in a position which must appear superlatively ridiculous to a large majority of general readers.

In order to arrive at the meaning of this or any other word, two things must be taken into account. First, its literal and etymological signification, and secondly, those extensions or limitations which have been effected by conventional usage. Its etymological signification is easily arrived at, since it obviously takes its origin from the Latin cantare, to sing; whence to cant, is simply to say anything in a sing-song manner, and perhaps implies, further, the exercise of but little thought and feeling on what is said. If this be correct, then all sententious expressions, all moral proverbs, and scientific formulæ, may very properly be ranked under this one generic term. It may be, that they all owe their origin to a high order of thought or feeling: but when once that thought and feeling had acquired a verbal embodiment, and had thus assumed the form of an aphorism, formula, or proverb, these latter were ever afterwards used with but a small fraction of that inward emotion to which they are primarily indebted for their existence. But the conventional use of the term is far more limited: for the arithmetician may arrange his problem in "Proportion," and look at his terms with the most awful profundity he pleases, while he runs through his "Multiply the second and third terms together and divide by the first;" or the merchant glibly chant his "Buy in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest;" or the economist his "Take care of the pence, and the pounds," &c: nay, even the moralist may sing "Virtue is its own reward," and no one will ever think of calling any of these things "Cant:" but woe betide the man, who by way of finis to some fruitless theological discussion, informs his philosophising friend, that "These things are spiritually discerned;" for here would be a genuine specimen of what in our day is universally recognised under that offensive name: and the philosopher would recoil with dignified revulsion, that such miserable jargon should be quoted in his hearing, while he paralysed the canting fanatic with glances of withering contempt.

Here, then, we have a definite clue to the conventional signification of a term which is never used but with a view to depreciate the value of the rejoinders of an opponent, and which an opponent rarely hears applied to his rejoinders without an inward sense of mortification and chagrin. How far that mortification may be well-grounded we leave each one to judge for himself; for our own part, we have learned to say, under such circumstances—"Cant! yes, I know it is cant; and I prefer it to a verbose mysticism: there have been seasons when my mind has been wearied with thinking, and my heart overwhelmed with emotion, when, after days and nights of intense spiritual conflict, I have sought for some verbal embodiment in which to incorporate the great leading idea that brought me forth out of that conflict in triumph, and oh! how precious have been the half-dozen or perhaps less number of monosyllables into which the quintessence of so much energetic thought has been compressed. And there have been other times when I sat at the feet of some self-abased but God-exalted minister of the gospel, as he poured forth from his fervid lips brilliant elucidations of scriptural doctrine, or, from his glowing heart the most touching exhibitions of Christian experience, while both the one and the other have been but the natural development of the main idea contained in some short, sententious, and perhaps, hitherto to me half-enigmatical text. Thus it is, that words and phrases which have never been the objects of concentrated thought, or the vehicles of genuine feeling, remain a dead letter, while the same words and phrases, when made the practical embodiment of that thought and feeling, become a living spirit: and whereas they owe their existence to the operation of intellectual and emotional forces of a high order; so they in their turn exert a reflex influence on me, engendering in my own mind and heart spiritual products closely akin to those by which they themselves were begotten. Whether these condensed expressions be called cant, or by any other name, is to me a matter of perfect indifference: I, as an individual, certainly regard them and use them as such."

Now by this circumambulatory process, we arrive by degrees at the chief end and aim of this paper; that is, to discover the sense in which the word "cant" is generally used, and to ascertain how far that contempt with which it is always regarded, is justifiable and appropriate. It might appear that the difficulty would be immediately overcome by reference to some dictionary of good reputation. But nobody looks into a dictionary for such a purpose now-a-days, except school-boys and members of parliament: for it would be about as rational as looking into "Moore's Almanack" to see if it were raining, when a glance out of the window would yield information on that point, far more certain in its character. Proceeding on this principle, we have arrived at this conviction,—That the stigma of "cant" is applied by a large class of persons, 1. To those expressions which make reference to a spiritual, supernatural power, as guiding and controlling the operations of the human mind. 2. To those expressions which make reference to an inward religious experience, and which regard that experience as more powerful to convince the understanding, than any amount of the most elaborate philosophical argumentation; and 3. To those which acknowledge the obligation of a severe practical morality. Not unfrequently, we see the term applied to words and phrases adopted from Holy Scripture, but the hardihood which prompts to such an application is happily comparatively rare. If this classification be correct, then it is obvious that the subject is one which demands illustration rather than definition; and in this spirit therefore our remaining observations shall be conducted.

Taking a glance at two or three dictionaries close at hand, we find that to cant is represented as meaning "to speak in a whining, affected tone," and "to use quaint phrases or peculiar forms of speech with frequency," and so forth. If this definition be accepted, then where can two other men be found who ever canted half so much as our illustrious Coleridge and his celebrated friend Thomas Carlyle? The former uttered all his conversations in a whining, snuffling tone, according to the accounts of those who were much in his company; while the quaint, peculiar, and oft-repeated phraseology of the latter is known to every one who has perused his works. But he would be considered a bold man who deliberately recorded it as his opinion, that the conversations and writings of these men were sheer cant. Lexicographers, therefore, must amend their definition, or sacrifice their authority. But now for an illustration or two of what is cant, according to modern acceptation, and which shall serve as types of most other cases which occur. A poor old widow, who had been beaten down by affliction, temptation, and adversity in its various forms, through a long series of years, was in the habit of comforting herself by incessantly quoting the familiar phrase, "It is all for the best." Now this phrase, the gentle Sterling thought proper to stigmatize as cant; and, as we think, quite correctly. It was cant, if the word have any meaning at all. The chief difference betwixt ourselves and others is, that when used with apparent sincerity, we always hear it with complacency, but they with revulsion. How can it be expected, of the multitudes of poor illiterate creatures who constitute a large proportion of the Church militant, and whose religion is their all, that they should be able to express their fluctuating emotions in elegant and varied language, or even treasure up in the memory a large number of texts and aphorisms for that purpose? A Bible, a Pilgrim's Progress, and a Hymn Book, constitute the entire library of many of them; and the phraseology of these books is all they can venture to use: while the particular texts and phrases selected by different individuals will depend much on the character of the teaching they have had, the worldly circumstances in which they are placed, and other causes too numerous to specify. But when the gist or application of certain texts and phrases has once been fully comprehended or felt, they ever afterwards serve as lode-stars by which the benighted pilgrim directs his course —as rocks to which the shipwrecked mariner may cling in the spiritual tempest—as caskets, from which the sorrow-stricken man may pick the gem of comfort—as weapons, with which the Christian may repel the attacks of the adversaries by which he is unceasingly beset. True, like lode-stars, they may sometimes be gazed on; like rocks, they may be rested on; like caskets, they may be conned; like weapons, they may be wielded, when there is but little necessity for them, and consequently with but little reflection or emotion; nevertheless, their worth is not diminished, and they are as invaluable as ever when the time comes that they are wanted.

Let, therefore, the humble Christian, who has been beaten down with adversity and misfortune, express his resignation and his hope in those familiar aphorisms, "No cross, no crown!" or, "It is a long lane that has no turning." Let him whose life is one perpetual struggle with inward corruptions and carnal propensities, take up the language of his Bible, and acknowledge that "what he would, he does not: but what he hates, that does he." Let him who is assailed by the quibbles of letter-learned sceptics and the verbiage of heady professors, fall back on that knowledge which results from "the Spirit bearing witness with his spirit;" let him who eschews the race-course, the theatre, the ball-room, and the card-table, because of the moral evils which are essentially or accidentally associated with them, repel the sophisms of their advocates with some or any of the mottoes whose value and adaptation his experience has aforetime attested; and though there be those on whom Fortune has smiled, and whose worldly or educational advantages have been greater than those of many of their fellow-creatures, who will apply to such language the epithet now under consideration, and that, not from any appreciation of its propriety, but because it is the most offensive and galling they feel at liberty to use; still, let the faithful and persevering pilgrim feel assured, that when he arrives at the brink of that cold, broad, deep river, which we shall all one day be called to pass over, and when its chilling waters begin to lave his heaving breast, and impart to his very life-blood their own frigidity; when his senses shall grow dim and when his memory shall fail; that the probabilities of a peaceful transit are immensely in favour of that man whose feelings have been educated to expand and soar beyond the limitations of mere verbal expression, or to start into active and vigorous existence at the mere mention or memory of words and phrases in which the highest and holiest emotions of the human breast have been embodied.

And let philosophising and speculative religionists beware how they stigmatize the language of their less favoured brethren with the opprobrium of cant: for to our mind there are few things so cantingly uttered as these unmeaning and lazy declamations against cant. It is a rare thing to hear a cry which indicates such thorough mental imbecility in those who use it; at least with reference to those questions to which it is directed. There is something exceedingly rich in the airs of those coxcombs, who, inflated with the sentimentalism of second-rate novelists and the bombast of aspiring poetasters, think to annihilate the opinion of staid and earnest men by the interjection of a powerless monosyllable: nor is the case greatly superior with those, who, having bewildered themselves in their endeavours to incorporate within the limits of human speech those transcendental ideas and emotions to which no articulate language is adequate, and seeing the facility with which illiterate men represent rather than express such ideas and emotions, gratify their pride and self-conceit by an ostentatious assertion of their hatred to cant.

Finally, let us not be understood as defending the use of that boisterous and unbecoming form of language more properly denominated rant: nor on the other hand, that vulgar use of the metaphor and metonomy, more correctly called, slang. To both we feel an intense dislike. But it would not be difficult to show, were the result worth the effort, that both these forms of speech have frequently been confounded with, and called by the name of, cant, by writers of great respectability. And while we thus point out what, in this article we do not attempt to defend, let us reiterate what we do aim to establish. It may be thus summed up:—That the term Cant has of late years, and by persons of great talent and influence, been applied to forms of speech and modes of expression quite different from those to which it was formerly deemed appropriate: and that the forms and modes to which it has latterly been applied by such persons, are by no means reprehensible or even objectionable. On the contrary, we have endeavoured to show the superiority of cant—taking the word in its present conventional signification, as well as in its etymological meaning—as a vehicle for the communication of elevated thought and sentiment, or as a means of representing those transcendental ideas which are beyond the scope of human speech, but which, notwithstanding, we may wish to impart to others.

AN APPEAL.

BY CALDER CAMPBELL.

Bear with me, for my heart is full—
I've had a heavy care to-day;
Though old and worn, I cannot school
My foolish tongue a part to play:
I cannot still the fevered pulse,
Nor feign a quiet, now unknown;
And thus I show what none should know
But thou—or God alone!

Air! give me air! my soul wants air,
And sickens 'midst this mass of stone;
The sunshine hath a light less fair,
It looks such ghastly sights upon!
The stifling breaths of wearied crowds,
The vapours, borne from court and lane,
Where famine pines and fever shrouds,
Affect my very brain!

What woe, what pain, what want, are here—
What crime, so oft the child of want!
The blow that wakes a dastard's fear—
The fear that wakes a woman's taunt!
I seem to feel them now as if
Some giant's hand had launched them all
In one huge knot, red, fiery hot,
Upon my head to fall!

I heard a mother chide her child
For craving what she could not give—
I heard a husband, fierce and wild,
Command his wife, that he might live,
To yield her honour!—Out, alas!
I dare not tell the things I heard:—
They hiss like adders in the grass,
With venom in each word!

And every sight and sound of woe
Add to the burden on my breast,—
Mine own sad weight of care, which no
Kind hand hath power away to wrest!
So, if my tongue speak bitter things
To those around me, as to thee,
I know that they will count the stings
And pay them back to me!

For them I care not! but thy heart
Hath borne so meekly—ah! I've said
That I would not one pang impart,
Nor cause thee one more tear to shed:—
Bear with me, then, if word or look
Convey upbraidings never meant;
Thou canst not study Kindness' book,
And call it time mispent!

POLITICAL REGISTER.

DOMESTIC.

On the 10th of last month Parliament reassembled, and the new Ministry at once commenced work. In the House of Commons Lord John Russell announced in the briefest possible terms, the course of policy which the Government had determined to pursue. As was generally expected, the promised Reform Bill is to be put off till next session, on the ground that, if now introduced, it would engross the whole attention of the Legislature, to the exclusion of other important subjects, which require immediate consideration. The delay, moreover, is requisite to give time for preparing a measure of reform, "that shall prevent for many years to come, the necessity of again legislating upon it." But "immediately after the commencement of the next session of Parliament, it will be the imperative duty of the Government to introduce a measure upon this important subject." The business with which the Government propose to occupy the present session comprises a bill to enable the Legislature of Canada to dispose of the Clergy Reserves in that colony; a pilotage bill, with other measures for the benefit of the shipping interest; the removal of the Jewish disabilities; proposals tending to promote the cause of education, both in England and in Scotland; a proposition respecting the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; the discontinuance of transportation to Australia, and a change in the present system of secondary punishments; measures for the improvement of the law, and more especially one to settle finally, if possible, the "agitated question" of land-tenure in Ireland. If, moreover, the investigations of the election committees should show that any measure is necessary for the prevention of bribery and corruption, an effort will be made to effect this object. The budget is to be brought forward immediately after Easter; and this announcement was expressed in terms which seem to indicate that some attempt will be made to readjust the income-tax.

This explanation of the Ministerial policy has, on the whole, been well received. The propriety of postponing the consideration of the proposed Reform Bill is generally admitted. This acquiescence, however, does not proceed from any lack of interest in the subject. At the general election, and still more at the late re-elections, the public feeling on this point was manifested with a strength which evidently took some experienced politicians by surprise. There could not be a greater mistake than to suppose that the present political calm results from popular indifference to the defects of our representative system. It arises, in part, from the confidence generally felt in the fair intentions of the present Ministers, and a consequent willingness to defer to their judgment in regard to the most suitable time for introducing the promised measure. But in part it must also be ascribed to the peculiar interest which foreign affairs possess at the present moment. This interest is undoubtedly greater, for the people of this country, than it has been at any former period since the close of the last European war. In and out of Parliament, discussions relative to questions of national defence, of foreign policy, and of political or religious sympathy with the oppressed people of various continental states, take precedence of all others. The differences of opinion on these points serve rather to increase than to diminish the interest which is felt in them. While the public mind is engrossed with these extraneous topics, it is clear that questions of domestic policy cannot receive that amount of attention which they would obtain under ordinary circumstances. Considering the rapid changes which have taken place within the last few months, not only on the Continent, but in the state of opinion at home, there is reason to expect that before the close of the year all apprehensions of a collision with any foreign power will have subsided; and it is by no means unlikely that the re-establishment of constitutional liberty in France may come, by that time, to lend an additional impulse to the demand for representative reform in this country.

The various subjects with which the Government propose to deal, will certainly afford ample work for the session. One of them—the question of national education—is not less important than the question of Parliamentary Reform. The result, however, will probably show that any great improvement in the existing educational system must follow a reform in the representation, instead of preceding it. There can be no doubt that the members of the present Administration are sincere in their desire to promote the cause of education; and, probably, a majority of the House of Commons would support them in carrying a much more comprehensive measure than has yet been attempted. But this majority will be too small, and its support too feeble, to overcome the opposition which must be expected in the other branch of the Legislature. A remarkable foretaste of what may be expected from that quarter has already been given. Lord John Russell, in announcing the intended discontinuance of convict transportation, justly observed, that this determination would render the diffusion of education among the people more necessary than ever, as a means of preventing crime. No sooner, however, was this proposition announced, than the alarm in the Upper House was vividly manifested, and with evident reason. If all criminals are to be retained in this country, it is quite clear that, as Lord John Russell intimated, a thorough system of national education will become a necessity. But when the people of Great Britain are all as well educated as those of Germany or the United States, what will become of the Game Laws?—of the Law of Entail?—of the privilege of Primogeniture?—and of other equally unjust and unreasonable laws? So strongly were their lordships' minds agitated by the vague presentiment of coming evil, that the Duke of Newcastle was obliged to soothe them by the assurance that the Government did not propose to put a stop to transportation altogether, but only to discontinue it to Van Diemen's Land. Convicts will still be sent to Western Australia for a limited time, as a means of "benefiting the colonists!" That so enlightened a statesman as the Duke of Newcastle can believe that this pernicious and corrupting system will really benefit the colonists, is quite incredible. The phrase was evidently given at random. But it is clear that Ministers are not prepared at present to press any measure which is likely to meet with a decided opposition in the House of Lords. Under present circumstances, and until the time comes for bringing forward the Reform Bill, this cautious policy is perhaps judicious. But, at the same time, it evidently tends to diminish the likelihood that any very beneficial legislation will be achieved during the present session.

COLONIES AND DEPENDENCIES.

Pegu has been annexed, by vice-regal proclamation, to our East Indian dominions, and the Burmese monarch has been warned that unless he submits quietly to this arrangement,—which he is not at all likely to do,—the remainder of his kingdom will share the same fate. It may, then, be taken for granted that within a brief period the whole of Burmah will be under British rule. A great diversity of opinion prevails in reference to the propriety and utility of this procedure. Some object to it because the country is likely to prove an unprofitable acquisition, being probably too poor to defray the expense of its civil administration, on the costly scale now customary in India. Others question the correctness of this conclusion, or maintain that, at all events, the benefits which the inhabitants will derive from our government should compensate for all other disadvantages. On the other hand, it is affirmed that our government in India is in reality so oppressive, and so obnoxious to the natives, that they are continually seeking to escape from it into the territories of the few princes who still retain some authority. These are questions which it is most important to have decided; for it is clear that if we cannot make our government in the East more beneficial to the people than that of their native sovereigns, we have no business as rulers in that part of the world at all. The contrary opinion may have prevailed in days when the slave-trade was a lawful and respectable branch of commerce; but public sentiment will no longer tolerate any system which is believed to be based upon oppression. Unless the inquiries of the Committee on East Indian Government should satisfy the country that our administration is really advantageous to the people of India, it will be impossible for the existing system to be maintained.

The evil consequences of the hasty and reckless manner in which emigration to the gold colonies has proceeded are beginning to manifest themselves. Recent advices describe the condition of the newly-arrived emigrants in Melbourne as most deplorable. The town was already over-crowded. Many were unable to procure lodgings, or even the humblest shelter; and not a few were dependent on the charity of the inhabitants for the means of subsistence. Yet new-comers were arriving by hundreds, almost daily, to increase the destitute multitude. The knowledge of this state of things ought at least to deter intending emigrants in this country from directing their course to that colony at the present time.

FOREIGN.

The French Emperor has convened the puppets of his mock Parliament, and has repeated to them those pacific professions which on a former occasion found so little credence either in or out of France. Nothing which Louis Napoleon can now say will be believed on his mere assertion. Still the earnestness with which he declares his peaceful intentions shows at least his conviction that such a policy will be popular with the French people. It is true that so long as he retains his arbitrary power he must be a dangerous neighbour; but there is every reason to expect that if the French people are left by foreign powers to deal with him in their own way, their reviving spirit will before long put an end to that extraordinary condition of affairs in which this danger originates.

An abortive attempt at insurrection in Lombardy has cost several lives, and has only served to tighten the bonds of tyranny by which that unhappy country is at once tortured and rendered helpless; but the cord, now strained to the utmost, will one day snap, and the prisoner be free. Italy will yet recover that civic freedom, of which she has twice, in distant ages, given the example to Europe.

LITERATURE.

Freedom and Independence for the Golden Lands of Australia; the Right of the Colonies, and the Interest of Britain and of the World. By John Dunmore Lang, D.D., A.M. London: Longman, Brown, Green, and Longmans. 1852.

An Historical and Statistical Account of New South Wales; including a Visit to the Gold Regions, and a Description of the Mines; with an Estimate of the probable Results of the Great Discovery. By John Dunmore Lang, D.D., A.M. Third Edition. Bringing down the History of the Colony to the First of July, 1852. In Two Volumes. London: Longman and Co. 1852.

In the first of these works Dr. Lang advocates the separation of the Australian Colonies from the parent state and their erection into an independent republic. After setting forth what he conceives to be the rights of the colonies, he proceeds to dispose of such objections as may be urged by parties opposed to their recognition. This he does in a very summary way and in a style of argument much more acrimonious than convincing;—in short we are not convinced by his reasoning of anything so much as of the danger of making a premature experiment under such sanguine and unreflecting guidance. But, however, it appears further on, that no alternative is left to this country but to submit to the loss of the colonies, who will sever themselves from the mother country without the sanction of the Home Government, if that is withheld much longer. The doctor declares that the discovery of the gold regions has virtually done the business already; and he hints darkly at symptoms of insurrection ready to burst forth into open rebellion should the rights he claims for the colonists be denied or much longer delayed. We can see no cause for seconding these alarms; the doctor's fears, or it may be his hopes, have magnified events, and led him to the expression of a false prophecy. That these colonies, as well as others, have long been grievously misgoverned we are perfectly aware; but the career of misgovernment, we trust, is drawing to a close under the policy of the new Administration. As to the advantages anticipated from the proposed independence of Australia, there is no reason upon earth why those who are to reap them should wait for that event—and judging from the thousands continually swarming to that favoured region, this opinion at least does not want countenance.

The "Historical Statement" is a new and enlarged edition of a work which has been some years before the public, and which contains something like a history of the colony from the first discovery of New Holland, at the commencement of the seventeenth century, down to last midsummer. The first volume is divided into a series of records of the transactions as well of the people as their rulers, under the reigns of the several governors, from Governor Phillip down to Governor Fitzroy, which latter gentleman, especially, is not bound in gratitude to compliment Mr. Lang upon his labours. The materials for this history have been industriously collated, and judiciously made use of, and no circumstance of importance affecting the colony has been omitted. It is to be regretted, however, that so much space, or indeed any space at all, has been devoted to the perpetuation of paltry and scandalous matters, for the gratification of mere personal resentments. The republication, too, of the doctor's libel upon Mr. Icely, for which he was fined and imprisoned in Australia, appears to us anything but prudent—seeing that from the writer's own statement the publication was clearly unjustifiable in the first instance. From the many interesting particulars in the early history of the colony we extract the following account of the last days of poor Muir, who, as every one knows, was transported in 1793, by an illegal sentence of the Scottish court, for attempting to procure a reform in Parliament:—

His case having excited a deep interest in America, the Otter, an American vessel bound for the north-west coast of that continent, was hired by certain gentlemen in Philadelphia or New York to touch at Port Jackson, for the express purpose of carrying him off from the colony. The plan proved successful; and, on effecting his escape, Mr. Muir left a letter to the Governor, stating that he did not intend to infringe the laws of his country by returning to Great Britain, but that he would endeavour to reach America, where he would practise as a barrister till the expiration of his sentence should allow of his returning to Scotland. The Otter was unfortunately wrecked on the west coast of America, to the northward of California; but Mr. Muir was fortunate enough, after suffering much hardship and privation, in travelling along the coast, to reach the city of Mexico, from whence he obtained a passage to Europe in a Spanish frigate. The frigate was fallen in with, however, by a British man of war, off Cadiz; and in the action that ensued and that issued in the capture of the frigate, Mr. Muir was dangerously wounded, part of his brain being actually shot away. In this condition, and when lying apparently dead on the deck of the frigate, he was accidentally recognised by a Scotch officer, who had previously known him, from a small pocket bible which had been given him by his mother, and which he held in his hand with the grasp of death. The officer humanely concealed the circumstance, but had him conveyed to an hospital on the Spanish coast, where every attention was paid him, and where he recovered sufficiently to enable him to proceed to Paris, on the invitation of the French Government, where he was treated with the most marked attention. He died, however, shortly after—I believe in consequence of his wound.

The second volume of the Historical Statement comprises the geography and physical characteristics of the country, its natural and agricultural productions, its population, its means of irrigation, its gold fields, and their social, moral, and political results—the prospects the country holds out to emigrants—the moral and religious condition of the inhabitants—the state of education—and the probable future of the colony. Upon all these topics the Doctor is well informed, and writes agreeably. He visits the diggings, graphically describes their labours, and reports the sermons which he preached to the diggers; and he supplies a vast deal of information calculated to be useful to intending emigrants. His hopes of success in the future appear, however, to be all bound up with his own plan for the immediate severance and independence of his adopted country. If this be refused, insurrection and bloodshed, according to him, will speedily obtain it by force.

For (says he) with the large and somewhat questionable addition that will ere long be made to our colonial population—Chartists in tens of thousands, from Birmingham and elsewhere; French adventurers fresh fron the Barricades of Paris (!) with some Albert ouvrier, at their head, and sympathizers in whole troops from California, with their bowie-knives and revolvers all ready—it will be comparatively easy, in the event of any such collision with the imbecile authorities of the Colony, as may occur at any moment, for a few able and determined men to bring the whole existing system of colonial usurpation and misgovernment to a sudden close. In that event, there are certain Acts of Parliament—including the so-called Constitutional Act of 1850, and Earl Grey's Squatting Act of 1846, with the Orders in Council, with which the latter Act was supplemented in 1847—of which the colonists will in all likelihood make a public bonfire in the midst of their capital: and, as the hated Documents—the badges of an ignominious bondage—crumple up and are annihilated in the flames, they will rend the welkin with their loud huzzas for the freedom and independence of Australia.

These volumes are characterized throughout by that acrid style of eloquence peculiar to the author, who appears never to be satisfied, unless he has everything his own way. He has laboured hard and suffered much, according to his own report, in the cause of Australia; but it is evident that his labours might have been much more efficient and his sufferings infinitely less, had he united the suaviter in modo, of which he appears to possess not an atom, with the fortiter in re. In that case his works need not have been overloaded with so much apologetic and egotistic matter, without which they would be all the more agreeable to the reader.

Claverston. A Tale. Showing how there was a living Skeleton in James Nicol's House; how it haunted him; and how it was laid. By Chas. Mitchell Charles. London: Saunders and Otley. 1853.

There is no living English author, whatever his reputation, who need be ashamed of having written such a work as this. Not that it is by any means a finished production; it was probably never intended as such; but as a sketch, it is original and masterly in design, and in execution shows the vigour of a youthful artist confident in his powers and possessing powers worthy of his confidence. The "Skeleton in the house" is the remorseful consciousness of a deep and deadly crime committed in an hour of sore temptation—the fatal remembrance of which blasts the entire life of the perpetrator, and blights for a time the cherished hopes of his only son. The spectre is laid by the kindly hand of a love more than sisterly, pointing the sufferer to a Divine promise. The iniquities of the father are not visited upon the child, and he finds peace and happiness, where others find it, in the path of duty and the reciprocations of an honourable affection. The story, which we need not repeat, is told in a manner exceedingly natural, occasionally humorous, and with a quiet sort of vivacity, characteristic of the writer. He touches incidentally upon various subjects, handling some with a cool kind of satire suggestive of a capability that way which it might not be desirable to provoke—and others with a discriminating judgment whose verdict there is no gainsaying. We shall give an example of both.

The following is a neat thrust at a well-known congregation of boobies and their leader:

"Have you ever thought," said De Laming, "what organs would be necessary for the digestion of that nutriment; I mean, air? The creature subsisting on it can never, for instance, experience the delightful sensation of Hunger. He must always be full, you know; for where air is not, there is a vacuum, and if he were not full he would collapse—wouldn't he?" . . . "I can't answer," I said; "I never thought of the matter. But I have often wondered what sort of mental digestive organs those people have who feed their minds upon air; spiritual chameleons, you may call them. I was lately at a church-chapel near Rathbone-place, which was filled with such. The minister puffs himself to no end—the merest windbag on the town; and his crowded audience suck in his wind as fast as they can get supplied with it. Can you explain that? Can any human mind live on wind, and such wind as his?"

"I know the congregation you refer to," said Emma. "But surely you would not consider their minds as living at all. They only make believe to do it, just as their perfumed preacher makes believe to think. The whole thing is a sham."

The next extract on the Copyright question is worthy the attention of literary men.

"What do you think," said Emma, "of this international copyright so much clamoured for between England and America?"

"Of course I'm for protecting our own authors," he answered.

"Should you not put it the other way," exclaimed James Nicol, from the other end of the room, . . . "and give American authors protection?"

"What's that?" cried De Laming. "Protect Americans and not ourselves?"

"Hout, mon," said Mc Gregor, "ye'll just go on wi' yere freedoms and sacrifices to foreigners till ye've naething left ye to protect. What for Americans, and no us?"

"I would have both protected," he answered. "But instead of agitating to get protection for ourselves—I mean as a motive—I would rather put it the other way, and give them protection. Our authors care more for the English public than for any other, and if American writers were protected, their works would not crowd our book-marts at absurdly cheap prices, or receive the preference from publishers because the authors are not to be paid,—to the partial exclusion of English books. The same principle would doubtless operate beyond the Atlantic now that there are some authors in America; but I say our real interests tell us to protect Americans here whether they reciprocate or not. Put us on equal terms with American writers, and we don't much fear competition with them as regards our own public."

Few persons, we imagine, who have had anything to do with literature as a profession, will deny the practical value of the above suggestion. Since the advent of Uncle Tom, whose universal circulation must have diverted some tens of thousands of pounds from the pockets of English authors, everything American, no matter how good or how rubbishy, is caught up and published, because Uncle Tom has brought fifty new publishers into the market, not a tithe of whom ever intend to pay a penny for copyright.

We must make room for another brief extract, which will introduce the heroine of the story to the reader in her intellectual stature.

She had read much, and, far better, thought much. Her mind had turned the produce of other minds to its own uses; a reader's true business. It is not by cramming that we get understanding. And she did not adopt teaching because it was orthodox, or because it was approved; she criticised everything in the true sense of the word. She judged her authors, re-creating their thoughts. Nothing really lives but what first dies; the truths which are sown "bare grain," die in the soul, before they spring up into glorious harvest. And all sorts of authors had contributed their seeds to her fertile mind.

We spoke of this Roman non-catholicism, and she expressed what had often occurred to me during the late excitement about the assumed ecclesiastical titles.

"It seems to me very humiliating," she said, "that after these last centuries of comparative intellectual independence, we are forced to bring out the very same weapons which our ancesters wielded against the king of darkness! A severe wound to intellectual pride, I think—it shows, I mean, that intellectual superiority does not necessarily imply spiritual superiority. What an anomaly, that this Roman machinery for destroying freedom should find free men to assist its efforts!"

"We here in London are living," said James Nicol, "in the very heart of the civilised and intellectual world. We are like engineers in a locomotive; but we have been so absorbed with our engine, that we have forgotten to notice that the train is left behind. It is indeed humiliating to see those antiquated delusions obtaining here again, especially when we find them in almost the same clothing as of old. But, if we had taken a little care with the couplers and the side-chains,—seen that the train was fastened to us, and the people speeding forward as quickly as ourselves, Rome would have been 'no-where,' in sporting phrase, long since. But a dray will beat an express if the engine has left it. Look at the ignorant herd that have run for refuge to Joe Smith. The fault is ours—who have neglected to educate the masses—who understand engine-driving, and only drive ourselves."

We may contrast this intellectual portrait of a young lady with a sketch in "body colours" of an old one.

Mrs. De Laming was very ancient and very stout. . . . . Her face testified to apoplexy; her dumpy arms, and hands, and neck, were all unanimously prophetic of apoplexy. Unless drowned, or run over, or cut off in some other unnatural way, this would terminate her career. I saw it at a glance. Her body was too big for her skin; her hand when I shook it felt stiff and lumpy, as though a tight cord round her arm kept the blood in it. It would have been a relief to have bled her. She wore those wiry old grey curls at the sides of her forehead, which adorn none but the very oldest-fashioned of women now. I knew them to be false. She had a blue paper box for them, long, and like a coffin. I knew all about them as well as if she had plucked off her dark cap, and showed me the machinery, or ordered the blue paper box to be brought down stairs.

The faults in this most interesting story are chiefly those of hastiness as well in the formation of the plot, as in the execution; but they are not many, or very great. There are a few characters and incidents too which have not much, if anything, to do with the progress of the drama; still they are not in the way, and though they might be spared we should not ourselves vote for their banishment. We know not whether "Claverston" will be extensively read; but we may safely predicate that those who read it once will be very likely to read it twice.

The Fine Arts, their Nature and Relations. By M. GUIZOT. Translated, with the assistance of the Author, by GEORGE GROVE. With Illustrations Drawn on Wood by George Scharf, jun. London: Thomas Bosworth. 1853.

A WORK upon the subject of art by such a writer as M. Guizot, may be looked upon as a novelty in literature; it does not, however, broach any novel views, nor does it enter very deeply into the matter, the writer being neither a connoisseur, in the usual sense of the term, nor much of an enthusiast in the cause of art. He is simply a man of genius fully susceptible of all such impressions as genius in any walk is sure to make upon kindred minds, and alive to the influences of beauty and truth wherever found, and whether expressed to the eye or suggested to the intellect. This volume consists principally of a series of "Descriptive Criticisms of Pictures of the Italian and French Schools." These criticisms are very brief, and some of them strike us, upon comparing them with our recollections of the pictures of which they treat, as being remarkably just and correct as far as they go; but they do not go far enough, and sometimes remind one unpleasantly of George Robins and his catalogues raisonnées, both in the unqualified praise they bestow and the summary manner in which it is served up. This objection, however, is not to be applied to more than a few; much valuable and interesting matter will be found, bearing upon the biography of many of the great painters and upon the histories of their most remarkable productions; and much of the feeling which the contemplation of their works never fails to impart to the educated spectator, will be derived to the reader from the perusal of M. Guizot's remarks. In appreciating the merit of these, he will be assisted, in some degree, by the clever illustrations in outline, in a bistre tint, most of which are beautifully drawn, and which add greatly to the utility of the work. We might reasonably demur to the extravagant commendation of Lesueur, who is deserving of no such praise as the author has bestowed; he might fairly rank as the Benjamin West of France, but need not make his appearance at a tribunal where the works of great artists are to be judged.

M. Guizot's criticisms are prefaced by a discourse on painting, sculpture, and engraving, their relations and differences. This, though exceedingly brief, is by far the most valuable part of the work, and may be read with advantage by artists of all grades, young and old. After adverting to the idle but violent disputes which, in the Middle Ages, distracted professors and students, in respect of which was the nobler art, painting or sculpture, he proceeds to show where lie the true power and scope of each; and, without pretending to establish their respective claims to pre-eminence, he defines clearly and justly their relative capabilities. He shows the effect of the study of the sculptures of Michael Angelo and others, upon the productions of the Florentine school, and deprecates the practice of drawing too much from the antique, as tending to confound the principles of the two arts, which are, in all respects, separate and distinct. He appears, however, to attach too much importance to the effect of a school of sculpture upon young painters, in supposing that it will incapacitate them from giving relief to their figures, and lead to an imperfect knowledge of perspective; with neither of which departments of a painter's art, we imagine, will a practical painter allow that the study of the antique has anything particular to do. The few paragraphs on the subject of engraving are to the purpose; we extract one, which we commend to the perusal of all engaged in translating the works of the great masters, ancient or modern, into simple black and white, and which we should like to see attended to more than is the custom.

> Lastly, the engraver must especially endeavour to become thoroughly acquainted with the peculiar manner in which each painter lays on and distributes his colour, since on this will depend the particular character of each of his works; every one knows that the nature of the lights and shadows of a picture is entirely changed by the colour being more or less thickly laid on, or by a greater or less degree of energy in the handling. Poussin must not be engraved in the same style as Caravaggio; and had these masters even painted the same subject, after the same design, with the composition and expressions identical, engravings of the two pictures ought to present very noticeable differences.

This work is handsomely got up in a sort of semi-mediæval style, boldly printed in old-fashioned type, and smacking of antiquity in the aspect of its substantial binding.

A Life of Wellington for Boys. By WALTER K. KELLY. Illustrated by JOHN ABSOLON. London: Addey and Co., Old Bond-street. 1853.

THE story of Wellington's life is such an extraordinary romance in itself, that the more plainly and succinctly it is told, the less smoke, as Mr. Kelly observes, is scattered about it, the more marvellous and striking is the recital. We have here a history of the acts of the deceased hero, drawn up for the express perusal of boys, with whom action is every thing, and who naturally care more for what a great warrior does than for what all the world besides chooses to say about his doings. Mr. Kelly's narrative is not a mere abbreviation of another man's detailed history; but an admirable and well-considered biography, carefully compiled from the best and most authentic sources. The tale of war is told, as it ought to be told to youthful ears—without any harrowing details of bloodshed and misery, on the one hand, or false pictures of military glory on the other. Courage, honour, generosity, and high principle, these are what the story is designed to inculcate: and there are few boys but will be the better for reading it.

A Treatise on the Proper Condition for all Horses. By HARRY HIEOVER. London: T. C. Newby, Welbeck-street. 1852.

WE have had but small experience in horses, for which we are thankful, and cannot pretend to judge critically of Harry's ideas of condition; but his work is readable and amusing even for a true keeper at home, who neither races, hunts, drives nor rides a hack. We derive from it the conviction that horseflesh is a great mystery, which even Harry himself has not quite solved, however near he may have arrived to the solution. He treats of the race-horse, the hunter, the ladies' horse, the hack, the carriage-horse, and the cart-horse; and parties interested in the management and condition of either, will find in his book some maxims worth attending to, the result, no doubt, of a pretty extensive stable experience. The book is illustrated with a brace of portraits, "Fit to look at," and "Fit to go," representing the same horse in different circumstances.

Rambles in an Old City; comprising Antiquarian, Historical, Biographical, and Political Associations. By S. S. MADDERS. London: T. C. Newby, Welbeck-street. 1853.

THIS work is agreeably written, and contains a store of curious matters pleasant to read; but we fear that it hardly answers to its title, the rambles of the authoress consisting much more of researches among the old records, than of personal visits to the streets, lanes, by-ways, and outskirts of the good old city of Norwich. It is probable that to the citizens themselves this may appear a recommendation rather than a defect; but to a stranger it must be tantalizing to find that having read this volume through, he has little, if any, more definite notion of Norwich than he had before he opened it. The chapters on the Cathedral, the Castle, the Market-place, and the Guildhall, naturally lead us to expect something like pen-and-ink pictures of the several subjects; but from each and all the lady flies off at a tangent, pleasantly enough to be sure, and alights upon some old legend, historical event, or vanished superstition, not always too evidently connected with the subject supposed to be under hand. Norwich is rich in worthies ecclesiastical, literary, and artistic, and to some of these the authoress has done justice; but we miss from the list the great landscape-painter, Crome, who is as worthy to be remembered as any one of them, and whose reputation is worth that of fifty bishops, erudite and excellent though they be. Hook, the father of the comical Theodore, was a Norwich man; and we are told that, in the course of his life, he composed two thousand four hundred songs, (where are they all?) one hundred and forty complete works or operas, and one oratorio, besides odes and emblems! Dr. Crotch was the great musical celebrity of Norwich: he was the son of a carpenter, and was a prodigy who played his first tune at the age of two years and three weeks. His life and works are well known; he died in 1847, at his son's house in Taunton, where he spent the last years of his life. These details we gather from Mrs. Madders' book, and they are given, be it noticed, under the head of "Conventual Remains;" from which the reader may perceive, that our authoress asserts her privilege, and talks of what she likes when and wherever she chooses. Still she gossips to some purpose or other amidst all her discursions, and one is content to follow her to the end of the book, which finishes in burying Joseph John Gurney, and leaves the old city in a cloud almost as dense as that which overshadows it in the first chapter.

The Charm. A Book for Boys and Girls. Illustrated with more than One Hundred Engravings. London: Addey and Co., Old Bond-street. 1853.

A REALLY charming book crowded with capital pictures and funny and entertaining stories, interspersed with useful lessons in geography, elementary science, and natural history. This work is issued in numbers, and forms a child's periodical, replete with all that can interest and amuse a child's fancy, and yet serving, at the same time, as a vehicle for solid instruction. It is to improve the mind and educate the eye rather than to pamper the stomach; and we recommend parents to indulge their children by the gift of such books as this, in preference to seating them on the confectioner's counter, with the affectionate design of destroying their digestion. They will find the "Charm" much more wholesome than jam as a diet, and the relish for it, in time, much more natural and durable.

The Peak and the Plain: Scenes in Woodland, Field, and Mountain. By SPENCER T. HALL, the Sherwood Forester. London: Houlston and Stoneman. 1853.

IF we were disposed to institute a comparison between the various works descriptive of local scenery, and its magical and elevating influence upon the mind and feelings, which have been at various times offered to our notice, perhaps we might rank this fascinating volume as the very first of them all. The Forester is a true son of the forest and the field, the hedge-rows and green lanes, the rocky peak and the barren moor; and he is never so happy or so eloquent, or so much himself, as when the deep shadow of the woods is upon him, or the voice of the torrent is sounding in his ears, or the wild winds scatter the dun clouds around him as he stands upon the rugged crag of some lofty Tor, with the broad lands of Old England spotted with her busy towns, her peaceful hamlets, her lone farm-steads, her baronial halls, and her humble cottages, mapped out at his feet. All these are a part of himself, and the best part—they have entered into his soul, and made it what it is, tender and loving, and truthful, and sensitive as the aspen leaf to the gentlest breath of heaven. He is one of nature's freemasons, and knows all her secret signs—one of her high priests who is at home in her innermost shrines, where he pays his vows and calls upon his fellows to pay theirs. He is her poet and sings her praises—and her champion, too, who vindicates her right. He will not crush the life out of an old legend for the sake of showing his learning—though he has it to show—any more than he would wound a brother with the shafts of his wit, for the sake of showing that. He loves all things—the loveliest most, and paints them in beautiful pictures, fit to be hung up in the galleries of memory. We feel strongly tempted to extract some of these word-limnings, and are only deterred from doing so by the conviction that we should do them an injury by detaching them from the position they occupy in the book. The volume consists of a number of brief sketches, drawn faithfully from the life—treating of a great variety of subjects, which may all be comprised under the head of "Landscapes with figures," and interspersed with many admirable poems, not a few of which are already familiar to us. The lover of nature will be glad of the Forester's guidance over Peak and Plain, and will rejoice with him to

Remarks on the Production of the Precious Metals, and on the Depreciation of Gold. By Mons. Chevalier. Translated by D. F. Campbell, Esq. London: Smith, Elder, and Co. 1853.

One would imagine that nothing could be plainer than the truth of the commercial axiom, that when a commodity is abundant it must necessarily be cheap, whatever be the nature of that commodity, and its real or conventional value. There can be no natural law which exempts any one thing from the operation of this rule; nor is it to be expected that gold, because it happens to be the standard of value in this country, shall not, like other things, suffer depreciation when the market is overgorged with it. This, at any rate, is the common sense view of the question, and though a great deal of ingenious argument has been adduced, to prove that the apprehensions to which such a view naturally gives rise are unfounded or premature, yet that portion of the public whose property is money in some shape or other, and therefore gold, are far from being at ease on the matter. Mr. Campbell, after a prolonged and careful investigation on the subject, has come to the conclusion that the supplies of gold now pouring into Europe must at an early period occasion an immense rise in the price of all commodities, which is tantamount to an immense depreciation in the value of gold. This is the conclusion enounced by M. Chevalier in a work as yet unpublished, a portion of which Mr. Campbell, having had it placed at his disposal, translated in support of his own views, and for the benefit of the public. We believe that so far both he and M. Chevalier are right; but in pursuing the argument of the French writer to its logical conclusions, Mr. Campbell may not be so correct. It is his opinion, for instance, that since all persons whose capital is money, will, through the influx of gold, be in the condition of the dealer who keeps on hand a stock of some commodity which is constantly deteriorating, they will, to compensate themselves, find it necessary to exact a higher rate of interest; and he expresses his conviction that the rate of interest in this country is far more likely to advance than recede. Now, considering that, fast as the gold comes into this country, it does not in any great degree come into circulation, but goes mostly into the cellars of the Bank, increasing the store of capital which will have to compete for employment, and must come into use upon easy terms, or not at all; we do not see, however necessary it may be for capitalists to exact a higher rate of interest, that they are likely to get it. On the other hand, it is likely that the rate of interest will not recede much; while money is abundant it will rarely rise very high—but since with plenteous capital there is generally commercial activity, the spirit of speculation will prevent its falling very low.

Mr. Campbell has executed his translation extremely well. We have not room even for an analysis of M. Chevalier's argument; but we extract one passage of pertinent value for the sake of our readers, most of whom will be interested in its contents.

> The aim of the Bank of England at present, and of the holders of the precious metals at all times, is to put into circulation the gold or silver in their coffers; but the coin which circulates in a country has natural limits, provided the metal or metals of which it is composed remain unchanged in value. The metallic circulation, practically, bears a certain proportion to the mass of business transacted. All beyond that is redundant, and the current of business throws it back into its natural reservoirs, which in our days are the public banks. A fall in the value of the precious metals is the only means by which the augmented mass of them can remain permanently in circulation. And this problem is now about to be solved before our eyes. Suppose the mass of business transactions to be twenty milliards, and the coin required therefore to be only one-tenth of that sum, any greater quantity of coin you may put into circulation will not possess in relation to the mass of exchangeable commodities, a higher value than that now possessed by the two milliards of coin. In vain will you add one half to the circulation, and increase it from two to three milliards, that is to say, if the coin be silver, from nine million kilogrammes to thirteen and a half million kilogrammes; your thirteen and a half million kilogrammes will only command in commodities of every kind the same quantity as was formerly exchanged for nine million kilogrammes. Let us imagine, for example, that some morning every housewife on her way to market at Paris, were to find in her purse three instead of the two five-franc pieces with which she had supplied herself for the morning's purchases, and that she proceeded to market resolved to spend the whole; that all of them acted in this respect alike, and that they found at the market only the usual supply of vegetables and other provisions; her three pieces would go no farther than the two would have gone; she would be obliged to pay for everything one half more than usual, and after having laid out the entire fifteen francs, she would return home with precisely the same quantity of provisions as if no addition had been made to her purse. This familiar illustration conveys a tolerably correct idea of the effect produced when fresh and copious supplies of the precious metal augment the quantity of coin in circulation.

The Sexuality of Nature. An Essay, proposing to show that Sex and the Marriage Union are universal principles—fundamental alike in Physics, Physiology and Psychology. By L. H. Grindon. London: Pitman. Manchester: Fletcher and Tubbs. 1853.

This is a very clever and still more fanciful treatise upon a subject on which ingenious and imaginative minds, from the days of Homer to our own, have occasionally delighted to disport themselves. Perhaps Mr. Grindon is the first philosopher who has published the banns of marriage between the universal "dualism that bisects Nature," and brought all matter organic and inorganic, and all spirit too, into the charmed circle of holy matrimony. According to him, not only have plants their loves, as Darwin teaches, but ores, and earths, alkalines and oxides are wedded in affectionate embrace, and are only to be divorced with difficulty by the tormenting processes of analytical chemistry—their ecclesiastical court. Oxygen is a terrible polygamist, whose concubines are legion, and whose offspring everywhere is Heat. Light is another, and his offspring is Colour, whose mother is matter. Old ocean, again, is the father of all production and the husband of mother earth. Further, the Divine nature is itself dual: in the language of the old Greek hymn—

Ζεὺς ἄρσην γένετο. Ζεὺς ἄμβροτος ἔπλετο νύμφη, being a union or marriage of perfect wisdom and perfect goodness. Setting out with these fine and truth-fraught fancies, our author discourses pleasantly and learnedly on the human character, the soul, the body, language, music, ideas, beauty and morals. On the subject of language he says:—

> The sexual character of words is one of the most beautiful and recondite subjects of philosophy. It is foretold even in their elements. The hard sturdy consonants are masculine; the delicate musical vowels are feminine. As man needs woman's aid to fulfil his noble nature, so does the consonant need the auxiliary vowel in order to be uttered; and as the woman without man is destitute of her stay and strength, so is the unmarried vowel rarely more than a thoughtless interjection. . . . . As with the near equality in numbers of men and women, so again, when properly discriminated, with the numbers of each class or sex of sounds. . . . . A philosophic analysis of all the sounds which have been ascertained to occur in human speech shows that there are about twenty-four vowel sounds, and twenty-four consonants; the English language using eighteen of the former and twenty-one of the latter. Certainly, the intermediate shades of sound are countless, but the types or distinct forms do not exceed the number above stated. . . . . On the proportions in which vowels and consonants enter into words depends much of the euphony of languages. . . . . The most impressive languages in point of sound, will probably always be found, on a phonetic analysis of their elementary composition, to be those wherein the two ingredients are nicely balanced.

We add a passage on Ideas:—

> All our ideas come of marriages; ideas being the fruit of the communion of the soul, through the media of the senses, with the forms and the phenomena of the external world. Ideas are not the result of thought, but its subject-matter; for there can be no thought without the antecedent acquisition of ideas whereon the thinking powers can employ themselves. Ideas are the property of the intellect, as feelings or emotions are of the affections. Hence their very name, which is founded on the correspondence of the intellect with the eye; just as it is with the ear, that the affections are in chief correspondence, so beautifully verified by music. Literally, an "idea" is "something seen," and its primitive, physical, sense, which is the key to all subsequent ones, denoted the exterior configuration of things, as viewed by the bodily sight. Well-known and striking illustrations of this primitive sense, are Pindar's ἰδέα τε καλὸν "beautiful in shape," Aristophanes' ἀθάναταις ἰδέαις "immortal forms," and the phrase in St. Matthew's Gospel, ἦν δὲ ἡ ἰδέα αὐτοῦ ὡς ἀστραπὴ, "his countenance was like lightning." Similar uses of it are not unfrequent in the English literature of the 16th century.

In the present utilitarian age it is doubtful whether the "Sexuality of Nature" will become extensively popular, since the use of the study is not very clearly made out, even by the author himself—but we can promise the reader who shall give it his attention, matter for pleasant and profitable reflection.

The Plaint of Freedom. 1852.

Such is the title of a work in small quarto, and bound in cream-coloured vellum, which, without the name of either author or publisher, has found its way to our desk. It is dedicated to the memory of Milton, whose voice the author, sitting in the shadow of his sepulchre, aspires to echo.

> Methought thy very clay
> Might tune the thinnest pipe of grass,
> To tell the free winds as they pass,
> How England lets thy grave decay.
> How o'er it things abhorr'd of light
> Crawl hideously, and worms obscene;
> And daily trampings of the mean
> Would hide the epitaph of might—
> Thy prophet mantle who may wear?
> Yet from thy car of splendour throw
> One spark on me: my song shall flow
> Volcano-voiced, for all to hear.

It must be confessed that the plaint which follows, if not actually uttered with the voice of a volcano, and though not tinged with any excess of loyalty, is to a rather startling effect. Freedom, intent upon stirring up Old England to do something—though what she is to do is not very plain—makes this bold demand:

> What waitest thou? Till Cossack feet
> Spur thy slow courage; till the war—
> Our sires had led to Trafalgar—
> Back desperately from street to street?
> Till London croucheth to its doom;
> When strangers stepping through our walls,
> Chant French Te Deums in Saint Paul's,
> And pile their arms on Nelson's tomb?
> What sloth of heart, or brain, or limb,
> What count of fears, what doubt of right,
> Hath hid thy spirit in this night,
> Whose clouds thy starriest honours dim?
> Can Wickcliffe's heirs permit the Pope?
> May Cromwell's lieges court the Tsar?
> Or Alfred's lineage shrink from war,
> With shameful peace for only hope?
> And yet thy sword, a liar's tongue,
> Thy highest faith some trick of trade,—
> What marvel England's name is made
> A synonym for coward wrong?
> The land that boldly judged a king,
> And slew the traitor for his crimes,
> Now stoopeth to the poorest mimes
> Of Tyranny—an abject thing.
> No wonder that thou dar'st not pile
> My beacon fire: 'twould light the world
> To see the hydra-slavery curled
> In thine own heart, unhappy Isle!
> The town is thick with loathsome graves;
> Yon fence that girds a thousand fields,
> Shuts out the serfs—their harvest yields
> No harvest unto landless slaves.
> The weaver starveth at his loom;
> The reaper faints for lack of bread;
> While age may nowhere lay its head;
> Decrepit childhood hath no bloom.

O, English girl, unsexed with toil!
O, English matron, gaunt and wild,
That starest on thy strangled child,—
And there is none to loose the coil!

And O, thou son and sire of woes,
Whose steps are shadowed by despair,—
Thou palsied beggar, trampled where
Our Hampden grappled with his foes!

The circled honour and the place
Of genius stolen by the mean:
What poor weak parody of a Queen
Insults the Elizabethan race!

A peerage—traffic's motley throng!
A Church,—where prelates build their styes!
And courts of law,—where Jefferies
Remains a precedent for wrong!

And in the halls where Vane was heard
Some rascal shopman (!) drunken-brave,
Babbling of State, while fool and knave
Applaud a lie in every word!

A people: thousands crowd the streets,
Exclaiming—Freedom! let thy grace
Be given us in the market-place,
Where slave his fellow coward meets!

So realms are colonized with thieves,
Despite the moss-grown hearths at home;
And starved men through the bleak world roam,
That native fields may fatten beeves.

We did not imagine Freedom was such a virago as to talk thus wildly. After more to the same purpose, she invokes "the ghosts of buried days," by way of imparting a little life to the dead present—and gives us a series of metrical ovations to all the old British worthies from Caractacus to Tom Paine (!) Of these, the following are the best:—

SIR JOHN ELIOT.

As one who climbs from stair to stair—
For narrow is the way and steep—
Until he heads the topmost keep,
And plants his victor standard there,—

So boldness steps from age to age—
Built Titan-like, hill crowning hill—
And stands, and with o'ertowering will,
Throws into heaven a champion's gage.

So clomb the dawn ere day began:
So Eliot reacheth to his tower,
Proclaiming thence with herald power
The coming monarchy of man.

Brave prisoner—Quail, thou crowned lie!
Before that proudly wasted face;
The firm lips asking but one grace—
"A little air for strength to die."

VANE—SYDNEY—RUSSELL.

The fire is out: Vane's life-blood poured
Upon the scattered altar-stones:
And ribalds desecrate the bones
Of men whom courage had adored.

And on the martyr's bloody sod
Shame's revellers foot the embers out,—
Save where, escaped the darkening rout,
Two souls flash upwards unto God:

A Russell pleading for the right
Of battle with tyrannic laws;
A Sydney for the "good old cause"
Republican.—And all is night.

A night to make the brave despair:
For Circe's bastard hath regained
His wand; and England sits enchained
Plague-smitten, stark, with horrent hair.

We know nothing of the author of these lines, but it needs no conjuror to guess that he is a young hand who has yet his craft to learn and his judgment to enlighten. Power of a certain sort he possesses, and dreams possibly that he is wielding a two-handed sword with the vigour of a Baresark against established iniquities—never suspecting that it is nothing but a large barn flail he is flourishing so valiantly about his head, and that of the hard knocks he deals the greatest part will fall to his own share.

The Future; or things coming on the Earth. In Letters to a Friend. By JOSHUA ELISHA FREEMAN. London: Ward and Co. 1853.

MR. FREEMAN looks for an individual antichrist, and recognises indications of his speedy approach; he foresees his destruction too by an overwhelming demonstration of physical force exerted by the Divine Vengeance. Babylon the Great—whether ancient Babylon restored, or Constantinople, or London, or Papal Rome, the author is by no means certain—is to be destroyed with him; and then comes a new earth—an earth without a curse, and a millennium of universal peace. He may be quite right, for aught we know; we do not undertake to pronounce a verdict.

Father Reeves, the Methodist Class Leader. By EDWARD CORDEROY. London: Hamilton, Adams, and Co. 1853.

THIS is an unpretending memoir of a very remarkable man, who, born in an humble rank, devoted the whole leisure of a long life,—leisure saved from the intervals of hard labour—to the good of his fellow creatures. He did, from religious conviction, what no man urged by a less powerful motive is ever found to do; he literally gave up himself for the benefit of others; he never earned more than forty shillings a week, and often not twenty, yet he gave up a shilling a day in order to make time to visit and console the poor of the populous district of Lambeth. Of these visits he made some 13,000 in the course of twenty-six years, and he carried them on to the last week of his life. There is a grandeur in the spectacle which such a career presents not to be met with in any other, be it what it may; and we are glad that this little memorial of the good man's life has been so worthily written; it may serve to teach the world a lesson of goodness which it is generally slow to learn. Poor Father Reeves, it appears, was killed in the streets by an over-driven ox, so that he was in some sort a Smithfield martyr. In strict justice the Corporation of London ought to meet all such casualties in their own persons. "We could have better spared an alderman."

A Children's Summer. Eleven Etchings on Steel, by E. V. B. Illustrated in Prose and Rhyme, by M. L. B. and W. M. C. London: Addey and Co., 21, Old Bond Street. 1853.

THESE etchings are finished productions of very extraordinary merit and beauty. They consist of a series of simple compositions in which children, from two or three to six years of age are admirably grouped together in the enjoyment of such pleasures as a summer's day ramble affords. They are drawn with singular boldness and at the same time with a delicacy and feeling rarely equalled. Perhaps the most excellent group of all is the young haymakers, which in the hands of such an artist as Collins would make a noble picture. "Homeward Bound" again is another charming subject for the canvas—and so is the "Flower Garden;" the artist who has designed these may win a brilliant reputation whenever he shall choose to clothe his ideas in colour. It is hardly fair to expect that the literature of this book should be on a level with its unrivalled pictures. It is not, however, unworthy of them, as the following extract will suffice to show:—

THE FLOWER GARDEN.

Two children wander, hand in hand entwined,
On scented turf, and where the laughing flowers
Dye with rich sunset hues the beds and bowers,
And touch with perfume every loitering wind.
O ye! to whom the elements are kind!
Fair boy! whom graceful fancies fairer make,
Fair girl! whom never earnest smiles forsake;
What happier, holier lovers can we find?
Pause in your play, and be eternal now!
Still mix your hair where golden sunlight gleams
O'er peach-like cheeks, amid the lustrous glow
Of eyes like two blue heavens in sleepy streams!
We gaze; the earlier Eden blooms below,
The loves of angels are no longer dreams.

Sunday and the Sabbath: or the Reasons for identifying the Lord's Day of the Apostles with the Sabbath of Moses. By W. H. JOHNSTONE, M.A. London: Wertheim and Macintosh. 1853.

THIS little work presents a candid, impartial, and fairly-reasoned argument on the subject of the Sabbath question which is just now so much a matter of debate. The author shows that the Mosaic Sabbath was a day of rest only, and not of religious worship, and that its violation consisted not in neglecting the duties of the synagogue, but in the performing of any kind of work. He shows, what is plainly undeniable, that Christ never abrogated this Sabbath, but on the contrary honoured and observed it. With regard to the practice of the early Christians he adduces evidence to prove that those of them who were Jews observed the Mosaic Sabbath in the same way that Christ had done; that the Gentile Christians observed no day of rest whatever, and that Christians of all kinds kept the first day of the week as a prayer-day devoted to worship, and that they did this with the sanction of the apostles and probably with that of Christ himself; and that it was not until the church was recognised by the state, that a certain degree of abstinence from work was rendered compulsory by the imperial edict of Constantine—sabbatizing being regarded up to that time as a peculiarly Jewish custom. Admitting these things, he yet affirms that the law of the Sabbath has not ceased because the institutes of Moses have been suspended and because the first Gentile disciples, being many of them slaves subject to heathen masters, could not sabbatize. On the contrary the obligation of its observance is binding as ever, and must remain so so long as Christian worship is a duty. We must refer the reader to the work itself for the weighty reasons by which these conclusions are enforced, as it would be foreign to our general purpose to cite them here; if he be at all interested in the question, he may reap some satisfaction upon finding it here treated in an original vein, and in a truly catholic spirit. Some of the writer's remarks, in the concluding part of his work, on the subject of opening the Crystal Palace and Grounds on the Sunday afternoon, may be read with advantage just now by all parties concerned.

Essays on Political Economy. By the late M. FREDERIC BASTIAT, Member of the Institute of France, London: W. and F. G. Cash, 5, Bishopsgate Without. 1853.

OF all foreign writers on Political Economy, M. Bastiat was the most intelligible, clear, and practical. It is to the efforts of his pen and to the sound economic philosophy which by his simple mode of treatment he rendered familiar to his countrymen, that France in a great measure owes her delivery from protectionist fallacies and socialist delusions. He stripped the absurdities of Proudhon, Louis Blanc, and the political mystics of a prior generation of the sophistry which disguised them, and laid their foul and disgusting enormities bare to the common-sense of the common people. He reduced the true principles of law and government to the comprehension of the day labourer, and showed how little of legislative interference was necessary to ensure the prosperity of the common interest. His works are looked upon as a kind of class-book by English commercialists,—and they ought to be attentively studied by all who would learn the true function of government in regard to commerce. The volume before us contains the five well-known and admirable essays: Capital and Interest—That which is Seen and That which is not Seen—Government—What is money—The Law. We commend their perusal, and their possession, to our readers, feeling well assured that no man will regret their purchase, or fail to recur to them frequently with both pleasure and profit.

The Ghost of Junius. By FRANCIS AYERST. London: Thomas Bosworth, 215, Regent-street. 1853.

WE have here a rather remarkable pamphlet upon a subject which has puzzled the literati of three-quarters of a century. Mr. Ayerst attempts to show that the authorship of the celebrated letters of Junius is deducible from a single letter written by Lieut. Gen. Sir Robert Rich, Bart., and addressed to the Right Hon. Lord Viscount Barrington, in 1775-6. The strength of his argument lies in a supposed similarity of style and certain peculiarities of phraseology and of irony observable in the compositions of the Baronet and of Junius. It appears to us that the author makes out no very strong case; there are some points of similarity—points too not easily to be paralleled in the works of other writers—yet after having read the passages carefully, as they are here arranged in columns, it is very difficult to imagine that Rich was Junius. But we leave the verdict to the public.

Wellington: A Lecture, by the Rev. JOHN CUMMING, D.D. London: Arthur Hall, Virtue, and Co. 1853.

THERE has been no memorial of the great Duke, among the almost countless number which have issued from the press, so well adapted for the perusal of young men entering into life as this small and unpretending volume. Brief as it is, it is a noble biography, not a record of the outer life and acts—but of the inner life and spirit of the true hero whose loss we mourn. There are a hundred "lives" of Wellington yet to come, and many a bulky tome, big with his deeds of arms and his wisdom in council, has yet to be written; but the future biographer will not add much if anything to the mental stature of the man, as he stands here in the true dignity and grandeur of his moral nature. We are struck as we read this masterly delineation of a great and simple mind, with the thought—How few are the men who have figured in the fiery history of warfare whose motives would bear the test here applied to Wellington? Having named Washington and Fairfax, and a few other noble names, the list is complete. Dr. Cumming has recognised the true nobility of his hero, and exhibited him in a light in which his example may be most extensively useful. Wellington was the prophet of duty, and pointed the way, more than any other man, to solid renown through the arduous path of difficulty and discouragement. His example will not be lost—"though dead he yet speaketh" and shall speak to generations yet to come of the virtue of self-reliance and the heroism that dwells in persevering fortitude.

A Scheme of Direct Taxation for 1853. By JELINGER SYMONS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London: Parker and Son, 445, West Strand. 1853.

THIS is an extremely well-written and well-reasoned pamphlet upon a subject of great and increasing interest, and is worthy of a much more extensive consideration than we have at present space to allot to it. That our whole system of taxation requires complete revision and re-formation, men of all parties in politics are more or less disposed to allow. Mr. Symons has made himself master of the topic, and in this essay has struck out some original views well deserving of serious attention on the part of the legislature; he has further exposed some remarkable fallacies in the published opinions of the greatest economists of the day—fallacies startling from their evident puerility, combined with the fact of their being embraced and promulgated by men who have taken the first rank as political philosophers. We must endeavour, as briefly as possible, to afford the reader some idea of the contents of this pamphlet. Starting with a glance at the Budget of 1852, Mr. Symons recapitulates some well-known truths in reference to increase of revenue from decreased taxes; he then shows the practical folly of customs and excise duties, and exposes the viciousness of the arguments by which they are sought to be maintained. Under the head of "Direct Taxes" he shows the operation which these would necessarily have were all indirect taxes abolished. For very good and sufficient reasons which he gathers from a consideration of the self-equalizing incidence of taxes, he would tax all incomes above £50 and except those below it; because there would be great difficulty in ascertaining their amount and collecting the tax. He would also exempt the wages of labour on the same ground—not that he deems that labour should be exempt from tax; the poor is bound to pay his share as well as the rich; and by the lowering of wages which would follow upon the transference of the taxes to the non-labouring classes, he would pay it. Thus > the poor will not benefit at all at the expense of the rich, but both classes, and all classes will, as they have all along done, share the burden, with this single difference—that by removing the imposition of taxes from consumption to income and property, and thus relinquishing indirect for direct taxation, a material saving will be effected in the cost of collection and in the amount required. That manifold hindrances to industrial enterprises, alike vexatious and costly, arising from the multitude of petty imposts, will be removed, greatly to the benefit of commerce; while the abolition of all customs and excise duties will alone give effect to the principle of unrestricted competition and free trade, and make an admitted theory a practical reality.

On the fallacy of discriminating rates of income-tax the author remarks, that to levy a less rate on income from trades and professions than on those from property, is to create a distinction without a difference; for if the latter be more favoured they will be less paid; and the burden will be as long in the one case as it was broad in the other. In the words of Col. Thompson, "if temporary incomes are taxed temporarily, and permanent incomes permanently, that is exactly the fair thing."

> It is the great merit of the present system that all incomes are treated, classed, and taxed alike; whether they be perpetual or temporary, and whether produced by capital or not of capital. And this system ought not to be altered, for it cannot be improved. Some actuaries, and others who are afflicted with a mania for arithmetical casuistries, and the apices juris of the subject, set up a distinction between incomes derived from fixed capital, such as the Funds, for example, and from circulating capital, or such as is employed in production. But they are for all the purposes and equities of taxation similar. True it is, that part of the income derived from the latter consists in the capital newly produced; but what of that? It still constitutes part of income; for it is part of the profit arising from the productive employment of capital: the original amount of the capital so employed being left untaxed and undiminished. True it is, that the process is easy of capitalizing incomes, and taxing £1000 per annum from the Funds, if in perpetuity, as £25,000, and of a life-interest in them of £1000 per annum at £14,753, and a professional income of £1000 as an annuitant also. But where is the justice of this proceeding? it is plain that the income in any of these cases survives from possessor to possessor, just as much where he has a temporary individual interest as where he has it in fee. It represents so much of the annual wealth of the country, receiving the same protection from the state, and surely chargeable with the same obligations. Why is one £1000 then to be charged less than another £1000? These varying scales are based on different prospective values of incomes. But nothing prospective should enter into the case. The tax is levied on a present income for a present benefit. Why, then, is not one possessor for the time being to pay the same tax for the same year's income as another? If there be a lower tax on life-incomes in the Funds than on incomes in perpetuity, it is manifest that one part of the permanent income of the fixed capital of the country is to pay less than another; so that there would, as between the state and the tax, be a perpetual inequality upon the same income from the same capital, enjoying the same security! Again we ask, Why?

The plan proposed by our author is to abolish Customs and Excise duties, leaving all other sources of revenue untouched, and to levy a tax upon all incomes above fifty pounds, of nine per cent. in the first instance, to be diminished as the revenue would permit. He calculates that a really free and unrestricted trade would result in a few years in an immensely increased production; and that the tax would then be reducible perhaps one-half. He estimates the taxable income of the country at only £405,000,000, which would yield, at 1s.9d. in the pound, £35,437,500. For the rest of his scheme, which is simple and intelligible enough, we must refer the reader to his pamphlet.

Under the head of "General Principles," the author sums up the advantages to the country derivable from the adoption of his plan. Having first shown that its execution is perfectly practicable, he adverts to the augmentation of income that may be looked for when "six millions are deducted from the gross amount of taxes," 'when six times that sum are shifted from the elements of production and the necessaries of life, and when commerce and manufactures are freed from the fetters of the excise; and he foretels the decrease of the national expenditure from the same causes. Among the more immediate benefits to accrue to the public, he reckons as one of the chief the abolition of the enormous frauds perpetrated on the revenue and on consumers by the producers and sellers of commodities; and he estimates that in lieu of the 1s. 9d. required to raise the revenue now got by the State from excise and customs, the tax-payer at the present moment really pays from half-a-crown to three shillings in the pound, in consequence of the dishonesty of the dealers. He illustrates this by reference to soap, which is surreptitiously or fraudulently manufactured to a large extent, and which cannot in this country be made of a quality fitted to compete with that of the foreigner, owing to the destructive interference of the excise-officer at every stage of the process; and by reference to tea, which the Government taxes from two to three hundred per cent. with the effect of crippling our home trade, and dwarfing our foreign commerce. It is supposed that China would take almost as many goods as Lancashire could manufacture, if they had the means of paying for them; and we prevent their doing so by a heavy tax upon the only means they have. And not only that, but we establish a handsome premium upon fraud and adulteration, and invite the peculator to poison the public with drugs and sloe-leaves, and pay him so liberally for doing it, that more tea, so called, is actually manufactured in this country and consumed as such, than the whole amount imported from China. There is another advantage of this gentleman's scheme, and that is, "that it affords the easiest possible mode of adjusting the revenue to the expenditure, year by year, without the ordinary parade and detail of fresh budgets." The following are the writer's concluding remarks:

Direct taxation is alone worthy of a great country, and commensurate with the aroused interest, awakened intelligence, and excited expectation of the people. It may be that this, and perchance another Cabinet, may wreck themselves on the shoals of that peddling pitiful system of small changes, which has rendered our finance a curse, and our budgets absurdities. But this practice of short-comings—this lingering love for obsolete dogmas and costly customs, must sooner or later give place to the behests of a wiser age, and the requirements of a growing commerce.

We ask for a system of national revenue, that shall cease to vex trade, cripple industry, and fetter the instruments of wealth—a system which shall take no more taxes from the people than the revenue requires, and whilst it secures the legitimate expenditure of the state, neither cramps the energy nor injures the health of the people.

The country is sick of petty changes; and of professions of great principles followed by little doings. If our Ministry is to be a Government, it must renounce the tactics of its predecessors, and adapt our fiscal policy to the permanent interests of the empire.

In a postscript, written after his pamphlet was in type, Mr. Symons comments upon some palpable blunders in the logic of Mr. Farr and Mr. Neison, in a manner which may probably prove edifying to those gentlemen, and to all other sticklers for a discriminating tax on incomes.

Ferdinand I. and Maximilian II. of Austria. An Essay on the Political and Religious State of Germany after the Reformation. By Professor L. Ranke. Translated by Lady Duff Gordon. (Travellers' Library.) Longman and Co. 1853.

This is a brief, but able and eloquent review of the internal policy and religious dissensions of Germany from the time of the Religious Peace to the eve of the Thirty Years' War. Its perusal affords but a melancholy spectacle of vacillating patriotism and rampant bigotry; and we learn from it that the Fatherland owed the thrice ten years of misery and desolation which followed to the intestine divisions and rabid obstinacy of the numerous parties of the Protestants. The same wretched and dogmatic intolerance which urged the Christlike Melancthon to covet a refuge in the grave "ab immanibus et implacabilibus odiis theologorum," ruined the Protestant cause in Germany—made her quail before the Ottoman foe, whom she ought to have rolled back to the shores of the Bosphorus—and finally caused the restoration of the Catholic supremacy—all of which might have been prevented had a more accommodating spirit animated the children of the Reformation. This translation, by Lady Gordon, is well executed, and may be read with advantage in connection with Schiller's "History of the Thirty Years' War."

Wonder Castle, A Structure of Seven Stories. By A. F. Frere. London: Addey and Co., 21, Old Bond-street. 1853.

These seven amusing stories make a charming companion for the winter's fire-side. Six of them are tales of pure imagination, exceedingly well told and recounting many droll and marvellous things. The remaining one, which we like best, and which is entitled "The Search after Ugliness," is the autobiography of an excellent fellow, who has the misfortune to possess a visage the very model of that of the gentleman one sometimes encounters in a table-spoon; and who, being in want of a wife, sets out in his travels in search of a corresponding physiognomy. How he is driven forth from home by the jokes and jibes of his relations—how he takes service and labours hard to obtain the hand of an unknown She, who turns out pretty instead of ugly, and so defeats his purpose—how he wanders further in search of his idol, and how he eventually finds her, and returns home happy and triumphant, the reader can learn by consulting the volume, which is got up in beautiful style, and adorned with a most whimsical coloured frontispiece from a design by Wehnert.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES.

National Life Assurance Society.—The twenty-third annual meeting of the members of the National Life Assurance Society was held at their office, No. 2, King William-street, London, on Monday, the 31st January last, when the report of the auditors and the general statement of the accounts, for the past year, were submitted and adopted. The business of the year 1852, as shown by this statement, has enabled the directors to make an abatement of thirty-eight per cent. on all premiums on policies of members who, having made five entire annual payments, are thereby entitled to participate in the profits for the current year. The amount returned to the members in the reduction of their premiums since the year 1835, when the first division of profits was made, is £180,260, exclusive of the amount to be allowed in the present year, which will give about £10,000 to the members, in addition to the above sum. The losses by death in 1852 have been very considerably under the amount that was expected, only eleven policies having ceased from this cause, assuring the sum of £14,300. The entire amount paid in claims to the representatives of deceased assurers, since 1830, being £257,794. The directors retiring from office by rotation, were unanimously re-elected, and Mr. Richard Vaughan Davis was also unanimously re-elected an auditor of the society. A vote of thanks to the chairman and directors for their able management of the affairs of the society was passed, and the meeting separated.

National Assurance Company of Ireland.—At the half-yearly stated general assembly of the Company, held at their office, 3, College-green, to receive the report of the Directors for the past half-year; the secretary read a statement of accounts, of which the subjoined is an abstract:—

Reliance Mutual Life Assurance Society.—The half-yearly general meeting of the members of this Society was held on Tuesday, the 25th day of January last, the same being also a special general meeting to declare profits for the third period of division. The Secretary read a report, of which the following are a few of the items: "At the first allocation of profits, in the year 1847, the principles upon which the valuation of assets and liabilities was computed, and methods adopted for equitable distribution of the realised surplus, were fully explained. To these principles the Directors propose strictly to adhere; they have borne the test of experience, and are now very generally acknowledged to be sound and just. The mortality for the period which has elapsed since the last allocation, has been in the ratio of only 60 per cent. of the estimated risk. Taken from the commencement of the Society's business, the sum paid on policies which have become claims, has been less than one-half of the amount of the aggregate of the yearly estimates. The balance sheet of the transactions of the three years under review, shows the full value of the Society's liabilities, upon the several branches of assurance undertaken, to be £123,411 10*s.* 4*d.*, while the present value of annual premiums, chargeable in respect of the same, is estimated at £124,006 17*s.* 3*d.* Deducting from this last amount, however, the value of the margin or surplus beyond the mathematical risk, the balance on the side of liability amounts to £28,806 6*s.* 8*d.*, which is amply provided for by the cash and invested funds of the Society. The balance of the "general assurance fund" is £10,030 0*s.* 10*d.* From this amount it is proposed to set apart, as before, £4,000, on account of the average of deaths having been less than, with reference to the tables of mortality in use by the Society, might have been expected. According to the provisions of the Society's deed, one-third of the clear surplus remainder has to be retained as a rest until the next triennial division; the sum, therefore, remaining for allocation among the members is £4,020 0*s.* 6*d.*, which will enable the meeting to declare a bonus equivalent to a return of 75 per cent. of the office margin above described, upon every policy entitled to participate in profits at this period; being the same proportional return which was afforded on the two previous occasions. Resolutions in accordance with the Report were passed unanimously.

Provident Clerks' Assurance and Benevolent Association. — BENEFIT DEPARTMENT. — The twelfth annual general meeting of the assurance or benefit department of this association was held on Monday evening, the 17th January, at the London Tavern. The Secretary read the report of the Directors, of which the following is an abstract: "The Board of Management, in submitting to the members the twelfth annual report of the association, have much satisfaction in calling their attention to the following details, which show its increasing prosperity. The number of policies issued during the past year is 429, for £81,950; 7 annuities, £149 16*s.* 8*d.*, which is an increase of 41 policies, for £9,075, on the business of 1851; 28 proposals, for £8,450, have been declined; 54 proposals for £12,550 have been deferred, withdrawn, or require further explanation—making the total number of proposals to the association 518, for £102,950. The annual premiums payable on the policies in existence, together with the dividends and interest on the invested capital, amount to £17,150. The amount of claims arising from 15 deaths during the year is £3,225, which is less both in number and amount than during the previous year, notwithstanding the large increase of members. This rate of mortality, which is considerably under the usual average, shows the great care and skill of the medical officers of the association. After payment of the claims from deaths, a further sum of £10,067 10*s.* has been laid out in augmentation of the invested capital of the association, viz., £3,117 10*s.* in the purchase of £3,000 3¼ per cent. stock; £6,600 advanced on mortgage; and £350 lent to members on the security of their policies of assurance—making the total amount standing in the names of the Trustees, £47,070, viz., £35,500 3¼ per cent. stock, and £11,570 on mortgage and other securities. The balance-sheet for the past year has been duly audited and approved by the Trustees. The Actuary of the Association and Mr. Griffith Davies are engaged in a valuation of the assets and liabilities of the Company, with a view to a distribution of the profits. All persons assured on or before the 31st December, 1849, on a participating scale, are entitled to share in the division of profits. Notice will be given by the Board to those interested when the Actuary's report is received, which may be expected in April next. A deputation from the Board of Management attended a public meeting at Birmingham on the 14th April last, which was supported by the members and friends of the association, and by some of the leading firms of that important town, and a fair increase of business has resulted therefrom. During the past year the attention of Parliament has again been directed to the present position of the laws regulating Friendly Societies, and it was referred to a Select Committee of the House of Commons to examine into and report on the subject. Your Board have devoted much time and attention to a question which must necessarily be of great importance to this association amongst many others. Your Chairman was examined as a witness before the Select Committee. No action of the Legislature has yet taken place, but the Committee has presented a report, and as it had been alleged that the operations of this and four other associations similarly enrolled had been contrary to law, your Board are happy to be able to state that the Committee has reported 'that it does not appear to your Committee that these five societies have been acting contrary to law.' As your Board have always acted under the best legal advice, they never entertained the least doubt of the perfect legality of the operations of the association; but it is satisfactory to have their belief thus confirmed by the report of the Select Committee. It is gratifying also to your Board to add the following further paragraph from the report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, viz.:—'These five societies have beyond question conduced in a very material degree to extend downwards in the scale of society a knowledge of the principles of mutual assurance, and a disposition to embrace the advantage of it.'" After the Report had been adopted, thanks were voted to the Trustees, the Treasurer, the Auditors, and the Chairman: and the proceedings terminated.

APRIL, 1853.

CHARACTER AND MODIFICATIONS OF SLAVERY.

We saw, passing through a street of Manchester, a waggon, or what is technically called a "lurry," laden, to the height of the warehouse first-floor window, with bags tight crammed full of the fleecy cotton wool; the white fibrous mass bursting out of its coarse integument, as it had burst out of the green pod, in the sun-heated and steaming savannahs of Georgia. It was a common thing to our eyes, but it made us imagine a far-off scene. In several groups, scattered over the plain where the cotton bushes grow, were some three score of negroes, listlessly pacing from one of the planted rows to another, picking the fruit which is to undergo a wondrous transformation. It is not the destiny of the cotton, that we are interested to pursue, but of the human lives among which that simple-looking substance, in its intended experience, passes to and fro. It will come back to the dusky negroes, the fabric of the blue shirts and the light trousers which Uncle Tom is wearing, and of the gaudy printed calico, which Dinah puts on for Sunday's finery: but who are the artificers that shall manipulate the material, and how is their condition different from that of the American field labourer? We have them and their work here. A spacious quadrangular paved court, in the suburb of Ancoats or, we might say, beneath the smoky cloud that overhangs Stockport, is enclosed by vast piles of a grimy brick building; the walls eight stories in height, and perforated with several hundred windows, regular and multitudinous as honeycomb cells. Out of a column, as tall as the London Monument, pours a flaunting banner of smoke. A dull muffled noise, as of incessant beating under ground, keeps the air and the earth in continual vibration; above and around us, there is a strange inexplicable hissing; but we see nothing stir in the vacant yard, and the neighbouring streets are deserted. We enter the building, and ascend, on a moveable piece of the floor which is carried up by an invisible power, to the loftier apartments. We are assailed by the shrill metallic whirring of an army of spindles. Many thousand of these, arrayed in close battalia upon their orderly frames, and screaming in the dizzy rapidity of their revolutions, are twining and twisting, and passing to one another, that same fleecy fibre, which the languid negroes plucked in America, now assuming toughness and incredible extension in the grasp of these little mechanical slaves, which cannot rest a moment. Human labourers are here,—three or four hundred, perhaps,—to guide and to control the machinery, which is doing all their work. This girl, who steps between the frames, and easily arranges the action of the spindles, with a slight touch of her finger, is an overseer of so many servants; and they obey her more implicitly, than ever did a negro gang obey the orders of their ferocious master. In an English factory, the human toiler is emancipated; gigantic limbs and tiny fingers of iron, which the breath of steam impels, are reduced to slavery, and he is set over them. To watch and to control that huge brute force, in its delicate operations, requires, in him, the diligence and the attention, which a slave cannot bestow. He must be a rationally responsible, and, in some degree, a trusted servant. Who could leave a brutish and unreflecting savage, imbecile from habitual degradation, in charge of an engine which, if he delay ten minutes the supply of water to its boiler, may shatter the great edifice and hurl its inmates to destruction? The quiet overlooker passes along, and sees the persons subject to his supervision, each attending the returning movement of the mechanism, and each unremitting in the task. Not a thread is broken; not an eye is averted, nor a finger absent from the wonted place, when its intervention is needed. But no violent gestures or loud menace of a driver enforce this work. There is no motive, to oblige these men and women to go on, except the agreement each one has fully contracted, and the expectation of a certain recompense on pay-day. They work, not under a blind compulsion like that of physical mechanism,—not by force of an unreasoning habit, as the horse obeys the bridle,—not because they absolutely must, but because they choose, and because they ought. "Man must not must," said a wise friend of man; and by this distinction, recognising his prerogative of optional conduct, we allow the essential freedom of humanity.

The comparison of these different classes of workers, (a reflection that has occurred to many of us, since the recent extraordinary appeal against American slavery,) may lead us to inquire, what is it, in which this peculiar hardship consists, that stirs our indignation with the name of slavery? What is this, more than other instances of "man's inhumanity to man,"—why is it deemed an oppression more iniquitous than robbery and assault, a suffering worse than torture? The apologists of it in America retort upon its English censors, with descriptions, in the present day scandalously false,—if they were sadly true in former years,—of wearing toil for insufficient food, endured by many workpeople in this country. Admitting such facts to be,—admitting that, in particular cases, avaricious tyranny, abusing an accidental advantage, may have imposed upon its hired labourers a more heavy amount of suffering, toil far more excessive, besides the miseries of inadequate subsistence, most wretched in contrast with the animal comfort of the slaves on a well-managed estate,—we still are conscious of another element, in this comparison, which such a view does not include. Excessive labour, however severe and protracted, is not slavery; nakedness and starvation do not make a slave. All these evils a free man, occasionally, may be liable to endure; nay, if a violent hand has perpetrated upon him the outrage of the lash, he is not reduced to slavery by its casual infliction. The essential evil of slavery is, the formal deprivation of that privilege of voluntary action, which is the birthright of manhood. The wrong is this,—that a man is claimed as a tool, belonging to some other, without his own consent and voluntary submission. Other servants, it may be, are at the disposal of their lords, in a manner that, practically, not less nullifies the discretionary operation of the individual. The soldier is an instrument, implicitly available for the despotic purpose of his sovereign; but the service he renders was of his own adoption; not how, but whom, he should obey for life. The slave is one who, without his own option ever being taken, is condemned to perpetual dependence upon some one whom he has not chosen; some one, whose ownership of him is the decree of a conventional arrangement, to which he was never a party. The feeling himself in this anomalous and inhuman situation,—the knowledge, from the consciousness of his own personality, that such a predetermined bondage is morally invalid,—constitute the keenest point of his suffering, the sense of injustice, and of his own impotence against it. If the slave, through his ignorant insensibility not perceiving the wrong, escape this intolerable sentiment of unavailing indignation,—then, it is evident that he sustains, unknowingly, the more serious injury of being mentally degraded. Either, his oppressors have obscured and blunted in him the feelings of a man, or they torment him continually by the systematic denial of his manhood. This evil is a most real one, much exceeding the extremes of bodily anguish; and, assuming the mass of those subject to it are indifferent to the deprivation of natural right, so much the greater is the mischief and the wrong. "He that is robbed, not knowing he is robbed," is nevertheless defrauded; and the more, if the robber have secured him in ignorance.

We shall not countenance the fallacious ideas of personal liberty, which represent the natural man, as quite independent of the will of his fellows. The fond reveries of a Rousseau, the unphilosophical notion of an isolated human being, unconnected by social ties anterior to a "compact,"—the poetical images of an aboriginal freedom,

> When wild in woods the noble savage ran,— have no relation to anything which ever existed, or could exist, in this actual world. Compromise is the common rule of human life. The noble savage, unless he were associated with other men by mutual obligations of service, must have died by the wilder beasts, or by famine and the inclement weather. Travellers in no region of the globe, so far as we are aware, ever discovered any tribe of uncivilised men who were not kept together by some government requiring a public self-surrender; and the relations of master and servant have existed, wherever men have worked to live. There is no possible independence, except in a conditional, modified, and voluntary servitude; a state of absolute freedom is beyond the reach of wealth to purchase, or of rank to command. Even supremacy over others imposes a reciprocal obligation, which,—though it be only the despot's office of signing his edicts and death-warrants,—is, certainly, a task which is externally prescribed to him, and is, to that small extent, an infringement of his individual liberty. But, we do not mean, that the ordinary compromises of freedom are different only in degree from the state of slavery; there is an essential distinction. That kind of personal dependence and of servitude, (for we take the latter word most generally, as signifying every constrained action,) which is proper to a particular office or condition, once freely adopted or ever dismissible at the pleasure of the holder, differs entirely with that other servitude, which has been imposed on a person without his own voluntary submission, and the direction and circumstances of which he is never allowed to alter. That lad with the ribands in his hat, to whom the magistrate has just read the Articles of War, is now, and perhaps during his life will be, as much the property, for practical use, of the masters who have purchased him, as any Cuban negro is the property of Senhor Maria de Valdes; but then he has sold himself, and he feels not only "every inch a man," but an added inch or two as he goes to the standard. Tom Brassey, one of Vulcan's journeymen, whom we saw busy among the red terrors of liquid metal, knows very well that he must not leave the job unfinished which his employer set him to do; and that if he refuse to work out the term of his present hiring, the magistrate may punish him by committal to prison; but he knows, there was a fair bargain between himself and Vulcan & Co., six days' work for so many shillings on the Saturday; and he feels himself as good a freeman as my Lord Derby.

These persons have chosen their service, and so, they preserve the dignity of man; they were not born, like the cattle in a stall, to belong to a particular master, as the child is born to its parents. In the natural relations of the family, as in the physical and moral relations of men to the universe, there is involved a fore-ordained attachment, a dependence made delightful by affection. But, in our social relations, we are not so bound to another, not of necessity obliged to this or that person; although a general obligation to do some service, for the behoof of some or other person, may be among the needs of our human life, we are to select the employment, which is the rational service of willing freemen.

But we think, further, there is a difference in kind between one state of servile dependence and another. The condition of the American negroes, who are the mere cattle of their owner, having no legal rights or recognised claim against him, liable to be disposed of in separate parcels at his convenience, to be kept or parted with at his sole will, is an altogether different state from that of any hereditary bondsmen, who are recognised by the laws of the country as parties competent to a responsible transaction, or entitled to sue for a personal claim. Wherever the servitude is, in any certain degree, limited or modified by some legal definition of its extent, the foundation of a constitutional existence has been allowed to the bondsman; his condition is no longer the abject prostration of utter slavery, but a state of protected serfdom. If we suppose the negro to be secured in the possession of any established rights, such as the legal right not to be separated from his family without his own consent, we suppose an immense improvement in his favour, beyond the enhancement of his domestic happiness; for he gains a part of his manhood,—the practical ability of asserting a certain personal claim. His state of life becomes a new and higher one. If we go a step farther, and conceive the law regulating his hours of daily labour, and giving him the spare time as his own, not by the favour of a master, but of right, he is advanced so much the nearer to the state of the freeman. If we consider him entitled, before the law, to acquire and retain property, to keep in his own pocket the few dollars he got by the sale of his garden herbs, then he becomes an acknowledged shareholder in the commonwealth. Let us now regard a condition of servitude, which, however it may be far removed from civil freedom, differs quite as materially from the state of immediate personal slavery. We mean that of permanent attachment to the soil of an estate, with the perpetual obligation of cultivating it for the owner's benefit, consequently, without the liberty of industry or of change of residence; but this connection involving reciprocally a title to perpetual maintenance on the same land. This is the condition of villeinage; and it is not, of necessity, incompatible with a considerable progress in the use and enjoyment of social privileges. It is, properly, a transition state, through which a servile class might become educated,—by the gradual adaptation of the terms of their service, according to their acquiring habits of intelligent self-control,—until they should qualify themselves, by using that permission to extra labour for their own profit, which must be at some period guaranteed them, to redeem their dependence on the state, commuting the compulsory labour into a rent for their allotted portion of the land, paid in labour it may be, as well as in produce or in money.

