

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

Several months have elapsed since we have offered the few remarks which we have long been in the habit of making on public affairs. There was indeed much to think about, much to grieve over, but little to talk about, while waiting for the results of the new Tariff and the new Sliding Scale,—seeing distress spreading on every hand, and lamentable divisions among those whose union was the surest foundation of the hope of better times. To have given expression to discontent and complaint had at best been idle: those from whom we had hoped better things than riot and outrage, of which they must always be themselves the surest victims, had been sufficiently punished by the vengeance of the laws which they had violated, and were more the subjects of commiseration than rebuke; and in the present awful state of the country, we hold merely factious party recrimination as worse than idle—as morally reprehensible. Party nick-names, and party tactics we have long since left to party jobbers; and having thrown all the badges overboard, we are not disposed to fish them up again. From the first hint of Sir Robert Peel's Tariff, small as was the actual advantage that could be anticipated from a measure that was, perhaps, underrated by one party, and viewed with inordinate alarm by another, Liberals were bound to be in charity with the Tory Minister, who, with however timid a hand, had fairly, though certainly not far, opened the sluices, and let in the waters which are now swelling around us. It is not less true, that Sir Robert Peel's predecessors in office had left but few of those grateful reminiscences and feelings which make this duty of charity difficult to practise towards their rival. A Session of Parliament was got through by Sir Robert, in which, one way or another, a good deal of useful business was accomplished, when its doings are compared with the latter years of the Whig administration; but of which the weightiest business was paving the way for those great commercial and fiscal changes which are now inevitable.

Let us not be understood to impute the dallying with important measures, and the disappointment of the reasonable hopes of the Reformers, altogether to Whig hollowness or disinclination. The late ministry were often obstructed by the contumacy and factious opposition of the party whom their supineness and want of confidence in the people had allowed to rally into formidable strength; though their greatest cause of obstruction lurked within. They had got all they wanted, and nothing more was necessary save to keep what they had obtained. The means of doing so they strangely miscalculated,—and so lost all.

These are things of the past; and now looking forward to the coming Session of Parliament, which, whether for weal or woe, must be one of the most eventful that has yet been witnessed, we start afresh from the point at which we left off when we last spoke of public matters, and inquire whether Sir Robert Peel considers the present distress merely one in the series of periods of temporary difficulty which arise from time to time in every great commercial country, from ruinous wars, bad seasons, and a variety of causes, and are again surmounted; or whether, as is now generally held by reflecting men, he considers it the most alarming symptom that has yet been apparent of the decidedly downward tendency of England in every one of her great interests. The agriculturists begin at length to perceive that all the unjust protection that can be cunningly devised for them, cannot long uphold them, if the other leading interests of the country suffer. The present distress, arising from the same causes, and partaking of the general character of previous periods of suffering, is seen to be more broadly based, and more inveterate in its nature; and the disease has seized upon a previously debilitated frame, no longer able to repel such attacks. National decay has been coming on, now with stealthy pace, now with an accelerated movement,—but ever gaining ground; and the only possible issue has been foreseen and foretold for a quarter of a century. We are not, however, disposed to exult in the fulfilment of prophecies of evil, but rather to rejoice in the indications, that the warning lessons of the justice which is wisdom, are at length beginning to be listened to. Experience, it is said, teaches fools. Falling corn-markets, on the one hand, in spite of a lately adopted magical protecting scale; and, on the other, the energetic action of the Anti-corn, law League, and the increasing phalanx of Free-traders, at the head of an unemployed and starving population, speak in a tone that must penetrate the most obtuse brains. There is little doubt that Sir Robert Peel, on questions of political economy, holds, at least in the abstract, the same opinions as the late Mr. Huskisson. But there is no longer place for theories and abstractions. Something must be done, and that quickly and effectually; if universal, and, it may be, irreparable ruin is to be averted; and if a last fair chance is to be given to the country to right itself. The Corn Laws must go in the first place;—and they are doomed, and are scarcely worth longer consideration from their opponents; since some of their supporters have themselves magnanimously spoken their sentence. They remain but a question of time, and surely of very brief time,—as we cannot believe that Sir Robert Peel, who has, on former occasions, had the manly humility, and true wisdom and patriotism to adopt whatever was commendable in the policy of his rivals, will pertinaciously cling to a measure proved to be worthless, even to those for whom it was devised, merely because it is not quite a year old, and was of his own contrivance. It has surely been tried quite long enough, the moment that its futility is demonstrated. We would hope that the Minister will as frankly throw his useless Sliding Scale overboard, as adopt the Whig modifications of the Sugar Duties, and, if he please, out-bid the liberality of the Whigs. His difficulties are easily foreseen; and therefore on these, and any liberal measure, or measure of liberal tendency which he may propose, it is the duty of every man who wishes well to the country, and hopes to prosper in the general prosperity, to support a Minister—Tory though he be denominated—who has already done the state some small service, and obtained credit for an inclination to do more, if he is permitted; if he is, in other words, supported by the country against the selfish imbeciles of his own party. Whatever may be the tactics, or, rather, the tempers of the wilder portion of Sir Robert's friends, the duty of Reformers is clear enough. A clamour has been raised by the Whig partisan press, because Sir Robert Peel seems inclined to delude the agricultural interest, has, in fact, deceived the farmers,—though Mr. Estcott and others seem to think this system of delusion will really serve the agriculturists; and no one doubts that, if Sir Robert means free trade in spirit, while restriction is maintained only in words, that this is a kind of delusion which must promote the interests of the whole people, and therefore merits a better name. What shall be said of another kind of delusion, dexterously practised, for a series of years, by another statesman who deluded the Reformers into the expectation that something great was to be done, and ended by telling the people, in plain terms, that even "The Bill" was intended to strengthen the landed interest in the House of Commons! Let us no longer be duped by party names, and made the tools of factious interests. Lord John Russell practised the same kind of tacit delusion. He indubitably allowed the Reformers to indulge in fond fancies of what the Whig administration was to do; and, when the time came, turned round and taunted them with their credulity:—He never had meant any such thing! If Sir Robert Peel should bubble the farmers in the same style, there is yet this great difference in the result of the deception, that his is for their ultimate salvation, and for the more immediate relief of the nation. Let us only find that Sir Robert proves himself an arch-deceiver to the hopes of selfishness and injustice; and long may the monopolists be so deceived! The more intelligent of the agricultural party do not seem to fancy that they have been betrayed.

The changed tone of the late great agricultural meetings is, if possible, a more heart-felt cause of congratulation than the formidable attitude, the elastic energy, and rapidly-growing strength of the Anti-corn-law League.* Those convictions must long have been working in secret which found such strong expression at these farmer assemblies, where things have not been minced or said by halves. The death-warrant of those foolish and iniquitous laws—for they are not more iniquitous than foolish—has been signed by the agriculturists themselves; which leaves no chance for a rescue, and little encouragement for the attempt. There is another advantage. Having surrendered their own monopoly, the landed interest will show no mercy to any other.† Free trade in corn is free trade in everything.——

* Among their other efforts, the active and indefatigable National Anti-corn-law League some time since offered Prizes for the three best Essays on "Agriculture and the Corn Law." From those offered the Three to which the prizes were awarded have been published; and they will, we trust, be speedily circulated far and wide, among the tenant farmers and farm labourers of Great Britain and Ireland, whom they are intended to enlighten. They advocate the same principles, and use the same strain of argument to which our readers have long been familiar in our pages, and especially in the Political Register of Tait's Magazine for the eight or nine years during which the Political Register was under the superintendence of the late James Johnston Darling, W. S., with whom agricultural science was a favourite pursuit, and who understood the subject well, both practically and theoretically. The opinions advanced in these Essays, and those beginning to be avowed at the agricultural meetings, were unceasingly inculcated by Mr. Darling; and his words have not been as water spilt upon the ground. Mr. Darling was from the outset a Total Repealer, from a sincere conviction, common to him with some of the most intelligent Scottish farmers, that the deprivation of the so-named protection must be for the advantage of the farmers themselves, and ultimately of the landlords also. Nature has, under all circumstances, given a lavish protection to British farmers in the distances from which the corn supplies of the country must be drawn; and from the superior skill, capital, and improved processes of husbandry that must be forced into play by the withdrawal of the enervating protective duties, Mr. Darling always expressed the utmost confidence in the farmers successfully competing with foreigners, if not in one kind of produce, then in others equally profitable. We rejoice to find such doctrines making rapid way. These Prize Essays form a valuable compendium of them.

† The galvanic throes of the Quarterly Review are to us another cheering symptom. The poor gentleman who writes about the League in that publication is evidently crazed; though there is no little malignity in his madness. Had he had a few more weeks for consideration, his very extraordinary demonstration might probably have been

The main foundation of the hope on which we now rest is, that the deep-seated evils of our condition being better understood, there is more chance of unanimity as to the nature of the remedy to be administered. There is, so far as we can ascertain, no abatement of the symptoms. Trade becomes every day worse and worse. Whole communities are nearly unemployed, starving, and despairing; and a fearful relaxation of morals, and letting go of the decencies and proprieties of the humblest life that is sustained by regular industry, must be the consequence of those habits of idleness and vagrancy to which so many of the young and of the rising generation are at present condemned:—Nor do we see any chance of speedy relief. Regarded merely as a Tariff, and not in its remote though weightiest results—as the hopeful entering of the wedge, in the process of overthrowing all monopolies—the Peel code promises but slender aid to the manufacturers when compared with their necessities; while another and another hostile Tariff bristles up in the face of our commerce; nor dare we well complain of receiving back from foreign nations the measure we have meted. The total repeal of the Corn Laws, however just and necessary, cannot all at once, nor yet, it is to be feared, of itself, renovate healthful production, and restore the manufacturing system to soundness and prosperity. More is required, much more—the abrogation of many burthens, and the removal of many impediments, which Sir Robert Peel has left untouched; nay, the total emancipation of manufacturing industry. And how is this mighty change to be effected?——By a more sweeping reduction of duties? That the insatiable demands of the State Revenue forbid. The nation, which is almost above measure impatient of the Income-tax in its present form, would absolutely revolt at the amount of direct taxation which might justify Sir Robert Peel in relaxing some of the duties that press the hardest upon the great manufactures of the country. Hostility to this obnoxious impost—the Income-tax, is, we fear, even more general than hostility to monopolies and restrictions on trade; and so determined will the attack already begun be, that unless the Minister has some tempting equivalent with which he can bribe the acquiescence of the country, his Income-tax must go, or he must go; however necessary both may in the meanwhile be to the public welfare. The Tariff is found to be no money equivalent for the Income-tax, though the repeal of the Corn Laws and the reduction of the Sugar Duties might help to fulfil the promise held out by Sir Robert when the tax was imposed; and nothing can compensate to private feeling for the attendant mischiefs of that measure as it at present exists. But were its inquisitorial, unequal, and irritating character corrected, and some great and substantial equivalent offered, in the shape of relieving and stimulating industry, with the farther hope of gradual approximation to a thoroughly sound fiscal system—to, in short, direct taxation—even the hateful Income-tax might find and deserve advocates as a step in advance. But we are not so near the political millennium as we dream of; and he must be a very enlightened man, and a very good patriot indeed, who will voluntarily agree to pay a liberal per centage upon his income or his realized property, merely to provide such a public revenue as might justify the abolition of all protecting or prohibitory duties. Were he screwed up to the pitch of making this sacrifice,—in the fruits of which he would ultimately share to the full,—he would be entitled to look for a previous complete revision of the public expenditure, and to demand that retrenchment be carried to the quick in every department of the state where the public interests warrant retrenchment. With our present complicated system of taxation, and overwhelming necessity for an immense yearly revenue, if public faith is to be kept, the change we have been contemplating looks Quixotical and impossible; as one which nothing short of revolution and a national bankruptcy could introduce. We are not so sure of this. "Impossible is the adjective of fools." A few months back, who would have hoped to hear Mr. Estcott and his brethren exhorting the farmers to rely, not upon "protection," but, like other industrious and independent men, upon their own exertions and skill. This looks almost as great a miracle as converting the whole nation to the principle of direct taxation; a principle only of secondary importance to that of universal direct representation, which must, among other reforms, ensure a sound system of raising the public revenue.

We do not wish to take a desponding view of the state and prospects of public affairs. The country has probably seen, for the present, the worst of its evil days,—if not yet the end of them; for now their complicated causes and the remedies begin to be generally understood; and though we dare not be changed into a decent adjustment of the mantle preparatory to the inevitable fall. The desperate and curious piece of rigmarole to which we allude is of great length. It revives the stale and self-refuting calumny of the manufacturers having incited the formidable outrages of last autumn. It deals hugely in CAPITAL and Italic letters, a mode of printing, according to the same Quarterly, (page 79,) "which may be defined as designating what especially demands skipping." There is, consequently, a great deal of that raw-head-and-bloody-bones article that "especially demands skipping." Its sting lies mainly in its tail, though its spines bristle all over. It would put down the League with the strong hand, as "Jacobinical—raising-money, organized and affiliated;" and finally endangering "THE SAFETY OF THE STATE." Thus thirty years ago, or less, the same parties—probably the same individual writer for one—would have put down the Anti-slavery Society, which also raised money, was affiliated, and sent forth lecturers who, in Bristol and Liverpool, were even more roughly handled than the lecturers of the League have been. But the Quarterly's scribe, not contented with attacking the members of the League, also denounces the ladies who have coöperated, (as English women, to their honour, have often before done in works of charity and mercy,) as political agitators, wheedling the workmen by styling them "gentlemen" in the circulars addressed to them—and who are, moreover, "the femelles de ces mâles" who head the League; a mode of designation sufficiently brutal in the original idiom, and not much improved in the delicate use of an English "gentleman." The article, however, places many pithy quotations from speeches and letters before the Quarterly's readers; and cannot fail to do good, especially when viewed in connexion with what has been accomplished, and the lowered tone of the Monopolists.

so sanguine as to anticipate a speedy and effectual cure, we may confidently look forward to a gradual amelioration of the more distressing symptoms, so soon as the trade in food is unfettered. Skill, enterprise, capital untold, anxiously waiting to be employed in setting busy hands in motion, are still ours, and only require free channels through which they may flow, to bring back the ease, content, and prosperity which it is, at the eleventh hour, discovered will not always wait even upon that protected class to which all the others have been sacrificed.——Instead of indulging in gloom, we would rather dwell upon the blessings which chequer the bitter adversity of the hour. Peace in the East and in China—to the news of which the desponding heart of the weighed-down nation leapt, as a drowning man clutches at a straw—is an eminent cause of gratulation, both from what it has given, and what it promises; and peace preserved with America is a common and inestimable blessing, not alone to the two countries immediately concerned, but to the whole human race. The finances of the country could not longer afford expensive wars; nor did consciousness of their justice strengthen us for the combat. In Sir Robert Peel, we believe, we shall have a promoter of peace, wherever else he may halt. Another ground of gratulation is found in the late indications of returning good sense among those of the "physical-force" Chartists, who, from ignorance, and the instigation of foolish, if not wicked leaders, were incited to violate the law, and who thus brought down its vengeance upon themselves, while they have brought disgrace and discomfiture upon an honest cause. With how many specious arguments has the conduct of these misled men furnished the opposers of every extension of the franchise; who now scornfully inquire if the plunderers and incendiaries of the late riots, are the sort of men for whom is demanded, as of right, a direct influence in making the laws? The insurrection,—for that, it seems, is the imposing though incorrect name given to the late riots,—has certainly no necessary connexion with the claim of the unrepresented for the Suffrage: but when some of the Chartists even boast that this was a Chartist movement, and not a strike for wages, many among the middle classes, who were previously favourable to the essentials of the six points, began to doubt if the claimants yet possess that commonsense qualification which alone can make the franchise in their hands safe to others, or useful to themselves. We, who consider the extended suffrage an element of safety to the body politic, as well as the right of the unrepresented, disclaim such apprehensions; without, however, being able: in the face of the alarming facts which countenance contrary opinions, to persuade our friends that their fears are fallacious. But one cause of unmingled satisfaction is the growing good sense, and frank good humour displayed of late by the farmers and a few of the landed gentlemen; whom one is disposed to rejoice over like the woman over her lost talent; to find which caused her more joy than the possession of all the rest of her treasure. The advocates of the Total Repeal of the Taxes on the People's Food, the LEAGUE—now "prosperous gentlemen," we already had; the Complete Suffragists we had, and highly were both to be esteemed and valued; but here is a new and almost unhoped-for accession of potent auxiliaries, who make a wise and generous surrender, instead of protracting a weak and exasperated hostility. If any part of this change is owing to Sir Robert Peel's delusions, all praise to him! He is gaining to himself in the farmers a phalanx of supporters in every useful commercial reform that he may project; for the agriculturists, if stripped of their own privileges, will have little indulgence for the monopolies and protecting duties of the other favoured interests.