A practical application of these remarks will be sought, in the present temper of the public mind —Our testimony, among the very first, was yielded to that touching truth of feeling, which has gained, for an unpretending literary work, a marvellous and unexampled popularity. The flame of compassionate sentiment, all but universal among us, which has cheered the past winter, is not merely a triumphant effect of imaginative art, but a symptom of moral health, and in itself a good. We felt enhanced respect for the might of popular sympathies,—a deeper faith in the common impulses of humanity,—in having watched the rising of that full tide of unaffected emotion, which has touched the majority of our nation, from the humblest to the highest ranks, with generous anger and unselfish pity. The authority of this consensus omnium bonorum, this concentration of right-minded thought, bears in the sublimity of its aspect an indisputable warrant. Slavery, as a system, lies under the damning sentence of an European public opinion. But, the execution of that great change, which Providence and humanity declare inevitable, belongs to those, who cannot reverse the decree, but may plead for a gradual and facilitated mode of accomplishing it, in consideration of the stupendous difficulties of their social problem,—the most awful problem which ever statesmanship endeavoured to solve. They have to cure the aversion of race, and to soothe the animosities of opinion, to conciliate the feud of forty years, rectify the anomalies of a sacred Constitution, reassure the proprietors of enormous interests, reduce a proud aristocracy and elevate a degraded nation of foreign Helots,—and all this, while distracted with the growing terror of a domestic calamity, which appears daily more imminent, the measure of which is utter ruin. We have not found, in modern history, any more frightful situation, than that of the southern states of the American Union; because nowhere, the ruling classes,—not the court and seigneurs of France before the bloody Revolution,—have been so unmindful of their position and their duty. They have negotiated a compromise, ceding nothing to humanity, but something to local jealousies, and they vainly call it "a final settlement." They delay to consider any plan for the ultimate adjustment of the laws of servitude. They have insulted the earnest convictions of New England, imposing upon the citizens of Boston, inheritors of a stern Puritan resolution, as well as upon the serious men of Pennsylvania, the extradition of hunted fugitives. It is not for us to say, whither such conduct is tending. The newspaper laid before us, this very day,—no enthusiastic rhapsodist, but the wary Times,—has an article beginning,—"The slave institutions of the United States seem tending with marked fatality to some violent result;" and ending,—"It seems impossible to anticipate that peace can be long preserved." Other pens than ours, commenting on the recent events, have written the words of "civil war," which must involve the horrors of a servile insurrection.

Our own countrymen have a special right to utter this warning. We do not only refer to the noble example of colonial emancipation. It is not only, that for the single sake of human right, Britain has, after sacrificing first a lucrative trade, which at one period employed two hundred British vessels, lavished immense treasure for the ransom of captive Africans, endured the disaffection of an influential class, and alone incurs a large expenditure of naval force and English valour, to shame and to compel her insincere allies to relinquish an avowed iniquity. This would give us a claim, before all the world, to testify against slavery; but, as regards the southern states of America, we have another more express. Consuming, with a comparatively small deduction for the manufactures of other people, the staple produce of their soil, England is a partner, not indeed in the guilt of their slavery, but in the vast peril of its continuance. Remembering the severe distress, which an apprehended scarcity in the production of cotton, the variation of a few farthings in its price per pound, have caused, some years ago, in the factory districts, we do not exaggerate in the assertion, that any sudden violent convulsion of the agricultural system of America, an insurrection of the labourers, with a general destruction of the capital invested in cotton-growing,—and what less may be dreaded, if the planters will follow the course of headlong obstinacy,—must affect this country with a calamity only second to that ruin, which the southern members of the Union may experience. The northern counties of England are, in fact, even more deeply interested in this matter, than are the northern states of America. We have had opportunities of observing, how seriously the more prudent and well-informed of the Lancashire manufacturers are impressed with this consideration. In every association for the security of their commercial welfare, the topic chiefly concerned is, the urgency of having another resource, than America, for the supply of that "raw material" for which they now depend, almost entirely, on the production of the slave states. For this object, the cause of an anxiety which is not the less real, though it is not ostentatiously professed, the Chamber of Commerce at Manchester has employed a special commissioner to investigate the capabilities of cotton culture in India; Parliament is repeatedly urged to promote it; public and private agencies, in several parts of Hindostan, the West Indies, Port Natal, Egypt, the western coast of Africa, and New South Wales, are kept in frequent activity. The hazard of a cotton famine cannot be regarded without dismay, even in the existing prosperity; the gigantic increase of the manufacturing capital -d population, which is the daily wonder even of those who live amidst it, is an augmentation of the mass of human interests which are at stake, and is, to the thoughtful, a greater reason of care.

Such a calamity, the measure of which, if it were more than very temporary, no arithmetic may compute,—involving not a check only to the growing wealth and power of Britain, but the blighting, it might be, of the fairest and most vigorous plant of industrial civilization, that has bloomed since the republics of Italy and the free German cities,—such is the risk of any fierce general outbreak of the virulent malady, which festers in the social body of America. The only safety for the slave states, the most obvious and immediate security for us, lies in a relaxation of the evil system. Let us remind the transatlantic supporters of it, that if they can ignore the future retribution,—which is coming, we do not say, as sure as fate, but as sure as the Nemesis of divine equity,—they cannot disguise the unhappy effect, which at present it operates on their affairs and their very life. In some parts of the slaveholding country, a stationary if not a retrograde condition of the white inhabitants, the slothful degradation of the lower, the enervating luxury and insolence of the higher classes, the dissolute and vagrant spirits, itching for lawless prey, who eagerly conspire for piratical invasion of a neighbouring territory,—these are the fatal fruits of such a wicked tree; these are the preparation of a destiny, such as overtook the oppressions of the ancient world. The acquisition of more space, the spreading of the infection of slave institutions over all the central part of their Continent, cannot defer, cannot but aggravate the fury of the crisis.

We are not among those who insist on the unconditional and immediate abolition of slavery. We disbelieve, truly, the fear which is pretended by some, that such a measure would occasion the black population to retaliate with licentious violence on their former rulers. The atrocities of St. Domingo, in 1791, although a miserable sequel of the declaration of equal liberties by the French Convention, must be ascribed to very different causes, than the announcement of intended emancipation. It was a very distinct class, the free mulatto people, ambitious of acquiring political privileges, who excited a servile horde more than elsewhere debased and exasperated, to massacre a set of unrelenting oppressors, more than usually cruel, cowardly, and despicable. It was the fatal suspense, delay, contention of the emancipating act,—the vacillations of the Convention at Paris, which repealed the declaration of freedom in September, having passed it in May,—the imbecility with arrogance of the planters, the vexatious and desperate conflict of authorities, between the colonial and the National legislatures,—which contributed fire to consume the rich crops and villas of Haiti, with rage to pour out on its dark soil the blood of the proud and the delicate, this uncertainty and contest of authorities,—we repeat the phrase, for it is the most perilous circumstance of a revolution. We would fain never witness it, in the American Union. No part of the recent controversies, on the subject of slavery, has escaped our notice; no various expression of sentiment, from the indignant unhesitating zeal of the instant Abolitionist, through the sceptical tolerance of unmoral philosophies, the bigoted and almost blasphemous assumption of the few that profess to vindicate the principle of slavery, to the very easy charity of "A Carolinian," who puts faith in the "great virtues on both sides, generated by its peculiar relation;" and so down to the mere business-like reckoner of the material profits of the system, and the ludicrous complaints of a British military officer, in one of our magazines, that, since the enfranchisement of the Demerara negroes, he cannot hire a fellow to carry his carpet-bag from the quay to an hotel at Georgetown! Having read carefully most of what has been written, now the discussion is abated, we may say, that a conviction is confirmed, which had been formed years ago, upon an anxious study of the debates of the American Congress. We deprecate, for the sake, not of the Union—a worthless one, if the principles of social and moral life are to be still radically discordant—but for the sake of mankind, that the bosom impregnated with the future destiny of our race may be spared an intestine war—we deprecate every menace, every intimation, of an interference, in spite of the constitution and terms of that Union, to force upon the southern States the alteration of their internal institutions. At the same time, we desire, by the sympathy of England, by the intellectual prestige of European leadership in public opinion—which Americans submit to, more than they like to avow—by the faithful testimony and exhortation of the Christian church—by the frank out-speaking of those who care for liberty, conscience, and truth, here and there and everywhere—to get up such a force of appeal, in every direction except that of actual political attempts to infringe the fundamental compact of the legal Union, as may induce, persuade, warn, shame, implore the southern States to make the changes, in what method and degree it shall seem good unto them, which other States of the Union have already made, and Britain has made, with a real generosity, so happily. We do not undertake to recommend either total abolition or an apprenticeship like that which, in our own West Indies did not work very beneficially, when the planters, having no life-interest in their bondsmen, but still without adequate restraints on their caprice, sought only to get as much as possible out of the negro, during the term of years remaining: while the negro, impatient for the expected release, was less amenable to discipline than ever. The pretence, that emancipation in Tennessee and Alabama would throw the land out of cultivation, we admit no more, than this same fallacy in regard to the West Indies; where, in five years of their competition with Brazilian sugar, since 1846, there has been an increased production in Guiana, Trinidad, and Barbadoes, and although in Jamaica, a decline of 7000 tons, in the West India Colonies together, a gross yearly augmentation to the amount of 20,000 tons. We know the culture of tropical produce is subject to peculiar exigencies, requiring the speedy command of a numerous labour force, in planting, weeding, and cutting the sugar-canes, at the moment of favourable weather; and that if the negro cannot be induced, after a shower of rain, to leave his own provision-garden or his lounge, and hire himself for a few days of field-work, the crop will be smothered irretrievably by the rank weeds. But the Jamaica planters have been embarrassed, not by these natural difficulties alone. They were a class of absentee cultivators—not merely absentee landlords, but employing distant agents to manage the work of agriculture, which more than other work requires "the master's eye." Their property was encumbered with onerous debt; the management of each estate was usually hampered with a needless crowd of agents, overseers, and clerks; maintaining a multitude of non-effective labourers, who must be fed by the owner, not only in the seasons they were useless, but in the time of life they were unable to work. Facts and figures are before us, proving out of the balance-sheets of several estates, that the assertion of a Speaker of the Antigua House of Assembly is correct:—"All things considered, free-labour is the cheapest." We shall not trouble our readers with these statistics. But, in quitting the West Indies, (although we might have pointed to the happy triumph of the memorable 1st of August, 1838, when eight hundred thousand African bondsmen, at once declared unconditionally free, began the course of independent life, and within two short years of peace, there were seven thousand freeholders dwelling in the simple cottages their hands had built upon the land their earnings had bought,* —such a refutation of that calumny against our kind, that slaves would reward liberation with plunder and massacre!) but in passing to the case of the cotton-planters of the United States, let us observe in this connection, that they cannot plead these peculiar disadvantages, to which the proprietors of the West Indies are said to have been subject: they are not absentee owners of heavily mortgaged estates; nor are they likely to encounter, in the growth of cotton, any material degree of foreign competition; for many years to come they may reckon upon the secure enjoyment (if only they could secure the supply) of the English market. They cannot, therefore, with any plausibility appeal to the alleged difficulties of the Jamaica planters, as an excuse for refusing the modification of the slavery system of the States. Opportunity is most favourable to such experiment. It will not always be granted.

It has been said, we disapprove any notion of the Federal Government interfering with States which constitutionally stand independent, although

*See the speeches of Lord Stanley,—why did the friends of the Derby Government forget, of late, to remind us of these bright and really praiseworthy passages of his career?—in 1842, for confirmation of these facts. We are told, from other sources, of the touching names these poor simple folk gave to their garden cottages: "Jane's Delight," "Happy Home," "Comfort Castle," "Save Rent," "Liberty Content," "A Little of My Own."

united. Congress, we think, has wisely resolved to prohibit the discussion of any proposal, in the federal assemblies, for the abolition of slavery. It is the State Legislatures, sovereign government of internal affairs, with whom the legal power and the moral responsibility resides. Indirectly, we know Congress could do much, to discourage slavery and check its extension; which Congress has meanly declined to do. The Compromise, which dishonoured the two illustrious names of Clay and Webster, (men whose eminent services shall be remembered, as well as their faults, now they are both in the grave,) was a deliberate falsification of the principle of the American republic. If its federal constitution forbade any encroachment on slavery, its spirit of freedom forbade any concession to it. But, if Congress can do little, what cannot the State legislatures do? The answer we have always been ready with is given in the Westminster Review, by one whom we know to be a candid advocate of human right,—"The slaveholders could, if they thought proper, merge slavery into an intermediary serfdom. They might strive to copy, consciously and by enactments, the course which history shows to have been unconsciously and instinctively followed in Europe. In order to secure the cultivation of the plantation, the slaves might, at first, give all their labour for food, raiment, and lodging; and then, give so many days' work in payment of rent; and then, money wages. The money rent might be gradually increased, until the serfs had become freemen, and obtained full possession of themselves."

Something like this proposal, we have been long convinced, is the only peaceable solution of the problem. We have expended no small attention, in verifying this conclusion. One reflection is obvious,—that by the process of gradual emancipation, or rather, let us call it enfranchisement, which is only the more advanced stage, we, the Saxons or the Franks of modern Europe, have passed into freedom. We have gone far, since the sixth century, when, as Gregory of Tours records, the poor subjected themselves to slavery, that they might get a little food; since, in the dreary famines of the ninth and eleventh, when human flesh was sold for meat in the markets of France and Germany, much was sold alive by the desperate souls who famished in it; since a Saxon lady, at the period of the Conquest, manumitted some slaves, "whose heads she had taken for their meat in the evil days," to quote her own words. We should like, if space allowed here such an inquiry, to indicate the gradations of this mighty change; from the times of the imperial despotism, when the lands of Europe, except in the farms occupied by free coloni, were cultivated by many millions of abject slaves, half the population in the condition of chattels,—through the barbarian conquests, when this condition was superseded by a modified servitude, till, in the age of Charlemagne, the agriculturist was a sort of farmer in bondage to the estate, who either divided with the proprietor, on the metayer system, the produce of the soil, or gave certain services to the lord,—until the tenant became himself a proprietor, in his way, liable to seignorial dues, to arbitrary and onerous exactions, not enjoying his proper liberty of person, indeed, but having a fair prospect of enfranchisement. If we could dwell on this, we might compare the suggestions above made, with the remarks of Mr. Hallam on the interesting statements of M. Guerard, editor of the Cartulary of Chartres; who speaks of a great revolution in French society, which had been consummated long before the period of that document, the second half of the eleventh century; by which, after the territorial appropriation on the feudal system, which issued from the confusion of anarchy, it came to be as he describes:—

"Il fut aussi difficile de deposséder un serf de son manse, qu'un seigneur de son benefice. Dès ce moment, la servitude fut transformée en servage; le serf ayant retiré sa personne et son champ des mains de son maitre, dut à celui-ci non plus son corps ni son bien, mais seulement une partie de son travail et de ses revenus. Dès ce moment, il a cessé de servir; il n'est plus en realité qu'un tributaire."

Another word or two, to the American slaveholders. The character and circumstances of their system, with their singular political position, isolate them in the world. They have no accomplices in the retention of slavery, except the corrupted and effete governments of Spanish and Portugese America, which they persecute with the assaults of republican propagandism. The nineteenth century disowns them; nor does antiquity, truly understood, countenance their policy. Their pulpit apologists, who traitorously prostitute the Christian sanctions, have cited the example of an Isaac, and institutions of the Hebrew commonwealth. But the bondage of a patriarchal family, in the simplicity of the infant world, was alleviated by the free plain manners, without conventional hauteur. Jacob, after seven years of service, was an equal match for Laban's daughter. A friend, who is a learned Israelite, tells us it is the opinion of Talmudical commentators, that in the event of a master dying intestate,—like poor St. Clare at New Orleans,—the female slaves were, by the Jewish law, at once liberated, to prevent their falling into the hands of a Jewish Legree. In the rude customs of an early age that of slavery was prompted by mercy; the prisoners captive in war, spared the point of the spear, ended their lives in the tribe of their conquerors. This condition, the servitude of δμωες, was reserved for the ruined citizens of Troy. In the domestic life of heroic ages, exhibited in scenes of both the Homeric poems, is preserved, to mitigate the rough barbaric usages, a certain ease in the presence of inferiors, a generous frankness of intercourse. In the Rome of Coriolanus, there was a common supper for the household, though while the master presided at the upper table, like our Saxon Cedric on his dais, the servants with the children sat on the subsellia below. Our transatlantic cousins are addicted to classical precedents, and name upstart villages after the towns of Hellas and Latium. They have shown us a lovely image,—not in ebony but in marble,—of the slave-maiden, shrinking in modest fear, with a chain on her soft rounded arm. The slaveholding republicans of later Greece were also not insensible to this woe,—if artistically, not really, presented. While the kidnapping traffic on Thracian shores went on,—while a thousand slaves were hired out by the orator Nicias, for toil in the silver mines, and his great rival computed the value of skilful artizans, of whom he was proprietor,—the liberal Athenians could weep over the despair of Hecuba, among the victors' tents, νυν ὁμοδουλον, προσθε δ'ανασσην; they could bewail in theatres the enforced dishonour of Andromache, or sympathise with the lamentation of the virgin daughter of Priam:—

> I, to be sold to any man for silver,
> May fall unto a coarse and cruel lord.
> And I, who once was sister of my Hector,
> And of my other noble ones, I made
> The drudge of such an one, to grind the meal,
> To press the curds, and clean the master's house?
> My bed of marriage, which the sons of kings
> Were scarcely worthy of, to be bestowed
> By force, on any knave bought for the household?
> No! rather let me sever the free light
> From these poor eyes, and give myself to death!

Fictitious suffering is a pleasure to sympathy. But, if in classical instances we may show the realities of slavery,—evils to both the tyrannical and servile classes, which though displayed in poetry are not the less real,—we would point to the demoralisation of gorged and intoxicated Rome. We would call out of the comedies of Plautus those rascal servants, in whom there can be no honest fidelity, because they have the cleverness to see, how in their service they are defrauded of themselves. We would interrogate that sullen desperado, who is past effect of threatening, for he knows that his death will some day be "on the cross, where his father and his kindred were put." The catalogue of tortures, the rack, the gallows, the furca, chain, and branding-iron, the like of which a slave is made with shocking levity to enumerate, are the necessary furniture of slavery; the padlock affixed to the jaws of West Indian negroes, to prevent their sucking the sugar canes, had its prototype in the broad wheel around a man's neck, while kneading the dough, to hinder him from eating, as in the jest of Aristophanes. But if we would know the hideous result of systematic inhumanity, reacting on the social life, let us consult that austere satirist, who, in his own bad time, pronounced the city of Regulus an abode fit only for liars; the luxurious lady Juvenal mentions, who may have been the mistress, in her town and country establishments, of not fewer than four thousand human creatures, according to contemporary memoirs, is "such a very superior person," that having insisted on her husband ordering to death the victim of her peevish caprice, when he demurs to take the life of the man she answers,—"Do you call a slave a man?" We would introduce, as congenial acquaintance, Marie St. Clare to that other Roman matron, who, being out of temper, sends out for the professional floggers,—sunt quæ tortoribus annua præstent,—that she may superintend the whipping of her naked handmaids, meanwhile painting her face, receiving a morning call, inspecting a new dress, or reading the newspaper. What may not American slavery do, if it last long enough, in the development of a national character?

But we find one or two things, to be excepted. In the milder community of Athens, a slave might indite his master for aggravated assault; and many freemen were capitally punished, for injuries to slaves. By the constitutional law of Georgia, there is no punishment for one causing the death of a slave, "should it happen by accident while giving him moderate correction." An ill-treated slave might seek refuge in the heathen temples of Theseus, or of the Eumenides, until transferred to another owner. In Mahomedan Turkey, when a slave had cause to complain of ill-usage, he himself had the right to go into the market, and declare his wish to be sold. In the Spanish colony of Porto Rico, the master is obliged to sell a slave, when it is proved to the satisfaction of the syndic, that he treats him badly. Protestant Christian, democratic America, you have much to learn! The slave at Memphis on the Mississippi, who cut off his right hand to be revenged on the owner, because his wife had been sold to the embraces of a rich voluptuary, is a witness against you, and not against the Gentiles.

We leave this grievous subject, with only another reference, to the peril that has been mentioned of insurrection. What it is that means, history will show. A certain island in the Ægean sea was anciently infamous for the slave-trade and slave-breeding business, which Maryland and Virginia chiefly pursue. There was a revolt in Chios, as in Hayti; and a brave Toussaint l'Ouverture, whose Greek name was Drimacos. The attempt was tolerably successful, for the time, and another may be more so, at another time. There was a servile rebellion in Sicily, led by a ferocious enthusiast, who mustered sixty thousand exasperated savage men. With fire and murder they desolated the Sicilian plains.

We have enough pity for the slaves. But for their owners, we have more pity, mingled with horror, as for some unholy victim bound for an avenging doom. But there is yet time. May God send them both a peaceful and safe deliverance!

NORMAN HAMILTON.

(Concluded from page 141.)

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE FLIGHT.

It may readily be supposed that in the circumstances of the fugitives many words were not exchanged; but as it became evident that the coach was fairly beyond the suburbs, there remained no urgent necessity for any continued embargo on conversation; and accordingly the friends began to congratulate Hamilton on his escape.

"Norman, dear Norman," said Henry, eagerly clasping his hand, "we will ship you off at Queen's Ferry; and if you go abroad for a few years, we may negotiate for your pardon."

Norman sighed deeply, but did not answer.

"You seem very cold, Norman," continued his anxious brother; "cheer up, my dear fellow. You'll require all your energy to complete the escape."

Norman again sighed, and deeper than before; and immediately after, he was felt to sink down in his seat. Arnold, who happened to be sitting next him, caught him in his arms, and found that he was helpless as a child.

"Hamilton! speak, what is the matter?"

"I am dying," was his feeble reply. "The shot has taken effect."

The friends were in a state of distraction. It was still far from day-light, and the rain, long suspended, was now falling in torrents. A dying man in a dark carriage, and no help at hand,—the misery was well nigh insupportable. The coachman was ordered to drive to the nearest house; but as every jolt of the vehicle caused a fresh pang to the wounded man, the very attempt to obtain aid was only aggravating his sufferings. After a weary half-hour, the coachman descried a cottage on the road-side, the inmates of which permitted the wretched fugitive to take shelter under their roof; and also communicated the welcome intelligence, that a surgeon resided in the immediate vicinity. Before the arrival of this gentleman, the patient had become worse; and, on the wound being examined, no hope of recovery was held out. The ball had penetrated into a vital region, and it was evident that the acute suffering under which he laboured, would soon be at an end.

"God bless you all. Love to Flor——" The death-rattle choked him ere he could finish the sentence; and the short, eventful, sorrowful, sad career of Norman Hamilton was over at last. The wicked now ceased from troubling him, and his weary soul was at rest.

The friends hung over the inanimate remains, not venturing to give verbal expression to the heavy, stunning grief that overwhelmed them; and even the medical attendant, accustomed as he was to mortality in all its forms, could not but sympathize in a sorrow that seemed so genuine and unaffected.

"Has this been a duel, gentlemen?" inquired the doctor. "If it has, as you can no longer be of any assistance to your friend, I would recommend that you should think of your own escape."

Arnold, deeming concealment useless, briefly explained the case. The doctor then advised that they should communicate with the magistrates, who, on satisfying themselves that the prisoner was really dead, would probably be induced to give up the body, with a view to private burial. This suggestion was cordially responded to, and it was arranged that while Arnold and Henry should acquaint Florence with the dismal tidings of the death of Norman, Cook should proceed to the authorities and apprise them of the fate of their prisoner. The doctor hinted that Cook should deliver his message as from him (the medical attendant), and not acknowledge himself as one of the parties who personally had been privy to the escape; but Cook, who still had a morbid hankering after defiance of the law, stoutly resisted all idea of subterfuge, and declared that although he would not implicate any of the rest, he would most unquestionably make no attempt to conceal his own share in the transaction. Arnold and Henry well knew his opinions on such points, and did not venture to dissuade from this course, although aware that it exposed Cook to no little risk of legal vengeance. The corpse was then left in charge of the physician, and the three allies returned to town, to fulfil their respective missions.

A new disaster was communicated to them on their arrival at the rendezvous, which was Arnold's lodgings. Smallbairn and Florence were both in the vicinity of the jail when the escape was made, and they also had a conveyance which, for greater safety, had been drawn up in a remote street. They hovered about the gate after Arnold and Cook obtained admission; but taking alarm at the appearance of the town-guard, the two had run off in separate directions. Missing Florence, Smallbairn cautiously returned, and finding a female lying on the street groaning, whom he supposed to be the young lady, he had lifted her up and caused her to be driven home to Mrs. Porter's.

"She is badly hurt," said the schoolmaster; "but I merely handed her in, and did not stop, as according to our arrangement, I came here to arrange as to further procedure."

"Norman dead and my cousin dying!" exclaimed Henry; "this is too much for mortal endurance!"

The agitated youth hurried home by himself, to ascertain the extent of the superadded calamity, while Arnold remained to give an account of Norman's end to the gentle-hearted schoolmaster; and also to receive a report from Cook, as to the result of his interview with the civic dignitaries.

Henry soon returned with the intelligence that the wounded female was not Florence Hamilton, but poor Maggie Buchanan. The ill-fated girl had followed her father up to Edinburgh, and had narrowly watched the whole proceedings; and on observing that the town guard's-man was about to make a bayonet thrust at Norman, she generously interposed her own person and received the blow. The wound was a very serious one, and slender hopes were entertained of her recovery. Florence had returned home on foot alone, and was tending the wounded girl when Henry communicated to her the sad story of Norman's end; and he now returned at the express request of Florence, who was apprehensive lest any indignity should be offered to the body of her hapless cousin. Cook alone could communicate information on this point, and his return was anxiously looked for; but he did not make his appearance till past mid-day.

The patriot was chafed, as usually was the case, when he came into contact with the powers that were.

"Here's a pretty kettle o' fish," said he, as he seated himself in a state of extreme exhaustion; "twa or three days ago they would hae the bluid o' this young lad, reason or nane, and noo they'll no have him dead or alive, and say he has been very ill-used, and that they are sorry he is dead."

"What is the cause of this sudden change?" inquired Arnold.

"Why, ye see," replied the man of leather, "whaun rogues cast oot, honest men get their ain. There's a black-leg fellow, frae London, that ca's himsel' a Kornel, has peached on that seceder rascal, Reid, i' the Canongate, who has been dealing in note-forging for mair than a twal'-month,—I aye thocht Reid wasna the clean potato, and so it turns oot—the lang-faced villain, think o' him speakin' to the like o' me, about what he ca'ad my iniquity. Weel then, the constables set off in full bang to tak Theodore, but on going to his shop they fund that the bird had flown—he had drawn his siller oot o' the bank, and left naething but the wind o' his heels behind him. Even his very wife kens naething about him—or, at least, she says she does na ken; but there's nae believing thae anabaptist characters."

"Yet, how does this affect our poor friend, Hamilton?" inquired Arnold.

"Patience, patience," rejoined the irritated patriot; "I declare ye have as little patience as the dominie here. (Poor Smallbairn had not uttered a syllable, but Mr. Cook, being in a combative mood, that was enough.) Weel, then, hear ye this, and let me speak without interruption. Reid could not be found—and the haill town are after him; and as a reward of a hundred pounds has been offered for him, doubtless, he'll be nickit in due time. It never rains, however, but it pours — nae sooner had Sharpnose rubbed his hands at thocht o' catching Reid, than in comes the auld hag whose son maks the notes, and she peaches on the fellow that calls himsel' the Kornel, and sae laying ae thing wi' another, Sharpnose has as much evidence as will mak baith Reid and the London sprig swing to some purpose. Weel, they had the trap ready for the Kornel, and I, mysel, was to be ane o' the witnesses, for I doggit him ae nicht at the biddin' o' this same auld limmer, who deserves strappin' as weel as ony o' them; but ye ken rats sometimes will no go in to a trap, although there's toasted cheese in't; and sae the Kornel, who was to come back again and gie evidence against Reid, has never made his appearance, and as he seems to hae got an inkling o' what way the bowls are running, he's ta'en leg-bail neist, and sheriffs' officers are after him as well as his victim."

"But what about poor Hamilton's body?" persevered Arnold.

"There's it again—I was jist comin' to that very point, when ye maun interrupt me. Baith the Kornel and the hag woman, said that Hamilton was a complete victim, and merely dragged in to let the Kornel get off when he was in custody here some months ago, although he was then dressed so differently from what he now is, that even Sharpnose did na ken him. Weel, the bailies and provost and a' the rest, are sorry about Hamilton, and say noo that if he had been alive he would hae been reprieved, and that it's a great pity that he has been shot."

"And the body?"

"Ye can do wi' it what ye list. Before I could get a word o' them, they had heard that a man who had been fired at was lying dead in a house on the Queensferry-road, and they sent oot the governor of the jail and their ain doctor to identify him, and they are noo satisfied that the corpse is Mr. Hamilton's, and that he is really dead, and ye have liberty to do with it as ye have a mind."

"And the escape from prison?" queried Arnold, "are any proceedings to be instituted against those who aided in that matter?"

"None whatever—and that's the maist curious part o' the whole affair. The watchman had seen us go in, and he went to the town-guard, one of whom was to strike down the first man that came out, till other help was got. Then the jailors, wi' a view to screen themselves, swear that they were overpowered by a mob—and although I told them that four men had done the haill thing, and that I was ane o' them, they insisted down my very throat that I was speakin' for mere vainglory—and that if I really meant to be o' service to the country, I should go back to them at four o'clock to meet the old woman, who was to explain hoo my evidence wad tell against the Kornel rascal. I have a good mind not to go, jist to spite them; but it wad be a pity to let Reid off, so I dare say I'll have to go after a'."

It now seemed clear that the authorities were annoyed at the thought of their having captured and convicted an innocent person, who had so evidently been entrapped into an appearance of guilt, while the real culprits, who had all the while been within reach, had so dexterously contrived to elude detection. It was similarly evident, that the discipline of the jail had been of the laxest description, and that any following up of the escape would result in a humiliating exposure of the inefficiency of the system, and provoke still greater public odium. It therefore only remained for the friends of Hamilton to take advantage of this singular change in the aspect of affairs, by making arrangements for the recovery and interment of his body. It was accordingly brought to Mrs. Porter's house that same evening.

The girl, Buchanan, rallied considerably by the time that the corpse was brought back, and the physician acceded, with some reluctance, to the urgent entreaty of her mother, that she should be allowed to take her home to Leith. Mrs. Porter and Florence, who bore no unkindness to the poor girl, but rather were grateful for her generous self-devotion, in risking her own life in the vain attempt to save that of their relative; were yet not unwilling that they should be relieved at such a crisis of care and attendance on a sick and apparently dying person; and they also gave their consent to her removal, provided it was the opinion of her medical attendant that it could be done with safety. Maggie was content to die in the belief that she had been the preserver of Hamilton; but it was a sad blow to her to learn that a pursuer who came up at the twelfth hour, should have first wounded her, the shield, and then, after all, slain the shielded man. She eagerly inquired for the body; and on being informed that it was in the same house with herself, and in the adjoining apartment, she expressed a desire to see it so intensely earnest, that it was not deemed proper to refuse her request. She was prepared for her removal, and in passing was carried into the presence of the unconscious corse.

It surely could not be that that shrivelled, pinched form was all that was left of the manly youth, whom but a few months before she had beheld in strength, health, and beauty? Already was he surrounded by the upholstery of death, and the winding-sheet covered all, save the pallid face, sad indeed in expression, but yet serenely sweet now that it was for ever hushed in the repose of the final sleep. The silver chord so long cruelly stretched, was at length broken; the buffetings of life's waves were no more to be endured, for the spirit had found peace on another shore. The shadow of destiny had deepened into the darkness of doom, and the end had now come.

Mrs. Porter and Florence sat by the corpse, and they rose to receive the wounded girl—the iron of distress having, very evidently, penetrated deeper into her soul, than the steel had done into the flesh.

"We have heard much of your kindness to my poor cousin, my good girl," said Florence, "and shall never forget it. If there is any particular way in which we can express our gratitude, I am sure we should be glad to do it." Tears prevented further utterance.

"Aye, leddy, you can cry; but when will tears ever again gladden the eyes of poor Maggie Buchanan? I've seen me cry for very joy; but now I cannot cry for very grief. People sleep at nicht, but when have I slept? like the good people in the Bible, my locks have been wet wi' the dews o' night, but never my eyes wi' tears. I've sat, nicht after nicht, on the cauld pavement in the High-street, an' sometimes the blast has been keen, and the rain has made me shivery; but I saw the place whaur he was confined, and wasn't that reward o't itsel? Ye have sorrow, leddy, but it's godly sorrow. I hae sorrow, but it's hellish sorrow. My father has killed Norman Hamilton."

"Oh, dinna say that, bairn," implored Mrs. Buchanan; "ye ken that he saved him again."

"Aye, but who first put his dear life in danger? No, leddy, your sorrow is no my sorrow. But what recks it? Had he lived he wad hae lived for you or some ither grand lady. A poor man's dochter, like me, durstna hae lookit at him; and yet God knows, and my heart knows, that I had rather seen him yours, than lying there in that white shroud."

She knelt down, and gently lifting the hand of the corpse, kissed it affectionately.

"In heaven there is neither marriage nor giving in marriage, and he has gone there. Death levels a', leddy; and in the grave there's nae remembrance o' persons; for the rich and the poor are there at least equal."

"Now, Maggie," said the mother tenderly, "the doctor said that ye wasna to excite yoursel; for that if ye did, ye couldna get better. Come now, it's time ye were leaving the leddies."

"Yes, it's time, mother," she answered calmly; "but there's ae thing I wad like to ask, but I dinna ken how I can ask."

Sincerely pitying the poor girl, Florence hastened to assure her that her own grief was too sincere not to sympathize sincerely with the afflictions of others, and that she need have no hesitation in making any inquiry she thought proper.

"I wad like to dee," answered Maggie, "for I am heart sore and body sore, and I hae nae joys to look forward to in this life; but folk can neither live nor dee, jist as they like. God gives life, and it's him only that should tak it. I mayna live lang, but I wad like to go often and see his grave. I think the green grass will grow sweetly o'er it, and bonnie flowers will bloom upon it. Where will he be laid?"

Florence was unable to answer the question, for she was sobbing bitterly.

"We have had sae much distress," said Mrs. Porter to the mother, "and the puir lad's death has come on us so suddenly after we thocht a' things richt, that we havena had time to think about the funeral or onything else. The country doctor had got the corpse sorted before it cam here. Lackaday! lackaday! sae mony sore troubles will break my frail auld heart. The bairn that I have kept ever since he was born—to see him lyin' there in that state, it's mair than flesh and blood can weel stand."

"I'm sorry, very sorry for you, mem," replied Mrs. Buchanan.

"I dinna want to be unkind," resumed the old lady; "but ilka word that yer dochter's saying is hurting my puir lassie here; and really if ye could get her hame noo, it would be better for hersel and for us a'. We'll send to see hoo she is in the morning."

Mrs. Buchanan needed no such hint, as the whole interview had been to her distressing in the extreme; but knowing her daughter's temperament and tendencies, she had not seen how it was possible to avoid it.

"Maggie," she whispered, "they haven't yet fixed where he is to be buried, but they'll tell you when they do. Now, come, lean upon me, and let us go hame."

"Hame!" shrieked her daughter. "Speak o' hame to me! I ken nae hame, and never will till I am in the cauld kirkyard like him."

She tossed her arms wildly in the air, and stared unconsciously on all around, and her mother perceived with inexpressible pain, that one of those states of mental excitement to which she had recently been subject was coming on. The poor maniac then rushed suddenly forward to the corpse, she clasped it in her arms, and kissed its lifeless lips, in seeming ecstasy.

"He's mine! he's mine! I've dreamed it o'er and o'er again, that he was to be mine—and now I have him—if ye bury him bury me.

Come death, pass life.

"He's dead, is he? Weel there was an angel cam to me the ither nicht, and said that he was sent down from heaven for him. Mither, they wear white in heaven; he has on white, come an' I'll get on white too, come. An' there's the moon, that aye spoke to me when I was sitting in the eerie nichts i' the open street—she's white too, come."

The mother was but too glad to get her unfortunate daughter off under any pretext, and she at once availed herself of the wayward whim which prompted the wish to depart.

Maggie Buchanan said right, that neither life nor death are in our own hands. She lived, but the lamp of reason grew dimmer, day by day, and at last it sunk in total darkness. Her parents carried into early execution their long-cherished plan of emigration, and carried their helpless child with them, but long after they had left the Kirkgate, the story of Maggie Buchanan, hovered traditionally amongst succeeding generations.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE PURSUED.

"They run fast whom the devil drives." So says the proverb, and the proverb says truly—for although there have been doubts about the precise character of satanic agency, there can be no question that in their dynamics, rogues are influenced by the impellings of the evil one. Theodore Reid and the Colonel were both rogues, they both ran, and there can be little dubiety as to the origin of the motive power. They did not, however, run in couples, as may easily be conceived, when their relations to each other are taken into account—and that being the case the ungracious task devolves on us of tracking their several courses separately.

Theodore Reid saw distinctly that the meshes were drawing closer around him, and that Flint and the hag, both or either, would extort piecemeal from him all the money that they thought him possessed of, and then denounce him to justice. Theodore did not relish this system of slow torture, and he determined to make a bold stroke to avoid what he shrewdly calculated was his certain doom. Theodore's plan of escape involved two things: first, to withdraw his entire monies from the bank, and secondly, to set sail with the vessel which was to carry his herring adventure to Stettin—calculating that after arriving at the continental port, he could leisurely make his escape to America. He fixed the arrangement of the second item, in the first instance.

"Captain McKerlie," said Reid, to the commander of the brig, Little John, "when do you sail?"

"About high twelve at night," replied the Captain, "but as we can't have water after six we leave the harbour then—a boat comes ashore for me at twelve, as I have to wait for a passenger coming by the Glasgow night-mail, and after that we sail."

"Exactly—weel can ye keep a secret?"

"Well, I should think so."

"Your hand."

The Captain grasped Reid's fishy digits.

"Weel, sir, I want to try a spec wi cash in Stettin, but I dinna want a' the folk in Edinburgh and Leith to ken, because ye see they would raise the market. Noo if I was seen on your deck a' body would ken—I'll come down at twal and gang oot in ye'r boat."

"Very well—but you can send your luggage before six."

"Dootless," replied Theodore, drily, "but may be little o' that will serve me."

The Captain took his leave, and the merchant, delighted with the result of his arrangement of item number two, now bethought him of settling number one. He went next to the bank, where our old friend Mr. James Carmichael still officiated as head-teller—for as Copley's cheque had been countermanded before being presented for payment, the loss by that worthy had only amounted to five hundred pounds, which sum Mr. James had honourably paid, and the directors thereupon were graciously pleased to allow him to retain his office. The sharpest warnings in this world fade in process of time, and Mr. Carmichael was rapidly forgetting the dispensation that at one time had all but submerged him. He was sleek, condescendingly balmy in his affability, amblingly consequential in his walk as ever—and even at home he was beginning to tighten the strings on Kate, as in the older time. His idol Williamson of the mint could not in such a state of reaction be forgotten by any possibility—and in short and in point of fact Carmichael was now very much himself again.

"Mr. Carmichael," said Reid, with mock humility, "yill be surprised at what I'm gaun to do."

"Not in the least," replied the banker, "as my friend Williamson of the mint says, 'No man should be surprised now-a-days at any thing he sees or hears.' "

"Weel, sir, Mr. Williamson is a very clever man, and so are you."

"The first proposition I admit, Mr. Reid, and it shows your perfect good sense; the second I cannot assent to, although I am free to confess that no man could have had so much intercourse with Williamson as it has been my honour and privilege to have had, without being a wiser and better man for that same. But what's your business, Mr. Reid, you are one of our oldest and most respectable citizens, and if I can be of any service to you, command me. If ye want a letter of introduction to Williamson, just say the word."

"It wad be great honour," replied Theodore, bending himself; "but it's no' that. It's this. The markets in the north o' England are in a kittle state, and wi' ready money there's a lot o' things that I could buy to advantage; and if ye could let me hae frae ye, a' the siller that I have in your hands, principal, aye, and interest baith, I could clear some five-and-twenty per cent."

"That's all, Mr. Reid; now mark my words, for I quote the very words of Williamson, and they are the words of wisdom. If a man deals with a constitutional bank, reads a constitutional newspaper, and belongs to a constitutional church, is he not far happier? By-the-by, Mr. Reid, I wonder that you, a man of sense, should belong to a vulgar dissenting sect."

"Weel, I've been thinking of taking seats in the parish kirk."

"My dear sir, you delight me. Now attend again. If you had dealt with a vulgar, petty bank, you might not have got your money out—that is, at least, not without some difficulty; but in an establishment of this kind, sir, orders to any amount can be cashed immediately, and without delay—on that point most emphatic—no run can injure us. But we have our rules, Mr. Reid—we have our rules—the principal you may get just now, but not the interest, because this is not the constitutional period for balancing our accounts. Of course, if you were to be leaving the bank, or leaving the country, that would be another thing."

Theodore virtuously protested that neither of these thoughts had ever entered his head; although at the precise moment those thoughts were occupying his head and none other; but as the reader may possibly have already guessed Mr. Reid's ethics were not of the purest water, and therefore we do not stop to tax him with inconsistency.

"Very well, then," resumed the man of notes, "the capital you shall have—five thousand three hundred pounds appear to be at your credit in our ledger."

"The exact sum," replied Mr. Reid; "was there ever a bank on the earth so accurate as yours is?"

The teller smiled benevolently.

"I suppose, if I give you the five thousand, you don't mind leaving the odd three hundred as a nest egg?"

"If you please, Mr. Carmichael, I wad like it a'."

"Ah, very well—what kind of notes?"

"A hunder in goud, and the rest in Bank o' England notes, for I doot if our Scots notes wud pass weel on the ither side o' the Tweed."

"You shall have the money as you propose," answered the banker, courteously.

The money was told down, and Reid departed, inwardly chuckling that he had got his own so easily,—although we are of opinion, that if others had received their fair and just proportion of what this good man called his "own," he would not have had such a sum lying at his credit with the banker—that sum, be it observed, by no means representing his whole property, his stock in trade being large and valuable; but Theodore saw no safe method of converting heavy goods into fine gold, and valuing his neck at a higher rate than his drysalteries, he resolved to leave them, for a time, in the hand of Providence.

Returning to his shop, he called his confidential assistant, and thus announced to him his projected departure.

"Dauvit, I hae to gang thro' to Glasgow about some cheese, see that ye look after the shop, and don't be idling your time whaun my back's about. If that auld gentleman calls, that was here about the cheese the ither day, say that I'll be back the morn, and no to tak' ony steps in that matter that he was speaking to me about, till he sees me. He was to be here at twal o'clock; but as the coach starts in a quarter o' an hour, I canna wait for him."

Theodore's last ceremony was to take farewell of his wife, and, to do him justice, this effort did cost him some few qualms of conscience. Mrs. Reid had a nature cold and selfish as his own; and she had been a congenial helpmate to him, denying herself every luxury, and, sometimes, even the necessaries of life, in order to gratify his hoarding propensities. Theodore could not be said to love anybody, but, of all the rest of the world, he had least reason to hate his wife. He had not anticipated any difficulty in parting from her; but Reid, although belonging to the lowest of the species, was still human, and, for perhaps the first time in his life, he felt something like affection stirring within him. He dared not impart his secrets to her; she knew that in his dealings he sailed close by the wind, but of positive crime, and especially such as would expose him to capital punishment, she had never entertained the slightest suspicion. Besides, if he had any intention of making her his confidant, there was no time for necessary explanations. Most anxious was he to have given her some hint about the winding-up of his affairs, and the sale of his stock, and re-union in some foreign land; but the denouncer was at his heels, nay, was at the very door, and every moment was precious.

"Nanse," said he, "I have to gang to Dumfries, about some hams, I'll no be up to my dinner the day."

"You gang frae hame!" exclaimed the astonished "spouse, Nancy," "ye havena' missed ye'r dinner, or sleepit a nicht oot o' the house, for ten years."

"Aye, but I can pick up some fine bargains."

"That's different, ye'll need to get yer things ready before ye start."

"No, the coach starts in a quarter o' an hour, and I'll jist tak the great coat here. I'll seek naething else." [He had stuffed the pockets, and large and capacious they were, sometime before.]

"Whaun will ye be back?"

"The morn, or may be next day."

"That's a lang time, Theodore."

"Yes, here's half-a-crown to keep the house wi'—or na, ye can get what ye need frae Dauvit. Oh look after them, Nanse, they're a terrible careless pack whenever they ken that I'm oot o' sicht."

"Good day," said the wife, stretching forth her skinny hand, "I'll look after them."

Theodore left, but Mrs. Reid never felt more strangely in her life, and could she have lifted the curtain of futurity she would have been satisfied that she did not feel strangely without good reason. But we must follow her husband. He took the most circuitous and least frequented route to Leith, and on arriving there he made his way to Buchanan's tavern, sagaciously concluding that in the event of any alarm being given, that was the last place where he was likely to be sought. There was no one in charge of the house, save the slattern wench who has already been referred to, and Theodore ensconsed himself in a retired apartment with the intention of remaining there till dusk, when he thought he might venture out with more safety. It was a weary seat; he had turned his papers over and over again, counted and recounted his money, but the wished-for gloom of evening came on slowly. There seemed to be no west that evening, and when the sun did at last become stationary, it hovered long and tediously before it would dip beneath the horizon, and usher in reluctant night. Footsteps he heard in the next room, and he eagerly listened for any conversation that might follow.

"I thought ye had given up this howff, Binnacle," said one of the guests.

"Yes, I did, but since Buchanan has tried to make amends for his misdeeds, I have come back again—besides I want to hear how Maggie, poor thing, is keepin'; I aye had a wark wi' her."

"It's a pity that that poor fellow has been killed after a'."

"Yes," replied Binnacle, "it is—for a finer fellow never stept in shoe-leather, and I was certain frae the very first that he had naething to do wi' note-forgin'; but it's a consolation that the villains at the bottom o' the haill affair will be gotten and strapped without mercy."

"And who are the villains?"

"Have ye no heard? Reid, a psalm-singing rascal in the Canongate, is ane o' them, but the warrants are out against him, and he'll be a cleverer fellow than I take him for if he escapes."

Theodore became immediately conscious of a choking sensation which was peculiarly unpleasant, and he rang the bell.

"Lassie, what have I to pay?"

"Ten-pence."

"Ten-pence! ye'r surely demented."

"Saxpence for the porter, and four-pence for the bread and cheese," replied Mysie.

"Lord bless me! the wholesale price o' the porter is four shillings the dizzen, and I havena eaten a penny-worth o' bread and cheese. There's a saxpence to ye, and even at that price it's perfect extortion."

Mysie gallantly defended the door, and said it was more than her place was worth to admit of any reduced tariff of charge; and Theodore had, with a heavy heart, to disburse a shilling, while Mysie requested him to remain until she returned with the change. Theodore was willing to do a good deal for two-pence, but as the abigail was dilatory in returning, he deemed it prudent to sacrifice the copper rather than to run the chance of being a step nearer to justice. He slouched his hat and buttoned up his great-coat, and the dusk favouring him, he made for the beach, without being recognised apparently by any one whom he met by the way. Some friendly Memel logs were stretched on the sea-shore, and he contrived to get underneath them, and there remained till the probable time when the boat would be putting off for the brig that was lying in the roads.

If safe on board the vessel, he would bribe the captain and elude search; but if the captain should have heard of the news, as this person in Buchanan's had done, and if he were to tell the authorities about his being shipped off in a boat, he felt that the very arrangement which he had made to ensure his escape might turn out to be the identical thing that would lead to his capture. This was a terrible thought, and he lay amongst the logs and groaned in mortal agony. How heavy are the wages of sin, and how few are the hardships entailed on man when he pursues the right path compared with those dangers and terrors that haunt him after he has committed crime.

Reid crawled from his hiding place under the impression that the time was now about come when the boat should arrive. The night was dark as doom, the wind roared in hurricane strength, and the distant moaning of the sea, all conspired to impress the fugitive with fear and foreboding. He groped rather than walked towards the quay, but save the noise of the angry elements he could hear nothing. Another hour of suspense in that stormy night—conscience reproaching within, and the tempest raging without, —Reid was truly a humbled, affrighted, trembling man. The wind caused a sharp noise—the fugitive heard in it the voice of the pursuer, and in his terror he sprung forward—but what new sensation awaited him? He was in the air—and felt his breath going from him—the next minute he plunged deeply into the ground.

He had leaped over the quay; and it being low water, he was immersed up to the middle in the soft silt which formed the bottom of the harbour. He struggled to extricate himself, but the force with which he had fallen had precipitated him so deeply into the treacherous substance that extri-cation was impossible. His very gold helped to weigh him down. The sound of the approaching tide might be heard during the intervals when the wind was not heard, and what awaited him but to be drowned by the rising waters! They would swim round and round him and rise inch by inch till they swallowed him in him in their cold embrace!

And was this to be his end! He shrieked and he screamed—he implored and he blasphemed all by turns. He offered to give his gold, his money, his all to any one who would save him, but no voice answered to his cries save the gurgling broken waves, and the harsh sounding of the tempest's roar.

Next morning, when day broke, all traces of the storm had disappeared, but one relic of the violence of the night was yet to be seen. Some mariners who had early come on shore from the brig, in order to make amends for being unable, in consequence of the storm, to land at the time appointed, were appalled by the terrible sight that greeted them on their entrance into the harbour. A human head, with dark matted hair, and look of unearthly terror, peered above the calm blue waters. What demon was it, for human look it had not, that thus scowled upon the terrified seamen? It was their expected passenger. The sullen sea had fulfilled its mission of death, and rudely as it had dashed up to the criminal, it was now flowing gently back, and slowly revealing the spectre-like form of the drowned man.

The body was extricated with difficulty amidst the gaze of hundreds of spectators, but the boldest in all the throng never to their dying hour forgot the demoniac glare of Theodore Reid's dying agony!

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE END.

At the hour appointed Cook met the hag at Sharpnose's office. She was low and dispirited—her son had died that morning—her victims had escaped her snares, and with her dear passion of revenge unsatiated she was furious and ill at ease with the world and herself. She still cherished the hope that Flint would be captured, and directed that the authorities should proceed with Cook to the place where he had last been seen by the patriot, and assured them that if carefully searched the proofs of the fugitive's guilt would be clearly established. The search was made, and in a recess in a garden wall, a large paper parcel was found which contained not only the notes stolen from Carmichael, but other ill-acquired wealth, which settled all doubt as to the character of the Colonel. The notes were returned to the joyful Carmichael, but the silver goods of poor Kate had disappeared for ever. The chemistry of Theodore Reid had, as the reader knows, converted them into a solid form.

The Colonel was never found. Very probably he had gone abroad, and it is perhaps no breach of charity to suppose that he continued his evil courses to the end. Copley took leave of the world at Tyburn, and his memory has been duly embalmed among the heroes of the Newgate Calendar. The hag found an asylum in the charity workhouse, where she proved a troublesome inmate, till the arch-fiend whom she had so long and faithfully served, was pleased to receive her unto himself.

Character Cook slowly discovered that the true way to obtain distinction in this nether sphere is to make money, and after he had arrived at this conclusion he set to with tooth and nail to accumulate mammon. He succeeded, and having received lessons in moderation from Carmichael the banker, and Deacon Elliot, he in due season cast off his radicalism and became a good tory. In process of time also he appeared in the streets, adorned with a white neck-cloth, and gold watch-chain; and soon after this transformation he was appointed a member of the corrupt town-council. His republicanism was not soon forgotten, but Character snapped his fingers at all gainsayers—and as he ever retained his good-nature, society in time overlooked the change in his political creed. Good John Campbell emigrated to London, and became a popular Independent preacher; he subsequently went abroad and became a famous African missionary. His life has been written, and those who look into it will find that Norman Hamilton is not entirely the creation of a romancer's brain. Having finally lived in London, the "philanthropic ironmonger" is in reputation better known as the late minister of the Tabernacle chapel, than he is in Edinburgh, where the early portion of his most useful life was passed. If these pages should perform no other service they will at least remind his countrymen of the career of an estimable and most patriotic man.

Our first chapter began with the Honourable Jasper Hamilton, and our last must see him to his end; although, in truth, the undertaking of this part of our history has already been sufficiently formidable. The honourable gentleman was long in bad health, and continued very ill-natured during the whole period of his sickness. The fate of Norman he never knew, and he was equally in the dark as to the history of Henry Hamilton. He passed much of his time in a state of semi-unconsciousness, but at last, while he one day was lifted up in bed to partake of his solitary frugal meal, his face became more purple than usual, and the alarmed domestics fled in all directions for assistance. One went for the physician, and another for the minister; but both functionaries arrived too late to be of any essential assistance. The leech assumed a dubious look, and said, that medicine had long been struggling to keep in check an incurable malady—the morbid element had decidedly obtained the upper hand, and life's forces could not long maintain the unequal fight; the gout had proceeded upward and inward to the great centre of vitality, and in a brief space it must cease its functions. Death had lifted its skeleton arm, and mortal aid could not arrest its blow; there are many battles in life where love and money can assist, but when the last struggle comes, every son of Adam must fight for himself alone and unbefriended. No earthly companionship avails in the passage through the dark valley of the shadow of dissolution. The physician summoned for the soul of the rich man was equally powerless, for the senses of the expiring Dives were one by one refusing to fulfil their offices. The kind-hearted Armstrong prayed, and prayed fervently, for the parting spirit, but the ear of him for whom he interceded was closed against external sound—other and deeper sounds may have been heard, but the utterances of earth were inaudible to him—yet the impassioned look, and the up-turned eye, and the clasped hands; the import of these significant gestures could not be misunderstood, and the glazing eye seemed conscious of their meaning, and the stiffening hand was perceptibly extended to the pastor, as if in token of gratitude and reconciliation. Armstrong clasped the hand with affectionate warmth, and in a few moments more, what was so lately the proud, irascible, wealthy, and Honourable Jasper Hamilton was now an inanimate clod.

An express had been dispatched to Edinburgh requesting the attendance of Florence and Henry, and also of Mr. Joseph Taylor, but they arrived too late to witness the final scene. The two cousins were still in deep mourning, for the catastrophe of Norman Hamilton had been consummated only three months before, and still fresh in their great grief, they gladly devolved all arrangements connected with the departure of their uncle, on the cautious lawyer. Smallbairn, ever observant, saw that Mr. Joseph demeaned himself very obsequiously towards the cousins, and he concluded from this circumstance, that their uncle's settlement must have been favourable towards them; for as Mr. Joseph never acted without a distinct object in view, it was difficult to reconcile his suavity with any other theory.

The old gentleman having lived unbeloved, he died unlamented: but as the wretched make-believe of this world carries its hollowness to the very mouth of the sepulchre, and would doubtless go further if it dared, a large concourse of people voluntarily attended the funeral obsequies, and assumed for the nonce cloaks as inky and faces as solemn, as if they had been mourning the departure of one of the great and good ones of the earth. Reader! how many will be truly sorry when you die? Reckon yourselves fortunate if six righteous persons regret your loss; it is assuredly greater than the average of such regrets. You may be of a different opinion, and as you can never personally test the truth or falsity of our proposition, it were needless to argue the matter; but if you are ambitious of posthumous honour, the consideration of our theory may induce you to apply more earnestly to the great business of existence—that of living well.

The last mourner had disappeared, the sexton had cast aside his spade and the rusty iron-door of the Hamilton vault had been with difficulty closed, and then Mr. Joseph Taylor beckoned on the minister, schoolmaster, and physician to follow him and Henry Hamilton into the castle. There was no necessity for the three professional gentlemen, but Mr. Joseph loved the appearance of show, and especially when he himself was to be the chief actor. Poor Florence and Mrs. Porter were also summoned to the library, for the man of law would have his form carried out. Torry broke the seals of the repositories, and Mr. Joseph, with unerring instinct and scarcely with the aid of vision, plunged his hand into a large pigeon-hole, where the huge parchment was deposited.

"I think this is the settlement of the deceased, but we shall see:" and Joseph adjusted his spectacles, to discover what he knew was already there.

"Whereas, I, the Right Honourable Jasper Hamilton, of Thornton and Thornton Castle, in the county of Mid-Lothian, being in my full and perfect senses, and being anxious for the disposal of my property, heritable and personal, bonds, bills, household furniture, and haill gear and effects, &c. &c. &c."

We shall not quote the whole testament, as we might thus be giving the benefit of Mr. Joseph's legal forms to some niggardly persons desirous of making their own wills—a most expensive luxury to their relatives, and the most fruitful source of litigation that can bless the gentlemen of the long-robe—we shall, therefore, content ourselves with stating, that the honourable gentleman had left Thornton estate and Thornton Castle to Norman Hamilton, and the residue of his property, "share and share alike," to Florence and Henry.

"Mr. Jasper," resumed the writer, "often spoke about disinheriting Mister Norman, but I gave him nae encouragement in that view; and, as his health got badly, he spak less about it: and so the upshot is, that Mr. Henry heirs the landed and house property, and, wi' Miss Florence, the half o' the moveables. There is not a bawbee o' incumbrance on the haill land: the tenants are thriving and industrious, and some of the leases are nearly out. George Tamson, at Braehead, has been sitting for half naething. I wad raise him for ane, Mister Henry; he'll stand a rise o' ten shillings the acre, and if he speaks about your biggin a new barn, if I were you, I wad tell him to look oot for a new landlord. The trees in some o' the plantations are far too thick; and, as the ships canna get frae the Baltic, on account o' the frost, timber will bring a good price in Leith, jist now. Then, there's the siller i' the bank. Miss Florence, he has been living at less than the interest, I can assure you."

"I dare say it is all right, Mr. Taylor," replied the young lady; "but I suppose it is not necessary that Mrs. Porter and I should remain longer here. I shall give directions that your comforts are duly attended to."

And with this she retired, much to the annoyance of Master Joseph, who would joyfully have treated her to an articulate statement of the items of her inheritance. The lawyer then essayed a similar infliction on Henry, but he also declined the honour; and as Torry could not suppress a rising titter, Joseph became exceedingly testy. The conference would have broken up, had not Potter, to the surprise of all, craved the favour of being allowed to put a few questions. This being granted, the reverend gentleman proceeded to put his interrogatories.

"Am I to understand that you are now the patron of the church and parish of Groombie, Mr. Henry?"

"Clearly," interposed Taylor; "the benefice gangs wi' the land. See the Heritors o' Bullsegg versus the Laird of Bullsmithy; and also 'Erskine's Institutes,' section third, chapter four."

"Then I crave permission to resign that living into the hands of you, the honourable patron, provided that ye induct into the same Mr. James Smallbairn, schoolmaster of this parish. Mr. Smallbairn has been well-known to me for a series of years. He has taught the parochial school with acceptance, giving satisfaction to the parents and to the manifest improvement of the scholars. As a man he is esteemed, and as a preacher he is clear in his exposition of the truth, and warm in pressing it home to the hearts and consciences of his hearers. He is——"

"My dear sir," said Henry, interrupting the amiable Potter, who appeared to labour under the hallucination that he was writing a formal certificate for his friend, and not making a few verbal remarks in his behalf, "it is unnecessary for you to say a single word in commendation of Mr. Smallbairn. I know him well, and thoroughly appreciate his character and abilities. There is another parish of which I am patron, and the incumbent of which is older than you; keep your living, my dear Mr. Armstrong, and depend on it that your friend shall receive a benefice very soon."

"I am not free to see Mr. James Smallbairn longer without a church," persevered Armstrong.

"Well, then," said the grateful Smallbairn, "since the new laird is so kind, and since you are so anxious for my promotion, I may propose a plan which shall meet the wishes of you both. I am much attached to this place, and recent changes will bind me to it more closely still. If the people are agreeable, I shall be glad to become Mr. Armstrong's assistant and successor."

"And live in the manse wi' me?"

"If you are agreeable."

"It's a bargain," and honest Armstrong very nearly wept tears of joy.

"But always, of course, on the supposition that I receive a distinct and unequivocal call from the people," added Smallbairn, for the schoolmaster was strong in the matter of anti-patronage, and tenaciously held that the church has a jurisdiction separate from that of the civil magistrate.

"The people," echoed Taylor, "a fig for the people; what bizziness have they to interfere wi' the legal rights o' the patron. I tell you what it is, Mr. Smallbairn, if Mr. Hamilton gi'es you the presentation, and if I get it extended on a five pound stamp, (I'll charge you a trifle less than the society fees for drawing it oot,) if ane of the people says 'cheep!' I'll let him see that it's term day wi' him. See what France has come to, wi' its nonsense about the richts o' the people. If the commonality want to choose their minister, let them pay for him. I really wonder to hear a man o' your sense, and college-bred too, sporting sic' nonsense."

"I hold by my principles, Mr. Taylor, you can hold by yours," replied the liberal preacher.

"Gentlemen," interposed the patron, "leave the matter in my hands, if you please. I respect Mr. Smallbairn's scruples, they are proper and becoming, but I am confident that from the estimation in which he is held by the whole parish, that the call will be general and the settlement harmonious."

As might have been anticipated, no difficulty was found in inducting Smallbairn into the cure of Groombie, in the mode proposed by himself; and that matter being adjusted to the satisfaction of the reader, there is only one remaining point, on which we may reasonably suppose that his curiosity remains unsatisfied, and that is, did Florence Hamilton marry Henry?

There is no doubt that Florence had secretly given her heart to Norman, although, in express terms, she had never said so, and there was much in the circumstances attending his end to induce her to forego the transference of her affections to any less-loved object. Henry knew her struggle, and he respected her none the less that she had preferred to himself, a brother to whom he personally was so much attached. Between the two surviving cousins there had ever subsisted a thorough congeniality of feeling; every nook and corner of the old castle had been familiar to them from their earliest childhood; and it seemed a matter of course, that Florence, although quite capable of setting up a separate establishment, should remain mistress at Thornton Castle; and it equally seemed a natural thing that Henry, although at liberty to marry in any one day of the calendar, yet never in imagination conceived of paying his addresses to several very eligible ladies in the neighbourhood. Henry never talked of love—not that he was not an ardent lover, but, from his knowledge of Florence's character, he knew that the wounds of the heart take longer time to heal than those of the body, and he was content to bide his time. If two parallel lines have but the slightest convergence, they will, in due season, run into each other — the convergence existing, the junction is a mere matter of space. It is the same with wedlock—two parties living in harmony with each other, and kept separate only by a remembrance of grief, will, when the wound gets cicatrised, enter into the matrimonial relation, as certainly as the stars gravitate towards the sun. If you tell me that this destroys the illusion of love—I answer that it is real, actual, current, every-day life. If you are a married man, don't pry too curiously into the list of sweethearts who dangled about your wife long before you were heard of; or if you believe that you were her first and only love, can you say, with anything like certainty, that she was yours? Or farther, as these are considerations, rather secret in character, and therefore incapable of tangible proof, we shall clench the matter by a reference to the conduct of widows. It is a well-known fact that many loving wives do, at the death of their husbands, unite themselves to other helpmates. Their affection to number one (we mean of the husbands) was undoubted, and doubtless the good-man thought so himself; but when number two was assumed, love was equally tender towards him, and he, also, would be conscious of the fact—and if he quitted the world prematurely, the same pleasant result would happen in the case of number three. The human heart is a wonderful organ, and one of its marvellous properties, is its elasticity—it bends to the shower only to rise to the sunshine. Let not, therefore, Florence Hamilton be blamed, if after a voluntary oblation of two years to the memory of one to whom she had not been married, who had never asked her in marriage, to whom she had not plighted her troth—let her not, we say, be blamed, if, ultimately, she gave her hand, and such of her heart as remained, to another suitor. At all events, whether such a thing was in itself right or no, such a thing was done, as any one who consults the file of the Edinburgh Evening Courant, may satisfy himself.

"Married at Thornton Castle, by the Rev. James Smallbairn, on the 20th May, 1793, the Right Honourable the Earl of Orchardfield, K.T., to Florence only daughter of the late Honourable Thomas Hamilton of Fairhaugh."

The Earl of Orchardfield! Did she jilt Henry Hamilton her cousin after all? No. Did he jilt her? No. Did they mutually agree to differ? No.

Here is the mystery.

The Earl of Orchardfield died without male issue, and Henry Hamilton as the nearest male heir acquired the title. The new earl became a patriotic nobleman, and till his death was returned a representative Scotch Peer in Parliament, and moreover—he did not, like Character Cook, turn his back on his old principles, but steadily adhered to moderate reforming progression.

The name and story of the noble convict whose career has now been feebly traced gradually faded from the public recollection; but to the last the Earl and Countess of Orchardfield visited his lonely grave in the old picturesque churchyard of Restalrig—but in turn they too paid the debt of nature, and now, except an aged judge and a venerable citizen, perhaps none in modern Edinburgh will trace in these pages the stern destiny of Norman Hamilton.

HOW A FORTUNE WAS MADE.

You wish me to tell you how, after my escape from the horrors and perils of the French Revolution of 1789,* I managed to retrieve my fortunes, and place myself once more in an independent position. Well, I will tell you the story as circumstantially as, at the present distance of time, I am able to recollect it.

Having escaped with little more than a whole skin from France at the death of Robespierre, and returned to England, I was compelled to seek employment in any occupation suited to my qualifications. A knowledge of the French and German tongues, accomplishments at that time of day not so common as they are now, simply perhaps because they were not so much wanted, procured me a respectable post in a mercantile house of some standing, for whom I did the double duty of cashier and corresponding clerk. I was hardly more than twenty at the commencement of my engagement in the spring of 1795, and I remained thus occupied for eleven years, occasionally travelling abroad for a month or two in the summer, in the execution of confidential commissions intrusted to me by my principals. I was still a young man when, in the year 1806, news arrived in England of the capture of Buenos Ayres by Sir Home Popham, who, without any authority from the British Government, (having settled the business of the Dutch bottoms under Jansens, and cabbaged the Cape of Good Hope to serve for a Tom Tiddler's ground for unfledged Governors to play the fool with,) had started across the Atlantic, picking up reinforcements by the way at St. Helena, and, dashing at the Spanish capital, had carried it by a coup de main.

If I were to talk for a month of nothing else, I should hardly succeed in giving you an adequate notion of the effect which the arrival of this news had upon the commercial world in England. Whether it be that there is anything talismanic in the two syllables "South Seas," I don't pretend to guess; but the fact once established that Buenos Ayres was ours, produced an infatuation comparable to nothing else of the kind which I can recall to mind. It was like a revival of the Mississippi scheme of Law, and had its effects not been confined to a certain class of the community, in all probability it would have resulted as ruinously. Merchants went mad upon the subject of the South Seas. Manufacturers were forced to work by relays day and night; and enormous consignments of anything and everything which could be produced by labour were dispatched headlong without prudence or premeditation for the mouth of the Plate. It is a fact consistent with my own knowledge, that among other things for which no reasonable being could have expected a demand, cargoes of winter clothing which would have been a godsend to an Esquimaux, and consignments of Sheffield skates, were hurried off to a tropical climate with the view of realizing a tremendous profit by their disposal. Infatuation was the order of the day. Everybody who had the means determined on a venture, and every vessel that could be caught up, whatever her sailing qualifications or condition as to seaworthiness, was chartered and freighted with commodities of all descriptions for the South American market.

I cannot boast of having been myself free from the prevailing mania, and I invested a small sum of money in the purchase of weapons, which I thought would be at least as likely as skates or snow boots to yield a profitable return. The house which I served held aloof from these speculations for a season; but they were bitten at last, and then set about making up for lost time with a vigour very different from their usually cautious and methodical mode of doing business. One morning I was surprised, while dressing, by a citation from the principal of the firm, to wait upon him at his breakfast table. During the meal he abruptly put the question to me, "Are you disposed to go on board the Lance as supercargo and agent, and to sail at once?" Though not very much surprised at the question, I was rather staggered at the suddenness of the requisition. I did not however object, but begged for a day or two to prepare my outfit. A few hours was all that could be allowed. My employers knew my penchant for travelling, and had rightly calculated that I should be at their command at any moment. I was no sailor, and knew but little of the necessaries required on ship-board, but I made the best use of the little time allowed me—had all my luggage packed snug in the course of the afternoon, and that same night started in the mail for Liverpool, where the vessel lay, waiting only the arrival of the supercargo to proceed on her voyage. The Lance was nearly a new vessel of 500 tons burden, belonging to our house; and this would be but her third voyage. She was freighted with Manchester and woollen goods, and, besides a crew of eighteen or twenty hands, had a dozen passengers on board, most of them carrying small ventures of their own. I had been furnished with a sealed packet of instructions, and duplicates of the invoices, and these I took occasion to con over during my journey to the coast. I found myself charged with the entire responsibility of the cargo, and invested with a discretionary power as to its disposal; and from a copy of the directions forwarded to the captain of the vessel, which was enclosed, I saw that he was bound to navigate the ship to any part of the American coast that I might think proper to direct.

Upon arriving at Liverpool and making inquiries, I learned that the Lance had worked out of the docks, and was lying a few furlongs down the river, waiting for sailing orders. A few hours afterwards I climbed her black side, laid my credentials before the captain, who, the moment his eye had caught the signature of the firm, gave the word for weighing anchor, and then, with a tolerably fair wind, we dropped down the Mersey into St. George's Channel.

I have said I was no sailor. Two or three passages across the straits of Dover constituted the whole of my previous maritime experiences; and you need not be surprised that when a fresh breeze sprung up, as we entered the open sea, I was thrown upon my back in my berth, where I had to undergo the usual seasoning which reconciles land-lubbers to the brine. The Bay of Biscay is a very ugly cradle for a qualmish patient; and the consequence to me was, that more than a week had elapsed before I was in a condition to shew my face on deck, where I could hear, as I lay groaning in my berth, that there was no lack of merriment on board. One fine morning, however, when the sun was shining brilliantly, and the breeze had moderated a little, I managed to dress and get on deck. The sudden change of air and scene, the magnificent and, to me, novel spectacle around, and the warm welcome I received from my fellow-passengers, banished my sickness at once. For a week I had eaten next to nothing, and had loathed the sight and even the bare mention of food; but I had not been two hours on deck, before a ravenous appetite drove me to the captain's cabin, where cold fowl and ham vanished down my throat, until I was ashamed of the exhibition I was making of myself, and desisted from modesty rather than satisfaction.

I now began to look around me, and found reason to congratulate myself upon my situation. We had an able and orderly crew, a captain who was a man of very few words, but who knew his business, and a dozen passengers besides myself, nearly all of whom were young fellows of my own age, full of enjoyment and confident in the future, which no one of them doubted would crown their expectations with success. We had a two months' voyage before us yet, and we were all of one mind as to the necessity of passing the time as agreeably as possible. Drafts, chess, backgammon, and rubbers of whist, alternated with music, dramatic reading and recitations, served to pass away the long evenings; and bobbing for sharks, firing at sea-birds or floating bottles thrown overboard, athletic games on deck, or racing among the rigging, found us amusement and appetite during the day. There were some smart wits on board, and some of these originated another species of amusement, which gave rise to no small amount of mirth. This was the publication of a series of clever pasquinades, which were found every morning placarded on the mainmast, whither we were accustomed to flock as soon as we turned out, to criticise and interpret them according to our fancy, amid roars of laughter. It happened, and it is only one of the characteristics of such a mania, that several of our party, in their eagerness to secure means of transport for themselves and their goods, had neglected all attention to their outfit, and had come on board the Lance with no better provision for a long voyage than a traveller by rail now puts into his carpet-bag, on starting for a journey of a few days. Among the rest was a light-hearted Irishman, quite a gentleman in manners, who had actually come on board with but two shirts for his whole stock. The consequence was, as borrowing was out of the question, that in a very short time he was literally reduced to the wash-tub; and, there being no female on board, was compelled twice a week to officiate as his own laundress. His exploits in this way were the theme of a good many of the anonymous productions which every morning appeared on the main-mast. A part of one of them, I recollect, ran thus :—

To all good people be it known,
Who sail to Buenos Ayres,
That our poor comrade, Bob Malone.
As mad as a March hare is.

For twice a week he takes a spell,
At washing his old shirt, sirs;
And though he's proud of washing well,
It's never free from dirt, sirs.

Which latter assertion, at least, was perfectly true, Bob's linen presenting anything but a Beau Brummel appearance, though he did the best he could with it. He was a fellow of infinite good temper, and not only bore all such references to his ménage with good humour, but actually took part in them himself. He seemed to consider that he should be robbing us of our entertainment and acting unfairly, if he got over his bi-weekly ceremony in any out-of-the-way hole or corner of the vessel; and, therefore, he regularly brought his tub upon deck, and went through the business with the utmost deliberation, in view of all on board. His chief persecutor was a young fellow of the name of Osborn, who had formerly managed a plantation in St. Vincents, and who was intending to settle again in the West Indies so soon as he should have realized the profit of his venture, from the proceeds of which he had resolved to purchase land and negroes on his own account. The rest of our adventurers were mostly clerks or managers from London houses; and all were sanguine as to the results of their speculations—each man imagining that he had outwitted his compeers by the superiority of the investment upon which he had ventured his capital.

I need not dwell upon the events of the voyage, which, though it will always remain as one of the pleasantest recollections in my own mind, presents no remarkable features. We did not forget the customary ceremonies on passing the line, when Malone had his revenge upon some of us, from the superiority of his genius in the concoction of practical jokes. The voyage was fortunate as it was agreeable. We had neither death nor sickness to deplore; which latter was a great mercy, as the captain was the only doctor on board, and his whole stock of medicine was contained in a square chest not bigger than a hat-box. With all our merriment, however, and we were in the humour to laugh at everything, we were none of us sorry when the voyage drew to a close, and a man was sent to the mast-head to look out for land. This was on the second of November. The coast was not sighted by sun-down, but we slackened sail during the night, and the next morning saw us within a few miles of the British fleet, lying off the mouth of the River Plate. While at breakfast, we were boarded by a man-of-war's boat, which brought us news that suddenly dashed all our hopes to the ground, and spread the gloom of disappointment and prospective ruin upon every countenance.

We then learned for the first time that the city of Buenos Ayres, which we had calculated upon finding in the possession of the British, had been retaken by the Spaniards—that the whole of the British forces, amounting in all to little more than 1500 in number, had been either cut to pieces, or made prisoners—and that Sir Home Popham, who had with difficulty escaped from the slaughter, and got on board the fleet, was then blockading the town, and awaiting the arrival of reinforcements, with the intent of recovering his lost prize. This reverse was owing to the strategy of a French officer in the Spanish service, who taking advantage of a dense fog, had crossed the estuary from Monte Video with a force of 1000 regular troops, and by thus imparting vigour and co-operation to an insurrection within the city, had overwhelmed the English force, and dictated terms of surrender, which, however ignominious, they were in no condition to refuse.

Here was a miserable consummation to the sanguine expectations of our jovial party! I shall never forget the spectacle of long faces that arose from that cabin breakfast-table, nor the contrast they offered to the hilarious looks with which, half an hour before, we had sat down to it. A gloomy silence, now and then broken by the abrupt and passionate ejaculation of an oath, followed the departure of the man of war's boat, which carried off a couple of our ablest seamen. In the course of the day, however, we recovered some portion of our lost spirits, and nothing contributed more towards this—perhaps I ought to be ashamed to say it—than the arrival of three other vessels bound on the same errand as ourselves, whom we saw consecutively boarded by the same boat, and subjected to the same experimentum crucis. Companionship in misfortune doubtless lessens its severity; and we began to take a spiteful sort of pleasure in counting the multitude of victims to the same calamity which had ruined ourselves. These soon became so numerous as to convince us that even had the chances of war not shut up our market, the fury of competition arising from the abnormal glut of merchandize of all descriptions must have been nearly as fatal to our prospects. The weather was comparatively mild, and this was so far fortunate as it facilitated the means of intercommunication. We had arrived after the hurricane season, which had prevented the embarkation of our troops, and occasioned their surrender to the Spaniards. Meetings were held daily on board one or other of the vessels continually arriving, to deliberate as to the best mode of procedure in the awkward circumstances in which we stood. I cannot say that much satisfaction resulted from these councils. We came to a determination, however, to seek advice from the Commander-in-chief, and sent a deputation to him for that purpose, a proceeding, by the way, for which I did not myself vote, not having any faith in it. The deputation returned from Maldonado, whither they had gone to seek the general, very considerably chop-fallen; they had not been honoured with an interview, but were sent back with a rather contemptuous message, verbally delivered through a subordinate, to the effect that, as the traders had come out to please themselves, they were at perfect liberty to go back if they didn't like it—he didn't send for them, and wasn't going to provide for them. Sir Home, in fact, was not in a very complaisant mood. The late failure of his attack on Monte Video, added to his summary disgrace at the capital, had spoiled his temper, which the sight of his troops cooped up in a beggarly town, all but destitute of conveniences, was not calculated to improve. He was recalled not long after, and took his passage home, where he had to face a court-martial, by whom he was severely reprimanded for his unauthorized precipitation in the whole affair.

Finding that all chance of coming to a trade with the Spaniards was hopeless, many of the vessels, after a short stay, sailed away to seek a market in other ports. My instructions, though loading me with more responsibility than I should have sought, hardly allowed of my following their example; and I wrote to my principals, stating the circumstances of the case, and demanding further directions. Before my letters could have arrived in London, I had received advices from my employers from which I learned that they were in possession of the history of events; and from which also, as they directed me to hold on, and bide my time for a market, I judged that they must be privy to a determination on the part of the government to avenge the disgrace of the British armies by the final reduction of Buenos Ayres. Though I did not much relish the prospect before me, still as several of my companions, with whom I shared my intelligence and conjectures, resolved to remain on board, and participate in our fortune, we contrived to pass the time tolerably enough. An acquaintance which I had formed on shore on one of my visits, led to a familiarity with a lieutenant in the navy, a relative of one of our firm, with whom I and my companions sometimes spent whole days on board his frigate; and as the welcome we received was reciprocated on our part on board the Lance, we managed to pass away the time without suffering much from ennui.

At the end of January, Sir Samuel Auchmuty, who, after the recall of Sir Home, had arrived with a pretty strong reinforcement at Maldonado, finding no accommodation for his men in that place, commenced the storming of Monte Video. This affair, which is generally considered as a very brilliant one, I had the pleasure, if it is a pleasure, of witnessing. The cannonading endured for a whole week before a breach was effected, and would have endured perhaps for a week longer had there been powder enough to carry it on; but all that being at length well-nigh shot away, an assault was ordered, which took place an hour before dawn on the second of February. What induced our fellows to go groping in the dark in search of a breach which was barely visible in the day-light, I don't know; but to it they went pell-mell, and five hundred of them were shot down before they knew where they were going. It was not till dawn broke, and they could see their way, that they discovered the breach, through which they poured like a cataract, carrying everything before them. They suffered a heavy loss, but it was said they slew a thousand of the enemy and took double that number of prisoners. The happiest result, however, was the capture of the place itself, which was well fortified, and yielded that accommodation to the British which they so much wanted. It was taken in the very nick of time, a large force of the enemy being on the way to raise the siege.

The success of this exploit had a prodigious effect on our spirits. We now began to look upon the possession of the whole country as an event not much longer to be deferred, and our hopes brightened accordingly. All was life and gaiety as well on board as on shore, and entertainments were reciprocated with a jovial hospitality that became quite contagious. As spring drew on we began to look out for the arrival of General Craufurd, who, with reinforcements of four or five thousand men, we knew was making for the River Plate. Still, month after month rolled away, and there was no sight of the wished-for transports. In May General Whitelock arrived at Monte Video, and took the command, and then came a change in our way of life. There was an end at once to our parties, visitings, and jollifications; grim-visaged war again showed his wrinkled front, and every device that could be thought of was resorted to in order to increase the numbers and efficiency of the host which was to chaw up Buenos Ayres at a mouthful, and make us masters of the country.

One morning, I received from London a packet, enclosing final instructions as to the disposal of the cargo of the Lance. The firm, tired at length of waiting the uncertain issue of the war, directed me to dispose of the lading at any sacrifice, naming a minimum sum at which I might, if it suited my views, become the owner of the whole myself, and desiring me to return with a cargo of sugar as soon as conveniently practicable. From observations I had been by this time able to make, I knew well enough the actual value of the goods on the spot where they were, and I saw at once that a liberal profit must be made by selling them, even taking all disadvantages into account. I did not, therefore, hesitate a moment, but sat down at once and wrote off, accepting the proposal, and enclosing my note of hand for the sum named. I had hardly time to congratulate myself upon this stroke of business, and had barely laid the foundation of a magnificent castle in the air, when, taking my morning's walk upon the deck, I saw a tall fellow uncommonly like a drill-serjeant clamber on board over the side of the vessel, followed by a file of soldiers, who ranged themselves in order, barring my passage down to the cabin. I walked up to the intruder, and, with a polite bow, requested to know the purport of his visit.

Without condescending to notice me even with a look, he bawled for the Captain of the Lance, and being informed that he was below, sent one of the seamen with a peremptory message for his immediate appearance. The captain, who did not choose to be at anybody's command on board his own vessel, took no notice of the request, beyond threatening the messenger with a round dozen if he dared to bring him such another. The officer, finding the captain was in no hurry to oblige him, sent another message still more insolent. Of this the sailor refused to be the bearer, and told him he had better carry it himself. The fellow, thereupon, dashed down below, and then we heard him and the captain in loud altercation for some minutes. When at length both, flushed with wrath, came upon deck, the bully condescended to explain his business, which was, to inspect the list of passengers and crew, with a view to the enrolment of volunteers in a new brigade which was forming, and towards which it was expected that the Lance, like all other vessels in the offing, should furnish a quota. I thought this was an odd way of collecting volunteers, and it is likely that I expressed as much in my countenance, for the fellow returned the look I gave him with a sneering kind of grin which promised anything but a pleasant termination to his morning call. When the list of the crew was read over, the men answered to their names, with the exception of course of the two who had been pressed on our arrival. The captain refused to read the list of passengers, and gave it to the officer, who proceeded to call over the names himself. There were six of them still remaining on board, as many having departed to pursue their fortune elsewhere; but though the brute bawled the whole dozen names twice over, not a voice was heard in acknowledgment of any one of them. Finding at length that we were not to be brow-beaten, he condescended to adopt a more considerate tone, and informed us that, as British subjects, we should be expected to co-operate with his majesty's forces in the projected attack upon the Spaniards, adding that we were at liberty to do so as volunteers, or we might enlist, receiving the usual bounty, into either of the regiments of the line.

"And just for the sake of variety, now," said Malone, adjusting the frill of his shirt, so as to conceal its ragged edges, "suppose that a gentleman, having no very violent predilection for his majesty's service, should decline to do either?"

"Then, by God," growled the ruffian, "he'd be likely to find himself in limbo before twenty-four hours were over, and strung up for a traitor by the end of the week."

"We will take time to consider of this honourable proposition on the part of his majesty," I said, "and in the mean time perhaps you will do us the favour of prosecuting your canvass elsewhere."

"Consider as much as you please," was the reply, "but you will go ashore this evening when the boats bring in the recruits. Of course you can choose whether you will go as volunteers or prisoners—that's none of my business."

With that this amiable specimen of military humanity signalled his myrmidons over the side, and relieved us of his presence. When he was gone the disagreeable singularity of our situation affected us rather less seriously than I should have anticipated. Malone was disposed to look upon the thing as rather a pleasant incident—and relished the notion of a "taste of fighting," as a kind of vivacious novelty, not at all to be objected to in itself; Osborn too would willingly have seen a little service by way of adding to his experiences of life; and the remainder of our companions, though by no means combatively inclined, evidently entertained less objection to bearing arms against the Spaniards than to the scurvy manner in which the proposition had been announced to us. For my own part, I confess that I always had a decided disrelish for fighting, under any circumstances, and I never felt less inclined to it than now that I had just completed a commercial contract, from which there was good reason to expect a fortunate issue. Had we been in a condition to sail I would not have hesitated to heave anchor and away, but, from many causes, that was not to be thought of; at a later hour in the day, too, we saw that it could not have been done, for a Bristol vessel which, having received the same civilities, hoisted all sail and bore out to sea, was suddenly brought up with a shot across her bows from the frigate, and peremptorily signalled to return to her former station.

We passed the day in a state of rather uncomfortable excitement, considering the matter, as the insolent bully who had broached it to us recommended, in all its bearings. We were utterly in the dark as to the intentions of the general, and our deliberations served to increase our perplexity. Dinner was scarcely over, when a man-of-war's long boat came alongside, freighted with a cargo of very moody-looking "volunteers," to the number of near thirty, some of whom, it was plain, from the effects of violence upon their persons, had been dragged vi et armis to take an unwilling share in the coming campaign. Our vessel was boarded by the brute of the morning, accompanied by an elderly man, of apparently the same grade. As we all, demurring to their authority, declined to notice the summons citing us to appear on deck, the two came down to the cabin, and he who was a stranger to us informed us that the boat was alongside waiting for us, and begged us to lose no time in getting on board. We expostulated, denied his authority, and threatened to complain to his superiors. He assured us, with some show of civility, that his authority was unquestionable, and trusted at the same time that our patriotic feeling would render it unnecessary to use force in putting it into execution, as he regretted to say he had unfortunately been compelled to do already in other cases. As to any complaints we might have to make, he assured us they would be considered fairly, and if well founded secure us redress. Meanwhile he must perform his duty, which was to carry us on shore, and consign us to quarters prepared for us at Monte Video. It was in vain that we protested solemnly against the despotism which jeoparded our lives against our inclination; we might as well have preached to a windmill. The smooth-tongued slave had but one idea, and that was his duty, which he adhered to in spite of every consideration we could urge. The upshot of the dispute was, that, protesting loudly against the tyranny practised upon us, we descended unwillingly into the boat to escape the degradation of being dragged or tumbled head-foremost into it, as would have been the case had we offered resistance. The boat called upon two other vessels lying at anchor, and with still less ceremony stole "volunteers" for this new company. By this time she was pretty deeply laden, and steered for the shore, landing at Monte Video about nine o'clock.

That night, for the first time in my life, I slept in a barrack amidst every discomfort to which a peaceful man can be subjected. The next morning, the so-called volunteers were all mustered to the number of near a hundred, and subjected to a mitigated kind of drill. As for preferring complaints, or bringing the question of our forcible enlistment before any tribunal, the bare mention of such a thing met with a roar of laughter. Our infamous capture was looked upon as a capital joke, the piquancy of which was the further heightened by our manifestations of resentment. In the course of a few days all thought of obtaining redress, which would of necessity have involved our discharge, was given up, and we began to feel by degrees reconciled to our new position. It is but fair to say that we were treated with some show of consideration. The drill was light and easy—our blunders and awkwardness led to no other punishment than ridicule, in which we ourselves joined. We had no irksome duties to perform, or even rations to cook, taking our meals at a kind of ordinary prepared for us. It is true we wore the common uniform (there is mine, hanging with my musket, behind my study door),* and none of us, that I am aware, held any other rank, even nominal, than that of a private soldier; but we had plenty of leisure upon our hands, and soon, becoming habituated to the change, recovered our mirth and spirits. By the end of a fortnight we had learned enough of the military art to qualify us to be shot at, and were drafted off into different companies, some compliance being shown to our wishes in this particular by allowing the parties from different vessels still to remain together.

At the end of the month came news that General Craufurd had arrived; and the next day he landed, having brought a reinforcement of between four and five thousand men. His arrival was the signal for immediate action. The season was already too far advanced for our comfort, and sickness had begun to threaten a diminution of our strength. All was now bustle and activity; the shore presented a scene of perpetual hurry-skurry and clamour; the boats of every vessel on the coast were pressed into the service, and the sea was alive night and day with the turmoil of warlike preparation. In the midst of all this, we of the awkward squad were again assembled en masse, and exercised on the ramparts in firing blank cartridge and accustoming ourselves to the smell of gunpowder. I suppose I must have imbibed some of the contagion of war, for I positively enjoyed the sport, and looked forward to the assault upon the capital, which we all knew was now near and inevitable, with something like a relish. A doubt as to the final success of the British arms never crossed our minds, especially since the arrival of Craufurd, who doubled our force.

Early in June our expedition, which consisted, in all, of something short of ten thousand men, set forth. I shall not trouble you with the plagues we endured through close quarters and wretched food, or the miseries of the forced and weary marches beneath a June sun. We met but little opposition from the enemy except once, on the occasion of fording a river, where a good many of our fellows were shot down in the water; and the whole army, having suffered no great loss, came to a halt almost within shot of Buenos Ayres, whose inhabitants had not been idle, and, as we found ere long to our cost, were but too well prepared for our reception. As the city was without walls, it seemed that all we had to do was to walk in and take possession. The fifth of July was appointed for this ceremony, which most of us expected would prove a very harmless one, it being generally imagined that the sight of our imposing force would be sufficient to ensure the submission of the Spaniards. All the accounts which I have seen of this inglorious invasion dwell upon one particular fact, to which there is no doubt that the failure of the attack is to be attributed, but which the narrators, from Alison downwards, have all contrived to misrepresent. The soldiers, say the historians, were forbidden to load their pieces. So far as my experience goes, this was not the case; the pieces of the regiment into which I had the misfortune to be thrust, at least, were all loaded, as I believe were those of the other regiments; but just as we were ready to start, the corporals were ordered round to collect the flints from each man's gun; this was done, and we were thus without the means of returning the enemy's fire. Had our pieces been merely unloaded, the fact would have signified comparatively little. We were all well supplied with ammunition, and could have charged our pieces in a few seconds. As it was, no sooner had we entered the main street than we beheld the flat roofs and the open windows of the houses

* The writer of this narrative details it as he heard it from the lips of the chief actor in it several years ago. He has not intentionally fictionized any of the incidents; though, from ignorance as well of naval as of military life, he may have fallen into some unimportant errors. The principal facts related are substantially true. The uniform and musket mentioned in the text, hung in the situation described for many years. The writer has often handled them; and it was their singular apparition in the private apartment of a gentleman of good fortune and fine accomplishments, which aroused the curiosity that was gratified by the recital of the present story.

bristling with fire-arms by the thousand: the roofs were not high, and the fellows presented a fair mark, but while they poured out a continued stream of fire and shot upon us, we were prevented from returning a single bullet. They were not slow in perceiving that it was out of our power to reciprocate their compliments, which made them all the more liberal of their shot, and less cautious in the bestowal of it. Besides the bullets, which fell like rain, every now and then came a hand-grenade, from an open window, which, in bursting, killed or crippled a dozen of us; while over the heads of the musketeers on the roofs came flying a shower of heavy stones, from which, though we saw them coming, there was not room to escape. A more horrible scene it is impossible for the imagination to conceive. Pushed forward by the masses from behind, on we staggered, stumbling over corpses, or floundering among the wrecks of barricades, which those in advance had been compelled to overthrow. I saw my companions dropping around me as the bullets whistled constantly past my face, and expected every moment to find myself mortally wounded and trodden under foot by my surviving comrades. If I could have been allowed but one fair shot, and could have put it into the heart of the cowardly villain who had sent us there to be murdered like sheep for the sake of Spanish gold, I felt then that I could have died satisfied. Of my fellow passengers in the Lance, two perished before my eyes. Poor Malone, who was boiling with rage at being converted into a mere target, got a shot in the temples as he was imprecating curses on the scoundrel Whitelock, and fell dead in my arms. So fearful was the confusion resulting from the terrible havoc, that we scarcely advanced at the rate of a quarter of a mile an hour. For three horrible hours this infernal and unresisted slaughter continued; and when we arrived, at last, in the great open square near the water, we had left above five hundred of our brave fellows dead in the street; had four times that number wounded upon our hands, and had lost between two and three thousand prisoners, who for want of the means of resistance had surrendered to the enemy. You may imagine what a night I passed—without food, without the shelter of a roof, and suffering from a deep abrasion caused by an enormous stone which smote me on the hip.

This was the beginning and the ending of my actual warfare. After all, I was not fated to commit murder, having never fired a single shot against the enemy. The next day I was unable to walk without assistance. Osborn, who had stuck close to me during the whole campaign, got a surgeon to look at my wound and to dress it; and in the evening brought me news that the war was terminated—that General Whiteliver had swopped Monte Video, Maldonado, and everything else we had on the coast, for the prisoners he had lost the day before, and was under an obligation to get back to England as fast as possible to enjoy the laurels he had won. The same night the volunteers were informed that his majesty had no further claim upon their services, and that those who chose might embark in a schooner bound for Monte Video, from whence they might repair at once to their own vessels. Our party, now reduced to four, lost no time in getting on board, and after a voyage of three days, during which I gradually got the better of my ugly bruise, I was again on board the Lance, not enriched with the spoils of war, but something comforted with the conviction that the bloody game was finally played out in that quarter. The excitement I had undergone, however, had an unfavourable effect upon my constitution, and threw me into a low fever, in which I lay for several days, suffering no pain, but such an excessive degree of languor and feebleness as made me at times doubtful of the result. When I recovered, the British had withdrawn from the coast. The Spaniards, pleased with their prowess and its result, were in excellent humour, and as much disposed to trade as I could have wished them to be. I found no difficulty in disposing of my cargo as soon as I was able to attend to business; and having sold the whole at a profit of nearly ninety per cent., sailed for the West Indies on the first of August.

After our long stay at the mouth of the Plate we were all glad to get away, and enjoyed our run northward. We were bound for Trinidad, but touching at Guiana for fruit and water, I happened to hear of a small island estate which was in the market, and, together with its standing crop and working gangs of slaves, was to be sold for a consideration which appeared to me to be astonishingly low. I showed the printed announcement to Osborn, who recommended me to inspect it, at least, before leaving the neighbourhood. The island, which though it is not to be found in the map, is not a hundred miles from Paramaribo, not being far from our locality, I resolved upon paying it a visit. The upshot was that, following Osborn's advice, I purchased it, stock and crop, and slaves and all, as it stood. Finer specimens of the human being than the slaves I thus purchased I never beheld. It was impossible to see them at their work, neither sex having more than a square foot of clothing about their persons, without being struck with admiration. The forms of some of them, the females especially, were perfect, and would have furnished admirable models for the sculptor. The estate, though not large, was in tolerable condition, and the canes ready to cut, which latter circumstance was my chief inducement to purchase. Osborn, whose experience as a planter qualified him for the task, undertook to realise the sugar with the utmost possible celerity, and no sooner was the bargain concluded than he set about the work. Perhaps you are blaming me in your heart for becoming a slaveholder; but if so, it is because you are reasoning from present data to past events. This, you must recollect, was more than forty years ago, when the iniquity of slaveholding had hardly entered the imagination of the commercial man, and when the slave-trade itself had not yet been abolished by our government.

I treated my slaves well while I had them; at any rate, I made them merry enough. By the allowance of some liberal indulgences, and not by the whip, they were urged to an extraordinary activity. We kept going night and day. The canes were cut, and the sugar and molasses manufactured from them with a rapidity which has been rarely equalled. As fast as the harvest was realised it was packed in casks and stowed on board, and the whole crop, which completed the lading of the vessel, being safe under hatches by the third week of November, we made all haste to get away before the stormy weather should catch us lingering on the coast. I made an arrangement with Osborn to remain and manage the estate for me, giving him an interest in the annual profits. He desired nothing better, and conducted the business so well, that at the end of five years, during which he transmitted me twelve per cent. upon the capital I had invested, he was in a condition to purchase it himself, according to the terms of our contract, at the price which I had paid for it.

On leaving the coast of Guiana we crowded all sail for the north, with the view of getting clear of the hurricane latitudes as speedily as possible. The Lance was heavily laden, but being a stout vessel and a fast sailer, and having, moreover, a crew by this time well accustomed to handle her, I had little apprehension on account of storms. Still it was with very different feelings from those with which I had embarked at Liverpool, that I now turned my face towards England. The events of the last twelve months had completely altered my position and social standing. I had left home a dependant upon the good opinion of others: I was returning to it as the possessor of a substantial fortune, and could look forward to a life of ease and enjoyment upon regaining my native country. While busy in the speculations which had led to this fortunate result, I had not had time to indulge in the reveries to which success gives birth; and even after all was prosperously concluded, and I was bounding homewards with my wealth, it was some time before I awoke to the full consciousness of my good fortune. A storm which we encountered suddenly off Guadaloupe, and which split the mainsail and sent some of our spars rattling about our ears, first brought me to the true sense of the increased value of my life. I began to grow daily and hourly more anxious about the issue of our voyage, with respect to which I could but imagine that I was far more interested than any other person on board. We carried seven passengers, three of them military men returning invalided to Europe, and the others men of business who had been dabbling with more or less success in the late speculations. My anxiety and restlessness induced me, when in the latitude of Antigua, to keep a reckoning of my own, with the assistance of one of the passengers, a man of some nautical experience. To this I was the more impelled by the unaccountable conduct of the captain, who, for some cause or other, rarely showed himself on deck after we had been a few days at sea, leaving the vessel almost entirely in charge of the mate. It was not until a fortnight had elapsed that I made the awkward discovery that the blockhead had been smitten with the charms of one of the sable Dulcineas belonging to my estate, and having fitted up a small store-room for her accommodation, had contrived to smuggle her on board, where she formed an object of sufficient attraction to wean him altogether from his duty. As you may imagine, this unwelcome discovery by no means abated my anxiety. I communicated the affair in confidence to my nautical friend; but he advised me to take no notice of it at present—but I observed that he revised the reckoning we had kept, paid more attention to it afterwards, and by acts of courtesy towards the mate, who was a pains-taking fellow and a capital seaman, secured his favour. The absence of the captain, however, operated unfavourably upon the crew. We had a great deal of new rum on board, and it was soon but too evident that the men had found some method of helping themselves to it.

One day when half the crew were more than half drunk, and quarrelsomely frolicsome, and brawling and fooling instead of attending to their duty—a stiff breeze blowing, and the prospect of a gale—I called a council of the passengers, and having stated the case as it stood, requested their advice. All that could be done was to send for the captain, and represent the matter to him. He came half intoxicated, and to our remonstrances returned no other reply than that we were a set of fools for meddling with other people's business—that he knew his duty, and should navigate his vessel in his own way. When he was gone we determined at any rate upon stopping the supply of rum, and this, aided by a hint from the mate, we succeeded in doing, having after a diligent search discovered the source from which the men supplied themselves. Things went on a little better after this for some time, though the captain having shut himself up with his inamorata, hardly showed his face for days together. We were still sailing nearly north, after a voyage of a month; but the captain, when applied to, would not alter the ship's course, and stormed and raved like a madman when either the mate or the passengers interfered. On we went day after day further north, with a drunken captain and an undisciplined crew. I had the horrors. It was plain that unless we resorted to some desperate measure, we should be carried bump ashore, or wrecked on some sand or reef in one of the dark nights which were now near sixteen hours long. I never slept for an hour together day or night. The weather was dismal with frost and fog, and the most horrible prospect was before us. At length the mate came to me with a long face, and expressed his conviction that unless we altered our course we should be on the bank of Newfoundland in twenty-four hours at the latest. I immediately broke this news to the passengers, who were but too well prepared for it. There was no time to be lost. They requested me, as agent for the owners, to arrest the captain, and give the command to the mate. I required first a requisition from them to that effect, signed by them all. It was prepared and completed in a few minutes; then arming ourselves with pistols and cutlasses, we dragged the drunken captain forth from his den, bound him hand and foot, locked him up in spite of his oaths and resistance, and putting the ship about, steered for home with a tolerably fair wind. The men at first made a demonstration in favour of the captain, but the resolute front we showed them, and the fact, which they knew well enough, that I was owner of the cargo, prevented their having recourse to violence. I promised the mate my interest with the firm to secure him in the command he thus assumed, if he brought the vessel safely into port. He played the captain admirably, and soon by a little wholesome severity restored the discipline we had lost. The Lance behaved famously in the wintry gales of the Atlantic. We made the Channel the second week in January, worked up to the Downs, where we lay for ten days, and where at his own request, I put the captain ashore—and arrived at the West India Docks before the end of the month.

My employers, though they had no great reason to be satisfied with the expedition, which had proved a sorry speculation for them, congratulated me upon my good fortune, expressing unfeigned pleasure at my return. They confirmed my appointment of the mate, who subsequently made many prosperous voyages in the Lance. As for the captain, he brought an action against me, which so far from doing him any good, only ruined his character by publishing the circumstances of his disgrace. I gave the negro wench a trifle to clothe her decently, and procured her a place in a gentleman's family in London, where she turned out a capital cook, and lived comfortably. Now you have the history of my South Sea speculation, which though it led me through the horrors of war and tempest, made me independent of the world. All the reward I ever got for my valour under Whitelock, was that dusty old uniform which has so often excited your curiosity—and that musket which has never been fired since the inglorious 5th of July, 1807, to this hour. You see there is no flint in the lock—but if you thrust in the ramrod you will find the charge is still in the barrel.

THE STORY OF RUTH.

It may be impolitic for us to betray, with how much interest we have read this tale;* for if an interested judge be thought disqualified, how shall the literary tribunal admit an interested critic? but we scarcely mean to assume that function here; rather to state the reflections, which the purport of the book has left with us, than to assess the merits of its fabric. Only two or three peculiarities we may first remark.

The most obvious one is the appeal, not more frequent than effective, to that imaginative perception of a mysterious response, which the outward and visible universe often seems to render, in accord with the passion of a human heart. This ideal sympathy of nature with man, when really regarded as a fact, is the author of superstitious mysticism; but, employed artistically, it is a potent charm of poetry. The senses are, so variously and in such a degree, liable to be misdirected or suspended by the distracting bias of the mind, that in the character of the sensuous impressions, during any moment of excited feeling, we find the symptoms of the prevailing affection. The inventor of fictitious life uses the privilege, therefore, of surrounding his persons with that kind of scenery, by describing which he may infect the reader with a sentiment akin to what his persons are feeling. The author of "Ruth" has been very skilful in this art; nor do we remember any prose narrative, where it is more successfully, though perhaps too prodigally applied. Despite that cynical sarcasm on the "Werter epidemic of view-hunting," in uttering which Dr. Teufelsdröck forgot that he plentifully avails himself of natural imagery, we recognise this among the legitimate means of effect. Old Homer, no puling vapourer, sends the murmuring man to "walk reluctant along the shore of the many-murmuring sea;" and equally suited to the dreary mood of poor Ruth, going unwilling to meet her persecutor on the sands, is the "eternal moan of the waves, since the beginning of creation." It would be curious, if one could analyse the satisfaction of reading, to ascertain how much we are helped, in our sympathising with Ruth's experience, by the reflex influence of these external glimpses. In the milliner's work-room, a panel painted with flowers cherishes her fresh youth of heart, through all the dulness and drudgery. At the window, looking out on the Welsh hills, her cheerful relish of their novelty sees, in the rainy weather, the "swift fleeting showers come across the sunlight, like the rush of silvery arrows; the purple darkness on the heathery mountain side, and the pale golden gleam which succeeded." The fondness of her love is warm and close "in the green gloom of the leafy shade, at the still hour of noon." When scornfully repelled from her lover's sick chamber, listening at the door in dread to hear his breathing cease, she hears "the soft wind outside sink, with a long low distant moan, among the windings of the hills, and lose itself there, and come no more again." Very touching,* in her unprotected desolation, is that little bird, in a nest among the ivy of the house walls, "chirping out its wakefulness before the dawn, but the mother bird spread her soft feathers, and hushed it into silence." These incidents are no mere prettiness or fanciful decoration of the story, but the very poetry of each moment. How truthful an observation of the workings of our minds it is, that in the wildest astonished despair, when the deserted girl has been running up the interminable road, pursuing her betrayer's carriage till it is out of sight, breathless falling on the ground, she notices, and ever afterwards remembers, a tiny trifle, the green beetle on the grass! The effect of this imaginative appeal to nature is the same, whether used as metaphor; when, "over the dark misty moor a little light shone,—a beacon, upon which in her dejection she fixed her eyes,—the little child that was coming to her;" or in the way of direct comparison, when the quiet of her child-bed resembles the moonlight calm of evening, the world wrapt in a white rolling mist, but "the heavens on such nights bending very near;" or when it is the actual accompaniment which nature performs to human life; as "the earth was 'hiding her guilty front with innocent snow,' when a little boy was laid by the side of the pale mother." The exquisite meaning of these, and other instances, will be appreciated by those who know her story. The use of art, as supplementary to natural suggestions, is exhibited in that sculptured face in the old church, which makes Ruth abate her own agony, by its aspect of resigned suffering.

The dramatic conduct of the tale is well sustained; not only the character of each person is consistently and roundly developed; but their mutual action upon each other educes just the probable modifications of personal character. The impulsive and cordial girl, whose jealousy of Ruth was aggravated by the unconscious serenity of its object, generously takes her part, when oppressed and unhappy. The minister, whose habits of subtle speculation have made his sensitive conscience a ground of practical feebleness, no sooner confronts the uncharitable violence of a tyrant, than his true moral courage, which doubtful delicacy had before obscured, flames up in the bold assertion of justice and mercy. His sister, whose busy forward will, never perplexed by ethical reflections, only takes counsel of the situation, and of her strong prepossessions, refuses at first to look upon the sinner; but staunchly, after a while, she helps the gentle fugitive; insists on the kind deception;—"Brother, I had as much to do with it as you had; I am certain it was quite right, and I would do the same again." We do not mean to blame her. The fraud on Mr. Bradshaw was not justifiable; in offering Ruth a domestic engagement, he had a special claim to know who and whence she was; but surely, in respect to the world in general, a disgraced person, striving with sincere penitence to reconstruct an honest name, is not required to publish her previous career. It is the particular trust, which ought not to have been accepted, without a frank confession of a former error.

The main artistic excellence of this novel is the unity of interest. We notice it the rather, because this merit has become rare in our popular literature. The method of piecemeal publication, in monthly parts, adopted in an evil hour by the very genius of tenderness and humour, "chief master to-day of our happy smiles and our unselfish tears," has gone near to destroy the English novel; degrading the prose epic to a series of entertaining sketches, in the necessity to provide each periodical issue with a separate chapter of excitement; so as to engage the reader, after a month's interval has cooled his sympathy with the proper interest of the tale, now with the buffoonery of a Guppy, and then with the spontaneous combustion of a gin-drinker. It is perceiving this faulty tendency, we believe, the author of "Esmond," as the result of his critical study of the older novelists, has relinquished the mode of printing in detachments. The book now before us is remarkable for harmonious consistency. During the first two volumes at least, the fate of poor Ruth is the interest ever present with us; and other occurrences only as affecting this. Latterly, the troubles of the Bradshaw family, though admirably managed on their own account, are placed more fully in relief than is requisite from their relation to the principal affair. But the events and all the experience of the story grow out of one root,—one fatal event. The personages, who are in any way prominent, are indispensable; not an extraneous crowd who encumber the stage. We can assure the sketchy and desultory writers of the day, that without such organic unity, like that of the members of a plant or animal, they will inspire a book with no characteristic life.

We began, intending not to regard the form, so much as the moral purpose of "Ruth." But we have lingered over literary considerations, delayed by a sense of the difficulty of the profounder questions it involves. The story of Ruth is the story of Margaret, and Mary, and many another betrayed and forsaken woman. The author does speak, in the language of one of her persons;—"I declare before God, that to every woman, who like Ruth has sinned, should be given a chance of self-redemption, and this, in no supercilious or contemptuous manner, but with the gentle, tender help, which Jesus gave once to Mary Magdalen." Now, there is a very wide distinction to be made. We do not say, no Christian,—but no one acquainted with the elastic capability of human nature, and the self-regulating pressure of experience, by which Time rectifies gradually much propensity to error,—may doubt the ultimate possibility of restoring any criminal. This is the lowest ground of hope for them. As for the treatment which a wise benevolence may administer, it is generally applicable, "that the women who have fallen should be numbered among those, who have broken hearts to be bound up, and not,"—no, certainly not, "cast aside as lost beyond recall." But, this girl of sixteen, who by the sweet purity of a suffering life would expiate the single error of confiding in a lover's honour, ought not to be confounded, surely, with a very different class of offenders. Agreeing that "not every woman who has fallen is depraved," unhappily we cannot deny, that some women are very depraved. The world has no right to neglect them in their depravity, for its own sake as well as for theirs; but to respect them as if ignoring their state, is not the way to cure it. We are convinced, after a long and painful study of this subject, that much is to be done, by legislation or by other agencies more adequately supported than our Female Penitentiaries are, to reclaim a large proportion even of the abandoned. Let us be far from recommending the example of some Continental cities! but while the system of the Austrian Foundling Hospitals, (where "they ask no questions" of the unblushing applicant for relief in her maternity,) has been described to us by one who, as "a looker-on in Vienna," saw there, as in the time of impudent Lucio, "corruption boil and bubble, till it o'errun the stew,"—let us remember that infanticide, the most unnatural of all crimes, is frequent in England to an extent which few are aware of, unless they follow the country coroner to each brief formality of an inquest, and compute every verdict of "found dead" upon a babe that has perished in the field. We happen to have witnessed much of this, and own it as a national abomination.

But, what has poor Ruth to do with all this vileness? Simply this,—that there is a cant, a notion or a prejudice, false as it is cruel, which, because she once did wrong, would drive her among the outcast. This pitiless severity towards feminine frailty, though it is not equally manifest in the ancient heathen world, comes not with the sanction of Christianity. We can indicate a very different origin. Lately, in commending the just esteem, with which our Teutonic forefathers regarded womanhood, we cited the Roman testimony to the chaste manners of the unconquerable fair-haired race. But the historian, angry with the luxurious profligacy of the imperial metropolis, fails to gain our approval of that ferocious custom of the barbarians, by which the unfaithful wife was scourged with ignominy through the village of her tribe. Yet is there any similarity between the guilt of her, who has infringed a lifelong solemn contract, and the folly of one who, lured by a traitor's lips, has given her implicit trust where she gave her maiden love? We do not underrate the moral mischief of that first step of error; but, that it should ever involve the total ruin of a life, is occasioned by the inconsiderate public opinion, which, by an entire deprival of her reputation, removes the customary barriers of her remaining virtue. See how this grievance is lamented by our kindly old Chaucer, speaking of the disgrace and abandonment of poor Creseide:—

> Yet ne'ertheless, whate'er men deem or say,
> In scornful language, of thy brutalness,
> I shall excuse, as far forth as I may,
> Thy womanhood, thy wisdom, and fairness;
> The which fortune hath put to such distress
> As her pleased, and nothing through the guilt
> Of thee, by wicked language to be spilt.

Allowing something of censure, as the case may be, we cannot allow this Teutonic rigour. Let there be no laxity of morals; may it still be said of us, what Tacitus said, "Nemo enim illic vitia ridet;" but this sentence of social damnation, worse than indiscriminate, acquitting the more guilty partner, is iniquitous, and we protest against it. Puritanism, with a servile adherence to the killing letter of the Jewish law, rejecting the merciful amendments of the new Divine authority, has made this public injustice more intolerable in Protestant countries; but has omitted redressing the balance by condemning equally the male offender. It is an evil among us, which needed, no less than slavery did in America, the pen of a gifted woman to challenge its consideration.

And, if any of the set profess to be shocked, that a lady has mooted this subject, let us intimate respectfully, that matrons and damsels of England are not without some responsibility, for the wrongs of their misled sisters. Let us quote an observation, which is not ventured by us, but by one of the clearest of our ethical writers. "Many a female, who talks in the language of abhorrence of an offending sister, and averts the eye in contumely when meeting her in the street, is perfectly willing to be the friend of the equally offending man." If this be a fact, we may spare them the essayist's comment; but he cites, by way of contrast, a statement, (we do not vouch for this fact,) that, "among the North American Indians, seduction is regarded as a despicable crime, and more blame is attached to the man than to the woman; hence, the offence on the part of the female is more readily forgiven and forgotten; and she finds little difficulty in forming a subsequent matrimonial alliance when deserted by her betrayer; who is generally regarded with distrust, and avoided in social intercourse." Well, even in savage life we may find instruction, as the Roman did in Germania!

This monstrous disproportion of the punishment, as visited on the two sexes, has no reasonable ground. Let us acknowledge, with our noble Milton, that unchastity is "in the man, more deflowering and dishonourable." But we dare ask any candid man who knows the world, whether chastity in manhood is not, in the immense majority of cases, the fruit of matured reason and established principle, controlling unworthy passions; and only in the very rarest, it can pretend to be an untouched blossom, a nursling of youthful education? If we must confess this, why regard the virtue of an erring woman as irretrievably and for ever lost? We must be permitted to say, deliberately and without offence, that in regard to a person like her imagined in this book, whose fault was done in ignorance, weakness, and indiscretion, whose affection remained constant, her behaviour modest, her sentiment pure and her conscience, though reproving her, still in its integrity, (which is all very possible in the case of a victim of seduction,) we could ascribe the opinion, which condemned her as hopeless, to no basis but a superstitious and exaggerated estimate of physical virginity, a vague notion which is not unmingled with gross and sensual conceptions of the matter, such as deformed the mystical theology of the monkish ages.

We have spoken; distinctly and in earnest, for we know no more serious subject. We are deeply thankful for the opportunity this book has given. The novelist, who dedicates art, in sad truth, to the service of humanity, may tread the ground which fools and sophists should not be allowed to enter. Those, who have waded, in wondering perplexity, through that gorgeous luxuriance of "tropical vegetation," as some one calls the "Titan" of Jean Paul, may remember the abused simplicity of the poor credulous country girl; and that other tragedy of deceived Linda, whose dark and lofty figure we see, plunging her arms into the thornbush which she is straining to her bosom, bidding, in the solemn tones of despair, "Depart from me for ever; I am his widow!" For another poet witness, let us call him, who atoned for the coxcombry of flirtation, which is reprehensible in some of his works, by creating the tenderness and the anguish of Gretchen. And, let all women observe, that, if it is the scornful gibes of her female companions, by which the sore heart of the lost child was tortured, yet after all is over, in the heavenly consummation, received into the presence of the Virgin Mother, it is there "das Ewig-Weibliche," which "zieht uns hinan."

EDUCATIONAL REFORM IN GERMANY.

BY JOHANNES RONGE.

The Educational System of Germany, especially that of Prussia, is often praised and held up for the imitation of other countries. Great credit is no doubt due to Germany for what in the course of time she has done for popular instruction; but they who so loudly extol are either ignorant or forget that there is a great German movement for educational reformation. This agitation is no novelty of the day; the first difficulties have been conquered. This movement had for its object a radical reform; to open a new field and to raise an entirely new structure. The struggle so hopefully commenced, is in truth the struggle of a free national school against a despotic State. Who, knowing the success of the contest for independence waged against the churches and priestcraft in 1770, can doubt that victory will crown the effort which is made for complete emancipation?

This movement for a substantial reform of the educational system, commenced with the Religious Reformation in Germany in 1844, and the first period of its history has terminated with the suppression by the governments of the first schools, established by the free religious communities. As the character of this movement is neither accurately known nor understood in this country, the object of these remarks is to afford some clearer information on the principles and aims of the new educational reformers.

To make this explanation the clearer, it will be necessary to sketch rapidly the historical development of education in Germany.

The Reformation of the sixteenth century brought education forth from the cloister, and created lay schools. Luther, supported by the electoral prince of Saxony, founded schools for the new Protestant congregations. But as these institutions were completely under the direction and control of the clergy, no great progress in education was made in the interval from the Reformation till the creation of a national German literature, in the eighteenth century. The German literature, which grew green with Klopstock in the middle of the last century, and bloomed in mature beauty with Goethe and Schiller, was not nourished by emperors or by kings, but by the people—by the whole nation. It consequently influenced all departments of knowledge, regenerating the spiritual life of the nation, and awakening new ideas. It had influence on religion through Klopstock, on philology and history through Herder; on the whole circle of knowledge through Lessing and his followers. It at last led to a reform of education, so long fettered by the clergy.

The influence on religion was, however, slight, for the clergy were not moved to progress. But the reform of the schools was so decided, that from about the year 1770 is dated the higher cultivation of all classes of the German nation.

While the United States of America were conquering their independence, and France preparing its great Revolution, Germany took her part in progress by a new literature and philosophy, producing new ideas and a sounder knowledge.

The most important practical results were her national education. Her school-reform was the revolutionary struggle of education against church misrule and bondage to priests.

So early as the year 1766, books and journals were published advocating school-reform, and it was proposed that the state should undertake the duty of improving the schools.

Quietly and almost secretly the way was prepared for the emancipation of the schools from the clergy.

The first person who gave a direct impulse to the movement was Basedow of Hamburg, who lived between the years 1723-90. After long meditation on the subject of school-reform, he, in 1768, published his "Proposals to the Friends of Man about Schools." Herder, Wieland, Lessing, and others, had propounded similar ideas, but Basedaw offered his plan in a more practical shape, and he found much sympathy from all classes of the people. As the national literature had grown, so was school-reform growing, from the people.

In 1771, Basedow was invited to Dessau, for the purpose of establishing a model school and seminary to train teachers for the whole of Germany. Enthusiasm for this reform grew up in all parts of the fatherland, and very soon a great number of able teachers were qualified to carry out the reformed system.

In Switzerland the genius of Pestalozzi was awakened to activity by this movement. But the most important results were exhibited in Prussia.

An independent class of teachers had taken the office of the education of youth from the hand of the clergy, without making a direct opposition to the church.

Till 1776, the school reformation was only represented by private schools. But in that year the electoral prince of Bavaria issued a decree for the adoption of the school reform in the archbishopric of Münster; and the other governments speedily followed his example.

In Prussia the enthusiasm for the school reform was national, and the Government at once took the superintendence of education from the hands of the Catholic as well as of the Protestant clergy. This interference by the Government caused the school reform to progress with greater energy, supported as it was by the power of the state and its greater material means.

This for the time was assuredly a great progress, for education could not have become general without the power and influence of Government, and the princes had not yet recognised in the school a mere instrument of despotism.

The existing organization of the educational system of Prussia was introduced about the year 1810. The Governments of Germany were anxious to do all they could to excite the national feelings against the oppression of Napoleon. Prussian statesmen, liberal enough in those days, carried out a complete national education. They caused schools to be built in all towns and villages, and ordered that every child, whether rich or poor, from six to fourteen years of age, should be instructed in the school; and it was declared that parents who did not send their children to school, or suffered them to neglect it, should be punished. Under this system a new generation was growing up while science and philosophy were gradually developing new ideas.

For the education of teachers institutions were formed, directed and supported by the Government. The appointment of the teachers was partly in the hands of the Government, partly of the municipalists. In the Catholic provinces of Prussia the right of nomination was divided between the Government and the bishops.

So long as there was no danger to the absolute power of the German Princes, from liberal movements of the people, the Governments did not abuse the schools. On the contrary, they rather supported the liberal principles, in opposition to the reactionary tendencies of the clergy, who endeavoured to bring the school back to their dominion, and to suppress all progress.

But from the time of the constitutional movements in Germany and France, about 1830, the princes began and have continued to use the school as an instrument of despotism, and in Prussia, since 1840, after the death of the late king, liberal schoolmasters and teachers were discouraged, and many even removed from their office. The school was now in greater danger from the political Government than even in the hands of the clergy. In escaping from Scylla it was lost in Charybdis.

"The people are getting too clever, we must put some stop to this progress;" this was the watchword of princes and ministers, given to all officials of the state. The clergy accepted it with delight, for they saw that this was the way to bring the people gradually back under their influence and yoke. Many Protestant clergymen who were superintendents of schools in a district, told the schoolmasters that they should not be so zealous and diligent in their office, for the people were too clever.

In the years 1841-42-43, several decrees and directions were given by the Prussian ministry, for limiting the instruction of the youth of the people, to reading, writing, arithmetic, and religion. Instruction in geography, history, natural science, was to be first neglected, and then to cease altogether.

The present king of Prussia, head of the chief Protestant country of Germany, it is well known, has long had an inclination to the Catholic church and to the institutions of the middle ages. He took therefore hostile measures against the progressive party in the Protestant church.

The Catholic hierarchy, well organized, and supported by Metternich, took advantage of this disposition of the head of the chief Protestant country of the continent, and arrogantly agitated against everything savouring of progress, and very strenuously against the Protestant Government of Prussia. In the year 1843-44, they were everywhere exclaiming, "in three years all Protestant Germany will be back to the Pope." To manifest their triumph, mocking the cultivation, the science, the great literature and philosophy, and insulting the genius of Germany, they set up a Fetish, or an external material object for worship—the holy coat of Christ "at Treves." The indignation of the German nation at this scandalous proceeding and outrage against religion, caused the second reformation in the year 1844.

The free or humanitarian religious congregations, formed since January 1845, commenced, side by side with the reformation of religion, a radical reform of the schools.

At the second religious reform meeting at Breslau, in January 1845, as the first representative of the new religious Reformation in the Catholic church, I pointed out the necessity of school-reform, and in all my reform-journeys through Germany I prepared the ground in the congregations, for schools independent of the absolute state. In the first synod-meeting of the congregations of Silesia, in August 1845, I induced a number of deputies, who were in favour of the plan, "to form schools in the congregations, independent of the absolute Government." As the struggles against the Roman hierarchy, and later against the intrigues of the Protestant state-church were sufficiently arduous, the reformers declared no open opposition to the government, but they quietly commenced to form independent schools, organized on the principles of the new reformation, each supported and directed by the whole congregation. Had the government clearly comprehended in the beginning, that the schools of the free religious communities formed a direct antagonism to the state, the congregations assuredly would not have been allowed to found them. But as, in the year 1770, the school commenced a struggle for emancipation from the church without noise or ostentation, so was the struggle for emancipation from the state begun quietly, and almost in secret, in the year 1845.

As the gospel of the new period of cultivation commenced, "In the beginning were deeds," the first reformers endeavoured to form schools independent of the absolute government, without making a noise about it through the press. The congregations, or rather the associations of fathers and mothers, took the school out of the hands of the government, and exercised their first divine right as parents of educating their youth.

It should be observed, that in the new humanitarian religious congregations, the independent and perfect education of youth is regarded as a religious duty. They proceeded to work on a ground well prepared through the instructional culture of the national system in use. Under the established state system, education was a policy, proceeding on command given by the government; under the congregational system it was regarded as a religious and moral duty, proceeding from the free convictions of the people themselves.

This is in outline the general history of the progress of national education in Germany.

The establishment of the free independent schools of the new religious community was thus the third great step in the history of German popular education. We have now to speak of the principles and constitution of the independent school. The fundamental principle of this educational system is the free development of the essence and faculties of the youth, or the development of the divine idea, living in man and mankind. The aim of the education in the free religious community is to awaken the consciousness of free dignity, the self-depending union of the individual with his nation, with mankind, and with God.

This education is in most intimate connection with the education of the family, as the parents of the children are the constant watching guardians and directors of the schools. They fix the principles on which their children shall be educated, not waiting for the orders or directions of governments, hierarchies, or priesthoods. Perhaps the most important point in the new education of Germany, is the righteous, distinctly recognised and independent participation of women in the duties of school-education; it is participation of motherly love, and recognition of women's natural and divine right. Under the state educational systems of Germany, the mother had only the right to educate her children while they were under the age of six years. Bureaucracy and hierarchy regulated the principles, and directed the education of all above that age. No citizen of the state, no mother, no father, had any voice whatever in the principles and organization of the school-education.

Who can best understand the tender duties of the loving office of education—the parents of the child or the despotised government of a state or church? As parents had no right whatever in the state schools (with few exceptions), the princes and clergy, alternately, or in league, abused education and trained up the children to their own purposes, always selfish, too often criminal.

In the commencement of the new reformation, the leaders of this movement took care, in framing the constitution of the new schools, that all parents should have the influence which was their right. Each congregation of the free religious community annually elects, by universal suffrage, men and women, a committee to direct the school, which committee must, regularly once a month, report the position and progress of the school to a general meeting of the whole congregation. The teachers have full liberty of instruction, and are limited only by the constitutional principles of the free religious community. The discipline of the school is only limited by the fundamental principles of the community, and these have been declared by the free, express, and separate assent of each congregation of the Union. The general supervision of education is intrusted to district meetings, or synods, and their executive officers, the presiding members of each district, freely elected. All the advantages which centralization offers to progress, are here given, without any of the despotism of centralization. By the free constitution of this community, these superior assemblies are real representations of the congregations, and all the resolutions they pass, must be first discussed and adopted by each congregation, before they can take effect as general laws of the community.

The free religious community is thus a religious and educational federal republic, in which democracy is not paralysed by inconsistent and tyrannic theories of omnipotence in superior councils. The members of each congregation are, as regards the regulation of their own affairs, sovereign, and only yield to a superior general direction for the common weal, for the common defence (as was the immediate occasion of the union in the first instance), and that progress and improvement may be promoted by the suggestions of those who have better means of study and observation than can be enjoyed by the masses of men. A complete self-government by each congregation is thus in no way crippled, but rather strengthened and made more efficient by the superior suggestive directions of the free synod and councils of the new religious community.

It is understood to be the intention of the reformers, whenever the political circumstances permit, and when Germany obtains free municipal constitutions, to admit the municipalities into the direction of education.

All children between the ages of six and fourteen years, whether poor or rich, have the same instruction, and the expenses are borne by the congregation. Besides developing the faculties and cultivating the minds of the children, ample care is taken, by suitable exercises, to strengthen their bodies. This brief explanation will suffice to show that the new reform in Germany is one calculated to lead to perfect liberty and a real humanitarian educational system.

As the humanitarian religious community had given women equal rights, and a share in the duties of education, it was necessary, with the view to a higher discharge of these duties, to provide a better system of superior education for women. In Germany there were numberless superior institutions, universities, colleges, and gymnasia for the male youth, but there were none for young females. I therefore proposed and took measures for establishing good institutions for the higher education of young ladies, especially for the instruction of Kindergärtnerinnen, or infant governesses. In 1846, I formed the first Frauenverein, or ladies' union, to support and direct female schools of the congregation, endeavouring to secure an active realisation of my idea of such institutions, based on the principle of the independence of women, and equally directed by male and female members of the congregations. I desired that this should be a national work, and I endeavoured to form a national representation of education composed of able and enlightened men and women, elected by the friends of school reform throughout Germany. But I was unable to bring this congress together before I was driven into exile by the despots in 1849. I, however, succeeded, before I left Germany, in establishing a "high school" for young ladies, at Hamburg. This institution was the first created and supported, and directed by the new spirit awakened through the higher religious ideas of the Reformation, to qualify women to take an active and efficient part in the great work of humanity.

Cultivated women, prepared by more independent thought and action, during three years of life in the humanitarian religious community, and in the ladies' unions, were now qualified to assist in working out these great ideas of a new and national educational system for the female sex. This high or training-school of Hamburg, was based on the principles of the free religious community, and constituted in strict conformity with its ideas; and it was supported by all the ladies' unions of the free religious community.*

The founders of this school fixed sixteen years as the age of the young ladies admitted to this institution, for instruction and training. They were instructed not only in the various branches of scientific knowledge, but were trained to conduct the Kinder-garten, to teach young girls in the school, and prepare them for a share in the duties of the ladies' unions.

To the meetings of the leading committee the young ladies of the college sent six members, as their representatives or deputies. This committee was chosen and composed of members of the ladies' unions and professors of this high school.

We must here shortly describe the interesting institution of the children's gardens, founded by Frederick Fröbel, one of the most thoughtful of the followers of Pestalozzi. The Kinder-garten is an improved infant-school for children of from three to seven years of age, on a system which should rather be styled one of amusement than education, in the common sense of the term. Fröbel based his system on a clear perception of the free and progressive nature of man. By comparing children to young plants, he demonstrated that mental cultivation should be combined with bodily exercise. The superintendence of the Kinder-garten he confided chiefly to female hands, believing that the delicate nature of young children requires the tenderness of woman's care. For this purpose, he trained a number of young girls as teachers, and, in spite of his advanced age, he still continues to do so.

The fundamental principle of the Kinder-garten system, is the free and harmonious development of the child's natural faculties; it assists the young mind of the child in its natural disposition for development and progress. As infants of three years are unfit to learn, but as they freely develop themselves even at that age by playing, thus manifesting their natural inclination to activity, the amusements of the Kinder-garten have been regulated after the mental faculties of man, and they receive a higher importance by conferring on the child a happiness shared by numerous companions; for man can only fully form himself in community, and, through association, attain a high degree of perfection. The development by playing makes the children happy, as working is the first condition of the happiness of men; and when they are happy, they leave off those bad habits which are frequently caused by an erroneous method of directing the natural inclination for activity and occupation. The practical use of such infant-schools, therefore, consists in giving full scope to this disposition, and in allowing the mental faculties a free development.

* The ladies' union supports the children, the poor, the sick, and instructs young girls going into service. The principle is, to aid the poor to help themselves. It is held by the congregations to be a religious duty, to prevent misery as much as they can, by securing employment for the poor, and, as far as possible, to banish alms.

Education in these schools commences with the development of the senses, and almost with the growth of the body. The children are first taught to observe, to listen, to talk, to sing accurately, and to move with grace. A ball is employed as the first instrument of play, or a soft globe which can easily be moved about by the tiny hand of the child, and with which the imagination may readily compare different objects. To the infant imagination, now it is a bird that flies, now, the dog that runs or leaps. The ball is coloured, that the child may be at once introduced into the living garden of nature, and have the sense of colour awakened. The ball is round, and, therefore, represents the earth and heavenly bodies, to comprehend which there is an innate desire in the mind of the child. There are upwards of a hundred games with the ball, each of which is accompanied by a little song. From the soft ball the growing child proceeds to the hard ball, that he may be accustomed to use his increasing strength. From the ball, the rolling body, the progress is to the use of an angular body, the cube. The cylinder or roller is used as a connection between the two. Ball, roller, and cube, are attached to strings, and swung round in circles to show to the child the motion of bodies and the different forms during that motion, so that it may acquire a clear conception of the same, and learn to distinguish how the unit proceeds from multitude, and multiplicity from unity. The balls, rollers, and cubes, are then separated and employed for further playing, termed architectural games. They consist either in face formations or plastic forms, created by the child's own unrestricted imagination, or in imitation of objects in nature called forms of life. They are, therefore, calculated to lead to observation of outward things, and to excite comparison of form and size in various objects. The perception of mathematical forms being thus prepared by ocular demonstration, cutting and figuring, piercing and pricking card-board, platting and folding paper, and braiding thin strips of wood and plat, are next introduced as amusements. The triangle is the fundamental figure in cutting out, and is shaped according to different models.

The great variety thus produced is remarkable and beautiful. Patterns are made from coloured slips of paper, and many kinds of apparatus are designed with little streaks and vegetable productions. This occupation improves the practical disposition of children and awakens the love of the beautiful. Lastly: there are social pastimes to exercise the strength of the body, and to create in the minds of the children a consciousness that they are members of a free community. These games being copied from nature, are well adapted to awaken the sense of beauty and love, and each is accompanied by its appropriate song. The children, for instance, represent fishes and birds, and with their little hands imitate their motions.

A garden is usually attached to the school-room, children like plants, constantly requiring fresh air. There they are taught to arrange their own little flower beds, and to sow them in spring time, and they thus learn the names and growth of plants. Experience has shown that children brought up in these infant institutions, are very active and cheerful, and that they distinguish themselves on entering a school of instruction by a desire for learning, by cleverness, and by cheerfulness.

After the princes of Germany, breaking the oaths taken before God and the people, had crushed constitutional liberty, they commenced persecuting the humanitarian religious congregations.

In Austria, where the first free religious congregations were formed by me in the memorable year 1848, the religious persecutions were commenced immediately after the unfortunate surrender of Vienna in October. The Government not only prohibited the divine service, but also the institution of instruction formed by the congregation and the ladies' unions. How brutal were the persecutions may be learned from the fact, that the ministers and presiding members were imprisoned, that one of the ministers was forced into a madhouse, that some members were publicly flogged, and the children of the members were forced into the schools of the Jesuits; any Austrian soldier seen going to the chapel of the free religious congregations was punished by twenty-four lashes.

In Prussia, the chief Protestant country of the European continent, the persecutions against the reformation of the nineteenth century commenced against the general meetings, but very soon extended to the children's gardens, and the schools of the free religious communities. In the year 1851 the ministry of Prussia issued a decree, forbidding all children's gardens, formed by the free religious congregations, or by the ladies' unions. In the year 1852 the ministry ordered the suppression of the first independent school in Breslau. In Bavaria the children's gardens and the schools were also suppressed in 1851 and 1852. The puissant Prussian Government, beaten by the Austrian Jesuits, turned its valiant armies against the terrible foes sporting in the children's gardens. And this mighty Government of Prussia is called one of the "great powers of Europe!" Is there no historical pencil to hand down to posterity the heroic achievement of Frederick William of Prussia, in taking the citadels of the infant schools? But if tyrant princes have put down some of the first planted schools of a new independent national education, they have not been able or have not dared to suppress all the new schools. A few still exist in South Germany, in Hamburg, and in other parts of the Fatherland. The idea still lives in all the German nations, and it has—thanks to the tyrant despots—even through their persecutions, ripened gloriously for a beautiful harvest in the good time coming.

In Hamburg and in other large cultivated towns of Germany, the best teachers have accepted the reform idea. If there is at present much to sadden the friends of human improvement, there is also much to excite hope that the tyranny of Princes and Jesuits is a temporary calamity; painful but useful in teaching men the power and necessity of self-dependence and united exertion for humanity and freedom.

A CHRISTMAS VACATION IN JUTLAND.

FROM THE DANISH.

CHAPTER I.

A SNOW-STORM.

In my thirtieth year I was appointed Rector (head master) of the Latin school in one of the provincial towns of Jutland. I entered upon my duties at Easter, and, nevertheless, when Christmas came round I was not yet married—nay, not even engaged. I am at a loss to account for so marvellous an occurrence, and the more so, as I not only cultivated the serious muses, but was likewise a devoted votary of their livelier sisters, Euterpe, Thalia, and Terpsichore; or, in non-mythological language, I took the part of first fiddler in all amateur concerts, and of first lover in all private theatricals; and as to the balls, it was the opinion of all the young ladies in the town, that neither the Figaro nor the Molinasco went off well if the Rector did not lead the dance.

The Christmas vacation was drawing nigh, and I was anticipating the enjoyment of a few weeks otium, during which I contemplated finishing off the dissertation on the "Social Pleasures of the Ancients," which I was writing for my Doctor's degree; but, most unexpectedly I was invited to take part in those of the moderns. Thammerraad Hansen* (I give him this name because it is borne by so many, and because I hate the mysterious . . . which so disagreeably interrupt the reader) from Ulvedal, whose son was one of the pupils in the school, came to fetch him home, and pressed me so warmly to accompany them, that at length I yielded, on condition of being allowed to return home whenever I desired. Fearing that time might possibly hang heavily on my hands I also provided myself with a duodecimo edition of old Gellert.

As soon as I had given my assent, the Thammerraad said, "I wonder if we could not also persuade the Conrector to be of the party?" "And all the masters, father!" added his son. The proposal was at once carried out, and as in accordance with the Thammerraad's wish, I exercised my bona officio, we gained the assent of all, except the master of the second form who was suffering from indisposition. But before I begin the narrative of our excursion to Ulvedal, I think I ought to give a sketch of these, my colleagues, who were all, like myself, unmarried, but had otherwise nothing in common.

The Conrector had been married; but at this time he had been during many years a childless widower, and living rather retired with an elderly sister who directed his little household. He was a man of good and sound principles, of much firmness and steadiness of will, and of a serious yet gentle turn of mind; in addition to which, he possessed eminent qualifications as a teacher and educator of youth, and was thoroughly versed in Greek and Latin, which he had expounded daily for upwards of quarter of a century. The classic authors in these two languages were his most cherished companions, and above all others he prized Horace, whom he knew by heart, and quoted on all occasions. The uniformity of his life was broken by one diversion only, and that was a game of Toccategli every Sunday evening, with the master of the fifth form; and even on these occasions he made use of the ancient terminology.

His adversary in the game—whom we will hereafter call Quintus—was, when I first made his acquaintance, a man of about sixty (the same age as the Conrector), tall, broad-shouldered, and of an iron constitution. In proportion to the rest of his body, his face was very large, and never betrayed the slightest sign of emotion, not even of anger. An old proverb says, "it is difficult to look further into a man than his teeth;" but into Quintus one could not even look so far; for his long upper lip formed an impenetrable curtain, which was kept firmly down, even when he was in the act of eating, and which neither smile nor laugh displaced; for he had never been seen to smile, and his laugh was but a succession of hollow sounds, which caused no variation in his countenance. Quintus was ruled by one passion only, or rather tendency, and that was a desire to accumulate money; wherefore, he never ate sufficient to satisfy his hunger, except when at a friend's table, and then indeed he made up for former privations. But if he used his jaws diligently at table, he gave them full rest on all other occasions. He never addressed any one; all his talk being limited to answers, and these were ever in the true laconic style. The school was the only place where he practised his powerful organ of speech. He was not a bad teacher, but he had a manner of his own, which he adhered to as faithfully as if it had been a ritual. He always insisted on a double translation of the books which he was reading with the pupils, the one literal, the other free; and it must be confessed that the freedom of the latter often degenerated into license. I thus remember hearing him one of the first days after my appointment to the school, reading a scene from Terence with the boys, in which occurs the sentence: "Ira amantium amoris est integratio." The pupil translated first thus: "The anger of lovers is the renewal of love;" but Quintus cried: "free!" The pupil began: "When sweethearts fall out—" "That is false, fellow," thundered Quintus, interrupting him, and substituting some arbitrary and outrageously burlesque version of his own. The laughter-loving boys often pretended to forget his travestie of the author they were reading, in order to make him repeat it himself; and when, on his doing so, they gave vent to their merriment, he did not take this amiss, but frequently chimed in with his hollow "Ho! ho! ho!" He would, indeed, have been a favourite with the boys, had he not been so covetous, or, as they termed it, stingy. When the pupils of his class returned to school, after the holidays, they were expected to present themselves before him; but those who came empty-handed received but a sorry welcome. "Have you brought me no message from your mother?" asked he, if the disciple said nothing to that effect. "No!" "Has she not given you some butter to bring?" "No!" "No cheese?" "No!" "Not either any chickens?" "No!" "Get along, you lazy fellow, I care not to see you before my eyes!" and thus ended the interview. His meanness was the more revolting as he even went the lengths of selling the presents which were sent to him on such occasions, never allowing himself to consume any but those which were very low in the market. His dress was in unison with his whole mode of living; his every-day costume consisted of a brownish-yellow frock-coat, ditto knee-breeches, and long stiff boots; his waistcoat was as invisible as his teeth. His black neck-tie partook somewhat of a brownish-red tint, and his wig and queue were of a yellow-red hue; for it was only powdered five times in the year, that is to say, on the great Church festivals, on which occasions, also, his old black suit got an airing.

Quartus was in almost every respect the reverse of Quintus. He was small, delicately built, and quick in all his movements, and though a man of middle age, had retained all the elegance of his youth, and also his youthful desire to please the ladies, a wish which seems, however, never to have been gratified; at least he had never succeeded so far as to induce any young lady to accompany him to the altar. In consequence of Venus having proved herself so unfavourable, he had devoted himself to the service of another divinity, who is said to have afforded consolation to many an unhappy lover and husband; but though already a votary of Bacchus, at the time I learnt to know him, he was not yet what he called a regular toper. The boys, who are always the first to discern the failings of their masters, were also the first to discover poor Quartus' frequent libations to the jolly god, for which purpose he used to invent various pretexts for leaving the school-room. Another little failing under which he laboured, was a desire to boast of his past as well as present favour with the ladies, and as this failing was well known, it will readily be conceived that he was in society frequently made the butt of ladies as well as gentlemen, the lively girls allowing themselves a little innocent flirtation with him, in order to strengthen his belief in his being irresistible.

Of Tertius I have but little to say. He was one of the million, who are wanting in such independence of character or being as is required to form a distinct individuality, and who are like certain insects, which take their colour from the objects that surround them. According to the world's judgment, he was "a good man," because he did no evil (at least in a positive sense); because he conformed himself as much as possible to every one; because he never contradicted any one; and because he was ready to do everything that others did, and did everything indifferently, or at least only pretty well. He was a mediocre teacher and a mediocre musician; he danced pretty well, and was an indifferent hand at whist. He was of my age, although his phlegmatic temperament and manners, as also his very dark hair and beard, made him appear older. And now I think the reader is pretty well acquainted with the learned company that had come to the determination of spending Christmas at Ulvedal; I, because I could not resist the hearty importunity of a sincerely hospitable man; the Conrector because he could not resist my persuasions; Quintus because he expected to enjoy good cheer at the expense of another; Quartus because he knew there would be good wine and pretty women; and Tertius, because every body else was going.

The day was drawing to its close before we started. I was seated with Thammerraad Hansen in his own sledge, which held only two persons inside, and was driven by himself, his son being seated behind. The four masters were in a sledge that followed, the driver being Mr. Hansen's coachman. The weather had been murky and still all day; but as we were leaving the town a south-east wind began to rise which disturbed the fine loose snow and whirled it like a thin volume of smoke along the top of the embankment which bordered the road; but the Thammerraad hoped nevertheless that we would reach Ulvedal without any difficulty, as the horses were swift and the road well known to him.

We drove at a furious pace, but the snow soon began to fall as well as to rise, and the wind continued to increase, and we had hardly left the town half a mile behind us, before heaven and earth seemed to meet—all was white above us and below. It was the first time in my life that I found myself in the open field in a serious snow-storm. Unacquainted with the difficulties and dangers of the position, I therefore enjoyed the tempest, as a child does the sight of a house on fire, or as Ossian's Carthon, when he tells of the destruction of his father's castle: "The volumes of smoke," he says, "delighted my eyes; I knew not why the women wept." Also my eyes were delighted with the whirling snow, which enveloped us like a dense cloud; I also knew not for some time, why the lively Thammerraad had become so serious and so silent. Even when the evening was more advanced, and our position was by no means matter for merriment, I felt in the midst of my fears that secret, perhaps I may term it romantic delight, to which danger frequently gives rise, when it does not threaten immediate or inevitable destruction. I fancied myself at sea in a furious gale; and indeed the movements of the sledge were much like those of a ship, for one moment it dived down, and the next rose up again, like a vessel on a tempest-tossed sea, and all traces of its passage were as rapidly obliterated.

We might have been about an hour and a half on the road, and ought, consequently, to have been near our goal, as we had been driving all the while very rapidly, when the Thammerraad stopped to consult with the driver of the other sledge. On hearing his master's voice the latter drew up alongside of us, and answered in the affirmative the question as to whether we were not on the wrong tack. When his master reproached him with not having spoken before, he replied, "that he had relied upon the Thammerraad." The spot where we had halted was in lee of the wind, and in advance of us we descried through the thickly-falling snow a dark object which might be either a house or a hillock. The coachman was despatched thither to reconnoitre. We passengers were still rather unconcerned. The Conrector was the first to open the conversation, by quoting some verses from Ovid, descriptive of winter on the borders of the Black Sea; upon which Quartus observed: "that the poet could hardly have felt the cold more keenly than he did, and that a portable stove, or any other warming apparatus, would be very acceptable." His pupil at once understood his meaning, and diving down into the sledge brought forth a bottle of brandy, from which, with the exception of the Conrector, each took a draught. In the meanwhile the coachman returned with the good news that we were on the outskirts of a wood, the name of which I do not recollect, about a quarter of a mile from Ulvedal, and that he could now easily find the way home. We then put ourselves in movement again, he taking the lead.

The snow gradually ceased to fall, and the wind seemed also to have abated somewhat; for we only heard a hollow moaning in the supposed wood, and as we were at the same time perfectly sheltered by it, we felt very comfortable and rejoiced in the prospect of being ere long under a hospitable roof. However, our hope was not so soon to be fulfilled; we drove, and drove, but no Ulvedal made its appearance. After we had proceeded for upwards of half an hour along a very rough road, where we were several times in danger of upsetting, the coachman stopped his horses with the consolotary avowal, "that he did not know where we were." The adventure, the novelty of which had until then amused me, now began to look rather serious. The Thammerraad swore at his coachman, and the coachman at his horses; but the Conrector consoled us with the exclamation: "Sodales! et hac meminisse juvabit;"* and poor Quartus comforted himself with another draught from the bottle. At that moment the coachman discovered the track of a sledge in the snow. We determined to follow this, feeling sure that it would lead us to some human habitation. We drove, and drove, and the further we proceeded the more beaten became the path. We continued our way in high glee at this piece of good fortune; but, as yet we saw neither house nor village! it was most puzzling. At length, we discovered something dark in advance of us on the snow. The coachman got down to see what it was, and lo! it was one of his own horse-cloths. For upwards of an hour we had been driving round and round in our own track, and were now on the very spot where we halted the first time. The joke was becoming rather serious; the Thammerraad began to upbraid himself, to pity us and to make many apologies, while the coachman again reconnoitred. He soon returned, and gladdened our hearts with the assurance that we were not far from some dwelling-place, for he had seen a light which he felt convinced was no will-o'-the-whisp. He took his seat again, turned his horses in that direction, and the Thammerraad followed.

We now advanced along a broad and straight road in the direction of the light, which soon appeared double, and was then found to proceed from two windows. The master and his man exhausted themselves in conjectures as to what house this could be; for the road seemed bordered on both sides by a quickset hedge. In a little while we were at the door of the house, which was suddenly opened with much noise, and a gruff voice called out, "Who's there?" "Travellers who have lost their way," answered the Thammerraad. "Good gracious, Sir," was the reply, "why have you come through the garden?" "What garden?" "Why, the garden! your own garden." And we now found that we had got over the garden fence by means of the heaped-up snow, and having proceeded down a broad avenue lined by a hedge of beeches, had thus arrived outside of the garden saloon. We entered the house amid much laughing and joking, and were received by the steward—the person who had first challenged us—and by the lady of the house and her two daughters, who had prepared an excellent supper for the wayfarers. We needed no pressing to partake of it; nothing was left of a hare and a goose but the bones; and Quintus, in particular, managed to pick the breast-bone of the goose so clear, that it was declared to have a beautiful polish. As Mrs. Hansen had not been prepared for so large a company, and particularly not for a guest with such an appetite as Quintus, the larder had to give forth its cold provisions also, and not until our hungry stomachs had been appeased, did our kind hostess make inquiries as to the strange way in which we had entered the premises; but sleepiness had already so far overpowered us, that no one answered but the Conrector, who in a doleful voice exclaimed: "infandum regina jubes renovare dolorem!"* Mrs. Hansen stared, but her husband, who knew Latin, laughed and said, "In Danish this is as much as to say, we are all longing very much for our beds, but to-morrow you shall be acquainted with our adventures." On hearing this, Quintus gave forth his hollow, "ho, ho, ho," and declared the translation to be rather free but very apt; saying which he arose, and the rest of us followed his example. A quarter-of-an-hour later I was buried in eider-down and sleep.

CHAPTER II.

A BATTUE.

When I opened my eyes the next morning, the first person I saw was my lively host, who was standing at my bed-side clad in a green frock-coat bordered with fur, a fur-cap and waterproof boots, which reached above his knees. "My son has told me," he said, "that you are a keen sportsman; and I have, therefore, given orders for a battue. The weather is as favourable as we could desire; but the days are short, and you must, therefore, excuse my urging you to get up." "I am only afraid of disturbing the old man," I answered, in a low voice, looking towards another bed, in which the Conrector lay; but he was already awake, and drawing back the curtains of his bed, said: "Leporem venator ut alta sectetur nive—mane surgit."† The Thammerraad laughed, and having once more reminded me that time was precious, he left us to make way for the servant, who brought in tea and coffee.

Not long after, I joined the family at the breakfast-table, fully equipped for the hunt; but found none of my colleagues there except Tertius, who always acted with the majority. The rest of the guests were unknown to me: but I soon discovered that they consisted of persons of all ranks: clergymen and military-men, large landed proprietors and peasant-farmers, nay, even a parish-clerk, who, at the same time, did service as butt to the company, whose sallies, however, he occasionally returned pretty sharply. The conversation was carried on in a lively strain, until the master of the hunt entered and announced that the beaters were assembled. Just as we rose, Quintus and Quartus came in and seated themselves at the breakfast-table; the Conrector followed, but not with the same intentions. He was wrapped in his travelling pelisse, had a night-cap under his hat, and a stick in his hand. "Hey-day!" exclaimed several of us at the same moment, "whither are you bound?" "To the battue," he answered, striking his stick upon the floor, and with the look which he assumed in the school, when he cried, "Be off," to the boys; "it is the first time in my life, and I dare say it will be the last. Domine confrater," said he then, turning to me, "I will follow you that I may witness your wonderful feats, and will incite your courage by my words." Every one laughed, and the Thammerraad said, "Only beware that the enemy hear you not!" We then got into the sledges, and glided swiftly away to the wood where the hunt was to begin.

It was one of those winter days which, though forming a striking contrast to the smiling days of summer, possess in my opinion a solemn, and, if I may be allowed the expression, a heart-strengthening beauty. The wind having lulled later in the night, and the snow having begun to fall again, the earth, wood and field, was now clad in dazzling whiteness. The stems of some few trees and the walls of some distant farmsteads, were the only dark specks which dotted the snow carpet that spread over the wide plain, and seemed at the horizon to melt together with the heavens. The sky was cloudless and beautifully clear, but in the south-east where the orb of day was rising, glowing, vivid tints of every hue which no earthly pencil can imitate, and for which the poor human tongue has no words, were blending, shifting, following each other in constant, though almost imperceptible succession. High in the west sat the moon, with a slight incision in her pale disc, as if awaiting the coming sun to dispute with him the dominion of light. Close by twinkled the star, which accompanies the queen of night, and is the last to give way before the god of day. But when the latter arose in dazzling beauty from the white winter ocean, driving before him the glow of morning high upon the arch of heaven; when his flaming glance fell like a life-giving smile upon the pale cold earth, which now blushed like a bride at the approach of the bridegroom; when the silvery branches of the trees shone in the light of morn, and the hoar-frost glittered in the transparent atmosphere, or sparkled like diamonds on the snow-covered fields, then — but where is the mortal who can describe in words the sweetest of all joys? We have but one expression for joy and sorrow—a tear.

The sledges stopped on the confines of the wood; we alighted in silence. The Thammerraad indicated to us by signs and whispers our appointed stations, in a long, deep dell. The Conrector remained with me, but was obliged to take up his station behind the tree before which I was posted. I once more admonished him to keep quiet when he saw the game approaching, and then awaited, with my gun in readiness, the signal for the commencement of the sport.

After the lapse of about seven minutes the report of a gun was heard on the right, then one on the left, and a third in the middle, and then followed the sounds of the beaters' hunting-poles on the trunks of the trees, and the cries of the gamekeepers and wood-rangers who were in command. Soon a stately stag, with crown antlers, appeared on the brow of the opposite hill. He stood still a moment, looked back, pricked his ears, and then bounded down right towards the spot where I was posted. When he was at a distance of ten paces from me, he again stopped short and turned his head aside. I levelled my gun, drew the trigger, and he fell shot in the neck. The Conrector advanced his head from behind the tree, and asked what it was. I pointed to the stag, which was at its last gasp. "Macte virtute esto!" exclaimed my second in a voice of triumph; but I implored him to suppress his joy and his voice, and reloaded my gun.

The eminence in front of us rose in a gentle acclivity, and was only thinly studded with trees, so that I had a full view of the whole field of operations, up, as well as down the dell. It was a beautiful sight to the eyes of a sportsman to behold the game come bounding, scampering, or sneaking forward; deer, hares, and foxes, the latter looking prudently around for a secure place of passage, the former running wildly and without a plan in all directions, and in their blind terror rushing right past sportsmen, whose shot fell thick and fast, some hitting, others missing. Each time the Conrector perceived any game approaching, he whispered, "ecce! ecce!" to which I returned an equally low-toned, "tace! tace!" For some time, however, none came within reach of my shot; but a fox had been running to and fro along the brow of the hill, at length he disappeared on the other side, and the loud cries of the beaters announced that he was endeavouring to sneak through their lines. Immediately afterwards he came scampering down towards the sportsman who was posted the second from me on the right hand. He imprudently stepped forward and levelled his gun. Quick as lightning the fox turned round—the sportsman fired—and missed his aim! Reynard now proceeded in the direction of my nearest neighbour; he fired, and also missed. Secretly rejoicing at their discomfiture, I was now in great glee, expecting that my turn would come; but, unhappily, my Achates behind the tree nourished the same expectations, and gave expression to them in too loud a voice, "Jam ad triarios venit res!" he exclaimed, and round turned Reynard, succeeding this time in making his escape, while my two neighbours, vexed at their own want of address, stretched their necks to look after him. I also at first could not restrain an angry exclamation; but when my colleague excused himself with "Profecto! I did not expect that he would understand Latin!" my vexation gave way to a hearty laugh.

The rappel was now sounded. The sportsmen assembled round the fallen monarch of the woods, and I participated with gratified pride in their satisfaction at my lucky shot; for a stag was seldom seen in the Ulvedal hunting grounds. This fortunate occurrence made them forget my neighbours' mishaps and my colleague's blunders; and the small game was hardly noticed. The second turn was meagre; but in the third I was so fortunate as to kill three foxes, which feat won for me the laudations of the whole company, but none were so flattering to my vanity as the observation which I overheard Mr. Hansen's ranger making to some of the woodmen; "What a devilish shot that Rector is," he said, "he might at any time take service as ranger!"

The first wood had been cleared, and just as we were on the point of proceeding to another, we met the ladies of the family, with Quartus and Quintus, and—as a natural consequence—provision-basket and bottle-case. Quartus, who performed the office of cup-bearer, did it with honour to himself, not forgetting the while to moisten his own throat; but when the Thammerraad jokingly reminded him from time to time not to neglect himself, he exclaimed, most innocently, "Did I not drink?" and then with a sudden resolution he replenished and again emptied the small silver goblet. Quintus ate for two.

You who read this, my first and last love adventure, forgive me the garrulity with which I dwell on every little incident of those happy days of my youth. Each one of them has a charm in my eyes; even the most insignificant would be missed by me were it omitted in this rural winter scene, which presents itself to me on this background of the past, attracts and rivets my attention, and enlivens and refreshes my old heart, which has endured so many a bitter grief. Dear reader! I have no one else left to whom I can say, "Do you remember this, do you recollect that?" They are all gone—all those who shared with me the pleasures of that merry Christmas. I am alone in the midst of a younger generation, and therefore my thoughts dwell so often and so long with one that has passed away.

After having distributed the refreshments, our pretty purveyors returned home with lightened basket and empty bottles. The Conrector, who by this time had had quite enough of hunting, accompanied them, but we sportsmen did not wend our way homewards until the sun had completed his short career, and the first stars began to look out from the many-hued heavens.

"Otium est pulvinar amorir," said the Conrector in a warning voice to the boys, when he was interpreting that part of the fourth book of the Æneid, where the poor fellow meets Dido in the grotto; and the old man then always defined otium as "days without care or any fixed occupation." I had now an opportunity of testing the correctness of his maxim. Hitherto I had really never had leisure to fall in love. The pretty faces among my female acquaintances had glided past me like the pictures in a magic lantern; or if by some extraordinary chance, I had fixed my eyes on some distinguished object in the great panorama of the capital, the serious muses soon recalled their obedient son to libraries and lectures, to lucubrations and lessons. To fall in love we must have otium; and of this there was no lack at Ulvedal, and of maidens also there was no lack, but there were so many that the one stood in the way of the other. I was like the intoxicated man who stood in the middle of the square with his latch-key in his hand, trying in vain to open the door of the houses that were eternally whirling round.

The prettiest among the young ladies at Ulvedal, were certainly the Thammarraad's two daughters, but they were equally pretty, so that when they stood side by side I knew not to which I should give the preference, and when they were separated I always gave it to the one that was present. Now—whether it was in consequence of the balance which was thus maintained in my inclinations, or that the maidens were in reality nothing more than common-place girls, with a smooth surface but no depth below—true it is, that I could take a cup of coffee from the hand of the one, without experiencing an electric shock in my fingers, and I could jest with the other at the whist table, without making any blunders; and, moreover, after the fatigues of the day, the merriment of the evening, I slept as soundly as though there had never been such a thing as love in the world.

SEVEN years have not yet elapsed since Lord John Russell formed the administration in which Earl Grey held the distinguished office of Secretary of State for the Colonies. In July, 1846, there was perhaps no member of either House of Parliament whose co-operation in constituting a Liberal Ministry was deemed more essential than that of Earl Grey. Indeed, so important was this considered that, only six months before, his refusal to take office along with Lord Palmerston had alone prevented Lord John Russell from forming a Government, and thus deprived him of the glory of passing the act for the repeal of the corn-laws. Nor was it without good reason that so much weight was attached to Earl Grey's adhesion. While the name which he bore was itself a recommendation to popular favour, his own previous career had not belied the assurance of public spirit and political talent which that name seemed to offer. He had served a statesman's apprenticeship. As Under-Secretary for the Colonies, Under-Secretary for the Home Department, and Secretary at War, he had had opportunities at the same time of acquiring official experience and of evincing administrative capacity of no common order. He had taken a distinguished part in the debates of the Lower House, and especially in supporting, through years of discouragement, that great cause of commercial freedom, which had triumphed but a few days before he became Secretary of State. He was favourably known, too, for the attention which he had given to colonial questions, and for the useful reforms which he had advocated in our system of colonial policy. High hopes were formed of his administration of the department committed to his charge; and not a few persons predicted that his success in that office would at length elevate him to the highest position which a subject can hold, and that we should again see an Earl Grey First Minister of the Crown.

How soon and how utterly those expectations were disappointed, no one will need to be reminded. Long before the Ministry of 1846 quitted office, Earl Grey had become by far the most unpopular member of it. When Lord Aberdeen formed his comprehensive Administration, the omission of Earl Grey's name from the list was regarded as simply an act of proper deference to public feeling. That name which, in July, 1846, was so essential to the completion of a Liberal Cabinet, would in December, 1852, have been the most damaging that could have been introduced into any ministerial combination. Yet most persons, if asked to state the precise causes of this extraordinary change in public opinion, would perhaps be somewhat at a loss. They would probably satisfy themselves, if not the inquirer, by observing that Earl Grey, no doubt, was an able minister, and meant well, but he seemed to have a shockingly bad temper, and managed somehow to keep the colonies constantly in hot water. It was a pity, to be sure, that his father's son should have failed so deplorably in office, but he had failed, and there was an end of it.

It is not surprising that Earl Grey himself should protest against such a summary decision, and should decline to submit to what he considers an unjust ostracism. He demands a regular trial, and pleads his own cause in the court of public opinion. In a series of letters, addressed nominally to Lord John Russell, but really to the political world, he undertakes to give an account of his Colonial Administration, and to show that, taken in the whole, it was beneficial to the colonies, useful to the mother country, honourable to the Government of which he was a member, and consequently creditable to himself as the minister on whom the "main responsibility" in this department properly rested. Such is the obvious, and indeed the partly avowed purpose of the work just submitted to the public. And it may be observed that there is something in this purpose itself which tends to conciliate the reader's favour for the author. When a statesman who has given his best years to his country's service, descends from the loftiest parliamentary arena, and appeals to the impartial judgment of his countrymen against the condemnation of political opponents, the very act of appeal, in acknowledging the supremacy of public opinion, awakens a favourable disposition towards the appellant. This disposition is decidedly strengthened by the general tone and spirit of the work. It bears no trace of the acrid temper, for which its author has acquired in public life so unlucky a reputation. On the contrary, the letters are written throughout with a calm seriousness, a careful avoidance of harsh expressions towards opponents, and a dignified reserve on merely personal topics, which altogether render them a most respectable exhibition of what Mr. Disraeli would doubtless call "the writer's better mind." The character of the work in this respect is very fairly displayed in the following passages of the "concluding observations," which may also serve as a specimen of the rather cumbrous, "state-paper" style in which the letters are written:

I trust, however, that the result of my review of colonial affairs will not appear, upon the whole, unsatisfactory to those who will impartially consider the subject and the difficulties with which we have had to struggle. No doubt, during the five years and a half of your government, while these affairs were under my immediate superintendence, mistakes were committed. Looking back, with the advantage of the experience we have gained, and judging of our measures by their results, I can see many things which might have been better done than they were. Knowing what the pressure of public business is in this country, the degree to which the attention of those who conduct it cannot fail to be distracted by the variety of different subjects which must, day by day, be considered and dealt with, the important decisions which must be come to with little time for deliberation, and often with a great difficulty in obtaining information; he must, indeed, be a sanguine man who can expect that any of the great departments of the State can ever be conducted without many and serious mistakes being committed; and, perhaps, there is no department of the Government where there is the same difficulty in avoiding such mistakes as in that of the colonies. * * * * *

Let me add, with regard to the results of our policy—for, after all, it must be judged by its fruits—that, taking our colonial empire as a whole, I greatly doubt whether any other period of equal length can be pointed out in our history, in which that empire has prospered so much, and has made such large strides towards future greatness, as during the years of which I have been speaking. There has certainly been no similar period during which, in spite of all the difficulties that have been encountered, the advance has been greater. The facts and statistics which I have quoted from official documents, enable me to make this assertion without fear of contradiction. With the single exception of the Cape, where we left, as we found, a distressing war going on, profound peace and internal tranquillity prevailed throughout the whole of our extensive colonial empire at the time of our quitting office. A commercial revolution, deeply affecting the interests of many of our most important colonies, has been safely passed through, not, it is true, without much distress and loss to individuals, which I deeply lament, but with great advantage to the permanent welfare of these colonies and of the mother country; and, except where our measures have been thwarted by the opposition to the new commercial policy, the difficulties inseparable from so great a change, have been nearly surmounted. Various important and difficult questions, touching both the internal government of the colonies and their relations with the mother country, have been happily settled; and in almost all the colonies a great reduction of the charges they impose on the British treasury has been effected, and principles have been established, and rules laid down, which, if they shall continue to be acted upon, must lead to still larger and early reductions of our expenditure. The burden of taxation has also been diminished, and the state of the finances at the same time improved, in the colonies where the most direct authority is exercised by the Crown. Finally, while the principle of leaving to the colonists the management of their own affairs has been carried further than at any former period, this has been accomplished without disturbing any of the ancient landmarks which define the limits of the powers vested respectively in the Crown, the Imperial Parliament, and the Colonial Legislatures. I may be deceived, but to this maintenance of the long-established boundaries of these different authorities I attach the highest importance. If, in deference to the popular doctrines of the day, an attempt had been made, or should hereafter be so, to meet the natural desire of the most advanced of our colonies to be exempted from undue interference on the part of the Imperial Government—not by a judiciously sparing exercise of what are still the acknowledged powers of the Crown and of Parliament, but by a formal surrender of the powers themselves—I entertain a strong persuasion that such concessions, far from tending to avert future difficulties and disputes between the parent state and her dependencies, would have the very opposite effect, and would be too likely to lead to frequent and dangerous contests of authority; and, ultimately, by a few short and easy steps, to the severance of the tie which unites the fairest portions of our colonial empire to the British Crown.

The concluding sentences of this extract, and especially the quiet sneer at the "popular doctrines of the day," indicate the fatal defect in Earl Grey's colonial policy, and the source of nearly all his errors. In spite of his fair professions, it is evident that he has no genuine faith in the principle of colonial self-government. It would hardly be unjust to go farther and to say, that he seems to have no great liking for representative government anywhere. He rarely fails to take advantage of any favourable opportunity which occurs for depreciating indirectly, and sometimes directly, the merits of this form of government, and for showing how much better the affairs of those colonies are managed which are under the complete control of Colonial Office functionaries. Thus, with regard to Jamaica, he observes:

This colony has for two centuries been in possession of a representative constitution, and the Assembly not only exercises the ordinary authority of a legislative body, but performs many of what are usually the functions of the Executive Government, the authority of the Crown being more restricted than elsewhere by various laws which at different times have been passed, and by usages which have grown up. But the actual condition of Jamaica, I regret to say, is far from being such as to show that the possession of the powers of self-government affords that complete security for the welfare of a community, and for the good management of its affairs, which many persons seem to suppose.

This singular passage would lead one to doubt whether Earl Grey understands the meaning of the expression, self-government. The colonists of Jamaica do not possess, and never have possessed, the power of self-government. They have, indeed, a Representative Assembly, possessing powers about on a par with those of Louis Napoleon's "Representative Body." If France is a self-governed country, then Jamaica is a self-governed colony. This Representative Assembly of Jamaica is overridden by a Council of Crown nominees, appointed for life, wholly irresponsible to the colonists, and, in fact, having functions and attributes not unlike those of Louis Napoleon's senate. Above both the Assembly and the Council is the Governor, who, like the French Emperor himself, is in no way responsible to the legislative bodies. All the executive officers—that is to say, all the Ministers of the colony—are appointed by the Crown for life, and are not responsible to the Assembly. Imagine the condition of this country, if all the secretaries of state and other officeholders were nominated by some distant authority, were entirely irresponsible to Parliament, and had the power of preventing the enactment of any law which did not happen to suit them. Such a supposition will afford some idea of the political condition of the colonists of Jamaica. What renders the matter worse in their case is the fact that their Assembly, such as it is, is elected under a restricted franchise, which excludes the majority of the inhabitants from the right of voting. Thus, in fact, the representative body in Jamaica is little more than a planters' debating-club. If, when the slaves were emancipated, the privilege of real self-government had been bestowed upon the colonists, with such an electoral franchise as would have included the great bulk of the inhabitants, it is extremely probable that those difficulties in connection with this colony, which have caused Earl Grey and other ministers so much trouble, would not have arisen.

It is a remarkable fact that of the fifty British colonies, there are at this moment only four which possess the power of self-government. These four are Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island. In these colonies the government is conducted on the British system, through Parliamentary ministries. The Governor holds the position of a constitutional sovereign: he reigns, but does not govern. The real executive power in each colony is entirely in the hands of popular ministers, who only hold office so long as they retain the confidence of a majority in the local legislature. All appointments to office are made on the recommendation of this responsible ministry. In this manner the administration of local affairs is placed not only under the control but entirely in the hands of the colonists themselves. Earl Grey admits the remarkable success which has attended the working of this form of government in the three first-named colonies, though he fears that in Prince Edward's Island "the experiment has been tried somewhat prematurely, and that the population of this colony is hardly sufficient for the effective working of the machinery of a form of government better adapted to a community in a more advanced stage of social progress." He strongly deprecates the extension of this system of "Parliamentary Government" to other colonies, and makes on this point the following extraordinary observations, worthy almost of the present ruler of France, who takes a similar view of the defects of a "Parliamentary system," and is equally convinced that free institutions are unsuited to a community which has not reached "an advanced stage of social progress." The sentence here printed in italics indicates a singular state of feeling in the writer:—

The system now established in Canada is that of Parliamentary Government, that is to say, government by means of parties. This form of government is now working well in that and the neighbouring provinces, and is probably on the whole the best plan hitherto adopted of enabling a colony in an advanced stage of its social progress to exercise the privilege of self-government; it may therefore be regarded as the form which representative institutions, when they acquire their full development, are likely to take in the British colonies. The experience, however, of our own country, in which this system of government has so long flourished, may teach us that its advantages are by no means unmixed, even in communities the best adapted to it, but that there are considerable drawbacks to the benefits we derive from it. We know also that hitherto Parliamentary Government has not been carried into successful operation for any considerable time, in any other country in the world but our own, and that it is little more than ten years, since it was first attempted in any of our colonies, while in none of them can it be said to have been brought into full operation until far more recently. Even this short experience of its working in the colonies would seem to show that it is only suitable to a colony which is not a very small one, to a population in an advanced stage of civilization, which has had the advantage of some training by the working of a free constitution of a simpler kind, and, I should be inclined to add, in which municipal institutions exist, capable of dividing with the Legislature the very large powers which it would engross, if, in the absence of such institutions, the representatives of the people had a virtual control over the appointment of the executive officers of the government.

The nature of this "free constitution of a simpler kind," which Earl Grey would give to the colonies, is elsewhere sufficiently indicated. It would consist of a "representative legislature," similar in its character and powers to that which now exists in Jamaica, or to that which existed in Canada prior to the rebellion,—in short, as has been before observed, a sham legislature, exactly like that which is now established in France. As to allowing the colonists to choose their own executive officers, that is altogether out of the question. The Crown, or the Crown's nominee, the Governor, must appoint them all, quite uncontrolled by the local legislature. And some of the principal officers should be sent from England. Earl Grey considers that the appointment of "persons not selected from the narrow circle of their (the colonies') own inhabitants, and imbued with the peculiar feelings and opinions which are apt to prevail in such communities, but chosen from among the well-educated gentlemen of the mother-country, is calculated greatly to improve the tone of colonial society, and to prevent it from gradually degenerating from the standard of manners and acquirements to which we are accustomed at home." The instinctive, though, probably, unconscious contempt with which Earl Grey regards "such communities" as those which exist in our colonies, is curiously exhibited in the foregoing sentence, which goes far to explain his failure as a Colonial Minister. He evidently cannot bring himself to believe—what is, nevertheless the truth—that in every British colony there are "well-educated gentlemen," fully equal in ability and accomplishments to the best that can be sent from this country, and, of course, infinitely superior to the latter in that local knowledge which is so essential to the good administration of the affairs of any community.

There is one point, in connection with this subject, to which it seems right, as a test of the value of Earl Grey's authority on this subject, to direct particular attention. It has been seen that his lordship's aversion to the system of "Parliamentary Government" for small colonies is countenanced, in his opinion, by the circumstance that this system appears to have been "somewhat prematurely tried" in Prince Edward's Island, which has a population of only about 55,000 souls. In another part of his work, he again hints his apprehension that the inhabitants of this colony have "acquired prematurely the establishment of a system of government for which they are not yet sufficiently prepared." Earl Grey alleges no facts, and no authority but his own, in support of this opinion. As it appears in his work, it is an ipse dixit, and nothing more. Under these circumstances, it seemed necessary to inquire how far his views were sustained by evidence. The latest and best evidence is that which is contained in the most recent "Blue Book" on the Colonies, that of 1852. In this "Blue Book" appears the last annual report of the Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward's Island, Sir Alexander Bannerman. The following is the concluding passage of this report, dated in July, 1852. It will be seen that the Lieutenant-Governor, who has watched the working of "Parliamentary Government" on the spot, has come to a conclusion directly opposite to that which is expressed by Earl Grey:—

On my assumption of the Government, in the spring of 1851, in accordance with instructions from the Colonial Minister, responsible government (for some years before eagerly sought for by the colonists) was conceded to Prince Edward's Island, and her Majesty's hereditary revenues surrendered to the colony. As was naturally to be expected, much party spirit existed before the concession was made, and it will continue to exist, in a greater or less degree, until the change of system has had a longer trial, and its opponents get more reconciled to the deprivation of that power and ascendancy in the island, to which many years' possession appeared to give them an inherent right, but which they can now only regain by obtaining the confidence of their fellow-colonists in the usual constitutional way: and, from my short experience in the island, and from all I have seen, I am of opinion the change was not only necessary, but will prove beneficial to the colony: and that I shall next year have to give a more favourable account of its progressive improvement.

Earl Grey is of opinion that "Parliamentary Government" was prematurely introduced into Prince Edward's Island, and that the colony was not prepared for it. Lieutenant-Governor Bannerman is of opinion that the change was "necessary," and "will be beneficial to the colony." Earl Grey had this "Blue Book" before him. He makes several references to it in his work. It is hardly possible that the important report of Sir A. Bannerman should have escaped his notice. His lordship has, of course, a right to retain his own opinion, even against the contrary opinion of the Lieutenant-Governor; but it may be questioned whether he ought not, in fairness, while speaking unfavourably of the working of this form of Government in Prince Edward's Island, to have mentioned that the testimony of the highest local authority was directly opposed to his views. At all events, the discovery of such an omission of important evidence, must certainly tend to lessen the reader's confidence in the other statements and conclusions which appear in this work.

It will surprise no one to find that Earl Grey is still an ardent advocate of the system of convict transportation. He devotes a letter of eighty-seven pages to an exposition of the nature and advantages of the system, and an account of his endeavours to improve and extend it. And he winds up his book with a "Postscript," in which he expresses the horror with which he had just learned, that the Government actually proposed to abolish the system altogether. He even throws out a dark hint that, although he is "exceedingly anxious to support the administration," it may be his "duty" to oppose it on this question. He draws a fearful picture of the evil consequences which may ensue, if the convicts are turned loose in this country: and he, therefore, thinks it decidedly better that they should be turned loose in the colonies. Whether they will be of use—like the "well-educated gentlemen," who are to be sent out as public functionaries—in "improving the tone of colonial society, and preventing it from gradually degenerating from the standard of manners and acquirements to which we are accustomed at home," his lordship does not distinctly state: but of the paramount necessity of getting them out of this country, in some way or other, he entertains no doubt whatever. Others, however, see the question in a very different light. They are of opinion that the deportation of convicts, instead of benefiting this country, has, in fact, been an injury to it, by preventing the adoption of measures which would have diminished the amount of crime. They observe that, on the Continent, directly opposite to Great Britain, there are three countries, Belgium, Holland, and Denmark, not among the least considerable of European kingdoms, and densely inhabited by populations very closely resembling in character and habits the population of these islands—not one of which countries has a penal colony—but all, on the contrary, keep their convicts at home, without experiencing any of those baneful consequences which Earl Grey predicts as likely to occur in this country. On inquiring how it happens that those states have not suffered any of these injurious effects, they find that in every one of them there is a good system of national education established; that, consequently, their criminals are comparatively few in number, and easily managed in well-conducted penitentiaries, or "home colonies;" and that thus those countries are, at this moment, less troubled with released convicts than Great Britain itself, which has annually exported thousands of felons for the last half century, without apparently making any impression on the number of its "criminal class." They have come to the conclusion, therefore, that our most judicious course will be to put a stop to transportation, and to direct our efforts to the means of preventing crime and reforming criminals. As the Times the other day well observed,

We must so conduct our penitentiaries at home, that convicts returned upon society may be less noxious, if possible, than heretofore; and above all—and this is our truest resource—we must endeavour to lessen their numbers altogether. Perhaps the loss of remedial means may be even a gain to us, if it makes us more anxious for prevention. Ragged schools and universal teaching—cheap bread and readier sustenance—free emigration and higher wages—must all come to our aid, and in the end we may possibly find that the great question of secondary punishments is best solved by the diminution of secondary crime.

This philosophy may be beyond the ken of Earl Grey, but it evidently is not beyond that of Lord John Russell. The noble ex-secretary will find himself, on this question, as on that of responsible government for the colonies, going counter to his former chief, to whom his vindicatory epistles are addressed. There have been strange changes of position and principles among politicians in our day; but surely the strangest and the most lamentable is that which has occurred, when a British senator, bearing the honoured name of Grey, is found inveighing against Parliamentary Government, and threatening to obstruct a Liberal Administation in one of its most salutary reforms.

A WORD OR TWO ON BONNIE SCOTLAND.

Sitting in our easy chair after dinner, having done a good forenoon's work on "new publications," our better and best-beloved half beside us, douce and demure as puss on the hassock, and making her knitting needles click with a sleepy monotony hardly to be resisted, we took up this big four pound volume,* sighing to think how easy our literary conscience must be to deal with such a Goliath ere that red-bleared sun which leared stupidly on us through the mist, should go down behind the chimney-pots on which his lower limb was resting. But needs must where the devil drives. And yet just half an hour's doze would be so pleasant, and as Kitty hints so proper too after one of her most elaborate "spreads." Stop—let me see whether we could not compromise the matter, and review this big one in a reverie. Scotland—good, not a better subject in all the world for an after-dinner dream about fairies and field sports, with the ring of burns and ballads in our ear; statistic—ahem: there's a crook in every lot: no man in his senses could voluntarily and of set purpose dream about fiars and census, unless he were a parish clergyman or own cousin to Joseph Hume. However, let me see: after all the thing is not so unlikely. Stir up the fire, Kitty, and just give me the least more room for toasting my toes, like a dear. There now.

This book seems to be simply some "dozen single gentlemen bound into one:" a combination of the new statistical account, Mc Culloch, sundry guide books, and Oliver and Boyd's Almanac. It is however a very readable volume—not sufficiently portable for the tourist nor minute enough for the economist, but for the general public more solid than the former class and less wearisome than the latter. Altogether it contains an amount of instructive and pleasant matter which ought to recommend it to a large class of readers. Like a good housewife, Mr. Dawson has spread the table with such a variety of viands that one cannot in conscience find fault with the deficiency of any particular dish. "The land of brown heath and shaggy wood" is here mirrored forth to our southern fancies so as to waken an eager longing for summer days, hob-nailed shoes, knapsacks, pocket pistols, and long vacations, when leaving the city's ceaseless din and the office, and copy, and the plaguy imp, and all anxiety behind us, we may once traverse those misty glens and great silent hills, and hear the peaseweep as she flits about the moorland, while we make ready a sure-killing fly for yon frolicsome grilse that showed his shining silver sides in the pool just under the fragrant birch that rustles its light leaves in the quiet evening wind. Hush! my dear, Mr. Dawson is not a wizard: not a bit of him: we will warrant him a good sound son of a God-fearing father; who loves "bonnie Scotland" too well to meddle with black art or grammarye. Nevertheless, he has managed with the help of certain potent charms, composed of the life-blood and brains of Wyllie, Chambers, Billings, Black, and Hugh Millar, to "cast the glamour ower me," and to send this dismal drizzling London mist to Coventry for the present; so that, whether in spirit or out of the spirit I cannot tell, only here I have been this hour past, sitting you say, my dear, and far be it from me to say you nay, by a sea-coal fire in the heart of Cockaigne; but wandering—not my mind, love, my pulse is quite calm, seventy-five to the minute precisely—yet wandering in imagination, now along "the banks and braes o' bonny Doon," by Alloa's haunted Kirk, and through that drunken town of Dumfries where Robin Burns guaged whiskey barrels to the glory of his country and the shame of his own soul—again down the Sneddon by that river of Warren's blacking the Cart, where the "puir weaver body" Tannahill, fifed and fluted his life away about the Braes o' Balquhidder, and that honest packman chield wrote his Wattie and Meg, and where Christopher himself dreamed his first dream about the Isle of Palms as he took a walk with Johnny Lockhart out to the old Manse at Inchinnan. And then I fancied I was far up the Dee at the back of Lochnagar, looking down on that wild Loch Dhu, unvisited hitherto by any cockney foot, and lying to this day unimproved and unregenerate with the old curse upon it in a state of diabolical perfection and Miltonic sublimity, black, blasted, awful, like Satan's own eye sunken among shaggy and beetling rocks; and by and bye I was "within a mile o' Edinburgh toon," away wandering with Jeanie Deans by Arthur's seat, and St. Anthony's well, and Muschat's Cairn, and watching the bright sunshine as it flashed over the monumental Calton and kindled up the Bass and the May. It is quite true, Kitty, I admit it, that my head was a little jumbled, and that Mr. Dawson was to blame for it. This mixture of old ballads and new red sandstone, genealogies and geologies, grouse shootings and graywacke, calves and coal measure, kirks and criminals, et cetera, is naturally a little confusing to you, my dear, who are properly the weaker vessel. That is to say—hear me out, and smooth that very unbecoming frown which never did look natural to you, my jo, Janet, for I do believe you were born laughing or at least with that quiet matronly smile which is now "fringing the dusky clouds with gold"—well, then, as I was saying, there is something confusing in all this to you, love, just as there is to me when I see you getting up a mess of hotch-potch with those fresh green spring vegetables which look as if they were quite proud to be handled by those dainty white fingers. But when we see the fair napery and the smoking tureen, and Peggy sitting everything down with a smirk on her sunny face, for Peggy knows our taste, why, the confusion has all vanished, and one thinks only how the grace may be shortened. Now, Mr. Dawson has really composed a very savory mess —something heterogeneous we admit, nor has he been always careful to gather the freshest material. For example, that new Lancashire which has sprung up in the lower ward of Lanark within the memory of man, with all its flaming forges, and mine shafts, and clicking looms, and half savage population, and millionaires, and wants, and dangers, is not by any means so vividly depicted as it might have been. Even the wonderful progress of agriculture in the Lothians, to say nothing of other less favoured neighbourhoods, is not marked in its latest development; nor are the moral statistics of crime, drunkenness, education, and religion by any means so perfect as we could wish to see them. We do love the old motherland, with all a Scotchman's prejudice almost—we love its history so fruitful in heroism, its literature beating with so full a human heart, its hills with their hallowed traditions of Wallace-wight and covenanting elders, its consecrated nooks, all of them sacred as the Bundusian fountain, sung in many a lilting ballad, which neither patriotism nor good taste would willingly let die. But just because we do so love it, our anxiety, if not our interest, is turned mainly to those new fields of energy and enterprise where the spirit of the present age predominates, and forces on our attention the grand moral and physical problems of which it behoves alike the philosophy and philanthropy of the time to be wisely endeavouring the solution. What are the poor laws doing about Glasgow and Airdrie, and Coalbridge and Gartsherrie, and the region round about? what the church, and schools, and tippling houses, and mill masters? What comparative rate of march is there between the growth of wealth and decay of morals? Of these and such like Mr. Dawson gives us but faint intimations; and though we can enjoy an hour's dream among the misty hills, we are soon pricked to descend to the stern realities of busy life in the valley.