In the meanwhile, and until the hour of distress is past, or its worst ills mitigated, never at any former epoch in the history of the country were consideration, and kindness, and bountifulness to the extreme sufferers, the unemployed, so much demanded as they are now, and must be for months to come. In relation to this we rejoice to see that a Poor Law for Scotland is at last under the consideration of the government, and that preliminary steps are immediately to be taken. This is a subject on which Sir Robert Peel is as well entitled to demand the support of the Liberals as in those commercial reforms which are expected from him; and we make no doubt that he will obtain it from the country at large, if not from the whole landed class of the North. But before any Poor Law can come into operation years must elapse, and the prevailing misery is extreme: An extraordinary crisis must be met by an extraordinary effort.

DEATH-HYMN OF THE FOOD-TAXED,

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

Tune.—"I waited long, and sought the Lord."

GOD said to man, "Arise and toil,
To fill thy soul with good:"
But men said, "No! nor food, nor work:"
I toil'd, and wanted food.
All ills that man can bear I bore,
With none to cheer me nigh;
For pain I toiled, of want I died;
God only saw me die.

"Bread, bread for toil!" I ask'd of man,
But Death for Toil he gave:
And now I ask, "A little earth,
For famish'd man a grave."
Of God I ask, what God will give,
"Rest! till the end shall be:"
Safe in his hands, oh, sweet is rest
To woe-worn men like me!

DYMOND'S GRAVE.*

Standing by Exeter's cathedral tower
My thoughts went back to that small grassy mound
Which I had lately left—the grassy mound
Where Dymond sleeps—and felt how small the power
Of time-worn walls to waken thoughts profound,
Compared with that green spot of sacred ground.

Dymond! death-stricken in thy manhood's flower,
Thy brows with deathless amaranths are crown'd;
Thou saw'st the world from thy sequestered bower,
In old hereditary errors bound;
And such a truthful trumpet thou didst sound
As shall ring in men's ears till Time devour
The vestiges of nations. Yet thy name
Finds but the tribute of slow-gathered fame.

PERAULT; OR, SLAVES AND THEIR MASTERS.

[The daring attempt of Perault and his companions, to free themselves from slavery, must still be fresh in the minds of many of the citizens of South Carolina; nor is it likely to be soon forgotten in any slave-holding State. Although little may be heard within the bounds of the slave-holding States of North America, of the mental faculties of the negro race, facts oftentimes occur, which show that the blacks are gifted with higher talents than they are generally allowed to possess. Of this the Insurrection planned, a few years back, by Perault, a negro slave in Charleston, afforded a striking example; and the ringleaders of that deep-laid plot were allowed, on all hands, to have displayed an elevation of mind, and a heroic fortitude, worthy of the best cause. That insurrection is the subject of the following tale, descriptive of the character, manners, and feelings of Slaves and their Masters.

It is left to the reader to reconcile the existing institutions of the slave-holding States of America with the following clauses in their Declaration of Independence, dated the 4th July, 1776:—"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all mankind are created equal—that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights—that amongst these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted amongst men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; and, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is right in the people to alter or abolish it. . . . . When a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their duty to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for future security."]

CHAPTER I.

THE INDIAN OUTBREAK.

"What signifies my deadly standing eye,
My silence and my cloudy melancholy,
My fleece of woolly hair, that now uncurls
Even as an adder, when she doth unroll
To do some fatal execution?
Vengeance is in my heart, death in my hand,
Blood and revenge are hammering in my head."

Titus Andronicus.

The banks of the Wandoo, in South Carolina, display some of the most diversified and beautiful scenery that is to be found in any part of the Southern States. The rich soil along the banks of this river, is possessed by opulent planters, who reside almost constantly on their extensive plantations, surrounded by crowds of slaves, and display all that easy luxury, and free hospitality, for which the Carolinian planters have been so long and so justly famed.

Of all the planters in that district, few ranked higher than Mr. Bellgrove of Bellgrove, whose family connexions extended far and near throughout the State. Mr. Bellgrove had taken the lead in society around him, until, in a predatory incursion of the Cherokee Indians, his plantation had been destroyed; and his only son—a youth of much promise—seized and carried away by the savages. From that hour no tidings were heard of the fate of the young man; and the melancholy event was soon followed by the death of Mrs. Bellgrove, whom grief for the loss of her son hurried to an early grave. Sick of the world, Mr. Bellgrove retired from society, and secluded himself on his own estate, shunning all intercourse with his wealthy neighbours, and leaving the management of his plantation to his kinsman and overseer, Mr. Joolay—a rude, unpolished Kentuckian—who ruled with despotic sway over the negro slaves intrusted to his care.

Early one morning, about two years after the destruction of Bellgrove Plantation by the Indians, two negroes were plying their hatchets on the trunk of a tree close by the banks of the Wandoo. One of them was a noble-looking youth, of remarkable regularity and beauty of features. Unlike the generality of the negro race, his figure was handsomely formed, and shown to much advantage by the neat arrangement of his dress, which was of finer materials than that commonly worn by slaves. His companion—who was attired in the ordinary slave-dress—was a chubby, merry-faced, blubber-lipped, flat-nosed negro, who seemed to love laughter and good cheer, and to cherish a thorough negro antipathy to labour; which latter feeling he evinced by repeatedly laying down his hatchet, and stretching his limbs, with a yawn which displayed his capacious mouth from ear to ear.

"Come, Whackie, you must get forward with your work before Mr. Joolay comes round," said his fellow-labourer: "you can't be tired already."

"I is always tire ob dis work," said Whackie, reluctantly resuming his hatchet. "I wish Massa Joolay was at de debil wid all a heart. 'Tis bery kind ob you Zama to come and help I so—but how you like dis workee workee all day?"

"Well enough," answered Zama, "if I saw our poor fellow-negroes looked upon as men and Christians."

"Goley, Zama!" cried Whackie, "Buccra tin!

we nigger is no men: and den what right hab nigger for be Christine?"

"Alas!" sighed Zama, "there is nothing but oppression for the poor negro race."

"Goley!" chuckled Whackie, "if dat be nigger wages, we is always well paid!"

"I grieve to say that you are right," answered Zama, deeply sighing.

"Well," said Whackie, after a pause, "you tink dat Massa Joolay sall go to heben?"

"All good men go there," answered Zama.

"Ah! boy, but Massa Joolay no good man. I tink um go oder place, an' poor nigger flog um when um is dere. I no like for workee; but Massa Joolay make me workee like a slave!"

"And what are you but a slave?" said Zama. Nothing provokes a negro quicker than to be called a slave, as the name sounds, even in his ears, like an insult; and Whackie, enraged at the epithet, threw down his hatchet, exclaiming, "Come, boy! no call decen' people names. Lookee, Zama, I no work anoder stroke; an' Massa Joolay may go dam for I!"

"Mr. Joolay," said Zama, "may miss the sound of your axe, and make you feel his whip."

This hint had the desired effect; and Whackie, taking up his axe again, growled,

"'Workee work from morn till night;
Why should black man stoop to white?'

If I was been born planta', an' hab white slave, Lor! how I flog 'em up!" and indulging in this fancy, he plied his hatchet with redoubled vigour, till Zama suddenly ceased working, and gazing earnestly at a small clump of cypress trees, motioned to Whackie to be silent.

"Wot you look at?" inquired Whackie.

"Hush!" said Zama, "there is an Indian lurking in the underwood."

"Oh Lor!" exclaimed Whackie, in a fit of terror, as he concealed himself behind a tree. "Hide, Zama, hide! he shoot like de debil!"

The Indian finding they had observed him, advanced from the thicket. His dress was that of a chieftain of the Cherokee tribe: deer-skin leggans were laced tightly to his shape, while a shirt of beautifully-wrought stuff descended to his knees; his moccasins were trimmed with the skin of the rattlesnake; and a large blanket hung, in not inelegant folds, like a mantle at his back, over which streamed his long, glossy, coarse black hair. The negroes instantly perceived that he bore on his face the streak of war-paint; his wampum belt sustained a huge scalping-knife and a glittering tomahawk, and in his hand he bore a long Kentuckian rifle. With bounding proud step the Indian approached the negroes.

"Peace," said he, extending his hand and lowering the barrel of his rifle; "peace: the Red Indian seeks not the blood of the black slave."

Whackie, on hearing this assurance, recovered his courage, and stepping from his hiding-place, sulkily said, "Why you lurk in a bush? why you frighten poor nigger like I?"

The lip of the Indian curled with contempt as he eyed the negro from head to foot.

"Slave," said he haughtily, "where is the nearest plantation?"

Nettled at the Indian's sneer, and yet frightened at the fiery sparkling of his hawk-like eyes, Whackie sullenly muttered, "Look for him; de first plantation you come to will be de nearest."

The Indian enraged at the insolent answer, and seemingly acquainted with the tenderest part of a negro's frame, suddenly brought the heavy barrel of his rifle in rude contact with the shins of Master Whackie; and that so forcibly, that the poor fellow sprang in the air, and catching hold of the affected part, shrieked with pain and anger, while he pirouetted round on the other splay-foot with the agility of an opera-dancer. "Yeh!" he roared, "yeh! wot is dat?—oh! you dam red tief! yeh! oh Lor! you cus' red waggybone, wot you mean?" The Indian grasped his tomahawk; but Zama, raising his hatchet, threw himself between his companion and the enraged Indian.

"You came with peace on your lips," cried Zama. "Begone then; pass on your way in peace."

"It is good," said the Indian, replacing his tomahawk. "Let there be peace between us. Poor slave," he continued, stroking Whackie's woolly head, "the Red Indian will not harm you."

"Go to de debil, you dam red tief. You break my shin, an' say you no harm me!" was the angry sobbing response of Whackie, as, holding up his cucumber-shaped leg to Zama, he bitterly cried, "Look a' dat Zama, see how he swell!"

Zama expressed his sorrow, and assured Whackie that there was no danger; when the Indian, addressing Zama, inquired, "What is your master's name?"

"Bellgrove," answered Zama.

The eyes of the Indian glowed, as he hastily said —"His plantation is called Bellgrove also. Is it the same Bellgrove whose plantation was destroyed some seasons ago, and whose son was carried away?"

"It is," answered Zama, as he sternly eyed the Indian; "and the Cherokee tribe will yet suffer for the foul deed."

"Have you seen the youth lately?" inquired the Cherokee, eagerly; "he left the wigwams of the Indian to return to his home; has he come? is he well?"

Notwithstanding the assumed composure of the Indian, Zama could easily perceive that there was some deep design labouring in his mind; and he accordingly answered, "The Red Indian comes with a lying tongue. We believe him not. The Cherokees are too bloody to spare the young pale face."

"Then the youth has not returned?" said the Indian.—"No," rejoined Zama.

"Ha!" shouted the Indian, "the young snake has not escaped from the forest yet; he is yet in the power of the Red Cherokee!" With a joyous shout he flourished his rifle in the air, and the wild woods rang with his horrid war-whoop.

"If it is to injure my noble master that you speed thither, you quit not this spot with life!" cried Zama, rushing on the Indian.

"Ay!" cried Whackie, starting up and flourishing his axe, "we do for you. You may kill Massa Joolay, but no harm Massa heshef!"

With a loud war-cry, the Indian bounded forward; and, eluding the grasp of the negroes, with the swiftness of the stag he darted through the mazes of the dark forest, pursued by Zama and Whackie.

After a hard chase, the two negroes reached the clearings of the plantation, and in one of the fields observed Mr. Bellgrove walking with Mr. Joolay.

"Thank heaven," cried Zama, "my dear master is safe."

"No be too sure ob dat," panted Whackie, who had ran till he was out of breath: "look, Zama, yonder de red rogue, see he take a bush an' aim him rifle at Massa; oh run, Zama; you, me run, come, come!"

Both rushed to the spot where the Indian lurked; and before he could take a deliberate aim at his intended victim, Zama hurled his hatchet at the savage, and struck him down with the blow. Whackie flew forward and would have completed the victory by chopping off the head of the Indian, but Zama withheld him. "Shame, shame!" he urged, "he cannot harm us now. Why butcher a helpless foe?"

"Ha, ha!" cried Whackie, struggling to get at the Indian; "he no scruple for take my scalp, an' why I no take him head? You tink if de red rascal get up he tank you for knock um down? He shoot you, and scalp you too, for be so werry kind."

While Zama was endeavouring to prevent Whackie from fulfilling his fierce intent, the Indian, recovering from the sudden effect of the blow, slowly brought his rifle to bear on Mr. Bellgrove, and fired; then instantly springing to his feet, hurled his tomahawk at Zama; but Whackie rushed between his friend and the weapon, the handle of which, in its whirl, encountered the head of Whackie with irresistible force, and stretched him at full length on the ground. Zama instantly caught up Whackie's hatchet, and darted on the Indian, who, drawing his long scalping-knife, attempted to grapple with the negro; who, avoiding his grasp, struck him a violent blow on the right arm, which caused the knife to drop from his hand; and ere he could recover it, the gripe of the negro compressed the throat of the savage, and snatching up the knife, Zama plunged it into the body of his foe.

A number of negroes led by Mr. Bellgrove and the overseer reached the spot, and were amazed at beholding Zama standing with the blood-stained weapon in his hand, over the prostrate Cherokee.

"Zama," cried the overseer, "what means this? who fired at your master?"

Zama turned to Mr. Bellgrove, and pointing to the Indian said, "He would have taken your life, my dear master; but you are safe!"

"Thanks, my faithful Zama," said Mr. Bellgrove. "I will reward your gallant conduct; but is this Whackie? Is the poor fellow dead?"

"He no dead yet, Massa," said Whackie, slowly sitting up and scratching his woolly pate; "only got rap on a head; he ring like an old dry calabash; only leely bruise: too tick for crack!"

"My poor fellow, I am afraid that you are seriously hurt," said Mr. Bellgrove.

"Oh no, Massa," said Whackie, rising up, as he screwed his mouth with pain; "no hurt much; only noise in a ears; dat all. Oh! de dam red tief, was gib me such rap!" And he squeezed his head all round with his hands, as if to restore it to a proper shape again.

"The Indian appears to be dead," said Mr. Bellgrove.—"He no more dead as I," cried Whackie; "he lie 'tiff an' quiet; but neber say Indine dead till um head off."

Mr. Bellgrove looked at the Indian, and seemed violently agitated.

"Mr. Joolay," said he to the overseer, "do you remember the Indian chief who headed the attack on the night my plantation was destroyed?"

"I marked him sure enough," said Joolay. "I shot part of his cheek away; and, if I guess aright, there he lies. 'Tis Moonakah, the Cherokee chief." The Indian slowly raised his head, while the blood oozed fast from his wounds. "Who spoke of Moonakah?" he feebly asked.

"Oh! tell me of my son!" exclaimed Mr. Bellgrove, as he stooped, and, supporting the Indian, endeavoured to stanch his wounds. The Indian faintly smiled; and, speaking with difficulty, said—

"The Red Indian hated the pale faces, and sought to destroy them. A slave has humbled the pride of the Cherokees. The deer shall bound through the dark forest unhurt—Moonakah's rifle is silent, his bow is unstrung."

"Your wounds will be attended to," said Mr. Bellgrove; "you will live and return to your tribe—only tell me of the fate of my son."

The Indian frowned as he feebly answered, "White man, the fawn of thy bosom hath fled from the wigwams of the Indian. He cannot escape—death stalks before the Red Cherokee—ruin is in his train—blood must flow in torrents ere the Red Cherokee seeks the shadows of the dark forest again!" He endeavoured to raise the notes of a warlike death-song; but the mild look of Mr. Bellgrove calmed the fierce spirit of the Indian, and faintly muttering, "I have pursued the young pale face, thy son, with my Braves: even now they surround him—they shall not all fall like Moonakah." With a faint sigh he sunk back into the arms of his supporter, swooning from loss of blood.

"Raise him," said Mr. Bellgrove; "carry him gently to the mansion-house, and let his wounds be properly attended to."