Altogether, however, the mess as we say, is good and palateable; indicating progress, on the whole, almost in every direction. We can see plainly that after the feverish crises it has lately come through, the land is gaining additional strength and vitality. Disruption fever purged out much of the old ecclesiastical humours, so that the fiddling and fuddling parsons of the old school are growing daily fewer, and there will be soon, we hope a plentiful lack of them, pleasant as they were on a fishing excursion, and over a tumbler of toddy on a frosty winter evening. The schoolmaster, too, begins to get more noticed, and will not, it is hoped, be permitted any more to starve, either his own body or the children's brains. The old clod-hopping farmer, ignorant of rotations, careless of green crops, despising science, and making his own manure, he, too, is nearly obsolete, and should be caught, while he may, to be a specimen in the Highland Society's Museum. The whiskey tide that once submerged the highest judges in the land, is now mainly found in the dock, and and never rises to the bench. There is one cottar's house, indeed, where fifty stood before; and we confess, it is a melancholy sight to pass through some of those green Highland glens, and see the ruined "wa's o' the auld biggar,"—the ash trees that grew round the kail-yard, and the gowan bank sloping down to the burn—a picture which hovers cloudlike and tearful amid the dreams of many a stout yeoman this day felling tall pines among the backwoods and prairie borders of Canada. But this after all is the economic law; and now there are fifty cattle browsing, where only one fed before. Looking at these things, we take heart; and with your permission, Kitty, we shall just pay another visit to Coila and Robin Burns, and hear him humming an old ballad between the stilts of his plough, while that cup of Bohea is making for thine own special comfort, and our own "night-cap" is being warmed by those ever careful hands.

THE CHURCH AND THE UNIVERSITIES OF SCOTLAND.

There is a spark kindled now in Scotland of which our neighbours on the other side of the Tweed are somewhat too negligent, seeing that their own premises are not insured against fire from that quarter. The main reason of this disregard may be traced, we dare say, to the fact that the controversy had at first a very sectarian origin, and a very narrow basis—was indeed simply a dispute between two rival kirks, which of them should play Procrustes in the old college halls, and whether some half an inch should be added to the length of that orthodox bedstead in which they meant still to stretch the learning and philosophy of the land. So long as the matter stood thus, England very properly went on with her business, having no time to spare for parting hungry dogs that were fighting after their kind over a bone in the kennel: But the colour of events has latterly changed—it is no longer a mere question of sectaries and sects, Books of Discipline and Acts of security: the tide has carried a large part of the intellect and godliness of the country away from their old moorings; and now, having fairly slipped the anchor at which they swung for a while in dubious uncertainty, they have got into the open sea, and are quite willing to be rid of Procrustes and his bed altogether. Now, this question is not provincial but imperial; and England should look to it for the prospective reform of her big nursery in Oxford.

It is true there is a very marked and considerable difference between the University systems of the two countries. In England the colleges are "louping stanes" to ecclesiastical preferment; in Scotland, a beneficed clergyman has no higher ambition than a chair in his alma mater. In the former, therefore, the universities are striving to obtain the patronage of the church; in the latter, the church is fain to have unlimited power over the seminaries of learning. The question of religious tests differs accordingly in the two countries just in proportion to the different relations of the educational and religious establishments. Looking to the universities as the porch of the Anglican Temple—yea, even Solomon's porch, which is called beautiful, Oxford dons and proctors have planted their 42-pounders at the entrance, and command the poor gownsman to stand and deliver his conscience into better keeping, before he can be privileged to scan a Greek chorus, or chop Aristotle's logic, or proceed to his degree. Anxious in Scotland simply to maintain a quiet comfortable preserve for her learned divines, the church there has simply provided a grand militia guage for her professional recruits, leaving happily to the students ample scope and verge enough to range undisturbed. The teacher of "the humanities," however, must stand in his stockings, a man of so many inches according to the Westminster confession—the instructor in physics must swallow the presbyterian pledge—and the professor in morals must believe in Lord Aberdeen's red-hair bill. Honest David Deans would republish his "Cry of ane Howl in the Wilderness," were any Armenian, L.L.D., poisoning the minds of youth through the medium of an algebraic formula—or any prelatic geologist unsettling the godly discipline of the kirk by a schismatic argument drawn from fossils and stones—or any latitudinarian dissenter tarnishing the fine gold by a heterodox reading of Horace or Homer. Now, it is felt that this bed is too short and the covering too narrow, so that learning is getting altogether cramped and cold by their means; and therefore Lord Advocate Moncrieff means to bring in a bill this session, we understand.

Before saying a word on Strowan Robertson's pamphlet,* we should wish it to be clearly understood what the real nature of the new movement is. All parties, we believe, are equally anxious that the universities should be untainted by schisms, heresies, and infidelities of any kind or quality. Orthodoxy is nationality in Scotland; and it would be hard to say in whose house the fire burns most strongly. The sole question among them is as to the right way of ensuring sound and good instruction of the higher class, with entire safety of Calvinistic faith in decrees, elections, irresistible graces, and final assurances. Strowan Robertson and his friends in the old kirk appealing then to the "wisdom of our fathers," and lifting up the larger and shorter catechism with proofs, summon every man aspiring to a doctorate to swear without more ado that this is verily his creed, flinging into the bargain a bundle of old acts of Parliamant and books of discipline. The other party object, that this is not fair to the scholarship of the land, because one may be perfectly competent to teach Greek, and perfectly willing to do his work in good faith, as a man of honour, without being able in conscience to stand the test of this orthodox pressure. They demand, therefore, that learning shall have the natural free play of her powers, stipulating only that if a professor shall abuse, or attempt to abuse his power by assailing the faith of the students, there shall be some court of appeal with power to strip the gown from his back. The proposal looks reasonable to reasonable men. But Strowan Robertson has reasons on the contrary; terrible bugbear reasons imported from Germany all the way, which is now, just as it used to be in old reformation times, the grand bale-fire and warning beacon held up by mother church to shew the breakers ahead. In Germany accordingly, he finds universities without tests, all of them hag-ridden by nightmares of neology, mythology, and pantheism, not surely to be tolerated in Presbyterian Scotland. There is a good cry for the hunt; shout it loud and often enough, and the movement men will be at their wits' end by and bye. These last, however, are not to be frightened so; and they reply, not unfairly, that a century ago, or less, one who wanted a similar argument against tests need only have pointed to Scotch universities—to Adam Smith, to Arian Hutchison, and Socinian Simpson, and others less notable, but not less pernicious. In short, they make it appear that even if these tests were fair, they are not effectual; so that if the universities are not to be degraded into mere appendages of the established church, Lord Advocate Moncrieff should get his hands strengthened, while he seeks to clear away this useless encumbrance. Let our English M. P's. lay this to heart; it will stand them in good stead when they come to speak to Oxford.

As to Mr. Robertson's pamphlet, he appears to be much too zealous a partisan to be trusted without guidance. His argument from the case of Sir Daniel Sandford is disingenuous, his proof of Adam Smith's dealing is an arrow for the enemy's quiver; and his general reasoning is based on the false assumption, that the universities are ecclesiastical nurseries, and the professors prophets in Israel.

THE POETS AND THE PROFITS.

Well hast thou cried, departed Burke,
All chivalrous, romantic work
Is ended now and past.
Bold Sidney and his kidney——

We have not heart to proceed—the quotation, we fear, can never be finished in these pages: the fortunes of its author*—homilied, too, in these verses—afford too melancholy proof of the truth he illustrates, that the days of romance, and chivalry, and poetry are past—outgrown and overgrown, and never to be restored till with one consent we return to boyhood. 'Twas there in the dim copses of that Happy Valley, we lost both lyre and spurs, as individually we still lose them.

For what is the decline of chivalry, the decline of poetry, but the decline of the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments" to each man of us as we grow into years of discretion? What but the decline of the Punch and Judy drama? Grown men, we still peruse the legends of the thousand and one nights—still occasionally we tarry at a street-corner to bestow melancholy smiles upon belated Polichinello theatricals—still, in wet weather, give an hour's attention while Coleridge or Campbell pours along the hearth a rivulet of song. But, alas, and notwithstanding, the golden bowl is broken. What now to us is Fadladeen, and who cares for the brethren of the barber? Shemselnihar, Zenobie, Badoura, moon-eyed princesses—gorgeous in shawl and silken shintyan, lapped in softness, lost in langour and the luxury of dreams—how has their glory departed since when, at fourteen years, we rumpled brown locks in extremity of emotion over the chronicle! Gone the radiance of eastern noon that slumbered on our faces as then we read; the little tongues of flame that flicker in the coal—suggest the noise of nodding palms no more. For the bulbul no cricket suffices; and what will you have for supper that shall so truly be mutton stuffed with pistachio-nuts as that barren crust of old? Soyer, depart! Dumb! your mutton, stuffed with your pistachio-nuts! Allah and the sacred blade-bones of Mahomet!—Forbear, lessee, forbear ambrosial manager! The real drama deceased some time ago in a drab great coat, breathing its last into the pipes of Pan. Vain your stews, your pies spiritual—vain your spectacles and comedies from the French! Restore to us our brown locks and the heads that were under them, that we be men by rule and square no more, prescient of the taxe no more—and then! O Badoura peri, wind your golden scarf about our brows, poise our drowsed souls in perfumes of celestial attar, and take us within the shadow and the twilight of your dreams.

But as there is no second boyhood for Englishmen, so there can be no second boyhood for England; and as with individual youth passes away all real and full appreciation of the poetry of Mr. Lane, so, we fear, with national boyhood passed away that same open-eyed, open-eared, open-mouthed appreciation of all poetry whatever. There is a poetic feeling that knoweth not, and poetic judgment that feeleth nought; and though we may now be better critics of poetry which is not English, but Latin written by Englishmen in English like that of Pope and Dryden, and their followers (the melancholy multitude!) or acclimatised German and Italian, like almost all the poetry of later generations, there is no longer a public mind responsive to chords of verse attuned from English character to English character alone. And there are no chords of that description to respond to. Neither masters nor scholars are left in the only real school of English poetry that ever existed; though that was as distinctive in its elements, and as original in its character, as its decay is significant and complete. The ballad-minstrelsy of England was the expression of poetical feeling truly national—indigenous to the soil and springing spontaneously from it, destitute of all extrinsic cultivation, and yet greater, for what is most graceful and pure in sentiment than for the rugged and rank luxuriance proper to untrained strength. It grew out of national character, as mistletoe grows on the oak-tree—green, graceful, and problematical: for how did such delicate verdure, such chaste grace, get there?* With this difference, however, that whereas the mistletoe asserts no existence but its own, and knows not the secrets of the oak, the poetry of which we are speaking asserts not itself, and tells all the secrets of the tree from which it grew. British idosyncrasy may be read from it—British history may be written from it. The unapproached pathos, the strong unwilling sorrow that sobs in these ballads, the grim Teutonic humour that crackles here and there in them, the swift percussion of stanza after stanza, when battle is the subject of the song—the very measure adapted to no known instrument of music so well as lusty lungs, are broadly and exclusively English, while nine-tenths of all produced from the various schools of poetical composition which have superseded it, might well be translations. The "Queen of the May" is indeed ours; but sad it is to suggest, dear Genevieve, that even you might possibly be an adaptation from the classics, some sweet daughter of the Gracchi in de laine—if you were not so German classical.

So our first love is abandoned. The English muse, large limbed, and brown eyed, and altogether beautiful,—thick crowned with leaves of oak, and smelling of the woods, found herself deserted long ago for a large importation of Chloes and Clorindas, and made a bed of leaves and died in the woods, proud and childless. Since then we have been improving on our Chloes and Clorindas, releasing them from much buckram, extricating them from much rouge and pearl-powder, by vigorous application of towelling. But the large, modest English muse, who never knew a farthingale, and seldom needed towelling—she is no more! and the loss is ours.

* War, wine, and women have engrossed almost all the poets. The greater number of the most renowned poems rhyme of these alone; and, of these, the most favoured of readers are those frenzied with the maddest aspect of the theme. The wherefore is, of course, apparent. Passion is always poetical: it creates language, and language is its most obedient servant, always its truly. If you wish to write a poem, with least trouble, select any passionate incident of love, any vivid incident of strife, and your poem is already half-made; and, what is even then of some importance, half praised. For every man, if he understand nothing else, understands loving and fighting; they are instinctive, varied little by education, and appeal to an average amount of savagery in men of all grades under one climate. Thus women, whose primal qualities are generally supposed to be less influenced by position or education than those of men, are superior to men in appreciation of all that belongs to love and chivalry: they comprehend both supremely; and with women, the better half in matrimony, the better half of the world is enlisted.

Under such halcyon auspices—with aids both subjective and objective, in the thing to be sung of and the thing to be sung to—a comparatively slender infusion of poetical genius is sufficient to render one the author of very commendable heroic or Petrarcan verses; and the deepest and purest wells of inspiration are those at which even the most brilliant composers of such verses have not drunk. Lord Byron is a high example of such brilliant composers; a great poet of the passions; and whose muse, when she chose to sing sweetness, chose to be as supremely sweet as though fervour were not in her nature most supreme, and inspiration flame. But a smaller amount of true creative poetic genius goes to constitute a poet Byron, than to the composition of others less brilliant or successful; while without a liberal infusion of what may be called the sublimated animal—akin to sense, which is not poetry, and alien from soul, which is—no poet Byron could be possible at all.

We recite all this in honour of British ballad-minstrelsy; and claim credit for the good authors and original minstrels, that they composed not in this way (i.e. in the war, women, and wine way), at a period and under circumstances, from which the existence of no other way could fairly be inferred. In ages, dark ages, of feudal insolence and feudal servitude, where the most respectable attribute of man was muscle, and animal courage compounded for the moral virtues, or went very far to do so—and beauty and the bowl, as always to the soldier, furnished the sum of incitement and reward—these ballads were made. They are, indeed, and could be little else, the chronicles of turbulent times; and were, moreover, composed by the descendants of those fierce Scalds who delighted in the banquet, in the chase, and in slaughter; whose paradise was a vinous Walhalla, and place of foemen's skulls for drinking-cups. "We hewed with the sword," sings Regnor Lodbrog, forefather of him who wrote the "Babes in the Wood"—"We hewed with the sword! we will not fail to pour plenty of ale out of skulls, and to wash our throats in Odin's-hall!"

But spite of the influence of such tradition, and the then condition of society; spite also of the very nature of their themes, our old ballads are not poems of passion: they are superior to the sublimated animal. Beautiful as they are, they depend for their greatest beauty on a refinement of feeling, and purity of sentiment, and innocence of thought, anticipatory of all that four centuries of cultivation has been found equal to educe; these excellences too, being oftenest clothed in a simple elegance of diction, which four centuries of cultivation seem not to have preserved. In a note like the present, and without quotation, it is impossible fully to recall how in these generally rugged ballads, poetry is softened in the still light of sympathy and human affection; how few heroes, in the military and Scaldic sense, are found in these ballads—how many good husbands, fathers, and brothers, who recommend themselves to us peculiarly, as such, in the very heat of strife; how seldom the cry of the stricken soldier is "Charge, Chester, charge!" how often some word of tenderness concerning that "lady dear, who waketh in bower for me;" how faint the blaze of glory, how bright, and warm, and all-welcoming the firelight from the hearth. The passion of love, again, is chastened with the same moral ameliorations. It is such a passion, in the ballads, as no man, at any time of life, could be ashamed of; a passion, or rather an absence of passion, which makes the men more manly, and the women more womanly; more honourable and more loveable both. Mr. Jamieson, who collected many British ballads, and translated some Danish ones, has noticed this. He observes that with all the Gothic nations, love was not the boisterous passion of animal appetite [the still intensity of passion] which is found to prevail in warmer latitudes, nor did it assume the visionary and fantastical form in which we find it represented in the earlier French and Provençal poetry. Our good mothers deserved something nobler and deeper than either; and certainly, like the blue-eyed, brown-eyed women, their daughters, whom we love, would "stand" neither. To conclude, the one broad, inspiring principle, running clear throughout our beautiful ballad poetry, is (O perfidious Albion!) the modest one of fidelity: the one ever-recurring sentiment (O morose shopkeeper!) a prolific compound of generosity, or love, best called kindness;—sympathy of kind, which comprehends fidelity and half the Christian virtues beside. These qualities, with earnestness and simplicity, are paramount in an eminently natural school of poetry, a school great in unambitious greatness, and one in which the unshackled aspirant may study with unsurpassed advantages.

And it is fair to deduce, we hold, from the loss from our poetry of English individuality and such reflections of mind and feeling as must best appeal to our poetical sympathies, if we had them, that we have also lost those poetical sympathies, or that they have at least greatly declined. We are no longer boys, and, therefore, Aladdin is no conjuror. Aladdin is no conjuror, because we are no longer boys. Rubbing that lamp of his proved, upon consideration, not calculated to be productive to us. Each shopkeeper of us, and the whole national Shop of shopkeepers, at about seventeen years and seventeen centuries of age, respectively, woke to the suspicion that the only lamp for us to rub with promise of profit was the shop-lamp—the lamp of commercial and scientific intelligence. And so hard has it proved to evoke, not pearls and diamonds as big as a musselman's thumb, but olives, and wine, and oil, and raiment—beef, boots, and bread-and-butter—that feeling has got merged into faculty, and faculty is at length all absorbed, and there is no time for poetry.

True, poets now and then, ignoring the facts, still indite; and we each make it a duty to become familiar with their names, and admire them very much—between the pauses of dinner and the dance; and so do our neighbours and partners—enthusiastically. We all read Shakspere in our youth; and if we have not read him since, bow nevertheless, to the opinion that he is the poet of all time. Milton, not so many have perused, even counting those who skip the dry and heavy; but we all know how much he was paid for "Paradise Lost," and think it very shameful. "Three poets in three distant," &c.—we all know that too, and can repeat it. So with the modern poets. They are universally known, and much admired; but read less, and bought—? If books could be read without ever being bought, if authors or booksellers were the "dear friends" of all the borrowers—we should say that the poets were never bought at all. "Small prophets and large returns," was first established as a great fact by Mr. Murphy, when he established his almanac;* but in the higher walks of literature the phrase is modified; it reads, "Great poets and no returns!" At any rate, we have no recent example of a poet relying upon a prospect of such returns: Savage was the last, and a very deplorable example. Those who have, since then, sought poetry professedly (we cannot say, as a profession) are divisible into two classes: those who were indifferent to pecuniary returns, and those who had talent to devote to other pursuits, and could depend on them. Byron and Rogers belong to the first. Of the second Southey is an instance; he laboured long and with intense industry, for reviews and in biographical book-making, before he felt his family secured from the chances of poverty. Coleridge also wrought hard in prose, and died in not too-flourishing prosperity. Moir had to stand by his surgery; and Moore, who had to be political and obtain an appointment, received a greater sum than poetry ever produced, for something that was not so much a poem as an amusing and brilliant constellation of bright and chiming words; a sweet ringing of bells, depending upon you to supply poetry and meaning, mainly.

* The maxim is now frequently met with, slightly altered, in trade circulars.

And here is the secret. We are willing to have our minds amused, but not enthralled or involved. If, O poet with long hair, you can divert our minds from thoughts and so give them rest and sleep,—from that law-suit or that railway business—from the mechanical difficulties of this factory, or the Saturday-night difficulties of that, from the too much work here, and the weariness of no work at all there—do so, and you shall not go unrewarded. Be a Monster, O long-haired poet. Become a General Tom Thumb. Be two feet nine inches high, eleven inches in circumference, and wear a funny cocked hat,—and you shall have shillings in unabated flow, our wives shall pat your cheeks and our daughters and sweethearts shall add kisses. And if any cracked painter of the name of Haydon, exhibiting his bores of historical pictures in the next room happen to take umbrage that not one shilling of the thousands pass to him, let him! He be shot!

So Poor Tom Hood choked up the spring of poetry that was in him (as well as he could, for it would still break out), wrote a "Lament for Chivalry," and took to "Comic Annuals" for bread. That Southey at one time also contemplated Comic Annuals, we suspect from that poem of his on the proportions of pork; and Poet Warren of the "Diary of a Physician" and "Ten Thousand a Year," took the same ground in a still more bold and decided manner, when he published that capital joke the "Lily and the Bee." The generous British public, however, too often ungenerous and blind in matters pertaining to literature and the arts, misunderstood Poet Warren so egregiously that we fear the mistake was wilful. It misunderstood the poet's very intention; which was, by the publication of an extremely absurd book, to drown the carking cares of the nation in a flood of laughter. The public, it must in justice be admitted, did laugh; but at the wrong object: at the author. This was most unkind. After all, however, he was more fortunate than many of his compatriots;—the book was largely bought, by the innocent and unsuspecting, and he thus indirectly obtained the reward his superior ingenuity deserved.*

* That the authors of four-fifths of these volumes of rhyme which are in constant issue from the press, are actuated by the same motives as moved Mr. Warren to the Lily and the Bee (i.e. the production of amusement and laughter by the intensely absurd), we have now no doubt: There can be no reasonable objection to so innocent a means of effecting an object so laudable, and it would be unjust to ascribe to these well-intentioned men the idea of effecting anything else. We were first led to this conclusion (and it is always interesting to note the origin of great conclusions) by a story related by Sidney Smith, but of which not even that penetrating ecclesiastic divined the full and dreadful meaning. The story concerns a Mr. Isaac Hawkins Brown. In the third year of the reign of his present majesty (George IV.) and in the thirtieth of his own age, Mr. Brown, then upon his travels, danced one evening at the court of Naples. His dress was a volcano silk with lava buttons. Whether (as the Neapolitan wits said) he had studied dancing under St. Vitus, or whether David, who danced in a linen vest, was his model, is not known; but Mr. Brown danced with such inconceivable alacrity and vigour, that he threw the Queen of Naples into convulsions of laughter, which terminated in miscarriage and changed the dynasty of the Neapolitan throne." And did the good-natured queen, then, suspect nothing Herodian in the dancing of Mr. Brown? Did she innocently think no guile existed beneath that dress of volcano silk with lava buttons?—no deeply conceived scheme to dance away a dynasty? With the penchant for imprisonment which characterizes the powers that be Neapolitan, we doubt whether the mask of Momus would now serve to disguise the political designs of any other Isaac Hawkins Brown.

But Poet Warren is not unequalled, great reason as he undoubtedly has for supposing so; and in presence of the production now before us, we are impelled to congratulate that gentleman on the fact that his previously-earned reputation insured for him, even more than his merits, the attention and the laughter of the world. The gain is his: let him be thankful! The author of the volume which (as orthodox reviewers) we again say "lies before us," has not the distinction of a name; and so for twelve years his efforts to benefit his species have gone unrecognised and unrewarded—if, indeed, that can properly be said to have "gone" which none but our fortunate selves seem to have met.* And yet we have truly averred that it is equal to the "Lily and the Bee" in the laughter-stirring element—in elements of mirth as boisterous as those that hurtle in the caves of Æolus; and as rich in that most welcome and marketable faculty of literature, amusement. Nay, we will even say that it is superior to Mr. Warren's admirable performance, and much more worthy of public patronage and purchase. The author has succeeded in assuming so magnificent an air of confidence combined with an appearance, marvellously life-like, of complete incapacity—he walks the world of poesy with so perfect an assumption of innocence, desperate unconscious innocence, of all and several the laws of language—that he is at once placed at the head of his insufficently valued compeers, the poets of the egregious absurd. Mr. Mahon, too, is thoroughly consistent. Many of his more successful rivals have persisted in detailing their nonsense in the most elegant or at least the most grammatical language at their command. Some have even adopted the grand Miltonic style; others the sardonic Byronical; others, again, the miserable style, after the manner of Keats. This, of course, is sheer pedantry, and a weakness Mr. Mahon has anxiously avoided. In contemplating the present work, he remembered that beauty unadorned is adorned the most by universal and unctuous acknowledgment; and rightly inferring that the beautifully ridiculous is amenable to the same rule, gives us his absurdity in accordance therewith. Not a rag of embellishment is here displayed; his muse disports herself in original innocence. In a conventional age like the present, this stroke of craft was not less bold than effective, not less ingenuous than ingenious; and carries out the benevolent objects of the author wonderfully. Its effects shall not be wholly left to the imagination of the reader: we will extract from the page that first presents itself. It is a wild story.

* "London as it Was and as it Is. A Poem. With Miscellaneous Pieces in verse. By Anthony Mahon. London: Johnson, Paternoster Row.

> One day in May I strolled my way,
> When vernal flowers and bloom looked gay,
> And all proud nature shone most bright,
> Which shed pure essence of delight!
> I sought a perfect shady bower,
> I longed therein to spend an hour.
> . . . .
> Methought, I am retired alone,
> Where hearts are free—no sigh or moan;
> Nought here that evil can impart,
> Where nought but transports reach the heart.
> These fledged creatures wing the air,
> To vie in song's their greatest care;
> Though nought that's human here but me,
> I'll share content with all I see.
> While thus such muse absorbed my mind,
> I further on my course did wind,
> Till soon arrested by a rill,
> That made this place more pleasing still,
> I stood to view and heard a moan,
> When thinking myself quite alone;
> It drew my gaze to every side,
> And on the bank I soon espied
> A maid more lovely still than May.
> . . . .
> When I approached she rose in joy,
> And now her grief I did alloy,
> Saying, "You deceived and led me here;
> Behold my state, bedewed with tears!
> You shunn'd my sight, into this bower,
> And in quest of you I spent some hours,
> Till I at length had lost my way,
> And here in hapless plight I lay."
> From bliss this maid now caused me woe,
> Not knowing who did upbraid me so,
> Yet knew she must be in mistake;
> I never did a nymph forsake;
> Still thoughts on this had filled my mind,
> And power of speech I could not find
> To plead my cause, and so make known,
> That she mistook who caused her moan;
> But when recovered from surprise,
> Resolved to make the dame more wise,
> And said, "Dear maid, it can't be me
> You followed here or wished to see;
> I never knew you in my life,
> To be my love or yet my wife;
> So be convinced of your mistake,
> And let delusion thee forsake."
> She gazed on me, now I felt the dart,—
> Her searching looks had thrilled my heart.
> . . . .
> And so stood mute we face to face;
> She like an artist me did trace,
> Until at length she did discover,
> That I till now was not her lover.
> "O pardon, pardon, Sir!" she said,
> "For such mistake, a lonely maid;
> Young Harry, Sir, was more like you,
> Than any man I ever knew;
> In looks, attire, and every state,
> Sound of voice and all complete;
> And amidst all lovers yet was known,
> I would mistake you for my own."

The fact was, the author had a brother so much like him that they "passed for one unless together." This was Henry; he had been consigned to the tomb, in a very loving state of mind concerning "Miss Flora Dubois." Upon informing her of the facts—

"He is dead!" aloud she cried,
And to despair her mind consigned.
I strove to soothe, but all in vain,
She could not now contentment gain;
She would give no ear to soothing voice,
When lost the object of her choice;
She now distracted, I forlorn,
And sat me down with her to mourn,
Yet strove all means I could devise,
Her deep sunk spirits to arise;
But too much woe enwrapp'd her soul,
And all her senses did control;
No rallying words could touch her heart,
Where grief was locked and could not part;
What means I used grief to dispel,
Who can transcribe?—no words can tell.
We both reclining on the green,
None could behold a sadder scene;

. . . .

Whilst near the fair maid I reclined,
And wishing now I could restore
The faculties she had before;
Yet to disclose her lover's death,
I deem was wrong, and did regret;
But soon her spirits did revive,
And set my heart once more alive;
But when her eyes did light discover,
She thought I was her absent lover;
Unconscious of what I her told,
Ere she 'neath grief's effects reposed;
For her sake I deemed it better
To pass awhile for my dead brother.
And now she ceased to grieve or moan,
And took my arm to lead her home;
We for some time together walked,
And not a word now either talked;
Meantime oft lovely looks she cast,
From eyes made dim by sorrow's blast,
And then in gentle accents spoke,
Saying, "Sir, you have not silence broke
Since we departed yonder grove,
Long absence blighted all your love?"
I was devising all on our way
What to dissemble what best to say;
I thought on one thing and another,
To make her believe I was my brother;
Yet now in answer, I said, "My dear,
Do you suppose if I were near,
That I would willingly forsake you,
Not call to see, and so deceive you?
By the powers that are divine,
My will did never so incline!"

To account for the apparent parodox between his conduct and professions, the author now resorts to what we must really stigmatise as a cock and bull story about going to Spain to prove an alibi; and in a rather off-hand manner he then asks:—

"And now, my dear, will all this do
To gain forgiveness now of you?"
"The act is worthy of applause,
And yet enough to gain your cause;
To forgive you, Sir, it's now I can,
As you had saved an honest man;
Your long absence caused me grief,
As wilfully met not my belief,
Yet what had most perplexed my mind,
Was where you lived I could not find;
I doubt you gave me your address,
As where it was I could not guess;
If I had got it I would have sent,
And find it was to Spain you went."

. . . .

The above recital may seem strange,
That she cannot perceive the change;
Nor do I believe she can for life,
Unless I tell her when my wife;
So much alike were me and brother,
That we passed for one unless together!
And still as rare we were combined,
In sentiments and mutual mind;
Bore no contrast by grief or pleasure,
In heart, in toil, in ease or leisure;
Yet what had crossed our course through life,
We both oft sought to get one wife;
Her loved by me, was by my brother,
Each will alike to have no other;
Nor could I ever have resigned,
Until my brother felt inclined;
So in each dilemma, we far better,
Gave up courting both together;
Yet how to manage such an affair,
With coalitions unfit to bear,
We thought concealment the best project,
That each may love a distinct object;
And by that means my brother courted
This maid, who sought where few resorted,
And was in hapless plight repining,
When by the lonely brook reclining.

Continuing to impose upon Miss Flora Dubois for the entombed Henry, the author has no difficulty in persuading her into the matrimonial connection. But conscience, the accuser, sleeps not. Outwalking one day—

Said she, "Why don't you now repeat
Our tales of love in single state?"
Response: "My dear, it slipped my mind;
Therefore you'd better me remind."

Mrs. Mahon adopts the suggestion, and the miserable man (who besides, as he admits, "knew not one thing or the other that passed betwixt her and my brother,") seizes the opportunity to disburden his mind. Then she:

"You state and swear that it is so;
It's mighty strange, yet I don't know,
But if it's true and I am wrong,
Why did you dupe me, Sir, so long?
We are now married a year and more,
Why not you mention it before?
What caused your brother, then, to leave?"
"Twas death, my dear; he is in the grave."
"As I must believe that you are true,
And Harry is dead, to bliss adieu!"
These words set horror in my mind,
And she to grief again resigned.
Ah! had I known, would I disclose,
To blast my own and wife's repose?
'Twas fate that prompt me so to do,
It's now my lot with her to rue,
And nought in life shall now restore,
The bliss I felt with her before;
She loved my brother more than me,
It's now displayed, I plainly see,
And jealousy springs in my head,
Yet it's not right since he is dead.

Now fall the fires of retribution; how touchingly they are sung, we leave it to the reader to conceive, and hasten to the blissful dénouement.

These are the crosses of our lives,
We find them out in getting wives;
The most ill-suited linked together,
To banish bliss from one another;

Still I must go to bring her round
To love, in duty I am bound;
I promised so ere we were wed,
And won't transgress until I am dead;
I'll go back now to soothe my wife,—

. . . .

"My dear, why do thee languish so,
For him that's gone where we must go?
Can I be happy to supply,
The place of him fate caused to die,
And share your love that is no treasure
To the dead, yet bliss or pleasure?—
But to me with a heart not cold,
It is more treasure than pure gold;
Will you now grant it, and forget
All that you loved ere first we met,
And I'll accept the precious boon,
With gratitude for thee alone?"
She, at these words, ran to embrace me,
And now in happy life doth place me,
And my forgiveness doth implore,
With vows to love me evermore.
Happy, happy, now is my state,
With conscience free—not a cheat;
I told the truth and blessed my life,
By undeceiving to my wife,
That I am myself and not my brother,—
Loved by her who loves no other.

If then (as we have assumed), in a careful and unimaginative age, the most benevolent end of literature be laughter, how nobly Mahon has performed his mission our readers have some means of judging in the quotation above. If, as the fact is, the most amusing writer, no matter how extravagant, is most favoured of the public, that public may now perceive how culpably neglectful it has been of a truly great man in that line. And yet it cannot all perceive from the broken poem here reprinted, the full amount of the efforts the author has made to bring mirth to the hearts of the nation, nor the full sum of its culpability in neglecting that effort. The book must be possessed and read to know that; and there are two-hundred closely printed pages, above seven-thousand lines, of such excellent nonsense, as we have instanced, not one of which could be spared without a pang. Those who have never composed in verse (the minority, we are painfully aware, is small) know not, and cannot know the amount of labour involved in such a work; but added to labour, the ingenuity here displayed can only be estimated by the immense benefits it is calculated to effect. With "London as it was," &c., the "Lily and the Bee," and some other books we wish not invidiously to mention, the physician might abandon half his drugs. To the hypochondriacal, to men disunited in the bonds of marriage, for family reading during November and the rainy days throughout the year, and for exportation to the poor oppressed Blacks—we consider the book invaluable. It is bound in unmitigated green.

Another word. The public does not like to be convicted of neglect, whether it be of poets, the bequeathed daughter of heroes, or anybody. It too often, we must say, endeavours to screen itself under the shabbiest excuses; the bequeathment is not bequeathed; the daughter is not a daughter; the the hero—well, if he was a hero, he did not behave himself as one would wish; and so on. The poet, of course, is no poet. And we foresee that this will be said of him whom we have had the honour of rescuing from darkness and the shelves of Mr. Johnson. A certain class in society will say that the grotesque garb of folly—assumed by this clever man for the most benevolent of purposes, is his natural hide; and that he could not help it. But did any one ever make a similar charge against the genius—say of the Clown at Astley's. Does it detract from his comic songs that he cannot help them? And did the Clown at Astley's ever write such a volume of poems as the present?

But we are prepared to meet the slanders of that section of society—or retort on some other section, which is as nearly the same thing as possible. If the author of this volume was not actuated by great designs to stoop to play the stupid, but is "a stupid" naturally, deranged, perhaps—what has reduced him to that condition? The following passage from his preface may assist the solution of the question:—

> I have written this little Work with no other view than to divert from my mind the wearisome burden of anxiety occasioned by a protractive and expensive lawsuit commenced by me at a very early age, indeed in my boyhood, against the Bank of England, for the recovery of funded property I stood entitled to by my uncle's will. . . . . . However, I could not bring that point to issue through the conduct of some lawyers I engaged to prosecute the case, who pretended faith, but proved to be otherwise; and although I could convince the reader of the truth of this statement, and the same may be useful by promoting caution, when employing lawyers, still I must forbear, though anxious for the public good, giving the names of the lawyers I allude to, nor trouble the reader with any further comment than to acquaint him with what led my thoughts to a work of this description.

We make no comment. We abide by our original opinion. There is but one step, say the philosophers, between the sublime and the ridiculous. In this case we hold for the sublime—the sublime-ridiculous; and those who may differ from us, are directed to the above quotation, with a recommendation to ponder it. The law, be it observed, "led my thoughts to a work of this description." Upon the law be the responsibility. Upon the law, which with its absurdities and injustice, has broken many fortunes and many hearts—upon the law, in the mazes of which many an intellect has grown giddy and gone out—be the blame and punishment. To the kindred floods that surge around our Chancery courts, be added the tears of Mr. Mahon's disappointed parents—let their sighs augment the winds that already rumble in the chimneys of its chambers—and the fabric must fall. It never could survive the odium of making so enormous a victim.

THE GOVERNMENTS OF CONTINENTAL EUROPE.

XIII. TUSCANY.

On ascending from the plains and valleys of the Roman Legations, amidst picturesque and magnificent scenery, we at length arrive at the post of Lojano. From this spot, on a ridge of the Apennines, we behold in the east a fertile and beautiful region, and, at the same time, we may enjoy a broad view of the Adriatic. On the west we look down upon the fields, vineyards, and villas of Tuscany, and over the fertile valley of the Arno, while we at the same time embrace a full view of the Mediterranean. As we descend from Pietra Mala to Maschere, the road winds through a country rich in vines and olives, and embellished with the palaces of the Florentine noblesse; until we arrive in the magnificent capital of the Grand Duchy of Tuscany.

This State comprises almost every variety of climate and soil. Over whatever part we travel, we find that fertility is the rule, and sterility the very rare exception. The Tuscans are industrious, remarkably frugal, and temperate in eating and drinking. They are devotedly attached to their country, and they very rarely emigrate to other lands. Ever since the three Republics of Florence, Sienna, and Pisa were united under one sovereignty by the Medici, the Government has been absolute, but, generally, parental and mild.

For more than two hundred years the family of the Medici maintained the ascendant, until 1737, when they became extinct; since which period Princes of the House of Hapsburg have held sovereignty over Tuscany; with the exception of the fourteen years, while the Grand Duchy for seven years formed the Kingdom of Etruria, and for other seven, three departments of the French empire.

Tuscany is generally well-cultivated, although the Metayer is the prevailing system; the landlord and the farmer dividing the produce between them. The dwellings of the peasantry are also superior to most of those in Southern Italy. Robberies and other crimes have long been rare, and the administration of the laws, until lately, has been impartial and usually just.

Tuscany has also been remarkable for its local municipal governments, which, for a long period, enabled the inhabitants of towns, in a great degree, to manage their own affairs. Education being under the superintendence of the clergy, has, however, been greatly restricted with regard to the diffusion of useful knowledge; and thus the intelligence of the rural population and of the artizans and tradesmen in the towns, does not often exceed the knowledge simply of their localities and pursuits.

Those who have travelled over this beautiful State, have everywhere been delighted with the scenery, and have always admired the neat and orderly conduct of the handsome Tuscan peasantry.

The parental, though absolute, government of the country, by Austrian Dukes, has also been extolled by travellers, and held up as an example highly worthy of imitation by other Italian governments. The present Grand Duke was also esteemed as an affectionate parent, and not as the despotic ruler of his subjects.

The revolution of 1848 has changed his character, and he has become a merciless tyrant and a bigoted fanatic. Florence, Leghorn, and other Tuscan cities, have ever since been in the occupation of an Austrian army. All freedom of speech or of writing has been abolished, and an inexorable inquisition exercises its tyrannical sway. Countless executions have been perpetrated; and with respect to religious persecutions, the tyrant of Florence surpasses his brother tyrant of Naples.

The reading of the Bible is not tolerated; the punishment is imprisonment or death. The sad story of the Madiai will form an eternal, disgraceful page of Florentine history. The Grand Duke is at heart and in sentiment the same, although destitute of the abilities of the hero of Macchiavelli—of Cæsar Borgia.

Most undoubtedly those cruelties which are practised in Florence, as well as in the kingdom of Lombardo Venetia, are not only countenanced but also directed by the despotic and indiscreet Cabinet of Vienna. That the execrable despotism of the House of Hapsburg-Lorraine may be maintained for some time by the force of great armies, by imprisonments, and by executions, it is not our purpose to deny; but a day of retribution will the more certainly arrive, and the consequence of arbitrary, unjust, and cruel government assuredly be the dismemberment of that empire of discordant nations, and the final destruction of the Austrian power, south of the Alps—in all probability from the western borders of Hungary to Wallachia—from the Carputians to the Danube, to Servia and Montenegro.

M.

SUN AND SHADOW.

Nearer still bend o'er me,
Nay, embrace me, I implore!
Ah, my pride is dead before me,
And its ghost has gone before.
And now leave your locks to wander
With the tresses of my hair,
And leave your soul to ponder,
How your love was left to wander
In the gloaming of despair.

Not in anger, scarce in sorrow,
For its fires are spent and past,
Glowing idly on the embers
Of consumèd life at last:
But unvexed and unrepining,
And to close the sad arrear
Of my dreaming and divining
With your presence round me shining,
I besought your presence here.

'Tis Yesterday no more,
When To-morrow is arrayed;
And the beautiful adorning
Of the everlasting morning
Stills my spirit in its shade:
A golden, slumberous shadow,
Where it slumbers unafraid.
But talk with me of yesterday,
Till all you loved is sleep:
My yesterday, 'tis present—
It is sobbing while you weep.

Till all you loved is sleep;
For 'twas not the hoarded treasure
Of a woman's trust and truth,
Stored by innocence and youth,
And bestowed in boundless measure—
But a countenance love-lighted
And accidently fair—
To this your truth was plighted,
And soon again was plighted,
To loveliness more rare.

Yet fain I would believe
That you truly loved me, still.
Oh, assure me!—re-assure me!
I believe it, and I will!

Whether fortune, fault, or folly
Loosed the floods of melancholy
It is all too late to care:
But you loved me—always, wholly—
And 'tis not too late to care.

Then you, too, know the story
Of a spirit poised for ever,
Sick and reeling, o'er the darkness
Of the stolid Stygian river.
And your eyes have been a-weary,
And your arms have been a-weary,
Strained through unrelenting blackness,
Stretched upon the vacance dreary.

And, indeed, I do remember,
Now that memory is to cease,
How some ghostly presence sought me,
Subtle as my soul, and brought me
Uninterpretable peace.
But, rejoicing, now I know
That, creating wings to flee
Of its own intensity,
And impelled of bitter woe—
'Twas your love, escaped and trembling,
Seeking respite in my breast—
Bringing, seeking consolation,
Refuge with my love, and rest;
And they slept and dreamed together
In the chill and harried nest.

No more! I must be still—
There are many things to ponder
In the sad and solemn umbrage
Of the Valley where I wander:
For the distant hills are golden,
In the golden Morning yonder.
And now, good night, and bless you!
Give, oh give your lips to mine,
That my latest breath caress you,
And the last of life be thine.
Quell them, dearest, these alarms—
Hold me fast, nor now forsake me,
That when angels stoop to take me,
They may take me from your arms.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

DOMESTIC.

On the 18th of last month, Parliament adjourned till the 9th instant, having been in session for about five weeks since the Christmas holidays. In that period the strength and the character of the Aberdeen Administration have been tested, and with a result, on the whole, highly favourable to it in public opinion. It is true that, looking only at the amount of legislative business completed, or in hand, not much progress would seem to have been made. The Army and Navy Estimates have been passed. The Jewish Disabilities Bill and the Canada Clergy Reserves Bill have been carried through the second reading by good majorities. A rather disappointing statement on the subject of law reform has been made by the Lord Chancellor; and an account, somewhat more satisfactory of the measures to be proposed for the benefit of the mercantile marine, has been given by the President of the Board of Trade. This is nearly the sum total of ministerial performances, in the legislative line, up to the present date. The Budget, and the promised measures relative to education, to secondary punishments, to land-tenure in Ireland, and to the government of India, are still to be made known.

Probably, however, as much has been done as could reasonably have been expected of any Ministry in so short a time after taking office. At all events, there is no doubt that the country is well contented with its present Government. The Administration has thus far shown itself united, firm, and popular in its tendencies. The public business, in every department, has been so successfully conducted as to leave hardly an opening for the attacks of hostile criticism. The composition of the Ministry, moreover, has the advantage of affording a very fair reflection of the actual state of the public mind. The whole nation may be said to be just now in a "Liberal-Conservative" mood, and inclined to steady, well-considered, and constitutional progress. Both Houses of Parliament, in their respective ways, exhibit a corresponding temper; and the disposition and action of the Government have hitherto been entirely in harmony with the prevailing sentiment.

But the interest of the Session has chiefly centered in the proceedings of the election committees, which have resulted not only in unseating sixteen members, but in disclosing an amount and a kind of corruption in the present constituencies startling to all but the persons practically initiated in electioneering mysteries. If a conviction of the necessity of some reform in the electoral system had not previously existed, these disclosures would certainly have awakened it. As it is, they will, probably, serve to render the reform more thorough and effectual than it would otherwise have been. It is deserving of notice that, with the single exception of Hull (where the corrupt "freemen" seem to have vitiated a large portion of the electoral body), every borough in which these illegal practices have been proved to prevail extensively enough to influence the elections has fewer than 2,000 registered electors. Cambridge and Canterbury very nearly approach this number. As it is admitted on all hands that one remedy for the evil is to be sought in an enlargement of the constituencies, the fact just noticed may, perhaps, be taken as indicating the lowest number of which a constituency should consist. With such an enlargement, with the protection of the ballot, and with stringent laws against bribery, as much will have been done to secure purity of elections as mere legal arrangements can effect. Popular education and an improved public sentiment must do the rest.

COLONIES AND DEPENDENCIES.

Just as the difficulties of the Burmese war, aggravated by the ill-judged manner in which it has been conducted, were assuming a serious aspect, there has occurred an unexpected event which seems likely to remove them. One of those "revolutions of the palace," which are so common in the East, has resulted in the deposition and death of the King of Ava, and the contest of two pretenders for the possession of the vacant throne. One of the combatants seems inclined to court not merely the friendship, but the aid, of the British commander; and it is not unlikely that the result may be, the early re-establishment of peace in that quarter. It must not be forgotten, however, that such a peace will almost certainly prove, under the present system of Indian Government, to be nothing more than a temporary suspension of hostilities.

This strangely managed war, and the approach of the period when what is called the East India Company's charter will expire, have together served to awaken in this country an unusual amount of interest in the affairs of our vast Oriental Empire. Events which have occurred of late years on the Continent and in our own Colonies, have rendered the nation peculiarly sensitive on the subject of oppression exercised upon subject races by arbitrary rulers. After sympathising with the unfortunate Hungarians and Italians, and censuring the severities which have been practised in Ceylon and the Ionian Islands, it is impossible for us to remain indifferent to the fact that a population half as large as the population of Europe, and thirty times as large as that of all the British Colonies, has been committed to the charge of a Government responsible only, in the most indirect manner, to the British people. This charge, there is too much reason to fear, has not been exercised in a manner conducive to the wellfare of the population so governed. Such an apprehension is amply warranted when an experienced and conservative statesman, like Lord Ellenborough, is found replying in the House of Lords to the common assertion that the existing system of Indian Government has "worked well," in the following striking and decided terms:—

"That had been the invariable answer when its anomalies, its absurdities, its monstrosities had been objected to. It might work well for those employed in the administration; but the question was, did it work well for the people of India? Did it possess any appearance of permanence? Was it possible it could be maintained? The great benefits that had been conferred upon India in the extinction of the Mahratta authority and of the Pindarees, and the establishment of internal peace from one end of the country to another, had been conferred by our military successes; in these the civil government had no part. The courage of our troops, the enterprise of our generals, the genius which they had displayed on many occasions, had given us immortal fame as a great military power, and had given to India all the benefits in the shape of internal peace which had been extended to it. Peace alone was a great blessing, leading to prosperity. The natural state of mankind was a state of progress. There must be extraordinary, unusual circumstances, arising through the worst of all possible governments, to arrest the progress of mankind when in a state of peace. But what we were to look to was the conduct of the civil government; what did the people owe to that? He really believed, that if you were to inquire what had been the alterations in the distribution of property occasioned by the thoughtless or inconsiderate adoption of measures for the collection of the revenue and other measures requiring the instant sale of land for arrears, you would find that the alteration in the distribution of property that had been effected by us in that country was much greater than the alteration of property effected in England by the Norman conquest, and equal also, perhaps, to that effected by the many confiscations which had taken place in Ireland. He confessed, when he marched through the upper provinces, and saw the vestiges of ancient palaces, and roads, and works, and temples, and mosques, and all the records of great government by which we have been preceded, he felt humiliated; he felt that we were exhibiting ourselves under circumstances of disparagement, as greatly inferior to a nobler nation to which we had succeeded. What we had now to endeavour to discover was the form of government by which a good administration might be given to India."

If any evidence were needed to confirm the correctness of this description, it would be found in the facts mentioned on the same evening (the 11th of last month) by Mr. Bright in the Lower House, and especially in the remarkable statement that during the fourteen years from 1834 to 1848 the amount expended by the Government of India in substantial improvements for the advantage of the people of that country, such as roads, bridges, canals, tanks, and other works of that nature, was only £1,400,000, being at the rate of £100,000 a year; while the papers before the house shewed that during the fourteen years in question the Indian Government had extorted the enormous sum of £316,000,000 from the population of India.

The truth is that British India has hitherto been governed not with a view to the benefit either of the Indian people or of this country, but chiefly for the advantage of the few thousand individuals who divide among themselves the largest portion of the revenues of that immense empire. This truth is now well understood, and the necessity of some change in the system is generally admitted. But no one of the many able writers and speakers who have discussed this subject, seems as yet to have come to any definite conclusion concerning the nature of the change which is desirable, or even concerning the direction in which the remedy is to be sought. An observation of Lord Ellenborough, however, affords a valuable indication, which may perhaps be usefully followed out to a practical conclusion. In commenting upon the petition of nearly thirteen hundred British and other Christian inhabitants of Bengal, who prayed for a reform in the present system of government, his lordship remarked:—

With respect to the Supreme Government of India, the petitioners observed, he thought with some reason, upon the paucity of members of the Legislative Council. They stated, "that, without questioning the fitness of any individual, they still regarded the council as very deficient, and especially as wanting in variety of composition, and as of too limited attainments and experience—deficiencies which would account in some degree for the little progress made in all great improvements, and the retrograde tendency of government." They therefore "recommended a considerable addition to the Legislative Council, and especially the addition of non-official persons from the commercial and professional classes." That the Legislative Council might advantageously be increased in number, was his own opinion. He thought it must be of very great importance to the Government that there should exist organized bodies of the natives, to which the Government might remit any matter on which they might wish to receive their opinion. The least satisfactory part of the business of the Government of India, was that which was connected with legislation.

The question here arises, whether the defects of the Indian Government are not due mainly to the absence of any check upon its action in the country which it rules. Can any country possibly be well governed which is not to some extent self-governed? If this question is answered in the negative, as in this country it is likely to be, we come next to the equally important query, whether it may not be possible to form, out of the many thousands of educated natives and British residents in India, constituencies large and influential enough to represent the interests and secure the confidence of the Indian people. For example, might not the elective franchise be safely given to every native and other British subject in India possessing a permanent income of £100 a year, and also to every such person (whatever his income) who can speak and write the English language intelligibly? If, on these or any other terms, electoral bodies can be constituted in the several presidencies, they might choose a certain number (say, one-half or two-thirds) of the members of the Legislative council of each presidency; and these local councils might elect the members (or a portion of the members) of the General Legislative Council of India. In this way, the desideratum mentioned by Lord Ellenborough would be supplied, and an important step would be taken towards the introduction of constitutional government into India. By this arrangement, moreover, the influence of the property and intelligence of the country would be enlisted on the side of the British connection; since the constituencies, thus emancipated and admitted to a share in the Government, would be well aware that a rupture of this connection would, inevitably, be followed by the loss of their privileges, and the restoration of the arbitrary power of the native princes.

The present Colonial Administration promises to be highly successful and popular. The prompt cessation of transportation to Australia, the proposed surrender of the Canadian Clergy Reserves to the control of the Canadian Parliament, and the completion of the Cape Constitution, in a very liberal form, afford satisfactory earnest of what may be hereafter expected from the able and benevolent nobleman now at the head of this department, supported as he is by colleagues, not less experienced and interested than himself, in Colonial affairs. If it be true, as is reported, that the purpose is entertained of establishing the complete system of Parliamentary Government, on the Canadian plan, in every Colony possessing a considerable British population, it may safely be predicted that the vexatious and injurious contests between the Home Government and the Colonists, which have caused so much annoyance and mischief of late years, will rarely, if ever, recur—seeing that, as has already proved to be the case in Canada, and the other North American Colonies, the chief source of these difficulties, will have thus been annihilated.

FOREIGN.

The history of the stupid and brutal military despotisms, which for a time oppress the nations of civilised and Christian Europe, has afforded, during the past month, no novelty requiring particular comment. There have been, of course, confiscations in Lombardy, military executions in Hungary, and prosecutions of libel writers in Germany. The political torpor in France remains unbroken. Diplomatists, wanting work, have busied themselves with their old amusement of raising and settling difficulties in the affairs of Turkey; but it is not in that quarter that any great European movement is likely to begin.

The most interesting intelligence comes from the other side of the Atlantic, where President Pierce has inaugurated his administration with an animated address, rendered eloquent by the speaker's hearty confidence in the destinies of the expanding Union, and in the worth and future prevalence of free institutions; but defaced, unhappily, by an allusion which reminds the world that "involuntary servitude," now nearly banished from Monarchical Europe, is recognised and maintained by the Constitution of Republican America.

LITERATURE.

Household Stories, collected by the BROTHERS GRIMM. Newly translated. With two hundred and forty Illustrations, by Edwd. H. Wehnert. In two vols. London: Addey and Co., 21, Old Bond-street. 1853.

THESE stories are the classics of German infancy and childhood, and were collected with much pains-taking labour, by the brothers Grimm, partly from old books and sheets, and partly from oral traditions handed down from generation to generation. Such a labour requires no apology. The world is full of children, and all children have a prescriptive property in these marvellous narratives. It is curious, in reading them over, to notice how much the legendary lore of one country assimilates to that of another, and to recognise in the "good old German stories" the identical plots and catastrophes, which constitute the frame-work, not only of many of the nursery tales of England and France, but even of Persia and the East. Perhaps this is one cause, among many, of the interest with which this species of literature, which matter-of-fact readers are too prone to cast aside as trifling, has been always regarded by writers whose countenance alone might be deemed sufficient to give importance to their subjects. Another cause is, without doubt, the influence, real or supposed, which the hearing or perusal of such fictions is thought to exercise upon the mind and imagination, and through them, upon the future experience and character of the children with whom they become familiar recollections. And here it might not be difficult to show that among ourselves a very ridiculous prejudice has prevailed, for some generations at least, with regard to the supposed immoral tendencies of fictions palpably absurd and grotesque—as though a child were necessarily an idiot, and could not by any manner of means fail "to interpret by the letter a story of a cock and bull." From an apprehension of the evil effects of such a literal interpretation, the nursery and the infant schoolroom have been deluged with "good-boy" stories and biographies, vast numbers of which are worse than useless, not because they contain anything bad in themselves, but because they ignore faculties which young children possess, and which might be cultivated to advantage, and appeal to faculties which have not yet had birth, and which, if they be prematurely developed, are all the less likely to attain lustihood and vigour. Hence we sometimes see metaphysicians in pinafores who grow to be blockheads before they get breeched, but rarely catch a sight of a child of parents well-to-do in the world, who is heathily ignorant of ethics and ologies, or free from the cant (at an age when it can be nothing more than cant) of the schools. For this reason, as well as others, we are glad to see the collection of stories by the Brothers Grimm, in the elegant, and, at the same time, popular form of the volumes before us. They are admirably got up in every respect, and they present to the juvenile reader—to the eye as well as the mind—such an endless variety of amusing material as will cause them to be cherished as a real treasure by all who are fortunate enough to possess them. The stories, which are exceedingly numerous, appeal to every faculty of a child's mind, but chiefly to his wonder and imagination. Some of them teem with marvellous adventures—others are purely humorous—and others again are pathetic and mysterious. Those who have read the well-known tale of "Hans in Luck," which is one of the series, and which has been translated in most of the current journals of the day, may form an adequate judgment of the longer pieces. Of the shorter ones we shall extract one or two, for the sake of affording a sample of the rest. The following is one of the few which carry a moral with them:—

THE SHREDS.

Once upon a time there was a maiden who was very pretty, but lazy and careless. When she used to spin, she was so impatient, that if there chanced to be a little knot in the thread, she snapped off a long bit with it, and threw the pieces down on the ground near her. Now she had a servant-girl who was industrious, and used to gather together the shreds of thread, clean them and weave them, till she made herself a dress with them.

And a young man had fallen in love with this lazy maiden: and their wedding-day was appointed. On the evening before, the industrious servant-girl kept dancing about in her fine dress, till the bride exclaimed—

"Ah! how the girl does jump about,
Dressed in my shreds and leavings!"

When the bridegroom heard this, he asked the bride what she meant, and she told him that the maid had worked herself a dress with the shreds of thread which she had thrown away. As soon as the bridegroom heard this, and saw the difference between the laziness of his intended, and the industry of her servant, he gave up the mistress, and chose the maid for his wife.

The following is an exquisite idea embodied in the simplest narrative form—

THE ROSE.

There was once a poor woman who had two children, and the youngest went every day into the forest to fetch wood. Once, when it had strayed far away, looking for branches, a little, but strong and healthy, child came to it and helped it to pick up wood, and carried the bundles up to the house; but then in less than a moment he was gone. The child told its mother of this; but she would not believe it. At last the child brought home a rose, and told its mother that the beautiful child had given it, and had said that when the rose was in full bloom, then he would come again. The mother put the rose into water. One morning the child did not get out of bed, and the mother went to it and found it dead; but it lay looking quite happy and pleased, and the rose that same morning was in full bloom.

The illustrations of these volumes, which are all by Mr. Wehnert, are entitled to especial praise. The larger ones, which occupy the whole page, appear to be drawings on zinc plates, and in some instances so strongly resemble original drawings as to be hardly distinguishable from them. The major part of them have a whimsical character, and some are exceedingly ludicrous and provocative of laughter; they are all, however, artistic in the highest degree, and marked by correctness of outline, coupled with a delightful sketchiness in execution, which always constitutes the greatest charm in works of this kind. Among the smaller engravings on wood, are a number of the most characteristic oddities, combining the rich humour of Hood with the facile handling of a finished artist.

We can commend these volumes cordially to all who are in the habit of making presents to children, as a sure means of winning their good opinion. Those, too, who have not had the misfortune to outlive their childhood, may relish them, as we do, for their own sake. If it be true that "dulce est desipere in loco," it can hardly be less so, that it is desirable to renew the associations of childhood, when the opportunity of doing it is agreeably afforded us.

Memoir of a Metaphysician. By FRANCIS DRAKE, Esq. London: Longman, Brown, Green, and Longmans. 1853.

WE can generally understand something of the nature of that temptation which allures a man to print a book, even to his own sorrow. There is the hope of fame, the idea of being read by students, thumbed by artisans, and talked about in drawing-rooms. There is the glory of having found a mare's-nest, or, failing all other motives, there is the simple cacoethes scribendi ripening into a mania for elegant type and unblotted margins; and all of these come within the range of our sympathies, as more or less natural and creditable vanities of the flesh. But this book has thrown us off the scent; and we must confess ourselves utterly at a loss to see why the author could write, or the publisher print, such a lucus à non as this Memoir of a Metaphysician.

Taking it for granted that Mr. Drake did not mean to perpetrate a bad joke, and hoax the credulous public by a simulated story; we have to inform our readers that his book professes to record the career, and unhappy end of a young South American bastard half-breed, intrusted to the care of our author's father, and by him, with the assistance of his two ushers, the one an apocryphal Scotch metaphysician, the other a ridiculous German phrenologist, so ill trained, physically, mentally, and morally—so miserably cooked, that not only is the crust burnt to a cinder, but every drop of sap exhausted, and what remains in the dish is but an indigestible compound of bend-leather, and oakum. This youth, Master Harold Fremdling by name, betrays a precocious affection for combining the discussion of psychology and apple dumplings, vacillates between the moods of philosophic abstraction and the tenses of roast-pork and repletion; whereupon he becomes, as may be supposed, a marvel and a mystery to his tutors and governors. The German Pfeffer feels his bumps, the canny Scot seems inclined to mesmerise him; while papa and mamma Drake, seeing his prospects of wealth, and having a daughter in the nursery, leave his mind to the philosophers, and lay their plans for his majority. In due time, our metaphysician launches into the fashionable world, because the laws won't countenance precocious marriages with guardians' daughters; and there metaphysics haunt him, it would appear, and, with their ghostly abstractions, in due time make a rip of him, a cool, calculating most deliberate rake, and finally reduce him at last to something viler than ever lotos-eating or Circe-cup opium, gin, or usquebaugh have yet been able to do for this poor human nature of ours. In the end, after a sufficient display of hinted brutality and hapless tragedy, Master Fremdling leaves to our author the bequest of a metaphysical mare's-nest, and dies as like a "Christian child" as ere a rogue in the Old Bailey, who has been converted at seven o'clock, under the skilful manipulation of a very evangelical ordinary, and hanged at eight to the general edification.

Such is the narrative. We give it simply because we fancy not many will trouble the book, or be at the expense of losing so much precious time with it as we have been. As to the so-called metaphysics of the author, it will be enough for those who know anything of the subject, that he acknowledges no prima philosophia except the science of phenomena; and announces it as the last will and testament of this victim of metaphysics, that matter and mind are only convenient words, and experience the only basis of real and credible philosophy. If Mr. Drake ever means to write on this subject again, we do hope his friends will give him better advice. It is just possible he may have read Mr. Louis's "Biographical History of Philosophy;" but we are much mistaken if he has ever dipped further into the matter; and we do assure him, on our credit, that until he has both read and thought a great deal more than appears in this production, he will be more profitably employed in dealing with Mr. Fremdling's monetary legacy than with his mental bequest. The one is, at least, a positive quantity; the other is minus all probability or power: the one is a definite article, and the other is a waste of ink.

A View of the Resources of Nations. By H. Fraser, Esq. London: W. Smith, 172, Strand.

We have here one of the most extraordinary performances which have ever come beneath our notice. To give the reader an idea of this Chart of Universal History, we cannot do better than copy at full length the title which sets forth its design. This "View," then, comprehends the Area, Chief town, Population, and Religion of each country; the principal Produce and Manufactures; Description of the general Imports and Exports, of the Imports from and Exports to Great Britain and Ireland; Receipts, Expenditure, and Public Debt; Military and Maritime Countries—the Naval Forces of the present time; Late Wars, Sovereign or Supreme authority, Form of Government, Conventions, and Principal Treaties of Amity and Commerce with Great Britain, and between different Foreign States during the present century, collected from celebrated statistical writers and other authentic sources—with Historical Notes. All this mass of information is classified in twenty-one distinct columns, and any portion of it is thus rendered available to the reader without the loss of a moment of time in the search. The preparation of this work must have required an amount of industry and perseverance only to be paralleled by the paramount advantage to the public derived from its successful completion. The whole is embraced within the area of two broad sheets. No student of history—no library, institute, or literary association, should be without them.

Burning of the World, and the New Earth. Explained from Nature, and from Armorial Symbols, &c. By Robert Howard, M.D., M.R.C.S., L.S.A. London: Piper, Brothers and Co. 1853.

This is a very ominous and portentous looking volume, in a red-hot cover, figured over on both sides with cabalistic signs and strange figures, among which there is a fool's cap, a bishop's mitre, a lamb shouldering the union Jack, and "the great globe itself," with a notch as big as South America cut clean out of it. We learn from its contents that the world we live upon is to be burned and blasted, on some damp and foggy morning, into the shape of a monstrous Montgolfier balloon, with a big dish on the top of it. All this is to come to pass by means of the iron that is in the earth, which is to set fire to the stone, and both are to blow up together, like the gunpowder and the soot when Betty skys the copper. "Then," says our author—

By the uprising of impenetrable smoke, thick darkness will diffuse itself throughout the vastness of the air; the substance of the earth will be devoured by the burning of inconceivable fire; the air will be dissipated and chased away, so as to be no longer able to support the sun, moon, and stars, and they will, by their own weight, then come down upon the earth. This is signified in Scripture by "the woman clothed with the sun;" Rev. xii. 1. And in allusion also to the burning of the earth, Scripture says, "The stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. xxiv. 29.

This, of course, is indisputable, and we shall not attempt to reason against it. It must be true, for Doctor Howard, with half the alphabet tagged to the end of his name, is ready to take his oath of it. Happy Doctor! he makes his own philosophy as well as his own pills, and both, we have no doubt, are equally efficacious and wholesome. We trust he will reap the reward of his merit, and add the degree of A double S to the honours he already bears so bashfully.

Education in England. Revolutions in France. Free Trade and Colonization. By Ferdinand Gasc, M.A. London: Trelawney Saunders, 6, Charing Cross. 1852.

These are three pithily written pamphlets (two of which have appeared before) upon subjects with which the writer appears to be well acquainted. They will be found to contain many valuable truths occasionally enunciated in an original manner. The essay on Revolutions in France is somewhat rambling and unconnected, but contains facts and reflections which are worthy of attention. This book is evidently the work of a foreigner unaccustomed to express himself in English; but he has mastered the chief difficulties of our language, and if he will study short periods and confine himself to words which are to be found in the dictionary, he may become ere long a popular writer.

Memoirs of a Maître d'Armes; or, Eighteen Months at St. Petersburg. By Alexander Dumas. Translated by the Marquis of Ormond. London: Longman and Co. 1853.

In these two numbers of the Traveller's Library, we have the most graphic, startling and interesting pictures of Life in Russia, which have ever been presented to the public. The narrator, a fencing-master, in the patronage of the Grand Duke Constantine, has the privilege of access to all ranks of society, and sketches their peculiarities with a master hand. The period of his residence in Russia extends from 1824 to 1826, and his narrative embraces events of historical importance, which being related by an eye-witness well qualified both to observe and to report, have all the freshness and vigour of life. The character of the kingly savage Constantine is sketched with astonishing force; and we should be tempted to transfer the picture to our columns were it not for the fact that this part of the work has been so often translated as to be already familiar to most of our readers. We extract the following account of the inundation of St. Petersburgh in the autumn of 1824.

About eight I was awakened by a cannon-shot. I put on a dressing gown and ran to the window. The streets gave token of great agitation among all classes. I dressed as fast as I could, and ran down.

"What was the cannon for?" asked I of a man who was carrying mattresses upstairs.

"It is the water rising, Sir," said he. . . . I ran to the door. The middle of the street was flooded, and waves, caused by carriages going along, washed over the footways. . . . . The cannon-shots now came faster and faster; and we could see the hackney carriages escaping from Admiralty Square in all directions—the drivers, who had hoped to make a good speculation, being forced to give up and escape themselves. They cried, "The water rises, the water rises!" and behind them, as if in pursuit, a high wave showed its green head above the quay, and breaking against the angle of the Issac Bridge, rolled in foam to the foot of the statue of Peter the Great. A cry of fright arose, as if the wave had been visible to the whole city. The Neva had broken over its boundaries. At the sound of the cry, the terrace of the Winter Palace was suddenly covered with uniforms. The emperor, surrounded with his staff, mounted it in order to give his orders, as the danger became momentarily more pressing. When he got up he saw that the water was half way up the walls of the fortress, and thought of the unfortunate prisoners, confined in cells looking out to the river. An order was at once given, in his name, to the owner of a boat, to go and tell the governor to remove them from their cells, and put them in safety; but the boat arrived too late. They had been forgotten in the confusion, and were dead.

We now perceived above the Palace the flag of the imperial yacht, which came to render any assistance that the emperor and his family might stand in need of. The water was now level with the parapets of the quay, and the sight of a carriage rolling over with the coachman and horse, showed that in the streets there was no longer a footing. The coachman reappeared swimming, and was taken into a balcony on the first floor. We were so taken up with the sight, that we had turned away from the river, but on looking at it again, saw two vessels in Admiralty Square. The water had risen so much as to allow them to pass over the parapets, and they had been sent by the emperor to the succour of the drowning. . . . . There were at least six feet of water in the streets. The canon had ceased to fire, so that the inundation had reached the height of the ramparts of the citadel. Portions of the ruins of houses now floated in from the suburbs, which had formed part of the wretched wooden sheds from the Neva quarter, and which had been carried away with their inhabitants. A boat passing us on the Perspective, picked up a man near us; but he was dead. . . . The water still rose with fearful rapidity. From the canals, boats got adrift and appeared in the streets. . . . . We felt the house tremble and groan, as it were, under the force of the waves which reached up to the first floor.

The emperor seemed in despair: Milarodowich, the governor, was by his side, receiving and giving orders, which were executed with wonderful zeal. The news brought was more and more disastrous. A whole regiment had sought refuge on the roof of one of the barracks. The building gave way, and the whole of the men were lost. As they told this fact to the emperor, a sentinel, carried off in his sentry box, which served as boat, passed the terrace, and seeing the emperor, stood up and presented arms. A wave overturned the frail bark. The emperor cried out for a boat to go and help him, and as the man could swim, he was able to keep himself afloat until he was picked up, and carried into the Palace.

The scene by degrees became so confused, that it was impossible to follow the details. Vessels dashed against each other, and their wreck formed a mass mingled with floating furniture, and the dead bodies of men and animals. Coffins, raised from the cemeteries, gave up their dead, as if the last judgment had come; and a cross, torn from a burying ground, floated in through a window of the Palace, and was found, a fatal omen! in the bedroom of the emperor.

The sea ran thus for twelve hours. The first floors were everywhere under water, and it reached in some parts of the town to the second, six feet above the Virgin of Peter the Great. It then began to subside; for, by God's mercy, the wind changed from the west to north, and the Neva was able to pursue its course to the sea uninterrupted. Twelve hours more, and St. Petersburg would have disappeared from the earth, like the old cities of the time of the deluge.

The death of Alexander; the coronation of Nicolas; the bloody conspiracy and massacre which signalized the accession of the new monarch—together with a visit to Moscow and a journey through the wintry wildernesses of Siberia; these are a few of the events of this remarkable narrative. They are interwoven with the details of a domestic romance of no common description, and the materials for which could be found in Russia alone—the main incidents being substantially true.

Lays of the Future. By WILLIAM LEASK. London: Partridge and Oakey, 34, Paternoster Row. 1853.

WITH the musical cadences of this writer's poetical prose fresh in our recollection, we must confess to a feeling of disappointment upon the perusal of his verse. Not that it exhibits any very great vices or even deficiencies; but that it does not come up to our idea of what the utterances of the author of such a book as "The Footsteps of the Messiah," should be, when he chooses to adopt a metrical form of expression. We should have thought his ear too well attuned to tolerate the introduction of Alexandrines in blank verse, or such apologies for rhymes as peace and please, say and hypocri*sy*, way and here*sy*, then and pain, &c., &c. These, which might be regarded as venial faults in a young writer, are serious anomalies in the production of such a man as Mr. Leask, who has gained a reputation worth preserving. The main subject of these lays is the future condition of the earth during the Millenial period—not a bad theme for poetry, whatever it may be for discussion or proof. The following are a few of the best stanzas of the best piece, which is entitled "That Day."

I see it dawning in the gorgeous east;
It beams, like angel's light on every clime;
The loftiest mountains hail it, and the least,
Catching its glories, make the scene sublime.
The storied fields of every kingdom feel
A happy morning gently o'er them steal,
And the new age begins its hallowed time.

Upon the breast of fruitful earth is spread
Teeming abundance—banish'd now the foe—
Thick clustered blessings in profusion shed,
Supplant the place of ancient tears and woe;
And summer shines serene on every land,
With love and beauty in her liberal hand,
And all the nations laugh beneath the glow.

The earth long curs'd with barrenness assumes
Such landscapes as an Eden once possessed;
The wilderness is cloth'd, the desert blooms;
The arid fields in flowery robes are dress'd;
The rugged hills that on the traveller frown'd,
Are with rich wreaths of verdant foliage crown'd,
And the wild tenants of the rock are bless'd.

The Meditations of Descartes, &c. Translated from the Latin, &c. Edinburgh: Sutherland and Knox. 1853.

WE are glad to see an English version of these profound meditations. In a more metaphysical age of English literature they were, perhaps, more generally known at once to the men of thought in their original garb, and to the general reader in the translation of Molyneux or the French of de Luynes. Latterly, however, except with a very few, the name of the author of the "Discours de la Methode" was associated merely with exploded vortices and other obsolete physical hypotheses, so that the sovereign intellect whose image so long and so generally stamped the currency of European thought, had fallen into a neglect far more unworthy than his former preëminence. We take it as an index of the revival of pure philosophy among us that this little volume has appeared in its present shape; and from what we have seen, it appears to be rendered by one who is steeped in the spirit of his great original, and able, on the whole, to give him a good introduction to English society.

The Working-Man's Way in the World, being an Autobiography of a Journeyman Printer. London: W. and F. G. Cash. 1858.

THIS narrative appeared in our pages, and has been very properly reprinted in a handsome little octavo.

One is naturally led from the title page to think of it primarily as one of the class of books which show how the current of the present age is running. Undoubtedly, the sympathies of "the reading public," from the studious philosopher and intelligent statesman, down to the boarding-school girl, and even the jaded victim of the circulating library, are turned in these days towards the mind and manner of the great democracy, misnamed the working classes. Tired of monks and nuns, and knights and ladies, and chivalries and feudalisms, and other obsolete phantoms that never were realities of any interest; wearied also of insipid Chloes and Chlorindas, novels of high life and gossip in saloons—at last the universal craving nearly coincides with the demands of philosophy, and the palled appetite of the romantic voluptuary cannot be excited or interested with anything less harrowing than the song of a shirt or the tale of a tailor. Now, this is in the right direction, although it be often pampered with spiced delicates from the stews and the sewers—thrilling horrors, sham miseries, and its own appropriate cant—recorded by lamentable philanthropists in shawl-pattern dressing-gowns who have looked in at the windows of poverty without ever having lived it. Of that kind of thing we—one of the people, familiar with "hodden grey" and hasty pudding, and worse—we are for our parts heartily sick, and confess ourselves hopeless of any good result of it whatsoever. Poetical tailors, writing crambo verses, and ascribing the abominable doggrel to an outpouring of the Holy Ghost—Cockney special judgments killing heartless parsons by means of a new cheap coat sent home from a sweater's with typhus and scarlatina in the buttonholes—chartist dragoons fraternizing in their patriotism with starving weavers, and getting whipped by the horrible oligarchy for their pains—of these, and such as these, our very soul is weary, and that just because we have not lived all our days in a drawing room and been sprinkled with rose water. The poor man will not be profited by drawing forth a sentimental interest in favour of these spasmodic and hysterical sorts of personages; but by showing how a manful, earnest, soberminded handicraftsman shall live in the honourable dignity of toilsome independence among his tools and his children as society now is.

It is for this reason that we are disposed to place a high value on "The Working-Man's Way in the World." There is an unmistakeable air of reality about it—a clear veracious manner, an observant intelligence, and a cheerful self-reliance, which make us feel that we can take the arm of our journeyman printer and go along with him in the utmost confidence. True, indeed, he is not just an ordinary journeyman printer; he has managed to pick up in boyhood "a little Latin and less Greek"—by and by he is able to speak good Parisian French, learnt among the open-mouthed children chattering in the Faubourgs—and in studious evenings he has added a sufficiency of German to read the lobgesungen and general poetry of the land. But all this he has done while doing his job of work laboriously, and with a single eye to the intelligent dignity of his life. So Franklin toiled, content if need were to finger small pica to the end of the chapter of life; so, in another sphere, the brave-hearted Hugh Millar hammered in his quarry, till he became the most eloquent geologist of his country, a man loved and honoured by all the people and by all the churches; so might our working-men labour and rise in mass to the level of higher spirits, if they would regard less agitators and social machineries, and be true to their own manhood, and the faculties that God has given them. It is on this account we like the spirit of this book. It tells us what goes on in the printing-house—its anxieties, its grievances, its perils, its unbeliefs, its readers, overseers, journeymen, and devils, literal and metaphorical: and all this it does in a clear, succinct, and veracious manner, displaying no small skill in discerning character, and a quiet shrewd humour which, if not very exciting, is not a little enjoyable. The man has an entire individuality—is a man, and by no means a stalking horse or a lay-figure. Nor shall any one read his book without feeling that a walk with this handicraftsman either among the green lanes of Devonshire or by the banks of the Wye, or through the streets of London or Paris, is a cheery, pleasant, satisfactory visit to the place under the guidance of one who knows whither he is leading you and what you ought really to see. The Intellectual and Moral Development of the Present Age. By SAMUEL WARREN, F.R.S. Wm. Blackwood and Sons, Edinburgh and London. 1853.

IN the form of a lecture addressed to the members of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Hull, Mr. Warren here gives a most eloquent and masterly resumé of the history of the latter-day progress of man in philosophy, science, and literature. Though the view which he takes of his subject is necessarily limited, he has succeeded in rendering it remarkably striking and effective, and in the highest degree interesting to the student. The good taste which prompted him in the selection of such a subject for such an occasion, is fully equalled by the skill shown in its treatment. The work before us, while profoundly suggestive to the man of science, is well fitted for popular use, and might be largely circulated among the young men of our day with the happiest effect. We know of no book more likely to arouse the dreamer from a state of listless apathy, to present him with a vocation, and set him diligently to work at it.

The Odes of Horace, translated into unrhymed Metres, with Introductions and Notes. By F. W. NEWMAN, Professor of Latin, University College, London. London: John Chapman, 142, Strand. 1853.

ALLUDING to the failures of previous translators of Horace, Mr. Newman attributes them not so much to want of talent or learning, as to their attempting to produce poems in modern style, through an excessive fear that a modern reader will endure nothing else. But this fear does not deter him from an attempt to render the poetry of the ancients in new metres unfamiliar to the English ear. Conceiving that every educated man, though ignorant of the dead languages, must desire to know whatever may be known in English concerning those master-minds of the ancients who have so affected the European intellect; he sets the example of rendering the old classics into English verse, unfettered by rhyme, and bearing a marked similarity to the metrical peculiarities of the original writers, in the expectation of, by this means, rendering them popular among English readers. "I bespeak," says he, "for myself a thoughtful and serious reader, anxious for instruction. I assume in him no knowledge whatever of ancient language or literature, except to have read Homer in a translation; and I endeavour to afford whatever is subsidiary to full intelligence—whatever will aid him to that close insight into men and times, which nothing but contemporary literature can give." Horace is the poet selected for this experiment, because he is the poet of whom it most concerns us to know something—because his writings bring us into contact with the Augustan age—and because he is so various in metre and subject as to afford the best chance of success. A further recommendation is hinted by the statement, that half our divines in past generations stole the substance of their sermons from the Latin lyrist; a most miserable fact, if it be one, and not at all complimentary to university training for holy orders. It appears to us, that the chance of this version of Horace, or any version of any classic effected on the same plan, becoming popular with mere English readers, is infinitesimally small. Not that we think there is any such violent prejudice against new metres as Mr. Newman hints at. Poe, the American poet, tried the effect of new metres with brilliant success; and Longfellow, to a less extent, has done the same. But their metres are in conformity with our old ideas of cadence and rhythm, which appears to us not to be the case with some of those of the translations in this volume; they savour too much of the Roman mechanism for English ears unaccustomed to Latin scanscion; and it is doubtful, however much they may be relished by those who are familiar with the original, whether the reader who has merely read a translation of Homer, will readily succeed in penetrating the mystery of their melody. We extract a specimen, from which our friends may judge for themselves:—

TO PYRRHA.

Who's the stripling slim with liquid scents
Drench'd, on plenteous rose, that sues thee hard
  In pleasant grot? for whom
 Tiest thou, Pyrrha, thine auburn hair

Simple in grace? How oft, alas! will he Faith and changed gods lament, and soon
  In strange surprise behold
 Black winds sweep on a ruffled sea!

Now he joys to eye thee golden bright,
Hopes thee alway vacant, alway kind;
  Fond fool? of shifting breeze
 Thoughtless. Woe for the hearts to which

Now thou glitterest. Me the sacred wall
Shows on votive board, when high I hung
  My dripping weeds;—a gift
 Gladly paid to the sea-god's might.

In each of the above verses the ear is disagreeably surprised, after a stately walk of three lines, by a hop, step, and jump in the fourth, which pops in with as much impertinence as a bar or two of "Rory O'More" at the heels of a dead march. The contrast is too violent, and not likely to be relished by the unclassical reader.

This constitutes the only objection we have to make to the volume, which we can but regard as one calculated to be eminently useful. The arrangement of the odes, as far as it was possible, in chronological order, and the historical notices prefixed to each, and which throw much light on the events and circumstances of the age, are both advantages of some importance, and are likely to be appreciated by students. Moreover, the translation appears to be executed with admirable fidelity and discrimination; and the notes appended to each performance supply everything necessary for the full understanding of the text.

Observations on India. By a Resident there many years. London: John Chapman, 142, Strand. 1853.

THE author of this perspicuous and outspoken narrative has travelled through most parts of British India, and made good use of his opportunities for observation. The pictures which he delineates of European life in India are, as we have good reason to know, uncommonly like nature under the circumstances which there disguise her in an artificial garb. Many interesting peculiarities in the manners and customs of the natives that appear to have been overlooked by previous writers, will be found detailed at length in this work, which affords valuable information with regard to the condition of the people under British rule. The author, while doing justice to what is praiseworthy in the administration of Indian affairs, denounces existing abuses with an earnest frankness which is above suspicion. He looks upon Haileybury College, and its corresponding institutions, as a gigantic nuisance, and would have them abolished at once, and the government left free to choose its judicial, and other agents, wherever it might find them most capable. He would put an end to the family party system, through the prevalence of which justice is often defeated. The man that married Jenny Stiles should no longer sit in judgment upon the youth that married her younger sister; and the appeal made from the decision of a tyrannical or ignorant magistrate should no more be liable to be quashed by the father or uncle of the despot. He would have magistrates heedful of their duties, and not absent for three weeks together at a race-ball, while matters of life and death were awaiting their return to the bench. He would also diminish the influence of the ladies, and dispense with their presence on all expeditions. He tells us that—

> A ship bound for Calcutta, with part of a regiment on board, grounded out of sight of land. The officer in command of the men left directly for the shore, in a boat, taking his wife with him, that he might place her in safety. The next day he returned to look after his troops, and, as it happened that the weather remained fine all the while, he found most of them alive, though, left to themselves, they had committed great excesses; had a single man been guilty of an irregularity of this kind, he would have been brought to account, and most probably disgraced. In this case no notice was taken.

This is bad enough; but a worse consequence of female influence may be learned from the Affghan tragedy, the bloody massacres attending which were, in the estimation of our author, largely due to the absence of the officers, who, having carried their wives to the asylum of the the enemies' camp, remained there with them, leaving their regiments to perish without leadership. An amusing sample of the same kind of influence is furnished by the following record of the reign of Lord Auckland. His lordship had fixed his quarters at Simlah, not much over a thousand miles from the seat of his government, preferring that cool retreat to the sultry climate of Calcutta, doubtless for the sake of the ladies—two elderly maidens, his sisters, whom he had brought out with him.

> Handsome aides-de-camp were here and there and everywhere, and if plain people did not know what the duties of aides-de-camp were, and why so many of them were paid by the state, they might here learn, that their employment was to follow the ladies, and make themselves generally useful as upper footmen. What swarms of idlers, in mountebank finery does the shadow of monarchy collect around it! Pious youths were not particularly in request in Lord Auckland's house, but good-looking ones held the same premium as with his predecessor. In the court of Simlah, had Socrates himself appeared, he would have been considered as marring the brilliant assemblage by his ugly mug; and Aristides would have stood no chance for a vacant judgeship against Adonis.

In reference to the grand question on Indian affairs, viz., whether the country is to remain under the East India Company or to be transferred to the Crown—the author declares himself decidedly for the former, on the ground that, faulty as is the present system, it is infinitely preferable to a government by functionaries who would get their appointments in reward for electioneering services. Crown patronage, as all the world knows, is a species of private property generally squandered in the purchase of votes in rotten boroughs; and it can be no very wise economy to exalt to office the scoundrel who sells himself for for a bribe—though it is in admirable keeping with the government system of planting a new colony with the convict scum of the old country.

Juvenile Delinquents; their Condition and Treatment. By MARY CARPENTER. London: W. and F. G. Cash (Successors to C. Gilpin), 5, Bishopsgate-street Without. 1853.

IN the number of this magazine for last month, in a paper entitled "The Night Side of Civilization," we had occasion to refer to the evidence of Miss Carpenter, of Bristol, given before a Committee of the House of Commons on "Criminal and Destitute Juveniles." We have now the pleasure of drawing the attention of our readers to a volume by that lady upon the same subject—a work which is in all respects worthy the earnest consideration of every man who has, or has not, recognized the paramount importance of the melancholy theme of which it treats. In an able chapter introductory to a practical dealing with the whole matter, Miss Carpenter draws a parallel between the children of the rich and respectable, and those of the poor and destitute. She shows, what is undeniably true, though it has been unmercifully overlooked, that the terrors of the law—the cold rigours of the gaol, are substituted in the case of the latter for the kindly admonition and moral training which the former receive from their parents—that while these are lured to virtue by precept and example, those are driven to vice and crime by the infliction of punishments outrageously disproportioned to the offences, if viewed, as they ought to be, in connection with the moral responsibility of the delinquents. This is one source—we are not sure that it is not the chief source—of the flood of criminality that overwhelms the land; and it is against this enormous social abuse and political blunder that an amiable and accomplished lady, after a long course of unwearied experiment and personal exertion in the furtherance of a work which magistrates on the bench have been heard to proclaim utterly hopeless, directs her persevering energies. To her faith in love and in human nature there is nothing hopeless; she sees difficulties only to see through them: and points the way clearly enough to a definite success which she has been among the first to perceive and the most ardent in endeavouring to accomplish. The volume before us may be regarded as the text-book of the juvenile reformer: it is eminently practical both in matter and spirit; it shirks none of the appalling and frightful details necessary to place the subject before the reader in all its hideous and portentous reality—yet it contains nothing which might not be read aloud in the family circle—nothing which is not calculated to attach in behalf of our fellow-creatures the best sympathies of our nature. The reader who shall thoughtfully peruse the second, third, and fourth chapters of this work, in contemplating the fearful and yet touching revelations they contain, may well stagger at the bare comprehension of the difficulties which a reforming legislature must encounter in dealing with this question. The condition of the boys, the girls, and the parents, which make up the criminal class is, morally and physically, so degraded and perverted, that the attempt at reformation does indeed appear to be hopeless; and we can scarcely wonder that many who have for a time put their shoulders to the work have finally abandoned it in despair. But Miss Carpenter does not allow of despairing; she affords us here and there a glimpse of light and a ray of encouragement as we proceed; and in spite of the dismal prospect we gather confidence as we get along. She recapitulates what has been done, in the wrong direction as well as in the right; and gathering warning from one and teaching from the other, lands us at last upon a green spot, whence we may look back across the dreary abyss through which we have been labouring, and see that the clouds are beginning to roll away, and that God's light is destined to penetrate through its darkest depths. We have no space for extracts from this volume. We might select matter of a most startling description for a dozen columns, had we room for it; confessions of infant criminals, the particulars of which outvie all that the most unscrupulous romancist ventures upon in fiction, or simple records of hapless experience more touching in their naked artlessness than the tales of tragic woe which form the poet's theme. But we must forbear, and refer the reader to the volume itself.

Readable Books. Illustrated. London: Clarke, Beeton, and Co., 148, Fleet-street.

THESE volumes form decidedly the cheapest illustrated series which have ever issued from the press. They are well printed, profusely illustrated with engravings of a superior class, and handsomely got up. The Tales of Mystery and Imagination, by Edgar Poe (second series), is an absorbing volume, which it is impossible to lay down without a thorough perusal. The Cavaliers of England comprises three capital stories exceedingly well told, and characteristic of the time. The Reveries of a Bachelor may serve to set many a bachelor a dreaming till he wakes up some fine morning transformed into a Benedict. The most remarkable of these volumes is, however, that entitled, "Wellington: the Story of his Life, his Battles, and Political career." We have here a volume of nearly three hundred pages, together with a dozen illustrations, for the cost of a single shilling. The biography is well written, containing a succinct account of every remarkable event of the life of the great hero, supplemented by a detailed narration of the funeral at St. Paul's. The readable books are deserving of their significant cognomen, being such as most men will find acceptable at a leisure moment.

The Band of Hope Review, and Sunday Scholar's Friend. London: Partridge and Oakey, Paternoster Row. 1853.

THIS is a handsome volume of a monthly serial, published at the price of a halfpenny a number. The contents are a collection of short and appropriate papers for children, well adapted to secure their attention and to cultivate a healthy moral and religious sentiment. How it comes to pass that these pages are illustrated plentifully with engravings, some of them equal to anything to be met with—that is a mystery we know nothing about.

Ten Sermons of Religion. By THEODORE PARKER. London: John Chapman, 742, Strand. 1853.

WITHOUT animadverting upon the peculiar phase of Christianity professed, or not professed, by the congregation in American Boston, of which Mr. Parker is the minister, and with which, we conceive we have nothing to do, we are bound to bear testimony to the surpassing excellence of these discourses, each and all of which we have read with unflagging interest and delight. They are characterised by a genial, fervid, and manly eloquence hardly to be paralleled in any other pulpit performances of our day, and exhibit such a profound knowledge of human nature in connection with such a kindly appreciation of its weaknesses and failings, as cannot fail to command at once the veneration and affection of the reader. There is nothing to equal the withering scorn—the blighting sarcasm—with which the preacher strips bare the loathsome shapes and seemings of hypocrisy, unless it be the "gentleness of hand" with which he would lead the wanderer to a safe path. We shall give an extract from the sermon, entitled, "Conventional and Natural Sacraments," with a wish that the admonitions it contains were less needed than they are.

> The effect of getting up a feeling of piety and stopping with that, is like the effect of reading novels and nothing else . . . . . the heart long wont to weep at the novelists' unreal woes, at sorrows in silk and fine linen, is harder than Pharaoh's when a dirty Irish girl asks for a loaf in the dear name of God, or when a sable mother begs money wherewith to save her daughter from the seraglios of New Orleans. . . . . . I do not say that novels are not good reading and profitable; they are so just so far as they stimulate the intellect, the conscience, the affections, the soul, to healthful action, and set the man to work; but just so far as they make you content with your feeling, and constrain the feeling to be nothing but feeling, they are pernicious. Such reading is mental dissipation. . . . Profligacy of the religious sentiment, voluptuousness with God, is the most dangerous of luxuries. Novel-reading, after the fashion hinted at, is highly dangerous. How many youths and maidens are seriously hurt thereby! But as far as I can judge, in all Christendom there are more that suffer from this spiritual dissoluteness. I speak less to censure than to warn. I hate to see a man uncharitable, dishonest, selfish, mean, and sly, —"for ever standing on his guard, and watching" unto fraud. I am sorry to hear of a woman given up to self-indulgence, accomplished, but without the highest grace—womanly good works—luxurious, indolent, "born to consume the corn"—that is bad enough. But when I learn that this hard man is a class-leader, and has "the gift of prayer," is a famous hand at a conference, the builder of churches, a great defender of ecclesiastical doctrines, and devotional forms, that he cries out upon every heresy, banning men in the name of God; when I hear that this luxurious woman delights in mystic devotion, and has a wantonness of prayer—it makes me far more sad; and there is then no hope! The kidnapper at his court is a loathly thing; but the same kidnapper at his communion!—Great God! and has thy church become so low! Let us turn off our our eyes and look away.

We can commend the reader especially to the sermon, entitled, "Culture of the Religious Powers," not as to the most eloquent, but as to that which is, perhaps, most suggestive of new thoughts and feelings in reference to an old-fashioned subject.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES.

Mutual Life Assurance Society.—From the Report of the Directors of the above Society, for the year ending 31st Dec., 1852, we learn that the total number of proposals laid before the Board during the year was 228, for assuring the sum of £126,329. Of this amount, 174 proposals for assuring £93,681 were completed; 43 proposals for assuring £27,248 were either declined, or not proceeded with, and 11 proposals for assuring £5,400 were standing over for further consideration at the close of the year. The following statement will show the relative proportion of assurances in force at the end of 1852, as compared with the end of 1851.

Of the policies written off, only 11 were for claims by death, assuring altogether £8,350, and which, if compared with the amount assured on the 30th June, £909,583, will be found to represent a rate of mortality of little more than 9 per 1000; 12 policies assuring £8,500, were purchased by the Society, and the remaining 26 for £20,599, were either forfeited or expired. The Directors have taken advantage of the high price of the public funds during the past year to realize a considerable portion of the Society's stock, and to invest it on mortgages of land and other available securities. After the payment of all claims and expenses, nearly £25,000 have been added to the invested capital of the Society during the past year, making the total very close upon £200,000; and if the securities were valued at the present market price, it would be considerably above that amount. The income of the Society has increased during the same period more than £3,000 per annum, and now amounts to upwards of £39,300 per annum. After a careful valuation of all the assets and liabilties of the Society, the clear divisible surplus on the 31st Dec. last, is ascertained to be £99,211 2s.

National Guardian Assurance Society.—The following is a summary of the business of this Society transacted during the year, ending Dec. 31, 1852:—

which have been distributed as follows:—

Proposals under consideration	38
	488

The annual income derivable from the policies thus issued is £2,141 1*s.* 4*d.*, which added to the premiums secured by the first year's business, after deducting all the policies which have become lapsed, shows an annual income, irrespective of fire and guarantee business, of £4,187 3*s.* 10*d.* This steady progress indicates increased attention to the very valuable principles upon which the Society is based, and warrants the belief that the National Guardian will rank amongst the most successful of modern Assurance Institutions. The advantages offered by the Society are of the most important nature, and none more so than the non-forfeiture of policies of five years' standing; thus, by a wise and equitable adjustment, providing for the possibility of the assured being unable to continue his premiums, while, again, policies can be issued as low as £20—the payments made weekly—so that the working man and artisan may enjoy the great boon of life assurance.

The Standard Life Assurance Company.—The twenty-seventh annual general meeting of this Company was held on Tuesday, the 15th of February, 1853, within their office, No. 3, George-street, Edinburgh; James Robertson, Esq., W. Ann. Aver. for ten years	£424,148	7	8	£14,294	12	3

The following facts are worthy of being particularly noted:—

The annual average amount of new business for the last ten years has been upwards of £424,000, and for the last five years £450,000.

The Company's funds have been nearly doubled during the last six years, and quadrupled during the last eleven years.

The general results of the business, and its steady progress, are most satisfactory, and afford good grounds for congratulation; but the annual increase of transactions has become so uniform, and the results of the business from year to year so regular, that the progress of one year is almost a repetition, in degree at least, of the progress of another.

The Company have deemed it advisable to invest a portion of their funds in the purchase of land, with a view to obtaining a good and permanent rate of interest. That such a measure is a wise one, there can be no doubt. They have also relaxed some of the more stringent conditions of assurance, as no longer necessary to a Society so long established. With respect to the former of these measures, the chairman observed that he thought it his duty to refer to the investment lately made by the Company in land, and, for his own part, he was satisfied that it was a very judicious step—looking to the large and increasing funds of the Company, to the probable difficulty in continuing to secure good investments, likewise to the anticipated rise in the value of land from the great influx of gold into the country. Since the purchase was made, the directors had had every reason to be well satisfied with the transaction, as a safe and prudent investment of the funds of the Company; and he was glad to find that the meeting had so cordially given their approval of the course which the directors had adopted.

Marine Life and Casualty Mutual Assurance Society.—The following is an abridgment of the first Report of the above Society:—"Your directors submit with great satisfaction, at this the first general meeting of the society, a report of its operations, and a statement of the accounts from the period of its commencement to the 31st December last. As the objects of the society and the circumstances connected with its formation are not generally known, your directors think it desirable upon the present occasion briefly to allude to them. Hitherto mariners, as a class, have been practically excluded from the benefits of life assurance. This is partly attributable to the improvident habits generally prevalent amongst them, while the high rates required for those risks to which their calling exposes them, have discouraged the more prudent from making that provision for themselves and for their families, which it would seem especially incumbent upon that class to secure. This society has been established to remove those obstacles, and to throw open to the seafaring community advantages which the public at large have so long enjoyed. In promoting so desirable an object the most valuable assistance has been received from those companies and shipowners at whose instance, and under whose auspices, the society has been founded. Upon data supplied by them, tables of premiums have, after much care, been prepared by Mr. Ansell, the eminent actuary. The rates thus framed have the advantage of being equitably adjusted to the various descriptions of risks, and of always being charged alike under similar circumstances. Owing to the facilities thus afforded, shipowners have found comparatively little difficulty in inducing those in their service to avail themselves of the advantages offered by this society. In order that the fullest advantages of life assurance may be enjoyed by the members of the society, it has been formed on the mutual principle, whereby the whole of the profits are divisible among the assured alone. Your directors refer with great satisfaction to the accounts which have been duly audited. They have been made up to the 31st December, in compliance with the requirements of the Joint Stock Companies' Act, and, consequently, exhibit the result of the society's operations for a very few months only; but even in that short period the premiums received exceeded £3,000, and owing to the rapid increase of business during the interval which has since elapsed, they already amount to between £4,000 and £5,000."

British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Company.—The following are extracts from the Sixth Annual Report of this Society. "The steady progress of the Company's business, unchecked from the outset, is shown by the following Table:—

"The new business of the year consists of 1,400 Life Policies, assuring £281,687, the annual premiums thereon being above £9,100. Fifty-one Annuities also have been issued, of which eight have been Immediate Annuities, on which £1,380. 18*s.* 1*d.* have been received. By the last year's new business the annual revenue of the Company from premiums on life business has been increased, after deducting for lapsed policies, about £8,358, and the amount assured by the new life policies of 1852, is above 33 per cent. more than those of the year 1851. The division of profits declared at the early part of the year has given complete satisfaction, and has, doubtless, contributed to that high public favour with which the office is regarded. The members are already aware by the public papers, that in accordance with the wish of the members, expressed at a special meeting held in November, 1851, the Legislature has granted a special Act of Parliament, by which various important privileges have been conferred upon this Society. Thirty-six members have died during the year, and the sums payable for assurances and bonuses under their policies have amounted to £6,544 9*s.* 2*d.* It is satisfactory to observe, that this amount is much less than the sum provided for the current deaths by the tables. The number of life policies in force on December 31, 1852, after deducting those which had terminated by lapsing or death, was 3,955, assuring the amount of £732,605, the annual income thereon being about £32,809 13*s.* 3*d.* After payment of all expenses and claims, the Company has accumulated the sum of £45,831 12*s.* 8*d.*, the whole of which (the balance in hand of course, excepted) is invested in approved securities."

A GLANCE AT ALLIANCES.

"L'Empire c'est la paix."—The words have been often enough repeated. We trust they contain a truth. But, what if it should not be so? "Si vis pacem, para bellum," says the well-known maxim. Si vis bellum, simula pacem, may perhaps be found to be also worthy of registration. At all events, considering what is said to be the deep-seated desire of the veritable Frenchman, viz., to revenge the disasters of the first Empire, and to reverse the treaties of '15; considering the temptation to the indulgence of that desire supplied by the revival of the Empire under a Buonaparte, as well as the necessity in which the present chief of France may ere long find himself to provide occupation for the bellicose spirit of his people, there can scarcely be anything inopportune in looking at European eventualities, and contemplating alliances, which, perhaps, as worthy Sir Thomas Browne says of the Song of the Sirens, are "not beyond the reach of happy conjecture." Neither is there any reason for checking speculation, on the ground of audacity or idle tampering with probabilities, since what speculation need be daunted, after the series of marvellous surprises inaugurated in February, 1848? Within the period of four years, calculation has been baffled, experience turned to foolishness; unexpectedness been the rule for events—not the exception.

That Napoleon III. will, like Napoleon I., brave all Europe, we do not believe. That he will seek to place any member of his family upon foreign thrones—to instal them in Spain, Naples, Holland, or to revive the kingdom of Westphalia; no, for such attempts we hold him to be too sage. But there are other objects, not of mere personal or family, but of national ambition, and the chief of these we take to be the recovery of the "natural boundaries," as they are called—for "natural" better read "necessary"—without which France will never, in our opinion, rest satisfied.

The resumption of the Rhenish Provinces of Prussia and Bavaria, as well as of the kingdom of Belgium, of every rood of territory, indeed, that lies between actual France and the line of the Rhine; this, we say, is the great and (to adopt their own term) the natural aim of French ambition, the natural tendency of French aggrandizement: as natural, and as infallible as has become the tendency of Russia towards aggrandizement on the side of the Ottoman Empire. It seems to us, that it is only a question of time, when they shall attempt it. The idea has never entirely left them. "J'aurais reconquis nos frontières naturelles," says Chateaubriand, speaking of his own policy, as Minister of the Restoration, at the time of French intervention in Spain, "Ma guerre d'Espagne," as he modestly calls it. Even in the reign of the "pacific" Louis Philippe, the idea pierces through—pierces through the policy of Mons. Thiers, in 1840. And it was in that reign that Mons. Victor Hugo* coolly proposed a cession by Prussia of her provinces on the left bank, in exchange for kingdoms and principalities on the other side—in securing which France, of course, was to aid her. What, then, more natural, more consequent, than that with a Buonapartean Empire, this tendency should be still more prononcée? When could such an opportunity appear to present itself, if not under the rule of him who declared before the peers of Louis Philippe, that the Emperor, his uncle, had preferred abdicating to accepting the restricted frontiers, &c.?" And I, he added, "Je n'ai pas respiré un jour dans l'oubli de tels renseignements."

Yes; the name and the notion are necessarily associated: the former prompts to the execution of the latter. We do not assert that war is instantly imminent; he will wait to strike the blow. But we believe that he will strike it; and that it is because they feel satisfied that he will strike it sooner or later, that the military spirits of France are patient to bide their time; letting the project be adjourned, but confiding for its eventual attempt in him to whom they have given themselves body and soul; of whose earnestness to vindicate the national honour (phrase of France) they can have no doubt, and of whose powers of maturing purposes, in secret, they have had memorable experience. He is not in the habit of letting the world into his confidence; he! he does not publish his ways and means in the market-place.

* In a work, the "Conclusion" of which obtained, perhaps, too little notice from English readers—"Le Rhin." Though somewhat extravagant (as too many productions of the same genius), and overloaded with historical and antiquarian verbiage, that political treatise contained much matter for meditation—on the fas est et ab hoste principle, if for no other reason.

Such, then, being, as we doubt not but it is, the main object of French and Napoleonean ambition, it is worth while to examine by what alliances it may be attempted to effect it; for that it will be attempted singly, is a supposition which, as we have said, we cannot entertain.

Two remarkable incidents lately occurred about the same time: the visit of an Austrian Emperor to the Prussian capital, and the appearance of the brochure that made so much ado—"Les Limites de la France." We call the latter a remarkable circumstance; for though we are aware that the book was officially disavowed and repudiated, we guess at what value such discountenance is to be taken; and we, nevertheless, hold the sentiments of the pamphlet to express the fundamental principles of French external policy. Its appearance was a striking confirmation to us of the opinion we have long entertained, viz., that the idea of the natural frontier is never extinct in the Gallic mind.

Now, in that brochure (which, however, we are not going to analyse), it is distinctly declared that the how and the when of the conquest of those frontiers form the secret of the statesmen of France —"le secret des hommes d'Etat." The appearance of the pamphlet almost coincidently with the Austrian visit to Berlin, we call remarkable; for the latter circumstance is, and perhaps justly, held to be a pledge of the renewal of the Austro-Prussian alliance; the which, backed up and fortified by that of the great empire of the north, would seem to defy the success—or even the attempt—of any method of conquest that the "Secret des hommes d'Etat de la France" could possibly harbour for eventual disclosure.

In looking at this state of things, and at the principal European powers, whose interests would be affected—favourably or the reverse—by an augmentation of territory to France—(it is, indeed, difficult to name a state in Europe whom the increase of French power would not in some degree influence)—we are naturally led to ask, by what means, by what alliances, or what transaction, could such augmentation be brought about?

Waiving politeness, we will begin with ourselves. That England sincerely desires peace there can be no doubt for a moment. That the alliance—or, at least, the entente cordiale, between herself and her neighbour outre-manche preserves, in the main, the peace of Europe, it is not necessary to go back to the days of the Regency of Orleans to prove. The history of many years preceding '48 is there to attest—that a good understanding between the two great powers of the West, serves as a check upon any undue projects of two at least of the three great Northern Powers, cannot be questioned. But it is only on condition of abnegation, on the part of France, of its lust of conquest, that such alliance, or such amicable relations can subsist. Abstinence from territorial aggrandizement is the basis of those friendly relations—the guarantee for their continuance. Any attempt at the "natural boundaries," a step into the Rhenish Provinces, a foot planted on the soil of Belgium, and all is over with the entente cordiale. The influence and the interests of England are too deeply concerned in the matter. There needs no dwelling upon this. It is sufficient to remind our islanders of the phrase of one who knew something of the value of positions—"Avec Anvers," said the first French Emperor, "je tiens un pistolet chargé sur le cœur de l'Angleterre."

British alliance, therefore, is altogether out of the question with the view of regaining the desired frontiers. Whatever may be the secret des hommes d'Etat de la France for the acquisition of the coveted territories, we will venture to affirm that the co-operation, or even the consent, of this country forms no part of it. For we defy the ingenuity of any Drouyn de Lhuys, or of the most active, plotting, resourceful, wonder-working Persigny, to devise any compensation that should buy off the opposition of England to those projects. There is no imaginable sop of sufficient magnitude or lusciousness to stop the mouth of the British lion (not only our old Protectionist friend—but the real roarer), on such an occasion.

But, as we cannot entertain the idea that the projects in question would be attempted in the face of the other Great Powers, and as the concurrence of Great Britain is not to be thought of, to what means can French statesmen or French emperors have recourse for the execution of the ambitious design? Will they repeat the old game of the earlier Revolution—arouse, or abet the spirit of nationality in Italy, and so paralyse, or at least occupy, Austria in that quarter? But they garrisoned Rome in the interest of reaction. Will they promote a new outbreak in Hungary? But they refused the chief of the late insurrection a passage through France. Will they call upon Poland, who, as Beranger sings—to rise against her partitionists? Poland, the cajoled of Buonaparte, the abandoned of Louis Philippe! We doubt the response to the call. Will they strengthen themselves with Spain?* and hold out to that creditable kingdom the conquest of the co-peninsular country, which, says the author of "Les Limites," is to Spain what Belgium is to France? A frail reed this, and one which a blast of the breath of Britain would bend and sweep away.

"tant de fois a pour eux combattu,"

But a good deal of this would be very like parts of the old story of the great war. And then, in the phrase of one of their own imperial scribes, after the Coup d'Etat of December: "tout serait

* A striking expression appeared lately in the Journal des Débats. "La France," said Mons. St. Mark Girardin, whose signature was affixed to the article, "n'est faible en Europe que lorsqu'elle a l'Espagne pour ennemie." And, coincidence-striking as the expression itself, this appeared the same day that the Patrie announced the project of Louis Napoleon's marriage.

à recommencer." That is to say, that the forces of the great monarchies of Europe, brought to united action by common danger, would probably have to be again directed against France. We question if it is in the secret des hommes d'état of that nation to draw on such an eventuality.

No! the chances for France of executing her schemes of territorial extension are, and are only, as we believe, in a division of the formidable triple alliance that stands in front of her—call it a coalition, if you will; but a defensive one. The present attitude of those three great Continental Powers, seems to forbid aggression upon any one of them without having to do with all three. But the duration of alliances depends upon many circumstances subject to change. The death of a sovereign or of a minister, a different temperament, a different view of interests, a fresh personality, in fact, or a new passion, a cross, or a caprice, may bring an alteration. The history of the last century affords examples enough of these girations. The demise of Prince Schwartzenberg the other day offers, there can be no doubt, an instance in point.

A possible alliance, then, for France—a speculative one, if the term suit better—is the question to be affronted. Among the constituents of the triple alliance, which, according to our judgment, she must divide, before she can hope to possess herself of the coveted limits, we will commence with the nearest—with the guard at her gate. What, if she could bribe the sentinel set to watch her? To convert the natural enemy into the ally would be a dexterous stroke of policy, no doubt. By the natural enemy of France, on the Continent, we mean Prussia—the enemy by position: and the word "natural," has at all events as much meaning here, as when applied to French frontiers. We call Prussia the natural enemy of France—since the treaties of 14-15, she has become so. For the territorial arrangements of that day transferred in a great measure the rivalry and antagonism with France from Hapsburg to Hohenzollern. Austria, no longer the head of a German empire, nor caring to resume her Belgic provinces—the two points upon which she came, mediately, or immediately, in contact with France—was left with a diminished concern in the defence of that frontier she had signed away from the empire at Luneville, and with her interest mainly concentrated on the conservation of those augmented Italian possessions, for which she cheerfully parted with the more remote plains of Brabant and Flanders. The broad shield of Brandenburg was now thrown over those fair lands, where the mitres of ecclesiastical electors had before yielded a weak and an uncertain protection. A new, and assuredly not a less, formidable opponent was confronted with French ambition on that side; and Prussian interest, and Prussian military honour, were at once involved in the defense of the rive gauche. And a masterpiece of policy this was considered. Chateaubriand exclaims against Talleyrand for being duped to support Saxony against Prussia, at the Congress, instead of consenting to the total absorption of the former state by the latter, and thus, probably, causing the left bank of the Rhine to fall to the lot of a power less capable of maintaining the fair domains. "Chef-d'œuvre," says Victor Hugo, speaking of this Rhenish dotation of Prussia, and which he calls the work of Anglo-Russian policy, "chef-d'œuvre de haine, de ruse, de discorde, et de calamité; mais chef-d'œuvre."* To obtain, therefore, the cession of that splendid investiture, a sufficient bribe must of course be offered. For the loss of the provinces on this side the Rhine, the annexation of other territories presenting an equivalent, "and something more," might be held out to Prussia. Hanover, and Saxony, and Brunswick, and Oldenburg, and Hesse-Electoral, and eke of Ducal a moiety; not to mention Mecklenburgs twain, nor Nassau perched expressly to be pounced upon, nor the little labyrinth of Thuringian States, grouped in admired disorder—there is compensation in abundance, it is only l'embarras du choix. In fact, Prussia might be bid to carve out what she liked north of the Maine. Even the ancient and steadfast friend of France, Denmark, might be thrown overboard, and Holstein delivered up to swell the sovereignty of the Hohenzollerns. And if the struggle for this transference of dominion could be confined to Prussia, backed by France, on the one hand, and all the German powers together, with gallant little Denmark on the other, the result would, we fear, be scarcely doubtful. But so audacious an attempt would inevitably bring into the field England, Russia, and Austria, in alliance together. We cannot believe that the Muscovite would, by temptations in another quarter, be induced to join the Franco-Prussian league. It rather appears to us that the apprehension of Prussian aggrandisement, away from or on the other side of the Rhine, bringing with it a tendency and an impulse towards greater consolidation on the Russian frontier, and the view of a possible future reclamation of the German provinces of the Russian empire—Livonia, Courland, would tend to throw the weight of that power into the other scale. The meditated consolidation of Russian sway beyond the Danube, might be meditated in vain—the maintenance of the conquest be regarded as insecure, if the erection of a really formidable power on the flank of the Russian Empire were the price to be paid for it. Let us not suppose that the idea of three great empires—a French to the Rhine, a Prussian to be extended over Germany, and a Muscovite to reach from the Neva to the Dardanelles, would caress the fancy of the Czars. The division, the piece-mealing of Germany, is the strength of Russia. In any important augmentation of Prussian dominion, that condition of Germany would run a too serious risk of ultimate disappearance, to be gratifying to the politicians of St. Petersburgh. Against any such contingency as the unity or the consolidation of a German nation, the Slavonic element, that formidable weapon in the hands of Russia, would have to be put in motion. A war of races—that war so often described by speculative politicians, would then be the practical policy of that power. What would become of Austria in the crush, it is scarcely worth while to enquire. For, indeed, the alliance of that empire with Great Britain and Russia, though in such circumstances as we are contemplating, Austria would certainly join those powers, both from a sense of danger to itself, and from its natural jealousy of Prussia; the alliance, we say, of Austria would not be of so much account as some, from traditional associations, might be disposed to consider it. And if the success of Russia against a thorough Prusso-Gallic alliance depended (as it seems to us it would depend) upon the impulsion to be communicated to the great Slavonic family, it is difficult to see in what respect Austria, whose chief population is of that race, would be ultimately a gainer by that alliance—into which, however, in all probability, its jealousy of Prussia, if nothing else, would have driven it.

Such, then, we hold to be the riposte, the counter-combination to a Franco-Prussian compact —the alliance of Great Britain and Russia, and the junction of Austria and the secondary Kingdoms of Germany to that alliance. In the event of success attending the Borusso-Gallic arms, then the partial subjugation of transrhenane Germany to the Prussian Crown, or (supposing France to be willing to go to the greatest lengths for its ally), the entire subjugation; and in that case a prospective war of races. In the event of failure, the abasement of the counterpoise to Austrian supremacy in Germany, but the renewed and confirmed pressure and preponderance of Russian influence in that great country. No attractive picture this, it should seem. Would Prussia purchase the French alliance at the price of the equivocal permanent advantages, and the not uncertain risks, near and remote? We shall have another word to say upon this point before we have done.

From the incidental glance we have given at the probable conduct, and probable accidents of Austria under the circumstances of an alliance between Prussia and France, we may take occasion to consider another possible combination—the alliance of Austria herself with the latter power. We may imagine the revival of ideas supposed to have been those of the late Austrian Minister, Schwartzenberg, whose policy seemed to propose to itself these two ends, the abasement of the Prussian monarchy, and the emancipation of his own country from the galling patronage and protection of the great Autocrat of the north. To realize these views a French alliance alone could serve as a foundation. Let us see upon what terms such an alliance could be effected.

There is a mémoire addressed by Chateaubriand, during his embassy at Rome, to M. de la Fenonnays, then Minister of Foreign Affairs, in France. In that document, the vain—but with all his egotism, and all his little foibles, let us add with pleasure, the illustrious Viscount, discussing the affairs of the East, at that moment the question occupying the great European cabinets, emits an opinion, in our judgment, too absolute. "L'Angleterre et l'Autriche," he says, "ont des intérêts communs; elles sont naturellement alliées pour leurs politique extérieure, quelles que soient d'ailleurs les différentes formes de leur gouvernements, et les maximes opposées de leur politique intérieure." As regards the Turkish Empire, this dictum may have some foundation; but, when he proceeds, as he does, to say, that neither Austria, nor England would ever consent to the resumption by France of the left bank of the Rhine, we must be allowed to think that the else-sagacious politician is forgetting the altered state of things, and looking at the actual territorial arrangements too much from the point of view of another century—from the times of the Holy Roman Empire and of Austrian domination in Flanders. We have said that by the Treaties of '14-15, the ancient antagonism of France and Austria was considerably attenuated. Instead of existing in full vigour upon many points, it was confined, in any striking degree, to one. The German frontier and the Belgic barrier concerned Austria but indirectly and secondarily since then—Italy was left as the theatre for future strife between the two powers—as, indeed, it had been of old; but now left almost singly as the field of rivalry, and certainly with immense preponderance in favour of Austrian ascendancy. Nay, more; by the necessitated antagonism of France and Prussia, induced by that chef-d'œuvre of Russo-Britannic policy of which our friend Hugo speaks, an indirect means was prospectively afforded to Austria of embarrassing, perhaps of humbling her great German rival—means which would probably be duly appreciated whenever a favourable opportunity should coincide with a violent access of jealousy; whenever a statesman of the genus Schwartzenberg should arise to inspire the policy of the Hapsburgs. Any deduction from Prussian sovereignty, any humiliation of Prussian power and influence, would be a welcome contingency, provided it could be effected with concomitant security to the Austrian dominions out of Germany. Nothing could be more flattering to those who have not even yet abandoned the associations, or forgotten the traditions of the old Imperial German Crown. Let French co-operation, open or underhand, or French sanction, or even French neutrality in Italian questions be secured to Austria, and it may well be questioned whether her German patriotism would go the length of maintaining by arms the German dominions of the House of Brandenburg. A French garrison in Rome, for instance, whilst apparently disputing Austrian influence in the Italian peninsula, might, we shrewdly suspect, be really playing into her hands—whilst ostensibly curbing the excesses of the revolutionary spirit, it might, in reality, be suppressing the outbreak of a fresh national movement.

By the change of conditions we have alluded to, as operated by the Treaties of '15, the "natural" alliance for England has passed to other hands. For a long while the "Emperor" and the British Sovereign were reciprocally indebted for assistance in the work of restraining the ambition of France. But the growth of another monarchy in Germany diminished the need of such assistance to one of the parties interested: and, perhaps, the future substitution for the Austrian alliance to this country of that of a rising military power, was not unforeseen by the genius that inspired the councils of Britain during the Seven Years' War. At all events, the altered relations of the House of Hapsburg to Germany, by the cessation of the latter as an Empire, and still more the separation of the Flanders from the Austrian monarchy, rendered the perils against which the alliance of that House with England had subsisted, less common to both of the parties, and consequently reduced the need of their common action. And so, we repeat, after the settlement of 1815, whatever may be thought of the "old," there was comparatively little left of the "natural"—or "necessary"—between us and our Imperial ally of the Danube. The latter epithets became due, and were virtually transferred to him who guarded the Rhine, and propped the Netherlands. And what in the last century was called the "*un*natural alliance" between the Courts Schœnbrunn and Versailles, no longer, in our opinion, would wear so strange a character; especially now (though we do not wish here to enter upon questions of government), especially, we say, since the installation in France of a régime, certainly not calculated to excite much alarm to the statesmen of Vienna on the score of liberalism. We assert, then, that an Austro-Franc alliance would not, as the territorial constitution of Europe stands by the Peace of 1815, be so unnatural a conjunction as formerly. For, it appears to us, that in the degree in which the former Power has lost its common interest with England (by cessation of its contact with Western Europe through the Belgic provinces); and in the degree in which it has lost its great interest in the integrality of German territory, in the same degree it has been drawn to France. For, if Italy still remains as a field for rivalry, Italy is a matter of less concern to French ambition than the Belgic provinces and the Rhenish frontier; and of these, the former is of no concern to Austria, and the latter, if lost to Germany—in whose entirety Austria has now a diminished interest—would be lost to a rival of the House of Hapsburg. And if, as is to be presumed, the weight and influence of that House would be increased proportionately to the loss sustained by its rival of Brandenburg, is it—we repeat the question — to be believed that the German would so preponderate over the Austrian patriotism in the councils of Vienna, as to induce that power to aid in maintaining its rival in possession of a German territory with a population of upwards of two millions?

It is true, that a different view may be, and according to the resent appearances is taken, of Austrian interests—viz., that a close defensive alliance between Austria and Prussia, supported by their gigantic neighbour of the north, would ensure the status quo of their respective possessions; and that the weight of entire Germany would thus be thrown against France, whether an attack from that nation should come on the side of the Rhine or of the Alps. It is, however, the possible disruption of existing alliances that we are considering.

And here, we may remark, that of the so-called Five Great Powers of Europe, two are maintained in that position by something else than their own inherent resources. The two military monarchies of Central Europe are, we hesitate not to affirm, respectively insufficient to themselves for the purposes of protection. Of the other three the reverse is the case. That the vast Empire of Russia suffices to itself in this respect, it needs but the mention of 1812 to prove. That an aggression upon France — upon solid, compact, united France—could be successfully attempted by anything short of combined Europe, no one supposes. That England, with due application of her means and resources, can answer for her own protection, we have no doubt. But very different is the state of things as regards Prussia and Austria; especially the latter. Prussia, by its strange and disjointed structure, exposed to attack on its points of contact with three of the other great Continental Powers, must support itself on one or other of those powers in case of aggression from either or both of the other two; must veer in its alliances according to the quarter more immediately menaced. An hereditary antagonism lies over against it on the side of Silesia, a territorial craving on that of the Rhine, a controlling and cumbrous domination on that of the Niemen. Accordingly, its motives of rapprochement alternate also. Impatience of Russian ascendancy must incline it to support itself on French alliance; fear of France must drive it to seek shelter under Russia; apprehension of these two combined, must induce it to draw closer the bands of German Union with Austria; whilst, again—penalty of the partition—its share in the crime of Polish dismemberment ties its hands, and fetters the independent action of its policy in reference to its two accomplices. But with Austria the weakness of the case is still more patent. There is scarcely a province, we had almost said, of its wide-spread empire which it may not fear to see snatched away from it, not only in the event of active instigation, but even of passive encouragement, or abstinence from interference from without. Excepting trusty Tyrol and the hereditary Duchies, of the steadfast allegiance, of what part of the monarchy can the sovereigns of the Hapsburg race feel secure? Its own Lombardo-Venetian—nay, half the Italian peninsula—is ready, from day to day, to burst into a blaze. Spontaneously, it may burst out at any moment, and in the face of all the engines arrayed to quench the conflagration. The shadow of a shade of encouragement from without, and all that stirred in '48 and '49 would be in motion again in an instant—only with more envenomed hostility and desire of vengeance deepened by intermediate suffering.

In Hungary is everlasting danger: for of the two principal elements, there, in presence of each other, the ascendancy of the Slavonic race ensures the discontent, and, when occasion serves, the revolt of the Magyar: the ascendancy of the latter, the disaffection of the former. The one, without the crushing weight of Russia thrown into the scale against it, has already shown itself capable of perilling the throne of Hapsburg-Lorraine: the other might substitute the ties of kindred for those of loyalty, and seek a refuge or a redress in the great family of which it is, ethnologically, a member. Then, again, the sentiment of Slavonic nationality in the enormous majority of that race in Bohemia; and which certainly would not indispose it to follow the fortunes of its once sister-kingdom—and add still, Galicia and its Poles; and the materials for dismemberment of the Austrian monarchy must be visible to the merest observer—the almost universal, and almost daily peril of that curiously constructed and unnatural empire. With all this, and with all its antecedents, so pregnant, as they have been, with imminent catastrophe, "cette vieille maison d'Autriche," as was said by one who himself dealt it a few rude blows, "ne meurt jamais."

The indication we have thus given of its internal dangers sufficiently establishes the need to Austria of support from without. A moral support, a material forbearance, are the very last it can require; for its own safety, from the Powers interested respectively in the different parts of its monarchy—interested respectively, and interested according to circumstances, in the conservation or dismemberment of those parts. It is the strange property of the Austrian Empire that any of its allies may almost as easily or naturally become its enemies; any of its enemies its allies. Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Turkey—even Bavaria—may, according to changing accidents, be ranged with it, or against it. If it be said, that all the other principal Powers are subject to a change of alliance, and that their mutual attraction or repulsion must depend upon events, and upon the general state of the Balance of Power, we grant it. But still, we assert that of no European power does this mutability form the differential character as so markedly of Austria: not even in the case of Prussia, who can, at all events, count upon a certain fund of nationality, upon a certain radical sentiment—a more definite and determinate rallying-point for uniting a people. If, then, such is the state of Austria, for and by reason of its internal constitution; if, in fact, it is insufficient to defend itself against itself, what must be its single inefficiency against aggression from another power?—and, further still, what must it be for the purposes of ambition, conquest, and aggrandizement? Self-preservation (and that, with difficulty) would seem to be of necessity its sole business. The policy of Metternich through so long a series of years—the policy of propping up and conserving the status quo—would appear to be the one obligatory on the statesmen of that ever periclitating Monarchy. Après moi le déluge, the well-known expression of the policy of that veteran of imperial councils, haply contained to his mind as much of foreboding as of insouciance. And something very like a deluge did break in upon the imperial edifice, and swept him from the spot before his time for disappearance in the course of nature. But lo, another minister arose, who seemed to meditate something more than preservation; who with two rebellions only just quelled (and one of them by foreign assistance) in the dominions of his master, seemed to aspire to further domination and extension; plotted aggression in the midst of defence; and was strongly suspected of leaning to a new alliance, by whose aid he might at once triumph over rival pretensions in Germany, and shake off the onerous obligations he writhed under on the side of Russia. There is no saying to what the arrogant and reckless ambition of a Schwartzenberg might have conducted the projects of Austria. A minister, confident as he was in a policy of audacity and overbearing, confident in the support of Southern Germany at least, seeking the alliance of France—as a guarantee for the immobility of Italy—might, in his impatience of instability, apprehensive of the dangers of inaction, launch into plans of aggrandizement, and desperately emperil the existence of the Monarchy in attempts to restore its ancient grandeur. We witnessed a specimen of his grandiose ideas in the attempt to annex Hungary to the German Confederation. It is true, that this proposal met with opposition from France, amongst others: but had that audacious minister lived, or should another such arise, and should the circumstances of the moment favour a rapprochement to France, might not that project be revived, and the consent of France be purchased by the—as far as Austria is concerned—permitted annexation by the former of the coveted provinces of the left bank? That is the condition which must and would be stipulated for by France in consideration of any aid to Austrian ambition, and of connivance at Austrian supremacy in Italy.

Let us suppose a change in Austrian counsels—a return to the ideas of Prince Schwartzenberg, and those pushed to attempts of enormous magnitude in an alliance with France. Seconded by that ally, the designs of Austria might stretch beyond an augmentation of its own influence and superiority in Germany—might be carried to the length of a partial dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire, to the definitive exclusion of Russia in the spoil. Price of the Rhenish Provinces, to be detached from Germany, the possession of Bosnia and Servia might be revindicated;* Albania appropriated; and thus a formidable barrier raised to Russian entrance to the Mediterranean, whether by the Bosphorus or by the Adriatic. Nay, the attempt might be made, however late in the day, and therefore difficult,* to possess itself of Moldavia and Wallachia, and thus withdraw those Principalities from Russian patronage. What, if a minister should spring up in Vienna who should opine that there would be as much for Austria to gain by holding Italy with the connivance of France and aggrandizing itself to the detriment of Russian influence, whilst at the same time the possessions of its German rival should suffer diminution—as much, we say, to gain by this, as by holding Italy against France by the support of Russia, but itself undergoing the patronage and feeling the weight of the latter Power; whose ambitious designs upon the Ottoman Empire, moreover, it would be forbidden to thwart; whilst at the same time the rival of the House of Hapsburg, in Germany, should at least maintain its position of equality, and be still, as now, disposed and capable to dispute supremacy in every question of German interest? It is not, we conceive, beyond possibility that a statesman of Austria should entertain such views as these; and though, as far as the retention of the Austro-Italian possessions is concerned, we should not be disposed to regard such views as very long-sighted, seeing that the other objects of the two allies being answered, viz., the annexation of Rhenish and Danubian provinces respectively, Italy would necessarily become again the theatre for their contending interests; still an open contest with its mighty neighbour, a contest aided by France, and undertaken in the hope of definitively arresting the march of Muscovite progress on the Danube, and of liberating Austrian rulers from their state of dependence, and two-thirds of the Austrian monarchy from its constant exposure to the intrigues of the great head of the Slaves—a contest, with these objects, and by these means, might, we repeat, to a daring and ambitious politician, present at least so much attraction as a contest with France for Italy, only to be hopefully maintained by the aid of that very power whose patronage alone, if nothing else, would be impairing the prestige of the monarchy on another side. Nay, it might be preferred even to a common action with that power in attempts upon the integrality of the Turkish empire, and to a scheme of co-partition in which we must be permitted to doubt whether the Lion's share would be the Austrian portion.

* They were in part ceded to the Emperor Charles VI. by the Peace of Passarowitz, and held by him for about twenty years.

And here it may be thought that we have improperly taken exception at the assertion of Chateaubriand, that "l'Angleterre et l'Autriche ont des intérêts communs;" and that by an alliance between France and Austria this country would be placed in a difficulty, by finding itself hostile to the projects of the former upon the cisrhenane provinces; while disposed, as regards its anti-Russian movement, to those of the latter. A distinction, however, must be carefully noted. It is true that neither England nor Austria particularly desires to see the Russian eagle swoop upon the minarets of the Bosphorus. It is true that the two have a common interest in barring the road to Constantinople before those hordes, who are ever ready to march to that magnificent conquest. But between the protection of Turkey from Russian aggression and the appropriation of any of its provinces by another neighbour, there is a very intelligible difference; and, although, under certain circumstances, Great Britain might be disposed to regard with favour the territorial interposition of another power between the Muscovite and the Mussulman on the Danube, we question very much the promotion of British interests by a further extension of Austrian territory along the eastern coast of the Adriatic.

But, after all, the alliance we have spoken of—that of France and Austria—would not alarm us above measure, however ambitious its views. For, in truth, we believe that it would be more specious than formidable. Sufficient means of resistance, we venture to think, would be at the disposal of the parties threatened. Great Britain, Russia, and Prussia are not states to be overridden in a campaign, nor are their means of action upon the European system so weak or so limited as to be paralysed or exhausted by the combined efforts of the other two "great powers." There would still be more than one côté foible in an Austro-Franc combination. In Italy, always open along its extensive coast to the action of England, a patriotism might be aroused, or rather might be seconded, which, even despite the union of ancient adversaries for the oppression of that country, might embarrass, at any rate, and haply, adequately occupy the occupiers. The spirit that breathed in the strenuous resistance of Rome to the French besiegers, is not, we imagine, so utterly extinct. The least reverse to the allied arms of France and Austria, and many a mute Ciceroacchio would speak out, many an embryo Garibaldi burst into life and action. The contest would be one of fearful odds against Italian patriotism, no doubt; but the hatred inciting to the contest would be intense: for, let not the French flatter themselves that in any other character than that of liberators they are welcome to the Italians. Italy has now imbibed another spirit than that of the days when a substitution of one foreign domination for another was all it looked for, or a partnership of oppression the only refuge from a single tyranny. Then, again, those states of Germany upon whose blind adhesion Austria would conceive she could count, might, whatever their jealousy of Prussian influence and soreness at Prussian pretensions, not exactly throw themselves under the chariot-wheels of Hapsburg. Bavaria, for instance (who, moreover, would have to be compensated for the cession to France of the Rhenish Palatinate*) might fancy, we suspect, that its better game were to

* Late, indeed, and difficult indeed! It is astonishing the opportunities that Austria has lost, the chances she has thrown away, the openings she has wilfully shut her eyes against. Some of these were ably glanced at by the author of the "Future of Austria," a few years ago—Baron Adrian, the Envoy in London, of the short-lived Reichsverweser.

* This, too, would be a curious question incidentally, and which we beg to recommend to amateurs of political map-making play off the two great houses against each other, and thus maintain to itself an importance, which the decided ascendancy of either of them would immediately efface.

Poland, too, which at a former day might have been an engine turned against the Russian by both Austria and France,* would now rather serve against them both. And that, first by reason of its hatred to the Germans, and to Austria in particular, and, secondly, by reason of its resentment, desertion, and cajollery at the hands of France. There are two effects of the great crime of the last century—the partition of Poland—that can scarcely escape the notice of any observer. One, that the influence of Russia overshadows Germany; the other, that the participation in the crime, and, of course, the desire to preserve its own portion, hinders either of the German despoilers from attempting to re-erect a state which would be now so serviceable as a shield to both of them. These effects might have been prevented in 1814-15; but the opportunity passed away. And it is singular that Austria, who then manifested some desire in that direction, and who, originally was the least criminal of the three, should now be, as she undoubtedly is, the most detested by the Polish race. The arms of that race would be more willingly turned against Hapsburg at the bidding of Romanzou, than against the latter at the tardy and suspicious summons of the former, even though repeated by the voice and supported by the sword of France. We may deplore such a consummation, but we cannot conceal from ourselves that the absorption of all the partitions into the Muscovite empire is a more probable consummation for the gallant and unfortunate Polish nation, than either the separate retention of their shares by its partitionists, or the recovery of its entire independence.

With these remarks, which, however, do not exhaust the topic, on the chief attackable points in an alliance of France with Austria, we dismiss the consideration of such a contingency, without serious apprehension at the danger should it ever arise.

A more alarming combination, far more than either of those we have touched upon, would be that division of the triple alliance of the north which remains to be spoken of—a division which should separate Russia from its two German allies, and attach it to France. Such an occurrence may seem—may be—remote: present appearances may not be in its favour. But, as we observed in the outset, our times have afforded sufficient instances of unexpectedness realised; history furnishes examples enough of extraordinary combinations and alliances, eccentric from their orbit, to warrant speculation upon a possible state of things not in correspondence with the actual. There is, however, nothing so very novel in the idea of an alliance between France and Russia. We know that the fact existed under Napoleon; and we know how the union came to be dissolved. The danger with which such a conjunction threatened Europe was then counteracted by the inordinate ambition of one of the parties—ambition, which, menacing a greater danger, roused a more extensive resistance, and ultimately converted the accomplice into an enemy. A Russian alliance was the rève of politicians devoted to the elder Bourbons; and the Orleans, with all the parade of the entente cordiale, would, we doubt not, have sacrificed it at any moment for the friendship of the Czar. Under the restoration, a writer we have more than once alluded to did not hesitate to declare that all the interests of France point to an alliance with Russia, as the preferable one among the great powers; and although this opinion was given while treating the question in agitation in 1828, similar reasons may still be urged, while the relative territorial condition of the powers remains the same—so long as the same temptations to alteration and aggrandizement exist; so long, in fact, as the "natural limits" are unattained, and the Ottoman Empire undismembered. We do not think that certain changes which have taken place since that opinion was advanced by M. de Chateaubriand, the foundation of the kingdoms of Greece and Belgium (no, nor even the establishment of French sovereignty in Algeria), are calculated to lessen the possibility, or invalidate in the eyes of French or Russian politicians the advantages to both of such an alliance. Let us try to examine, then, the grounds of this conjectural conjunction; its inducements to the supposed contracting parties, and what it would have to encounter at the hands of other European governments.

A half-grave, half-facetious friend of ours, a gentleman past the meridian of ordinary human life, who pursues politics with an appetite for the tremendous, something akin to that of the individual who followed the representation of Van Amburg, in expectation of the hour when the lions would devour their master; this "old and excellent" friend of ours is wont to express his desire that his days may be prolonged until the taking of Constantinople (he does not say by whom) and the break up of the Ottoman Empire. "I should like," he says, "to see the great débâcle that will then take place." Great débâcle, indeed! for the day of the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire must, will assuredly, be the day for a general shock of clashing interests: the day for the disappearance of the great landmarks of treaties, to be followed by a new configuration of kingdoms.

Without so keen a relish for the gigantic-terrible as our worthy acquaintance just alluded to, we confess that we should be disposed to desire for ourselves survivance of that tremendous epoch to come. Shall we speak the truth, and avow that we are heartily sick of that ever-reopening "Eastern Question?" Frankly; we should like to see it "settled," before the dark day come to us. It may be, that the time of its "settlement" is yet distant; it may be that it is near. The

* By both, we say: for the secret alliance of Great Britain, France and Austria, in February, 1815, had in contemplation the restriction, at all events, of Alexander's exorbitant pretensions upon Poland—another opportunity lost to Austria. But this time, it is true, it was the landing of Napoleon that stopped the proceedings.

dissolution of the Turkish Empire has seemed so often on the point of taking place, and the event has so often disappointed the gapers, that some may look upon the Sublime Porte as a fixture irremovable. The Russians have so frequently been going to go to Constantinople, that when the hour arrives, the alarm may again appear a false one. So many an expedient has tinkered up the infirmities, and propped the tottering fabric of Mussulman rule, that the status quo may seem to some to be the "settlement," after all. We cannot think so. For what, in good sooth, is the meaning of the assertion over and over again repeated, that the maintenance of the Empire of the Sultans in its integrality, is necessary to the Balance of Power? It means nothing but this: that everybody is not ready for its partition. All the parties interested are not agreed upon the distribution of the spoils. Let some political enchanter, some diplomatic Deus ex machina, operate such agreement, and we shall hear no more of the indispensibility of the Turks to the peace of the European world. It is not, we apprehend, any sentimental weakness for the Koran, a sympathy with seraglios, a penchant for polygamy, or for bowstrings, a taste for turbans or horsetails, that lurks behind the councils of cabinets, and that will retard the downfall of the Mahommedan abomination.

But whatever causes may have hitherto averted the evil day of the successors of Mahomet II., however the mutual jealousies of European governments may combine to prolong the existence of Turkey, we, for our part, see in that very circumstance an earnest of its eventual destruction. The dismemberment of Turkey appears to us one of those events, of which, like many an one in private life, men disguise to themselves the realization, because they fear it. They feel that it must arrive, and therefore veil it to their eyes. They even affect at times a sort of incredulity; just as men, for the most part, unwillingly contemplate that "necessary evil," which "will come when it will come."

We may be charged with political fatalism; but, nevertheless, this is our conviction—that there are certain eventualities, the constant and deep-rooted apprehension of which is a very guarantee for their fulfilment; and foremost of these we rank the dismemberment of the Empire of the Ottomans.

The dismemberment of Turkey! Event easily foreseen in the main; but difficult, indeed, of arrangement in its details. Well may European statesmen shrink from contemplating it closely. There go too many words to that bargain to have it concluded out of hand. The assignment of Moldavia and Wallachia is obvious enough: that of Servia and Bosnia might not present great obstacles. But who is to push his frontier to the Balkan? Is any to do so—and go no further? Who is to have Egypt, and Tunis, and Tripoli? Who Candia, la reine de l'Archipel? Who the great prize of the lottery, the "gemini janua vasta maris?" And what is to be done for the Lieux Saints, a source of moral influence in the East not likely to be overlooked?

Now, to the question of that dismemberment, partial or entire, we hold the question of the Rhenish frontier to be closely and necessarily attached. The limites naturelles are the prime price that could purchase the consent of France to any appropriation by other powers, of the provinces of European Turkey. We do not say they are the only price, but the chief, the sine quâ non. To those who might suggest Egypt as an adequate bait for French ambition, we would recall the fact that the treaties of Leoben and Campo Formio preceded the expedition of General Buonaparte to that country.* And had not Mons. Thiers' pugnacious propensities shrunk before the union of the parties to the Treaty of July, 1840, there cannot be much doubt but that, though the Turco-Egyptian affair would have been the occasion of the rupture, the blow would have been struck by France on the Rhine. This was felt in Germany, as we all remember; and the song, which on steamboats and in schnellposts, in salles à manger and stabes, in drawing-rooms and drinking-boats, has belaboured our ears ever since—sie sollen ihn nicht haben—dates from that critical juncture.

We may confidently, then, assert, that the first stipulation on the part of France for an alliance with Russia, would be an extension of its own European territory to the north and east. And the demands of the former would probably, and naturally enough, be regulated by the latitude to be allowed to the latter. For instance, for the annexation by the Czars of the Danubian principalities, Belgium might content our meek and modest neighbours of the Seine; for a further extension of Russian rule—say, to the Balkan—the Bavarian Palatinate, and the Prussian Rhenish province south and east of the Moselle might be accepted as an additional instalment; for the occupation of Constantinople by the Muscovite, the remaining territory (Prussian and Dutch) on this side the Rhine. And this, at the least.

For, we may ask, would even the entire possession of the left bank satisfy France for the acquisition to Russia of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles? The acquisition of Constantinople by the successor of Catherine! Why, the other Napoleon would not listen to the thing for a moment, even when his sway was not bounded by the limites naturelles. In vain the "Greek of the Lower Empire" tried to persuade him that Constantinople would only be a provincial town of the vast dominion, whose capital was St. Petersburgh. It was of "no use" Alexander's, "knocking at that door." The exclamation of the French Emperor shows in what light he regarded the possession of the famous city. "Constantinople!" he replied, to the desire of the Russian, "jamais! c'est l'empire du monde!"†

* It is true that the Congress of Rastadt sat during the expedition to Egypt. But the cession of the rive gauche had been already agreed to, and that congress was, mainly, to discuss the terms of compensation to Austria and other German Powers.

† "L'influence sur la Méditerranée dépend de l'influence sur la Porte; je ne l'aurai, cette influence, qu'en de-

Supposing, however, that in addition to the Rhenish boundary line, an alliance of Russia with France should consent to assign Egypt to the latter, as a share of Ottoman spoil. But to this assignment there are two drawbacks: one on the side of France, the other, of Russia. In the first place, the consent of Russia might not be held equivalent by France to the acquisition made by the former Power; for the difficulties attending the conquest of Egypt would not only be far greater for France than those attending the conquest of Belgium and the Rhenish boundary, but also far greater than would attach to the conquest of Constantinople by Russia. The Dardanelles are of easier reach to the Muscovite, than is the Delta to the Gaul. Russian Czars might, with comparative ease, march to St. Sophia any day in the week; French Emperors would find (as French captains have found before them), certain monsters on the watery way that lies between them and Alexandria. In the next place, the drawback to Russian advantage in this conceded partition to France, would be the closer approach of a Catholic Power in the East, and the struggle to come hereafter, when, as would indubitably happen, the Greek and Romish interests should come into collision in Palestine and its "Holy Places."

It has been supposed by some, that France would consent to the fall of European Turkey into Russia, or Russian and Austrian hands, upon condition of the re-establishment of Polish independence. Possibly; but would the chief party to the alliance on the other side consent to the stipulation? Certainly not; for to admit the restoration of Poland would be to allow a wedge to be driven into its bulky empire: would render for ever insecure its new acquisitions. It is thought by others, that Tunis and Tripoli would serve the purpose of France. But though the conquest of them would be attended with less difficulty than that of Egypt, their acquisition by France would be, in the eyes of others, only a step to future attempts upon the latter country.

Menacing, then, as would be for the general equilibrium the junction of French and Russian arms, we may question whether that alliance could be formed with full satisfaction to the pretensions of both the contracting parties. For, to balance Constantinople—the great object of the one—the other would insist on the Rhine *at the least; and in that relative appreciation would, perhaps, lie the difficulty.

But, be the compact concluded with or without reference to Egypt, what, in either case, would be the conduct of the other Powers? The attitude of Great Britain is clear enough. Such an alliance could encounter, on her part, nothing but opposition, and that of the most strenuous kind. We can scarcely imagine anything more perilous to her influence and interests. Her two great European rivals leagued together, and with what objects? We have already expressed our conviction that an attempt on Belgium or the Rhine would be the signal for a rupture between France and this country. But, to see our supremacy in the Mediterranean and the Levant doubly menaced, the road to our Indian empire threatened with obstruction by the old hereditary foe! No efforts of which this mighty nation is capable would be spared to avert the accomplishment of such objects as those. But Great Britain alone—we cannot, and must not, disguise it from ourselves—with all her great and varied resources, though the vigour of a Chatham or a Palmerston should direct her energies, could scarcely hope for mastery in the unequal strife. Upon whom then could she count? And of the allies upon whom she might possibly count, what would be the weight and value? We confess we should not look without uneasiness at the prospect. Of states of inferior consideration, the profit to be drawn in this contest, would be small, or the application doubtful. Spain, for instance, listless, apathetic, and powerless for any external effort. Even if she should not regard with favour, or, at all events, with indifference, the struggle for sway in the Mediterranean, the erst victor of Lepanto would be without ability to influence the destinies of the midland sea. To rouse to any effectual effort the languid energies of Islamism, would be—apart from a certain awkwardness attaching to an anti-christian patronage—a hard, and probably a vain endeavour. Upon the resistance to incorporation with France, likely to be opposed by Belgium, we rely with childlike confidence and simplicity.* How deeply the sentiment of a distinct nationality has penetrated that recent kingdom remains yet to be put to the test. Of course its resistance to annexation must depend, in a degree, upon the support it should receive from its natural protectors. Then again, for Holland; the course to be taken by that country, menaced as it would be with the immediate and not over tranquillising vicinity of France, would undoubtedly be regulated upon the course pursued by Prussia. Should the latter consent to any transaction, the former would scarcely stand venant le voisin de l'Empire turc," was the opinion he stated in a subsequent interview with an Austrian negociator, Mons. de Bubna.

"La Russie, maitresse du Bosphore, de Constantinople, et de la Grèce, c'était la monarchie universelle de l'Europe, de l'Asie, et de la Méditerranée."—Lamartine, Restauration. But it is scarcely necessary to heap up testimonies to the importance of yonder positions.

* "Au moins," said the claimant of the rive gauche, in the "Limites de la France." Au moins, without specifying the supplementary desiderata.

* We have under our eyes the Brussels edition of a pamphlet of the day, when the Turco-Greek question was yet undecided. The brochure is by a certain "General Bacon de Richemont, Deputé de l'Allier," who tells us in a preface, that the English "Times" had called him an "old fool." And, àpropos to the author's assertion, that Belgium waited only for a bold step on the part of France in order to throw itself into her arms, the Belgian editor thinks proper to subjoin a note, denouncing the assertion, and appealing against it, both to citizens and soldiers, both of whom are, he says, "inviolably attached to the independence of our happy country, and to the dynasty of Nassau." This was in the year——1829! It is a sensible proverb that says, "il ne faut jurer de rien."

forth as the single Continental champion of Western Europe against French encroachment. Even the encouragement which England is disposed to afford to Italian freedom must depend, in some measure, upon the side to be taken by Austria in the great array of European combatants.

As regards the two great Powers, Austria and Prussia, the line the former might adopt is not after all, we think, of such a very vast importance. Its accession to the Russo-Franc alliance would bring no well-wieldable strength with it; and would scarcely be worth their purchase by a conceded share of the spoil, from which its opposition—unless, indeed, conjointly with Prussia and the rest of Germany—would avail little to debar them. To Austria herself, such adhesion would only bring a temporary security, or a temporary enjoyment, at the best, of the portion of plunder accorded to her. For the radical disorders of that monarchy would not be remedied by any such permissive aggrandization; and the arm of its huge neighbour, ever suspended over it, would only be strengthened for a future blow. On the other hand, neither, we say, would the opposition of Austria to the Franco-Russ designs, be of very great service or account. For that Power, once embarrassed in a war on either side, Italy and Hungary are there ever ready to start away from its grasp. If, indeed, a cordial and thorough union of the German element in its States with that of Prussia, and with the other members of the great Teutonic family, could really take place; if (leaving Italy beside the question) a German union for a truly German object—viz., defence against the two other great races threatening Germany on either side—if this could be counted on, then, it is true, a compact mass might be opposed to the two-fold enemy, and a bold front presented both to Gallic and Muscovite ambition. If any danger could bring to united action the some forty millions that Germany, in her dreams of national unity, loves to number, one would think the threatening aspect of an alliance between the two mighty states which enclose it on either hand would be that peril. But this, we fear, is scarcely to be looked for. Old ambitions, traditional jealousies reviving aspirations, would too probably, as too often before, be at their evil work; and short-sighted views of individual interest would create division where union alone could hope for ultimate safety to all parties. It is under such influences that we hold the accession of Austria to a Russo-Franc alliance a more probable contingency than a counter-movement on its part.

But Prussia? In the Mémoire of Chateaubriand from which we have cited a passage, it is said that an additional recommendation of an alliance between France and Russia is, that it would be an easy matter to induce Prussia to join it by the offer of certain advantages. This, of course, can only mean the offer of indemnification in Germany at the expense of the smaller States, and to the detriment of Austria.* We have already touched that point while speaking of a conjectural alliance between France and Prussia alone. And if the facility of acquisition would now be increased to Prussia by having the Czar for ally instead of opponent, the difficulty of hereafter preserving its acquisitions would be increased also by the enormous and disproportionate aggrandizement of that ally. And to all other considerations may be added this; that, as the future of Prussia would then consist more than ever in taking the lead (as then it would inevitably be at the head) of the German people, it would be questionable how—and we should like to know quo ore?—that Power which had bartered away to the stranger some couple of million of German race and tongue, on the West, and which had resigned, for personal objects, the Rhine, the pride of the nation, could pretend to rally round itself that race for resistance to the Slavonic north and east. We doubt, too, considerably, whatever unpopularity and disfavour Austria should labour under in Germany, whether Prussia would rise in Teutonic estimation, or conciliate Teutonic sympathies towards its views of supremacy, by accepting German spoils and German principalities, at the price of German cessions and German national honour.

We must take leave to insist upon this point; for Prussia is essentially a German power. She is a German power, or she is nothing. Her history (since she had a history of any importance) is full of this fact—with a single exception—and that exception " not only a crime but " (as time tends more and more to prove) " a blunder;" also, the ambition of the Hohenzollerns cannot rightly be said to stray out of Germany. The rising greatness of the royal house, its recent history, its future—all associate it intimately and indivertibly with the German " Fatherland." This cannot be predicated so strictly and simply of the great rival house. Throughout many centuries there have been alliances, pretensions, interests, other than German, which, even when the Austrian wore the Imperial Crown of the country, have, more or less, influenced his policy. Dashes of foreign colour are seen ever and anon in his historical pictures. That Austria should not aid in maintaining the entirety of German territory, that it should let " the left bank" be lopped off from the mass, would be neither unintelligible, nor very surprising, nor perhaps unvenial; but that Prussia should consent to sign away any acre of German soil from Germany, to cut off an arm of the great body, suppress a power of the machine that should be made to work its greatness, this would be both unintelligible and astonishing as to its permanent interests, and unpardonable to its patriotism and its honour.

No! the honour, the pride, and the interest of the House of Brandenburg alike demand from it a firm maintenance of the inalienability of German

* Be it observed, that something more than an equivalent of territory and population must be given to bribe Prussia. A mere equivalent, even though bringing to Prussia greater compactness than it now presents, would not be sufficient to abase Austria in the scale of German power, and to compensate (if indeed anything could compensate) for the loss of the prestige of German patriotism.

soil. Let it beware of offending its own fortune, marring its destinies; beware of alienating the national German sentiment by a too exclusive pursuit of personal objects. Let it take heed lest it incur such a denunciation as that so justly launched against certain "new-born kings," who owed their royalty and their aggrandization to the stranger.

> Woe to them all! but heaviest woe and shame
> To that Bavarian who did first advance
> His banner in accursed league with France—
> First open traitor to a sacred name.

Whatever, then, might be the attitude of Austria with reference to a Gallo-Muscovite alliance, the rôle of Prussia is pointed out to her both by honour and by interest; by principle and by calculation. Should the voice for opposition to a French and Russian combination prevail in the court of Schœnbrunn, then the efforts of united Germany, at any rate (for we will not take into account any other element of the Austrian monarchy) would, we should hope, tell for something in balancing the contest. But let Prussia guard against the temptation, suggested by hereditary rivalry, to take the side opposed to the one of Austrian choice. It could not join a French and Russian alliance, without the sacrifice of its possessions on the rive gauche, while what it might gain in immediate compensation on the rive droite of Rhine or of Elbe, would be lost in moral power, lost in the appreciation of that Germany to the supremacy of which it aspires. The prestige of the House of Brandenburg would be ruined with the German nation—that prestige which has suffered so much already, by the feeble will and unstable policy of '48, and the two following years. For as to Prussian ascendancy in Germany, let not—we must again urge the point—the House of Hohenzollern flatter itself that it is to assist it to found a new empire in its dynasty, that France and Russia would lend their hands. If ever that House is to be the head of Germany, it is by the German nation itself that it must attain that elevation; and the sacrifice of German provinces would be, we humbly opine, a dubious prelude to success in such an ambition.*

But if Austria should accede to the alliance of Russia and France, the duty is still more imperative on Prussia to guard the German soil from violation, and the interest clearer still. All that Hapsburg would lose in national consideration, and in hold on the German people, its rival would gain.

Prussia, then—to place once for all, finally, the situation in its proper light—Prussia, we maintain, has a grand, a paramount interest in preserving to itself and to Germany the provinces west of the Rhine. It has, therefore, an interest in keeping France within her assigned limits—we mean of course with reference to that river; for we have not thought it worth while to allude to Alpine limits, and Savoy is an insignificant item in the great European account. It must, consequently, have an interest in the defence of Belgium, the conquest of which country by French arms could only lead to, and facilitate aggression upon the Prussian cisrhenane territories. But if the most favourable means for France to attempt these objects be —as no incompetent judges have advanced—an alliance with Russia, to that alliance Prussia must find herself opposed; and to the views of both parties to that compact Great Britain is opposed also. By interest, therefore, by position, by principle, Prussia is, obviously and obligatory, the ally of this country. It may, we conceive, be regarded as the necessary, the natural, the morally certain alliance for England; whilst on the other hand we can only look on Austria as the conditional, the accidental, the problematical.

And thus we close our remarks upon the counter-contingencies to that third phase of the conjectural division of the Triple (erst "Holy") Alliance—the junction of the arms of France and Russia.

While we are writing, the affair of Montenegro appears to assume rather grave proportions. Austria is massing troops upon the Turkish frontier; and certain articles, evidently officially inspired, have been given to the world in the Allgemeine Zeitung, that would be very menacing, indeed, could we take them quite au serieux. In one, the downfall of the Ottoman Empire is spoken of as on the point of arriving. "The apple," it is said, "threatens to fall from the tree—the apple of discord for all that has any pretensions to power in Europe." In another, the European portion of that Empire is assigned to its two great neighbours, and a line deliberately drawn from Widden to Salonica, from Salonica to Cape Linguette (below Durazzo), and the included territory coolly claimed for addition to the Illyriac provinces of the sovereignty of Hapsburg. Prussia, and the some-time Zollverein, are invited to welcome this solution, as offering prospective commercial advantages innumerable. And the organs of the cabinet of Vienna take care to assure us that there is a perfect understanding between France and Austria, as well as between the latter and Russia.

We will here take leave to remark that there is no power whose conduct has rendered so difficult the "settlement" of the Turkish Question, as that of this very Austria; none, that is so answerable to Europe for the dangers to which the Ottoman dominions are exposed from Russian ambition. Had Austria, with provident magnanimity, renounced her Italian ambition; had she, instead of seeking to perpetuate an odious domination in that peninsula, boldly advanced her pretensions to guard the line of the Danube; manfully interposed in the principalities, and anticipated the game of Russia; had she adopted a liberal system, and patronized the free and enlightened tendencies which she has uniformly opposed; she might have taken up a position which would at once have extended her own dominions, in compensation for renunciations in Italy, and reassured Europe with regard to the fate of Constantinople. Yes; reassured Europe, we say; for even though her protection of the Sultan should have been purchased by the cession of some of his Danubian provinces, Austria, as the possessor of those provinces, would have been less alarming to the general fears than the other mighty neighbour is now. But now, Austria can no longer play that part—the day is gone by. She may affect to be a protectress of Turkey; but the internal weaknesses of her own Empire are too great to render her protection of any real value. It is a pretension without power. She can now only offer a feeble resistance to the designs of the Czars, or co-operate with them in an illusory participation of plunder, merely serving as a tool to be thrown aside, when its uses are done. She may be admitted by the Muscovite to a share in the spoil for the nonce—only to be stripped of it when the gain of her giant accomplice shall be well established and assured. Her airs of protection, as her threats, are now singly, of little moment; and the statesmen of the Divan must, indeed, possess but an antiquated acquaintance with European affairs, if they do not know the peril to Austria of an aggressive war.

* It has been well remarked by a writer in the "Revue des Deux Mondes" that "Dés le jour où la Prusse, infidéle à toute son histoire, n'est plus l'état libéral de l'Allemagne, et le gardien de certains principes, dès ce jour, l'Autriche reprend ses anciens droits; la souveraineté appartient à la monarchie des Hapsbourg." Let the hint be taken, but with larger application than the Frenchman, perhaps, intended; for we can hardly suppose that he would consent to recommend among the "certains principes," that of fidelity to its trust as guard of the German frontier.

With all her bravado, therefore, addressed to other Continental Powers, and with all her assurance, with all this blunderbuss and thunder, we can change nothing of our opinion—to wit, that Austria, insufficient for self-defence, will not dare to take the initiative in a war of aggression. The recent matter at Milan—mere échauffourée as it was, and speedily repressed—may serve as a warning to her not to be bold over much. As to cajoling Prussia into an acquiescence in Austrian aggrandizement, without an equivalent to itself somewhere; the idea is absurd. With Russia, she may concoct her schemes of partition; but if unconsented to by France—opposed as they would undoubtedly be by England—we do not fear their realisation. If, on the other hand, France should be a consenting party, we know at what price, at the least to existing territorial arrangements, such consent would have to be purchased; and, in that hypothesis, the case occurs which we have last contemplated in our consideration of conjectural alliances.

With the inscrutable will of him who sits upon the throne of France, we will answer for no surprises. He who but yesterday shot a dart at the "antique et illustre maison d'Autriche," may draw the sword on its side to-morrow. Conspicuous among the favoured guests at the Court of the Tuileries are, if we are not mistaken, Lord Cowley and the Count de Hatzfeld—a circumstance which in no degree confirms our confidence in the stability of its friendly relations with the countries those plenipotentiaries represent.

[The above article, written, as our readers will have perceived, while the Montenegrine matter was still pending, reached us too late for publication in our last number. But neither the "success," as for the moment it is considered, of the Austrian stroke at Constantinople, nor the other events which have intermediately occurred, seem to us any reason for altering the opinions expressed, or for modifying the principles applied in this review of the "Great Powers."]

A CHRISTMAS VACATION IN JUTLAND.

FROM THE DANISH.

CHAPTER III.

AN UNQUIET NIGHT.

Though so well inclined for a long night's rest, I was not allowed more than three hours' sleep, when I was awakened by a loud noise outside our door, and by the sound of merry voices laughing and talking, while others were calling to order, and recommending silence. At length, the door opened, and a servant-maid entered with a light in her hand, and several travelling cloaks thrown over her arm. She was followed by four gentlemen, loaded with cloaks, pillows, sofa-cushions, bolsters, &c., with which, I concluded, a bed was to be made on the floor for the merry party who had just arrived, and did not wish the family to be disturbed. "Who sleeps here?" whispered one of them to the servant, while they traversed the room on tiptoe. "The two head masters," she answered, opening a door in the arras, which led to another room. "Oh! I thought I perceived an odour of Latin!" said another, and the whole party proceeded into the next room. The servant returned immediately, leaving the gentlemen to their own devices.

I then prepared again for sleep, but in vain; my neighbours' spirits were too high. First, they made a tremendous racket by pulling each other out of their boots, in the course of which process, now one and then another plumped down on the floor, amidst the laughter of the others; and when at last they got to bed, they commenced a scuffle for pillows and coverlets, that ended in a general bombardment with bolsters, which, often missing their aim, hit with a tremendous bang against the wooden partition which separated me from them. At length, peace was concluded, and I was on the point of dropping asleep, when I was again roused by the shrill crowing of a cock in the corridor into which my room opened. A suppressed laughter in the next room led me to conjecture who it was that had introduced this living alarum into the house. But this was not all; chanticleer had just commenced a second fanfare, when he was interrupted by a sound of a very different nature, and which seemed to alarm him even more than me, for he sent forth a shrill scream. It sounded as if several well-shod horses were galloping to and fro in the corridor. It was too bad. The Conrector, who, until then had been sleeping soundly after the unwonted exertions of the day, now awoke, and raising himself on his elbow, listened and muttered to himself, "lemures nocturnaque spectra!" I gave no answer, and the noise having ceased, a deep silence ensued, which was, however, soon broken by one of my frolicsome neighbours, who, in a hollow, lugubrious voice, declaimed; "Und immer weiter, hop, hop, hop, geht's fort im donnernden galop."* He had proceeded so far, when the door to the corridor was burst open, and at it appeared a dwarf, with a long white beard. I felt somewhat disconcerted, and the Conrector, it appears, equally so. "Are you asleep," he whispered. I answered "No;" but at that instant the mystery was solved; the mannikin raised his voice, and was discovered to be a goat. As I afterwards learnt, the animal was a pet in the family, and allowed the free range of the place, and had probably introduced himself unperceived into the house, along with the strangers who arrived in the night. Provoked at having been startled by so ridiculous a cause, I jumped out of bed, and seizing the fellow by the horns, dragged him to the door of the next room, opened it, and shoved him in to my neighbours, to whose machinations I thought I was indebted for his visit. Having shut the door upon the goat, I went up to the Conrector, gave a whispered report of all that had taken place while he was asleep, and then slipped into bed again, hoping that I should at length be able to enjoy some repose.

But I had only made bad worse; instead of pelting each other with soft cushions and bolsters, my neighbours now made use of "Billy," as a missile, shoving him from the one side of the room to the other, to their own great amusement, but to the great discomfiture of the long-bearded gentleman, whose pitiful bleatings blended with the laughter chorus of his tormentors. But even the best fun will at length pall; so after some time, one of the young men proposed that they should fling a cloak to Billy, and invite him to take his rest upon it. As thereafter everything became quiet, I concluded he had accepted the invitation.

"Tandem!" I sighed, and settled myself comfortably on my pillow; but sleep would no more come at my bidding. I had been tossing and turning about half an hour, when I heard a deep sigh from the other bed. I turned my eyes in that direction, and as the moon was by this time high in the heavens, and her beams were streaming in through the window, I beheld the Conrector sitting up in bed, with his face buried in his hands.

"Are you ill?" I inquired.

"Oh no! it is only old memories that are troubling me." After a pause, he resumed in Latin, which language he spoke as fluently as Danish: "Dear friend, you know that I am a widower and childless; but did you ever hear how I became so?"

"No!"

"Will you hear my sad history?"

"Yes, if it be not ripping up old wounds," I answered.

"Oh!" said he, "the wounds in my heart will never heal in this world—they cannot and they ought not—they are to me, as it were, an assurance from God, that I shall once be reunited with those for whom I yearn. . . . . After I had taken my degree in Copenhagen, I visited the universities of northern Germany. In Kiel I saw her who afterwards became my wife. We learnt to love each other, and when, in the ensuing year, I had obtained the appointment which I now hold, I returned to Kiel and married her." Here he paused, pressed the sheet to his eyes, and then continued: "Five years we lived together, my friend! during these five years we never spoke one unkind word to each other. Do you remember the last chapter of the Book of Proverbs? Such a woman as is there described was she. Yes; 'She did me good and not evil all the days of her life!'" Here he sank back on the pillow and wept, but not long; he again raised himself, and said: "My father-in-law was a merchant—a most kind-hearted man, sickly, and of weak constitution. After the lapse of those five happy years, we received a letter from his wife, telling us that his end was approaching, and that he had but one wish, and that was once more to see his daughter, his only child. They had a son, but he died a short time before the father. She insisted on going, and no doubt she was right. But I could not accompany her further than Colding. There we parted. There I saw her the last time; but not only her. Our only child, a sweet little cherub, four years old, we had taken with us, never intending, however, that she should proceed further than Colding. But when she and the mother were to part, their grief was excessive, and it ended in their both going, and I returned alone to our home. Dear friend, do you know what it is to live in suspense? if not, you do not know how interminable time can seem. The day after my return home, I hastened to the post-office, for I calculated that I might have a letter from her from Flensborg; but I found none. This did not, however, make me uneasy, as I felt sure that the next post would bring me one. The post-day came, but no letter. I had flown to the post-office, I crept back. I felt the days now begin to lengthen and the nights likewise. Hope and fear, faith and doubt, alternately took possession of my mind; I conceived and rejected one possibility after another. Another post-day came, and still no letter. Now the minutes were to me like hours, and the hours like days. I knew no peace. I wandered through the house as if in search of something, yet I knew not what. I looked at the sun, it seemed not to move; I looked at the clock, and had it not been for the ticking of the pendulum, I would have thought that that also had stopped. At one moment I threw myself upon my bed, but the next I was again walking hurriedly to and fro, as if I could thereby make time move quicker. A month had passed, and it seemed to me as if a year had gone by since I parted from my wife and child. I could bear the suspense no longer. I set out and travelled day and night. I arrived in Colding, and knew not how I got there. I reached Haderslev. The innkeeper, who knew me, as I had often before passed through the place, asked me if I was going to fetch my wife home, and told me, that when she arrived there, on her way to Kiel, she had learnt that there was a vessel in the harbour just about to leave for that place, and as this would make her journey less expensive and quicker, she had taken her passage in it, and had left the port with a fair wind. On hearing this, a cold shudder ran through me, and I could hardly collect myself sufficiently to bespeak post-horses. I reached Kiel and my father-in-law's house—he was a corpse, his wife was very ill, and my wife had not been heard of." The old man stopped, but a deep sigh told me the rest of his tale.

"Merciful father!" said I, "the ship must have been wrecked."

"Without doubt," he answered, in a tone of calm resignation; "the captain of the vessel had his home in Kiel; the innkeeper at Haderslev had mentioned his name; I recollected it, and made inquires at his house. His widow was already wearing mourning for him. Another shipper had brought the intelligence that the schooner had capsized in a gale, and that everybody on board had perished."

Saying these words, the old man again laid himself back on his pillow, and folded his hands on his breast.

The sad tale had made a deep impression upon me, and in imagination I now pictured to myself the various distressing scenes he had mentioned, from the comfortless home of the widowed husband, to the house of death in Kiel, and to the tempest-tossed vessel, where the despairing mother, clasping her child to her bosom, implored mercy from heaven, until the rising waters drowned her voice, and, at last, closed above them both. Overcome by painful emotion, I was on the point of getting out of bed to dispel these dark imaginings, when on looking over at my companion, I saw that he was asleep. "Thanks to our Father in Heaven!" I sighed with a relieved heart, "who sends comfort and consolation even to those who are most sorely grieved. He lets the healing hand of time pass over all; it levels, obliterates, and covers over the memories of the past."

At length I fell into a sweet slumber, and when I awoke again, although the melancholy narrative at once recurred to my mind, it was as if it were a long time since I had heard it; and my spirits having recovered their accustomed buoyancy, I got up, and wrote a few remarks on the pleasures of the chase among the ancients.

I had just finished, when the servant came in to announce that breakfast was ready. I went down, and joined the family, and one after another, the other guests did the same. As usual, the first questions addressed to us, were as to how we had spent the night, and I gave a full account of the adventures I had experienced, inquiring at the same time who were my frolicsome neighbours. No one, however, could answer my questions, except by conjectures, for the new-comers had not yet made their appearance, and the names they had mentioned to the servant in the night, were evidently fictitious, and dictated by the spirit of fun. While the conjectures were still going on, three of the party entered. On seeing the foremost, the Thammerraad sprang towards him with an exclamation of pleasure, saying, "I guessed as much!" but, at the same moment, he and all the rest of us burst into uncontrollable laughter, for leaning with his one foreleg on the arm of the new-comer, and tripping daintily along on his hind legs, was the goat, with the parish-clerk's wig and hat upon his head. "I have the honour of presenting to you," said the jocose guest, "my contubernalius, the reverend Mr. Billy Goat, privileged sleep-disturber at Ulvedal, likewise vice-gardener of the same place, and assistant to the parish-clerk of Ulstrup, cum spe successus."

What a blessed gift is that merry cheerfulness of heart, which, like an electric shock, communicates itself to all who behold it, and even forces the sorrowful to laugh with the tears still in their eyes; which enables the possessor to see the bright side of all things, to seize hold of every fleeting joy, to be witty without sarcasm, and to jest with others without giving offence. The gentleman who was so warmly greeted by the Thammerraad; and who was the Herredsfoged* of the surrounding district, possessed this happy gift in a high degree, and was, therefore, rightfully considered the soul of all social meetings. Indeed, his coming seemed to infuse new life into our party; and though I did not know him before, I felt now as if he had hitherto been missed. His two companions were amiable young men, gifted with some of his wit, and with an equal share of good humour.

When the laughing and joking had somewhat subsided, we remembered that a fourth guest had arrived with them in the night. The three gentlemen, however, knew nothing more of him than that he was a merchant, and that his name was Anderson. They had met him at the inn, at Veile; and as he had at once proved himself to be a very agreeable and cultivated man, they had not hesitated to offer him a seat in their carriage, as he was going in the same direction as they. While we were speaking of him he entered the room, and having begged to be introduced to host and hostess, he advanced towards them with the ease and grace of a man of the world, and said, "If apologies could in any way justify my intrusion, or if I thought such would be required, I would be ready to proffer them; but your light-hearted friends have promised to plead my cause." . . . . Here he was interrupted by the hearty welcome of our amiable host and hostess, and before he was introduced to the rest of us, he continued: "I am a merchant—in my younger days I was a sailor—I have come from the Cape on a visit to my native country, from which I have been absent two and twenty years; but, above all, to see my only brother, with whom I have had no communication during the whole of this time. He lives in the neighbouring town of———and is Conrector . . . . ." Here all eyes were turned towards my old colleague, who sat pale and trembling, without the power to rise from his chair, and hardly able to pronounce the words—"Christian! is it you?" The brothers fell into each other's arms.

The surprise of my excellent friend was the greater and the more joyous, because, for many years, he had believed his brother to be dead, as, since his first voyage to China, nothing had been heard of him, except that he had remained in Batavia, which was known to be a very unhealthy place. His continued silence had been caused, it seems, first by the thoughtlessness of youth, and afterwards by the determination not to let his friends know anything about him until he had become a rich man, which was now the case.

CHAPTER IV.

THE COUNTESS.

The Herredsfoged was an excellent performer on the violin, and hoping to find some occasion for using it, he had brought a whole box full of music with him. Among the company there were six other persons who played divers instruments; but, unfortunately, of instruments there were none in the house, except an old flute belonging to the master. But measures were soon taken to repair the deficiency; a carriage was forthwith despatched to the town to fetch the leader of the town band and his whole store of instruments.

In the meanwhile we did not suffer from ennui. After a most hearty breakfast, during which the clerk and his horned substitute furnished abundant matter for merriment, the Herredsfoged took up his instrument and played a waltz, which soon set the greater number of us whirling round the room; and, as there were not ladies enough for us all, the gentlemen were obliged to dance together. The two re-united brothers sat by each other's side, as smiling lookers-on. They scarcely ever let go each other's hand, the eldest in particular. The Conrector was, I think, some sixteen years his brother's senior—watching the other as if he were afraid of losing him again, or, according to the Herredsfoged, as a bridegroom watches his bride. If the Merchant were one moment out of his sight, he directly asked in a tone of anxiety, "Where is Christian?"—"Have you seen Christian?"—and he sought until he found him.

One amusement succeeded another; the light-hearted magistrate was the promoter of all; he was so irresistibly comical as even to make Quintus show his teeth. The day had sped before we were aware of it, and the evening likewise. Even the ladies had been so completely carried away by the joyous whirl, that not before it was time to go to bed did they remember that room was wanting for one. Offers were made to sleep on chairs, but these our hostess would not listen to. At length one of her daughters whispered something to her. The mother shook her head, and answered in a low tone, which prevented my hearing more than the words: "Trouble her so late at night" . . . .

"After all, it is not necessary," said the Thammerraad; "there is a bed in the black room; my master-key will open the door, and to-morrow we may make the necessary apologies."

"The black room," exclaimed both the daughters with looks of astonishment; "who does papa think he will get to sleep in that room?"

"Why, the clerk, for instance;" answered the father, with a smile.

"May the cats scratch me, if I do," replied the clerk, with the utmost energy; "I would rather go home at once."

This excited the curiosity of all those who, like myself, were staying at the house for the first time.

"What is the matter with the black room?" asked several voices at once.

"Nothing, but that it is haunted," answered the Thammerraad, in a mocking tone. "It is said that a young lady, who, in bygone times, brought dishonour on her family, was walled up there. Well, the matter must be arranged in some way or other—will you draw lots, gentlemen? or if no one dares to venture alone, you might be two, I volunteer my company."

"On no account," we all exclaimed; "we cannot allow you to be turned out of your own bed!"

"No, no, we will draw lots," said the Herredsfoged; "but whoever is designated by fate, must encounter the adventure alone!"

We drew, and the lot fell upon me. I received the congratulations of the company, with the exception of the clerk, who exclaimed with a most portentous countenance: "May the cats scratch me, but I wouldn't change with him, if I could get the whole of Ulvedal by it."

The room which was in such evil repute was situated in a distant wing of the house, and in order to get to it, I was obliged to traverse long galleries flagged with stones, and sometimes to descend one flight of steps, and then again to mount another. The servant who had accompanied me with a lantern, lighted a candle and then withdrew, casting a rapid and shy glance at one of the corners of the room. The name of black-room given to this apartment, was no misnomer, for ceiling and walls were painted in such dark colours, that the whole bore a most sombre aspect, and the hangings of the huge old-fashioned bedstead were of the same dusky hue. Before getting into the latter, I made a tour of observation round the room, candle in hand. When I approached the corner towards which the servant had glanced with such a suspicious look, I beheld a picture, which I at once connected in my mind with the tradition to which my host had alluded. It represented a young and lovely woman, with downcast eyes, and over whose countenance was spread a deadly pallor; her form was wrapped in the sable drapery of a nun, and in her folded hands she held a crucifix and a rosary. This picture was placed close up to the angle of the wall, and on the other side stood the portrait of a man, who was appropriately called "the red man;" for not only his hair and his beard, but his whole dress, even to his shoes, with long upturned points, were of the same hue. His eyes were fixed on the maiden's face with a dark and ferocious expression, and I afterwards learnt that he was the father of the hapless girl, and that it was his lips that had condemned her to the dreadful death which was to be the punishment of her fault.

Until this night I had never been able to comprehend how it was that those who did not believe in ghosts, nevertheless, felt afraid of them. But now, on finding that a certain dread had really taken possession of me, in consequence of what I had heard, it became clear to me, that this awe has its roots in our spiritual nature, that it is, as it were, a rent in death's dark veil, through which the soul catches a glimpse of immortality. And since then the fear of ghosts has never been to me a subject of ridicule; but I have, on the contrary, looked upon it as a holy, though vague, revelation of the world of spirits. I tried in vain to sleep. My eyes often closed, but opened again to glance at the mysterious corner where the moon-beams fell upon that deadly pale face. At length I thought I heard low tones like those of a musical instrument proceeding from the corner. I held back my breath—but all was still again. In a little while the tones again struck my ear. I raised my head from the pillow—it was no self-deception; but they were so low and so distant, that it was impossible to discern whether they were emitted by an instrument or by a human voice. A slight shiver passed over me. Was it a spirit song, coming from within the wall?—the death-hymn of the wretched girl? The tones continued. My nerves quivered, my heart beat violently, my breath came thick and fast. I sat up in the bed, and bent my eyes intently on the portrait, dreading and expecting every instant to see something as mysterious as what I now heard. The head of the portrait moved, it was raised—bent down again—seemed to expand—then again to diminish—my terror increased. My reasoning powers had not, however, entirely left me, and I was soon able to judge that these fancied movements were the effects of the light as the moon disappeared or came forth again from behind a cloud. Another interval of deep silence ensued.

I began to breathe more freely, to be able to collect my thoughts, and to reflect, and I took a courageous resolution: got out of bed, and throwing some covering over me, went to the window, where the sight of the calm bright moon soon exercised a tranquillising effect on my agitated nerves; yet my eyes would still turn from its mild disc to glance at the haunted corner. But what was next to be done: Was I to remain standing here until morning? or—I peeped out of the window: it was far from the ground; I was in the second or third story. Should I return by the same dark way I had come? wake every one in the house, and expose myself to their laughter and contempt? From this state of uncertainty I was relieved by the mysterious tones which again struck on my ear, but which I now perceived did not come from the corner, as I before supposed, but from the opposite side of the room. I ventured to go thither and put my ear to the wall. I now distinguished the soft tones of a female voice. I recovered my self-possession, but my surprise increased: Who could it be that was singing so late at night? I made my watch repeat, it was half-past twelve—just the hour when spirits are most abroad! I leaned against the wall—it gave way, and a door in the arras opened slowly into a very large room. At the other end of it I perceived a stream of light on the floor. From that side the tones came—now they were hushed; but immediately after I heard the voices of two persons in conversation. Irresistible curiosity took possession of me. I walked stealthily across the room in the hope of discovering which of the ladies of our party had come so unexpectedly into my neighbourhood; I put my eye to the keyhole, through which the light was streaming, and great was my consternation, for before me sat the original of the picture, in the same sable dress, and with the same deadly pallor spread over her lovely countenance. Her side-face was turned towards me, and before her lay a paper on which she seemed to be drawing. Another lady was seated at the same table, but with her back towards me, so that I could only see the back of her head and the beautiful outlines of the upper part of her figure, as she sat between me and the light. She leaned forward to look at her companion's drawing. I felt as if I were nailed to the spot.

"You have been successful with that flower," she said, in French, and with the purest accent.

"Is it the heartsease, you mean?" replied the other, in the same language; "it is the flower I love best, Alice!" She sighed deeply, looked at the flower with a tender smile, and let the pencil rest in her hand. The lady whose back was turned to me sighed also, drew back her head and resumed her needle-work, as I could perceive by the movement of her arms. After a pause, during which she made a few strokes with her pencil, the other said, slowly and sadly: "It is the last flower of the year." And with a look of compassion as it were, at the flower, she sang, in the same soft and melting tones which had before so startled me, an elegy expressing the regrets of a heart whose summer had fled without fulfilling the promises of its spring.

When the song was ended, she leaned back in her chair, folded her hands, and tears rolled slowly down her pale cheeks. Her companion now thrust aside the needle-work with which she was occupied, seized her hand, pressed it to her bosom, and sang in a louder and stronger voice, and in quicker time, a little French song, composed as if in answer to the other, and breathing a spirit of hope and joy. But, before she got to the end, the songstress' voice failed her, and, bursting into tears, she threw herself on her knees before her friend, embraced her and laid her cheek on her arm. The other, who seemed the elder, laid her hand, as if in the act of giving a blessing, on the young girl's head. A strange feeling of melancholy sympathy made the tears start to my eyes also, though the cause of their grief was as little known to me as were their persons. At this moment the wainscot against which I was leaning creaked. The elder lady turned round abruptly, and as I feared that they might take it into their heads to look into the room to ascertain the cause of this discord, I returned to my own black room quicker than I had left it, and got into bed again; but now my curiosity kept me as wide awake as fear had done before. Who in the world could these ladies be? Strangers to the family with whom I was staying! and not the slightest allusion had been made to their presence in the house! At length I became so confused by these vain guessings and questionings, that I almost began to think that I had been witness to a scene in spirit-land, and that the two mysterious beings I had beheld belonged in truth to a bygone century. The resemblance of the one to the portrait of the lady of the legend—her uncommon costume—the foreign language in which she spoke, but which was formerly in general use among the nobility—every thing was in accordance with the legend.

At length I feel asleep, and slept until the first dawn of morning. I lost no time in dressing, and hurried down to the room in which the family usually assembled.

"How did you sleep? Did you see anything?" sounded from all sides; and it was long before I could put the question I was so anxious to have answered.

"Does any one sleep in that wing of the house? Who lives there? Who are those ladies?"

The Thammerraad laughed.

"Did you visit ladies, or did they visit you?"

I then narrated my adventure. The greater number of the persons present laughed heartily, and our host exclaimed—

"Our Rector has been endeavouring to take the Countess by surprise."

"What Countess?" asked I, with astonishment.

"Why Countess R——, who has hired the apartments opposite. Her ancestors owned this place for I don't know how many hundred years; but her father sold it, and the land with it."

"But, who is Alice?" continued I.

"Hem! that question is not so easily answered," was the reply. "She is Alice, or Else, as some here call her, and is a kind of companion to the Countess, and came with her from abroad."

Now I knew so much; but it was only sufficient to heighten my curiosity the more. A Countess and her French companion do not in ordinary cases excite this feeling; but these, so highly cultivated—as they appeared to me in the few moments that I observed them—so accomplished, so full of feeling, and yet living in such seclusion; keeping to themselves, burying within their own bosoms their, no doubt, interesting secret! I went on asking questions, and by degrees obtained the following unsatisfactory explanations, which were communicated to me with the same indifference with which people who have always lived in the midst of beautiful scenery answer the questions of a stranger about different points in the landscape that attract his attention.

The Countess might be between thirty and forty years of age; had spent the greater part of her life with relatives in the South of France, and had only been at Ulvedal a little more than four years. She lived very retired, never received strangers, and never went out except to go to church regularly on the first Sunday in every three months. Alice and herself took tea with the Thammerraad's family, after having formally announced themselves; and the Countess invariably invited them to take tea with her the following evening. These meetings were not particularly amusing to either of the parties, as the Countess spoke Danish very imperfectly and with difficulty. She did a great deal of good in a quiet way, and every new year supplied two poor children with clothes, and distributed food and other things among the poor at Christmas time. The parish clerk praised her, for she gave him an offering of two silver dollars, on every festival. With Alice he was still better pleased, as she stood sponsor to many children, though only to those of the poor, on which occasions she always gave him a Rig Daler. Otherwise both the ladies were somewhat stiff and reserved in manner, which the Thammerraad charitably attributed to their want of familiarity with the Danish language.

Having learnt all these particulars, I asked the Thammerraad to send his servant to request the Countess' permission for me to present my respects to her, and to thank her in person for the night's lodging she had afforded me. He acquiesced, telling me, however, at the same time that my request would not be granted. Indeed the servant soon returned with the answer, that the Countess begged to be excused seeing me, as she was not well, but hoped that I would continue to make use of the room."

"There, did I not say so;" exclaimed my merry host, with a hearty laugh at my discomfiture. "And now let us have a game at l'hombre."

(To be continued.)

HOW TO LOSE A COLONY.