"If you would take my advice," cried Mr. Joolay, "you'd throw him into the Wandoo."

"Silence," said Mr. Bellgrove. "He brings me tidings of my long-lost boy, therefore he must be well treated. Now, my friends," continued he, addressing the negroes, "we must to the woods, and search for your young master; he cannot be far off: and, mark my words—The first negro who brings me intelligence of my son shall be rewarded with Freedom!"

"Freedom!" shouted Zama, stepping suddenly forward. "Freedom!—Oh! rapture! Come, my friends, to the forest! Let every swamp and every thicket be explored. Liberty is our reward!"

To his amazement the negroes shrank back and regarded him with sullen angry looks.

"Are ye men?" cried Zama; "hear ye not a father asking for his child—your own master, too; and will you not aid him? Are ye Africans? Ye base dogs! ye are only fit for the whip and the chain: will no one follow me?"

"I go with you," cried a stalwart negro, advancing; but this volunteer was instantly collared by a coarse-looking, blubber-lipped negress, who nearly strangled him with the fury of her gripe as she yelled, "Yeh! oh! you blacka waggybone; you want a go free, an' leave you bootiful wife and you lubely piccaninny!"

"Hold you tongue, Sally," remonstrated the negro, struggling to get away from her; "no 'front me 'fore de whole plantation. See, Massa be angry."

"Let him go, Muma Sally," said Mr. Bellgrove; "if any negro brings me tidings of my son, the negro shall not only obtain his own freedom, but the freedom of his wife and family also."

"No, no, Massa," cried the negress, "no free—no free. Joey go free, Joey go lazy—wife an' piccaninny go starve. No free—no free!"

And the cry of "No free!" arose from the whole sable mob around.

"Pardon me, Sir," said Mr. Joolay, respectfully addressing Mr. Bellgrove. "Your excited feelings cause you to forget the negro character. In the first place, these fellows can do nothing of themselves. In the second place, effectual aid must be obtained, otherwise we are lost. With your permission, therefore, I will proceed to the city, and inform the Governor of this outbreak of the Indians, and request a few companies of Cadet Rifles to scour the woods. In the meantime, send on to Myrtlegrove, and cause your niece to alarm her plantations, and set her negroes to coöperate with your own in watching the clearings till aid arrives. Let your own negroes be well-armed, and a few bands of them be dispersed amongst the thickets to give the alarm. No fear of the Indians harming them; they know the negroes' scalps are no honour, so wont touch them."

"You are right," said Mr. Bellgrove: "proceed instantly to the city; take eight good rowers with you—you will soon reach it. Zama, proceed you to Myrtlegrove and spread the alarm. Request my niece to send out her negroes to cover my son's escape. Mr. Joolay will call at Myrtlegrove on his return, and see that effectual measures are taken. I will arm my own servants, and scour the woods myself at their head."

Zama's countenance became joyful again as he said, "I will strike through the forest, and soon reach Miss Bellgrove's plantation."

"You please, Massa," cried Whackie, "I go wid Zama?"

"If you think you are able, go. Remember, watch the woods well; bring me tidings of my son, and freedom is your reward."

Zama, with an exclamation of joy, caught Whackie in his arms, and cried, "Oh! Whackie, we will yet be free."

"Much good dat do we, eh?" said Whackie, disengaging himself from the embrace of his friend. "Wot use for be free? Massa," continued he, addressing Mr. Bellgrove, "I no like a be free—I no want a be free."

"Why not, my good lad?" inquired Mr. Bellgrove.

Whackie's blubber lip seemed to dangle over his chin with a ludicrous expression of sorrow as he answered, "'Cause, Massa, free nigger hab to work for um wittals; an' when he fall sick, nobody care for um; free nigger no respectable; oder nigger laugh at um: no, no, Massa, you please I no want a be free."

"But, my good lad, you will still remain with me, and I will be your friend and protector," said Mr. Bellgrove.

"Hi!" cried Whackie, joyfully, "dat be oder ting; but wot if Massa Joolay flog I den?"

"Knock him down," cried Zama; "the lash touches not the free!"

"Den, Massa, I want a be free," said Whackie. "I say, Zama," continued he, with a chuckling laugh, addressing his friend in an under tone, "Goley! how I like to hab de pleasure of knock down Massa Joolay!"

"Every man to his duty!" cried Mr. Bellgrove; and instantly the negroes rushed into the thickets.

CHAPTER II.

"There's a splendid day for yellow fever," said Lieutenant Galliard to Captain Charles Waldenberg, as they sauntered along the piazza in front of the Governor's house in Carlville.—"Ay, or roasting eggs i' the sand," responded the captain. "This is no day for reviewing the troops. I'd as soon go through drill in a baker's oven."

"It seems," said Galliard, "that we're to have hot work somehow. What can the Governor mean by sending for us so hurriedly?"

"I can't tell; but here he comes; he will explain it himself."

"Good morning, gentlemen," said the Governor, as he advanced to meet them. "Have you heard anything of this outbreak of the Cherokees?"

The young officers answered that they had heard nothing of it.

"As yet," said the Governor, "it is merely a rumour; nor has aught transpired to confirm it. A number of the Cherokees recently entered the State, and advanced close to the city on pretence of trading; but it seems they have now broke into open warfare, thinking that we are not prepared for them. Captain Waldenberg, I regret that that unfortunate duel between your brother the colonel and Major Maitland should deprive me of the service of two such gallant officers at such a crisis."

"I am happy to learn," answered the captain, "that Major Maitland is now fully recovered from the effects of his wound. My brother has been self-exiled too long; but I am in hourly expectation of his return."

"I rejoice to hear such news," said the Governor; "but in the meantime it is my wish that your brigade of rifles be in readiness to repel any attack which the Indians may be inclined to make."

Assuring him of their readiness to obey his wishes, the young officers received their instructions from the Governor, and were about to take leave, when Captain Waldenberg, looking down the avenue, exclaimed, "As I live, here comes old Joolay, waddling like an overgrown Muscovy duck."

"I see he has got that eternal coach-whip with him," said Galliard; "I should like to know how many lazy negroes have felt it during his progress through the streets."

"His presence bodes no good," said the Governor, hastily.

"One-half of the negroes in town will swear to that," said the captain, laughing.

"Excuse me, gentlemen," said the Governor; "I will go and meet him. He seems fatigued. Don't leave till I return." So saying, he hurried down the piazza stairs, and advanced to meet the overseer.

"What does Joolay's face look like?" inquired Galliard of his merry companion, as they watched the approach of that worthy.

"It has been sadly bungled in the making," answered the captain: "Nature, in sculpturing his nose, seems to have missed the chissel, and flattened his features with her mallet, leaving the brow and chin protruding most ludicrously."

"True," said the lieutenant, smiling; "and, by way of amending her blunder, Nature placed a fiery carbuncle where the nose should be, and which the owner nourishes most carefully with brandy and water."

"Did you ever see such a dress?" said the captain; "his nankeen coat and trousers would contain half-a-dozen ordinary-sized men, and his sombréro might thatch a negro hut. Here he comes; keep your gravity—he's a dead shot, and I have no desire that he should try his skill at my corpus."

"Sarvant, gentlemen," roared Joolay, as he waddled towards them. "Warm weather this for running in, ain't it? Tarnation hot, I guess, for agoing through the millinery evolutions!"

"Ay, or flogging lazy negroes, Mr. Joolay," cried the captain. "Any of your negroes ran away, that you have galloped to town so fast?"

"No, no," answered Joolay, taking off his huge sombréro, and wiping the perspiration from his face with the lining of it. "The Indgines are down on us bang slam; we want you chaps up to shoot a lot of 'em."

"We are always ready to oblige our friends, Mr. Joolay," said the captain.

"Then, gentlemen, it is time your Rifles were advancing," said the Governor. "Give orders to sound to arms." The young officers bowed and took leave.

The sound of the bugles were heard through every quarter of the city; and the citizens hurried to ascertain the cause of so sudden a call to arms. Merchants, planters, and store-keepers were running along the streets towards the Exchange—all seemed noise and confusion. The haughty Spaniard paused in his promenade, twirled his moustaches, pulled the cigar from his mouth, and muttering "Que ruido es este?" stalked on. The lively Frenchman jumped quickly round, and listening to the clang of the bugles, exclaimed, "Ha! preparatifs de guerre!" as he rubbed his hands with glee. Young Carolinians were seen rushing with speed through the streets, with flushed cheeks, and eagerness and joy sparkling in their eyes. The negroes looked around with distended eyes and mouth, and wondered—"Wot de debil is de row!" while the Catabaw Indian started forward—clutched his bow and arrows with firmer grasp, and drawing his blanket closer around him, sought the outskirts of the city. Americans of every state—Scotch, English, Irish, Spaniards, French, Germans, Italians, Israelites, Indians, Africans, men of every clime and every tongue, were crowded at the Exchange, all eager to know the cause of alarm—when suddenly the Carolinian Cadets, in their elegant uniforms, with their dreaded Kentuckian rifles in their hands, were seen hurrying to their place of rendezvous, and the mounted brigade galloping along at full speed: the alarm was now explained—the Cadets were called out to repel the Cherokees.

The Governor and Joolay stood in the verandah of the Governor's house, watching the gathering of the troops as they rapidly formed on the lawn; and in a short time, four hundred as noble-looking and as gallant-hearted youths as ever breathed, were drawn up in warlike array, ready and eager to advance upon the foe.

"Look, Mr. Joolay," said the Governor, as his voice trembled with emotion, and the tear glistened in his eye; "are they not a noble set of young men? Do they not look like members of one family?"

"I shouldn't like to be the father of such a family!" growled Joolay.

"Is it not a pity that such gallant youths should fall in such a warfare as this, with these savages?" continued the Governor.

"Better for them to be fighting the Red Cherokees, than fighting duels with each other," answered Joolay. "Lord bless you, Sir, they're all as merry at the idea, as if they were going to shoot squirrels. Hillo!" he cried, "what's ado now?" as two mounted officers galloped up from different directions in front of the troops, and, dismounting from their horses, advanced and embraced each other amid the cheers of the brigade.

"Nobly done!" exclaimed the Governor. "It is Waldenberg and Maitland. I am happy that Waldenberg is returned, and still happier at this reconciliation. Now the young sparks will follow them in the face of all danger. Come, Mr. Joolay, it is time they were getting orders."

The Governor, followed by Joolay, approached towards the corps, and the officers gathering around him, awaited his instructions.

"Colonel Waldenberg," said the Governor, "your presence is unexpected, and it affords me much pleasure to behold you again."

"It is not an hour since I arrived in the city," said the colonel. "Indeed, I had but brief time to arm and gallop hither."

"Major Maitland, I am heartily glad to see you at your post again," said the Governor, addressing

Maitland; "but see that your health can stand this campaign."

"My life," said the major, bowing, "is at my country's service."

The officers having received their instructions, fell back, and took their stations by their different companies. The order was given to advance. Amid deafening cheers the star-spangled banner was unfurled—the band struck up the favourite national air; and, amid prayers and blessings, the gallant youths marched forward to meet their savage enemy.

The Cadet brigade marched through the shady avenues of the city, and, having passed the lines, struck into the open country. The day, as before remarked, was sultry—not a cloud was visible in the heavens: the vultures soared high in the air, till they seemed like small specks flitting in the clear blue sky. The mocking-bird was wheeling his restless flight from bush to bush, warbling in a thousand different notes, and seemingly endued with a sincere love of mischief. Now imitating the warbling of the crested red bird, he would cause numbers of them to forsake their perching places, and fly towards him; but no sooner were they nigh him, than he changed his notes to the fierce cry of the hawk, and caused the terrified warblers to fly for safety, till he in turn was obliged to drop his ill-timed mockery, and, with an ill-natured chirp, hop to the root of the bush, to save himself from the real hawk brought forward by his cries.

The brigade soon entered the bowery paths of the forest. The sunbeams, mellowed by the leafy canopy, spread a rich golden hue around; the lovely jasmine, twining from tree to tree, threw forth its brilliant flowers like a gay drapery; while the clustering vines, clambering around the trunks of the cedar and myrtle, hung in rich festoons, heavily laden with large clusters of grapes, as if inviting the thirsty passer-by to pluck and eat; the smilax, twisting from branch to branch, looked like triumphal arches gaily scattered throughout the forest;—flowers of every form and hue, exhaling perfume, seemed to captivate the senses; while the royal palms and gorgeous magnolias, towering like monarchs of the sylvan scene, showed nature in her richest and most splendid trappings. Guarded by alert skirmishers in the front, on each flank, and in the rear, scattered throughout the forest to rouse any ambuscade of their wily foes, the main body of the Cadets advanced joyously and fearlessly through the lovely scenes of their native land.

CHAPTER III.

Having seen the forces depart, Joolay bade the Governor good-by, and sauntered along the shady streets towards the beach, to regain his canoe. The deep shade of the Pride-of-India, and orange trees, which lined the footpath, could not prevent the overgrown overseer from being oppressed by the excessive heat, which had the effect of making him unusually crabbed. Joolay had a mortal antipathy to "lubberly negroes" wasting their time; and so well-known was he to the sable race, that a glimpse of his figure was quite enough to make a negro run homewards. It so happened that, on turning the corner of Market Street, he stumbled on three clumsy negroes, busy at a game of marbles, with their baskets filled with provisions lying on the ground. Negroes are all fond of gambling; and, whatever may be the game they engage in, their whole soul seems centred in it while they play. So intent were these negroes on their diversion, that they did not observe the approach of their enemy, who, grasping his long whip more firmly, slyly slipped up to them.

"Ah! you tief, Jupita', play fair!" roared one of the gamblers, who appeared to be the losing party; "play fair. Cus you eye!—knucka down—knucka down—no go for cheat!"

"I'll knuckle down ye, you lazy rascals!" cried Joolay, rushing at them, and plying his long whip about their shins. The gamblers instantly began a fandango, yelling in concert, and rubbing their legs; but no sooner did they recognise the hateful face of their assailant, than each, snatching up his market-basket, fled in a different direction, leaving Joolay master of the field; who, like all other conquerors, instantly seized upon the spoils of the vanquished, and pocketed the marbles which the negroes, in their hurry and alarm, had forgotten.

"One, two, three, four," he muttered, as he picked up the trophies of his victory. "Lazy vagabonds, I'll marble them!—five, six, seven, ay, a dozen—that's winning the game, I guess."

So saying, he waddled on his way, till he reached one of the most retired streets in the city, leading to the upper part of the beach. He had not proceeded far along this street, till he encountered a smart-looking negro, who attempted to take the wall of the overseer in passing. Joolay instantly stopped, stared the negro in the face, and uttered a fierce oath.

"Beg pardon, Massa," said the negro; "I want to pass you."

"How dare you take the wall of me?" roared Joolay.

"Because you fill up all de rest of de pave!" answered the negro, grinning broadly in his face.

"You're an impudent dog, and I've a mind to——" Here Joolay flourished his whip very scientifically at the negro; but happening to place his foot on a trap-door in the pavement, leading to a cellar, the door gave way beneath his weight, and Joolay was precipitated into the cellar, where he lay wallowing in mud. With a look of amazement, the negro beheld the sudden and unexpected exit of the overseer; but summoning up his courage, he cautiously peeped into the cellar.

"Help me out, you darned nigger—help me out!" roared Joolay, in a fury.

"Hu—hu—hu!" shouted the negro, in a convulsion of laughter. "Look at de old Buccra—hu—hu—hu! Um be catch like an old rat in a trap!" he shrieked and laughed, till he could no longer stand; and, throwing himself down on the street, rolled in the sand, exclaiming, "Oh dear! —hu—hoo! Oh lor! I sall die wid laughee!"

The mirth of the negro added fresh fuel to Joolay's rage. Scrambling out of the cellar without hat or wig, he regained the pavement, and looked around for the object of his wrath. The street was perfectly deserted—not a creature was visible.

"Darn him!" exclaimed Joolay, "he's off. No—by the 'ternal here he is!" And there the negro lay at the root of a Pride-of-India tree, holding his sides, and gasping for breath.

"Who the devil was you laughing at?" roared Joolay, springing on the negro, and seizing him firmly by the neck.

"Take care, Massa," bellowed blackie; "I is a free nigger!"

"A free devil!" cried Joolay; "I'll shake the black soul out of your sooty carcass!"—and the overseer bade fair to put his threat into execution. "You 'll laugh, will ye?—at me, will ye?" he roared, as he shook the negro almost to pieces.

"Oh! no, Massa," cried the sufferer; "I no laugh—no, Massa—neber laugh no more!"

"If you do, I——"

Here the overseer was interrupted by the clattering of a horse's hoofs beside him, and a stern loud voice exclaimed, "White monster—unhand the poor African!"

Joolay looked up. The horse was curvetting right over him. A dark face peered on him—a heavy blow descended on his head, and Joolay rolled in the dust, stunned and insensible.

The rescued negro started up and gazed on his deliverer, who was a handsome, haughty-looking negro, attired in a rich Mameluke dress, and mounted on a beautiful and spirited courser.

"Oh, Perault!" exclaimed the poor fellow, with a burst of joy; "can it, indeed, be you?"

"Ay," rejoined his sable auxiliary; "Perault, indeed. Who else of all our race durst strike that monster down?"

"I fear dat you have killed him," said the negro, trembling, as he looked at the prostrate form of the overseer.

"I care not if I have," cried Perault. "If you and the rest of our oppressed race would do the like, our proud tyrants would become the fewer. But, quick—drag his carcass out of the way."

"What can I do?" inquired the negro, looking more and more frightened and perplexed.

"Toss him into that cellar, and leave him," answered Perault, pointing to the one from which Joolay had immediately before emerged. With much difficulty the negro dragged the overseer to the cellar, and tumbled him in.

"Will I shut de door on him?" he inquired. "If he come 'live again, and find heshef in de dark, he sall get good fright!"

"No," said Perault, hastily, "leave the door as it is; if he is found, his fall will be attributed to chance. Now, mark me—not a word of this adventure to any one, if you value your life. Farewell!" He dashed his rowels into his horse's side, and galloped off at full speed, while the rescued blackie sneaked quickly away.

Some time elapsed ere Joolay recovered his senses. A loud tingling in his ears caused him to think he heard a thousand bells ringing; and he was puzzled to conceive where he was, till, by degrees, his ideas arranged themselves, and putting his hand to his crown, he found the bump of knock-downism very largely developed.

"I recollect," he soliloquized, "of tumbling into this darned cellar; but then I got out again to thrash that whoreson nigger, and then I remember of a black rascal riding me down; but how I got into this tarnation hole again, confound me if I can guess."

So saying, he groped about, and finding his hat and wig, which he adjusted, grasped his whip; and scrambling out of the cellar, with sore bones and an aching head, he proceeded towards the beach. On reaching the shore Joolay looked about for his attendants, and beheld them diverting themselves with the little land-crabs, chasing them into the holes in the sand. The negroes were so intent on their sport, that they had forgotten the receding of the tide, which had left their canoe high and dry on the land: no sooner, however, did they observe Joolay, than they rushed helter-skelter into the canoe, and each of them laying hold of it by the side, began to pull and haul with all their force, to get it into the water again, encouraging each other with loud shouts.

"Did ever mortal man see such jackasses!" exclaimed Joolay. "Jump out of the canoe, every devil of ye, and push it into the water before you."

The negroes instantly obeyed him, and, to their great delight, the canoe was once more afloat. "Now," cried Joolay, as he nestled himself in the canoe for a snooze, "row to Myrtlegrove, and don't utter a word till you are there—row like lightning,' ye black boobies!" and the grinning negroes plied their paddles with vigour.

CHAPTER IV.

The Columbian mail-coach, or, properly speaking, cart, was rumbling along a sandy road through a dark part of the forest, with two inside passengers—a young lady, and an elderly gentleman.

"I wish," exclaimed the gentleman; rather testily, "that Government would pay a little more attention to the roads in the State. It certainly would be better to root out these plaguy stumps of trees, that stick up in the road, endangering people's lives at every jolt. I declare I am shaken all to pieces."

Here a sudden jolt tossed him nearly head foremost out of the vehicle; but his cranium coming in contact with one of the bars, another jog flung him back on his seat again.

"Plague take it!" cried he, "I've got my skull fractured."

"Do take it easy, papa," said the young lady; "that's the thirtieth time to-day you have declared that your skull was fractured—a compound fracture I suppose!"

"I shall be all fractions before I get out of this, anyhow," said the gentleman, recovering his good humour. "Ah, Letty, Letty! see what a state you have brought your poor old father to: shaken to pieces in this vile machine to please you."

The coach suddenly stopped, and the driver uttered a fierce oath.

"What is wrong?" said the young lady. "Why is the driver stopping the coach?"

"Hillo, Coachee," cried the gentleman, "anything wrong?"

"An Indgin, Sir!" roared the driver, in answer.

"An Indian; what does he want?"

"I guess, Sir, as how you ha'n't heard that the Cherokees are broken out?"

"Is it possible?" cried the gentleman, somewhat alarmed.

"Calculate as how it is," answered the driver, rolling his quid in his cheek; "and here comes one on 'em." Looking out of the vehicle, the passengers beheld a person in the Indian garb, flying with the speed of the wind towards them. On a sudden the sharp crack of a rifle was heard, and the supposed Indian, bounding forward, fell prostrate at the side of the carriage.

"Guess I've hitten him!" roared the driver, slowly reloading his rifle.

"Hit him?" cried the gentleman. "You villain, how dared you fire upon him without a cause? he is unarmed, and was giving you no provocation. Poor fellow," he continued, looking at the prostrate form before him, "he must have come a long way; see how torn his garments are.—Letty, my love, let us help him."

Quickly descending from the carriage, the lady and gentleman raised the wounded man; and, to their surprise, beheld not the red face and long coarse black hair of a Cherokee, but a face of youthful beauty, with light-brown hair curling in beautiful ringlets over a brow of purest whiteness. The wounded youth slowly opened his large dark eyes, and bent them for an instant with a look of deep anguish on the lady.

"I am no Indian," he faltered; "I am pursued:" and he sunk insensible, while the blood oozed from his mouth and nostrils.

"No Indian?" said the gentleman, deeply moved by the youth's situation. "No, I'll be sworn for it, fair boy, that no Indian blood runs in thy veins. Here," cried he to the driver, who stood very unconcerned, chewing a quid of tobacco, "here, you harsh brute, lend a hand and help him into the carriage."

"I'm daddled if I does!" exclaimed the driver; "and hark ye, old chap, tip no more jaw, or I guess I'se gotten a 'tother ball in my rifle. Besides, who pays this chap's fare? Let him lie—he won't run far?"

"Unfeeling wretch!" exclaimed the lady.

"'Tisn't manners for us free citizens of America to wallop ladies," said the driver, eyeing her with infinite contempt; "so, I guess, I doesn't fight wi' the fair sex."

"I'll pay this youth's fare," said the gentleman. "He goes with us."

"I guess you'd better tip us the blunt first," said the driver, holding out his hand for prompt payment; "two dollars and a half for carriage and trouble—not a cent less."

"There's your money," said the gentleman, paying his demands. "Now, help him into the carriage—gently now—there, that will do. Letty, take his head upon your knee—poor young fellow, how I feel for him! "Drive slow, Sir," cried he to the driver, as they set to the road again—"and you may rest assured, I shall inform Government of your wanton attack on this poor youth."

"I doesn't care a sweet 'tatie for Government," answered the driver, carelessly. "Government's more obliged to me, than me to it. I'se a free and independent citizen; and I does as I likes."

So saying, he planted himself firmly in his seat, and belaboured the poor skeletons of horses that drew the vehicle, till, to his own wonder—and no doubt the wonder of themselves—they essayed a canter.

While these transactions were taking place, Zama and Whackie had held on their way through the deep forest with the utmost speed, bounding over tangled brakes and vines, dashing through swamps and underwood. Unheeded by them was the hissing of the deadly black snake, and the threatening coil and thrilling rattle of the fiery-eyed and poisonous rattlesnake; the squirrel peeped from his leafy bower with wonder at their speed; the racoon and opposum fled to their places of shelter; while the wild-deer, starting from its covert, bounded away to the darker wilds of the forest. On a sudden Zama stopped, and grasping Whackie by the arm, pointed to the leaves which thickly strewed the ground, and exclaimed—

"See! we are close upon a large band of Indian warriors!"—"Oh, Zama! wot sall we do now?" was the alarmed inquiry, as Whackie, gazing on the ground, beheld the prints of the moccasins of the Indians. "Hush!" whispered Zama; "the trail is quite fresh—let us follow it. Slowly and cautiously now—keep close on the ground among the bushes." Crouching amongst the underwood, and gently pressing the branches aside, they proceeded for some time; when Zama, throwing himself flat on the ground, listened attentively for a few seconds, then motioning to Whackie to follow him, crawled silently to a small thicket of myrtles which commanded a view of an extensive glade. "Look there," whispered Zama, as he pointed to the opening of the forest in front of them; "there the Indians are—in possession of the road too."

Whackie looked in the direction pointed out, and beheld the Indians clustering in numbers. Their tall, erect, and noble figures; their unconstrained and elegant attitudes; their martial air, and wild commanding appearance, arrayed with their fearful weapons, might have struck terror to a firmer heart than that of poor Whackie. There stood the bravest warriors of the Cherokee tribe, among those scenes, and on the soil over which their forefathers had held undoubted sway for ages unknown; yet there, the rightful owners of the land stood as detested blood-thirsty intruders. The soil no longer owned their sway: the white man had seized upon it—driven them from their own hunting-grounds, and cooped them up, like deer in the toils. Now they had rushed from the western wilds, to make the hunting-grounds of their fathers ring once more with the wild war-whoop of the Red Cherokee, and to spread ruin and desolation throughout the land.

A shrill cry of exultation arose from the Indians

as they pressed towards the centre of the road, and a general rush ensued to a place where one of their chieftains stood. Concealed amongst the bushes the two negroes looked on with intense anxiety. "I say, Zama," whispered Whackie, "wot yon long chap wid de red fedder 'tick in him crown mean by point to de wood, den to de road, and shake him rifle?"—"Now, God help our young master!" sighed Zama, bitterly.—"Eh? dey is cotch him, eh?" inquired Whackie.

"Not yet," whispered Zama; "that seems plain from their gestures; but they have got on his trail, and, from their exulting cries, he cannot be far off. See—see," he exclaimed, as he started up; "they point along the road.—Ha! they have vanished. Now, Whackie, let us save Master Charles, or die with him!"

The negroes hurried to the spot where the Indians had previously grouped around, and the trodden leaves showed plainly, that the Cherokees had gathered from all parts of the forest to that particular spot.

"Hi! Zama, see wot a lot ob de red rogues been here!" cried Whackie, pointing to the prints of the Indians' footsteps.

"Ha!" cried Zama, stooping and looking earnestly at the sand, "here is the mark of a white man's foot."

"How you know de difference?" inquired Whackie.

"Notice," said Zama, "how the haughty tread of the Indian causes the sand to sink as he raises his step—see how the leaves and sand are pressed down at the print of the toes; yet you observe that the footstep is turned a little inward, and the mark is smooth by the moccasin—that is the Indian foot-mark. Now, look here," and he pointed to the impression of a small foot on the ground. "See how the footstep is turned outwards; and see, the person must have been running hard, for the sand is pressed forward by the front of the foot, and the mark deeply indented: it is the footstep of a white person."

"How you can tell dat?" inquired Whackie.

"As easily as I can tell the foot-mark of a common negro from that of an Indian," answered Zama; "look at the print of your own foot-mark."

Whackie raised his foot, and examined the sole of it most minutely, then looked at the broad splay mark with the long spur heel in the sand; and, thoroughly satisfied with the proof, he scratched his head and muttered, "Bery well; may be nigger foots be all alike."

"Stay!" exclaimed Zama, "here is blood. See, some one has fallen prostrate on the earth—there is foul play here. Ha! the print of horses' hoofs and carriage wheels—and see here are more foot-marks of white people. I see, it all," he cried, starting up—"he has been wounded, and fallen on the road, where some travellers have found him, and carried him on in their carriage. These red fiends know this, and like so many famished wolves, are on the track. There is a narrow foot-path through the cypress swamp which leads to the turning of the roads. Come, Whackie, redouble your speed, and get between the Red Indians and their prey!"

So saying, he dashed into the thickets at headlong speed, followed by Whackie.

CHAPTER V.

In a gorgeously decorated apartment, displaying all that wealth and luxury could heap around its occupant, there lay upon a rich ottoman, and wrapped in deep slumber, the young and beautiful heiress of Myrtlegrove. Her face was pale, and bore a deep trace of melancholy and suffering; in her silent slumber she was scarcely seen to breathe, and her pale and beautiful features seemed more like the master-piece of a skilful statuary, sculptured from the purest Parian marble, than like a form of life. The paleness of her countenance was relieved by the exquisitely arched eyebrows, and long black silken eye-lashes, and her dark hair, which lay in clustering ringlets on her neck, while the whiteness of her robes vied with the purity of her face. Over her bent a young negress, whose features, for regularity and beauty, rivalled even those of the slumbering white beauty. The dark blood was seen mantling on her cheek; nor could the glossy darkness of her skin, prevent her features from portraying the various emotions which agitated her breast. Her large gazelle-like eyes lit up the whole countenance with sensitiveness, which caused the looker-on to forget that that dark and exquisitely sweet face belonged to the oppressed African race; while the elegant figure, and beautifully-shaped foot and ancle of this negro girl, showed that Nature could lavish her skill on the despised negress, as well as on the proud and haughty white lady. In her hand the young negress held a fan of richly variegated feathers, with which she gently brushed the musquit-toes from the face of her slumbering mistress, as they buzzed around her. "My own dear lady," she murmured, as, with looks of fondness, she bent o'er the fair slumberer. "Hush! Ooknea," she continued, as an elderly Indian woman entered the apartment; "hush! she sleeps."

The Indian squaw stepped gently forward, and gazing on the pale face of the lady, murmured, "Fawn of my bosom—sleep on! And oh! may you awaken but to find new pleasures and happiness!"

Here they were startled by the loud crack of a whip, and a harsh voice beneath the front verandah, sounding like the coarse rasping of a saw, exclaiming—

"Out of my road, ye black rascals, or I'll flay you alive!"

Another loud crack of the whip, followed by the jabbering of a band of negroes, expostulating with the intruder, caused the sleeper to awaken with a start.

"Zada—Ooknea!" she exclaimed, in alarm—"what is that?"

Here another loud oath from the harsh intruder, accompanied by another loud crack of a whip, was followed by an angry exclamation of—

"Flog you own nigger, you dam buccra tief! wot you flog I for?"

"Sarve you right, you black rascal," was the response; "that's to learn you manners!"

"If flogee be good for teachee manners," roared the negro, "you hab much need for get him ten time a-day youshef!"

"You darned black son of a baboon," was the enraged rejoinder, "do you set up your tarnation jaw to me?"

A loud shout of laughter was now heard, and cries of "Run Haman, run—well done, Haman!" Hitherto the lady and her attendants had listened with silent surprise.

"It is that wretch Joolay striking the negroes," said the lady. "Zada, love, call on him to desist; tell him I wish to speak with him."

Zada hastened to the verandah, and beheld Joolay, with his long whip in his hand, giving chase to a negro footman, with about a score of other negroes at his heels, who were roaring and laughing at the race. The bulky form of the overseer, set off with his wide coat and trousers, looked like a sugar hogshead mounted on legs, and his huge hat, with a brim like an umbrella, flapped up and down, as he waddled after the negro, as if to wing him onwards. The fugitive proving too nimble for him, Joolay gave up the pursuit, as, shaking the whip at his light-heeled enemy, he shouted—"Stop till I catch ye! by the Lord Harry, I'll wallop you in style, I calculate!"

The negro instantly turned round, and began dancing in triumph; and, wriggling his body into the most ludicrous postures, he sang—

"Massa Joolay ugly face,
I neber like for see um;
Pity much him nigger case,
I shouldn't like for be um!"

Joolay's rage arose beyond all bounds, and he yelled out, "I'll make you pity your own case, you darned ourang-outang, if I catch ye!" Turning quickly round, and resolved to wreak his ill-nature on something, Joolay plied his whip right and left amongst the negroes who followed him.

"I'll give you something to laugh at, you 'tarnal caoutchou-faced yahoos!" yelled he, as the negroes flew off in all directions, cursing him in most energetic terms. Fretting and fuming with passion, Joolay drew nigh to the house, when Zada called to him.

"Well, my negro-queen," said the overseer, looking up, "what is it?"

"My lady is alarmed and displeased at your conduct," answered Zada.