Shall a British colony be abandoned? This, it is said, is a question which will shortly be brought under the consideration of Parliament—perhaps in the form of a money-vote for compensating the settlers in the surrendered colony, perhaps in some other shape. As it is a question in the decision of which the British people are certainly a good deal interested, it is but proper that they should be prepared to form an opinion on the subject. The colony which is to be given up, is as large as England. It has a fertile soil, a temperate and healthy climate. The population is estimated at a hundred thousand souls. About fifteen thousand are colonists of European descent; the remainder are barbarous or semi-civilized natives. The colonists already occupy more than two thousand farms, which are either under cultivation, or are stocked with cattle and sheep. Several of these farms have changed hands during the past year at prices exceeding £2,000. The settlers last year purchased British goods of the value of nearly £100,000; and, besides other exports, they sent to this country 500,000 lbs. of fine wool. The settlement comprises half-a-dozen thriving towns, the largest of which has already about a thousand inhabitants, and is rapidly increasing. Such is the colony which, strange as it may appear, has caused so much annoyance and perplexity to three successive administrations that, with one consent, they have determined to get rid of it as soon as possible, even at the cost of a good round sum to the British treasury. Before referring to the supposed grounds of this decision, it will be necessary to give a brief account of the colony's antecedents, and of its present political condition.

The Orange River Territory, or, as it is sometimes styled, the Orange Sovereignty, is situated in the interior of South Africa, between the Cape Colony and Natal. Its boundaries are well defined. Two rivers and a mountain-chain completely encompass it. On the south, the great Orange River separates it from the Cape Colony. On the west and north, the "Vaal" or Yellow River, the chief tributary of the Orange, divides it from the country of the half-civilized and pacific Griquas, and from the independent community of the emigrant Boers. On the east, the lofty ridge of the Drakenberg Mountains, the Andes of Africa, parts it from Kaffraria and Natal. The territory included within these limits, is supposed to comprise an area of about fifty thousand square miles. Its latitude is that of Northern Chili and of Moreton Bay; or, in the northern hemisphere, the latitude of Oude and Delhi, of Egypt, of Florida, Texas, and Lower California. But the Orange Sovereignty has, for inhabitants of European extraction, one advantage over all these countries. Being elevated more than a thousand feet above the level of the sea, it enjoys the temperate and bracing climate of countries distant ten degrees further from the equator—the climate of Greece and of Northern Italy. In winter, snow-falls are frequent, though seldom heavy; and the smaller streams are sometimes thinly sheeted with ice. Those English fruits and garden vegetables, for which the climate of Natal is too sultry, thrive luxuriantly in the Orange River Territory. "In the eastern part of it," we are told by a recent visitor, "wheat of the finest description, maize, and millet, can be raised to almost any amount. The water capabilities are so great that water-mills can be erected on almost every farm; on some, indeed, as many as ten or twelve could be erected. In the lower, or pastoral country, unlike most of the sheep-farms in the Cape Colony, almost every farm has water sufficient to enable the proprietor to have an orchard and vegetable garden, and in many instances they raise sufficient wheat for their own consumption." As a wool-growing country, there is reason to believe that the Orange River Territory has natural advantages over all other British colonies, those of Australia not excepted, in its abundant and nutritious herbage, its good supply of water, and the low winter temperature, which increases the length of staple of the fleece. Many of the settlers already possess large flocks of sheep; and fifteen hundred bales of wool were last year sent out of the colony. This year, it is supposed, the export will be doubled. Cattle and horses are numerous, and thrive well. The markets of the Cape Colony, even as far west as Cape Town, a distance of eight hundred miles, are supplied with cattle from the farms of the Orange Territory.

The capital of the colony, which enjoys the poetical name of Bloemfontein, or "Flower Fountain," is situated near the Modder River, about a hundred miles north of the Cape Colony. "Four years ago," according to the authority already quoted—a writer in the "Cape Directory for 1853,"—"there was scarcely a tenement here; the town now numbers upwards of two hundred houses, many of them fine buildings; a Dutch church, erected at a cost of upwards of £1,500; a large Episcopal church, now in course of erection; a Roman Catholic and a Wesleyan chapel; and a Government school-house. It also boasts of a weekly newspaper, and delights in a club-house and theatre." A file of this newspaper, The Friend of the Sovereignty and Bloemfontein Gazette, is now before us. It is printed in English and Dutch, and is, we observe, in the third year of its existence. Its well-filled advertising columns, and the numerous letters from correspondents, give an impression of business activity, and public spirit, very favourable to the young community of which it is the "organ." Another town, which seems likely to rival Bloemfontein, is Harrismith, situated near the Drakenberg mountains, on the road to Natal. "This town," observes the writer in the "Directory," "which, little more than a year ago, had but one house, the residence of the Civil Commissioner, now boasts of upwards of forty, many of them fine buildings. The district in which it is situated is the largest, best watered, and must, ultimately, if the country thrive at all, become the most important district of the Sovereignty, being adapted for agriculture to any extent, without requiring irrigation." Another district, that of Smithfield, is described as "a very rich district. Farms in it have been sold at very high prices, £1,500 not being at all uncommon. There are several very enterprising inhabitants, who are most laudably exerting themselves in establishing agricultural and other societies." In the town "there are several good stores, at which British merchandise of every description is to be obtained."

After perusing these details, the reader will probably feel inclined to ask why such a promising colony is to be abandoned. The reason may be given in a few words,—Because it has not an elective legislature. Since it became a British dependency, the eighty or ninety thousand natives who inhabit the eastern portion of it, have, on two or three occasions, given the authorities some trouble. Of actual fighting there has not yet been much; but our Government dreads, and with reason, a new series of Kaffir wars in that region. These wars, of course, would be very expensive, if British troops are to be employed in them at the expense of the Imperial treasury. There are two methods by which such a mischievous result may be avoided. The one is by giving to the colonists a free Parliament, and leaving them to govern and defend themselves; the other is, by withdrawing altogether from the province, and surrendering it to the natives and to any individuals who may choose to establish an independent community in it. Our Government is said to have chosen the latter course.

But why, it may be asked, is not the other method adopted? Why should not the colonists, if they are desirous of it, be allowed the common privilege of managing their own affairs, and of making their own terms with the native tribes? Not being in the secrets of the Cabinet, we can only answer this question by asking another. Why was not a representative government established in the Cape Colony itself, when it became a British dependency? In the year 1674, the Dutch settlement of the New Netherlands was ceded to Great Britain. Before ten years had elapsed, viz., in 1683, a free constitution was granted to that colony. This "charter of liberties," then bestowed upon New York, is thus quoted by Bancroft:—"Supreme legislative power," such was its declaration, "shall for ever be and reside in the Governor, Council, and people, met in General Assembly. Every freeholder and freeman shall vote for representation without restraint. No freeman shall suffer but by judgment of his peers; and all trials shall be by a jury of twelve men. No tax shall be assessed, on any pretence whatever, but by the consent of the Assembly. No seaman or soldier shall be quartered on the inhabitants against their will. No martial law shall exist. No person, professing faith in God by Jesus Christ, shall at any time be any ways disquieted or questioned for any difference of opinion." Whatever may now be thought of the last clause, it was, for that day, a remarkably tolerant provision. The whole constitution, thus established in the reign of Charles II., was one that even at this time would be esteemed liberal. The concession of this charter was productive of the happiest consequences. There was in the province of New York a most formidable body of Indians, the well-known confederacy of the Six Nations, renowned throughout North America for their savage prowess and their devastating conquests. The New York Government, guided by the local knowledge and natural caution of the popular representatives, whose villages were to be preserved from the horrors of barbarian warfare, managed to keep always on good terms with the native confederacy. All disputes that arose were settled in amicable conferences. No war between the colonists and the Six Nations took place while New York remained a British dependency—that is, for a whole century; and to this day the remnants of those tribes exist on the lands which have been specially reserved for them in the now populous "Empire State." Had the same judiciously liberal policy been pursued towards the Cape Colony, when it was ceded to the British crown, in the year 1815, there is nothing unreasonable in the supposition that similar good results would have ensued. Collisions with the Kaffirs would either have been avoided altogether, or would have been brought to a summary close after a brief and sharp contest, like the Indian wars in which some of the former British colonies in America were occasionally involved. Under the actual system, there have been, since the British Government took possession of the Cape, no less than five Kaffir wars, three of which have been of a protracted and desperate character.

The reason why a free constitution was granted to a colony in the seventeenth century so much more readily than in later times, is evident enough. At the former period, there was no "Colonial Office," no ministerial department specially charged with the management of colonial business. British ministers in those troublous times had enough to do in attending to home affairs, and were glad to be relieved of the labour and annoyance of looking after the concerns of the colonies. They willingly shifted what they regarded as a burden to the shoulders of the colonists, who still more gladly received it as the most precious of boons. In our day, unfortunately for the colonies, we have a Colonial Minister, with a large staff of under-secretaries and clerks. These gentlemen, with a natural confidence in their own powers, have the notion that they understand the management of colonial affairs much better than the colonists themselves. They have consequently avoided and discouraged as much as possible the concession of free institutions to the colonies; and when they have been compelled in any case to grant a representative assembly to a colony, they have taken care to retain the appointment of all the executive officers in their own hands (or in the hands of their nominee, the governor), and to render these officers irresponsible to the colonists, and accountable only to the Home Government; thus retaining for the Colonial Office the power of interfering continually, and to an undefined extent, in the local government of the colonies. There is some reason for hoping that under the present Administration a better policy in this respect will be pursued. We are now speaking of the system which has prevailed from the separation of the American Colonies down to the commencement of the present year.

Bloody and desperate wars with the native tribes have not been the only evil fruits of the modern colonial system. Another result has been extreme discontent in all the colonies, sometimes breaking out into open rebellion. The existence of such a state of feeling is not at all surprising. Not only have the colonists been misgoverned, but they have been constantly maligned and misrepresented. The Colonial Office had to account to the British Parliament and people for its systematic refusal of the privilege of self-government to the colonists. This could only be done by representing the colonists as either too ignorant or too depraved to be trusted with the management of their own affairs. Such have been the grounds on which every demand for more liberal institutions, whether urged from Canada, from the West Indies, from Australia, or from the Cape, have been, down to a late period, steadily rejected—with what results the public are tolerably well aware. The Cape colonists, and especially the Dutch portion of them, have had perhaps, in this respect, the hardest measure of all. They have, till very lately, been constantly described by the authorities in our Colonial Office, and their underlings in the colony, as a brutally degraded and ferocious race of men, cruel towards the natives and disaffected to the British Government. The very name by which they are commonly known has been so employed as to confirm the impression made by these representations. The English term boor, which conveys a very unfavourable idea, has been generally used as convertible with the Dutch word boer, which has the same pronunciation, and, no doubt, the same origin. But in Dutch the word means simply a landed proprietor who farms his own land. It is the German bauer, which is commonly translated "peasant." The Dutch term would be more properly rendered by the good old English word, yeoman. The "Dutch boors" are the landed proprietors or yeomanry of South Africa. Some of them are men of great wealth, of good education, and polished manners. The majority, of course, are of a lower grade; but the extreme grossness and ignorance which some writers have ascribed to them, and which the designation of boor seems to imply, are only to be found, as in America, among the rude frontiersmen in the outlying settlements.

In their treatment of the aborigines, the Dutch settlers will compare favourably with the colonists of other nations. The North American Indians, and the Australian natives, are fast disappearing before the progress of colonization. The Hottentots of the Cape, once regarded as the feeblest and most barbarous of humankind, are now a numerous and partially civilized people. They owe, no doubt, their emancipation to British philanthropy, and much of their improvement to the missionaries. But had the Cape been originally settled by British colonists, there may be some question whether the philanthropists and missionaries of our day would have found many of these poor savages in existence to profit by their benevolent exertions.

The state of feeling which led to what is known as the "great emigration" of the Dutch farmers from the Cape Colony, in the year 1836, is sufficiently shown in the following passage, extracted from a work of Captain (afterwards Sir James) Alexander, who travelled through the western part of the colony in that year:—"We read in the papers," said a Dutch farmer to him, "that in Europe we are considered as tigers, and that we destroy the coloured people without mercy; look round and say if you see anything of this. We are vexed and annoyed at the opinion which is entertained of us; and no allowance is made for us, for being reluctant to lose two slaves out of three—for we are only paid for one out of three; thus a farmer who gave a few years ago £800 for a few slaves to cultivate his ground, now receives only £300 for them. Our countrymen, too, on the eastern frontier, have been ruined by the Kaffirs, and have not recovered their property. We hear of the great fertility of the land beyond the north-eastern limit, and we wish to try and find out a new country for ourselves."

It happened that at that time two of the finest and most fertile regions in South Africa—that which is now the colony of Natal, and that which constitutes the Orange River Territory—had been in great part depopulated by the internecine wars of the native tribes. The former possessors had either been extirpated, or had been carried into captivity and incorporated with the conquering hordes. The vacant lands lay open to the first comers. Captain (afterwards Sir W. C.) Harris, who travelled through the Orange River district in the years 1836-37, describes it as "a trackless desert," "a howling wilderness," "a land in which, although thinly populated by skulking broods of Bushmen, and by the starving remnants of nomadic pastoral tribes, which have been broken up by war and violence, no man permanently dwelt, neither was the soil any man's property; a land in which, for hundreds of miles, the eye was not greeted by the smallest trace of human industry, or by any vestige of human habitation—the wild and interminable expanse ever presenting the same appearance, that of one vast uninhabited solitude." Such was the state, sixteen years ago, of the region now occupied by the flourishing colony, whose present condition has just been described.

The emigration which took place in the year 1836, was on a scale which might almost be called national. It was estimated at the time that about twenty thousand persons then crossed the northern frontier of the Cape Colony, to seek a "new country" in the vast and fertile wilderness which stretched out before them for hundreds of miles towards the north and east. About half the emigrants remained in the interior; the other half crossed the Drakenberg range, and settled in Natal, where they established an independent republic. In the year 1842, the British Government determined to take possession of this settlement. The emigrants resisted; but after some sharp fighting, they were forced to capitulate. Natal became a British colony. A promise was at the same time made to the settlers, that representative institutions of a very liberal character should be granted to them, in lieu of the "Volksraad," or popular council, which had previously managed the affairs of the young commonwealth. Had this promise been kept, the emigrants would undoubtedly have remained in Natal, which would by this time have become a prosperous and valuable colony. The evil influences in the Colonial Office prevented this happy consummation. The promise was broken. To this day, representative institutions have not been introduced into Natal. The government of the country was committed to nominee functionaries, having no interest in its welfare, and wholly irresponsible to the colonists. The defensive organization by which the settlers had protected themselves against the attacks of the border tribes was broken up. The tenure of their lands was interfered with, in the most arbitrary and vexatious manner. As they had fled from the Cape Colony to escape these annoyances, they now fled from Natal, and recommenced their wanderings in the wilderness. Of the two thousand Dutch families whom our troops found in Natal in 1842, not five hundred remain at the present day. The place of the fugitives has been partially filled up by emigrants from England and the Cape Colony; but the sturdy South African farmers, who formed the strength of the settlement, have been lost to it for ever.

They recrossed the Drakenberg range, and joining the emigrants who had remained in the interior, spread themselves over a vast region, extending from the Orange River to the Southern Tropic, and even beyond it. The country over which their settlements were scattered was as large as the Austrian empire. The number of the settlers, greatly increased by accessions from the colony, was supposed to be about forty thousand souls. Hardly had they established themselves in their new asylum, when the indefatigable Colonial Office was again on their track. In 1845, Sir Peregrine Maitland, the Cape Governor, placed a military officer, with the title of British Resident, and a small garrison, at Bloemfontein, with orders to keep the peace between the emigrants and the natives. This was a virtual extension of the royal authority over that region. In February, 1848, Sir Harry Smith, the newly-appointed Governor of the Cape Colony and High Commissioner in South Africa, issued a Proclamation declaring the whole country between the Orange and Vaal Rivers subject to the British Crown. This act, after due consideration, was formally sanctioned by the Home Government. In March, 1851, letters patent, under the Great Seal of the Empire, constituted the new province "a distinct and separate Government," under the title of the Orange River Territory. Of the Dutch settlers in this territory, the major part remained on their farms, relying upon the promise of Sir Harry Smith that the privilege of sharing in the government of the colony should be conceded to them. A number, however, fled to the northward, and took up their abode in the extensive and fertile country beyond the Vaal River, where already several thousands of the refugees from Natal had settled. A few months later, a body of these fugitives, about a thousand in number, under their leader, Andries Pretorius, made a sudden irruption into the new colony, with the intention of expelling the British authorities and recovering the territory. They were defeated by Sir Harry Smith, after a well-fought action, and have not since attempted to disturb the peace of the province.

A noble opportunity now offered itself for redeeming past errors, and initiating a wise, just, and liberal policy in the government of the ten or twelve thousand emigrants who had thus, once more, been brought within the limits of British jurisdiction. Had an elective legislature been established, or had the management of their own affairs been committed, in a great measure, to the colonists of the Orange Sovereignty, it is highly probable that peace would have been maintained in that territory; and it is nearly certain that no troubles would have ensued which could have caused any uneasiness in this country. Such a legislature might have been formed without difficulty. Among the Dutch emigrants were many men of good abilities, and sufficiently well educated for the transaction of the public business of their community. Many English settlers, moreover, speedily established themselves in the colony, some as farmers, but the greater number as traders and professional men. The inhabitants of the towns are now chiefly persons of British descent. They have fraternized very amicably with the Dutch inhabitants, and have united with them in repeatedly soliciting the introduction of free institutions.

It was Sir Harry Smith's intention to comply with this demand. By his order, the draft of a Constitution was prepared, giving to the colonists of the Sovereignty the right of electing eight out of the twelve members who, with the British Resident, were to form the legislature of the colony. This concession would, doubtless, for a time, have contented the colonists, and led to results highly beneficial to the province. Once more, however, the malign influences of the "Office" interposed. The liberal draft was cancelled; and a so-called "Legislative Council" for the Orange River Territory was established, to consist of thirteen members, all nominated and removable by the Home Government. Not one political franchise of any description was conceded to the inhabitants. A purely arbitrary government, with a military officer at the head of it, was established over fifteen thousand Dutch and English colonists, who were quite as capable of managing their own affairs as the householders of any borough in Great Britain. It is a remarkable fact that although this system of government was established with Earl Grey's full cognizance and sanction, he had, in an official despatch, which was published (and probably written) for the edification of Parliament, distinctly enjoined the directly opposite course. In this despatch, dated June 21, 1848, after referring to Sir Harry Smith's declaration of the royal supremacy in the new province, and the proposed erection of a government in it distinct from that of the Cape Colony, the Colonial Minister proceeded to prescribe the proper character of this local government in the following terms:—

The tendency of these measures, if duly executed, will be to give somewhat more regularity and greater strength to that rude system of government which has grown up of itself among these people from the necessity of their position, and to provide them the assistance which they really require, for the purpose, chiefly, of settling their disputes among themselves by the interposition of an authority to which all the different races of men whom circumstances have brought into such singular relations with each other, look up with respect. But it is essential that the management of their own concerns, with the duty of providing for their own defence, and for the payment of the expense of that system of government which is established among them, should be thrown entirely on the emigrant Boors, and on the native tribes among whom they are settled.

The manner in which "the management of their own concerns" was thrown upon the settlers was, as we have already intimated, by setting over them an irresponsible Council of Colonial-office nominees, under the presidency of a major in the British army! We have now to relate how this arbitrary government produced, as its inevitable consequences, discontent among the settlers and quarrels with the native tribes—how on two occasions it brought a British force into needless and disastrous collision with barbarian hordes—and how it has finally led the Imperial Government, in perplexity and disgust, to decide upon putting an end to this state of things, not by the simple, rational, and feasible process of conceding to the colonists the management of their own affairs, but by the unwise and wasteful policy of abandoning, at a heavy cost, a most valuable and promising colony.

LEAVES FROM THE ARABIAN NIGHTS.

THE FLYING HORSE.

A TALE OF CASHMERE.

Canto the First.

"There's something in a flying horse!"—
WORDSWORTH.—Prologue to Peter Bell.

THERE is a good old custom in the kingdom of Cashmere,
With flying flags and beating drums, to welcome in the year;
To set a gallant fair afoot, with spacious booths and gay,
And keep the merry Nevrouz-time, which we call New Year's day.

Not there the Fantoccini show—the tumbler on the cord—
The wax-work van—the Acrobats—the man that eats the sword—
The beer within the drinking booth—the pork upon the pole,
To glut the cockney appetite, and vulgarize the soul.

From all the wealthy provinces, the steady craftsmen bring,
The best of all their workmanship, to set before the king;
That he may judge their diligence, as proved in every stall;
Rebuke the bad, reward the good, and crown the best of all.

With all his court and councillors, the good old monarch went,
The morning that my tale begins, through every booth and tent:
He praised each well-made implement, with "Come, that's very nice!"
And sometimes asked the use of it, and sometimes asked the price.

At length—for monarchs are but men—"Methinks a tidy spell,
A long day's work, my lords," he said; "Ho, sound the dinner bell!
A good pope's eye and cherry pie, will find more grace with me,
Than all the 'raw material' there yet remains to see."

Then straightway from a scarlet booth, there jumped an Indian man,
And boldly towards the weary prince, the noble savage ran.
"Lor, King," he said, "me here all day from six o clock till four,
In hopes to show you something, dat you nebber seen before:

Do come along—it won't be long; for if you will not wait,
To-morrow all de folks will say, de King him come too late;
Him nebber see de famous horse dat in de Indian stall:
Dis king no wise, him give no prize to what was best of all!"

"Dear me," the good old monarch said, "since you've so much to show,
And cannot wait, our spoon and plate awhile we must forego:
Lead on my friend, and we'll attend: we praise your workman zeal,
And hold the cause of Industry far dearer than our meal."

Three summersaults that Indian cut, and chuckling led the way.
His apish face had not a trace of aught save craft and clay;
The fire that shines through lips and eyes, and speaks the man within,
Had never yet been lighted in that swarthy child of sin.

"Ah, bless my soul," the good king said,
"A model I presume,
Of steeds beyond the Tigris bred?
Bedad, I'll send my groom.
'Tis very clever—nice indeed!
He looks almost alive;
Now, pray—a horse of such a breed
Do people ride or drive?
Aha! yes, thank you! bless my heart,
What a long way to send
So very large a work of art;
Good day my honest friend!"

"Stop, massa king," the Indian cried,
And flashed his coal-black eye;
"You tink my nag a straw-stuffed hide,
Like what de picanniny ride;
Dat neither kind nor sly.
Look here! I turn dis tiny peg,
And up he lift his fine fore-leg,
And swish dat silken tail!
I turn it more—he stamp and snort—
Ha! shall I ride him round the court,
And top a six-foot rail?
Not I, indeed, for what the need
To praise or puff so rare a steed?
I tell you he can fly!
Turn but dat peg completely round,
He'll dash like arrow from the ground,
And gallop in the sky!
You guide him straight with bridle-rein,
You prance on cloud, you cross the main,
You see the stars extremely plain,
Like pumpkins—only bigger.
You do much more—too fine to tell,
But dat's enough: me here to sell,
If, as I tink, you like him well,
Perhaps you'll name your figure."

"My lords—my lords!" exclaimed the king,
"Who ever saw so strange a thing,
Or dream of such a horse?
Ha, ha! when turned the tiny peg
To see him lift his fine fore-leg!
Buy him? of course—of course!
I would not for the five great zones,
The wealth of all their thousand thrones,
This masterpiece of art,
Should ever fill a gilded shrine
In other halls than these of mine,
Or glad some rival's heart!
What says my Keeper of the cash—
Himself the best of tizzies—
How much to spend would not be rash
On such a horse as this is?"

Replied the bland Exchequer lord,
"O king, give what you will;
The doubt is what you can't afford,
Whilst I command the till!
Bid what you please, great master mine;
No faithful liege will grudge it.
Or, if the sulky slaves repine,
Leave me to cook the budget."

"There—there!" cried the king,
"How much must he bring?
You've only to speak for the guineas to ring!"

"Go—offer your cash to the bird on the wing!"
Sneered the horse-dealing savage: "dat lark in de sky,
Would gold fetch him down to be baked in a pie?
'O tanky!' he say, and O tanky say I.
Now, hearkee to me,
Dis horse dat you see
Was made by three fellers much wiser than we:
Nine years they sat a-thinking,
With hand upon the chin,
Across the work-bench winking,
Before they did begin.
Nine years they spent a-talking
Of what their thoughts had been,
In turn their plans a-chalking
Upon the workshop screen.
Nine years they toiled a-building,
And then they came to die;
Two graves alas! were filled in
Before the Horse would fly.
But when the last lay sickly,
He kindly sent for me;
Says they, 'my lad come quickly,
He's almost up the tree!'
I went: I found him dying;
But he said, 'The work is done.
The Horse that goes a-flying
I leave to you, my son.
The secret's in a parchment scroll,
Concealed within my breeches;
One promise please:—upon your soul,
You won't for filthy riches
Resign the prize: demand no less
Of those who'll swarm to buy,
Than a respectable Princess,
Good bye, my lad—good bye!'
Now what you say? your daughter's nice;—
I'm not so nasty:—that's the price!"

You may guess that an offer so friendly and frank
Made the Court and the King look remarkably blank.
Just fancy yourself, my dear madam—do pray,
If your own model maid should composedly say,
"Please mem, might I wear your best bonnet and shawl,
To go with my cousin to-night to Vauxhall?"
If you think that your answer'd be pithy and short,
You may guess what the King said and what said the Court.

Still it seemed so absurd,
He thought, at a word,
To lose the fine Horse that could fly like a bird,
That he didn't give way
To his temper and say
Such horrid strong things as papas, in the play,
Would seem to consider gives point to their "nay."
He argued, "this lout
Knows what he's about;
There are more ways than one though to tickle a trout!
A wretch who can scarce know the clink of a ducat
Will jump at the offer of gold by the bucket;
While, as for my daughter—an impudent whim!
We'll try how diplomacy answers with him.

Your Horse, my good friend—a mere toy though it be,
I wish to possess. In selecting your fee,
I must say you'd better have left it to me.
To sneer at hard cash, man, is humbug so rank
That I doubt if you ever went over the Bank;
To ask for my daughter is still more insane:—
Why, every one knows she's peculiarly plain;
She squints with one eye,
And one shoulder's too high,
And she hops in her walk;—she's a positive Guy!
And her hairs run to seed like a crop of dry teazles,
And 'twas only last night she broke out in the measles.
Of course, if you wish me, I'm ready to bid her
Accept you at once: don't be rash, but consider!

Then forth from the ring
That surrounded the King,
The Prince heir-apparent advanced with a spring.
"Good gracious," he shouted, "to speak so of sister!
I'm sure it's a wonder your tongue doesn't blister!
This blubber-lipped rascal, this woolly-pate cur,*
To dare to come here and talk nonsense of her;
And you, at your age too, to gape at his Horse,
As if the whole thing wasn't humbug of course;
If you must be convinced it's a thundering do,
Here!—I'm in the saddle, and round goes the screw!"

For my part—who never, I'm sorry to sing,
Could pull without flinching my shower-bath string—
I candidly own that his Highness's freak
Appears, to my thinking, both wilful and weak;
And, being by nature much wiser than witty,
Regard such a simpleton simply with pity.

With a great crash of clock-work and jingle of wheels,
The savage steed instantly kicked up his heels,
Gave a stamp and a bound and a plunge and a neigh,
Sprang snorting from earth and flew soaring away!
Straight, straight through the air
He rattled full tear,
Galloping, galloping goodness knows where!
Till the Prince, whom they followed with horrified stare,
Far dwindled in distance and ether quite thin,
Looked less than a walnut—a whitebait—a pin!
And in five minutes more, so exceedingly small,
There really was nothing to look at at all!

"Yah! seize me the traitor—the fiend! he shall swing!
Odd's bomb-shells and catapults!" thundered the king.

"You gallows-faced heathen, how durst you draw nigh,
Thief—ape that you are! with a horse that could fly?
Do you see what he's done?
Flown away with my son!
That's all! O by Jove, but you'll pay for your fun!
Where is he? I ask you—you damnable black!
Is he lost? Is it likely the Horse will come back?"

"Sare, why speak to me? How you 'spect me to know
Where dis foolish young gentleman likely to go?
Me run up to stop him;—him tell me 'get out!'
Me 'spostulate; debbil! him hit me a clout.
Me no time to show him de oder peg, sare,
Dat make de fine Horse come down out of de air.
If he no find it out, him continue to fly
Till him knock a great hole in de roof of de sky!
Me s'pose dat him get in de debbil's own row—"

"Cease, Traitor!" the King said, "I solemnly vow
That if, safe and sound,
My boy isn't found,
Before the great sun has completed his round,
In twenty-four hours told off by the clock,
Our headsman shall hand you at once to the block.
Meanwhile—hollo, blacksmith! steel bracelets for one—
Beware, when to-morrow I ask for my son!"

'Twere needless to tell what a frightful to do
Upset the whole Palace; how dreadfully blue
The 'Sticks' and the 'Grooms' and the Chamberlains grew;
(As any good Stick would, of course, at the bare hint
That the Heir to the throne was no longer Apparent.)
How the king feeling anxious and wakeful—no wonder!
Lay lapping rum 'nightcaps' and roaring like thunder;
While, chained in the cellar, that Indian perfidious,
With yells made the night inconceivably hideous.
All this, which decidedly out of our line is,
We briefly pass over to follow his Highness.

Away, away, through the pathless blue,
Higher than ever the condor flew;
Over the desolate mountain-height,
Over the glacier jagged and white;
Over the deep dusk plains beneath,
Crossed by many a wandering wreath,
Without one sound or mark of man
Throughout their shadowy rounded span;
Stretching away, like a swarthy lea,
To the luminous line of the distant sea.

The very first words Prince Firouz spoke
Were "Blow me tight, but it's past a joke!
A curse I say on my folly to back
This clattering, flyaway, clockwork hack!
I can't pull him in for he's all made of tin,
And, to judge by the way the wheels jingle and spin,
He may fly for a week, and the pestilent pin
That started wont stop him; oh, murder I see
In more ways than one that it's all up with me!"

If ever you've seen
The 'veteran Green'
Ascend with his boat-load of cocknies, or been Yourself on a trip to the regions serene,
Please fancy the funk of his petrified crew,
If he suddenly said, looking ruefully blue,
"We've seen the last of London Town,
For the valve's gone wrong and we can't come down:
And the thinner you grow,
The higher we go;
So where we shall stop I'm not likely to know!—"
So shall you figure the blank despair
Of poor Prince Firouz up in the air.

* I cannot help suspecting that the villain of our story was, in reality, an African;—the authors of the Arabian Nights being quite as independent as Shakspere in their geographical notions. His character is so thoroughly that of the conventional "nigger" of fairy romance, and Africa so likely a place to pick up an Enchanted Horse, that I have had no hesitation in assigning him the usual characteristics of what I believe to have been his real breed. I shall probably be reminded that the conduct of the Horse, in taking the first opportunity of making a bolt for Bengal, is very strong evidence that he was at least acquainted with the road. But since, most assuredly, the Indian was no mild, effeminate Bengalee, I do not lay much stress upon this particular fact.

I cannot help remarking that, in my own opinion, the original story would have been better had the author not insisted upon the fact that the Horse itself was enchanted. Surely there was here no "dignus vindice nodus." Magic is well enough in its way; but, like a great many other good things, is occasionally out of place. We take much more interest in the curious quadruped if we look upon him as the triumphant result of a long life of artistic labour, than if all ingenuity be dispensed with, and all difficulties cut short, by degrading him to the level of Mother Shipton's flyaway broomstick.

Now, in cases like these—you may sneer if you please—
It's fifty times worse when you've no bread and cheese—
Not even so much as a penny French roll,
For a sort of spare link between body and soul;
And hence, as he flew
Through the fast-falling dew,
Each supperless moment more frantic he grew;
And tugged at the bridle, and strained at the screw,
And piously said all the prayers that he knew,
In hopes of inducing the horse to bring to;—
Till down sunk the sun:
I'm certain, for one,
He'd have pitched himself over as sure as a gun,
If, just at that moment, he hadn't espied
A second small handle, deep sunk in the hide.
"Thank Heaven, at last there's a chance to be tried!
I can't be worse off—that's a comfort!" he cried;
"Even if—as most likely—'tis part of the trick,
And you screw up this peg when you want him to kick."

No! Down at the touch
Went the steed very much
Like a crow on a fallow slow-sinking, and such
Was the giddy sensation as wheeling and wheeling
He went, that the Prince lost all thinking and feeling,
And found all his brain-work as quickly congealing
As if playing pendulum, legs to the ceiling.

Starting at last, as out of a dream,
He woke to find the clear moon shining
Full on his face:—"Well, don't it seem,"
He said, "as if I had been dining?
I'm in a land of chimney-cowls;
That's plain: and how they all swing whining!
And there's my Horse—by all the fates,
Insanely trying to graze off the slates!
Bah! fool that I am—I remember it all!
He's back upon earth to look out for a stall.
The stupid brute can't have the sense of a louse
To turn a chap loose on the top of a house!
I won't sleep outside! how the housemaids will roar
When they hear rat-tat-tat on their jolly trap-door!"

After infinite groping
Round roof-top and coping,
He reached a dark nook, where a ladder went sloping,
By way of a species of airy back-stair,
One couldn't for certain prognosticate where.

An endless terrace carved and laid
With snow-bright marble: not a sound,
Nor sign—save where the moonlight played
Along what seemed enchanted ground,
And on the three great windows bright,
Flung open to the sultry night.
From slowly-burning lamps within,
Creeps on the air a golden gloss,
The giddy bats fly blindly in,
Through floating trailers looped across:
And out again, on soundless wing,
They dive and flit the platform round;
But hark! whose jingling footsteps ring?
Who dares to tread enchanted ground?

"Aha!" cried the Prince,
"This is charming, but since
I'm rather too hungry the matter to mince,
I'll just beg a peep through those curtains of chintz;
The windows would hardly be open so wide,
I should think, if one wasn't expected inside.
Ha! beauty, by jingo!"—
So still she sat
Amid the grand armorial panes
Flung backward from her chair of state,
You might have deemed that from her veins
All force had ebbed, as if to rise
Resistless in those noble eyes.

Half leaning on the faultless arm,
That shone through glossy waves of hair,
She sat, the spirit of the calm,
The Queen of moonlight, gazing there:
Gazing on the grand procession,
Brightly marching east and west;
Star and plant's thick succession,
Toiling orbs that scorn at rest!

Hairbrained was the Prince and reckless,
But his face due qualms expressed,
When he saw the diamond necklace,
Throbbing on her startled breast;
And when she, with calm impatience,
Queen-like eyes upon him fixed,
Then, indeed, his young sensations
Grew at once extremely "mixed;"
Not that she looked annoyed or furious,
But much surprised and proudly curious.

"I'm the Prince of Cashmere,"

"I'm the Child* of Bengal!"

"I'm intruding, I fear."—

"Oh, dear, not at all!
But our ditches are deep and our walls are high,
And our warders are fierce and let nobody by,
And you didn't, I fancy, drop down from the sky?"

"I fancy, I did,"
Said the Prince "but pray bid
You cook to peep under his pudding-pot lid!
I swear I'm so hungry I'd feed off a horse,
Without making faces, or asking for sauce;
In fact, since I started, I've lived upon vapour,
And eaten both gloves and no end of brown paper."

"Dear me—dear me!" said the sweet princess,
"How shocking! some supper he quickly shall dress;
Your fork you shall stick in
The wing of a chicken,
And revel in salad that lobster shall thicken;
Champagne shan't be wanting to fill up a chink,
Nor punch that would make a dried crocodile wink.
So few are our visitors here in Bengal,
I'm only too pleased you came this way to call."

Delightful days! I've often thought,
When starch formalities were none;
When beauty, turning up unsought,
Blessed the glad finder idly won.
When folks had little else to do
But smoke their pipes in gardens breezy;
Till mild adventures came to woo,
And crisp the stream of "Life made easy!"
Ah, well-a-day! so, times there were
When ways were none to mend;
When oaks were tall that now are all
Transformed to good Wall's-end—
When wriggling out of old-world eggs,
Came huge land-lubber whales,
With fourscore eyes and fifty legs
And several dozen tails.
When sprawled fat spiders, yards across,
And each primæval lizard
Could grind a tough rhinoceros
Alive within his gizzard.
Till Time came by with sand and scythe,
To banish the colossal;
And pitched their naked bones to writhe
In gaunt museum-fossil.

* Pro "Infantâ," scilicet Princess,—prosodiæ gratiâ.

Long may they rest in idle truce,
Quartz-coffin'd and age-smitten,
Who'd wish to see a mammoth loose,
His best friends tossed and bitten?
But must all eras change alike,
The same coarse hand crush all?
The steel that should the elm-tree strike,
On bleeding violets fall?
And could not even time forbear
To spoil those charming days,
Whose very sunset in the air
Still gilds Arabia's lays?

Come, come, little muse! this is "nodding" indeed!
The Prince very gaily sat down to his feed;
Some dozen black eunuchs brought up every morsel in Plates of pure gold, or still costlier porcelain;
All was delightful, and very divine
The deep-swimming goblets of ruby-bright wine.

Now, honest old wall!
I prithee tell all
That met the sweet ears of the child of Bengal;
How spoke the gay prince at the blithe tête-à-tête,
That grew so imprudently lengthy and late?

"Ah, royal child!—I give thee the pith,
Since life within me rallied,
(Another tumbler, hot, please, with:—
This is indeed a salad!)
Your beauty's done its work on me,
And, heaven be my witness,
Without your smiles the world would be,
(Oh, what a plate of kidneys!)
I say the world were one wide blank,
A hopeless hateful prison;
(Such stunning punch I never drank!)
My angel, won't you listen?"

Then, shifting down from love to gold,
His father's wealth he sounded;
His fame in fifty books inrolled,
His realm almost unbounded.
He talked of chested millions,
Of pearl tiaras ten,
Of crimson war-pavilions,
And endless lanes of men.
Of the vast palace-parapets
That blazed a furlong high;
The fish-pools and the fountain-jets
That sprinkled half the sky!

Well pleased the lady listened
To the sounding of such fame,
And her dark eyes brightly glistened
When the wild proposal came:
But the Horse upon the house-top
Made her start a little too;—
"For goodness' sake, sir, now stop!"
She said, "that can't be true!
What! gallop here from far Cashmere
Along the yielding sky,
And reach Bengal ere night could fall!"

"You think it's all my eye?"
The Prince cried: "Step upon the roof,
Fair Child, and you shall see;
And find in this the clearest proof
That you may trust in me.
You'll come? Brave girl, I knew it!
Yon vault is not so dark
But he'll bear you safely through it,
Till you hear the dog-star bark.
I now no longer fear him;
I can curb his clockwork flight,
And I know the way to steer him,
So mind you hold me tight!"

* * * * *

Aslant Cashmere the morning breaks and grows to sultry day;
Now from the brazen arch of noon the cruel sunbeams play;
Now, striking from the purple west, they float in painted lines;
Now, round and rayless ere he sinks, the feeble monarch shines.
All day the king had stumped about, and asked of every one,
"Pray can you tell me anything of my departed son?"
Of course his worst misgivings would nobody avow,
So all they did for answer was to shake their heads and bow.

Then mad with wrath and fear he grew, and ill with rage of mind;
"Bring forth," he said, "this Indiaman; this cunning knave unbind;
Set out the block and basket, that his head may grin to-night
Upon the steepest pinnacle that crowns our palace height!"

Out came the solemn headsman, with his heavy shouldered axe;
Out came the wretched Indian, whining, "Crikey, what a tax
To pay for bringing here a horse which, it must be allowed,
Caps all the world for workmanship!" "Speak up, sir!" bawled the crowd.

The headsman swings his hatchet
Three times aloft in air:—
To see the nigger catch it,
The people press and stare.
"Hold, hold the death-stroke—hearken!
The Prince—the Prince! hooray!"
A thousand flung caps darken
At once the face of day.
"Hooray, our fine young master,
He's here all safe and sound!
There isn't no disaster!"
Roar all the folks around.
"Hug, hug me, Royal Father!
A lady on the crupper!
She loves me too, sir—rather!
And, oh! sir, such a supper!
Such kidneys! oh! such lovely eyes,
And such a little waist!
She's here—no there, sir, in disguise,
For fear she should be chased!"

"Dear me, dear me," the monarch said, "I don't quite comprehend:
Pray where were you the livelong night?—and who's your female friend?
I don't quite see the story's point, or why she should be chased,
You skip so quick from kidneys to the lady's little waist!"

Again the frank young Prince began and told the story through,
Commencing where, aloft in air, the mad sky-charger flew.
He prosed about the charming child a little, to be sure,
And sketched, with pardonable pride, his brilliant coup d'amour.

"I chose not that the million Should say," continued he,

"He came a riding pillion,
With a wife upon his knee;
And therefore I alighted
At our country palace gate,
Till, royally invited,
I bring her home in state.
Pursuit! a likely notion!
I'm not myself, sir, yet;
That nag's confounded motion
Might steadier brains upset."

"Ah, that reminds me," cried the king. "Why, bless my heart and soul,
They're nicking off the rascal's head to clap upon a pole;
He needn't die—of course not—if you're certain you're alive—
Quick! check his fate, and through the gate that hateful heathen drive!

And for a hint, six kicks imprint with care upon his stern,
That lightly of the lame-foot maid* the tingle he may learn.
Now, lovelorn son, this mercy done, we'll view your lady's charms;
Ho! turn a torch-light escort out, and drummers beat to arms!"

Danced on the drum the larum-loud, the clear-throat bugles blew,
It's ravel bright of roaring light each bursting bonfire threw;
Forth strode the milk-white elephants in hugh throne-laden pairs,
And, shuddering at their foot-fall weight, far shook the city squares.

Then down the crowded rampart-line a cheer like thunder ran,
As through the massive gateway-arch poured the long-lighted van;
As rose amid the roar of drums the stormy serenade,
And streaming down the causeway went the endless cavalcade.

The fleece-drawn mist hangs bloodshot o'er the torchman's winding line;
Like shock-hair'd goblins of the dew the palm-trees blink and shine;
Till breeze-borne floats the wedding-march, blown back in filmy strains,
From a dusk-red hazy glimmer moving o'er the moonless plains.

They tapped the Indian on the back,
"Begone, you thief," said they;
"You just make track, and don't come back,
Or else alive you'll flay!

* "Pede Pœna claudo."

So swears his Royal Highness,
And his word he's like to keep;
So don't abuse his kindness
Now he's let you off so cheap."
Uprose the kneeling victim
With a scowl of serpent-hate,
And, as if the fiend had kicked him,
Ran yelping through the gate.
You cannot think how cunning
Was that varlet's foxy soul,
Nor, if you'd seen him running,
Had you ever guessed his goal.
With horrid croaks of malice,
And thoughts too vile to tell,
He reached the country palace,
And briskly rang the bell.

"De master of de Horse am I,"
Said he, "de King's a-coming;
Look where dat heap o' torches fly,
And harkee to de drumming!
To seat upon de saddle
His lady bright and true,
Young massa bid me rattle
Like a swish-tale kangaroo.
For, says he, 'the crowd's quite fur'us
To see my Princess fair,
And I guess they'll count it cur'us
If I fetch her home by air!'
But what's the good o' talkin'
Till we catch it 'cross the hide?
Will you please to let me walk in,
Till I set the gal astride?"

Alas, too trusting beauty!
Your Prince is at the gate;
But the nigger saves his booty
And the bridegroom comes too late.
Alas, too sanguine lover,
Dismounting at the doors,
As a pheasant whirrs from cover,
Away the Indian soars!
Aloft a blazing flambeau
He waves in triumph wild;
While, in the clutch of Sambo,
Screams the poor affrighted child!
"Hoy, Massa Prince,—good bye, sare!
Dis nigger up to snuff!
You catch me? O you try, sare!
Dat just one leetle tough.
Me neber had de measles,
So your sister count for small;
I'se one of dem born weasels
You don't trap every fall!
Dis fine gal suit me better,
All royal top to toe:—
Wal—in hopes to get a letter
'Fore long, up sky we go!"

End of the First Canto.

JOE LOCKHART'S DREAMS; OR, A TALE OF THE NEUK STICK.

BY W. CARLETON, ESQ.

Author of "Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry."

PART I.

There are certain parts of the world in which an opinion prevails that those who are born without the ordinary complement of rational faculties are placed in so peculiar a manner under the direct guidance and protection of God himself that they receive a degree of honour and reverence such as a devout Christian would pay to a saint or an apostle. In such countries the natural fool and idiot are looked upon as beings whose persons are not only privileged and sacred, but who besides are supposed to be chosen by the Creator as pure and inoffensive instruments through whom he frequently gives forth the manifestations of his will, especially as regards the future and the past. In fact they are considered as, to a certain extent, inspired, and their acts and words are supposed to imply a depth of meaning that is never attached to those of a reasonable individual. This is the case in many countries in the East as well as in the New World, and it may be fairly deemed a proof of our Oriental origin, that in some remote parts of our own land such opinions, a good deal limited and modified it is true, are found to exist.

One thing is obvious and well known with reference to this subject—which is that in all pagan nations their prophets and prophetesses were uniformly supposed to utter their oracles and responses under the influence of a divine fury which amounted to temporary insanity, and we know that the exorcists of the middle ages were similarly influenced. As it is not our intention, however, to write an essay on this particular subject, we shall dismiss it for the present, and proceed to the relation of a very singular narrative, the contents of which are perfectly true and well remembered by ourselves, as well as by many still living.

About thirty-four years ago there lived at a place called "the Widow Hill," that is to say, when correctly pronounced, "Woody" or "Wooded" Hill, three or four families named Cosgrove, Cullinan, Lockhart, and Gott. Tom Cosgrove and Jemmy Cullinan were both farmers of the more extensive and respectable class, and were consequently wealthy and independent men, considering their condition in life. Gott, who had been a serjeant-major in the army, was a pensioner, and only farmed about eight acres, if so much; he had also been originally a weaver and kept a weaving shop with half-a-dozen looms in full operation. Their farms marched each other, and perhaps it would be difficult to find a spot of greater rural beauty than the wild and sequestered little valley in which they lay. There ran parallel with, and winding according to the bendings of the upper farm, a beautiful and ancient road, which was its boundary on one side, and followed the curves of its extreme verge on that part. From this road—the sides of which on the right and left were overgrown with green short grass, and in many places spangled with wild flowers whose beauty and fragrance made a walk along it so peculiarly romantic and delightful—from this road we looked down into a sweet little vale that resembled an inverted bow, so green, so pastoral, and calm looking, that one's first natural wish would be to spend a life in a spot of such secluded beauty. Through this valley, so full of repose and solitude, wound a streamlet over a smooth sandy bottom, and in a nook, covered in summer with the golden-blossomed furze that perfumed the whole glen, it gathered itself into a clear pool, just deep enough in midsummer to wash the fleecy sheep which fed over its green pastures; for the farms we spoke of were stock farms, and their respective proprietors cultivated no more land than was barely necessary for their own support.

The distance between Cosgrove's residence and Cullinan's was about a quarter of a mile, and about three hundred yards to the left of the former place there lived another man named Lockhart, whose circumstances were quite as independent as those of his neighbours. This person's ancestors, being of Scotch descent, had been originally stern and gloomy Presbyterians, although he himself and his father adhered to the Roman Catholic religion, in consequence of his grandfather having adopted the creed of his wife who had belonged to the Catholic persuasion. This Lockhart's character was peculiar. The religious change which had taken place in his immediate family effected modifications of temper and disposition that were strikingly anomalous. He was a man of few words, and manifested in his bearing much of that shrewd but gloomy solemnity that characterized the old Covenanters of Scotland and the more rigid class of Northern Presbyterians. Upon this had been superinduced a feeble portion of that cheerfulness which usually marks the Irish temperament; but so strongly was it checked by the dark solemn spirit of his original creed, that it became a matter of some difficulty to estimate his character properly, or to determine the peculiar class of temperament to which he belonged. One vice, however, was deeply and indelibly imprinted upon his heart—to wit, an extraordinary and almost unparalleled love of money—and an indisposition to part with it, which made him rigid and penurious to the last degree.

Now, it so happened that this remarkable man had two sons—the elder of whom was named George, and the younger Joe, an idiot. George was a well-made, good-looking, cheerful young fellow, who inherited more apparently of his mother's disposition than his father's—to which his indeed seemed a very striking and decided contrast. He was a general favourite with every one; sang a good song, made a good jest, told an excellent story, and in general was the life and soul of every rustic assembly or festive sport where he appeared. Gifted with a handsome face, buoyant spirits, and a good voice, it is no wonder that he held a high place in the estimation of the softer sex, who principally admire those fortunate young fellows who happen to be so endowed.

The second son, Joe, was, as we have said, an idiot—one, we may add, from his birth. He was rather tall, slender, and of a melancholy but plain cast of countenance. His eyes were soft and solemn, and had that mild and dreamy look that is peculiar to his class. In his case, however, it was tempered into something that was singularly sweet and affectionate, although it is true the mournful expression was ever there. Altogether it was impossible to look upon him without interest as the kind and gentle creature passed from place to place, swayed by the innocent but capricious impulses of his nature.

Poor Joe, though fond of cleanliness, was, like every one of his class, rather negligent of his dress; and for this reason—but principally because his father would not go to the expense of purchasing new dress for him—he generally wore the old man's cast-off clothes; and as the latter was rather of a large size, his garments were considerably too much of an over-fit for the son, and added a characteristic vacancy to his very shape and appearance. In this loose trim he went about from place to place, regardless of heat or cold, and as much at his ease as if he had sat in a drawing-room.

If his mind, however, were a blank, or very nearly approaching to it, so was not his heart. The poor fellow was like a child in the innocence and simplicity of his affection. In fact, his being might be said to consist principally of love. It was nearly an impossibility to provoke him to anger. He loved everything and everybody, and was equally beloved in his turn. It was a well-known fact, that neither mischievous cattle nor fierce dogs were ever known to attack him. He was wholly exempt from the enmity of man and of the inferior animals, who seemed rebuked and awed by the power of his innocence and his unprotected condition, or, perhaps, by the unseen Spirit of God that accompanied and protected him wherever he went.

If, however, there was one being beyond another whom he loved, it was his brother George; and we are sorry to say that George formed, perhaps, the only exception in life among those who loved him. From whatever cause it proceeded, the fact cannot be concealed that he did not treat the gentle and affectionate creature well. He has frequently striven to annoy and vex him, but in vain; the poor boy had ever met him with smiles; and when, on some occasions, he has gone so far as to raise his hand to him, the look of affectionate sorrow he received in return for the blows he had inflicted was enough to soften a heart of stone. And yet George, after all, was not cruel to him according to our notions of cruelty. He was the only one, indeed, from whom the other ever received a harsh word, or a blow, and even these were not very often repeated, for George was not, nor could he be, entirely destitute of affection for his gentle and defenceless brother. Poor Joe was in the habit of frequently getting copper money, in small quantities, sometimes from strangers, who took it for granted that, like most of his unhappy class, he must have been destitute and stood in need of assistance, and sometimes, besides, from many who knew him, and who availed themselves of that opportunity to put it in his power to purchase fruit and sweetmeats, and other little rarities of the kind. Sometimes these loose coppers accumulated in his pockets, until he has found himself master of a shilling or two; on which occasions his brother George usually made it a point, either to steal the money from him while asleep, or to take it by open violence—in both of which creditable acts he was not unfrequently anticipated by his father.

Tom Cosgrove, their neighbour, had two sons, also fine athletic young men, full of courage and animal spirits. He also had one daughter, by far the most beautiful peasant-girl in the whole parish. Mary Cosgrove was rather petty in size, but of almost perfect symmetry. Her luxuriant tresses were beautifully fair, her sweet oval face pale but exquisitely clear and indicative of health. Indeed it would be difficult to see anything more delicious than her small rose-bud mouth, displaying, when she smiled, a set of teeth that could not be surpassed for whiteness and regularity; whilst the light that danced in her laughing blue eyes, reflected from within the purest imaginable spirit of innocence and light-hearted mirth.

A little before the period when our narrative commences, Mary Cosgrove, in consequence of the death of an unmarried uncle who had adopted her, and with whom she had lived almost since her childhood, had returned to the house of her father, who was now preparing to emigrate to America, on the invitation of another wealthy brother, also childless, by whom he and his whole family were pressed to go and partake of his prosperity. Mary, in the meantime, had been left the sum of five hundred pounds by her uncle, and was consequently looked upon by the young men of that and the neighbouring parishes with a degree of interest proportioned to her wealth and beauty.

The next house in point of vicinity to Tom Cosgrove's, was that of Bob Gott, the pensioner. Bob was as well to do in the world as any of them, for, in point of fact, the country at that period, owing to the great circulation of money arising from war prices and a forced market, was plethoric with wealth, if we contrast its circumstances then with its lazar-like condition of to-day. Gott had no children, but his wife, a thin, keen black-eyed woman, who knew the value of a shilling, and was abundantly gifted with the use of the tongue, rendered it unnecessary for him, in consequence of her bustling and active industry, to keep more than one servant, who was a Connaught woman, by name Honor Burke, from beside the town of Ballina.

Honor was as frugal, as saving in her habits, and as active as her mistress, with whom she was a great favourite, having lived in the family for about eight years. We have said she was a Connaught woman, but we omitted to add, that although an humble servant-maid, she was possessed of a good deal of money—more indeed than any one would suppose she ever could have saved during the period of her service. As, however, Connaught servants, when they come to the north, or, as it is usually termed "down the country," sometimes adopt a method of getting together money that is well worthy of imitation, we shall briefly detail it here; regretting, at the same time, that the same method is not more generally put in practice by other servants, as well as a few occasional ones who come from the West.

The first thing they do after they have got a couple of pounds together, is to purchase a year-old calf, which is sent up to the mountain-districts to graze, where grazing is got for a mere trifle. Here it is kept upon one of those rough upland stock farms, until it becomes a springer, when it is sold, generally for a good price, and thus is a new capital created for a larger purchase, and perhaps two or three year olds are now sent by the same speculator to the same farm. In this manner, they proceed putting up money by a very simple but effectual process, until they sometimes have from fifty to a hundred or a hundred and fifty pounds accumulated.

Honor Burke was known to have money, and it was felt and admitted besides that she deserved to have it, inasmuch as she seemed, by her good conduct, industry, and honesty, an admirable example to girls in her situation of life. If she had any fault at all, it was that her heart, for the last two or three years, had settled down into a strong and increasing love of money and an earnest desire to accumulate it.

In consequence of the proximity of Gott's house (where Honor lived) and Tom Cosgrove's, there was almost a daily intercourse between the families. Mary Cosgrove, since her residence at home, occasioned by her uncle's death, took a strong personal liking to Honor, and as a mark of respect for her admirable qualities and unblemished character, she treated her with uniform kindness and attention. There existed, however, in addition to the possession in common of many excellent qualities, another cause of sympathy between the two young women. Honor, not only in shape and size, but also in manner—the very colour of her hair—and what was still more extraordinary, in her features, bore a remarkable likeness to Mary Cosgrove; and if the former had had a sufficiently liberal spirit to afford herself any kind of becoming or decent dress, it would have been difficult at a distance to have distinguished them from each other. To dress well, however, was more than poor Honor, whose heart was beginning to contract and harden by the love of wealth, thought she could afford to do; and nothing could induce her to put on becoming garments at her own expense.

Until Mary Cosgrove's return from her late uncle's, George Lockhart seemed to look upon Honor with more than usual interest. She was an admirable girl, active, frugal, and industrious—highly respected for her enterprise and many virtues—and possessed, it was known, of more than a hundred pounds fortune—together with a considerable share of personal beauty. All these matters operating together, began gradually to produce their legitimate influence upon the heart of George, who considered that it might not be easy to find a more valuable wife than Honor—for, although she was a servant, it was known that her family was as respectable as his own, if not considerably more so. In a short time, it became evident that an attachment had arisen between them, and so admirably were they considered to be adapted for each other, that their marriage was looked forward to not only as a certain event, but as one that must necessarily be productive of mutual happiness and much temporal prosperity. They were already betrothed to each other—that is to say, pledged by a hand-promise, which is considered among the lower classes of the Irish as more binding than an oath itself.

In this state were matters between them for some time previous to the return of Mary Cosgrove to her father's house. Neither Honor nor Lockhart made any secret of their relative position, and ultimate prospects and intention, with the exception of the betrothment, the mention of which George always treated with a hearty laugh—a laugh, indeed, of that equivocal kind, that it seemed neither to admit nor deny it.

The truth is, Mary's arrival in the neighbourhood seemed to cause what is termed in higher circles, quite a sensation. The girl was amiable, generous, kind, and beautiful; in fact, possessed of every virtue that could adorn her humble life; and, in addition to all this, she was in possession of five-hundred pounds' dowry—a sum which, when taken in connection with her singular beauty and sweet disposition, along with large expectations from another wealthy uncle, was enough to draw lovers from every point of the compass. This money her uncle gave her with his own hands, together with an emerald-ring—a gift and keepsake from a young lady, who, having proved inconstant to him in early life, and married his rival, caused him to give up all notions of matrimony, and lead the life of a bachelor.

"I pay you this money, my dear," he said, "with my own hands, lest any thing might possibly happen to prevent you from getting it; and this ring," he added, presenting it to her—"wear it if you like—or give it away if you like—all I ask is not to prove deceitful to the man that loves you—as she did who gave it to me. And Mary, listen—never marry the man you don't love—nor allow any person on earth to force you into such a marriage. You are now an independent girl, so bestow upon the man you love, unless his moral character be a bad one, both yourself and the fortune that's lying there before you. Now, God bless you, and make you happy both here and hereafter—for you deserve it."

Knowing, therefore, Mary's position and prospects, our readers will not be surprised that many a close siege was laid to her heart—some for the sake of her beauty, and more still for the sake of her wealth. We know not under which class, at present, to place George Lockhart, but most assuredly we are bound to state that Mary Cosgrove had not been a month in her father's family when this gay and handsome young fellow became her secret admirer, and lost no possible opportunity of attempting to win her affections. Mary felt somewhat surprised at this, and taxed him with his want of faith to Honor Burke; but his reply was very natural—he admitted that he had been rather fond of Honor Burke, but that he had never been actually in love with her, and that at all events ever since he had seen her (Mary), he could think of no other female, nor even let her out of his head, or his heart. He did not want her fortune; his father was rich, and he would inherit his farm and his wealth; he did not care then about her fortune; he loved her for her own sake and for nothing else. Mary at once told him his plea was vain; he was solemnly engaged, she said, to Honor Burke, and bound to fulfil his engagements to her. She thanked him for the opinion he expressed for her, but assured him that all importunity upon the subject would be an idle waste of time, for that he never must expect a favourable answer from her. Little confidence, she said, could be placed in a man who had already been inconstant to a virtuous and handsome girl.

Lockhart, however, by no means abandoned his suit; but as he treated Mary with great respect and natural delicacy, she felt that she could not receive these painful proposals with rudeness or insult, and, consequently, they met each other upon civil and agreeable, though not at all upon intimate, terms.

Among the others who paid their addresses to this rustic toast and beauty, was young James Cullinan, the eldest son of their neighbour, Jemmy. This fine young man and George Lockhart had, on many occasions, found themselves rivals. In leaping, foot-ball playing, throwing the stone, wrestling, &c., they were very nearly matches, whilst, at the same time, a greater number of successes gave a superiority to Cullinan. In consequence of this—although they met and spoke on decidedly friendly terms, to all appearance, at least, yet there lurked, unquestionably, that latent and jealous feeling on each side which it is never at any time difficult to kindle up into enmity. Here, then, in the affections of Mary Cosgrove, appeared another subject of rivalry, the most serious and important, beyond all parallel, that had yet arisen between them. Mary saw this feeling and strongly deprecated it, and in order, besides, to prevent disagreeable consequences between two impetuous young men, and avoid the painful risk of becoming the subject of a vulgar brawl, she endeavoured so to manage her deportment as to give neither of them, while in the presence of the other, cause for triumph—an error of judgment, on her part, which only perpetuated the ill-will between them.

In the mean time, let the matter have happened as it may, the rumour had gone abroad that James Cullinan and George Lockhart were far a-head of all competitors for Mary's hand, and the difficulty lay in determining which of them should be ultimately successful. A little time, however, soon struck the balance on that point. Mary's whole family threw themselves into Cullinan's scale, and although she herself expressed an anxiety rather to remain as she was than to marry at that present time, she felt herself completely overborne, and was obliged to hear Cullinan spoken of by every person, her own relatives included, as her future husband.

It is not to be supposed, on the other hand, that Honor Burke was an indifferent spectator to the defection of her plighted lover, or that the reports which reached her ears passed away like idle conversation. Her attachment to Lockhart possessed double strength. She loved him in the first place because she knew that his father was wealthy, and that his son would necessarily inherit all his property; and she loved him besides from a personal motive, because the young man was very handsome and amiable. Had the influence of money not taken possession of her heart she would have loved him in the first place from the tender impulses of womanly affection—but at the present stage of our narrative that was with her only a secondary element in the attachment she felt for him.

Towards Mary Cosgrove her feelings were of a different character. Without having any direct cause for personal resentment against her, she could not avoid reflecting that Mary had deprived her of the affections of the young man whom she had loved with a devotion which gratified all that was natural and kind in her heart, whilst we may add for her, with all besides that was, so far as regarded the spirit of the world, selfish and unwomanly there.

During the competition between the two rivals for Mary's affections, she could observe occasionally that whenever Honor and she happened to meet, the latter was in the habit of getting pale as death, and that from time to time, if she imagined that Mary did not perceive her, she turned upon her one of those brief, but fearful glances which none but a jealous and neglected woman can give or understand. She was also in the habit, at this time, of musing and walking in solitary places, with her chin upon her hand, as if she were engaged in deep thought, or in devising some secret plan or project for the recovery, perhaps, of her faithless lover's affections. What the subject of her contemplations and the cause of retiring to solitude could be, was out of the power of any person to ascertain, although, perhaps we may be enabled to guess at it before the conclusion of the narrative.

Mary saw at once, and felt, that the poor girl was suffering much, and knew that she, herself, had, without deserving it, lost favour in her sight. She resolved, therefore, to come to an early explanation with her on the subject, and to set her right, at least, so far as she herself and young Lockhart were concerned. With this object in view she sent word to Honor that she wished to have some conversation with her upon a particular subject, and would feel obliged if she came over for a few minutes. Honor in the course of the evening came, and Mary, when they had retired to the garden, addressed her as follows:—

"I was anxious to see you, Honor, for your own sake more than for mine. I esteem you and respect your character very much, and I do think it was a very dishonourable thing in George Lockhart to desert and neglect you as he has done."

"Was this what you wanted to spake to me about, Miss Mary?" replied Honor, whilst her face got darkly pale, and her eyes shot actual fire.

"Principally;" said Mary, "but I had another thing to mention too. I am going to place great confidence in you; but first, about George Lockhart."

"Let that be last, if you please;" returned Honor, "George Lockhart is no more to me, now, than any other man. He's your favourite, Miss Mary; and I don't think it was very generous in you to encourage a young man that you knew was hand-promised to another girl."

"It was to set you right upon that very point," replied Mary, "that I sent for you. I never encouraged him—so far from that, Mary, George Lockhart knows that his case is hopeless with me. I told him, from the beginning, that a ring never would or could go upon him and me; and, I said, that even if there was nothing else to prevent it, his conduct to you would do it. I now tell you the same thing, in order that your mind may be easy on the subject, and that, if you indulge in any bad feeling, Honor, it may not be against me."

"Well, that's very kind of you, Miss Mary;" replied Honor, in a tone, however, which Mary did not altogether like, "but you said you had a saicret to tell me."

"So I have;" said Mary, "but the time has not yet come to tell it; when it does, Honor, I shall try your good faith; and God forgive you, if you deceive or betray me."

About this period, there returned to the neighbourhood a young man named Murray, who had been finishing, at a classical school some few miles distant, his preparatory education, as a candidate for Maynooth. He had, in fact, already passed a very gratifying and successful examination for entrance before his bishop, and was, on the evening of the conversation between Mary Cosgrove and Honor Burke, within a few days of starting for college. Murray was an exceedingly handsome young fellow, remarkable for a very manly and intelligent bearing. Between his family and Mary's there never had been any intimacy or intercourse, beyond what is known as a mere speaking acquaintanceship. "The young priest," however, was respected and admired, and very justly so, for his amiable qualities and fine person, and was consequently a very general favourite.

Every Irish reader knows, that when a candidate for the Roman Catholic Church is about to go to Maynooth, it is usual for the neighbours to call upon him, as a mark of respect, to drink a friendly glass with his family—perhaps to leave a few pounds behind them, if they think that his circumstances require it, and, at all events, to take their leave of him, and wish him success in his arduous and sacred undertaking. It is also customary in the young candidate himself, in many instances, to call upon certain more distant neighbours, and those with whom he is less intimate, in order to take his leave of them, receive their congratulations, and bid them a kind farewell. On this occasion, therefore, Murray, who was dressed in black, which set off his person well, remarkable as it was for a good deal of natural and gentlemanly ease, came a few days before his departure for college, to bid farewell, among others, to the Cosgroves. He was asked to stop for tea, an unusual treat in those days, which he did, and spent a couple of hours in very agreeable chat with the family. At parting, he shook hands with them all, and expressed his warm sense of the hospitable and respectful cordiality with which he had been treated.

At this very period, Cosgrove's family and Cullinan's looked upon the marriage of Mary and young James as an arrangement that was understood, and all but finally settled upon. It is due to Mary, however, to state here that it was one to which she had never lent her final sanction, even when it had been formally and seriously proposed to her by her own family; on the contrary, she always held herself at liberty to reject it. Young Cullinan himself she treated with kindness and good humour, but whenever he approached the subject in question, she either laughed him out of it, or became too grave to suffer it to be seriously discussed. Indeed, Cullinan himself began to fear that his progress in her affections—if he had ever made any—was advancing but slowly; and a circumstance which we will now mention, seemed to confirm him in his apprehensions. Mary, ever since her uncle's death, was in the habit of going once a fortnight, or so, to the Neuk Stick Farm—for so her uncle's place was called—for the purpose of seeing that everything was proceeding aright, and that the furniture and other chattels were kept in proper order. An old female relative and some servants were at that time taking care of the house and farm, until the crop then in the ground should be secured, and the farm disposed of—for as Tom Cosgrove had proposed to avail himself of his wealthy brother's invitation to America, he was only then waiting to secure the crop, together with the value of the holding, which, with the lease of it, had been left to him by the late proprietor. For some time past Mary, when going over in the evening to her uncle's, had permitted young Cullinan to accompany her—at all events to see her safely over a kind of simple wooden bridge, called The Neuk Stick. This consisted of a long round tree laid across a narrow portion of the river, which in that spot formed an angle, or Neuk, as it was termed—and on this account the bridge in question was known as The Neuk Stick.

It was considered a great privilege to be allowed the pleasure of seeing Mary over The Neuk Stick, but it was one of which Cullinan had of late been deprived. Mary on the two recent visits to her uncle's had gone alone, nor would she permit Cullinan, under any possible pretence, to accompany her—a piece of firmness or coldness on her part which nettled him very much, and threw him into fits of despondency and depression.

The reader is already aware that Mary Cosgrove had promised to repose some peculiar confidence in Honor Burke, and it would seem that in a few days after their last interview, the secret in question, or at least a portion of it, had been communicated to her. Mary had, in fact, sent for her again, brought her out to the garden, held a long dialogue with her, and after having made presents of dress, shook hands with her, and bade her an affectionate good evening.

Honor on her way home, after dusk, met her former lover, George Lockhart, at a gate which led from a narrow lane by a pathway up to her master Gott's. Each involuntarily paused, and at length Lockhart spoke.

"Well, Honor," said he, "what's the news?"

"Nothing very pleasant for you," she replied. "A new broom, they say, sweeps clean; but for all that, Mary Cosgrove gave you the go-by—you thought you were sure of her—but you see your chance I hope."

"Fine feathers make fine birds, Honor," he replied; "and to tell you the truth she made a fool of me, or rather I made a fool of myself, like the rest of the young fellows."

"No, no, George," replied Honor, shrewdly, "that wasn't it—but five hundred was better than one—and yet may be we have more than one to the fore, and half a one to the back o' that."

"Honor," returned the other, "after all I think the best thing you and I could do is to forget and forgive. I'll forget Mary Cosgrove, and you'll forgive me."

"I may forgive you," she answered, "but I'll never forgive Mary Cosgrove. You loved me well until you saw her face."

"Indeed, that's true, Honor, sure enough;" said George, "but if it's any satisfaction to you to know, I can tell you that I'm indifferent enough about her now—the truth is, I could cudgel myself soundly for being such a fool as I was—and after all she is not better looking than yourself."

"I'm inclined to think, George," said Honor, "that you like money—indeed you would not be your father's son, if you didn't?"

"I don't hate it, at all events;" he replied, "but why do you ask?"

"Because I could put five hundred pounds into your hands, and nobody the wiser—if you had a heart—that is the heart of a man and not of a coward."

Lockhart started at the extraordinary import of her words, and looked upon her with astonishment and incredulity.

"Put five hundred pounds into my hands!" he exclaimed. "In the name of all that's wonderful, how could you bring that about?"

"I haven't time to tell you now," she replied, "but if you meet me behind the Sally Garden, about half an hour after dusk, to-morrow evening, I'll tell you that—aye, and another hundred and fifty along with all. At any rate, it's very little goodwill Mary Cosgrove deserves at your hands—she does nothing but make sport of you—turns you into a common laughing-stock."

"Never to my face, Honor."

"No," she replied, "I'm not saying that—she's too cunning, but behind your back she's jibing you for ever."

"But couldn't you tell me now," he inquired, "how I'm to get the money?"

"No," she replied again, "I cannot—I have some things to think over first; and besides, my mind's not made up to mention it to you at all. All that I can say now is, that it isn't by fasting, praying, or building churches, that the money's to be got—I mean the five hundred. Now, good night—you won't forget to-morrow evening? But whisht," she added, bitterly, "don't promise, for if you do you won't come." Having uttered these words she ran along the pathway that led to her master's house, and in a couple of minutes was engaged in preparing the supper.

That night George Lockhart's mind felt disturbed and darkened. What, he asked himself, can she mean by putting five hundred pounds into my hands? Could it be possible that she spoke of Mary Cosgrove's fortune? for that's the sum her uncle left her. Or—stay—could she mean anything dark or dangerous? It's not, she said, by fasting, praying, or building churches, that the money's to be got. That looks suspicious. Five hundred! it's a great deal of money. And she talked of another hundred and fifty—which is her own, I suppose. Well, that's more than I thought she had—six hundred and fifty! I didn't care if I had it, at all events—if I had, I wouldn't call the king my cousin. However, I can make nothing of it, so I'll go to sleep if I can."

NEWS FROM OUR DIGGER.

LOG LINES FROM THE "CHALMERS."

PART I.

Departure.—Being seized like many others with a violent attack of the gold-fever, which was so prevalent at the beginning of the present year, and finding I could obtain little or no relief by staying in England, I resolved to try the effect of the homœopathic system of treatment, and administer to myself a dose of pure gold (if I could only get it) from the native diggings of Australia, in the hopes thereby of effecting a perfect cure. I, therefore, on Sunday, 1st August, 1852, embarked, at Gravesend on board, the good ship, "Chalmers," bound for Melbourne direct. This vessel was advertised as offering great advantages over other emigrant vessels, being fitted up under the superintendence, and after the plan, so successfully carried out by Mrs. Chisholm; the consequence of which was that every berth was engaged. As I passed over the gangway, the first gun was fired to give notice to those who might be ashore, of our approaching departure, and also to clear the decks of those friends who had come to bid most of us an eternal farewell. Our names from the muster-roll being called over, and duly responded to, Mrs. Chisholm mounted the poop-steps, and addressed with great fluency and eloquence a very attentive audience. The matter of her speech was almost entirely confined to the object of emigration, advice as to our conduct on board and on landing, together with our future prospects of success. The second gun was now fired, a final clearing of strangers from the decks took place, a steam tug was attached to our bows, and amid many tears and sighs, waving of hats and handkerchiefs, and vigorous shouts, we glided slowly over the bosom of old Father Thames; and at the Nore, separating ourselves from our steaming friend, we spread our sails to a stiff breeze, and ere night set in, many, for the first time, began to feel that they were really on the sea, and to wish themselves back again in their snug and comfortable beds ashore.

Our Ship, Crew, and Passengers.—Shortly after leaving the Downs, we encountered very heavy weather, which fully tested the qualities of our ship, which, fortunately for us, proved to be first rate, or, as they would say, at Lloyds, A1. She was ship-rigged, built of teak, after the best models, 650 tons register, and nearly new; this being only her second voyage. Our captain was a member of the numerous family of Smiths, short, rather stout, and very sunburnt; in manner reserved, seldom speaking to any of the passengers, but constantly smoking a long clay pipe; on the whole, a good man, careful in the hour of danger, and a skillful and experienced navigator of more than thirty years' standing. First mate, a Scotchman of the McGreggor clan, short, thick-set, and very upright, round head, ripstone-pippin cheeks, separated by a broken nose, much resembling the imaginary nose on the face of a cocoa-nut, chatty and fond of spinning a long yarn to his favourites, and hearing a good joke; possessed of a mighty voice, the terror of the children; a martyr to rheumatism, and a capital specimen of a true British sailor. Second mate, young, short, strong, and rough as a young bear at play, cracked voice, good seaman, and rather a favourite with the single ladies. Doctor, young, agreeable, and married; had some experience as a ship-doctor, and attentive in all cases of real illness, a most inveterate smoker, and bound for the diggings. Crew, as a body, rather better than usual. Our passengers numbered in all 255; viz., 132 male adults, 58 female, 29 male children, 27 female, and 9 infants.

Among these were, I believe, a sample of almost every trade and profession, but tailors and linen-drapers' shopmen predominated. The former might be easily distinguished from the rest of the passengers by their bowed legs and peculiar walk; the latter by their finnikin ways, and smart dapper attire, especially on Sundays, when they came out as strong as if they intended taking a walk in Hyde Park. We had our lawyers, doctors, merchants, actors, shoemakers, tinkers, farmers, policemen, soldiers, cooks (two of Soyer's), bakers, butchers, &c., also governesses, singers, milliners, straw-bonnet-makers, housemaids, &c. Such was the floating population of the good ship "Chalmers."

Aristocracy and Democracy.—Our ship certainly possessed one great advantage over many of the vessels which leave England, and this was, instead of having three classes of passengers, she had but one, all being placed on an equal footing, and having the free range of the vessel from stem to stern. The only division was between the married and single. Strange to say, in spite of this excellent arrangement, a certain separation or classification took place, and we had not been long at sea before we had our aristocracy and democracy. This was noticed by all, and although we mixed together at mess and on deck, still there was a very perceptible division of certain parties, and it was not at all an uncommon thing to hear such expressions as the following:—"Oh! what can you expect from him, he's an aristocrat;" or "Never mind that fellow, he's only one of the democracy."—Another fact was, that the aristocracy were always to be found on the poop, while the democrats, who had an equal right to be there, rarely ventured, but kept together in midships, or, pipe-smoking, around the galley. If, by chance, a democrat had the boldness to venture on the poop, you would see him look round, seemingly uneasy, appear out of place, fidget about for a short time, and finally making a precipitate rush below, join his friends with the pipes at the galley.

Love Making.—"Love is the theme of the minstrel all over the earth."—So sayeth the song; and most truly doth love find a home in an emigrant ship. No sooner had we got clear of the Channel and the stormy weather, than the single men, in spite of the strict printed rules and regulations, would go aft to see to the bodily comforts of the single women. Love on ship-board usually commences in the following manner. Some highly inflammable young gentleman, most likely his own master for the first time, assists some delicate, tender-hearted young lady just recovering from sea-sickness, on to the poop, and, when there, carefully places her to windward, right in the captain's privileged walk, and then, wrapping her up comfortably in a railway rug, will discourse with her upon the beauties of the ocean, with which he pretends to be familiar and to like, but inwardly detests; or reads in a soft voice some equally soft novel.

Love, now having fairly gained a footing, is not content with having attached one pair of hearts, but shoots his shafts right and left, and soon firmly establishes himself. Couples are quickly formed, who drop daily into their places on the poop and quarter-deck, to which they, and even the rest of the passengers, think they have an undoubted right. As evening advances, they walk to and fro in tender converse, and when night closes in, they take their places on the spars and long-boat. One couple claimed a right to the pig-sty, from which circumstance this sweet and favoured spot obtained the name of the "Bower of Love."

It was the duty of our doctor to collect together his charges (the single girls) at ten o'clock, and see them safe into their cabins; and well did he know, even to an inch, where to find those young ladies who consider themselves engaged; but it was a far more difficult matter to find those marked as "not wanted during the voyage;" for, like lost sheep, they strayed unprotected and uncared for, here, there, and everywhere. Question for the curious—How many marriages will take place from all this love-making afloat?

Lost and Found.—There are few places, I think, where so many things go astray, get lost, or are stolen, as on board an emigrant ship. Almost immediately after weighing anchor, our knives, forks, spoons, pannikins, &c., established the baneful habit of going a-visiting, and staying out, not only at night, but for weeks and months together. For instance, my fork had been on a visit for two whole months, when one day, like the prodigal, it thought proper to return, minus two of its prongs, proving, beyond doubt, its having been in most disreputable society, and now only returned to its lawful owner when utterly useless to the set it had joined. As for my spoons, they all left me in the Channel, and never returned; so I put it down that they ended their days disgracefully in some wash-kid, and were duly consigned to their final resting-place, Davy Jones's locker. But the worst of it was, that this rakish conduct on the part of the aforesaid knives, forks, and spoons, bred a habit of pilfering amongst their masters; thus, a knife and fork having agreed to join company and start on a visit, their master, on discovering their absence, would doubtless be seriously inconvenienced, but he will in the first place most likely put up quietly with their loss, contenting himself solely with advertising their desertion, and supplicating those who may find them to bring them back to their disconsolate owner; but this, after a time, not having the desired effect, it is ten chances to one but that he changes tactics, and slyly pounces on the first stray knife and fork which comes across his path; and henceforth, from this circumstance, a perfect system of petty larceny runs rampant throughout the ship.

Our posting-houses for lost articles, theatrical announcements, &c., were the wash-houses and galley; and numerous were the posters which daily appeared, and droll enough some of them were. Here are some specimens:—

LOST.

A red silk pocket handkerchief, having a yellow border, and green spots, all over. Any person finding the same, will greatly oblige the owner, by bringing it to cabin 14, better known as "Bank Villa." P.S.—If this handkerchief, after the above notice is, by chance, seen in the possession of any individual, the party in charge thereof, will be fully and handsomely rewarded by the rightful owner for his trouble, and the fatherly care he has taken of it.

NOTICE.

If the gentleman (?) who was seen coolly partaking this morning at his breakfast of a fat rasher of bacon, off a plate marked M. E. 17, does not immediately return the plate to its lawful mess, his name will be posted, and he himself be placed in considerable personal danger. N.B.—If HE IS a gentleman, he will send a rasher of his favourite bacon along with the plate.

ATTENTION.

If the gentleman who cut off the straps and buckles from a leather trunk this morning, will call on Mr. Noble, at his cabin, he can have his head well punched for his trouble.

Washing.—During the fine weather, the scene on the forecastle every morning was highly amusing, for there might be seen some twenty or thirty men rubbing and scrubbing away at shirts, trousers, handkerchiefs, socks, and such like articles of daily wear, with all the energy of professed washerwomen. Here, seated on the anchor, was one up to his very elbows in suds, sousing some half-dozen coloured shirts; there, another on his knees scrubbing with a hard brush, a dirty, very dirty pair of canvass trousers; while, hid in a corner, as if for shame, would be one of the dandies of the ship, who, not being quite up to the mark in the science of washing, would be dabbling in a shallow tin bowl, containing about half a pint of water, and a little thin bit of hard white soap, a pair of socks and a small white pocket handkerchief. Then again, what a sight did our vessel present in the afternoon! One would suppose it had been taken possession of by some vast washing company, lines of clothes were hung across in every direction, and every available spot on the standing rigging covered with day-shirts, night-shirts, both male and female, trousers, ditto, ditto, handkerchiefs, stockings, caps, gowns, &c.; these, when fully inflated by the wind, presented a most comical appearance. Woe to the unfortunate individual who, either through innocence or neglect, attached his line of clothes to any of the running tackle, for let Jack but see it, and so surely was he to cut it down, and send it adrift on a voyage of discovery.

Manias.—In our little society we also had our manias. They began soon after we fairly got to sea, and the dire effects of sea-sickness had in some degree worn off—I think the first was a singing one. Night after night, without any preconcerted notice, all assembled at eight o'clock on the long-boat and pig-sty (a sweet place for sweet sounds), when a chairman was immediately chosen, and then, without any further ceremony, except perhaps a tap with a hammer on the gunwale of the boat, he would call upon some gentleman to oblige with a song; certainly, a Mr. Matthews would, and forthwith, "What are you going to stand, my boys?"—would be vociferated by the above-mentioned Mr. Matthews, who possessed a treble bass voice, and then a general chorus would unanimously answer "What are you going to stand?"—After the applause (which was by no means of the Opera House kind) had subsided, some thin pale-faced gentleman would warble forth "Wilt thou love me then as now?" which, in all probability, would be responded to by a shrill squeak from the pigs, ever and anon disturbed from their repose, either by the sentimental gentleman's falsetto or their pinched tails. The singing, at last, began to flag, but the grand break-up arose, I think, from lights being introduced, and the singers (at the request of the ladies, whose olfactory nerves were rather too delicate to tolerate the pigs) being desired to remove to the after-part of the vessel. Many now altogether refused to sing, and so the singing mania gradually declined. But, another soon took its place; this was the Carpentering Mania, and it started by altering all our cabin doors, which were hinged, into sliding ones—certainly a great improvement; and as this commenced just as we were getting into the warm latitudes, our amateur carpenters employed their talents (in some cases with great success) in the manufacture of small tables, chairs, and stools. Then burst forth a mighty mania for evening tea-parties on deck. The weather became cool again; tea-parties al fresco were on the wane, when a lady suddenly found out the means of converting bouilli meat, a much despised article, into the most savory of potted meats. Then pestles and mortars, chopping-boards, seasoning and spices, were in active demand—this was followed by every man becoming his own tinman, and a perfect din rang through the ship, as preserved meat-cans were being fashioned into every kind of domestic and culinary article, from a gigantic Dutch oven (which, by the by, was a sad failure) to a stew-pan. But the worst of all the manias, while it lasted, was the raffling mania; it broke out suddenly with a straw hat value five shillings, and died as instantaneously with a pair of pistols, value ten pounds. During the time it raged, it tainted nearly all, from stem to stern of the vessel, and articles of every description were put up, amongst which were pipes, hams, coats, tools, watches, accordians, hats, rugs, books, &c. One day, the last of its existence, when it was raging at its greatest height, chances were bought and sold, and dice rattled on every table and in every cabin, until at length all appeared perfectly surfeited. It died that very evening as suddenly as if by the stroke of some unseen headsman's axe, and was heard of no more.

Sunday.—The duties due to the Sabbath were never neglected, except in case of bad weather, and then only in a morning, when the service could not be performed on deck on account of exposure to cold and wet, nor between decks, as in the evening, owing to the preparations making by the various messes for dinner. In fine weather the morning service was hold on the quarter-deck, where seats were arranged for the congregation, which was generally numerous. The booby-hatch, covered with the ensigns, served as a pulpit, and it was the duty of our doctor to read prayers, while one of the passengers would undertake to act as clerk. The psalms and hymns were generally well sung by our principal singers, and the sermon was either preached or read by one of the passengers. A Mr. Bell was exceedingly au fait at extempore preaching, and gave us some most excellent lectures; he, therefore, was more frequently called upon than any of the other passengers. Our Sunday afternoons, when fine, were passed in walking the decks, reading, journal and letter writing; but no labour of any kind was allowed, neither would our captain so much as permit a newspaper or novel to be brought up on the poop. It was a day of rest and devotion, and was strictly observed as such.

Classes.—Shortly after our departure from England, several classes were formed for the instruction of the juvenile portion of our community, such as day and Sunday schools. These were quickly followed by others of a more entertaining and attractive character, in which the adults took a part, such as dancing, fencing, singing, drilling, &c. Having from my youth upwards always been a stanch devotee to the flighty muse Terpsichore, I entered into partnership with another devotee, and opened a dancing academy, free of all charge, for both juveniles and adults. The following is a copy of our circular:—

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

Royal Atlantic Dancing Academy.

Messrs. Moon and Percy beg most respectfully to inform their friends and fellow-passengers on board the good ship Chalmers, that they intend to open an academy for the instruction of the adult and juvenile members of the community, in the polite science of dancing, on Monday, Sept. 13th, between the hours of three and five p.m.; and, at the same hour (weather permitting), every succeeding Monday and Wednesday. For further particulars, apply at Messrs. Moon and Percy's respective cabins, Nos. 13 and 14, Larboard and Starboard-streets, single men's department.

(Signed) MOON AND PERCY.

Sept. 13, 1852.

N. B.—Dancing academy situated on the quarter-deck, between the mainmast and poop.

The result far exceeded our most ardent expectations; for, on our opening day, we had the names of more than fifty members entered on our books, at least thirty of whom were adults. On forming our classes, we found that some had a partial knowledge of the art, and only required a little practice and instruction to make them proficient; but the mass were totally ignorant of it, and the turning in of toes and difficulty of getting them to turn out, seemed to be the great obstacle to surmount, but by degrees we succeeded, except on very rough and rolling days. The drill class was a great source of attraction, and always well attended, being admirably suited to the cold weather we fell in with after leaving the tropics. This class was under the superintendence of an old ex-guardsman, who took vast pains with his awkward-squad; and mighty indignant was he when told that the marching and counter-marching of himself and raw recruits worked the pitch out of the seams, and let the water into the cabins below, and that, therefore, he must disband his regiment; but he would'nt.

Songs Afloat.—There is one thing in particular which is sure to attract the attention of a landsman when he first sets his foot on board ship, and this is the songs sung by the seamen whilst performing their various duties. These songs, which often, as regards words, are made impromptu, are most enlivening and spirited; and a good singing crew, with a clever leader, may, in my opinion, be looked upon in the light of a blessing on board any ship. In a little schooner in which I made a voyage up the Mediterranean, we had some excellent singers; and scarcely was a rope touched, sail set, or other heavy work done, without a song: and this may, in some measure, be accounted for by the encouragement given them by our captain, who would often promise all hands a tot of rum, if they did their work in a seamanlike manner, and sang well. The good effect of this was very visible on the men, who evidently pulled the ropes more cheerfully and with double vigour. The following are specimens:—

On Hauling up Topsail Yards, after Reefing.

Polly Racket, hi-ho, cheerymen—(pull),
Pawned my jacket, hi-ho, cheerymen—(pull),
And sold the ticket, hi-ho, cheerymen—(pull);
Ho, hawly, hi-ho, cheerymen—(pull).

Rouse him up, hi-ho, cheerymen—(pull),
Pull up the devil, hi-ho, cheerymen—(pull);
And make him civil, hi-ho, cheerymen—(pull),
Oh, hawly, hi-ho, cheerymen—(pull).

I wish I was old Stormy's son,
Hurra, and storm along:
I'd give the sailors lots of rum,
Storm along, my Stormy.
Chorus—Hurra!—hurra!—hurra!—storm along,
Storm along, my roving blades,
Storm along, my Stormy.

Dramatic Society.—Our dramatic performances were certainly the most attractive and enduring of all the amusements we had on board. They were looked forward to as grand events, and no sooner was our play-bill posted up, than it was surrounded by an eager group who forthwith discussed the merits of the piece, and probable success or failure of the various actors engaged therein. Our company consisted but of few members, but amongst them were two who had had some experience, both in England and America, as regular actors; the whole business, therefore, as to choice of pieces, cast of characters, stage management, was confided to their hands. The first thing, after having chosen and cast a piece, was to get the various parts written out, for there was rarely more than one printed copy on board; and then came the most difficult part of all, viz., the study of the parts. This chiefly arose from the constant noise made by the children and interruption in the way of chat from the adults. Our only place of refuge, therefore, and this was not always proof against assault, was the main or mizen tops, and there perched, in these lofty crow's nests, might be seen the Hamlet, Gravedigger, or Bombastes of some future evening. Our rehearsals were numerous and generally well attended; these were held in the women's hospital (if fortunately it was not occupied), and surely such scenes as were therein enacted were never seen before at any stage rehearsal. For example, our call-boy would be sent to tell Hamlet he was wanted, which call would immediatly be attended to by Hamlet, who would appear before us in anything but princely costume, but most likely with shirt-sleeves tucked up, and armed with a pudding nearly a yard long, and ready for the pot. He would most likely be followed by the fair Ophelia, smothered in flour, having been diligently engaged making rolls for the evening tea. Our rehearsal ended, all would return to our domestic duties.

At length, the all-important day would arrive, and during the afternoon the various members of our corps dramatique might be seen busily engaged fitting up our little theatre. Our stage was formed on the quarter deck, or between the mainmast and poop, and divided from the audience by a rope made fast to the mainstays, and which rope served also to hang our curtain. Our wings, or places of exit, were made by suspending flags on each side of the stage, and the awning, being left up, formed the roof. Our orchestra was not numerous, but very select, being composed of first and second fiddles, and a tamborine. The stage was well lighted by cabin-lamps and candles, stuck behind bouilli-tins, which served as reflectors. With regard to the arrangement of the audience, we considered that those who took poop-seats were our aristocracy; the pit, which was formed by planks placed across and resting on buckets, was occupied by our middling-class; and the shrouds, by our democracy, this being the gallery. Our green-room was the captain's cabin, and the dressing-rooms the mate's and doctor's cabins. In the dressing-rooms might be seen our various members busily engaged making-up for their parts, as you would see them at a regular theatre; there was the rouge-pot, hare's foot, burnt cork, powder-puff, and wigs; there dresses were taken off and put on, faces lined and coloured according to age and character, amid great general confusion in seeking little odds and ends, or, as they are called, properties. The property-man and stage-manager were hard at work arranging chairs, tables, books, papers, &c., or whatever might be wanted on the stage, while at the wings, the various actors, waiting ready dressed to go on, were studying their parts or giving each other hints and instruction.

Before we draw the curtain we will explain how we manufactured our dresses, and therefore take, as examples, the principal characters engaged in "Richelieu," and "Bombastes Furioso," which we performed (with great success) on the same evening.