"Is she, my pretty treacle-dish?" he replied—"then let her tell me that herself, and not do it by deputy. I've had enough of your complexion for one day, I guess. Blow my wig," he continued, "I think the world's coming to an end—the niggers care no more for me, than they do for an old turkey-buzzard! Here, my coal-black Venus—my pretty queen of sables," he added, as he entered the verandah, "put my sombréro and my whip out of the way—don't lose 'em though. Now, where's my Mexican rose, my lovely lily of the Wandoo—your mistress?" Zada threw open the door, and Joolay entered the apartment.

"Bless my heart, my dear Miss Bellgrove," cried he, as he looked on the pale face of the lady, "I am sorry to see you thus."

"I have been indisposed for some time," said Matilda.

"Ay, ay, so I heard," said Joolay, "ever since that duel between Colonel Waldenberg and Major Maitland."

Matilda's face flushed with anger as she sternly said, "Silence, Sir; your business here, I presume, is some message from my uncle."

"I humbly crave your pardon, Miss Bellgrove," said Joolay, "if I have hurt your feelings by my ill-timed allusions. I am plain and blunt, my dear young lady; but allow me to say, that no man would lay down life faster than old Tom Joolay, if it was to serve you."

"I believe it," said Matilda, smiling, as she held out her hand to the overseer, who pressed it in his paw, somewhat roughly.

"And now," continued Joolay, "have Zama and Whackie been here?"

Zada answered that they had not arrived.

"They should have been here some hours ago then," said Joolay; "we must to business without delay. Miss Bellgrove, you must instantly call out your negroes, and arm them well."

"Why so?" inquired Matilda, with a look of alarm.

"Because the Red Indians are on us," answered Joolay; "young Master Charles has escaped from them. The woods are filled with them in pursuit of him, and many atrocities have been committed by them."

"Has my cousin escaped?" cried Matilda, with a burst of joy.

"Alas!" said Joolay, "he is still in the woods, surrounded by the savages. One of them early this morning fired at Mr. Bellgrove; he had a narrow escape. Faith, Zada," said he, addressing the young negress, "if it hadn't been for your brother, Zama, it might have gone hard with Mr. Bellgrove. Zama did the Indian's business—knocked him down with a hatchet, and then struck him with his own scalping-knife. A capital joke! keh—keh—keh!"—and the overseer chuckled loudly at the idea.

"My cousin still in danger," cried Matilda; "the Indians at Bellgrove! Oh! Mr. Joolay, what can be done to save him?"

"Ring the alarm-bell," said Joolay. "Arm your niggers—I'll head them; the Indians are nigh, and we can keep them in check till the Rifle Cadets come up; they ought to be close at hand by this time."

"The Rifle Cadets?" said Matilda, trembling.

"Ay—I was at the city, and saw 'em march off to aid us," said Joolay. "And what's better," he continued, with a knowing look, "Colonel Waldenberg and Major Maitland lead them on!" With a piercing shriek Matilda staggered forward, "Waldenberg," she exclaimed; "Waldenberg returned—Maitland alive! Oh! old man," she continued, as she clasped her hands, and almost sunk on her knees before him, while the tears streamed fast from her eyes, "do not—do not jest with my feelings! Was not Maitland killed, and Waldenberg branded as a murderer; outlawed from his native land, and I, I the fatal cause?"

"Bless your lovely little heart!" said Joolay, coaxingly, "don't take on so. I declare you've almost set me a-crying. You'll see Waldenberg and Maitland both here, alive and happy, in half an hour!"

"Thank heaven—thank heaven!" cried Matilda, as with an hysteric sob she sank into the arms of the overseer.

"Here, Zada, help your lady," cried he; "she's fainting!"

Zada sprang forward, and took Matilda from the arms of the overseer, while Ooknea bathed her forehead with orange-flower water.

"Let me rest," said Matilda faintly; "I am better now. Oh! what a load seems removed from my heart and brain!" and her tears fell unrestrained, as she sobbed aloud on the breast of her attendant.

A distant, shrill, piercing yell, burst on their ears, and Matilda and her attendants started with horror and affright; even Joolay stood transfixed with amazement. Again the yell arose, so shrill, so horrifying, that it curdled the blood at the heart of the hearers.

"What means that fearful cry?" inquired Matilda, in an almost inaudible whisper.

"Now the Great Spirit defend us!" exclaimed Ooknea. "'Tis the war cry of the Red Cherokee!"

"'Sdeath!" roared Joolay, "what am I standing here for! Ring the alarm-bell—arm the niggers—where will I get a rifle?"

"This way," cried Zada; "the armoury is on your left hand; there is the key—I will alarm the negroes."

The loud peals of the bell rang through the plantation, and the negroes rushed in crowds to the mansion-house; when Joolay, armed with a long Kentuckian rifle, appeared in front of the verandah; and beckoning to the negroes to draw nigher, cried with a loud voice—

"Hearee, boys! the Red Indians are coming to kill your Missee: will you fight for her and save her?"

"Yes! yes! we all fight—we all die for Missee!" was the loud and hearty answer.

"Then," cried Joolay, "all you that have got guns, go and bring them, with your powder and shot—I'll give you plenty more when you want it; all you that have no guns, come here and you'll get them."

Many of the negroes were allowed to keep fowling-pieces, to shoot racoons and wild-turkeys; and, hurrying to their huts, they speedily returned armed for the conflict, while Joolay rapidly distributed what rifles and other arms he could get amongst the rest. Women and children came crowding forward to fight for "Missee;" and hatchets and sharp-pointed poles were flourishing in every direction. Joolay soon mustered those who had fire-arms, and found himself at the head of more than a hundred stout fellows.

"Now," said he, "let forty of you arrange yourselves in the upper verandah, and draw down the blinds, except one or two that you can see to fire through; the rest, along with me, will meet them on the lawn. If we are beaten back to the house, then fire from the verandahs down upon the Indians, and give us time to rally again."

"'Top, Massa," cried one of the negroes, "dere be one great big gun in de cella'."

"Bring it out!" cried Joolay; and to his joy the negroes dragged forth a small field-piece.

"Massa use for keep um for fire on grand days," cried another negro.

"Then load it now, and fire at the Indians," cried Joolay, as he helped to load the piece to the very muzzle.

There was a small grove of orange and citron trees near the avenue, which commanded the front of the mansion; here Joolay posted his forces.

"Now, my lads," cried he, "you must fight like devils. Recollect you are fighting for your lives and liberties——No, no, that's a mistake," he cried, checking himself as he beheld the negroes gaping and staring at the idea of their fighting for Liberty, a thing they never dreamed of. "Fighting for your lives and your lovely young Missee!"

"Yes, yes, we all fight for Missee!" was again the cry.

CHAPTER VI.

The yells of the Indians were drawing nigher and louder every moment, mixed with a loud rumbling sound which Joolay could not account for.

"Hark!" cried one of the negroes, "the sound of chariot wheels."

"Stand firm, my boys," cried Joolay; "here they come."

Louder and louder arose the Indian war-whoop, and a carriage dashed like lightning down the avenue, and wheeled through the centre of the negroes, who opened their ranks to make way for it. It passed so rapidly, that Joolay could only get a glimpse of the horses covered with foam, and the driver and two black faces on the coach-box. He had but little time for reflection; for, like a legion of demons broke loose from pandemonium, the Cherokees came on hard after the carriage.

"Fire!" roared Joolay; and the negroes poured in a well-directed volley on the pursuers. The foremost fell, strewed on the ground like leaves shaken by the wind. The check was so sudden, so unexpected, that the Indians for an instant wavered and turned; but one of their chieftains rushing to their front flourished his rifle, and pointing to the gallant little band of defenders, raised his horrific war-whoop, and urged the Indians on.

"Tarnation!" cried Joolay, "that chap must be done for, or we're all dished."

So saying, he levelled his rifle at the chief and fired. The shot told well; for the Indian, staggering backwards, sunk upon his hand and knee; then striving to regain his feet, again he fell, but fastened his eyes on Joolay with a look of rage, which made his eyes glitter like those of an enraged rattlesnake.

"No joke that," said Joolay, as his cheek blanched a little when he saw the Indian take aim at him: "I wish I was ahind a tree!"

"Stand out the way," shouted a voice behind the overseer, "till I give that there chap his gruel." A shot whistled past Joolay's ear, and struck the Indian in the forehead, and he fell prostrate, his limbs quivering in the agonies of death.

"Ha! that 's saved your bacon, my old cock," cried our friend the mail-driver, as he hit Joolay a hearty slap on the shoulder.

"I'm certainly much obliged t'ye for't," answered the overseer joyfully.

"Is this here thing loaded?" said the driver, pointing to the cannon.

"Yes," answered Joolay.

"Then tip us the match and stand clear." So saying, the driver applied the match to the touch-hole: bang went the piece, and a fearful cry amongst the Indians told of its fatal effects; while the cannon rebounded, and, as if rejoicing at the deed, threw a somerset amongst the negroes, some of whose legs it nearly broke. The cannon shot was answered by the shrill blast of a trumpet in the forest. "Hurrah!" roared Joolay, in a delirium of joy; "we're safe! The Cadets—the Cadets!"

All was hurry and alarm now amongst the Cherokees; and instead of rallying to the attack, they began to pick up their killed and wounded warriors, and prepare for flight.

"Another volley," cried Joolay, "and then charge on the red rascals!"

Another volley was poured in upon the retreating Cherokees; and Zama, with a hatchet in his hand, suddenly rushed to the front of the negroes, followed by the whole band whom Joolay had left to guard the house.

"Follow me, my brethren!" shouted Zama; and leading on the whole body of negroes, he charged furiously on the Indians. The rattling of the rifles was now heard in the wood, mingling with the trumpet-sound of the Cadet brigade; while the Cherokees, broken down, dispersed and dispirited, fled from the lawn to the thickets for safety. The sound of the conflict in the forest was drawing closer and closer, and the main body of the Indians were drawing nigher and nigher to the mansion-house, and were seen hurrying from bush to bush, and from tree to tree, wherever they could maintain their position. It was evident that the Cadets were driving the Cherokees before them; while the negroes, eager in pursuing those who had already fled, could not be rallied to attack the advancing enemy.

"Oh! for a bugle or a horse-whip," cried Joolay, "to bring them black niggers to a sense of their duty. Tarnation! the Cherokees will be round us in a jiffy!"

At this moment Whackie hurried past, armed with a huge club.

"Here," cried Joolay, "roar on Zama and these vagabonds to come back; don't you see the Cherokees coming on us again?"

Whackie instantly darted forward, and considering, that if Zama turned, all the rest would follow, he bellowed out, "Zama, Zama! de Red Indine is behind you: look back—look back!"

Zama heard him, and, looking round, perceived the Indians approaching the clearings. Instantly halting the negroes, he hurriedly formed them, and led them on the approaching foe. The whole posse of negroes, acting like sheep following their leader, no matter where, charged furiously on the Indians. A fierce but brief struggle ensued; for the vanguard of the Cadets now advanced at double-quick time from the forest, driving the Indians like stricken deer before them; a general rout ensued, and the Indians fled in all directions.

"There's a charge for ye!" shouted Joolay; "there's a glorious charge!" as Zama and his followers seemed actually treading the Indians under foot. "Hurrah! the red rascals are beaten to eternal smash. By jingo! Washington, nor Gates, no, nor no other general, ever did the like. By the hookey, its all my doing!" he roared, as he frisked and gambolled about like a young elephant.

"Bravo, my old boy!" cried Captain Waldenberg, as he advanced; "you have stood your ground most nobly!"

"Hav'n't I?" cried Joolay; "show me a general in Ameriky, ay, or out on't either, that could do better!"

The captain laughed, and waving his sword, pointed to the retreating Indians. "On, gentlemen," cried he to the Cadets; "forward on these savages!"

"Oh!" cried Joolay, "if I was as supple as you chaps, I'd show you fun. I've won the battle to your hand, my bucks; so you can chase 'em yourselves. Hillo!" continued he, as a party of the Cadets advanced supporting Major Maitland. "What's ado? What, major, are you wounded?"

"Slightly, slightly," answered the major. "On, gentlemen, on!—Bind that scarf over the wound. Thanks, that will do.—Forward, forward!" He staggered and fell. "Never mind me, gentlemen. On, on; do your duty!" he cried, as he endeavoured to rise.

"This is a sad misfortune," said Joolay, as he stooped down and supported the major's head.

"Yes," said the major; "to be struck down in the moment of victory! I must make another effort to join my gallant comrades."

"What!" cried Joolay, "fight again! and you got a bullet through you already? No, no, let me guide you to the house; Miss Bellgrove must become your sick-nurse."

"No, no," said the major, "rather let me lie where I have fallen; not for the world would I intrude on her!"

"Fiddle-de-dee! my dear fellow," rejoined Joolay, "the turkey-buzzards would gobble you up in a jiffy. Miss Bellgrove knows you are come; so don't offend her again."

"I'll take t'other wing of the gemman," said the coach-driver, "and help him into the house; there's t'other wounded chap in the big house, and a prime wench, I guess, a-looking arter him."

"Is it one of our brigade?" inquired Maitland.

"No," answered the driver, "its a young blade that was chased by them Red Indgins. He's been among 'em a while, and the two black niggers wot saved us from the Cherokees, thinks as how it be's their master,"

"Is't possible!" exclaimed Joolay. "Master Charles here? Lord bless me! what am I about?" So saying, he left Maitland, and trotted off to the mansion-house as fast as he could; when, just as he reached the front staircase, a loud voice hailed him. Joolay turned, and beheld Zama and Whackie advancing rapidly towards him.

"Well," cried Joolay, "do you two niggers think you've nothing to do but spanking Indians? Come along, my boys; your young master's here. But why were you not here before me, eh? You came on to give the alarm, and you wasted your time on the road preciously, I guess."

"We could not arrive earlier," answered Zama. "We came upon the Indians in the forest; and, by the aid of Providence, we have been instrumental in saving Master Charles."

"What d'ye say?" cried Joolay; "how? explain yourself."

"The carriage was pursued by the whole of the Indian warriors," answered Zama. "I knew a road through the forest, which leads through the cedar swamp; we took this path, and overtook the carriage just in time to save the passengers. Whackie and I sprang upon it, and compelled the driver to gallop the horses full speed, and we reached this, followed closely by the Cherokees."

"You're a brave and a clever fellow, Zama," exclaimed Joolay; "Natur' never intended you for a nigger, but blackened your face in a mistake. Come along, my lad, and I'll get you a glass o' brandy, the best in the house, for I want one to myself."

Zama shrank back with a bitter sigh, and his lip quivered with a pang of agony, at the insult to his complexion, and the reward offered for his meritorious service. "Yes," he inwardly exclaimed, "had I saved a thousand whites, my thanks would have been their cold disdain; and this, because I am what God has made me—a Negro!" The next moment the gallant youth was folded in the embrace of his affectionate sister, Zada.

"My beloved brother!" exclaimed the girl, as she gazed fondly on him. "Oh, what a noble part you have acted this day!"

"My beloved sister," said Zama, tenderly, "to meet thee thus, and merit thy praises, proves a balm for every wound—both of mind and body."

"What's the meaning of this tomfoolery with you two niggers?" roared Joolay. "Zada, show me instantly to Master Charles' room."

"Master Charles?" said Zada; "he is not here."

"Zounds!" cried Joolay, "didn't he come in the carriage that flew past a little ago?"

"The whole party in the carriage," answered Zada, "were more dead than alive when helped out. But there was a young man in the Indian garb, sorely wounded, carried into the house."

"That's him, that's him!" cried Joolay. "Where is he, where is he?"

"Stay a moment," said Zada; "should it be Charles, oh, what happiness!" So saying, she tripped quickly away, leaving the overseer in the piazza.

On entering the apartment where the wounded youth lay, Zada found Ooknea watching over him; his eyes were closed, and he breathed heavily as with pain. The negress looked earnestly at his features; but grief, harsh usage, and toil, had considerably changed the appearance of the young man. Still Zada saw, or fancied she saw, in the countenance, a strong resemblance to Charles Bellgrove. "Ooknea," said she, "do you not think this is Master Charles who was carried off by the Indians?"

"Nonsense, child," answered Ooknea; "the boy was killed by the Red Cherokees."

At the sound of that dread name the youth started and opened his eyes, while a faint murmur of alarm burst from his lips. The strange appearance of the apartment struck him with surprise, as he gazed around him. "Am I then safe?" he said, "or is this a dream?" He turned, and his eye met the glance of Ooknea. "God help me!" he exclaimed; "am I yet in the power of the Red Indians?"

"Not so, young man," said Zada; "you are safe in the keeping of those who can and will protect you."

The youth started at the sound of her voice, and, looking at her, exclaimed, "A negress! then I must be safe. Where am I?"

"With friends," answered Zada.

"Methinks I hear the horrid yells of the Cherokees ringing in my ears," said the youth; "and yet I must be safe. Where is your master?"

"I have no master," said Zada, smiling.

"You are free, then?" said the youth.

"No," answered Zada.

"Strange!" he said. "Methinks I have seen that face before; and yet my own negroes spoke all in broken dialect. How far am I from Bellgrove?"

"Does your wound pain you?" said Ooknea, interrupting him.

"No, no; not much. The joy of being safe expels all bodily pain. Mother, my beloved mother!" he exclaimed, "am I again near thee?"

"Mr. Bellgrove had a son carried off by the Cherokees," said Zada.

"'Twas I," exclaimed the youth; "I am Charles Bellgrove."

"Joy, joy!" cried Zada, as she sprung towards him. "Oh! Charles, do you not remember me—Zada; your own dear Zama's sister?"

With an exclamation of joy, the youth stretched out his arms to the girl. She caught his hands, and pressed them to her lips. "You are safe," she cried; then rushed from the room with the glad tidings.

"Deuce take the wench!" roared Joolay, as Zada hurried from him, leaving him in the piazza; "where is she gone to? Let's see who's here," he continued, as he pushed open a door; and, followed by Zama and Whackie, he entered into a spacious apartment.

"Ha! Joolay, my old boy; how are ye?" cried a friendly voice.

"Eh? it can't be," cried Joolay. "Well, I declare! is it possible? My dear fellow, how are ye?" And Joolay seized the hand of the beforementioned old gentleman who had picked up young Bellgrove.

"Well, I guess this is odd!" cried Joolay, as he shook the hand of the old gentleman with as much force as if he was working the handle of a pump-well. "My dear Captain Norrisville, what can have brought you here?"

"For mercy's sake, Mr. Joolay, don't shake my arm so. Oh! my bones! I've been bumped and thumped, and tumbled and rumbled, till every joint is dislocated."

"What brought you here?" demanded Joolay.

"That bone-dislocating machine you folks call a mail. My stars! you should call it a new-fashioned wheel for breaking folks alive," answered Mr. Norrisville.

"But bless my wig," cried Joolay, "when did you come? and what brought you to Myrtlegrove at such a time as this?"

"Oh! Joolay, that foolish little jade, my daughter Letty, heard that her cousin, poor Matilda, was ill. So no rest got I, till I agreed to bring her here. Well, as the mail—confound it, say I—was said to be the most expeditious mode of travelling, I secured seats. We got on with plenty of jolting, till we picked up a young wounded lad; and after that we heard an awful yelling and hallooing. Lord bless me! when I looked back, there's about a little thousand of these rascally Cherokees, full drive after two niggers: up come the niggers, jumped up beside the driver like linkin, and lashed the horses like blazes. Away we went—rumbling, tumbling, heels over head in the inside of the coach, rattled up and down, round and round, just like dice in a box, till we got here. We were lifted out by the nigger women, and poor Letty is in hysterics—and as for me, I can't walk a step."

Matilda now entered the apartment, and addressing Mr. Joolay, said—"Oh! Mr. Joolay, this has been a fearful day!" The tears were streaming fast from her eyes, and the overseer felt almost inclined to partake of her grief; but dismissing the thought, he addressed her as he would have done a weeping child, whom he wished to coax with a sugar-plumb.

"Don't cry now—that's a darling: dry those pretty eyes—there's a sweet creature. All's right now, my lovely dear; the Indgines are beaten—all put to flight,—it's devil take the hindmost with them now;—and, hark! there's the Cadets' bugles sounding the recall; faith its time—for the sun's agoing down, and the young chaps can't see to shoot Indgines in the dark." As he spoke, the shrill blast of the bugles sounded the recall. "That's right," cried Joolay.

"Joy—joy!" cried Zada, as she rushed into the apartment; "he is safe—he is safe. Oh, my dear lady, Master Charles is here."

"Hurrah!!!" roared Joolay, as in the height of his joy he pulled off his wig, and tossed it in the air. "Bless you, my dear girl, for the intelligence." So saying, he flung his arms around Zada, and hugging her in a bear-like embrace, imprinted a score of kisses on the cheeks, brow, and lips of the astonished girl.

Whackie, determined to follow the good example thus set him, gave full scope to his joy, and flinging his arms around the neck of a negro woman, who happened to be near him, impressed upon the blubber lips of the wench a kiss, which sounded like a pistol-shot.

"Yeh! you black nasty nigger," shrieked the female, as she struggled to free herself from Whackie's embrace.

"I say, Whackie," expostulated a sulky looking negro footman; "you no do dat again—dat my wife!"

"I no care if she was you moder!" cried Whackie. "Oh, Lor! I is so glad!—ha!—ha!—ha!" He then, forgetful of where he was, and setting all the rules of decorum at defiance, began a negro jig, to the great surprise of the slaves; and it was not till Joolay roared to him to behave himself, that Whackie was restored to peace.

"Nay, check not his honest mirth," said Miss Bellgrove. "To him and to you, my noble-minded Zama, we are indebted for the safety not only of our long lost Charles, but of my dear Cousin Letia, and her father also. Approach, Zama, and receive the slender reward which I now offer, and take it as a guarantee that a higher reward will yet be yours."

Zama had stood transfixed with the excess of rapture; the sound of Miss Bellgrove's voice aroused him from his stupor; and advancing towards her, he cast himself on his knee before her, while, bending his forehead almost to the dust, he gently took and kissed the hem of her garment.

"Dearest lady," he said, in a voice tremulous with emotion; "the rapture I now feel in being instrumental in saving the life of my young master is a reward sufficient in itself. To have merited the approbation of one so lovely, and so good as thou art, adds but to the excess of joy which your poor, but faithful negro feels."

"Take this," said Matilda, as she drew a massy chain of gold from her neck, and threw it around that of Zama, as he knelt at her feet. "Take this—and wear it in remembrance of Matilda Bellgrove."

The negro pressed the chain to his throbbing heart, and answered, "And the heart of Zama will be cold in death ere the gift of Matilda Bellgrove quits its resting-place."

He rose, and a loud noise was heard on the verandah, as Haman threw open the door of the apartment.

"What means this uproar, Haman?" said Miss Bellgrove.

"Oh! Lor A'mighty!" cried Haman, "oh! Missee! he be Massa Maja Maitland kill an' wound, an' shot tro' a body, comin' up a stair—Oh, Lor!"

"Maitland wounded!" exclaimed Matilda, as she flew forward, and, at the door of the apartment, met Maitland, supported by the driver and some negroes. "Oh! Maitland," she exclaimed, as she pressed his hand, "is it thus we meet? Alas, it seems that you must never approach the unhappy Matilda Bellgrove but your blood must pay the forfeit!"

"Oh, say not so, Miss Bellgrove: to die in thy cause were bliss indeed," said Maitland.

"Your wounds must be instantly attended to," said Matilda. "Zada, call Ooknea."

"She is dressing the wound of Master Charles," said Zada.

"Wound!" cried Joolay. "Who wounded him —was't the Indgines?"

"No," said Mr. Norrisville. "This gentleman," pointing to the driver, "mistook him for an Indian, and shot at and nearly killed him."

Joolay turned upon the driver as if he could have swallowed him. "Oh! you darned ugly son of a racoon! did you shoot Master Charles? Tarnation! if I hav'n't a mind to skin you alive."

"Not so fast, master," said the driver. "How was I to know the young gemman from an Indgine?—he was more like that nor a decent Christian. I wasn't a-going to wait to see if he'd knock my brains out with his tommy hawk; no, I guess. I fired to save myself,—self-preservation, you know. Besides, if I shot him by mistake, I carried him here, in spite of the red rascals who were after him; and, I guess, if I hadn't a-come to your assistance, and shot yon red chap that was agoing to make you his target, ecod! you wouldn't be crowing so loud now."

"You're right, Sir," said Joolay; "and I forgive you."

"Conduct Major Maitland to the apartment next to Charles, and see that Ooknea attends him instantly," said Matilda.

"He couldn't get a better she-doctor than that old copper-faced crone in the State," said Joolay. "So, come, major; I'll escort you. Lend a hand Mr. Norrisville."

The major, expressing his fondest thanks for the kindness, was conducted to his apartment.

A loud altercation in the piazza now arose, and Zada hurried to ascertain the cause of dispute.

"You can't get in," cried Haman.

"What's wrong?" said Zada.

"Oh! him be lot ob dam low nigger want for see Missee," answered Haman.

"Admit them instantly," cried Matilda. A group of armed negroes rushed into the room, and shouted, "Long live Missee!—we beat de Red Indines,—dem no take good Missee away,—no, no, nigger fight for Missee!"

The negroes were all attired in white Osnaburg dresses,—wide trousers, fastened with a red and white sash around the waist,—their jackets, vests, and broad shirt-collars folded over, gave them a neat and smart appearance; and, while each stood before her, grasping his gun firmly, and rejoicing that they could protect her, Matilda felt proud that she could rely upon their courage and fidelity.

"Thanks, my friends," said she. "To-night let there be feasts at your huts: ask freely what you require, and all will be supplied you."

"Massa Corhim Wallenpig!" roared Haman, as he threw open the door; and Colonel Waldenberg entered. A slight wound, which he had received on the cheek during the skirmish, and which he had neglected to think of, was still bleeding. As he advanced, the negroes fell back in two lines; the white dresses of the working negroes blending with the rich liveries of those of the household. Waldenberg's eyes rested on Matilda. She had sunk back on her chair,—her head was drooping on her bosom, while the heaving of her breast, and the working of every nerve, showed that she was violently agitated. Zada was bending at her feet, and looking with sorrow on her mistress. Thrice Waldenberg essayed to speak, and as often his tongue refused its office. He glanced around the room on the silent slaves, and, for a second, not a breath was heard. At length Waldenberg found speech, and tremulously uttered, "Lady!" Matilda started, and Zada, pressing her hand, fondly whispered, "Oh, be calm,—do compose yourself." Waldenberg advanced closer to her, and said, in a tone of deep entreaty, "Miss Bellgrove!" One or two large tears coursed down her cheeks, and fell upon her hand; he took her hand unresistingly, and pressed it fondly in his, as he said, in a tone so soft that it thrilled through every nerve, "Dear Matilda! will not thy sweet lips welcome the weary wanderer to his home?"

Matilda raised her tearful eyes; they fell upon the bleeding wound on his cheek. With a loud shriek she started up, and, throwing herself into his arms, exclaiming, "Waldenberg! you are wounded!" sunk insensible on his bosom.

He looked with alarm on her pale face, and, pressing her to his breast, exclaimed, "O God! I have killed her!"

The negroes, taking the exclamation of the colonel to be a literal fact, raised an ugly and fierce howl, while a dozen of firelocks were instantly levelled at his body. Another moment, and he would have been stretched a bleeding corpse; when Zama rushed on the levelled fire-arms. "Madmen!" he shouted, "what means this folly?"

"Stan' out a road," cried one of the avengers; "you no yearee dat dam buccra say him was kill Missee!"

"No, no," cried Zada, throwing herself between the colonel and the weapons. "She has only fainted. Bear her to the window—she will soon recover—give her more air."

The colonel raised Matilda in his arms, and, forcing the negroes aside, bore her into the verandah.

Zama stepped fiercely up to him and said, "Give the lady in charge to her attendants."

"Begone, dog!" was the angry answer.

Zama turned and pressed his hands on his heart. "I forgot," he said, "I am a negro and a slave!" and with a look of deep anguish he quitted the spot.

A considerable time elapsed before Miss Bellgrove was restored to consciousness; and on her reviving, and finding herself in the arms of Waldenberg, her cup of happiness seemed once more full. In the deep fond look, in which the whole feelings of the soul were concentrated into one blaze of love and joy, Waldenberg read all that his heart could wish.

"My own Matilda," he said, as he pressed her to his bosom, "you have not forgot me?"

"Ah, Waldenberg," she answered, "what I have suffered since that fatal day——"

"I erred," he said, "but still I hope for forgiveness; and I have a long story to tell thee," added he, smiling; "but you must thank my faithful slave Perault for seeing me here."

"Why so?—you know I never could endure him."

"We were attacked by pirates on our return from Havannah, and Perault's bravery alone saved us——"

"Then he merits regard from me. Is he with you!"

"He follows our route with my horses through the forest."

The sound of Joolay's voice, in angry altercation with Ooknea, now interrupted them.

"Not admit me to see Master Charles!" bellowed Joolay. "You red-faced, brick-bat-looking b——! I must, and shall see him."

"You can't," said Ooknea. "He sleeps. You must not disturb him."

"Well, that's an excuse," cried Joolay. "Why not say so before?"

"Ha!" said Waldenberg, "this reminds me of sending forces on to Bellgrove, Mr. Joolay!"

The overseer joined them. "We must get canoes to send our men to your plantation."

"With Miss Bellgrove's permission I shall do this," said Joolay.

"Order my negroes, Mr. Joolay; all is at your service. I will prepare a letter for my uncle." So saying, she took the colonel's arm, and retired.

MONTHLY MEMENTOES.

NO. I. FOR JANUARY—THE OLD CENTINEL.

I.

Loud revel sleeps—the lights grow dim
In Pleasure's gilded halls,
While thronging spectres visit him
Who paces round the walls;
Yes, midnight stark,
With storm and dark
And solitude, appals
The breast that ever foremost wont
Where Fury scorched the battle's front;
For stern reflection calls,
Demanding, with unceasing cry
From gibbering forms that fitful wake
And mock the sense they cause to ache,
"Should man, uninjuring, injured die?
You gave my heart to the vulture's beak,
Death's blood-hound—servile, moral Cain—
You gave sin's blush to my daughter's cheek,
And my son to the galley chain;
They would have blest the sire you slew:—
What wrong had I e'er done to you?"—
When the stars are hid and the blast is loud,
And the snow-flake, weaving his winter shroud,
Gives depth to the midnight bell,
These visions of glorious war will crowd
On the aged Centinel.

II.

Slaying, he stood in the reeking fosse
Till Glory filled the trench
Before the breach of Badajos,
Cursing whate'er was French;
His ire and hate,
Exasperate,
No sea of blood could quench!
And man on man—or foe on foe,
If inhuman fools will have it so—
Hurlèd with desperate wrench,
Down from the ramparts headlong went
To the pikes below, whence wretches' groans
Of agony o'ertopped the stones
That coped the battered battlement.—
The Centinel, as thought haunts him there,
Inquires, in reason's rising flood,
"What kings take arms?—Why did I wear
Their hateful livery of blood?
In the melée, though tried and true,
My bayonet run my comrade through."
When the stars are hid and the blast is loud,
And the snow-flake, weaving his winter shroud,
Gives depth to the midnight bell,
These visions of glorious war will crowd
On the aged Centinel.

III.

Who war applauds, convince him now—
His tears freeze as they flow—
True bravery's scars are on his brow,
But on his mind there's woe;
The pang of one
That 's murder done
By many a ball and blow,
Which no invaded home defends,
Through all his lone reflection wends;
And he has learnt to know,
The valour spent to build a king,
Perforce, upon a nation's wrong,
Nor blesses life, nor triumphs long,
Nor glows at Freedom's beckoning.—
And thus his foraging crimes return;
Maidens shriek to their fathers slain;
Chateau and chalet before him burn;
And brothers, with scatterèd brain,
Peer in his eyes and sift him through
With, "Servile Serf! how harmed we you?"
When the stars are hid and the blast is loud,
And the snow-flake, weaving his winter shroud,
Gives depth to the midnight bell,
These visions of glorious war will crowd
On the aged Centinel.

J. A. O.

MINOR FRENCH POETS.