Richelieu.—A sailor's scarlet serge jersey, with lace ruffles; shirt, lady's chemisette, petticoat, made full out of a piece of crimson cloth; broad black belt round the waist, black trousers, and wellingtons; hair whitened with violet powder, (natural appearance red and curly,) and black velvet scull-cap.

Joseph.—Dark blue serge shirt, woman's black petticoat, black stockings and shoes, rosary and cross, cord round the waist, and black velvet scull-cap.

Louis XIII.—Kossuth hat, with plume of black feathers; wife's black velvet mantle, cut to shape; lace ruffles, cream-coloured and flowered waistcoat; blue pantaloons, converted into breeches and frilled below the knees with lace; wife's light cloth Adelaide boots, white kid gloves, sword and belt.

Bombastes.—Black cocked hat, surmounted by an enormous plume of white feathers made out of curled tissue paper; large white wig, made out of hospital tow, and having a movable pig-tail; white Joinville and frilled shirt; black frock coat, turned up at the skirts and lined with white calico; epaulets, gold lace and ruffles; ladies' gauntlet gloves, belt and sword; white moleskin breeches, made very large, and filled out behind with a feather pillow; large sea boots and spurs.

Distaffina.—Pink jacket, white worked petticoat and black silk apron, silk stockings, and green shoes with high heels—flowers in hair.

With regard to this performance, it was decidedly our best, and was listened to with great attention by a crowded audience. Our captain, who took much interest in these exhibitions, as usual, treated all those engaged therein to wine and grog.

Battle of the Pannikins.—No sooner did our pilot leave us at the Isle of Wight, than strong adverse winds set in, and on reaching the entrance of the Bay of Biscay, we encountered heavy gales and a hurricane. This, to those whose first appearance it was at sea, caused great alarm; and when, on the night of the 11th of August, all able hands were called up to work the ship and take in sail, the scene presented was both terrifying and laughable. Upon going on deck, the night appeared so dark that the masts and sails were scarcely visible, except when illumined by the lightning's flash; peal after peal of deafening thunder rolled, the rain descended in torrents, and the wind howled amid the rigging, and lashed to madness the mighty billows which upheaved our vessel in a frightful manner. Let us descend between decks; what a change! what a scene of confusion, if not fun! Pannikins, plates, pots, water-kegs, mess-kids, boots, shoes, coats, hats, beds and bedding, flying about on all sides, and making a most frightful din and clatter. All of us suffered more or less; every cabin was absolutely turned topsy-turvy. Such was the state of a few; for instance;—

No. 11.—Single men's cabin.—The pickles paid a visit to the plum-duff; the pepper worked its way, in a most insinuating manner, into the sugar basin; boots and shoes took refuge in the slop-pail, and a Bath-brick ran right through the looking glass.

No. 19.—Married cabin.—Treacle pot upset over the babies; husband pitched unceremoniously out of bed on to the floor, and half smothered in treacle. Lights brought—one baby discovered licking the other baby clean; while the wife was engaged in the pleasing operation of scraping the saccharine matter from off her better-half's back.

No. 14.—Single men's berth.—Top bunks overwhelmed with flour and rice, followed afterwards by a shower of pickles and treacle, which rendered the blankets very uncomfortable and sticky. Door burst in by a water keg, which finished by emptying its contents amidst the coats, trowsers, boots, &c., on the floor—occupants of berths, fore and aft, getting their backs well ground, and those athwart ship rolling about like beer-barrels.

Chalmers Lodge—Married cabin.—Everything everywhere and nowhere. Children fighting, husband crowned with a flower barrel, and wife saluted with the mustard pot.

The rebellious pannikins and pots were at last brought into subjection, and although in the gales we encountered, after crossing the Line, they tried to get up another battle, it was a miserable failure.

Births and Deaths.—We had not been on board a week before it was announced that we had another passenger added to our mess, in the shape of a plump little boy, and at the same time the bulletin stated that "mother and child were doing well."

This incident caused some chat, especially amongst the ladies; but when shortly afterwards it was publicly given out that on a certain Sunday the mother was to make her first appearance on deck, for the purpose of being churched, and also to have the little stranger christened, great, indeed, was the excitement to see these interesting ceremonies, and nearly all hands mustered on deck. After the service of the day was over, the ceremonies were performed with all due solemnity by our doctor, and the little one received the name of John Chalmers Groves. Miss Steward fulfilled the responsible part of godmother, while I stood godfather, or, as I was afterwards called, silver-spoon. At the conclusion we retired into the hospital to partake of medical comforts.

The remembrance of this event had scarcely begun to fade away, ere we had another birth, succeeded, alas! within a week, by the death of the mother, and three days afterwards that of the child.

These events occurred just as we were crossing the Line, and, as a matter of course, prevented the usual ceremony of shaving, which we intended should take place on a grand yet refined scale, and for which we had made great preparations.

The death of the unfortunate mother took place early on a Sunday morning, and at three o'clock, p.m., the sad and impressive ceremony of a burial at sea took place. A tropical sun shone forth with intense brilliancy; a gentle breeze filled our sails, and lightly rippled the surface of the vast ocean, as the bell tolled to assemble all hands on deck. The body tightly packed in canvass, and placed upon a grating, covered with the union Jack, was carried by four seamen, in their best attire, and placed at the leeward gangway with the feet (to which were attached a heavy shot) towards the sea. The beautiful service of the Church was then read in a most impressive manner by our doctor, assisted by Mr. Bell, and appeared to reach the hearts of all, to judge from the tears which stood in many an eye. It was indeed a sad spectacle; for standing around the body was the bereaved husband with his six infant children, he apparently broken hearted with grief, while the poor innocents were playing with and talking about the pretty colours of the flag, which served as a pall to cover the cold body of their mother. At length, at the solemn words, "we therefore commit her body to the deep," the flag was withdrawn, and the corpse slid from the grating into its vast ocean cemetery. At this time I was clinging to the shrouds, and saw the body rapidly shoot into the water, and disappear for ever, when immediately arose a beautiful fairy-like nautilus, which spreading its gossamer and rainbow-tinted sails, glided over the spot, like the spirit of the departed, wafting its way to its far-off home. The service concluded with a most impressive and eloquent address, delivered by Mr. Bell.

Messes and Messing—In my opinion, a worse system than the present of serving out and preparing the messes, could never have been devised. It was performed after the following manner, and I think, when fully explained, will clearly speak for itself. Each mess was composed of twelve persons, and it was then generally arranged that two out of the twelve filled for one week the office of captain and mate. Now their duties were to receive the rations daily from the emigrants' steward, prepare the same for meals, attend the galley, and wash up the plates, knives, forks, tables, floor, &c. At the end of the week, their place would be filled by two others, and so on, until the whole twelve had served. Now, what is the consequence? why, in the first place the food, when prepared, was often totally unfit for consumption, the bread being as heavy as lead, and the puddings, or duff, like putty; this arose from their being made by persons who had never cooked before, most of the captains being single men. Secondly, the messes were constantly quarrelling amongst themselves, and a general break-up would ensue, which usually ended by each drawing and cooking his own rations. I can safely affirm that there was not one perfect mess on board the "Chalmers" for a month together. There are also other things against the system, viz., that the butter, rice, sugar, treacle, pickles, &c., have to be kept in the close, confined cabins; also the tables are in a continual state of mess, morning, noon, and night.

The plan I would adopt, is simply this—Let every emigrant pay, say 5s. extra, towards providing two or three professed cooks to serve during the voyage, then let the messes draw their rations from the steward as heretofore, and hand those requiring to be dressed to the cooks. This arrangement would secure the proper cooking of the food, also clear cabins, and put an end to mess-quarrels, and often to fights at the galley and between decks. Our provisions were generally good both in quantity and quality, if we except the beef and biscuits which were often bad.

Committees.—We had not been long at sea, before we found it necessary to form a committee to arrange classes for giving instruction to our numerous children, and also amusements for the adults. After our first meeting, we issued the following programme, which was duly carried into effect:—

Sunday.—Church Service at 11 a.m. and 6½ p.m.
Monday.—Debating Class, 6½ p.m.
Tuesday.—Singing and Music, at 6½ p.m.
Wednesday.—Church Service and Lecture, at 6½ p.m.
Thursday.—Theatrical Performance, at 6½ p.m.
Friday.—Debating Class, or Judge and Jury, at 6½ p.m.
Saturday.—Music, Dancing, and Singing, at 6½ p.m.

These committees were of the greatest importance and utility for the well-being of all on board: and to them, in a great measure, was to be attributed the healthy state of the passengers during the hot weather. The strictest rules were enforced and exacted by the sanction of the doctor, as regards cleanliness in the cabins and between decks.

Testimonial.—Upon our nearing the shores of Australia, it was proposed and warmly seconded by the respectable portion of our passengers, that a testimonial should be presented to our good captain. A committee was, therefore, appointed, and subscriptions solicited from all. From the grumblers we met with great opposition: but in spite of all we collected a goodly sum, with which we purchased, on our arrival, an Australian gold ring and shirt studs; to which was added, a piece of pure native gold in quartz. On the day of presentation, all hands being mustered on the quarter-deck, Captain Henry Smith was called and addressed in a neat and appropriate speech by Mr. Noble, one of our committee, who also read, from a written testimonial, the names of the subscribers, and then in due form presented our brave captain with the gold ring and studs. On accepting this trifling mark of our esteem, he appeared highly delighted, and expressed his thanks in few but impressive words.

Arrival.—On the 20th November we sighted, for the first time, the Australian shores, and, in the evening the light on Cape Otway; and great indeed was the excitement. Many found their way up to the tops, who had never dared to venture there before, and telescopes were in active demand. But the great feature about this time was the sales by auction, which took place in the afternoons and evenings, on deck, the auctioneer and his clerk being seated on the long-boat. This being packing-up time, boxes were turned out, and their owners selected those things they considered useless to them, and put them up for sale. Others sold many of their worldly goods, being short of the needful to effect a landing on arrival. By this means was got together a most extraordinary collection of articles, which rapidly exchanged hands and fetched as high prices as they would have done in any auction-room in London. On the morning of the 21st we were becalmed off Port Philip Heads; but when the breeze set in towards evening, and we were rapidly making our way to our destination, our vessel became a regular fishing-smack, lines hanging from her in every direction, having large hooks baited with white and red rags attached to them. With these we caught an immense quantity of fish, called barraconta, about three feet long, like a mackerel in colour and a jack in shape and voraciousness. They proved to be very good eating, and were no sooner out of the water than into the pan. On the morning of the 22nd we passed through the Heads, as the two capes are called which formed the entrance to Port Philip, and here took in our pilot, who underwent a regular siege as he mounted over the gangway; and a bunch of wild flowers he brought with him was seized with as much avidity as a bag of gold would have been. The latest news of this our new world was also a source of greatest interest, and the two or three newspapers brought on board were read aloud to eager groups. Sailing up the noble port, we, at twelve o'clock, amid lusty cheers, dropped anchor off William's Town, the port of Melbourne, as I believe it is considered, and thus ended our voyage of one hundred and fourteen days from Gravesend. The above is a short but faithful sketch of life on board an emigrant ship. Of life in town, country, and at the diggings, more anon.

CANADA, AND THE CLERGY RESERVES.

Ninety-four years ago, all the regions, including the Island of Cape Breton, New Brunswick, the territories standing west and north from the Gulf and River of St. Lawrence, and south, west and north, from the Great Lakes of Canada, and with broad valleys drained by the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and other magnificent rivers, down to the Gulf of Mexico, were allowed by the other states of Christendom to be under the sovereignty of France.

In 1759-60, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, fell, after the Conquest of Louisburg, and the great victory gained by Wolfe on the heights and plains of Abraham, under the dominion of the British Empire.

The progress of Canada was first slow. Its prosperity and the increase of the population of that fertile and vast region has been during the last twenty years wonderful. A great empire has grown up on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and in the territories watered by the rivers of Canada.

A Bill has recently been passed by the House of Commons which, in its political, social and religious effects, will greatly accelerate the progress, the wealth and power of the first of British possessions.

Let us briefly review the progress of the countries which once constituted the province of New France; without including New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland, all important colonies.

After the surrender of Montreal and the remaining French ports to General Amherst, in September, 1760, the Canadians capitulated on terms honourable to themselves and liberal on the part of their conquerors.

It was provided that "The free exercise of the Catholic Apostolic and Roman Religion, shall subsist entire, in such manner that all the States and people of the towns and countries, places and distant posts, shall continue to assemble in the churches, and to frequent the Sacraments as heretofore, without being molested in any manner, directly or indirectly.

"These people shall be obliged by the English Government to pay to the priests the tithes and all the taxes they were used to pay under the government of His Most Christian Majesty.

"The chapter, priests, curates and missionaries, shall continue with an entire liberty their exercise and functions of their cures in the parishes of the towns and countries.

"The Grand Vicars named by the Chapter to administer to the diocese during the vacancy of the Episcopal See, shall have liberty to dwell in the towns or country parishes, as they shall think proper. They shall at all times be free to visit the different parishes of the diocese, with the ordinary ceremonies, and exercise all the jurisdiction they exercised under the French dominion.

"The Communities of Nuns shall be preserved in their Constitution and privileges. They shall continue to observe their rules. They shall be exempted from lodging any military; and it shall be forbidden to trouble them in their religious exercises, or to enter their monasteries: safe-guards shall be even given them if they desire them.

"The preceding article shall likewise be executed with regard to the Communities of Jesuits and Recollets, and of the house of the priests of Saint Sulpice, at Montreal. These last, and the Jesuits, shall preserve their right to nominate to certain curacies and missions, as heretofore.

"All the communities and all the priests shall preserve their movables, the property and revenues of the Seignories, and other estates which they possess in the Colony, of what nature soever they may be. And the same estates shall be preserved in their privileges, rights, honours and exemptions."

The foregoing stipulations were afterwards sanctioned by the King, and, in 1774, by Parliament.

The best account we have of the state of Canada at the conquest, is a report forwarded to the Board of Trade by General Murray, the first Governor. The following condensed extracts afford a curious picture of the people and their condition.

"The towns of Quebec and Montreal contain about 14,700 inhabitants. The savages, who are called Roman Catholics, being within the limits of the province, consist of 7,400 souls, so that the whole, exclusive of the King's troops, amount to 76,275 souls, of which, in the parishes, are 19 Protestant families; the rest of that persuasion (a few half-pay officers excepted) are traders, mechanics and publicans, who reside in the lower towns of Quebec and Montreal. Most of them were followers of the army, of mean education, or soldiers disbanded at the reduction of the troops. All have their fortunes to make, and, I fear, few are solicitous about the means, when the end can be attained. I report them to be, in general, the most immoral collection of men I ever knew: of course, little calculated to make the new subjects enamoured with our laws, religion and customs; and far less adapted to enforce those laws which are to govern them. On the other hand, the Canadians, accustomed to arbitrary and a sort of military government, are a frugal, industrious and moral race of men, whom the just and mild treatment they met with from His Majesty's military officers who ruled the country for four years, until the establishment of civil government, had greatly got the better of the natural antipathy they had to their conquerors.

"They consist of a noblesse, who are numerous, and who pique themselves much upon the antiquity of their families, their own military glory, and that of their ancestors. These noblesse are Seigneurs of the whole country, and, though not rich, are in a situation, in that plentiful part of the world, where money is scarce and luxury is still unknown, to support their dignity. Their tenants, who pay only an annual quit-rent of about a dollar for 100 acres, are at their ease, and comfortable."

The Canadian noblesse were hated, because their birth and behaviour entitled them to respect; and the peasants were abhorred, because they were saved from the oppression they were threatened with. The presentment of the Grand Jury at Quebec puts the truth of these remarks beyond doubt. The improper choice and numbers of the civil offices sent out from England, increased the inquietude of the colony. Instead of men of genius and untainted morals, the very reverse were appointed to the most important offices. The judge fixed upon to conciliate the minds of 75,600 foreigners to the laws and government of Great Britain, was taken from a gaol, was entirely ignorant of civil law, and of the language of the people. The Attorney-general, with regard to the language of the people, was not better qualified. He was afterwards succeeded by a man of great learning and abilities, Mr. Maseres, afterwards Cursitor Baron of the Exchequer. General Murray observes: "The offices of secretary of the province, registrar, clerk of the council, commissaryof stores and provisions, provost marshall, &c., were given by patent to men of interest in England, who let them out to the best bidders; and so little did they consider the capacity of their representatives, that no one of them understood the language of the natives. As no salary was annexed to those patent places, the value of them depended upon the fees, which, by my instructions, I was ordered to establish equal to those of the richest ancient colony. This heavy tax, and the rapacity of the English lawyers, were severely felt by the poor Canadians; but they patiently submitted, and though stimulated to dispute it by some of the licentious traders from New York, they cheerfully obeyed the Stamp Act, in hopes that their good behaviour would recommend them to the favour and protection of their Sovereign."

Arbitrary domination, on the part of the British Crown, occasioned the lamentable discontent and the just complaints which prevailed in the old English colonies at the time alluded to. Instead of allowing the colonists to govern themselves, as they had previously done, Parliament then determined that they should be governed by the decisions of the British Crown, and by acts of the British Parliament. The loyalty and obedience of Her Majesty's subjects in the newly-acquired Colony of Canada were then remarkable. They offered no opposition to the taxes which had been imposed upon them by the British Parliament. They submitted to the Stamp Act, in the hope that they should be treated with clemency, and that they should have extended to them the privileges which they demanded at the capitulation of Canada.

From the period of the capitulation of Canada, to the year 1774, the colonists were, however, treated with great harshness, not only by the government, but by English adventurers, who uniformly considered the French as a conquered and an inferior race, over whom they had a right to tyrannize. To remedy these defects, at a period when the old colonies revolted, the celebrated Act, called the Quebec Act, was passed in the year 1774. This Act was denounced by Lord Chatham, in consequence of its establishing what he considered an arbitrary government in that country. He said it would involve a large province in a thousand difficulties, and in the worst of despotism, and put the whole people under arbitrary power; that it was a most cruel, oppressive and odious measure, tearing up justice and every good principle by the roots; that by abolishing the trial by jury, together with the Habeas Corpus, he supposed the framers of the bill thought that mode of proceeding most satisfactory; whilst every true Englishman was ready to lay down his life, sooner than lose those two bulwarks of his personal security and property.

The merely supposing that the Canadians would not be able to feel the good effects of law and freedom, because they had been used to arbitrary power, was an idea as ridiculous as false. He said the bill established "a despotic government in that country, to which the royal proclamation of 1763 promised the protection of the English laws." Lord Chatham also objected to the bill, on the ground that it granted an almost unlimited extent to the boundaries of Canada; for it applied to all lands in America not comprised in any previous charter. The 14th Geo. III., commonly called the Quebec Act, placed Canada in a situation entirely different from any other British Colony. It declared all former provisions made for the province null and void. In place of a legislative assembly, the administration was to be confined to the Governor, and a council appointed by the King. It was, however, in several respects, agreeable to the French Canadians, who established French laws according to the Coutume de Paris, by which all civil matters were to be adjudicated. In criminal matters, the laws of England were still to be in force. The French language was also to be used in the Courts. The Catholic Church was secured in all the immunities it enjoyed under the French king, with all its former revenues. The seignorial tenures were also to remain undisturbed.

The great merit, in fact, of this Act, however, was, that it, for a time, settled the religious difficulty as affecting the Roman Catholics of Canada. At that period, the number of Protestants was insignificant, not exceeding a few hundreds. But the Act provided that the King should make provision, as he should think fit, for the Protestant Clergy. The criminal law was, at the same time, instituted, with trial by jury; but, in all civil matters, causes were decided according to the laws of Canada. A Legislative Council was appointed, but without power to impose taxes. In fact, this Act placed the whole territories comprised within its unlimited boundaries under the absolute authority of the Crown; and, in fact, its only redeeming proviso was that which related to religious freedom.

For seventeen years Canada was governed under this despotic Act; yet, during the war of American Independence, the Canadians of French origin remained faithfully attached to the Crown of England. But after the peace of 1783, which acknowledged the independence of the old provinces, as the United States of America, murmurs and discontents and the hatred of races were manifested in Canada. The English adventurers increased greatly in number, and the loyalists who had left the United States to settle in Upper Canada, looked upon the French as an inferior people, over whom they had a right to domineer. Under these circumstances, it struck Mr. Pitt that he might allay these animosities by dividing Canada into two provinces; and with this view he introduced the Act 31, Geo. III., commonly called the Constitutional Act, which divided the province of Quebec into the two provinces of Lower and Upper Canada, and gave to each a separate Legislative Government, consisting of a Governor, Council and House of Assembly. The French laws and language were still to be in full force, as established by the Quebec Act, 14 Geo. III.

By this Act, a separate Legislative Constitution was granted to each province; and both were divided into twenty-one counties. The French laws and language were still retained in the counties and Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada; and while it provided that those professing the Roman Catholic religion should maintain their clergymen by payment of tithe, it also provided for the maintenance, but not by tithe, and the support of the other religious denominations, by reserving one-seventh of the land not comprised within the seignories. So arbitrary an attempt to seize upon so great a proportion of the lands of the province has been attended with two consequences, first, that of preventing the improvement and cultivation of the Colony; and, in the next place, that, in proportion as the lands surrounding those reservations became settled or cultivated, those uncultivated became of high value compared with the adjacent wilderness territories, where no settlements had been formed, and the land lay waste. There is no doubt that the backward state of the countries on the northern banks of the St. Lawrence and the western banks of the Ottawa, has in a great degree arisen from those impediments to their improvement, called the Clergy Reserves, and which has ever since proved the cause of pernicious discontent and complaint, misrepresentations, and administrative difficulties.

In the Session of 1823-4, Mr. (now the Hon. Mr.) Morris, brought the case of the Scotch Clergy before the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, on the 16th Dec., when the following resolution was passed:—

"That when the Kingdoms of England and Scotland were united, the subjects of both were placed on a footing of reciprocity, and were to enjoy a full communication of every right, privilege and advantage; and that neither the church of the one nor the other thereby gained any ascendancy. On the contrary, that both were established by law as National Protestant Churches within their respective kingdoms; and, consequently, the clergy of both are equally entitled to a participation in all the advantages which have resulted, or may hereafter result, from the said Union."

In the meantime the Episcopal Clergy were by no means inactive. In 1823 the late Bishop of Quebec (Dr. Mountain) and his clergy drew up a memorial to His late Majesty, George IV., of which the following are extracts:—

"That the population, now greatly increased and embracing in its bosom many denominations of Christians, still retains its prominent feature of being attached to the Church of England, the members of which, together with the Dutch and German Lutherans, who join them in communion, comprise by far the most numerous description of Christians in Canada.

"That the very little progress made by the other denominations compared with that of the Church of England, and the very recent establishment of their scanty congregations, has generally created in the minds of the people a veneration for it as the established form of worship—a light in which it has always been presented to the inhabitants of the Province from their earliest years.

"That when new missions are established in any quarter, not only do those persons readily join who are not yet particularly attached to any denomination, but even Presbyterians and Congregationalists attend public worship with their families, so that on many occasions the whole neighbourhood becomes united to the Church.

"That there is every reason to believe that the greater proportion of all the various denominations of Protestants may be expected to conform, so as at length to include the great mass of this population.

"In fine, there manifestly appears the fairest prospect that the Church of England, from the favourable disposition that now exists towards it, will be able to collect within its bosom the great bulk of the inhabitants of the Province, should no prospect of supporting their clergy be held out to the various Protestant denominations."

Never did prelate write a more blundering perversion of facts. The following is an extract from the journals of the Legislative Assembly of the 22nd of December, 1826.

"That the Imperial Legislature foresaw in 1799 (Mr. Pitt stated so in a speech), the probability of circumstances in the condition of the inhabitants of this colony which might render an alteration in the law with respect to the Clergy Reservation expedient, and wisely left the Provincial Parliament at liberty to make such changes therein as the future state of society might require.

"That the construction given to the Imperial Act which appropriates the Clergy Reserves to individuals connected with the Church of England, and the determination of the clergy of that Church to withhold from all other denominations of Protestants residing within the Province, the enjoyment of any part of the benefits arising, or which may arise from the lands so set apart, call for the immediate attention of the Provincial Legislature to a subject of such vital interest to the public in general, and that such claim by the Protestant Episcopal Church is contrary to the spirit and meaning of the 31st Geo. III., and most injurious to the interests and wishes of the Province.

"That it is the opinion of a great proportion of the people of this Province, that the clergy lands, in place of being enjoyed by the clergy of an inconsiderable part of the population, ought to be disposed of, and the proceeds of their sale applied to increase the provincial allowance for the support of district and common Schools and the endowment of a Provincial Seminary for learning, and in aid of erecting places of public worship for all denominations of Christians."—This resolution was passed by—Yeas, 31; Nays, 2.

It was then resolved—"That the number of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Provinces bears a very small proportion to the number of Christians, notwithstanding the pecuniary aid long and exclusively received from the benevolent society in England by the members of that Church, and their pretensions to a monopoly of the Clergy Reserves." Yeas, 30; Nays, 3.

The Archdean of York (Toronto) came to England in 1826, and obtained a Royal Charter for the university of King's College, Toronto, with an endowment of 225,000 acres of land, and £1,000 a year for sixteen years. The provisions of the Charter were so sectarian and exclusive as to be reprobated and loudly denounced by the whole Province, each year, until Royal instructions were sent out in 1835, authorising the repeal of the obnoxious and exclusive clauses in the Charter, and giving an equal right to the Charter of Scotland. The Episcopal assemblies were really the cause of the rebellion of 1837-8.

In 1840, the Act (3 and 4 Vict., c. 78), set forth that the terms "Protestant Clergy" might be construed to include other ministers than those of the Church of England; and assigned to the latter about one-half the provision for religious instruction which heretofore had been regarded as exclusively her own.

After many ineffectual attempts at a compromise, it was, in 1839, decided by the whole Provincial Legislature that the Clergy Reserve Lands should be re-invested in the Crown. This proceeding was founded on the belief that a division of the property could be made by the Imperial Parliament, with more justice than amidst the factious strife of local legislation. The Imperial Act of 1840 was passed in a great degree, but by no means completely, in accordance with the Provincial Act, and declared to be for the final settlement of the question of the Clergy Reserves, the maintenance of religion, and the diffusion of Christian knowledge within that Province. This could not be practically effected under an act which maintained one-seventh of the whole Province for church purposes, although all Protestants, the church of Rome too, were to share the proceeds.

In 1850, the Legislative Assembly passed resolutions, on which was founded an address to Her Majesty, praying for the application of the Clergy Reserves to secular as well as religious uses. Earl Grey, when Colonial Secretary, was prevented by the change of Ministry, which took place in February, 1852, from bringing in a bill to comply with the prayer of the Legislative Assembly in Canada.

Earl Derby, at all times the evil genius of Canada, the chief cause of the Canadian rebellion, would have, we believe, if he had remained in office another year, caused another rebellion in Canada, which would only have been terminated by the separation of that country from the British Crown.

He decided that the Canadian Legislature should not have any direction, control or right over the Clergy Reserves. Fortunately for Canada and England, his administration was as brief as it was impracticable and obnoxious: especially with regard to the Colonies. A wise Prime Minister has succeeded, and Canada will still remain a great, and powerful, and loyal part of the British Empire.

Let us briefly sketch the present state of the Clergy Reserves of Canada. Every seventh square mile of ungranted lands in the vast territories of that Colony, is embraced in the Clergy Reserves, according to the Imperial Act of 1791. The area of the counties in that part of Canada, formerly known as Lower Canada, comprises 209,290 square miles, or 133,945,600 acres.

According to the returns of the Surveyor-general, of 28th of February, 1845, it appears that the lands surveyed and comprised within the seignories amount to 9,027,880 acres, which included 57,580 acres formerly belonging to the Jesuits, and since appropriated to the purposes of education. Besides which the Jesuits had grants of above 600,000 acres in the districts of Quebec, Three Rivers, and Montreal, while 124,800 belonged to the charitable nunneries.

The Crown and Clergy Reserves surveyed in the townships, amounted to 8,745,889 acres. One half of this appertains to the Clergy Reserves; of the other half a great portion has been disposed of by the Crown. 3,907,000 acres had been surveyed but not granted, and 107,856,000 remained unsurveyed.

The population of Lower Canada, in 1851, amounted to 890,000, of which 665,528 were Canadians of French origin, being about eleven times the number of inhabitants at the conquest of 1759-60.

The dioceses of the Church of England in Canada are three in number, with 242 clergymen, and the number of the population who frequent their churches is computed at 268,592. The dioceses of the Church of Rome are seven in number, with 543 clergymen, and a population professing the Roman Catholic religion of 914,561. The clergy of all other denominations amount to 725, and their congregations to 661,112.

Of the monies derived from the Clergy Reserves, £10,394 5s. were appropriated in Upper Canada; and £1,786 in Lower Canada, to the Church of England; or, in all, £12,181. To the Church of Scotland in Upper Canada, £5,816 17s., and in Lower Canada, £893. Besides which, £464 was given to the United Synod of the Presbyterian Church in Upper Canada, and £639 to the Wesleyan Methodists; and to the Roman Catholics in Upper Canada, £1,369.

In Lower Canada the Roman Catholic clergy are provided for in accordance with the articles of capitulation and the constitutional Act of 1791.

The members of the Established Church of Scotland in Canada, amounted to 61,589, of the Free Presbyterian Church to 66,074, other Presbyterians to 110,020, or a total of 237,683 Presbyterians of the Scotch Church.

The Wesleyans and other Methodists amounted to 228,839; Baptists to 49,846; Lutherans, Congregationalists and other Protestants, to 73,500; Jews, 7,400; and about 75,000 whose creeds are not given; the whole population of both Canadas being 1,842,265, in 1850-1, and the immigration and natural increase since, at least, 160,000, being rather more than 2,000,000, or equal to that of the British American provinces when they declared their independence. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward's Island, Cape Breton, and Newfoundland contain, altogether, about 500,000 inhabitants.

The population of the British North American Colonies, unlike the inhabitants of the old countries of continental Europe, are an enterprising and an intelligent people. The inhabitants of Canada have become rich and powerful, have constructed splendid cities and great public works. They know their power. Trust them and they will have confidence in you.

All our colonial difficulties, all the evils that have distracted her Majesty's subjects in those Colonies, have been caused altogether by the undue and unnecessary interference of the mother country, in matters of local colonial government.

The local authorities of Canada are best acquainted with the wants of the country. All that the Imperial Government should require from the Colonists is allegiance to the Queen. It is not for us to pass laws to control their local affairs. What has caused the power and prosperity of the old Colonies, now the United Independent States of America? Why, that, until our unconstitutional interference and injustice, from 1763 to 1773, they had had the management of their own local affairs, and that they carried into those countries a knowledge of administrative and free government. How true and prophetic were the expressions of Lord Chatham, when in 1774 he stated, "Had the British Colonies been planted by any other kingdom than our own, the inhabitants would have carried with them the chains of slavery, and spirit of despotism; but as they are, they ought to be remembered as great instances to instruct the world what great exertions mankind will naturally make when left to the free exercise of their own powers." Afterward, this great statesman observed, "I am an old man, and would advise the noble lords in office to adopt a more generous mode of governing America; for the day is not far distant when America may vie with these kingdoms, not only in arms, but in arts also. It is an established fact that the principal towns in America are learned and polite, and understand the constitution of the Empire, as well as the noble lords who are now in office; and, consequently, they will have a watchful eye over their liberties, to prevent the least encroachment on their hereditary rights. His Majesty's American subjects who acknowledge themselves bound by the ties of allegiance have an equitable claim to the full enjoyment of the fundamental rules of the English constitution; and it is an essential and unalterable right in nature, engrafted into the British Constitution, as a fundamental law, and ever held sacred and irrevocable by the subjects within this realm—that what a man has honestly acquired, is absolutely his own; which he may freely give, but which cannot be taken from him without his consent. This, my lords, though no new doctrine, has always been my received and unalterable opinion, and I will carry it to my grave, that this country had no right under heaven to tax America."

Now, Canada is quite as powerful at the present time, and more defensible than the thirteen old British colonies were when Lord Chatham delivered those sage observations; and any attempt of the British executive and parliament to govern that Province, without the consent of the Canadians, will be found impossible—futile.

We have, given them, by the Act of 1840, self-responsible government. It was a great healing measure. The Bill passed by the House of Commons, respecting the Clergy Reserves in the Canadian Legislature, will perfect and perpetuate the cure. Rejecting that Bill would bring on another Iliad of American woes.

Let us leave the inhabitants of the British Colonies to manage their own affairs, and they will not consider their allegiance to England either burdensome or disagreeable. They will continue bound to you by affection. They have no desire to become united with the Great American Republic; and should the time come when they will resolve to become one or more independent governments, let the separation of their union with us be in peace, love, and wisdom. Though under different governments, let all the Anglo-Americans be one great nation.

M

POEMS, BY ALEXANDER SMITH.

It is not in literature as in politics, where "the wise and prudent" ones hasten to hail the rising sun, and are glad when the knell of the old sovereign is rung out, so that they may welcome with decent joy the hopeful successor to his throne. Rather, on the contrary, Mr. Critic is so busy paying court to the reigning dynasty, that he cannot believe in the birth of another heir of glory until all the bells are ringing and the jubilant multitude waken him up from his loyal reverie, and startle him into a vain endeavour to disprove the stranger's pedigree and disavow his lofty claims. Mr. Pharisee-Critic! there is a woe also against thee—what an ancient friend of ours used to call "a good Old Testament curse," grim and pitiless, though it happens to be in this case not in the Old but the New Book. Thou art given to garnishing the sepulchres of the prophets, or at the most thou bowest down to none but acknowledged and accredited idols, "running after a multitude to do evil," or good as it may happen; but with "no eye to see, or ear to hear, or heart to understand" the right man when he comes without flourish of trumpets, in his own native simplicity, as God made him and endowed him. By such as thee, Alexander Smith may be overlooked and despised and evil spoken of—is, I dare say, at this moment poohed and pshawed and doomed to the portmanteau, with some few "odorous comparisons" and sententious advices; whereat, poor fellow! he may even now be writhing and making lamentable grimaces somewhere among the shady retreats of the "Guse Dubs" or the Molindinar-Burn. Nevertheless, Mr. Critic, and albeit there may be a grain or two of truth in what you say, still let me tell you it is better to come like a gentle gossip, and look kindly on the prophet's cradle, than to garnish the sepulchre you may have helped to hew for him.

Alexander Smith! do they call thee Alick or Sandy when thou art at home? they will twit thee, perhaps, with thy name. Who ever heard that a prophet was born in Nazareth? who ever heard of a poet among the Smith family? Never mind them, man; stick to it, as you have begun with it, bravely; and eschew y's in the middle and e's at the end, as thou wouldst shun piracy and plagiarism; and as thou shouldst have despised those mocking-bird mimicries which thou hast unhappily tried already, forgetting thou hast a true song of thine own to sing among starry nights and flowers and leafy trees. But let that pass for the present. That same patronymic will not introduce you into "good society;" but we see no reason why, in this age of pig-iron, the old race of Tubal Cain should not begin once more to handle the harp and the organ. Sparks from the anvil were always to us a cheery sight, as we gathered about the smithy door, or under the broad sycamore watched the swart sinewy Vulcan fabricating horse-shoes and hobnails, and giving forth wisdom in his own pithy way, as if he would knock it into our juvenile head with the hammer. And for thee, Alexander Smith, albeit I find not here in this book the fine contrast of glare and gloom in that old village smithy, which is still a wonder and a mystery haunting memory like a dream—and albeit thou hast not the old smith's hearty, deep-throated laugh so full of a genial, frank and manly nature—yet thou hast at least the sparks flowing thick and fast and bright in a ceaseless stream of native poetic fervour, which, if thou look well to it, shall do thee better service than merely to emit scintillations soon to be extinguished and forgotten, when the hand that called them forth is growing weak and cold.

Such, indeed, is this volume of poems. It is a rich, luscious, abundant blossom; but we have yet to wait for the fruits of which it holds out a good hope. It is a large promise to pay, and we are ready to accept the bill, believing that there are effects to realize the whole sum of our expectations. It is a bright morning spangled with countless dew-drops, and ringing with many song-birds, and we hope it will go on "shining more and more unto the perfect day." More than this it is not; and it is devoutly to be desired that Mr. Smith should himself learn and believe this; for otherwise he will surely disappoint his best friends, and shooting fast heavenward, like a rocket, will yet get no place among the stars. There will need, we assure him, long toil, calm thought, and much practice both in the outer and inner harmonics, ere he accomplish the destiny that lies, we think, before him. Let him not be offended because we speak the truth. Were it our object to find fault, we could pick more holes in his Life-Drama than we could in ninety-and-nine out of every hundred stale and spiritless inanities that the midwives of "the Row" transfer to the undertakers of Grub Street.

Mr. Smith has started on a noble race, and he has points of unmistakable power and speed in him, though he wants something of symmetry and much training; and we speak all the more frankly because, from his own idea of the poet's function and character, he cannot but feel that he has yet much to learn and to unlearn, to do and to leave undone.

> My friend, a poet must ere long arise,
> And with a regal song sun-crown this age,
> As a saint's head is with a halo crowned;
> One who shall hallow poetry to God
> And to its own high use, for poetry is
> The grandest chariot wherein king-thoughts ride:
> One who shall fervent grasp the sword of song
> As a stern swordsman grasps his keenest blade,
> To find the quickest passage to the heart.
> A mighty poet, whom this age shall choose
> To be its spokesman to all coming times.
> In the ripe, full-blown season of his soul,
> He shall go forward in his spirit's strength,
> And grapple with the questions of all times
> And wring from them their meanings.

So writes Alexander Smith truly, and manfully, about the poet; but he himself will admit that this book was scarcely composed "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying," as above hath been well said already. Let him, however, bear these words in his heart; let this picture be graven in his memory; and let him sit down to his rude block, not falling down to worship the unshapen idol, but determined doggedly to chisel out the reality of this fine ideal; and in due time we hope to see him sitting high in the grand Valhalla which he is now earnestly panting to enter. Verily, Alexander Smith, thou hast limned the poet's outline greatly to our mind: a many-sided man is he, with thoughts that wander abroad over all the universe of God, and large-souled sympathies with all the brotherhood of men. Haunting the trees, and the streams, and the fountains, the brown and silent hills, the mystery-sounding shore that labours in strange inarticulate fashion to utter something which we feel to be unutterable—the poet gathers everywhere forms of beauty and spiritual harmonies, as he clasps, child-like, the fair bosom of mother Nature, drinking from her full breast and listening to her loving voice. Ranging, too, among the varied scenes of life, sitting by its firesides and watching the cheery blink of the quiet hearth as it flickers on the weary face of toil, or the matron's patient thoughtfulness, the poet seeks to transfuse himself into all other beings, and to taste the sweet and bitter of every manner of existence,—to live in other men, in other times, in all this glorious and beautiful creation, so that his heart-beat, whether calm or fevered, shall be less a thing of his own breast, and more like the general pulse in the bosom of our human nature, or as our author himself says:—

> Like God I would pervade humanity,
> From bridegroom dreaming on his marriage morn,
> To a wild wretch tied on the farthest bough
> Of oak that roars on edge of an abyss,
> The while the desperate wind with all its strength
> Strains the whole night to drive it down the gulf.
> I'd creep into the lost and ruin'd hearts
> Of sinful women dying in the streets.

And in short the true poet seeks to identify himself with all mankind, to visit the secret "chambers of imagery," and know what is going on in the depths of every soul, believing that everywhere he will find a point of contact, and something to be loved. Above all, whithersoever he goes or whatsoever he is doing, whether gathering pale cowslips in the springwoods, or listening to monotonous runnels bubbling among their pebbles, or whispering to the water-lilies, or whether he be giving utterance to the sorrows, and struggles, and pains, and joys, of an age that is labouring with great thoughts or striving after high achievements; in any case, and even in his most playful mood, there is a depth and solemnity in him becoming a man who feels that he is moving among the pillared stateliness, and sculptured grandeur, and lofty harmonies of a temple which God has reared for his own glorious worship, and in which the poet hath a place as one of the anointed high-priests and inspired oracles of the faith. So they judged rightly of old time, when the Vates was deemed a true prophet, and not merely a verse-maker, given to chiming syllables in a school-girl's album. Thus the old heathen poems of Greece caught more nobility, and grandeur, and loveliness from Zeus and Aphrodite, than ours have done from the living God himself. Nay, the Roman Jupiter Tonans did more for Virgilian mimicries, to make them great, than ever the Messiah and His mysteries have done for our English poetic literature; for, bating some few street-singing hymnsters, organ-grinding in a London fog at the maddest pitch of a cracked counter-tenor, who have howled certain polemical ballads more or less blasphemous, truly we have little or nothing to show that our poets have yet escaped from Egyptian bondage, and thick darkness, and leeks, and onions, and garlic. Of this sad lack Alexander Smith has spoken truly, when he makes demand for one who shall "hallow poetry to God;" but his "Life-Drama" has verily done nothing to fill up the chasm—has not so much as flung a stone into the abyss, to shew how deep and how hollow it is.

Still, with all the unartistic clumsiness of this unripe poem, there is one thing having some likeness of a divine truth in it. Too much there is of the spasmodic and hysterical, struggling uneasily where the ripe poet would be calm; too much there is also as if he thought that the proper function of the Vates was "to draw images from every thing"; for > Images lie thick upon his talk

> As shells on ocean sands;

a great mistake, surely, for you might as well say that "a man's chief end" was to make clothes, these images being chiefly of use as garments for his thoughts, and otherwise not better than robes upon a clothes-horse. But still the leading idea of this Life-Drama, shadows forth to us, though dimly, the transition of an earnest human soul from the cold, icy winter of human vanity that craves for idle fame, to the warmth of that genial spring-tide which love quickens in the heart, and wreaths with perennial blossoms; and so far, we hold that this is a veritable contribution to the literature of our day; the distinct utterance of a truth which it was high time for any one who had heard it "in the closet," to proclaim to the world "from the house-tops." While we are ready to admit, then, that Mr. Alexander Smith has dug from his intellectual Mount Alexander a good deal of precious metal for increase of our general circulation in the shape of very poetical similies and metaphors, as when he speaks of his life, saying that it is

> Bare, bald, and tawdry as a fingered moth;

or talks of

> Giving men glimpses so divine
> As when, upon a racking night, the wind
> Draws the pale curtains of the vapoury clouds,
> And shows those wonderful, mysterious voids,
> Throbbing with stars like pulses;

or when he says it were

> Better for man,
> Were he and nature more familiar friends!
> His part is worst that touches this base world.
> Altho' the ocean's inmost heart be pure,
> Yet the salt fringe that daily licks the shore
> Is gross with sand;

still, upon the whole, this book exhibits less of poetic thought than of poetic sensibility; little "grappling with the questions of all times," though much of a keen insight into those symbols and affinities which link the world of thought with the world of matter, and which form the rich colouring of poetic language, rather than the fabric and texture of its ideas. And even in this respect we could find it in our hearts to quarrel with Mr. Smith for his too frequent habit of toying with a conceit, and his readiness to go out of the way in order to cull a chance flower and stick it in his button-hole. We could also tell him some certain things that might help him to distinguish between a true interpretation of nature and the forced and fanciful way in which he has dealt with the volume of its book; like many another preacher, wresting the letter quite away from the spirit. And truly there are many things we should like to say, and would say, if we could only have a forenoon's saunter with him, some bright sunny day, along the Trongate, or the Sauchie-hall-road; or, better far, if we could just have a moonlight stroll together where the brown gloom of the old hills lies mirrored in great shadowy masses on the quiet bosom of Loch Lomond; and, in fact, the next time we visit the precincts of St. Mungo's, the old city of the fish and the castle, where we believe our poet wons at this day, our purpose is to see the Laigh Kirk, the Saut Market, and Mr. Alexander Smith, and then and there to tell him, in the spirit of brotherly love, that he has used the sea and the stars like the minister's pair of horses, which to-day are ploughing the glebe and to-morrow are drawing his wife in an open phæton to the Laird's—that he has, in his tenth midnight-scene on London-bridge, sacrificed grossly to a sentimental Moloch, making his hero pass through unhallowed fires in most unnatural fashion and with most gratuitous pain; and, in fine, that he has, in various ways, occasioned such an overflow of our critical bile, that, but for a very wholesome and happy constitution, in the main, we should have been in as acrid and bitter a state as if we had supped last night on Welsh-rabbit, and been hag-ridden by the ghost of a Gloster-cheese. But though it is our full purpose to be sharp with Mr. Smith, and though we have a "crow to pluck with him," we would, for the present, "gently scan our brother man," and rather make welcome recognition of the light and heat of this sun, than take a curious survey of the spots by which it is tarnished.

Indeed we are not sure that we have not already catalogued the blemishes too much at large. Perhaps we have; but if so, it has been in no unkindly spirit, but simply with the purpose of couching the poet's cataract, that his vision hereafter may become more clear. If we have spit upon the ground, it was solely to anoint his eyes. It is far from our object to touch the sensitive spirit on the quick and tender part, or to pour oil of vitriol on his sores. On the contrary, though we can plainly discern that the writer of the Life-Drama has not yet shaken off the chrysalis, and is only struggling to get his wings free, that he may bask in the sunshine and flutter among the flowers; yet, from a careful and indeed curious survey of that part of him which has yet been developed, we argue decidedly that he is no death-moth, who will singe his wings at the candle flame, but rather an emperor butterfly, a joyous creature of the day and the sunshine, whom we hope to see some day fluttering around the path of life, and gladdening the hearts of men. That he will yet shake off the extreme sensuousness of his present character, and leave his Anthony and Cleopatra notions, like other Egyptian ruins, to be buried in the desert-drift and oblivion, we for our parts have no doubt at all; and unless we have greatly mistaken the springs of native power that are in him, he will leave many other things also behind, and press on towards the perfect man, striving, in a calm toiling silence for a space, to be a meet organ, at last, for the utterance of the many-voiced harmonies of this many-sided age. That he has a fine eye in his head, a painter's eye rejoicing in God's fair handiwork, who can doubt who reads these lines?—

> 'Mong the green lanes of Kent—green sunny lanes—
> Where troops of children shout, and laugh, and play,

And gather daisies, stood an antique home,
Within its orchard rich with ruddy fruits;
For the full year was laughing in its prime.
Wealth of all flowers grew in that garden green,
And the old porch with its great oaken door
Was smothered in rose bloom, while o'er the walls
The honey-suckle clung deliciously.
Before the door there lay a plot of grass
Snowed o'er with daisies—flower of all beloved,
And famousest in song; and in the midst
A carved fountain stood, dried up and broken,
On which a peacock perched and sunned itself;
Beneath, two petted rabbits, snowy white,
Squatted upon the sward.
A row of poplars darkly rose behind,
Around whose tops, and the old fashioned vanes,
White pigeons fluttered, and o'er all was bent
The mighty sky, with sailing sunny clouds.

That is a picture not perhaps of the highest kind, not beheld with the Turner "eye of faith which seeth things that are invisible" to grosser sense; but yet full, clear and true, just such a Kentish grange, "smothered among rose-buds," as we have often seen with mingled love and envy, while drowsing a rare holiday among the hawthorn-scented lanes, or while the white cones of the chesnut-bloom were still sweetening the June air. But, why is it that our Glasgow poet has not taken us "doon the water," among the lochs and firths, and glorious island glimpses of his own lovely land? We should have expected Bute and Arran and Lomond, and the splendid day-dream which opens on the Clyde voyager, as he steams in sight of Dumbarton on a summer afternoon, to figure with more prominence on these picturesque pages. That would have been more edifying by far than the idle laudation of whiskey, "yellowed with peat-reek and mellowed with age," and drunk in a "mountain shieling," among "dark purple moors," by the "grey boulders of Rannoch," or the misty scarf of Ben-More;" of all which we are ready to avow that, greatly to the credit of the writer, he has caught no inspiration from his subject, exhilarating though it be. But, if there is any thing in which our author excels, it is in the description, direct or incidental, of dewy nights and starry heavens. There he is quite at home, though we dare say, his mother, or his landlady, may entertain a different opinion on this head, when the gentle poet knocks timidly at untimely hours, and stands on the door step, watching Orion among the chimney-pots. With the sea, also, he plays familiarly, as one that has gathered shells on the grey beach, and pulled the tangles from the rough-backed "skerry," and who is, probably, all the more fond of Father Neptune, from having mainly watched him in the moonlight evenings,

Toying with the shore his wedded bride,
When in the fulness of his marriage joy,
He decorates her tawny brow with shells,
Retires a space to see how fair she looks,
Then proud, runs up to kiss her;

for he has always a kindlier word for the hoary old rogue than ever any one could yet spare, who knows what it is to be dandled on his bosom at the mouth of the Solway, or about the Kyles of Bute. No, no, Mr. Smith; don't tell us about the bridegroom sea, toying in this playful and happy way; for a more deceitful sleeping-companion there never was, and when he comes to that kissing work you speak about, it is the roughest and most boorish attack ever made on maiden's lips, to say nothing of the salt, or the blue-beard character of the grim old wooer. You really must give over this way. It has not verisimilitude. It is like the notion of a girl at a watering-place, before she makes her first trip in a pleasure-yacht; and if you would be a wise interpreter of the ocean shells and surges, you must take a walk with old Homer, by the many-murmuring sea, or feel as Tennyson, when he wrote the

Break, break, break
On thy cold grey stones, O sea!
And I would that my voice could utter
The thoughts that arise in me.

But we must have done, our space, though not our matter, being exhausted. We would, therefore, briefly recommend Mr. Smith to remember his own words—

Strive for the Poet's crown; but ne'er forget
How poor are fancy's blooms to thoughtful fruits.

Be in no hurry to be famous; you must first of all be great. Sit down humbly on the footstool at the knees of the great parent, and listen reverentially to what mother Nature has to sing or say—to the old ballad lore that is chiming in her memory, to the sage counsel that she mingles with her talk, to the histories and the mysteries which she will by and by reveal to thee, if thou shew thyself a good listener, and able to receive her dark sayings. If so, we shall expect to meet thee again, and would now bid thee adieu in words thou knowest well.

A star is trembling on the horizon's verge.
That star shall grow and broaden on the night,
Until it hangs divine and beautiful
In the proud zenith.
May you so broaden on the skies of fame.

The proceedings which have taken place in Parliament, since it re-assembled on the 4th of last month, have possessed more than usual interest. Of the subjects which have been under consideration, the most important have been the proposals of the Government relative to education and the finances. As regards the former, the expectations of the public were not very high; and the intentions of the Ministry, as announced by Lord John Russell, if they do not fall short of these anticipations, certainly do not surpass them. The principal features of the scheme (if such it may be called), are the provisions relative to education in towns, and to charitable endowments. Municipal councils are to be enabled, by a majority of two-thirds, to levy a rate in aid of education—the proceeds to be distributed, according to a fixed and uniform proportion, among schools already existing and approved by the Educational Committee of the Privy Council. The charitable endowments, which now produce an annual revenue of about £312,000, are to be rescued from mismanagement and inefficiency, and turned to better account for educational purposes, under the supervision of a Committee of the Council. Special allowances are to be made to schools in places which possess no municipal organization. The amount annually voted for education is to be increased by £100,000. The Universities are for the present left undisturbed, but with an express warning that the interference of the Government can only be averted by timely self-reformation.

These proposals, satisfactory as far as they go, are, of course, liable to the objection that they fail to supply the great want, now acknowledged and deplored by all parties, of a method by which instruction may be made to reach the children of the most necessitous and ignorant classes. The assistance rendered from the public funds is to be afforded only to those parents who are already able and willing to give some sort of education to their children. The proper answer to this objection is, that the blame of the shortcoming rests, not with the actual Administration, but with the present frame of the Government. Under a restricted franchise, the beneficial action of the State, either for educational or for any other purpose, is limited, by a kind of political necessity, to what may be termed the electoral classes of the community. The establishment of a really national system of education, is one of the results which may be expected to follow a large extension of the suffrage.

If the Government proposals with regard to education rather disappointed public expectation, the Budget has greatly exceeded it. This statesman-like and comprehensive scheme, ably and clearly developed by Mr. Gladstone, in his speech of the 18th of last month, has been received with more general approbation than usually rewards the efforts of our ministers of finance. This approval of the scheme as a whole, however, does not apply to certain details, some of which, it is to be hoped, will be amended before they pass into law. The Revenue of the financial year 1853-54, is estimated at £52,990,000; the expenditure at £52,183,000; leaving a surplus of about £800,000. This surplus it is proposed to increase by some additions to the existing taxes. One of these is the temporary extension of the income tax, at the reduced rate of 5d. in the pound, to incomes between £100 and £150, and to Ireland. The legacy duty is to be extended to all successions, real property being no longer exempted. There is to be an addition of 1s. a gallon to the duty on spirits in Scotland, and of 8d. in Ireland; and an increase is to be made in the higher grade of licences to brewers, and to dealers in tea and coffee, tobacco and soap. The total receipts from these increased taxes are expected to amount, in the year 1853-4, to £1,344,000, and in future years to a considerably larger sum. The means which the Chancellor of the Exchequer thus obtains are to be applied to the remission or reduction of some of the most objectionable of the existing imposts. The duty on soap, which now produces £1,126,000, is to be abolished altogether. The tea-duty is to be diminished, by gradual reductions, from its present amount of 2*s.* 2¼*d.* per lb., to 1*s.* per lb., in 1856. The customs' duties on twelve other articles of food, including butter, cheese, eggs, raisins and cocoa, are to be considerably lowered. There are, besides, 133 more articles, the duties on which are to be reduced, and 123 which are to be set free from duty altogether. The stamp-duty on life assurance is to be diminished from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 6*d.* per £100; on receipts, to 1*d.* for all amounts; on indentures of apprenticeship, where no consideration is given, to 2*s.* 6*d.*; on attorney's annual certificates, to £9 in the metropolis, and £6 in the country—and on articles of clerkship from £120 to £80. The duty on advertisements is to be reduced from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 6*d.*; and newspaper supplements, containing only advertisements, are not to be liable to the stamp duty. The duty on hackney carriages is to be reduced from 1*s.* 5*d.* to 1*s.* a day. In the assessed taxes large remissions are to be made. The duties on men-servants, and on carriages, horses and dogs, are to be considerably lowered in most cases, and in others to be simplified and equalized. The conditions of the redemption of the land-tax are to be made more favourable. By all these remissions, under the different heads of excise, customs, stamps and assessed taxes, there will be a reduction of taxation for the present year of £2,568,000, and a loss incurred by the revenue, after allowing for the additional receipts from increased consumption, of £1,656,000. The surplus of revenue remaining after these remissions will be £493,000. When all the proposed reductions, including that of tea duty, shall have taken effect, the entire remission of taxation, under this scheme, will be not less than £5,384,000. The resources which are expected to be available for the repeal of the income-tax in 1860 (after successive reductions, in 1855 and 1857), to 6*d*. and 5*d*. in the pound, are to be derived partly from the legacy duty and the other new taxes, partly from the diminished charge of the national debt, and partly from the falling in of the long annuities, which alone will in that year effect a relief of £2,146,000.

Such is an outline of the Government plan, which in its extent, not less than in the mingled boldness and prudence of its various provisions, reminds one of Sir Robert Peel's memorable budgets. The chief merit of the scheme is that it carries out the system which that great statesman was the first, not indeed to originate, but to bring into practical operation on a large scale. On the other hand, the defects of the plan are obvious enough; not the least among them being the retention of the income tax in its unreformed state, though its inequalities are now admitted. However fair the intentions of the Ministry may be, few persons will be sanguine enough to expect that the Government of 1860 will be able to dispense with the amount of revenue afforded by this tax. The advocates of a re-adjustment of this impost may, however, be content to endure its inequalities a few years longer, in the hope that, by the year 1860, public opinion will have become sufficiently enlightened to enable the Government of that day to convert an unfair and vexatious income-tax into an equitable property-tax.

Of minor objections, one of the most reasonable is that which relates to the manner in which the duty on advertisements is to be dealt with. The tax of sixpence, which is to be retained, will be quite sufficient to prevent the cheapening of advertisements, by preserving the partial monopoly which is at present enjoyed by a few of the principal journals. The remission of the duty on supplements, a measure unobjectionable in itself, will only serve, under the circumstances, to develop and confirm this monopoly. The tax should be abolished altogether; its reduction, as now proposed, will produce few of those benefits which may reasonably be expected to accrue from its entire remission.

The intended reforms, subsequently announced by Mr. Wilson, in the methods of levying the customs' duties, constitute the proper complement of the financial reforms proposed in the budget, and will relieve the commerce of the country from many needless and injurious restrictions.

COLONIES AND DEPENDENCIES.

The increasing interest felt in the question of the future government of India has been considerably strengthened by the intelligence that two of the judges of the highest court of Bombay have been summarily removed from the bench, by the mere fiat of the Governor, without process of trial, and for alleged grounds which the public in India consider not to be the real causes of their dismissal. Whatever the truth of the matter may be, it is clear that, under the present system, no security for the good administration of justice can exist in India. It may, however, be questioned whether any arrangements which can be devised will afford this security, until the natives of India, or, at least, the more civilised portion of them, shall be admitted to some share in the government of their country. In a petition, signed by between six and seven thousand educated natives of Bengal, and presented to the House of Lords by the Earl of Harrowby, some suggestions are made on this point, which deserve attention. The petitioners propose that the legislative power shall be vested in a council of seventeen persons, of whom five shall be Europeans, and twelve, natives—three from each presidency. The twelve native members, they suggest, should be at first selected by the Governor-General, but with the understanding that at some future day this method of appointment is to give place to a system of popular election. Of course, Lord Ellenborough, whose opinions with regard to Indian government appear to be formed on the old maxim of paternal despotism, "Everything for the people, nothing by the people," objected strongly to these suggestions; but, some of his noble colleagues took different views on the subject; and the sagacious manufacturers and merchants of Manchester, at their recent public meeting, have sufficiently indicated their own opinions, that industry, prosperity, and contentment in India, can only spring from the self-reliant energy and intelligence, which will be developed by education and free institutions.

From an allusion in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget speech, it may be inferred that the Colonial Minister, in accordance with his well-known principles, has determined to empower the colonists of Jamaica to exercise a more complete control over their public expenditure. How systematically they are thwarted at present in this respect appears from the following intelligence from that island, which we copy from the Times of April 4. It must be borne in mind that the Jamaica "Council," or Upper House, is a nominated body, appointed by the Home Government, and not responsible to the Colonists:—

A bill to reduce the expenditure of the colony by £62,500, had passed the Assembly. It was fully expected that the bill would be rejected by the Council. Indeed, it was whispered in political circles, that only one member of the Council would vote in favour of it. In the event of the bill being rejected, it was supposed that the popular branch would pass a resolution refusing to raise any supplies. This would be followed by a short prorogation. On re-assembling, the same resolution, or one similar to it, would be, probably, passed. This would leave the Governor no alternative but to dissolve the Assembly, and appeal to the constituency. Should this be done, it is pretty certain that the new House will be imbued with retrenchment principles, to at least as great an extent as its predecessor.

Such is the mode in which the Government of Jamaica has hitherto been conducted. In this country, when the House of Lords opposes itself, on any important question, to the fixed determination of the people, a continued "pressure from without" will, in time, compel it to give way; but in Jamaica, the Council, backed by the overwhelming power of the Home Government, can always resist effectually any amount of pressure. If "responsible government" shall now be established in that colony, with such an elective franchise as will enable the labouring classes to protect themselves against oppressive legislation, we shall soon cease to hear of discontent and distress in Jamaica.

FOREIGN.

The political stagnation of the Continent has only been disturbed, of late, by two changes of ministry, remarkable rather for the causes which led to them, than for their intrinsic importance. In Spain, the unpopular Ministers who have in vain endeavoured to carry out the reactionary intentions of the Court, and to reduce the Legislature to a condition similar to that of the French Empire, have been, at length, compelled to resign, and have been succeeded by a ministry of professedly moderate and conciliatory views. The event is only of importance as an evidence that even in Spain, as in other countries of Western Europe, the cause of constitutional government has not been weakened by the temporary defection of France.

In Holland, a "Papal aggression," closely resembling that which disturbed this country three years ago; in other words, the appointment of a Roman Catholic Archbishop and four suffragan Bishops, has produced a popular excitement, which has driven from power the Ministers who acquiesced in this proceeding of the Roman See. In our country, the statesmen who, three years ago, opposed the current of popular indignation, now hold the highest places in the Administration. It remains to be seen, whether the Dutch Protestants will be equally ready to forgive the Ministers whom they have now expelled from office, for the offence of religious toleration.

LITERATURE.

Cobden and his Pamphlet considered; in a Letter to Richard Cobden, Esq. M.P. By Alfred B. Richards, Esq. Second Edition. London: Bailey Brothers, Royal Exchange Buildings. 1853.

Mr. Richards has wrought himself up to a state of perfect delirium, and bidden adieu to common courtesy and decency, and, what is worse for him, to common sense as well—and all along of Richard Cobden and his pamphlet. On this subject he is insane, perfectly mad with sheer hatred, which, far from endeavouring to conceal, he boasts and parades upon all occasions. His avowed hatred is only equalled by his pomposity and pedantry. Stupidly imagining that because Mr. Cobden does not garnish his paragraphs with fag ends of Greek and scraps of Latin, he must be wanting in education, Mr. Richards takes care to show himself a man of erudition by dragging in classical quotations where they have no business, and actually pens an elaborate note to prove to the world that he knows almost as much of prosody as a boy on the lowest form at Harrow is expected to know at twelve years of age. With all his scholarship, however, he writes in an abominably stilted and inflated style—a style as remote in vigour and effect from the plain Saxon of Cobden as mere windy verbiage can well be. We do not share the whole of Mr. Cobden's opinions on the question of war and the probabilities of invasion, as our readers well know, but we would much rather endorse them in toto than subscribe to the rabid rant of these pages, or countenance the ungentlemanly and savage discourtesy which seems to be the chief characteristic of their author. In page 111 he gives us the old saw "Didicisse fideliter artes," &c.: if there be any truth in it, Mr. Richards ought to be as ignorant as a blind horse. We have some faith in the adage ourselves, and are, therefore, strongly inclined to suspect that this erudite seeming is assumed for the nonce. It is possible that his furious wrath is also got up for a temporary purpose; so much the better for him if it be.

Australia Visited and Revisited. A Narrative of recent Travels and old Experiences in Victoria and New South Wales. By Samuel Mossman, and Thomas Banister. London: Addey and Co., 21, Old Bond-street. 1853.

The authors of this volume are practical men who write for a practical purpose: their object is to lay before the public a work which, while it affords to the emigrant all the information he requires, shall put the stay-at-home reader in possession of such interesting facts as most persons at the present crisis are desirous of knowing. Afraid of imparting a wrong impression of the countries they have visited, and thus occasioning mischief, they limit their narrative almost entirely to the facts of their own experience, rarely recurring to any other source. Fortunately for the reader, this experience is pretty extensive, and the narrative will be found to comprise every subject in connection with the progress of our South Australian colonies, with which he would desire to be acquainted. The relation commences with a log of the voyage out, which those about to emigrate will be glad to learn is one of the least dangerous, notwithstanding its length, that can be undertaken. The travellers arrive at Melbourne within a few weeks after the discovery of the gold diggings; they describe the excitement of the time—the doings of the diggers—and the rush of all classes to the gold-fields; and they visit them all in succession, reporting without enthusiasm or prejudice the actual state of affairs on the spot. They journey into the interior, visiting the squatters and the sheep-farmers, and paint many striking and life-like pictures of life in the bush and the wilderness. The following sketch of a Squatter's homestead may serve as a fair sample of the style and contents of the volume:—

As we approached the homestead, we heard the lowing of kine, the bleating of sheep, and the homely bark of the dogs, which thrilled with a pleasing sensation through our wearied frame, while our good horse pricked up his ears and sniffed the air, as if he was sure there was a feed of corn at hand. Emerging from the forest, we came suddenly upon the head-station, with its house and out-offices built upon a small hill, at the foot of which was a running stream about ten yards wide; this stream we forded, over a pebbly bed, with the horse up to his knees in water. A general whoop from all the live creation about announced our approach. Among barking dogs, crowing fowls, cackling geese, lowing cattle and neighing horses, we made our way up to the house, where we found the proprietor standing at his open door, who cordially invited us to dismount and step in, after perusing a note of introduction which we presented to him from his agents in Melbourne.

Apologising for the absence of his ostler, who had gone to the diggings, he led the way to a roughly-built but comfortable stable in the rear of the premises, where, between us, we managed to put up our tired horse snugly for the night. After this he shewed us to the strangers' bed-rooms, of which there were half-a-dozen in the house, and left us to indulge in refreshing ablutions, which, under the circumstances, was the most agreeable thing we could have. When we had finished, we were shewn into a comfortably furnished parlour, where we were introduced to our host's wife, a lady-like personage, and his family, consisting of four boys and two interesting girls, all in their teens. Besides these, there were two gentlemen from a neighbouring station, who had come a distance of ten miles to drink tea with them. Altogether, a more homely, pleasant-looking family party you would not find in the oldest farm-house in England; and nowhere but in a gentleman-farmer's homestead would you find the same elegances and comforts with which the room was furnished. Sofa, table, chairs, carpet, pianoforte, curtains decorating a French window opening upon a verandah—every thing had the semblance of wealth and taste, which you might expect in the cities, but certainly not in the bush of Australia. Our host, although more than twelve years a tenant of the bush, had not lost any of the polished manners of the gentleman; and his children, brought up under the care of an amiable and accomplished mother, presented that decorum and obedience which betoken the well-bred family. Those who have read of the barbarous state in which the American squatter lives, from whom the appellation has been derived, as he squats down upon a piece of land in the backwoods, without paying fee or license, are agreeably surprised when they witness the superior condition of the Australian squatter.

The state of society in the principal towns, at the diggings, and in the bush, is depicted in plain, homely, but vigorous colours, with such an evident and dogged adherence to the facts of the case, that no man shall read this volume half through without feeling assured that he knows something at least of Australian habits and feelings. The writers travel overland from Melbourne to Sydney, a distance of some six hundred miles, through forest and plain, ravines and rivers; they record the events of the journey, its pleasures and pains, dangers and delights. We have not space to follow them, but commend our readers to do so at their leisure. In the course of their route they came upon a shepherd, whose history may serve for a warning to many proposing to emigrate, but who had better stay at home.

In our conversation with this shepherd (say they), we were struck by his manner, which was above that of the mere labourer; and his little history, which he briefly told us, proved that we were not wrong. He said he was an artist, and had received a good education from his father, who was a man of good repute at Merton in Surrey. That a year or two before, he was tempted, by the favourable reports of Port Philip, to try his fortune there in prosecuting his profession. When he arrived, he found that his talent as an artist was of no value to him, and his small means became exhausted, when the reality of his position soon became clear. He did not blame any one but himself for the step he had taken, only that he had been mistaken as to the class of men best adapted to the exigencies of a colonial life; he had learnt a lesson, and he trusted he should profit by it. That upon the discovery of gold at Bathurst he had started from Port Philip to walk overland, and try his fortune as a gold-digger; having reached thus far, his means had failed him, and he was compelled to defer his intention until he could realize the wherewithal to make another start by acting in the capacity of a shepherd, as he was then employed. The experiences of this young man are by no means singular throughout these colonies; and there have been many hundreds with better prospects at starting compelled through necessity to labour at ordinary occupations.

The concluding chapters treat of matters which already demand serious consideration, and will not admit of being much longer shelved by the home government. The suggestions of Messrs. Mossman and Banister point to a practical remedy for existing evils—but it must come soon, if it is intended to be effective. The Australian of to-day is not the Australian even of a month ago, and it is vain to predicate what shall happen upon a soil subject to changes never before paralleled in history. The last chapter on Cautions and Suggestions should be well studied by all who think of departing for the land of Gold. This volume deserves to become, par excellence, the emigrant's book: it makes no pretence to literary display, but is none the less practically useful, for all that—and it is furnished with an excellent map and chart, available at all times for reference.

Sonnets, and Miscellaneous Poems. By JAMES COCHRANE. Edinburgh: Johnstone and Hunter. 1853.

THE author of these Sonnets seems to have had a presentiment that they are not what the public have reason to expect from him—and he is right: little thought has been bestowed on their contents, and less care on their execution; there is not one of them that would not admit of considerable improvement under his own hand—as he knows well enough, being capable of far better things. We extract one on "Railways"; there is a joke in it, but the joke is common property.

This is the age of progress: time and space
Are things that were, are numbered with the dead;
The universal cry is, "Go a-head;"

Till scarce of our youth's world is left a trace.
But are we always wise when we displace
Things old and tried, to which our hearts were wed,
And substitute the untried in their stead?
Or is our only aim to end the race?
The box-seat of the mail, and quicker rail,
For true enjoyment who would once compare you?
In that, ev'n if an accident occurs,
Why, to be sure, you're pitched off without fail,
But there you are: but on a rail, good sirs!
If there should be a blow-up, why, where are you?

The miscellaneous poems offer less scope for selection, being for the most part very trifling things and not a little disfigured by expletives lugged in to fill up the metre.

Money: how to get, save, spend, give, lend, and bequeath it: being a practical Treatise on Business, &c. By EDWIN T. FREEDLEY. London: Partridge and Oakey, Paternoster Row. 1853.

THIS volume is a neat, compact, and cheap reprint of an American work of extraordinary merit, supplemented with original chapters on the subjects of Banking and Life Assurance. The author has handled the matter throughout with the seriousness it demands, and like a thorough man of business, has entered deliberately into the investigation of every topic bearing upon the question. He is plainly a man of high principle, one in whose estimation the morality of commerce is as pure as that of the pulpit, and who would countenance no departure from rigid honour for the sake of greed however great. His book is at once intensely interesting, instructive and amusing; and we can but think that it is destined materially to check the rascal spirit which is everywhere manifesting its villanous presence in the trading operations of mankind. It will be read by all ranks and classes, and by none more advantageously than by the young who are entering upon life, who will see here the only road to honourable and permanent success, and who will act wisely in regulating their conduct by the spirit and precepts of its author.

Poems Narrative and Lyrical. By EDWIN ARNOLD, of University College. Oxford: Frances Macpherson. 1853.

OF these effusions we like the narrative better than the lyrical; but neither kind have any great claim to public admiration. The lines are harmonious and fluent, without any depth of thought or felicity of fancy, and are occasionally marred by rhymes which don't rhyme, and the stereotyped formulas of so-called poetical expression. Mr. Arnold, however, tells a tale, particularly a pathetic one, pleasantly. The "Feast of the Falcon" would bear out our assertion, and we would transfer it to our columns but for its length. The following description of Venice may serve as a specimen of the writer's vein.

As one who comes from years of weary roving
To look on her who was his early love,
And findeth for the end of all his loving
Only a green grave and a stone above—
Only her silent grave; so shall it prove
With him whose heart, full of her history,
Leadeth his feet to Venice. Grief shall move
His eyes to tears as true as tears may be
At sight of her who reigned, the sweetheart of the sea.

Yet she is fair—oh! very,—very fair,
The ancient beauty is not buried, yet,
But like gold gloss on a dead lady's hair,
That lingers when the eyes are still and set,
And the lips locked, winning us to forget
By little and by little all her grace,
Till we may bear to lose it:—so is met
Life and cold death on the dead city's face,
Not the sweet life itself, but the life's latest trace.

Lent Lectures: Solomon. By the REV. JOHN C. MILLER, M.A. London: T. Hatchard, Piccadilly. 1853.

THESE are five lectures on the character and career of Solomon. They are plainly written, to serve a practical purpose—to warn, to instruct, and to edify. They may be read with profit by those who are willing to be profited by the earnest admonitions of the preacher, and will find their proper place on that shelf of the family library which is devoted to books for Sunday reading. This is the greatest praise we can award them, and all, perhaps, which the author seeks. Considered as literary productions, their merit is nothing extraordinary.

Lord Byron. And, The Comic Dramatists of the Restoration. By THOMAS BABINGTON MACAULAY. (Traveller's Library). London: Longman and Co. 1853.

THE above two well-known articles, here reprinted from Macaulay's Critical and Historical Essays, need no recommendation from us to secure the favour of the public. The article on Lord Byron has formed the ground-work on which most of the voluminous criticism on the life and writings of the noble poet which has since appeared has been written: and he would be a bold writer who should venture to question the fidelity of the masterly portrait Macaulay has drawn. The Essay on the Comic Dramatists is however, to our taste, far more interesting of the two, not so much on account of the dramatists themselves, to whom due measure of justice is fairly done, as from the sparkling and vigorous sketch it contains of that sturdy old English divine who was their scourge and vanquisher, Jeremy Collier. He lashed the filthy Congreve into dulness and imbecility, and brought Dryden himself to a confession of penitence; and he did more to reform the morale of the English stage, and to prolong its respectable existence, than any other man either of his or our own day.

Papers for the Schoolmaster, Vol. II. London: Simpkin, Marshall and Co. Glasgow: Hamilton.

WE had occasion about a year ago to call attention to the first volume of this most useful and interesting publication. We are glad to see that the second volume is in no way inferior to the first—and we may be allowed to express a hope that the work is making its way as it deserves to do. Schoolmasters who neglect to procure it, are doing themselves an injury, and losing a means of efficient instruction, and a medium of information to themselves, which is not to be supplied, so far as we know, from any other source. The music alone in this volume is worth its price.

Jane Seton; or, the King's Advocate. A Scottish Historical Romance. By JAMES GRANT. In two volumes. London: G. Routledge and Co. 1853.

LIKE all the productions of this author, the romance of Jane Seton is full of incident and action. The events here recorded are supposed to have taken place in the reign of James the Fifth of Scotland, and in the year 1537. The time is sufficiently far back to allow a writer scope for imagination, and that latitude which most romancers require. The light which history throws upon the social customs of a generation which has been dead and buried three hundred years, is but a dim and hazy gleam; and the world willingly allows the writer of fiction to disport himself in the comparative obscurity pretty much as he chooses, so long as he keeps within the bounds of probability, and deals fairly with the known facts of the period of which he treats. Mr. Grant has availed himself of the full liberty awarded to the members of his craft; and his book, by the generality of readers, will be relished all the better for the license he has taken. Perhaps the student of Scottish character may object to some of his delineations, as not too like; but it is not always overwise to be over-learned in such matters. We should sit down to a romance as we would to a banquet, content to enjoy the feast before us, without peering into history in the one case, any more than we would into the cookery-book in the other. Jane, the heroine of this story, is a beautiful and high-minded girl, whose family and friends are obnoxious to the monarch and the courtly party; but she is betrothed to Vipont, the most valiant knight and chief favourite of the king. Redhall, the king's advocate, who is all-powerful in Edinburgh, is, however, desperately enamoured of her, and dares and does all he can, first to obtain her hand, and, finding that hopeless, afterwards to have her burned alive for sorcery. In the pursuit of his villanous designs, he is run through the body by Vipont and stabbed in the breast by Ashkirk, Jane's brother; but he survives both wounds, and succeeds at last so far as to procure the condemnation of the poor girl, who is stripped and tortured on the rack in his presence. Her confessor, through the cardinal, obtains a pardon from the king, which pardon the wretched advocate contrives to intercept by means of one of his sanguinary myrmidons, and the doomed girl is led forth at midnight to be bound to the stake. In the meanwhile, Vipont, who had been confined in the castle on a charge trumped up to get him out of the way, escapes from prison, meets the scoundrel Redhall, and runs him through the body, this time making sure work of it. Then, mounting his horse, he proceeds to the place of execution, and rescuing his lady-love from the faggots, carries her off in triumph. The above is a rough outline only of the leading events. There are a variety of characters introduced, most of whom do what Mr. Falloon would call "very good business," and whose various exploits constitute the chief interest of the tale. The story is full of stirring matter from beginning to end. Battle and murder and sudden death—treachery, conspiracy, poison and the black-art, and other nice things of the sort, are the stock-materials of the drama, which is played out to the end with admirable vigour, and with a knowledge of stage-effect rarely rivalled even among melo-dramatic authors. Mr. Grant describes a battle capitally, and the more bloody and obstinate the better. Had we room we would extract the night-attack by Vipont and his band upon the Barmkyn of Cairntable. The whole scene is vividly life-like, and death-like; as we read, we see the grim warriors at their work, and when the strife is over, its details dwell upon the memory with painful distinctness. For the sake of the heroine, who bears her tribulations so well and nobly, we could wish that Vipont was more worthy of her—that he was something better than a brawling soldier, whose fool's argument is the sword's point; and it is hardly without a fear of the consequences that we see her married to him at last.

These volumes are brought out in a somewhat novel style for works of this class. They are handsomely bound in cloth, and illustrated with designs by Gilbert, admirably engraved by Dalziel.

Poems by Edward Quillinan; with a Memoir by William Johnston.——The Lusiad of Luis de Camoens. Books I. to V., translated by EDWARD QUILLINAN. With Notes by John Adamson. London: Edward Moxon, Dover-street. 1853.

THE name of Edward Quillinan, the friend and son-in-law of Wordsworth, and the first Portuguese scholar in England, is not so well known as it ought to be to the general reader; and we shall, therefore, condense briefly the leading events of his life from the Memoir prefixed to this edition of his collected works.

Edward Quillinan was born at Oporto, of Irish parents, on the 12th of August, 1791. At seven years of age he was shipped off to England, to go to school; and he never again saw his mother, who died a few years after. Arrived at Liverpool, he was forwarded into Staffordshire, to the Catholic school at Sedgley Park, where he was plagued with the ferula of one pedagogue and the fist of another—and whence, in a few years, he was removed to a Dominican school at Carshalton, under the superintendence of masters who used him well, treated him kindly, and led him a happy life. At the age of fourteen, being destined for the counting-house, he returned to Oporto. But before he had been there six months, the invasion of the French drove out all the English families, and he had to fly with his father and step-mother (his father had married again), back to England. The lady, being taken prematurely in labour, unfortunately died on the passage. In London, his father formed a military acquaintance, which led to the introduction of young Quillinan into the army, and he was gazetted, in 1808, as a cornet in the 2nd Dragoon Guards, with whom he witnessed the disasters of the Walcheren expedition.

Two years later, he purchased a lieutenancy in the 23rd Light Dragoons, and joined the regiment at Canterbury, soon after its return from the affair at Talavera. At Canterbury, he made his first essay in literature, by the publication of a satirical poem, and contributions to a periodical, called "The Whim," got up among the officers of his regiment. His satire embroiled him with his brother officers, and brought three duels upon his hands, from which he extricated himself with honour, according to the senseless notions of the time—fighting twice, and accommodating the third quarrel. He then exchanged into the 3rd Dragoon Guards, and, joining that regiment in Spain, served with it to the end of the Peninsular War. In 1816, having returned home at the Peace, he published his "Sacrifice of Isabel," a poem which was favourably received, and which he dedicated to Sir Egerton Brydges, whose friendship he had acquired, it is said, by his conduct in the matter of the duels. In 1817, he married Jemima, Sir Egerton's second daughter, and soon after joined his regiment in the neighbourhood of Dublin, where, in 1819, his eldest daughter was born. From Ireland he went to Scotland, and visited Edinburgh, it is supposed with hostile intentions towards the author of a bantering critique, which had appeared in "Blackwood," upon one of his poems. The magazine article bore the title of "Poems by a Heavy Dragoon," and it expounded with great gravity the reasons why the heavy dragoon was not likely to be a good poet—reasons connected with camp-kettles and pipe-clayed breeches, and other such like associations unpropitious to the poetic faculty; and it ridiculed severely certain passages of the soldier-poet. But our author had not been long in Edinburgh, before he found himself on terms the very reverse of hostile with the whole band of the Blackwood contributors; with the author of the offending article for his particular friend. In 1821, while quartered at Penrith, he visited Rydal, carrying an introduction from a friend to Mr. Wordsworth, for whom he had for many years nourished a decided and growing admiration. He chose not to present his introductory letter, but introduced himself, and thus originated a friendship with the great poet which lasted during the lives of both. In the same year he quitted the army, and took up his residence on the banks of the Rotha, between Ambleside and Rydal. There his second daughter was born, whom he named after the stream on the banks of which he dwelt, and who is the "Rotha" of Wordsworth's fine sonnet, commencing

"Rotha, my spiritual child! this head was grey," &c.

Shortly after the birth of her child, Mrs. Quillinan fell a victim to a sad fate. She had removed to Lancaster for medical advice; and there, her dressing-gown taking fire, she received such injuries, that after lingering a few days, she died on the 25th of May, 1822—Dora Wordsworth, the poet's sister, attending her dying bed.

After the loss of his wife, whose death he heavily deplored, Mr. Quillinan went abroad, and passed some time on the Continent. Upon his return he resided at Lee Priory, near Canterbury, which belonged to his brother-in-law, Col. Brydges Barrett, and sometimes at his house in London, until 1832—occasionally visiting the Wordsworth family in Westmoreland, or receiving them in London. From 1832 to 1834 he resided in France; he then visited his brother in Portugal, and returned to England at the end of 1835. In 1836 he took his eldest daughter with him to Portugal, and remained there a year. After his return he resided at Canterbury until 1841. On the 11th of May, 1841, nineteen years after the death of his first wife, he married Dora Wordsworth, at Bath, in the presence of her father, mother and brothers. Settling in London after a round of visiting, the pair resided there until the winter of 1843-4, when they removed to Ambleside.

In "Blackwood's Magazine" of December, 1842, appeared an article by Walter Savage Landor—an imaginary conversation between Porson and Southey, intended to reflect ridicule upon the poetry of Wordsworth. Mr. Quillinan, in return, wrote a dialogue between W. S. Landor and the Editor of "Blackwood's Magazine," and appealing to the editor for fair-play, procured its immediate insertion. In this dialogue he puts into Landor's mouth all the bitter and sarcastic things he had said in his critical writings respecting eminent persons of ancient and modern times, thus causing him to appear as the very Thersites of literature. This was fair enough; and Mr. Landor did not condescend to avenge himself, further than by a pun on his antagonist's Quillinanities, for which pun, it appears he was indebted to Quillinan himself, who had fired it off in his hearing thirty years before.

The years following his second marriage, up to 1845, were the happiest of Quillinan's life. He passed them chiefly at Ambleside. At the end of this period, anxieties respecting his wife's health induced them to undertake a voyage to the South of Europe, and, accompanied by his youngest daughter, they departed in the spring for Portugal. The remedy proved effectual. Mrs. Quillinan recovered her health; and having prolonged their absence for more than a year, they returned in July, 1846, to a new residence on the banks of the Rotha. Here they both for a time became immersed in literary avocations. Mrs. Quillinan prepared her Journal, which appeared in two volumes early in the ensuing year, and he published in "Tait's Magazine" for October and November, 1846, "The Belle: Adventures at a Portuguese Watering Place." In the December number of the "Quarterly Review" of the same year, he published an elaborate criticism on the works of Gil Vicente, and the ancient Portuguese Drama—a well-digested and masterly performance.

But a terrible grief was at hand. In December, Mrs. Quillinan, while on a journey to Carlisle, caught a severe cold, which her constitution could never shake off. She had gone to reside at Rydal Mount during the absence of her parents. Her illness increasing, they were sent for, and returned to the north; but the patient never rallied. By the end of April, the physicians announced that there was no hope of saving her life; and lingering on through much suffering for several months, she died on the 9th of July. The sorrow with which her husband lamented her loss, he never shook off during the remainder of his life. He sought distraction in literary labours, in translating the "Lusiad" of Camoens, and the "Portuguese History" of Herculano. In the August of the following year, he published in "Blackwood" an article on "Laurels and Laureates," a curious piece of research connected with English bards and their rewards. This appears to have been the last of his productions published during his life. In April, 1850, Mr. Wordsworth died. In the spring of 1851, Mr. Quillinan exposed himself to wet and cold during a fishing excursion, the consequence of which was inflammation, resulting in a decided pleurisy which resisted all remedies. He was seized with delirium on the third day, and without recovering consciousness, died on the 8th. The ruling passion swayed him to the last. His talk was of Milton, Shakspere and Wordsworth; and but an hour before he died he called for the book in which he was writing his translation of the "History of Portugal," and with pen in hand endeavoured to pursue his labours. He could not recognise his children, but he said to his attendant, "I want to finish, or it will be of no use to them," meaning his daughters.

Mr. Quillinan was professedly a Roman Catholic; but he attended the services of the Church of England, and used the prayers of that church in the morning and evening devotions of his family. His biographer suggests that whatever were his religious convictions, it may have been a point of honour with him not to make a change in profession which might wear the appearance of having been made from motives of selfish advantage. In his youth, the Romanist laboured under civil and religious disabilities because he was a Romanist—and Quillinan was just the sort of man to be deterred from separating himself openly from Romanism, for that very reason. In politics he was a Tory, but willing to allow every man the indulgence of his own views. Like most Irishmen, he was the occasional subject of restlessness and excitability; but, if we are to believe the testimony of his friend, a more generous, noble, and high-minded creature never breathed. He lies in Grasmere Churchyard, between the graves of the two he loved best.

Of Mr. Quillinan's poetical talents Mr. Johnston informs us that Wordsworth had a high opinion: the pieces in the volume, to which the memoir is prefixed, do not however fully countenance the bestowal of praise from such an authority; many of them, it is true, are mechanically perfect, and all characterised by facility of versification and elegance of diction; but they are wanting in soul and strength—the casket is elaborately wrought and polished, but the jewel within is of inadequate worth. The expression of appropriate sentiment in artistic phrase is not enough to constitute a good poem, but we have here little beyond that. The flood of verse continually pouring from the press, and into forgetfulness, bears upon its surface much that is of equal value with the productions of this amiable man. The translations are by far the best pieces, and these, perhaps, may be destined to survive when the others are no more remembered. The translation of the "Lusiad," though excellent in one sense, is defective in another. So far as we (reading the original with difficulty) can judge, it is by far the most faithful version yet published, and widely differing from the paraphrases of Strangford; but unfortunately it comes unfinished from the translator's hands, and needs much his final revision. Had he lived to complete it, in all probability it would have taken its place among the translated classics of our literature, and gained for its author a niche in the temple of fame.

The History of Germany and the Austrian Empire; from the Earliest Period to the Present Time. Adapted for Youth, Schools, and Families. By Miss Corner. London: Thomas Dean and Son, Threadneedle-street. 1853.

It is a fortunate thing for the young people of the present day that ladies like Miss Corner, possessing the tact and discrimination necessary in dealing with such a ponderous and involved subject as that of German History, are found willing to devote themselves to the task of juvenile instruction. The preparation of this compact and yet comprehensive volume must have been a work of real labour. It contains all that is necessary to ground the young student in the knowledge of facts and dates, to which latter particular especial attention has been paid. The history is carried down almost to the present day, and includes a summary of the late memorable war in Hungary, with the leading events of the revolutionary movements. A compendious series of questions for examination are added at the close of the volume; the answers to which may be found on reference to figures in the text, prefixed to the paragraphs containing them. We do not see how the utility of the book could be further enhanced. The illustrations are on steel, from designs by Gilbert.

Virginalia; or, Songs of my Summer Nights. A Gift of Love for the Beautiful. By T. H. Chivers, M.D. Philadelphia: Lippincott, Grambo and Co. London: Trübner and Co., Paternoster Row.

We shall not say a single word on the merits of this production, but allow the author to speak for himself. Hear him, ye poets of old England. Having first learnedly described the cutting of the "brilliant" from the rough diamond, he says:—

> Now you may as well tell me that a rough diamond, newly dug out of the mines of Golconda, can be made the mediator of the revelation of as much purely white light from the sun, as one that has been appointed to the office by the ingenuity of the Lapidary, as to tell me that any poem can become the mediation of the revelation of the influx of the Divine life of God into the soul, without the highest knowledge of the true art of musical language in the poet; for just as the first owes its ability to express itself crystallinely to the peculiar mode of that cutting which is best calculated, according to the highest mathematical laws appertaining to the full development of light through a multiplication of highly-polished facets, so does a full manifestation, or Shekinization, of the passions or emotions of the soul, depend entirely upon the art displayed in its creation, according to certain musical laws by the poet. . . . . . . For as the diamond is the crystalline revelator of the acromatic white light of heaven, so is a perfect poem the crystalline revelation of the Divine idea! There is just the difference between a pure poem and one that is not, that there is between the spiritual concretion of a diamond and the mere glaciation of water into ice. For as the irradiancy of a diamond depends upon its diaphorous translucency, so does the beauty of a poem upon its rythmical crystallization of the Divine Idea. Now in regard to the refrain of a poem, I would merely mention here, that it is not only an ornament, but an essence—a life—a vitality—an immortal soul—not a mere profane appendage, but a sacred symbolical ensignium, a crown of beauty, and a diamond of glory, &c. &c. . . . . . Thus have I moulded on the swift-circling wheel of my soul some of the manifold members of that Divine beauty which lives immortal in the shining house of life.

We shall only remark that the modesty of the above is at least equal to its philosophy. The reader is, by this time, anxious to be introduced to some of these "manifold members of divine beauty," moulded on the soul of Mr. Chivers. Here are one or two specimens, indicative, of course, "of the highest knowledge of the true art of musical language in the poet."

Many mellow Cydonian suckets,
Sweet apples, anthosmial, divine,
From the ruby-rimmed beryline buckets,
Star-gemmed, lily-shaped hyaline—
Like the sweet golden goblet found growing
On the wild emerald cucumber tree—
Rich, brilliant, like chrysopraz blowing—
I then brought to my Rosalie Lee—
To my lamb-like Rosalie Lee—
To my dove-like Rosalie Lee—
To my beautiful, dutiful Rosalie Lee.

Scourgings would be to this fond heart of mine,
The soft caressings of impassioned pain;
Wormwood, ambrosia—death, the life divine—
If I in kingdom come, with thee could reign.

Passing over a song in whose "immortal soul" of a refrain, the word "heigh-ho" occurs no less than four-score times, we extract one stanza from the "Poet of Love."

From the inflorescence of his own high soul,
The incense of his Eden song doth rise,
Whose golden river of pure redolence doth roll,
Down the dark vistas of all time in melodies—
Echoing the islands of the sea,
Of the vast immensity,
And the loud music of the morns,
Blown through the conchimarian horns,
Down the dark vistas of the reboantic horns,
By the great Angel of Eternity,
Thundering, Come to me! come to me!

The following is from a Poem addressed to a deaf mute lady:

Two of the golden strings of thy dear harp are broken,
Leaving the harp-strings of thy spirit still complete;
Words by thy tongue have never yet been spoken,
Yet thy dear soul doth warble words most sweet,
Whereon blest spirits from their bright abode
Make music such as please the very ears of God.

We shall venture no verdict upon these "members of Divine Beauty." Mr. Chivers intimates that the true poet never writes for the Aristarchi of the world, unless it be to show them what blockheads they are. "How can the critic judge," he demands, "of that which belongs only to the artist?" So we shall let him have his own way, commending all who are fascinated by the examples we have given above, to rush at once to their booksellers, and secure, while they may, copies of the "Virginalia."

An Easy Story Book for Little People. Solomon Lovechild's Sketches of Little Boys and Girls. London: Dean and Son, Threadneedle-street.

These are collections of simple and pleasing tales and sketches, adapted for the perusal of young children, in whom they are likely to promote the growth of moral habits and amiable manners. They are exceedingly well and handsomely got up, and illustrated with engravings of a bold and superior class.

The Colony: A Poem. In Four Parts. London: Thomas Bosworth, 215, Regent-street. 1853.

"The Colony," is a performance of very unequal merit, containing occasionally some good and vigorous lines—and a great many with halting metres, and deficient or redundant feet. The subject is very scantily treated—the author satisfying himself merely with the inculcation of a few general principles.

Religion and Business; or Spiritual Life in one of its Secular Departments. By A. J. Morris. London: Ward and Co., Paternoster-row. 1853.

We live in an age when the whole art and mystery of doing business—the very constitution of commerce—is undergoing a radical change, a metamorphosis far more striking and complete than it seems likely to be satisfactory. The old moralities of trade are being pushed out of the way, as so much refuse stock: the ancient and neighbourly maxim, "Live and let live," is already a dead letter—and the natural law of untamed brutes, the law that the strong should prey upon the weak, which signifies, in commercial language, that the capitalist shall devour the man of small means—is taking its place. Multitudes of small traders are overthrown, and trampled out of existence, that a few great ones may thrive upon their ruin. Mediocrity feels that, as such, it has no chance, and struggles and strives, by puffing, lying and chicanery, to swell itself into notoriety, without which it dies, with a line in the Gazette for an epitaph. Worse still—the war once waged only between rival traders is now carried on against the customer. Predacity is the order of the day. Bargains are battles, in which the greatest rogue stands the best chance of coming off conqueror; and he or she who goes a shopping goes into an enemy's country, and is there considered in the light of a lawful prey. How it is all to end—to what final condition we are tending, does not at present appear very plainly; but what does appear is a vast amount of practical wickedness, which men, professing religious principles, and men of no religion at all, seem equally to practise, and at the same time to ignore its enormity. It is, probably, to the perception of these evils, which no man can fail more or less to perceive, that this little volume on Religion and Business owes its existence. The subject is one, which, notwithstanding that it is growing daily of greater importance, is seldom treated of in the pulpit, and still more seldom by the press. This is, perhaps, owing to the fact that the precepts and monitions it suggests to most minds, are so obvious and unavoidable, that it might be supposed that any discussion of the matter must necessarily be trite and common-place. But if any one looks for the trite or common-place in these seven short discourses, he may chance to find himself agreeably disappointed. The current of the writer's thoughts does not run in the common channel, but almost invariably out of it. Originality is more natural to him than repetition; and if an old saw does escape him, as escape it must sometimes, it comes in a new garb and with a new grace. We shall extract a single passage, taken at random, feeling assured that it will justify our verdict.

It is honourable to be independent. The more there is of self in our portion, the more blessed and glorious it is. The more of our own energy and life it contains, the more precious; in a word, the more our own it is. For things are made ours not so much by communication to us as communication from us. In the highest sense, and for the highest uses, that is most mine, not which is most given to me, but which has received most from me. The deepest kind of possession belongs to objects not bestowed by others, but wrought out by a man's own activity. And, therefore, it is a glorious feeling which a man has, when, by his own assiduity and toil, he provides from himself for himself. He may fall short of the property of others, who have not laboured for it—he may be without their broad acres, and ample incomes, and civil honours, but if there be less for him to possess, he possesses it more. He has feelings which a "stranger" to his labours cannot "intermeddle with," a boasting which no man can stop, that he is more to himself than any other is, that what he has he has made, that he receives what he has given, reaps what he has sown. And, thus, all the enjoyments and powers of life, beyond their intrinsic value, have the sweet and noble quality of rewards. There is no disgrace in deriving riches and renown from ancestors, but there is virtue and glory in obtaining them from ourselves; and that religion which makes everything of the will and nothing of accidents, which aims ever at deepening personal interest and impressing personal responsibility, smiles ineffably upon the Christian at his work.

These are, indeed, "right words,"—and this is the sort of stuff the book is made of. We should like to see a second edition printed in minion type, and portable in an envelope—and sent, winged by a queen's head, to do business in counting-houses and behind counters, where it is prodigiously wanted just now.

The Free Church of Ancient Christendom, and its Subjugation under Constantine. By BASIL H. COOPER, B.A. London: Albert Cockshaw, 41, Ludgate-hill.

THERE is an affectation of utter historical impartiality and absolute freedom from bias of every kind, which is the surest token of a thoroughly prejudiced mind. We never take up a volume of that stamp, in which the writer has put on the judicial horse-hair and parades the spotlessness of his ermine, as if he were seated on a bench far above all human weakness, and breathing an atmosphere of calm philosophy never disturbed by human passion—a book of that kind we never read without suspicion, and never found that suspicion misapplied. Of course it would be very pleasant to get the opinion of an angel on our mundane affairs, as viewed from his peculiar sphere, where he sits on the unvexed and cloudless Olympus, watching the dark tide of time rolling and breaking along the eternal shores. How true it might be, were a matter of fair speculation; but at all events it would be a curious document, worth careful decyphering. When, however, a man writes about the things of man, the more he is striving to be really impartial, the less will be his pretensions; for he will feel at every step, that the mists he is anxious to dispel from historic men and events, may possibly wrap their skirts about his own eyes, and unconsciously bewilder his vision.

On the other hand, to trace the stream of history avowedly from the stand-point of downright partisanship, though honest enough in its way, is neither very safe nor generally very edifying. The annalist then becomes little else than a pamphleteer; and his philosophy a special pleading. This is voluntarily to disavow the judge and assume the advocate; and such a writer must be content with the support of his clients. Mr. Cooper will not blame us for identifying him with this class, as he frankly tells us that his "work makes no pretensions to rank as a Church History." At the same time, we would not be understood as throwing any slight on such contributions to ecclesiastical literature. The advocate may exhibit profound research, minute criticism, acute dialectics, and eloquent illustration; he may shed a flood of light on a point which would otherwise have attracted little observation, had not the rays been concentrated by the special bent of his mind; and he may give, for the time being, an exaggerated prominence to some constitutional principle, which, however, but for his urgency might have been suffered to fall into desuetude and neglect. On the whole, our author has acquitted himself, as a barrister, ably; perhaps, if he go on, he may some day come to the bench. If he had confined himself more to his function, more to the pleading of his cause, diverging less into the general matter of church annals, he certainly would not have injured his case, and he would have also avoided the disagreeable predicament of seeming to write a history which will certainly never be admitted into the catalogue of histories. For although this volume carries us along the dry, dusty road of schisms and heresies, down to the Council of Nice—though all the usual names, Gnostics, Docetæ, Aphytes, Œons, Callistians, Bonatists, &c., dance and flicker like marsh lights on his pages, as they used to distract our eyes on the barren paragraphs of Mosheim, when sleepily cramming for examination-day; yet we are constrained to say that the chief matter of this book, is rather the compilation of a diligent student, than the product of a broad-thinking historian; rather the creditable notes of a well-read man, than the thorough investigation of a profound inquirer.

Setting aside, therefore, any claim which may seem to be made by Mr. Cooper to the position of an original authority in ecclesiastical matters—a claim which is nowhere openly made, but which is really implied in the very size as well as in the character of his book; we must glance at its main feature, and what will form its chief excellence with one party, and its greatest blemish with another. "The Free Church of Ancient Christendom," then, is, in other words, the history of the first three centuries, according to the Anti-state-church Association, just as Milner's book is the anglican annals of the kingdom of Christ. Mr. Cooper starts with the idea that the church is, in the words of Neander, "a union of men arising from the fellowship of religious life: a union essentially independent of, and different from, all other forms of human association;" and we venture to say that no body of Christians will offer any material objection to that definition. Side by side with this, he places what is in his idea the old heathen estimate of religion as a mere tool of state-craft, wielded by the priestly and prelatic influence, and incarnate in the person of the Pontifex Maximus, in imperial days, or of the augur, in those earlier times when Cicero philosophised over the entrails of the sacred birds. And the grand heresy of the first three centuries is, according to Mr. Cooper, that fatal aberration from the path, now pursued by "Independent churches," and "voluntary associations," which ended in the final assumption of that pagan form of prelacy and erastianism, under the guidance of Victor, Tertullian and Constantine. Such is, in as clear and succinct a shape as we can give it, the great fact and philosophy of the first three centuries of our era, as laid down in the "Free Church of Ancient Christendom."

Now, apart from the general soundness of our author's principle, we think it was hardly fair to overlook the fact that there is in existence a third view of the matter, honestly held and sturdily maintained, by not a few wise and prudent ones; a view which differs equally from the erastian idea, and from the voluntary one. We use these technical names, though we should be glad to get rid of them, because they are the shortest way of expressing our meaning, and will be understood, at least by those who are likely to be interested in this work. There are people, we say then, who contend that erastianism, or state control in matters properly ecclesiastical, is not a necessary consequence of alliance with the civil powers; but is on the contrary excluded by the very idea that the church is not the servant but the ally of the state: more or less definitely, that was, in fact, the general opinion of the reformation churches everywhere, save in England; and considering the tone and temper of the present times, Mr. Cooper may be assured that his argument, however conclusive it may be, will not attract much observation in the higher walks of thought, so long as he overlooks what is now pretty generally felt to be the stronghold of our national establishments of religion. Nearly every scholar will admit that the argument against prelacy is now conclusively settled, except on the ground of a supposed expediency. Nearly every churchman will admit that the erastian theory is untenable and inconsistent with the divine idea of Christ's church. But when all that has been admitted, there will be found not a few ready to say that the Anti-state-church advocate has not proved his case. The Chevalier Bunsen will join heartily in his denunciation of Byzantinism; but there he will stop short, and begin to tell him of an ecclesiastical absorption of the nations into a grand Christian polity, where the church shall not be the tool but the mistress of the state. Perhaps our author's logic might be able to meet the case of the learned Prussian Ambassador; but how will he deal with the Free Kirk of Scotland, where every one of his positions will be sturdily maintained, except just the very one which his book was written to prove. Dr. Hook, too, and the convocationists, will hold themselves absolutely untouched by his argument,—and free to follow their own course. We do not mean to enter into the general question, a vexed and dreary one it is, ever ending in platitudes and noisy logomachies "most tolerable and not to be endured;" but we must say that however general the pernicious Byzantinism be in the practice of our times, the theory is in so little credit, that it is but fighting with shadows and beating the air, to contend against a principle which has scarcely any supporters. It may be true that the idea of the church as a union, cemented by purely religious sympathies, cannot justly be developed into an ecclesiastical institution, allied with the state, paid by the state, and yet free to maintain its proper spiritual independence. Of that we say nothing at present; except this, that it is the only feasible theory of church establishments, the only one which now holds its ground, and the only one which our author has not thought proper to mention. His book, however, is on the whole well written—will be useful; it is easily read, and not quite so ill to remember as works on church history usually are.

Old Lamps or New? A Plea for the original Editions of the Texts of Shakspere, &c. London: 90, Fleet-street. 1853.

Mr. Chas. Knight here examines, at some length, a few of the Emendations to the text of Shakspere, proposed by Mr. Collier, on the strength of his folio edition of 1632. It appears to us, that Mr. Knight takes sure ground in rejecting by far the greater number of them. The substitution of "boast" for "beast," murders the sense of the passage which it proposes to emend; and other instances quoted by Mr. Knight, are not much better. We have not seen Mr. Collier's volume, but of a pretty lengthy list of proposed emendations, which lies on our desk, we should be disposed to reject the great majority, on the principle, that to emend Shakspere, it is not absolutely necessary to knock out his brains.

History of the Anti-Corn Law League By ARCHIBALD PRENTICE, One of the Executive Council. Vol. I. London: W. and F. G. Cash, Bishopsgate-street. 1853.

ENGLISHMEN know the part which Mr. Prentice took in the formation and establishment of the League, and the good service he did as editor and manager of the Manchester Times, and as a clear-headed and fluent lecturer, in supporting and disseminating the principles of Free Trade. There is, perhaps, no man living better qualified to become the historian of the "Great Fact;" and those who are aware (as who is not?) of his constant and unflinching advocacy of the rights of the labourer—the right to purchase bread at its natural value, and of working for himself instead of the land-owner—rights secured to him and to all, through the successful agitation of the Anti-Corn Law League, will be glad to receive at his hands the report which he is so well fitted to render of its rise and progress—its difficulties and dangers—its dauntless courage and dogged determination—and its eventual triumphant and unparalleled success. It is curious in reading this interesting record of events, which are as yet but of yesterday, to note the marvellous ignorance of political leaders—noble lords and prime ministers—in reference to the simplest commercial propositions—and the singular effects which a little enlightenment administered in a practical way, produced upon some of them. It has often been remarked, "With how little wisdom has the world been governed!" but the exact amount of that infinitesimal quantity of common sense which was deemed necessary for a legislator, in the interest of monopoly, was never so clearly demonstrated to the public as by the straight-forward expositors of League principles. The spectacle of senatorial sagacity reduced to a nonplus by the plain logic of simple addition and subtraction, is one which ought to be preserved in memoriam, as a monument to posterity of the wisdom of their ancestors, and an encouragement to future reformers not to be dismayed or overwhelmed by the profundity of the advisers of the crown. This narrative commences, as it should do, ab ovo—with the first broad assertion of free-trade principles at the Manchester election of 1832; and the present volume recounts the operations of the League down to the close of the famine year of 1842. The details comprehend every fact of importance, and they are given in a fair and impartial spirit, and ought to offend no one. It is true that many persons, who are or were more or less celebrities in their day, figure in these chapters in a way not very much to their credit; and they may feel unwilling to appear once more upon the stage as the oracles of exploded stupidities, or the abettors of something worse: but the historian is bound to truth, and to that Mr. Prentice adheres simply—often without comment, and never with angry or recriminative expressions. We anticipate a wide circulation for these volumes, and trust that no long interval will be suffered to elapse between their several publication.

Speculation; or, the Glen Luna Family. By AMY LOTHROP.—The Wide Wide World. By ELIZABETH WETHERELL. London: Routledge and Co., Farringdon-street. 1853.

THESE are two American romances, the undoubted merits of which are already well and widely known. Their object is to delineate domestic and country life in the United States; and the various characters of either story, it is very evident, are drawn from the life, and many of them are types of a class with which American readers are familiar. From their literary excellence, these volumes have a claim to general favour: the present editions are published at a low price, and have the advantage of being clearly printed, in a small type, with what printer's call a large face, which renders them as readily readable as large-print copies.

The Scottish Review. A Quarterly Journal of Social Progress and General Literature. No. II. Glasgow: Scottish Temperance League.

THE contents of this second number of the Scottish Review are of a varied and interesting sort. The opening paper upon Chalmers, though all too brief, is an admirable biographical sketch, reproducing the man in his sturdy and native manliness as he lived and moved among us. The article on the Delirium of Intoxication is from an able pen, and will repay the trouble of a deliberate and thoughtful perusal. There is one subject, however, all-important to Scotland (and indeed to England too), which is here treated in a fearless and outspoken manner, and which is destined, we would fain hope, to do something towards the reformation of a social evil of unappreciable magnitude. We allude, of course, to the paper entitled "Better Houses for the Working Classes," in which the detestable abominations of the bothie system are brought to light. The Glasgow League labours hard and labours well in the cause of temperance; and we are glad to see that they have the wisdom to look beneath the surface of things, and strength to strike some good home blows at the root of the deadly upas that overshadows the land. Let us hope for a repetition of these home-thrusts at vice in its hot-beds. It is here, in these demoralizing dens, whether of farm bothy or city cellar, that vice and wickedness of the foulest die are generated, and until these be in some measure purged and purified, it is all but hopeless to look for right views on the subject of temperance from their miserable inmates. There are six other articles in the present number, which we commend to the acceptance of our readers.

Tamerton Church-Tower, and other Poems. By COVENTRY PATMORE. London: William Pickering. 1853.

THE poems in this unpretending volume are worthy of the name. They are simple in language and construction, almost as much so as the simplest of Wordsworth's, of whose rural lyrics some of them remind us; still they are not imitations of Wordsworth or of any other poet that we are aware of. The author has been to nature for his inspiration and his subjects, and whether he paints her inanimate forms or draws from the living model, the picture is invariably life-like and often striking. The versification, though designedly unpolished, is never defective or unmelodious, and has been well adapted, by the art which conceals art, to the various subjects. We have some recollection of having read "Tamerton Church-Tower" long ago, and we learn that it is here reprinted, with alterations, from a former edition. We are not sure, though it holds the first place in the volume, that it is the finest production; still it contains many charming passages and suggestive thoughts. Had we room we would quote "The River" entire, as a poem justifying the author's claim to favourable notice; as it is, we can but extract a few stanzas which may serve to show how forcibly the aspect of nature appeals to his imagination.

> The restless moon among the clouds
>   Is loitering slowly by;
> Now in a circle like the ring
>   About a weeping eye;
> Now left quite bare and bright, and now
>   A pallor in the sky.
> The lonely stars are here and there,
>   But weak and wasting all;
> The winds are dead, the cedars spread
>   Their branches like a pall;
> The guests, by laughing twos and threes,
>   Have left the bridal hall.
> The moon is looking through the mist,
>   Cold, lustreless, and wan;
> And wildly past her dreary form
>   The watery clouds rush on,
> A moment white beneath her light,
>   And then, like spirits, gone.
> Silent and fast they hurry past,
>   Their swiftness striketh dread,
> For earth is hushed, and no breath sweeps
>   The spider's rainy thread,
> And everything but those pale clouds
>   Is dark, and still, and dead.
> Beneath the mossy, ivy'd bridge,
>   The river slippeth past:
> The current deep is still as sleep,
>   And yet so very fast!
> There's something in its quietness
>   That makes the soul aghast.
> No wind is in the willow tree
>   That droops above the bank;
> The water passeth quietly
>   Beneath the sedges dank;
> Yet the willow trembles in the stream,
>   And the dry reeds talk and clank.

Where is the artist who could not paint from such a description? We must add another specimen.

> The summer's prime is come again;
>   The trees are out anew;
> The current keeps the mournful past
>   Deep in its bosom's blue,
> And babbles low through quiet fields,
>   Grey with the falling dew.
> The sheep-bell tolleth curfew time;
>   The gnats, a busy rout,
> Fleck the warm air; the distant owl
>   Shouteth a sleepy shout;
> The voiceless bat, more felt than seen,
>   Is flitting round about;
> The poplar's leaflet scarcely stirs;
>   The river seems to think;
> Athwart the dusk, the lily broad
>   Looks coolly from the brink;
> And knee-deep in the freshet's fall,
>   The meek-eyed cattle drink.
> The chafers boom; the white moths rise,
>   Like spirits from the ground;
> The grey-flies sing their weary tune,
>   A distant, dreamlike sound;
> And far, far off, in the slumberous eve,
>   Bayeth an old guard-hound.

"The Woodman's Daughter" is another charming but sorrowful ditty, full of truth and nature—an old-world story told in a new way, with a simple delicacy and feeling rarely equalled. There are a host of readers who will derive unalloyed pleasure from the perusal of Mr. Patmore's volume.

The Great Sin of Great Cities. London: Chapman and Hall, Strand. 1853.

THIS admirable essay is reprinted by request from the "Westminster and Foreign Quarterly Review," of July, 1850, in which it appeared as an article, entitled "Prostitution." It is a sad and sorrowful subject, which the writer has handled with all needful delicacy, and with much truthfulness and argumentative force. It is enough to give a man the heart-ache to read the wretched revelations it contains—and to make him blush for his species that such horrifying disclosures should be possible. Man, sated by possession, abandons the victim of his sensual passion—and proud, unfallen, untempted woman pushes her into the pit, from whence, after a few short years of disgrace and misery and pain, she is relieved by death. Such, in a few words, is the history of a vast proportion of English Magdalens. Others, if possible still more forlorn, are driven by starvation to prostitution and crime, from which once hopelessly engulphed, they never emerge. The remedies proposed by the writer include a moral reform which would operate to prevent desertion by the seducer, and do away with the unworthy contempt of the sex—and certain legislative measures on behalf of the unfortunates, securing to them the means and opportunities of returning to an honest course of life. Let all who would know the truth with regard to this subject procure this pamphlet, and ponder well its contents.

Odds and Ends. By A. E. MARSHALL. London: William Pickering. Chester: G. Prishard. 1853.

ODDS and ends are generally found in Betty's dresser-drawer in the kitchen, and it is odds but that will be the end of these. The cooking up of common-places into doggrel rhymes will never promote archæological research in the "background of British history," whatever Mr. Marshall may think of it. The peccadilloes of John Jones, the chimney-sweeper, who appears to be the Rob Roy of the Welsh Border, will not achieve an immortality either for himself or the bard who sings his exploits. "Odds and Ends" are destined to the usual fate of such ownerless fragments; and the sooner they are swept into the dust-bin, the better for the comfort of all parties.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES.

Scottish Provident Institution for Mutual Life Insurance.—The fifteenth annual general meeting of the contributors to this Society was held in the Waterloo Rooms, Edinburgh, on Wednesday, the 9th March. The following extracts are from the Report of the Directors:—In the past year, 662 new proposals were accepted, covering Assurances to the amount of £277,724 15s., and with yearly premiums to the extent of £7,802. A considerable additional amount of premiums has also been received by single payment. The total amount of premiums received in the year has been £72,132, of which about £58,524 was for annual premiums. The claims on account of emerged policies have been smaller than in the preceding year, by about £5,600, the amount having been only £17,788 4s. At 31st December, 1852, there had been issued in all 5,898 policies, assuring £2,571,428. The amount remaining assured was £2,071,125. The number of policies reported from year to year as opened, was 5,952, but of these 58 were not taken up by the parties by whom they were ordered, from inability to meet the premium, or other cause. The Accumulated Fund at the same date was £254,675 (being an increase of £46,500 within the year), or, including interest to the end of the year, £255,665. And the whole funds are invested on undoubted securities, the average rate of interest being between 4¼ and 4½ per cent. The total amount of the claims which have emerged since the commencement of the institution is £138,688. The experience in this respect has been most favourable, the number of deaths being very greatly under the expectation according to the mortality table of the office. The state of affairs of the Corporation shows a surplus of £26,159 10s. 9d. Two-thirds of this surplus are to be allocated to those members who shall have paid in premiums, with interest accumulated at 4 per cent., a sum equal to the amount of their assurances, as well as contingently to those who shall have so completed their accumulation within the next septennial period. As the surplus is divisible, not by the usual system of an equal per-centage addition to each £100 assured, without reference to the age of the members or the duration of their policies, but, in proportion to the values of their policies respectively, the rate of addition varies in each case, and it can therefore only be stated, generally, that the additions will range from 20 to 54 per cent. on the amount of the assurance. The Report was unanimously agreed to.

Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society.—At the annual general meeting of this Society, the Manager read a Report, from which we select the following particulars:—"The annual statement of the business for the year 1852, which the Directors have the satisfaction of placing before the members, again presents evidence of a remarkable and extensive diffusion of the advantages of the Association. The number of new policies passed during the year is 1,146, representing a capital sum of £380,567 5s., and the corresponding amount of annual premiums is £13,579 14s. 2d.; while, for the same period, the nett addition to the total sums assured since the commencement of the Society, deducting all policies emerged, forfeited, surrendered, and not taken up, is £273,497 12s. 9d., and the nett increase of premiums £9,488 19s. 9d. The claims of policies emerged during the year have been at the rate of about 1·1 per cent., or £14 out of £90. This, more especially looking to the age of the Society, is a small per-centage; and it may be also noticed, that the principal portion of the claims has fallen upon policies of long standing. It is almost unnecessary for the Directors again to repeat their gratification with the whole business of the London establishment, and the signal success which has continued to attend its progress." The Directors, in accordance with the wishes of the Society, have revised the conditions involving the forfeiture of policies, and embodied the alterations in a series of resolutions, calculated in a liberal spirit, to meet the views of their numerous members. For these resolutions, we must refer the reader to the Directors' report.

Star Life Assurance Society.—The following is an epitome of the report of the above Society presented to the ninth annual meeting of the proprietors and privileged policy-holders. "In presenting to the share-holders and policy-holders of the Star Life Assurance Society the ninth annual report, the Directors have a pleasing duty to perform, in stating, that the business done during the past year has been of an extensive and gratifying character: the transactions submitted to the Directors from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, 1852, exceeding in number and amount those laid before them in any previous year:

	No.	Amount.	Premiums.
Polices issued	609	£186,225	£5,986 7 7
Proposals declined or not completed by the proposers	122	39,015
Proposals passed the Board on Dec. 31st, 1852, but not completed	48	28,620
Proposals in house, Dec. 31st, 1852, not submitted to the Directors	31	10,100
	810	£263,960	£5,986 7 7

The deaths during that period under review have been about 20 per cent. less than the year preceding; claims having been discharged on 23 lives only, whilst the mortality, as indicated by the combined experience of Life Offices, shows the probability of 40 claims in the twelve months. The sum paid for claims on policies amounted to £5,253 10*s*. 8*d*., which included £103 12*s*. 2*d*. additions made to the sums insured, at the division of the bonus in the year 1849, and conseqently paid to the representatives of those who had insured. The number of proposals received to the present date (or rather for two months past), is 237 for the sum of £84,625. Of the 609 policies granted by the Directors in the year 1852, a majority (in point of numbers) has been upon the lives of members of the Wesleyan Methodist Society, for whose more immediate benefit, it must be remembered, this Institution was established. It is therefore upon the increased and increasing confidence of the Wesleyan Society, as well as upon the character of the lives selected, that the Directors rely for the ultimate prosperity of the Society; believing that the lives of the religious and moral class of insurers obtained, are, as a class for such insurance, far superior in value to the mass of the general population; and this fact is well evidenced by the history of this Institution. It is a duty of this meeting to declare what sum shall be allowed to the Chairman and Board of Directors as remuneration for their services during this year, which the Directors recommend shall not exceed the amount allowed by the deed."

Deposit and General Life Assurance Company.—The first annual Report of this Company exhibits a comparison of the amount of business they have done during the first six-and-a-half months of their existence with that done by other Companies in corresponding and longer periods. From the table of comparisons it appears that in a period of six months and a half, from September 20, 1852, to March 31, 1853, this Company has received for premiums £2,514 7s. 8d., an amount of business not exceeded by a single one of the twenty-eight Companies with which it is compared. The Directors feel, therefore, that they are fully justified in anticipating from their present large amount of business a proportionately greater amount of success than has hitherto attended similar Institutions. They are, further, proud of the confidence placed in the Company by the public, not only on account of the large amount of assurance business transacted, but also that every share in the Company (20,000 in number) has been subscribed for, with the exception of 1,400. They have succeeded in appointing, and are continuing to appoint, a large number of influential agents throughout the country. In Leeds, Birmingham, Cornwall, and the West of England, the principles of the Company have met with marked approbation, and have led to valuable results—and in India the Deposit feature of the Company has been looked upon as particularly applicable to that country, the Directors having received the highest testimony to that effect from persons of the first standing and known judgment there. The Balance-sheet appended to the Report, shows that the accounts are in a highly satisfactory state, and speaks well for the present position and future prospects of the Company.

United Guarantee and Life Assurance Company.—The annual meeting of this Company was held at the offices, in the Old Jewry, on Tuesday, the 5th inst. The Right Hon. Lord Erskine in the chair. The advertisement convening the meeting having been read, Mr. Knight, the Secretary, read the following Report:—"The Directors have much pleasure in meeting the proprietors on this the 'fourth annual general meeting,' and in announcing that the business of the Company has been uniformly progressive. It will, no doubt, be satisfactory to the proprietors to observe that the new business transacted during the past year has increased from £3,479 0s. 8d., (which was the amount of new premiums for 1851,) to £4,242 8s. 6d. received on the same account during last year; whilst the renewal premiums have increased from £1,608 10s. 8d. to £3,835 15s. 7d. The total income from premiums has thus increased during the past year from £5,087 11s. 4d. to £8,078 4s. 1d. The Directors think it right again to call the attention of the proprietors to the extra expenditure which has been entailed on the Company by the appointment of agents, an item of expenditure which largely swells the annual charges of management, and which they hope shortly to be able greatly to reduce. During the past year, the Directors have availed themselves of the powers conferred on them by the extraordinary general meeting, held in November last, to apply for an Act of Parliament to enable the Company to guarantee the integrity of officers engaged in the public departments under the Crown. The result of an investigation into the various classes of guarantee risks undertaken by the Company has shown that there has been a profit upon each, independently of the expenditure, which always forms a heavy item in the accounts of the first few years of such an institution. This investigation has, however, enabled the Directors to modify the premiums upon certain risks, and to decline others: and they have no doubt but that the Company will, from year to year, feel the benefit of the increasing knowledge and experience derived from a careful examination of past and existing risks." Mr. Knight then read the statement of receipts and expenditure for the year ending 31st December, 1852, from which it appeared that, after deducting every claim against the Company, there remained a balance to its credit of £8,141. The Report, being moved and seconded, was, after the usual vote of thanks to the Directors, Secretary and other officers of the Company, carried unanimously.

A VOTE FOR SWILBURY.

SWILBURY is a neat and thriving borough, whose population are mostly of the middle and lower classes, among whom, not a few professional men, principally legal and medical, find tolerable scope for their exertions. It does not concern the reader to know the exact situation of Swilbury upon the map of England, or what branch of manufactures provides occupation and subsistence for its inhabitants. Enough that it is in some sort a manufacturing town, busy and prosperous when trade is brisk; and dull, miserable, and dead as ditch-water when trade is flat, and exports are few. From time out of mind the old town has returned one member to Parliament; and from time out of mind, too, the free and independent electors of Swilbury have been, through all their generations, to use their favourite expression, "true-blue," deep as indigo. Church and King was their watchword through the reigns of all the Georges; and in every Parliament during the last hundred years, at least, the Honourable Bulworthy Brag, Baronet, has been their worthy, consistent, and dumb representative in the people's House of Commons; for though the Brags are individually mortal, like their neighbours, and drop into the family-vault when their time comes, the race is a productive one; and Brag Hall has not wanted a Brag since the days of the Restoration, or Swilbury a candidate, since the first Bulworthy condescended to solicit the sweet voices of the electors.

But it is now some years since an ominous change began to steal over the political aspect of the town. Even before the advent of Free-trade, which, as the landlord of the Pipe and Pillars is fond of declaring, did a good deal for Swilbury, democracy had crept into the borough, and the Yellow element began to be discernible in the vacillating opinions of some of the most respectable potwallopers who boasted a voice in the representation. But with Free-trade came a gradual but continuous increase of population, principally made up of the new party. The borough was split up into two factions; and though the Blues, from their numbers and influence, had the upper hand, the Yellows were none the less noisy and uproarious. At the election of 1847, the worthy proprietor of Bulworthy Hall received a terrible shock to his nervous system, which well-nigh disgusted him with mankind in general, and with Swilbury-kind in particular. This was owing to the favour which his own born constituents testified towards the pretensions of an impudent fellow of an ironmaster, who dared to consent to have himself put in nomination against a Brag, of Brag Hall. Of course, the rascal reaped nothing but defeat from the motion; the majority of the voters retained their loyalty and adhered to the old colour, and the baronet, of course, was returned as usual, but a little flustered with the barefaced impudence of the opposition, and most disagreeably excited with the tumult and uproar of the pretended contest. It was thought by some that grief for the degeneracy of Swilbury shortened his days; others said it was gout that brought him to his end; but whatever the cause, within a twelvemonth of his return, he had joined his ancestors beneath the big monument in Swilbury church-yard, and another Bulworthy (he was the seventh) reigned in his stead. There was no opposition to Septimus. When the old Bulworthy died, a corrupt administration was also in its last agonies; and the ironmaster stood aloof, not choosing to be at the trouble of a canvas, which, even if successful, would have to be repeated in a few months at farthest. The new baronet took his seat, and hugged himself in fancied security, imagining that the late defeat of the Yellows had taught them a lesson of prudence, which would suffice them for one generation at least. But soon after came the bungling budget which blew up the Protectionist Ministry. Parliament was dissolved, new writs were issued, all Swilbury went mad for the ironmaster, and Septimus saw with apprehension and horror the whole town and neighbourhood swallowed up in the vortex of a contested election.

Swilbury has awoke up at last from its long sleep. The Pipe and Pillars, veiled in a profusion of yellow flags, is hardly visible to the eyes of the public. "Cogswell for Swilbury!" "Cogswell for ever!" "None but Cogswell!"—these are the significant words borne on banners in the air, fluttering from the windows of the Committee-room, and waving majestically over the roof. Brass-bands, big drums and beer have banished business from the town. Everybody is idle because everybody is so busy. Cogswell has been put in nomination; the Mayor has declared the show of hands in his favour; he has made the right sort of speech at the hustings, parried a dead cat intended to floor him, diverting it point-blank to the head of the bewildered Bulworthy; and gained the goodwill of the potwallopers, more especially of those who have no votes to give, by a few timely jokes. Polling-day is drawing nigh. Agents are at work canvassing from house to house. The town is full of new faces flitting hither and thither, and more are arriving by every train. The inns are all occupied, and prodigiously noisy and wakeful till long past midnight. Bulworthy, aroused to the necessity of exertion, has compromised with his dignity, and allowed his supporters to convert the Green Dragon into the citadel of the Blues. "Brag and the Constitution!" floats in gold letters on a violet ground, upon a broad banner projecting from the balcony, in which a dozen brazen-throated trumpets appeal to the hearts of the electors at regular intervals. The band of the Yellows perambulates the town in a monster van, followed by a rabble of boys, all day, and squats at night over against the Committee-room at the Pipe and Pillars, which is crammed within by flagmen, clerks, tellers, canvassers, whippers-in, &c. &c. Never was Swilbury in such a state of excitement before, or the glorious constitution at such a glorious premium.

Samuel Suddles is a small man, in a small way of business, in a small street. Born and bred a barber, he had been endowed by nature with two qualities which he possessed in the greatest perfection—one was an extraordinary talent for the perception of a grievance, and the other a power of loquacity which Xantippe might have envied. Both were of use to him in his profession, as they enabled him to command the attention of his "subjects" without making them laugh, an impropriety of which no shavee was ever known to be guilty while under his hand. Suddles was a a family man, and full of family woes, and these he knew, no man better, all originated in the corruption of the governing powers. He had a vote, but was far from knowing the value it might prove to him, from want of experience. Hitherto he had voted, like his father before him, for the old member—and seeing that he daily shaved the baronet's butler, he would until lately have thought it rank ingratitude to have done otherwise. But a barber's shop is in some sort a school of philosophy—it is a centre of general resort and general discussion, and new ideas on any subject are sure to be examined and sifted wherever beards are mown. Suddles, under the influence of the liberal principles which were developed in his hearing, began to think of revising his political opinions. The first fact which he gathered from the examination upon which he entered, was that he hadn't any political opinions to revise; it is true he groaned under a general sense of oppression, but was not exactly clear from what quarter it came. The address of the new member to the independent electors of Swilbury, which he had stuck up in his back room, helped him to something like a conclusion on this subject, and he felt very strongly inclined to cut the baronet in spite of the butler's daily chin, which, of course, he would lose if he did, and vote for Cogswell. He was cogitating upon this step one morning, having just spelled over the address for the twentieth time, when a messenger from the Pipe and Pillars burst suddenly into his shop with a command for his services immediately on behalf of Mr. Snardle, Crawford Cogswell, Esq.'s London agent, who had just arrived. Suddles donned a clean apron, and seizing his curling irons, entered the Pipe and Pillars at the heels of the waiter.

The London agent was a tall, thin and livid-faced gentleman in solemn black, who ought to have been taciturn and reserved. He was, on the contrary, talkative, gracious, and familiar, and while submitting his head to the manipulations of the barber, carried on a conversation in a most lively and agreeable style. Putting various questions, which Suddles answered with astonishing readiness and volubility—he ended by proposing that the barber should accept service ostensibly as a flagman, though he would not be called upon to bear the banner, but merely to use his industry and influence in prosecuting the canvass on behalf of the liberal candidate. Suddles, who had never had the honour of such a conference before, at once accepted the proposal, and promised everything. What further arguments the agent used to spur the barber to immediate diligence, or of what complexion they were, we need not stay to consider—their effect was that Suddles, merely pitching his apron, razors, combs, brushes, and curling-irons into his shop, and calling upon his wife to attend to customers, should any come, started off at once to try the effect of his rhetoric upon his friends and neighbours. He had not been gone ten minutes when Lawyer Chivers, the baronet's man of business, and his principal electioneering manager, dashed into the shop in search of him. Mrs. Suddles did not know when he would be at home—he had left no message; he might return directly—he might not return till night—could she do anything? Time was precious: the lawyer waited a few moments impatiently, and then put the question abruptly—Was Suddles going to vote for the baronet?

"Good gracious! Muster Chivers, sir, to be sure he is. Who else should he vote for?"

"You are sure of that?"

"Quite sure, sir. Why he and his father before him always voted for the Brags—and ain't the butler at the Hall his best customer?"

"When did he go last to the Hall?"

"This blessed morning, to be sure, afore breakfast."

"Ah, very good, then I may rely upon him; good morning"—and the lawyer was departing, but a second thought brought him to a stand. "Stop, Mrs. Suddles," he said, and he drew out his purse—"I am in your husband's debt, tell him to place this to my account—good morning"—and he left the shop.

Mrs. Suddles, with five golden pieces in her open palm, stood for several minutes the picture of astonishment. Suddles had certainly set a a couple of razors for Mr. Chivers—two months ago—that she knew, because the lawyer had sent them back again, with the information that they were considerably worse for the operation. What he could mean by debt, and giving her five sovereigns, and making off, without explanation, she couldn't imagine. However, as the good woman observed to herself, "five pounds is no affront to nobody," and she resolved to make the best of it for the use of the household. So she put it in her pocket, thinking it might, perhaps, be as well to say nothing about it to Suddles, at least for the present. Perhaps the lawyer had made a mistake in his hurry to be gone—she should know more about it by and bye. The barber's wife was too busy to pursue these reflections further. Gentlemen, in leathern aprons, came in to be shaved, and a whole school of boys to be cropped, previous to being paraded before the new candidate, who had shown extraordinary interest in the state of education in Swilbury. Then there were the four little Suddles to attend to, the eldest of whom was fortunately big enough to do the lathering, and look after the rest upon an emergency.

Suddles did not come home till after midnight, and then he was far gone in a state of beer, a thing, to do him justice, not usual with him, except on holiday occasions. When his sleepy spouse let him in, she mentioned that lawyer Chivers had called in the morning. Suddles hiccupped a threat to smash him into shivers as an "unconstitooshional humbug," and after repeating his threat a dozen times, consented to go to bed. The next day was Saturday. Suddles dispatched his wife in the morning to the Hall to operate upon the butler, and to apologize for him on the ground of "a little shakiness." The butler, of course, attributed this to drinking overnight to the success of the Blues—and there was no suspicion at the Hall of the defection of the barber. When his helpmate returned home she found her husband again absent, where, or on what business, she had no idea. He made his appearance in the afternoon in time to reap the customary Saturday night's crop, which on this occasion happened to be large beyond all precedent in his experience. He had never seen such a number of strange faces, nor, he thought to himself, such ungentlemanly ones, in the town before. His hand was weary with wielding the razor, and it was past midnight ere the tide of bristly beards ceased to flow in. Sunday morning it was the same, and until noon had struck he found his hands full of business. The barber went to bed after dinner, to make up the arrears of sleep, and recruit strength for certain labours which he foresaw on the morrow, and the morrow's morrow, which would be the day of the poll.

On Monday the Swilbury shaver was to be seen everywhere but at his shop. He had reported progress daily to Snardle at his professional calls, and had pledged himself for a goodly number of the ten-pounders, whom he had gained over by unanswerable arguments to the Yellow interest. Among these, however, were two or three who took a great deal of looking-after. The town cobbler, Larrup, especially, who was the fatherly founder of the Crispin Codger's Club, and whose example, it was supposed, might go a great way, was intoxicated from morning to night. That would not have signified much had the man got drunk upon principle, but the ignorant blockhead used no discrimination—tippling promiscuously in any tavern that happened to be open and nearest at hand, whatever its presiding colour might be. Then there was Wriggle, the plumber, who couldn't make up his mind, and wanted more enlightenment previous to a final decision. Further, there was cause for uneasiness in the fact, which there was no concealing from Swilbury throats, that the Green Dragon brewed the best beer; and it was thought, too, by some, that the old Conservative party had very powerful reasons on their side. It was plain that the battle would be a very hard-fought one—the best proof of which was that the bets ran pretty even on the subject, and no one talked of the long odds save those who had not any money to stake. At night the barber's shop and back room were the rendezvous of his peculiar coterie of converts. Larrup had been caught and conveyed thither, nothing loth—and Wriggle too, though he had not yet pronounced, honoured the company with his presence. Suddles was in quite a glorified state as he marshalled his precious lambs, and administered brandy in thimble-fulls, by way of a whet, and congratulations without number, ere they adjourned to the Pipe and Pillars for a supper and jollification.

The supper was pronounced "the thing,"—it was supposed to be the barber's treat—and the jollification that ensued lacked nothing that money and lungs could supply to render it equally acceptable. Larrup was soon merging towards a condition that would have entitled him to take up a position under the table. This was a climax towards which Suddles looked with satisfaction, designing to transfer him to his house, and, locking him up for the night, thus make sure of his vote and influence. Wriggle did not advance so satisfactorily, but drank with caution. Of the rest the barber felt he could make pretty sure; and he industriously plied the plumber with the best, in the hopes of bringing him round to a manageable state. The fun and frolic grew fast and furious; but in the midst of it there came a tap at the door; a boy had brought a note from Mr. Snardle demanding the attendance of the barber for a few moments at his lodgings. Suddles, apologizing to the company, and promising a speedy return, made off to the house of his patron. When he got there, he found that no one had been sent for him. The note was a hoax, evidently a contrivance to draw him away from his post. He hurried back with all possible haste, and resumed his place at the head of the table; but on looking round, Larrup and Wriggle were not to be seen. Trap, the tinker, informed him that the old cobbler was gone out for a breath of air, in charge of Wriggle who had volunteered to take care of him, and that both would return presently—"trust 'em." They did not return at all. Suddles grew alarmed, and vacating his chair in favour of the "Vice," set off in pursuit. By this time it was past twelve o'clock, and the town was comparatively quiet. The barber ran hurriedly through the whole town—popped in at every open door, and made all the inquiries it was possible to make, to no purpose. Worn out at length with the chase, and despairing of coming up with the fugitives that night, he turned his face homewards and got to bed.

He could not sleep, and lay revolving the circumstances in his mind. Could it be that the plumber was a spy in the pay of the enemy? The suspicion, once awakened, was soon confirmed by a hundred corroborative facts which now recurred to his recollection. Slow as he was, the barber could not avoid coming to that conclusion before drowsiness stole over him. Awake at cock-crow, he rose with the dawn, and resumed the search, if not with success, at least with one good result—the certainty, to wit, that neither the missing cobbler nor the delinquent plumber were in the town, unless, which was not likely, they were lying concealed in some private dwelling. As early as possible, after a hasty breakfast, the barber beat up his recruits, and confiding them to a trusty agent, saw them marched off to the polling-booth, by twos and threes, and thus contrived to get them off his mind before the morning waned. He acquainted Snardle with the state of affairs, and that worthy, testifying the most virtuous indignation at the trick that had been played them, urged him to leave no means untried to discover the cobbler. Suddles now recollected that Wriggle had a little place at Tottleton, two miles off, which he let in summer-time to visitors. He felt sure that the cobbler had been carried thither, and at once set off, as fast as he could walk, to reconnoitre. He was upon the right track, but ignorant of the perils that awaited him.

When he drew near the house, which was a small four-roomed cottage standing a little back from the main road, he was made aware by sounds of laughter and certain odours which assailed his experienced olfactories, that a jovial band within were doing their best to make themselves comfortable. Never doubting that Larrup was one of their number, and thinking to surprise and carry him off—he dashed into the passage, ran upstairs, and found himself in the presence of a party of the Blues, with Wriggle at their head. They received him with shout and jeers, and clapping to the door and locking it, swore he was their prisoner, and that he should not go forth until he had taken his Bible oath that he would vote for the baronet. The barber commenced an harangue upon the liberty of the subject and the freedom of election; but they knocked his hat over his eyes, and tripped up his heels—then picking him up and seating him on the table, clamoured again for the oath. Suddles refused to swear, and threatened the vengeance of the law; and when they proffered him wine, refused to drink, being at this time in a towering passion, and beside himself with excitement. They threw the wine in his face, and knocked him from his perch, and might have half killed him, but just then a couple of carriages drove up to the garden-gate to carry the enlightened Blues to the poll. Seizing the poor barber, who was now well-nigh stunned by blows and ill-usage, by the neck, they dragged him out to the landing, and opening a trap-door which led to a dark loft between the ceiling and the roof, hoisted him in head-foremost. Having thus boxed up the barber, they drove off, exulting in the deed, to the poll.

When Suddles recovered his senses, he commenced feeling about his dark prison, and soon ascertained that he was not alone. His hand fell upon a leathern apron heaving with the heavy breathing of a sleeper; he felt for the nose of the recumbent figure, and gave it a hearty tweak. "Cogswell for ever"! saluted his ears, in the well-known voice of old Larrup. "Here's a pretty kettle of fish!" said the barber, "I've found my man and lost myself. What's to be done?" He groped for the trap-door—it was fast bolted on the other side, and refused to yield to any pressure he could bring to bear upon it. He heard the village clock strike two: the poll would close by four; and here were he and his friend the chief of the Codgers in durance vile two miles from the scene of action. He lay on his back, and gave a desperate kick at the tiles above him—happy thought!—a batch of them fell off and went rattling down into the garden. The barber leaped up and pushed out his head just in time to see lawyer Chivers rolling by in his gig. The lawyer pulled up in amazement at the spectacle of one whom he imagined to be a warm adherent of his own party stuck fast by the neck in a pillory of pantiles. He sent his servant to the rescue, who getting in at the window, undid the trap-door and relieved the barber, who for the present made no mention of the cobbler, having been able to discern upon the admission of the light that he was steeped in drunkenness, and utterly incapable of voting.

With a brief expression of thanks and a polite bow to the lawyer, who was on his way to fetch to the poll an invalid voter in the baronet's interest, Suddles set off for Swilbury as fast as he could run. Snardle was no sooner in possession of the facts of the case, than he packed a couple of chaises with Yellows of the combative sort, and despatched them to the rescue of the cobbler. Larrup was drawn forth—whether dead or alive, it appeared impossible to say. Suddles, having recorded his vote for Cogswell, met the cortége bearing the insensible cobbler on its return. They drew up at the doctor's and carried in their speechless patient. Dr. Forceps pronounced at once, the moment he had felt his pulse, that the cobbler had been "bottled," and hoped the business might not have been overdone, of which he appeared to seem dubious. The stomach-pump was applied, at least so say the newspapers—and then the voice of old Larrup was heard once more ejaculating "Cogswell for ever!—Brag be——" They were his last words. The man was dead. The free and independent elector had been drugged to death by his free brother elector, and his voice was dumb for evermore.

It is not true that dead men tell no tales. The murderer's creed is a lying one. The dead cobbler did more harm to the Blue faction than a score of living Yellows could have done. Rumour has many tongues, and they are never so busy as at election time. In ten minutes the news was known to every man in Swilbury—and Cogswell who had lagged in the poll since the morning, till he was above a hundred in the rear, pulled up rapidly as the hour for closing drew nigh. Many who had resolved not to vote at all, came forward at the instigation of the cobbler's death, to be revenged on the party who had occasioned it; and others who had reserved their votes for the baronet, in case they should be wanted, gave them to his opponent, to show their abhorrence of the deed. When the hour struck for closing the poll, the numbers were thought to be even; but the final totting-up showed a majority for Cogswell, of eleven votes—and, to the unspeakable surprise and mortification of Bulworthy Brag, Baronet, of Brag Hall, the high bailiff declared the ironmaster duly elected to represent the borough of Swilbury in Parliament. The triumph of liberal principles had not been achieved without a severe struggle; a dense crop of broken heads and battered visages had sprung up spontaneously round the hustings towards the termination of the contest, and when the result was proclaimed, and exhibited in figures a foot long from the platform, the rage of the Blues knew no bounds. Balked of a victory in one way, they determined to have it in another. By dint of bludgeon and fist and iron-shod toes, they gained the mastery in the streets—drove the Yellows to a shameful retreat—and, headed by Wriggle, and a band of his glaziers, commenced a combined assault on their windows. The Pipe and Pillars went to smash in a few minutes; and then they visited consecutively with a storm of pebble-stones the abodes of all whom they imagined had any claim to their gratitude. Dire was the din—and cruel was the wrath of the defeated faction, which struck terror to the heart of Swilbury on the evening of that eventful day. The opportune arrival of a detachment of military towards night-fall restored something like peace, and gave the successful party the opportunity of creeping forth from their hiding-places and celebrating their conquest.

An interval of a few days cooled down the excitement of the election, and then, when party feeling had somewhat subsided, the independent electors began to recognise their own true character and position. The Blues looked upon themselves as martyrs to principle and the good old cause—while the Yellows professed to be pioneers of progress and the champions of popular privilege. Suddles had grown into great importance, and was the talkative oracle of a pretty extensive circle. True, he had lost the patronage of the baronet's butler; but he had gained renown as a clever fellow who had outwitted lawyer Chivers and the Blues—and a bold one, to boot, who had not scrupled to throw them overboard. His history of the election, of which he could enumerate every particular, became a standing entertainment for a large and bristly audience, and he was in the habit of dwelling at considerable length on his own share, which according to him was by no means a small one, in securing the recent triumph.

Suddenly, however, after about a fortnight's very prodigal self-ovation, the barber was noticed to become exceedingly taciturn, and, on the subject of the election, utterly oblivious of every single event—he who had been regarded as the first authority on disputed points of fact—a sort of talking cyclopædia of general details. Whether this change in his habits had any connection with the sudden rumours of a Petition, which began to circulate pretty freely among the Blues—or whether it was due to a conversation with Snardle, who just at this time again appeared in Swilbury, when he was shaved and curled by Suddles at the Pipe and Pillars, we must leave the reader to judge. Perhaps each of these events may have contributed to obfuscate the memory of the barber—who now, strange to say, could not speak with positive certainty in regard to any single circumstance connected with the late election.

We must now shift the scene. Swilbury disappears in the far distance, and the unfinished towers and turrets of the New Palace at Westminster rise into view. Here we are at Westminster Hall, passing through which we ascend the broad steps which lead into the penetralia of the Commons House. On, over the tesselated pavements, through St. Stephen's Hall, where the statue of Falkland waits for that of Cromwell—through the Central Hall, with its muddy-looking frescoes, and blank spaces for more—and on again into the long corridor into which open the Committee Rooms of the House. Here, to-day, we are stopped by a crowd composed of such anomalous constituents as give the lie to the time-honoured distich which says that birds of a feather flock together. Here are fellows with short-tailed coats and top-boots, "fancy"-looking men with spotted Belchers round their necks and "bully" legibly written in their faces: here are seedy vagabonds in shreds of shirts and ill-patched garments smelling of stale-beer, whose only wealth is a promising crop of "grog-blossoms" at the end of the nose: here are sturdy yeomen from their farms, and dapper waiters from the tavern, and women, one or two, of the worn and hard-working-class—and all wear an indefinable expression in their features, half apprehension, half indignation, with a substratum of satisfaction, which is to be seen in no other atmosphere, though something resembling it may be discerned in the Old Bailey when the criminal trials are on. These are the witnesses brought from various parts of the country to bear testimony upon oath to their own and other people's doings at the late elections, the returns of which have been petitioned against. Among them are jolly clerks, who, in contrast with the witnesses, look particularly free and easy, and gentlemen of the law, or of the law's dirty, draggle-tailed skirts, and election agents and moral dare-devils, who care no more for an oath than they do for a cigar—and not half as much—and a considerable sprinkling besides of that peculiar section of society, known among discriminating people under the denomination of "raff." Pushing, as well as we may, our way through this heterogeneous assemblage, we pass on until we are stopped by the sight of the words, "Swilbury Election Committee" placarded on the side-post of one of the Committee-room doors. The porter civilly makes way as we intimate a wish to enter, and in another moment the door has closed behind us. We are in a spacious and lofty room, the windows of which look pleasantly out upon the river Thames; it is divided across the centre by a stout oaken barrier, on one side of which are seated the Parliamentary Committee, eight or ten in number, presided over by a noble lord of rather youthful appearance,—a company of lawyers in black gowns and frightful horse-hair wigs, who watch the case, and take part in the examination in the interest of the several candidates,—the reporters who perpetuate every word that falls from every lip—and the witness undergoing the experimentum crucis of examination. On the other side of the barrier, wedged thick and close together as sticks in a faggot, are the public, among whom, it may be, are not a few personally interested in the matter in hand.

We happen to have come just in time to witness the debût of Mr. Samuel Suddles, whose affectionate wife has rigged him out in his best—a blue coat not more than two sizes too large for him, a tawny waistcoat, a tremendous triangular collar, reaching almost up to his eyes, and a white "choker," liberally spotted with iron-moulds. He enters rather unwillingly, and glances timorously round in search of a friendly face. He catches the eye of Snardle, who is standing, with folded arms, next the barrier; but that, instead of re-assuring him, only embarrasses him the more. He is motioned to a chair, in which, after fidgetting with his hat, and depositing it on the ground, he at last takes his seat. He scarcely ventures to look round, and he catches the eye of Snardle whenever he looks up. At his right are the members of the Committee, with the noble chairman; at his left the big-wigs in their long robes, and right in front are the short-hand writers at the table, ready to seize the slightest word that falls from his lip. He starts at the first summons like a guilty thing. He is sworn; and then comes the voice of the noble lord, commencing with—

"Your name is Suddles, I believe?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Samuel Suddles?"

"Yes, Sir."

"You reside in Swilbury?"

"Yes, Sir."

"How long have you been resident in Swilbury?"

"All the days of my life."

"And, if you have no objection, how long is that?"

"Thirty-nine years next Michaelmas."

Suddles begins to think there is nothing in being examined after all, and plucks up courage. But he feels the eye of Snardle upon him, and holds his breath while the next question is pronounced. The repetition of a few more common-place enquiries contributes to set him at his ease; and as he gathers confidence he settles himself comfortably on his seat, looks round, and confronts the impassive face of Snardle without quailing. When, however, the questions begin to bear upon the late election, the barber's tremour returns, and his memory fails him terribly. It takes five horse-hair wigs and three Members of Parliament to get an answer to the simplest question. He cannot recollect the names of his oldest acquaintances; and though living in Swilbury all his life, cannot specify a single person who took part in the election, or who did not. Is not certain that he had borne any office himself—might have been supposed to be a flagman, but never touched a flag. Had given his friends a supper at the eve of the poll—was not in the habit of giving suppers—couldn't tell why he did it then. Had never paid any voters himself, would take his oath. Had been paid for his services—couldn't recollect how much, nor who had paid him—Was a Yellow from principle "because the Blues never done him no good"—voted for Cogswell—never promised to vote for Brag—never took a bribe from the Blues. Mr. Chivers owed him fourpence, and left five pounds with Mrs. Suddles to set off against the debt. Didn't know that before yesterday, when he got the summons to come to London—had never seen the mony—his wife, he supposes, had it—couldn't really say who had paid him, or what he was paid—it might have been a note—it might have been gold, or silver. Thought he was paid at the Pipe and Pillars, like the rest. Didn't know who the "rest" were, or why he said "like the rest." Knew Wriggle very well: he had promised to vote for the Yellows, and was a Blue all the while. Wriggle had used him badly. Knew Larrup very well. Larrup was "bottled"—didn't know who did it. Had known Larrup all his life, since he could recollect anything—saw him every day for a week before the the poll. Larrup was rather fond of drink when he could get it for nothing—saw him drinking at the Pipe and Pillars, and at the Chequers, and at the Green Dragon, and at the Codgers, and at the Marquis of Granby, and plenty of other places—didn't see him pay for drink—didn't pay himself—wasn't asked for payment. Had been in Cogswell's committee-room—couldn't say who he saw there at any particular time—might have seen Mr. Jolly there—didn't know when. Knew John Jinks very well—never asked him if he thought two-ten all fair. Didn't know how much he could earn a day by shaving—never had a whole day's shaving in his life. Didn't recollect telling Wriggle he was to have two guineas a day for services—don't recollect what he was paid—didn't count the money. Knew Dangle. Dangle was a flagman—didn't recollect showing him the way to Mr. Jolly's room—Mr. Jolly's room was a small room over the committtee-room—might have been there himself—couldn't say—did see voters going up and coming down—don't recollect who they were—might have gone there himself on polling-day, couldn't say—couldn't recollect who he saw there besides Mr. Jolly—Yes, if he saw Mr. Jolly there, must have been there himself—recollects now, was there for a few minutes—What took him there? can't say—will try and recollect (dumb and dripping with perspiration for several minutes.)

Suddles, now in a purgatory of apprehension, presents a piteous spectacle. The Committee pause for a moment in their interrogatories, and the gentlemen of the long robe take him up. They refer him rather sternly to certain admissions he has made which are altogether inconsistent with his assertions of forgetfulness—remind him solemnly of his oath, and demand an answer to the last question. The distracted barber glances at Snardle, who is biting his lip, and remains dumb, until at length a hint from the Chairman, of committal for contempt of court, loosens his tongue. We need not particularize what follows. By degrees the fountains of memory are unlocked. Amidst symptoms of indescribable agony, testified by big drops of sweat falling from his quivering features at intervals upon the floor, the unwilling truth is slowly tortured forth. The unhappy barber is finally squeezed dry, in more senses than one. Not only does he disclose all the under-hand doings at Swilbury, but the second conspiracy to gull the Committee, to which he had been a party since his arrival in London, with all its details and accompaniments, down to the very last glass of wine which Mr. Jolly administered to him, to keep up his spirits, in the refreshment room on the other side of the corridor. All comes out; and the barber, having nothing more in him, not even an equivocation, or the necessity for one, is dismissed with a severe reprimand from the Chairman, and an intimation that he has narrowly escaped a prosecution for the crime of perjury.

Before following the discomfited Suddles we may take the opportunity of venturing a remark or two, suggested by certain evidences discoverable among the spectators of the feeling with which the spectacle of a man altogether destitute of integrity and moral principle being stripped of the pretences of truth and honesty, is witnessed by a discriminating public. Whether there be any covert relation between the examination by a Committee of the House of Commons, and such recreations as badger-baiting, cock-fighting, or hanging at the Old Bailey, we have not the leisure at present to enquire; but one thing is certain, and that is, that a very considerable section of the on-lookers at an Election Committee are the same class of persons who are generally congregated at the entertainments above mentioned. By their perceptions the moral ugliness of the thing is not recognised. It is a species of man-baiting, in which the bribed voter plays the part of Bruin among the bull-dogs; the more he lies and swears through thick and thin, that black is white, in defiance of plain and palpable facts, and the more he won't acknowledge what is incontestibly proved to the comprehension of everybody, so much more delectable is the sport he affords. The posing questions of his watchful antagonists in horsehair are regarded as so many attacks which he is bound to parry or elude, by cunning or equivocation; and if he can succeed at last in sophisticating his examiners, and putting them upon the wrong scent, he has the merit of game and pluck, and becomes the object of general favour. This, by the way, is a consummation but rarely achieved. The bare-faced knave who, having bartered his privileges for a bribe, and betrayed the trust committed to him, dares to launch into a labyrinth of lies, in the hope of deluding his judges, is pretty sure, sooner or later, to suffer the shame of exposure—and it is instructive to mark the contrast between the confident assumption of careless innocence and candour by many an ingrained scoundrel, as he takes the oath—and his crest-fallen shame-facedness when, crushed beneath the sense of ignominy, he leaves the room after being forced to publish his own disgrace, with the knowledge that it will be patent to all the world, and to his most intimate friends in particular, before he is a day older.

Suddles, as he returns to the corridor, is in mortal fear of Snardle, whom he would avoid if he could, and therefore he takes refuge on a bench among a few kindred spirits who, like himself, bear on their countenances the scars of that terrible combat from the ordeal of which he has just emerged. To his infinite relief and satisfaction, Snardle no longer knows him, and returns his timid glance with the unconcerned gaze of a stranger. A thousand times during the examination the barber had wished himself at home; and when the Committee rises at the instigation of the little bell which rings the legislators to prayers, he applies to the agent, and urging the plea of business, asks leave to return to his wife and family. The agent, who knows that he is now but a squeezed sponge, and that nothing further is to be got out of him, grants his request, merely intimating that he must be ready to return again if his evidence should be again required. The barber is off by the first train, and at night lays his head on his own pillow, and hopes to recover his lost self-respect in the bosom of his own family.

The result of the Committee's Inquiry on Swilbury Election showed that extensive bribery and treating had been practised by both Blues and Yellows. Since it took place no new writs have been issued, and there is a talk that the borough is to be disfranchised. Whether that will be done remains to be seen; but among all the free and independent electors, there is not one more indifferent upon the subject than the late loquacious, but now taciturn, Suddles. Shaving, unfortunately for him, is scarcer than ever he knew it in Swilbury; and he has taken refuge from the distraction of his mind in the occupation of weaving a wig—which will not be made of horsehair.

A CHRISTMAS VACATION IN JUTLAND.

FROM THE DANISH.

CHAPTER V.

ALICE.

I HAVE often observed in my own case, as well as in the case of others, that a single event, be it ever so important, distressing, or even fearful, does not so easily make us lose our self-command, or even put us out of humour, as a succession of vexatious occurrences, however trivial each may be in itself. We are able to resist one heavy blow, but succumb to a succession of lighter ones. Such was my case on the present occasion. First, I was vexed at the mysteries of the night having been solved so immediately and so simply; secondly, I was vexed that the explanations I had received relative to the two interesting actresses in the nocturnal drama, had rendered them even more enigmatic than before; and thirdly, I was vexed at the indifference with which the Thammerraad's family spoke of the two ladies. Indeed this indifference lowered all the members of the family in my estimation; I thenceforward looked upon them as mere common-place personages: their gaity appeared to me insipid, their jokes stale, and their amusements stupid. In a word, I was thoroughly out of humour, and my partner in the game was the sufferer for it. The arrival of the expected musician soon broke up the card party, and acted as a stimulant on my unstrung nerves. The Herredsfoged, who was a passionate lover of music, was in a state of great excitement; he helped Mr. Fidler, this was the musician's name, to unpack the instruments, and to distribute them among the performers; note-stands were drawn forwards, music-books were opened, and instruments were tuned with an air of importance, as though the weal and the woe of the world depended upon what we were about. Our hostess twice appeared at the door of the concert-room to inquire whether the gentlemen could not find time to dine; but could obtain no satisfactory answer. At length, however, the Thammerraad came in, armed with a hunting-whip, and drove us all to table.

After dinner we again repaired to the music-room. It was amusing to see the Herresfoged and the conductor of the orchestra, as we called Mr. Fidler, examining each other's store of music. Their eyes and hands were in constant movement, and exclamations of admiration announced whenever the one had discovered an especial favourite among the musical treasures of the other. At length the Herredsfoged exclaimed, "What is this?" "Hem!" answered Mr. Fidler, "that is something we cannot make use of on this occasion; a grand aria, with accompaniment of violin, violoncello, hautboy, and bassoon. For the accompaniment we have performers, but where shall we find the singer?" "Perhaps Miss Alice might undertake the part," said one of the Miss Hansens; "I have frequently heard her sing such great long things—I will show it to her. . . . ." "Oh, pray do," exclaimed the Herredsfoged eagerly, but Mr. Fidler turned away with a contemptuous "pshaw!" and proposed that we should commence a quartett.

Evening had crept on, and we were still deep in music. During a pause in the symphony which we were just playing, I turned round and beheld a lady among the party whom I had not before observed. She was standing by the door at Mrs. Hansen's side, and seemed listening with downcast eyes. In her hand she held a roll of music—could it be Alice? The pause was out, and in spite of my exceeding curiosity, I was forced again to turn my eyes and my thoughts to the music. When the symphony was finished, she stepped forward modestly, but not bashfully. "Pshaw," said I to myself, in imitation of Mr. Fidler, when I beheld her more closely, "a handsome figure, but an indifferent face—so cold, so inanimate!" Her eyes I had not yet seen, for they were almost completely veiled by the long eyelashes, and she did not let them rest upon any one, but merely glanced at the person she spoke to. She advanced towards us, opened the music she held in her hand, and said in an accent that betrayed her foreign birth, "I know this, and have sung it repeatedly, and with the assistance of these gentlemen" . . . We gentlemen were not a little surprised, and Mr. Fidler more than all; he stared at her as if he had not quite understood what she said, but when glancing round the circle she asked, "Who is conductor?" he answered with much alacrity, placed his own music-stand before her with a bow, and distributed the various parts with the greatest empressement. None fell to my share, and, highly pleased at this, I took my place among the auditors.

I felt my heart beat at the thought of the difficult task the young girl had undertaken, surrounded as she was by thorough conoscenti; but when she commenced, when her rich, full, silvery tones fell upon my ear, I at once felt that she was mistress of her art, and that she had nothing to fear from the severest critics. Then only I ventured to glance at the mouth from which such sweet tones were issuing. There was no denying it—it was not pretty, at least not then. But why did I look at her? ladies ought never to be seen while singing; I turned away my eyes, and was soon carried away by the indescribable beauty of her voice and execution.

When she had done, she handed the music to Mr. Fidler with a slight curtsey, and received, with downcast eyes and a faint smile, the thanks and applause which burst forth from all sides, and then returned to Mrs. Hansen's side. After we had performed another instrumental piece, she was requested to favour us with another song; she consented without the least display of affected reluctance, but when it was found that unhappily all the other songs in hers and our possession were arranged for the accompaniment of the piano, and she was in consequence implored to repeat the former aria, she resolutely refused: "I dislike encores," she answered in broken Danish and with much hesitation, "the singer is never successful the second time and —but—I express myself so badly in Danish."

"Pray speak French, Mademoiselle," said I, addressing her in that language. I think I almost guess your thoughts. On hearing the accustomed sounds every appearance of embarrassment and awkwardness vanished, the restraint which had hitherto characterized her manner gave way to a most animated look and tone, and with the ease of a person accustomed to converse on such topics, she gave her reasons for disapproving of the immediate repetition of a successful musical performance.

We continued for some time to converse with much animation, when I was called away to take a part in another quartett. When I returned to resume the conversation which had been interrupted, I found that she had been sent for by the Countess. As is usually the case, those who remained behind began to criticise the guest who had just left; and her fate was no better than that of a new poem, subjected to the criticisms of various judges of æsthetics: all find fault, but no two find the same faults; what one praises another blames, and if the author were desirous to avoid in a new edition all the defects that had been pointed out by his critics, he would find himself in the predicament of the old gentleman in the fable, from whose head a young mistress picked all the grey hairs, and an old one all the black. However, severe judgments are not always a bad sign; it shows that the critics are searching for faults; and in Alice's case all were at last agreed on two points, viz., that she sang like an angel, and had a large mouth. Even I was obliged to admit the justice of the last sentence,—but, as I found afterwards, as yet none of us could be said to have seen her.

While we were at supper she returned, and our considerate hostess observing that the two French talkers had better be near each other, assigned her a place by my side. Never before had I met a woman in whom depth of feeling was joined to so much refinement of manner, and sprightliness of mind. With the greatest ease she passed from one subject to another, whenever I started a new topic of conversation, and with equal ease she evaded every allusion to her own history, whenever I attempted by indirect means to gain some information on this point. What a pity, said I repeatedly to myself, that the mouth that speaks so prettily, is not itself pretty.

When I got up the next morning I found that thaw had set in; the forest, which the day before was clad in winter's glittering silvery garment, as if decked out in honour of the festive season, now stood there in dark russet dress in harmony with the heavily laden clouds that hung over its head. A south-west wind howled through the lobbies, and rattled among the rushes in the moat that surrounded the old castle. My mind was depressed; it was as if the leaden clouds were weighing on my bosom, and preventing the healthy action of my heart. I thought with a feeling of melancholy of the noble lady inhabiting the apartment next to mine, the last withering branch of a tree once flourishing and vigorous. She also will soon have vanished from the halls of her ancestors, which are already inhabited by a new and multiplying race.

At that time it was quite inexplicable to me why my "thaw humour," as the Herredsfoged termed it, would not be dispelled the whole day long. I took part in all that was going on; but I seemed only partially present, and it frequently happened when any of the party remarked that my thoughts were absent, that I discovered that in truth they had wandered away to the countess's apartment.

Our amusements and occupations were as varied as could be desired: we played at billiards, at cards, at battledore and shuttle-cock, and at length we fought a battle with snow-balls; in a word we played all kinds of mad pranks, and a dance in the evening was to conclude the merry-makings. Several other ladies had arrived, and Alice also had received and accepted an invitation.

I was engaged in a friendly contest with some of the gentlemen about who was to open the ball, when she entered. Cupid, and all the graces! It was she, and it was not she, it was not the darkly-clad, cold and reserved French girl we had before beheld; it was Terpsichore herself, light as a zephyr, surrounded with a mild radiance like that of the morning-star. A snow-white ball-dress fell in light but ample folds around her beautiful figure, and being somewhat short, according to the fashion of the day, displayed her pretty little feet and ancles wound round with rose-coloured ribbon in the Greek fashion. An azure blue gauze scarf was thrown over her shoulders, and among her rich brown tresses was concealed a single white lily. But her countenance! What an extraordinary change it had undergone! What had become of her large mouth? When I beheld her smile when she accepted my invitation for the first dance, I could have wished it larger still, that it might have displayed more fully the most beautiful teeth

I had ever seen between two lips of coral. And her eyes! For the first time I looked into their dark blue depths, and caught a glimpse of the spirit that dwelt within. What is beauty, other than the reflexion of a beautiful soul. Every feature in a face may be handsome, and the whole regular; but if the light of the spirit be wanting, it will rank no higher than Pygmalion's Galathea, before the gods had heard his prayers and bestowed a soul upon the marble; it may awaken admiration, not love.

It was fortunate that the music began at that moment, for I was so wrapt in sweet surprise that I had forgotten myself, the dance, and everything that surrounded me.

Young reader of which ever sex thou be! I doubt not that thou hast already made the discovery, which I however did not make at the time, that the god of love had wounded me with one of his sharpest darts. But how—but how could I imagine that she, who had been so indifferent to me during our first interview, should suddenly become so dear to me? I had always thought that love must come at first sight. But perhaps it did in reality then take possession of my heart, but lay, as it were, in a torpor—and had only now awakened to conscious being? as when we dream, but know not that we have dreamt until we awake.

I did not become aware of my own feelings until Alice was gone. Towards midnight she left the ball-room to rejoin her solitary friend. It was then to me as if the lights had lost their lustre, the music its sprightliness, and dancing all its attractions; she had taken away with her half of the light, the life, and the joy. I could no longer deceive myself as to the state of my heart. The important discovery would at once have driven me into solitude, had I not feared betraying my feelings to my merry companions, who had already commenced teazing me about my strange abstraction of manner. When, at length, the ball was over, and I was allowed to retire to my room, I reviewed in memory every event of the evening, from her first entrance dazzling in her loveliness, to the last graceful inclination with which she retired. I repeated each of her words. In imagination I danced over again each dance that I had danced with her, and now only I understood what it was that in this art also distinguished her from all others; it was not only the gracefulness, but the extraordinary lightness, of her movements. Feet and arms (for it was then still the fashion to accompany the dance with movements of the arms) moved together in undeviating time, as if impelled by machinery, and her beautiful figure glided forward among the other dancers, as the swan sails in calm and stately beauty among rocking billows.

Every look, smile, and word which she had addressed to me during the evening was recalled to memory, and I endeavoured to discover whether they had conveyed more than expressions of mere politeness. It seemed to me that in some cases they had—but here I was suddenly struck by the thought: what was her manner towards the other men?—Hem! I could not tell. One thing, however, I had observed, and that was that the Conrector's brother had repeatedly fixed his eyes upon her with an expression of much earnestness, and that she in return several times threw stolen glances at him. He was indeed past his first youth, but though his hair was tinged with grey, his tall military looking figure still retained all its vigour, and his manly sunburnt countenance, was enlivened by a pair of laughing blue eyes. As regarded his feelings, however, I was soon reassured, for I heard him snoring most lustily; for he and his brothers—the inseparables—were now, like myself, inhabitants of the black room, the new accession of guests for the ball having necessitated this crowding.

I awoke late the following morning, and found that the brothers had already left the room. Having dressed hastily, I was about to follow their example, when the sound of footsteps in the adjoining room arrested me. Could it be she? I could not resist the desire to ascertain, and moving on tiptoe, I went to the well-known door and peeped in. Yes, it was she—in a morning dress. She was putting her nicely-folded ball apparel into a drawer; when she had done this she opened another drawer, and took from it an object which I could not see, but from which hung a twisted cord of silk or hair. For some moments she seemed lost in melancholy contemplation of the object she held in her hand; she then drew a deep sigh, pressed it to her bosom and to her lips, and lifted her tearful eyes to that heaven where mortals seek balm for their earthly afflictions. She then replaced the object in the drawer, wiped her eyes, and left the room.

What could it have been? a miniature? No doubt; but whose? a lover's?—my heart sunk. Or, perhaps, a mother's? my heart was relieved. But who was she herself? an emigrant? of high rank—too high rank! her manners, her accomplishments, her highly cultivated mind betrayed. —"I must have certainty," said I to myself as I went down to join the family.

CHAPTER VI.

THE ROPE DANCER.

THE day elapsed without my being able to come to any determination as to how I was to declare my feelings to Alice; but the fact of my having resolved to make such declaration enabled me to take part in the pastimes of the rest of the party, without betraying any remarkable absence of mind, although my heart was so far from being in them, that I do not now even recollect wherein they consisted.

It was Christmas eve.—On the following festive day, I went to church with a few of our party, among whom were the inseparable brothers. Alice was there; but not the Countess, who was indisposed. During the service the pious girl's eyes were riveted exclusively on her prayer book, or on the clergyman. I rejoiced to see this—but our pews being opposite to each other, our eyes met when we were coming out at the conclusion of the service. She blushed, and bowed politely, but neither of us spoke. I had not the courage to do so.—"To-morrow," said I to myself.

The morrow came.—Again the brothers had left the room before I awoke. I got up. Full an hour I then spent in listening and peeping into the adjoining room—but she was not there. I was several times on the point of going down, but turned back again, hoping that the next moment would bring greater luck. My mind began to waver, my courage to fail. At length the well-known sound of her footsteps fell upon my ear. "Now or never!" said I aloud, and went into her. She was again at the chest of drawers, but on hearing me enter, she turned suddenly round; seeing me, she changed colour, and her face betrayed emotion. This restored my courage: the first step was made.

I remained at a respectful distance and said:—"Mademoiselle!" but more I did not say, for, in truth, I knew not exactly what I meant to say.—"Monsieur," she answered; but no more. I was disconcerted, abashed, floundering in a state of indecision and anxiety. Suddenly a bright thought struck me: "I have learned," I said, "that the Countess is indisposed." "She is much better to-day," she answered—"I am most happy to hear it."—Another pause.

The painful embarrassment under which I was suffering, increased with every pulsation—I could bear it no longer.—Like a swelling stream bursting through its embankments, my pent up feelings broke forth in a flood of words. What these words were, I cannot say; but the colour faded from Alice's cheek, and the brightness from her eye, and she was obliged to support herself against the chest of drawers near which she was standing. The earth seemed to burn under my feet.

"Sir!" she commenced, in a firm and clear voice; but it seemed to me that her composure was forced. "Sir, the honourable proposal which you have just made, is of a nature that urges me to treat you in return with perfect sincerity," (first-rate French style, thought I), "and I must, therefore, inform you that I am bound to Countess R ——, by bonds which I cannot allow to be dissevered. She is everything to me—and I am her only comfort—the last link that attaches her to life. You will perceive," she added hastily, "that I fully appreciate the flattering confidence you have shown me, by my speaking to you so openly of a connection which is not known to the world." While she was speaking, I had cast down my eyes, like a culprit placed before his judge. I now raised them again, but hers were then immediately cast down, and I saw tears gather in her long lashes. My voice and my courage returned:—"The relation which exists between you and the Countess," I said, "I honour it—although I do not understand it—but—allow me one question!—if this relation were not?"—Her eye flashed, she hesitated an instant, and then answered with apparent coldness:—"It is—and" . . . . she looked round, as if seeking the means of escape. "Alice!" I now said, with increasing boldness; "I know you by no other name, and by this I name you for the last time if you so will it. I am not a frivolous youth; as a man, an honourable man, and after having seriously communed with my heart, I tell you honestly and without reserve, this heart belongs to you—it is yours undivided, and with all its best feelings. But, if in your heart there be no feeling that responds to mine,"—here she looked at me with a pained expression in which also I thought I descried a slight appearance of tenderness. I took her hand which she did not withdraw. "Alice," I continued, "if I am not quite indifferent to you—say but one word—one word of hope! I can, and will wait patiently, until the connection to which you have alluded, may perhaps be changed without being dissolved."

She drew her hand gently out of mine, placed the other over her eyes, closed her lips firmly, as if to repress starting tears, and then motioned to a chair near her. I seated myself mechanically, and she sank into another. She remained a few moments, as if engaged in an inward struggle; her bosom heaved, her eyelids trembled, at length, she breathed a heavy sigh, and then with much self-possession spoke as follows:—

"Before you request, a second time, an answer to the important question you have put to me, it is right that you should learn more of my history and my position, than you have hitherto known. But first—if I am . . . . as . . . . as I . . . . entertain much esteem for you . . . . you will, I am sure, promise me, after having heard my history, to wait until I give an answer to your too flattering expressions, without again being called upon by you so to do." I promised.

"My birth and parentage," she resumed, "are as little known to myself as to you. I have never known father or mother; alone, without relative or friend, I was thrown upon the stage of life—and to a real stage my first recollections are attached. Yes, sir, my earliest years were spent among rope-dancers, jugglers, and equestrians." (I felt a cold shudder pass over me, and I perceived that her eye dwelt for a moment scrutinizingly on my countenance.) "The slight proficiency in dancing which I possess, was forced upon me by the sound of the lash, and attained in bitter grief. Ah! often did I wish—I knew not God then, and could not pray for support from him—often did I wish that the rope on which I was dancing would give way, and that a precipitate fall would put an end to my sufferings. Throw myself down I dared not, for I feared the lash more than death. Often when applause was showered on me, and I bowed my thanks with arms folded on my bosom, tears of bitterness used to course down my hollow, painted cheeks.

"Child as I was, I would, no doubt, at length have found means of putting an end to my intolerable existence, had not a change been wrought in it by the association of a band of musicians with our troop. One of the musicians, a Roman by birth, discovered my talent for singing, and undertook to develop it. As my services might thus be made to contribute doubly to the director's revenues, he allowed me to avail myself of the proffered instruction, and then commenced for me a happier period, for I loved music—the best interpreter of man's sorrow as of his joy—besides which, while so engaged, I escaped the ill-treatment of the brutal director and his wife, and I was able to satisfy my hunger, as my kind-hearted teacher gave me as many maccaronis as I could eat. I made rapid progress, but to my own unhappiness. Previously I had only had to dance and jump in public, now I was made to sing; and as my repugnance and timidity often caused me to fail in eliciting applause, I was punished with stripes." Here she paused, and dried up the tears that were escaping from her eyes. My tears also flowed at the thoughts of the barbarity with which so angelic a creature had been treated. My emotion was so great that I was incapable of speaking.

"But," she continued, "the Lord took pity on the poor orphan, and rescued me from the hands of the brutal creatures. We had repaired to Leghorn, where we were to embark for England. The last day of our stay I performed so badly, that I had reason to fear the most severe punishment. In my despair I determined to put into execution the resolution which had long been firmly fixed in my mind. Before the performance was out I slipped away, ran as fast as I could down the harbour, and threw myself into the water. It was evening, but the seamen on board a vessel, moored near by, saw me, and one of them immediately jumped in after me, and in a few minutes I was on the deck of the vessel, having sustained no injury. Immediately afterwards the director and another member of the troop, who had discovered my escape, and who had followed me, came on board and demanded that I should be given up to them. I screamed, and threw myself at the feet of the man who had rescued me from the waves. Embracing his knees, I cried with my last strength—Save me! do not give me up! kill me! and then swooned away. When I recovered I found myself in bed, in a strange, handsomely-furnished room. A friendly man, in a blue uniform, was seated by the bed-side, and when I opened my eyes he patted my cheek, and spoke so friendly and soothingly to me that I grasped his hand and covered them with kisses. 'May I remain with you? Is Roletti gone? Will you protect me from him? Will you let me stay with you?' Thus I cried, and stretched my hands imploringly towards him. He imprinted a kiss on my forehead, and gave me the consolatory assurance that I was safe. He had paid a sum of money to Roletti, who had in return ceded all claims upon me."

Alice's eyes sparkled; she stretched out her hands as if her benefactor were still before her, and said, "May the Lord reward thee, wherever thou be, in this world or in a better one;" and, with the expression of a Madonna, she turned her eyes to heaven, where she hoped once to thank him. Her folded hands then fell into her lap, and she sat for a while as if wrapt in thought and unconscious of my presence. After a little while, she soon resumed.

"It was he who had taken me out of the water. He was the commander of the vessel in the port, but to this day I do not know if he were an Englishman or a Dutchman; for his mother-tongue I did not understand. The last benefit he bestowed upon me was as great as the first. The following day he purchased suitable clothes for me, and then took me out to a villa in the neighbourhood of Leghorn, where he introduced me to several ladies. The youngest of these, in particular, received me with much kindness; and when I had related the little that I knew of my own history, she asked me if I would stay with her. At first I refused, and insisted upon remaining with the captain. Soon, however, they succeeded in persuading me that that could not be. I remained. He departed. I have never seen him since.

"The lady to whom I have alluded became my instructress. I was then about ten or eleven years old, but knew not how to read or write, and religion was a word I had never heard. She undertook to teach me all, and my love for her, as well as my natural aptitude, soon placed me on a level with other children of my age. God had appointed her to be a mother to the forlorn orphan; and this, my second mother, is the countess—as you have, no doubt, already guessed. And now, sir, you are aware how sacred are the bonds which attach me to her, and I am sure you are too noble to desire to dissever them."

She rose, and I likewise. Taking her hand, which she did not withdraw, I reverentially pressed it to my lips, and then returned to my own room in silence.

I felt that I must renounce Alice and endeavour to combat my passion, and that the first step I ought to take to this effect, was to leave the house in which she was dwelling. Too sudden a departure, however, would create surprise, and perhaps betray the secret of my heart, which many had already begun to suspect. Besides, only half of the vacation, which I had promised to spend at Mr. Hansen's had elapsed, and to avoid giving offence to my hospitable entertainers, it would be necessary that I should give some plausible reason for curtailing my visit. Such a reason I readily invented, and my departure was, in consequence, fixed for the day after the ensuing.

Even our best actions very frequently spring from mixed motives; and, in the present case, my apparent resignation, no doubt, had its source as much in a latent hope that by withdrawing at once, I would raise myself in Alice's opinion, as in respect for the relation which existed between the two ladies. Perhaps, also, there was a little mixture of pride in my feelings, together with something of what the French term dépit amoureux; and, in addition to all this, I must confess, that at the bottom of my heart lurked a rather confident hope that Alice would, at last, be mine.

CHAPTER VII.

THE CAPTAIN.

The following night I woke, after having slept some time, and overheard involuntarily a conversation, the substance of which is so intimately connected with the present history, that I must repeat it for the benefit of my readers.

The two brothers, who believed me to be asleep, were repeating to each other the most important events of their lives. The elder, the Conrector, had probably just before I awoke completed his narrative, for I heard him say, "Such, dear brother, is the way in which Providence has led me. But tell me, now, how it happens, that you, who are blessed with such ample means, are not married."

"It is soon told," replied the Captain; "because I never saw but one woman that I wished to have for my wife, and her I could not get."

"But this one," said the Conrector, "who was she? Why did she not become your wife? Tell me the whole story."

"Certainly, if you wish it," answered the brother. "I had just returned from a cruise off the Kurilian islands, and had anchored in the harbour of Peter Paul, in Kamschatka, when despatches arrived from the Admiralty, ordering me to proceed at once to the north-west coast of America, to make some surveys, and then to proceed by the nearest route—that is to say round Cape Horn and through the Mediterranean—to a port on the Black Sea, to deliver my report. Having suffered average, I was obliged to run into a port in the Mediterranean, and there it so happened" . . . .

"Excuse me," interrupted the Conrector; "but when was this? how many years is it since?"

"Let me see," replied the sailor; "it must have been about twelve years ago. Well, it so happened, that several Russian travellers of high rank had just arrived in the same port. They came on board my vessel; I returned their visit on shore, and for a long while it was nothing but a succession of balls, and fêtes, and all kinds of junketings. It was on one of these occasions that I was run into by the frigate I have alluded to, and was damaged in the heart in a manner that was not easily repaired."

"Aha!" exclaimed the schoolman; "you fell in love, I suppose?"

"That I did," answered the brother; "and it was no wonder, for, I can assure you, she was one of the finest crafts I had ever beheld. I made signals; but she would not answer them, or perhaps did not understand them. I then ran close along side of her, and hailed her . . . in the politest terms, of course. And then we talked, and we danced, and . . ."

"Was she an Italian," again interrupted the elder brother, "and what was her name?"

"She was not an Italian," replied the younger; she was born in France, and her name was Roseau. But the name is of no importance. To be short—we met once, and twice, and many times; and at last, I don't know how it came about, but I told her right out that I loved her."

"That was right," said the Conrector; "and she?"

"She said nothing at all, but she fell into my arms and looked unutterable things. And then I kissed her and she kissed me, and the meaning was, that we swore . . ."

"What! did she swear?" asked the Conrector.

"Well, yes, I mean, we solemnly promised to love each other as long as the breath of life continued to swell our sails."

"That was a good promise," said the Conrector; "why was it not kept?"

"I will tell you. Among the Russians, whom I have mentioned, there was a nobleman who admired Marie as much as I did; and when he perceived that I had taken the wind from him, he crowded sail to come up with me, that is to say, he tried to gain her good graces by flattery, and diamonds, and pearls, and such like trash—and when that did not help, and he was nevertheless forced to fall astern, he showed his teeth, I answered in kind, and so we ended by fighting a duel."

"For shame, brother Christian!" murmured the Conrector; "duelling is a barbarous, heathenish custom."

"It may be so," answered the sailor; but it is the custom on such occasions, and I only did what I was obliged to do. After all it did not turn out so very badly, though bad enough: he received a shot in the hull, and was obliged to be laid up for some time to be overhauled . . . ."

"He did not die in consequence?"

"No; but he belonged to a powerful family, and had influential friends; and I was worried and tormented until I was induced to ask for my discharge. This, you know, led to my fortune."

"But the maiden?"

"The maiden! . . . Hm—when he found that he had no chance of making her his, he determined that as far as he could prevent it, she should not be mine either; and he spread all kinds of calumnies about me, which she foolishly believed; a certain circumstance which I will relate to you by and bye, having given an appearance of truth to the invention. So she wrote me a letter to the effect that she was going on another tack, and that I might steer my course whithersoever I liked. I hastened to her to clear up the mystery; but she and the whole squadron had already heaved anchor and were off. I have never seen her since."

"Why did you not write to her? why did you not go in quest of her?"

"Whither?" answered the sailor. "I did not even know the name of her native place. It was all over, there was nothing more to be done."

A pause in the conversation now ensued, but was interrupted after a while by the Conrector: "You alluded to a circumstance which had induced your beloved to place faith in the calumnies—what was that?"

"True! It was a romantic incident. One evening, as I was . . . ." Here I was seized with a fit of sneezing, which at once put a stop to the conversation. The Conrector called out, "God bless you!" and the brother said to him in an under tone of voice, "Another time."

CHAPTER VIII.

CONCLUSION.

"No one knows, when the sun rises—how it will set." This was one of the wise maxims of the parish-clerk of Ulstrup, and one which had almost acquired for him the reputation of a prophet, and was by the Herredsfoged classed among the wise sayings of the seven sages of Greece. In my memory it has been indelibly fixed, owing to the circumstance of its having been repeated at Ulvedal on the morning of the day fixed for my departure, which arose enveloped in a thick, grey fog; and because of its being so singularly applicable in a figurative sense, to the subsequent events of the day.

While dressing in the morning, the captain proposed that we should, in the course of the day, call upon the Countess and thank her, in person, for the use of her room. I told him that I had a few days before proposed doing so, but that my visit had been politely declined; however, I consented to solicit again an interview with the noble lady, in company with himself and his brother. To my surprise she consented to receive us.

I do not know how it happened that I preceded my companions. Was I perhaps unconsciously spurred on by a latent hope? Cupid is a sophist; and what is worse, he plays with his victim, like a cat plays with a mouse.

Alice was not present, but from the very courteous reception which I met with from the Countess, I judged that she had spoken favourably of me. The Countess was a woman of most captivating manners, a delicate and graceful figure, and remains of what some years back must have been remarkable beauty. Her conversation was animated and interesting, betraying a highly cultivated mind, and we were soon chatting with the ease of old acquaintances, about la bella Italia, and the treasures of art which it contains. The conversation was protracted for some time, and I was on the point of taking leave, when the servant announced the captain, and the latter entered. To my surprise I saw that he was clad in the uniform of an officer of the Dutch navy, and that a Prussian order decorated his breast.