We have heard an ingenious Italian maintain, that it is absurd to compare the value of different kinds of poetical genius. All excellence, he asserted, not to say perfection—is positive. If the Idyls of Theocritus are, in their class, as faultless as the Homeric rhapsodies in theirs, what determines the precedence of either? A mere arbitrary choice, varying with the critic's temper: as one eye prefers the green—another the violet ray. The parallel, we might reply, is not quite complete;—and, even in matters of sense, some approach to a law might be found. But in marshalling the several classes of poetry, admitting the vital principle of all to be an inspiration of some truth, the popular distinction cannot be called capricious, so long as it is agreed to grant the supremacy of the spiritual over the sensuous elements of nature; and, amongst human feelings, to dignify those which serve the virtues above those that minister to enjoyments only, or are immediately under the dominion of the senses. Here we would continue to fix the line of division: humbly differing from some eminent modern critics, who regard nature as a whole so homogeneous, that everything truly belonging to it, of whatever kind, is to be accepted with equal love. The high places in the poetical hierarchy, indeed, which we claim for the vestal muse, could hardly be coveted by her unzoned sisters, who breathe the pleasures and passions of a lower region. Their votaries are rarely more ambitious—and why should they be? They are neither seers nor teachers—nor even kings or paladins; but professors of the gay science, nursed in smiling leisure; buxom, careless, pleasure seekers and singers—no lights of the world, but shining motes that dance in its sunbeams—holiday companions, too seductive for constant intercourse, but exquisitely welcome in those moments when the mind, turning from severer thoughts, seeks for elegant relaxation. More than this we would not venture to claim, even for Anacreon.

From the days of the Fronde until the close of the last century, France has produced a succession of butterflies of this species, quite unique in their way. They were the offspring of a privileged world, closed to all but the luxurious and the gay; a kind of Pagan Elysium, the Diety of which was Pleasure, and its Demon, Ennui. In this voluptuous region, Woman, decorated by every art that could render her seductive and imperious, was the visible sovereign; and the favourite saint, of course, was Love. Its possessors were removed alike by position and by choice from the severities of life; accustomed to none but delicate sounds, their silken ears would have been startled by the accents of any deep emotion;—and as they listened their Poets sang. A singular manner of being! not less remarkable for its effeminate ease and indifference to all that lay beyond it, than for its long continuance and terrible catastrophe. While it lasted, it might be regarded as the most successful attempt made in modern times to realize the idea of an Epicurean paradise, and devote all the gifts of life to the service of refined animal enjoyment. The most serious cares which it knew, were the struggles of vanity for precedence, the monotony of repeated pleasures; and the April changes of a love that made no pretence of disinterestedness, was not remarkable for constancy, and openly laughed at the restraints of the moralist or the Churchman. To clothe the prevailing idea in graceful forms, to mingle levity with elegance, and add another luxury to the list of pleasures, was the chief ambition and office of the courtly minstrels, fostered in this world;—whom, for want of a better name, we shall beg to introduce as the Minor French Poets.

The reader asks: "Why not rather call them the Drawing-room Poets?—were there no others, of a stronger frame, belonging to the people?" Alas! the ancien régime knew of no people to whom any one cared to sing. L'état, c'est moi! The court and the noblesse, were the only class—for scattered exceptions do not make a body—able to enjoy or support any kind of literature;—and the genius of the country was all in their service. Even Voltaire and Beaumarchais, at a time when the great earthquake was at hand, had no notion of addressing any but the inmates of the salons. Beyond the vaudevilles sung in the streets, and the farces on the Boulevards,—which were things of another race, there was no form of poetry—not even the drama, in which the people ever dreamed of taking real part. In all countries a majority of the patrons of letters will be found in the higher ranks; but in France, the distinguishing feature was the exclusive obedience of the arts to an order, that had, indeed, taken care to appropriate every other blessing of the land. In the fearful storm that swept all this injustice away, was seen the fruit of a system which, amongst other evils, deprived the many of all share in the genius of their country. While the masses grew brutal, at a distance from the kindly influences of poetry and letters, these, too, were in turn, enervated by confinement to the task of pleasing a class, instead of speaking to a nation.

The Poets accordingly wear embroidery, and exhale the fragrance of poudre à la maréchale. They were as idle and voluptuous as those who applauded them:—and either belonged by birth, or sought by their talents admission to the Great Vanity fair, in the train of some magnificent duke or marquise. As the favourite subjects here were few, it was indispensable to study variety in the manner of displaying them: sprightliness and happiness of allusion were graces the most in request, because the most thoroughly appreciated. The verses which were first read in a boudoir obeyed the laws which governed all conversation there,

They were to charm, sparkle, and agreeably excite; no prejudice was to be alarmed, no composure disturbed; and, above all, it was forbidden to be too discreet or tedious. Such is the power of prescription, that the manner thus established survived not only the dominion under which it rose, but even the sentiments it was taught to express. But from the beginning of the present century, a different tone may be felt: to the few who still pursued the old dainty fashion it had evidently grown a mere tradition;—and even in them new sympathies begin to appear and mingle with the habitual strain. These, too, have now become silent, and a new school of poetry has arisen—if better or worse it would be hard to say, looking at the chaos of things vile and things splendid which now envelopes the genius of France. But the Minor Poets will chirp no more; their summer day is over.

Let it not be forgotten that the influence of which they were the most complete expression, was, in its time—and for a time—the canon of literature throughout all Europe;—where one State after another took laws of taste from the French court. They are per se a remarkable race; rarely exhibiting genius of the highest kind, but sparkling all over with its smaller brilliants. What they have attempted they have performed with a success approaching to perfection. They are, moreover, exceedingly and absolutely French; and are in the closet what the opéra comique is on the stage, and the brisk wine of Ai on the table. We shall not ask whether excellence of this kind is not the highest of which French language and genius are capable; but may strongly believe that it is the most perfect thing in its kind that France has hitherto achieved: the consummate flower of conventional and luxurious society, sprinkled with such feelings as refresh that artificial atmosphere, and bearing in its bright colours and trimmed leaves the evidence of choice and delicate culture.

Amongst many light professors of the art, here and there was one who displayed other energies, and at intervals took a bolder flight. You might even find a stray pietist (like Louis Racine) singing devout canticles only; or a philosophizing Ducis, whose gayest excursions end in a moral;—but such exceptions were far from meeting with general applause, or influencing the prevalent fashion. The poet of gentle birth, or the well-beneficed abbé, rarely attempted more than scattered and occasional verses; which, after passing successfully through the ordeal of the salons, were committed to the press with the imprimatur of their approval. A few, more ambitious, were encouraged by such triumphs to attempt what were called ouvrages de longue haleine; epistles, may be, in imitation of Horace, or other considerable pieces, in sonorous heroic metre, adorned with all that this artificial style of poetry required. But these essays were oftener the "probationary odes" of some humbler candidate for admission into the charmed circle. Inspired by Apollo, and the desire to rise, he began with the production of some highly-finished poem—trimmed with classical allusions—glittering with point, and seasoned, if possible, with a panegyric of the reigning monarch, or of some noble Mæcenas. The work, if admired, was a passport to patronage, and even, in some cases, to a chair in the academy; in the meanwhile it secured the author a dubious kind of naturalization in the gay world; for which he paid tribute in the strains most welcome to courtly ears. His real success here was to be won with lighter gifts;—sonnets,—epigrams,—occasional verses happily turned; refined flatteries of great personages, warm compliments to renowned beauties; with abundant elegies and other ditties, of which the burden was love.

That the Divinity worshipped under this name was no Venus Urania, needs not be demonstrated here. An indulgence of the sweetest of all passions, without a thought of restraint, and with enjoyment refined by the resources of art and fancy—was the idea of love, as presented in these poems. Their colouring is often too warm for senses accustomed to breathe a purer air; and many of them, however charming, must be denounced as dangerously seductive. But there are multitudes of lighter essays, in which the passion, less eager and imperious, only lends a distant warmth to wit, archness, and gaiety;—delightful trifles, which may be admired without a frown from the severest censor. It is from this class, and from the occasional pieces of a mixed character, that we propose to offer a hasty anthology gathered wherever a flower could be found in so brilliant a parterre, small and modest enough to be preserved between the leaves of the present essay. Not only do we think such specimens often the most genuine and pleasing of their authors' works; but it would be impossible in any compass, to attempt the slightest notice of more pretending efforts; which we are far from regretting, because we have in vain attempted to take a hearty pleasure in the holiday accents of the French muse. The list of authors, beginning with the early age of Louis XIV., and extending into the present century, excludes, of course, those from Marot and Malherbe, down to La Martine, who deserve a higher place than with Minor Poets. Nor does it contain any of the mere chansonniers, who would require a separate article for themselves, if their songs (of which, until Béranger's time the best were merely addressed to the event of the day) could now be understood by an English reader without a commentary. The field, or rather pleasure-ground, which we have chosen is already wide enough without adding to it this merry debatable land.

The first place, in gallantry, must be given to a lady:—"la tendre et naive Deshoulières." She appears with a grace rather faded, and her speech, it must be confessed, has a little flavour of the Grand Cyrus,—but we love her all the better for reminding us of an age, the very affectations of which had an air of purity, which we miss in the gallantries of the following period. She was noble and beautiful, and adored at the French court as "the tenth Muse," between the years 1660 and 1694, when she died, at the age of fifty-six. There is an easy flow in her verses, and a delicacy in their texture, which bespeak some of the most engaging qualities of a feminine hand. Happy the man who has never received a refusal less daintily and tenderly worded than the—

NOTE TO M. DOUJAT.

You called yourself a vassal in Love's train,
And me the instrument the god employs
To bend your heart to his imperious reign,
And turn to constant faith your fickle joys:—
Thirsis! unless you meant to jest or feign,
You quite mistake your heart's estate and voice.
You chase me not where'er I stray;
Nor even when we meet, betray
The ceaseless wish, the fond impatience, still
To breathe some gentle nothing in my ear;
You are not jealous when a rival's near;
Nor does my absence cloud your days, or fill
Your heart with sighs, your eyes with weeping dim;
Thirsis! this love exceeds your skill,
You took his sister, friend, for him!

The white hand that penned this indictment, (whereby we learn what your perfect lover was expected to fulfil in that day,) is still more happily employed in writing songs, light and playful enough to be set to the music of fairy bells. One we shall try to catch, though at a distance:—

Lovely Spring adorns the year
With as many loves as flowers:
Tremble, virgin hearts, for yours,
When the budding time draws near!
Coyness must give way to Spring,
But the sweetness he may bring
Soon, perhaps, will cost you dear.
Virgin hearts, beware his powers!
Lovely Spring adorns the year
With as many loves as flowers.

A mere nothing! and yet one that you can repeat and remember with pleasure, when greater things have left no impression. There is a secret of poetry in this. The following Ballade has another kind of attraction; the old-world style of Marot, in which it is written, was well chosen to convey the regrets of a fair mourner over the decay of the old gallantry and belle flamme. Great, no doubt, was the change in this branch of manners during the reign of Deshoulières; yet it is amusing to see, in such instances, how every age has a golden past to describe and lament, bewailing its present decay.

"Trust ne'er a lover but with ample bail:"
A maxim surely in my judgment writ.
Nought think I of the secret pains they wail;
Nought need I charms to guard me from their wit;
The heart of men true Honesty hath quit,
Albeit on lips the same fair words have they,
As ran ere Falsehood in the world was born;
But for fair deeds, the fashion is outworn!
—Men love no more as in a former day!

Rich garments, feasting, servants more than meet,
Of merit now engross three parts in four;
Of lovers true, submissive, and discreet—
If such there be—the troop is dwindled sore.
Love a month old is deemed a thing of yore;
The rudest wooer bears the prize away;
For sighs and tears the world proclaims you Fool:
A favour's boasted ere the lips are cool;—
—Men love no more as in a former day!

In vain young Bellamours their nets devise:
Young bachelors,—a race for mischief born!—
Consort aloof: beneath the sweetest eyes,
Your fopling glories in his lazy scorn.
Not even a decent mask in love is worn;
Or if at times an airy springal may
To some attentions stoop and condescend,
Love's gracious boon is not his only end.
—Men love no more as in a former day!

These are your gallants now! and such entice
Poor silly maids, since better ware is none.
Greybeards have hearts less insolent and nice—
(The devil, waxing old, a cowl put on)—
But naught in these awakes a tender tone.
Much winter chills and drives desire away;
Much ailment turns the sweetest humour sour;
When once, alas! their heads are growing hoar,
—Men love no more as in a former day!

RACAN, who was a flourishing poet and lover in this good old time, so feelingly lamented, shall now appear, and show how he was wont to regard the objects of his admiration. He is the oldest of the poets in our series,—having been born as early as 1589, and a pupil of Malherbe,—and preserves in his manner much of that strange and engaging mixture of simplicity and stateliness which belonged to the French noble of the school of Henri Quatre. In his day, which still retained some of the jovial frankness of that earlier period, no real disrespect to the church would be thought implied in a sonnet like the following: in stricter or less devout times it might have seemed an affront to the dignity of His Confessor, whom the poet thus addresses:—

As heaven my heart to penitence inclines,
No thought concealing you are bound to hear,
So, as my failings grave or light appear,
Prescribe the penance: thus my shrift begins.
—If I have played with Love, before and since
Your holy veto, much contemned, I fear,
Contrite, with due remorse, behold me here
To make entire confession of my sins!
At the grand altar, I admit, I swore—
'Twas on the day you heard me last confess—
Thenceforth no mortal creature to adore.
Good Father, weigh my fault, and pass it by!
Divine is she whom now my prayers address;
I cannot think such worship perjury!

As a Confessio Amantis, tradition, going back at least to the times of the pious Eneas, will confirm its entire orthodoxy. O Dea certe!

Another step brings us into the very midst of the poetical petits maîtres; how different from their predecessors of but a few years earlier! Yet in the first rank of these were some who were not always mere triflers; although none have written more mercurially. SENECÉ, for instance, (born in 1643,) was a soldier and a diplomatist before he turned courtier; and an elegant Latin scholar to boot. He writes with the charming good-humoured ease which distinguished his temper, after the quarrelsome heat of youth was spent, and preserved him to the good old age of ninety-four. The little piece which he calls a Moralité, clothes a familiar idea in a kind of whimsical complaint, that is very pleasing; and can hardly have been heard unmoved by the beauty to whom its moral (heaven save the mark!) was pointed:—

Thou know'st that Time, too fugitive, away
With all our joys will flee;
Yet ever say'st: "To-morrow!" when I pray
For that sweet grace from thee!
To-morrow! fye! how slow the antic creeps!
Where hides he, lingering still?
In Norway, Guinea, under Calpe's steeps,
In China, or Brazil?
What reason bids thee in to-morrow trust?
Say, has it given thee bail?
I fear it hollow; and by Fate discussed
The hope it gives may fail.

Amidst this coying yonder comes old age
With cares to bind thy brow:
To-morrow's but a vapour, Love,—the sage
Would say, "Be happy now!"

We add a lively epigram by the same hand. It was written a hundred and fifty years since; and yet, if you add a name or so, the trait might pass for an anecdote of some modern May-Fair. Non exolescunt vitia.

Paul, who now to write pretends,
Royally, last Sunday, fed
At the first hôtel, his friends,—
Dinner two pistoles a-head.
But a mile of tedious prose
Read by Paul, concludes the feast:
Every page by every guest
Welcomed with ecstatic "Ohs!"
Whispers Frank to George, aside:
"How we all like villains lied,
Ne'er was duller trash or thinner!"
George, as low, to Frank replied:
"Silence, criticising sinner!
Don't I know the ass is mad?
The romance, I grant, was bad;
But what genius in the dinner!"

Still more distinguished had been the MARQUIS DE LA FARE: now as a volunteer fighting against the Turks, in his day the terror of Europe; now acting as right hand to the Great Condé at Senef. But he was disappointed in his ambition, and early retired to a voluptuous leisure, amidst friends and light poetical recreations. These he continued until an advanced age; proving at least that his pleasures had not fatally impaired mind or body: in spite of the Epicurean creed which enlivens trifles like the following:—

TRUTH ILLUSTRATED.

Hear but your mannikin's conceit!
For him all things are born, preserved, decay:
For him the spheres revolve from night to day:
The universe was fashioned for his seat!
To prove me this, howe'er he words his plea,
All reasoning's impotent, I humbly think:
But need no syllogism to make me see,
When I am thirsty, that this wine I drink,
Was clearly made for me!

An epigram of his in a few words says much of the court of Louis XIV., and was pointed, in reality, at higher game than it would have been safe to attack openly. Its truth is still to be recommended to all prosecuting attorney-generals:—

Pasquils, in our fathers' time,
Ran, indulged, through all the court:
Now they ban from thence, like crime,
Even the harmless form of sport.
Ah! if these important folks
Whom a laugh with fear can touch,
Less deserved satiric strokes,
Would they fear a jest so much?

The ABBÉ CHAULIEU, La Fare's intimate friend, was the most celebrated of the anacreontic poets of his day, and like many of his brethren, enjoyed that day long.* He, too, was of noble family; and although a Churchman, a greater rake than any of his associates; the many mistresses whose charms he proclaimed were neither imaginary nor platonic. The exceeding warmth of his erotic pieces, charming as they are, debars us from touching them here; and in his other compositions (far inferior to these) there is a tendency to be diffuse, which renders it difficult to find a convenient extract. We must be contented with a fragment of his Ode contre L'esprit; in rendering which it is absolutely necessary that we should be allowed to use the word wit in the sense attached to it by Addison and other older writers. Modern ignorance or whim has deprived us of the word, and given no equivalent: the barbarous use of "talent," "talented," which now shocks good taste on every hand, being auctioneers' slang, not English.

The Ode against false wit begins with this lively apostrophe:—

Error's source that never dries;
Subtile poison that perverts
Truth of accents, truth of hearts,
Nature's artless sympathies!
Wisp, that only shines to harm,—
Wit! the altars raised to thee,
Brain-sick weaklings' pest and charm,
Now to break my task shall be.

After denouncing with much emphasis the affectations which it has introduced into Poetry, Philosophy, and Religion, he comes to its effects on the commerce of Love.

Author of the fopperies whence
Venus half her tribute draws,
Thou abusest Love with Laws,
Arts, and quibbles, void of sense.
Who in truth has known the birds
"Pine in chains," "in fetters groan,"
"Deafen rocks with doleful words"
And "to streams their grief bemoan?"
Thou hast framed the grand romances,
Strange alike to life and truth,
Which the heads of amorous youth
Turn with empty, frantic fancies.
Still the nightingale and dove
Though unlearned, can pair and please:
—Say, to teach them arts of Love,
Was some Ovid born for these?
Hateful book! from whence distil
All thy worst corruption taught;
Where a gentle passion's wrought
To a hideous game of skill.
Art! from whence, with harlot smile
All coquettish mischiefs came:
And that merchandise of guile,
Gallantry:—deceitful name!
—What, alas! unconscious, then,
Has the spell my steps betrayed?
Soon, I feel, my hate will fade
If I longer hold the pen.
Loved by most, by me abhorred,
Wit! with blank chagrin I see,
Even thy very shafts to ward
Verse must borrow arms from thee!

It is but fair to observe that this diatribe was written when the Abbé had passed his climacteric; and might safely indulge in censures of gallantry, which he was no longer able to pursue. But that, after such a life as he had led, he could venture to denounce the folly with so much unction, is a proof of self-deception as droll as any that can be quoted off-hand.

For the next specimen let us give an elegant trifle by HOUDARD DE LA MOTTE, who belongs in part to the 18th century, although born in 1672. It was he who, when very young, was rendered so desperate by the damnation of a farce which he had composed, that he forsook all his prospects and entered La Trappe. The good De Rancé,

* He died in 1720, aged eighty-one; and was merry, in spite of his gout, to the last.

however, let him loose again after a three-months' trial;—it is said, because the novice was too sickly for the severities of the order;—more probably, because he had grown wise enough to repent of his silly step. He returned to the world, and to verse-making, but did not attempt any more comedies.

THE TEACHER'S PLEASURE.

The charming Angela, erewhile,
For whom a thousand rivals strove,
On me alone was pleased to smile,
And taught my novice heart to love.

To please the soft and warm the coy,
From her I learned to sigh and glow;
And those nice cares, the chief employ
And wisest lore that lovers know.

Scarce had I ceased, a student yet,
These sweet Love-mysteries to learn,
When running to young Violet,
I gave her lessons in my turn.

O! how the teacher loves the taught!
How pleased I saw her knowledge grow!
The bliss my own soft studies brought
Was far less sweet than teaching so.

My heart is now in Violet's care:
And truth must own the mistress kind
Less cherished than the pupil fair:
'Tis so in every school—I find!

This would be the place for PIRON's entrance, if it were possible to introduce him to the worshipful reader. But this merry rhymer is not only free, but loose in his talk; and rattles on at a speed which runs beyond our compass, even when he is more discreet. His epigrams, terse enough and stinging hot, are either too broad or too local for translation; so that we can only place an empty chair for the wicked wit; whose droll sayings and doings are current in France to this day. Near this vacancy let us seat one of the few Minor Poets who served a chaster muse. The chief poetical works of LEFRANC DE POMPIGNAN * are on scriptural subjects—in which he rises at times to a very respectable elevation;—and the rest of his compositions display the seriousness of a calm and reflective nature.

His odes, one of which is translated below, are distinguished by their graceful simplicity; and at times have an earnestness which is touching and almost solemn. In poetic feeling, at least, he rose far above many of his more celebrated rivals.

THE SEPULCHRES.

As late, my restless cares forgot,
I strayed to breathe the breezes free,
My wanderings reached a lonely spot
That bordered on the lonely sea.

There statues from afar were seen,
And wrecks of arches triumph-crowned;
And prostrate columns: nearer then
I drew: and tombs were all I found!

The first, a grand mausoleum, held
One of those conquerors dear to Fame,
By whom the trembling Earth beheld
Her fields laid waste, her cities flame.

There were portrayed a hundred fights;
And nations' chains, and monarchs' fears;
Triumphal marches, funeral rites,
And tributes of a world in tears.

Beneath a shade of ancient yew
A fairer monument was placed,
That charmed the passing stranger's view
With emblems on the marble traced.

This was a Poet's tomb: who sung
So well, that nations praised his lay:
A lute, a lyre, and trumpet hung
From the green branches of a bay.

Hard by, interred in humbler guise,
A fisher slept amongst the dead.
A simple net, a rude device,
Was drawn above his crumbling bed.

"Alas!" I cried, "misdeeming Art!
To all that pass the stone declares
The history of a wretch, whose part
Was less to live than suffer cares."

"And wherefore so?" with angry voice,
A wanderer near me turned to ask:
"The fisher's labour was his choice
And calling: he fulfilled his task."

"See rather here what life displays:
The poet trills his canzonets,
The warrior ravages and slays,
And the poor fisher throws his nets."

Of all the light versifiers, GRESSET, author of the celebrated Vert-vert, is the lightest. The general favour which this lively narrative poem has retained, and the applause bestowed on its author's comedy, Le Méchant, make us hesitate in expressing a lower opinion of his relative merits than is commonly professed. There must be some peculiar charm, which none but a French ear can perceive, in the cheery gossiping flow of his lesser poems; to us they are commended by little else but ease and good-humour. An extract from La Chartreuse, an epistle in cantering verse, which describes his retirement, will give as fair an idea of his manner as we can present.

"If the chamber's round or square
To decide would pose my lore;
But, without a compass, dare
Say that, past the slanting door
Five good steps, or may be more,
You may take within my lair.
Windows, skylit, badly rent,
O'er a gutter look, the which is Used for Sabbaths worse than witches',
Where collegiate cats,—the vermin!
Every night in gowns of ermine
Hold their squalling Parliament.†

On a pair of trestles spread;

Which my hermit-cell adorn.

Oft upset with hideous din,
Round my eyry as they course,
Ere their serious wars begin,
And your climate feels their force;
Or, when joined, their icy legions
Form the bolts of snow and hail,
Which across your shivering regions
Shoot catarrhs and agues pale.

And writes, cum privilegio, rare
Fictions of the starry tribe.

There is exceeding elegance and feeling in the verses of ST. LAMBERT—whose name is better known to England from his intimacy with Voltaire, and his tenderness for the gentle Madame D'Houdetot, than by his admired poem of the Seasons. In France it would seem that the pursuit of the gayer muses is rewarded with the longevity promised to those who honour their fathers and mothers;—a vast majority of the minor poets lived long, and St. Lambert was of the number: having reached the age of 86, when he died in 1803. We shall only cull a trifle from his garden; but it is a very charming one.

TO A BUTTERFLY.

Inconstant butterfly, pursue
Thy flight where Spring reviving flowers exposes;
Less fond than eager, flattering more than true,
Go kiss the bosoms of coquettish roses,
And pleased, with each thy rapture light renew;
Enjoy, and hasten from the prize to woo
The next that fresher loveliness discloses.

Such be thy rule; still courting, ever changing
To these sweet errors all thy hours apply;—
And such I, too, had followed, freely ranging—
Had Sylvia never met mine eye!

Of BERNARD, the French Ovid,—Gentle Bernard, as he was christened by Voltaire,—it is hard to speak to our heart's content. So soft are his pictures, so seducing his voluptuous eloquence, so smiling are his landscapes, so delicate and warm is his language, that it is painful, amidst all this beauty, to confess the presence of the merest sensual passion, lurking like a poisonous snake. But it cannot be denied:—whether as teacher of his Art of love, or in his occasional rambles, we see only the refined Sybarite, whose idea of Good is an incarnation of animal pleasure, only the more dangerous for the grace with which it invites the reader. From these we must turn, and listen, instead, to part of one of his harmless anacreontic carols:—but alas! his best powers lie breathing in those naughty erotics,

quæ Venus
Quintâ parte sui nectaris imbuit;—

and at other times, he writes like one exhausted. The following is from a little piece called

AUTUMN.

Haste to close the day,
Tethy's lover! glaring
Sun, thy fires o'erbearing
In their source allay.
With excess of heat
Brown the fields are lying,
Flowers are scentless dying,
Drained the fountains sweet.
Tearless wakes Aurora,
O'er a pining Flora
Breathless zephyrs fleet.
All are faint and mute,
Save Pomona now
Laughing, with a brow
Crowned with purple fruit;
Midst a merry crew,
Bathed in vine-juice new,
Of the Sylvan throng,
Who in gambolds heady
Reel with feet unsteady
As they dance along.
Come, Aristus mine!
Let her vain command
Reason sour resign;
Would the sage withstand
All the bliss of wine?
Still be wise—but free:
Drink! the god of Pindus
Let your pattern be:
Bacchus, lord of Indus
Conquered him, like thee:
Ever since, Apollo,
Whose decrees we follow,
Bids us make allies
Jests and homilies,
Honour Cato stern,
From Petronius learn;
For a while be wise,
Then to folly turn.
Joyous counsels these,
To the banquet lure us,
Where grave Socrates
Welcomes Epicurus.
Prythee add a guest,
Cypris' boy, the charmer,
Midst the tale and jest
His enchantments warmer
Please my fancy best.
In the vine-leaves' shade
If a sleep o'ertake us,
Low by Bacchus laid,
With his charming aid
Cupid sly shall wake us.
Dotards! that oppose
In the stoic's quarrel,
Feelings youth bestows
With a musty moral!
Why with painful days
Load the passing season,
Gift of Heaven,—'tis treason,
Simple nature says;—
Seneca may reason,
Wiser Horace plays!

As the eighteenth century advances, the noble versifiers give place to rivals of humbler birth, whose talents procured them the notice of the great. The most remarkable of these was LE BRUN, born at Paris in 1729;—whose life, prolonged till 1807, was fertile in strange vicissitudes. What a vast interval is grasped by the mere record, that the poet, favoured in youth by the patronage of a Prince de Conti, and the friendship of Louis Racine, lived to serve under Napoleon as a Director of the Institute! It is almost an injustice to Le Brun to place him amongst the minor poets. None of them seem to equal him in variety of power or in energy:—and while he has as much wit as any, and is not wanting either in grace or in tenderness, a true poetical enthusiasm often animates his strains. The following noble exordium is taken from his "Ode on the Earthquake of Lisbon in 1755;"—of which we grieve to take a fragment only;—recommending the reader to seek for the whole, and compare it, en passant, with Voltaire's icy lines on the same subject.

Thus in his heart the proud one said,—
"Lord of this universe am I:
The royal circlet crowns my head,
Bound at my foot disasters lie;

My palaces the hills o'ergrow;
My vassals every plain o'erflow,
And Pleasure decks my banquet hall:
Heaven speeds my vengeance with its fire,
And winds with subject waves conspire
To make the Earth my Fortune's thrall!"
Presumptuous mortal! foolish clay!
Thy destiny's eclipse beware.
Earth's feeble tenant of a day,
Scarce are thy footsteps printed there—
What! does the cradle touch the tomb?
One step from nothing to the gloom
Of graves, and blank oblivion passed;
His day's a flash of hasty light
Gulphed in the greedy jaws of night;
What compass for a pride so vast!

After this the poet points to the real Lord of the World, in a series of stanzas of which the following are part:—

The heaven beneath his march august
Bows trembling its eternal head;
The starry myriads are the dust
That his immortal footsteps tread.
Beneath his chariot thunders roll:
The welkin groans;—from pole to pole,
Earth to the dreadful call replies,
Serene amidst the tempest dire
He sees beneath his feet expire
Monarchs, and tribes, and centuries!
Nought from his lightning Justice hides
The dark abyss of hearts depraved:
He laughs to see the reckless pride
Of kings adored by crowds enslaved;
And from the diadems he breaks,
And from the kingdoms that he shakes,
The fragments strew his awful path—
—O close, in mercy, jealous God,
The days of vengeance! hide thy rod
In thy great treasury of wrath!

This is true poetry—and of a very high class. We cannot refrain from directing admiration to the noble apostrophe in the last stanza, where the poet, as if appalled by the terrors of his vision, suddenly breaks off to implore the avenger's pity. It is said that Le Brun never suspected his own talent for epigram, until he was provoked, by Fréron's attacks, to defend himself in this manner. If so, the assailant must have bitterly repented his folly, when he saw the glittering abundance of the arrows which at once began to fly from his enemy's quiver. Of all the collections of French epigrams, we like Le Brun's the best; they are neat, spirited, and full of Attic salt:—nor in his repayment of literary assaults is he so venomous as some of the writers of this class, although stinging enough, as we shall take occasion to show. Many of his epigrams too have a mixed character, more nearly approaching the true Greek model;—these are very delightful: one shall be selected, not only as a national tribute, but because the lovely trait which it records was no fiction. The "English gallant" was the second Earl of Albemarle,* a true gentleman, if one such ever lived, and father of the admiral. The anecdote may be found in Marmontel's Memoirs.

In his trim park an English gallant, young,
Bounteous, and rich, enjoyed the evening air,
While on his fondling arm a mistress hung:
It was the hour that Venus loves, and fair
Her dewy planet shone. The lady eyed
The star with earnest gaze, and faintly sighed,
As if some yearning with her silence strove;—
The lover, catching at her thought afar,
Said gently: "Do not look so long, my love,
'Tis past my power to give thee yonder star!"

* See a notice of him in a recent No. of this Magazine, vol. ix. p. 641.

The following are of a more festive tone:—

Chloe, the pretty poetess, for two small faults the worse is:
She makes her countenance herself, and does not make her verses.

Here 's a hump-backed bridegroom buckled
To a sweetheart with a bunch:
If the hunch-back 's not made cuckold,
What will be the offspring? Punch!

At Lisa's feet a battered coxcomb lay,
With airs of one on dangerous conquests bent,
And growing urgent: "Rise, dear marquis, pray,"
The minx exclaimed—"Suppose I should consent!"

We have fields so rich and fair,
Hills so fertile, that, I swear,
—Quoth a Gascon of Bordeaux,—
If you set a scabbard there
In a week a sword would grow!

Know you that withered Amoret
Who's ever raging to be fancied younger?
She dreams that Love still watches her toilette
From whence the truant's fled an age, or longer.
No Kalydor that Rowland can supply her
Will hide the world of wrinkles that belie her;—
At fifty-nine she claims for twenty-two!
She'll soon come forth, as Folly still grows worse,
With a baptismal register so new,
One cannot help but send her back to nurse!

We add a specimen or two of the stinging weapons with which the French men of letters have, from time immemorial, been accustomed to assault each other.

"I've just been plundered"—Sorry for your grief.
"Of all my papers."—Sorry for the thief!

No, no! La Harpe the serpent's likeness missed.
The reptile hisses—but La Harpe was hissed.—

—For a dramatic work, the failure of which was manna to those authors whom his strictures as a critic of the belles lettres had exasperated. Here is another assault equally keen.

Supreme La Harpe, from his professor's chair
Poetic Laws so learnedly rehearses,
That we his pupils never more shall bear
A single word of the professor's verses.

The readers of this essay, however, are not in the same predicament; and in justice to an author so hardly treated, may be told that La Harpe, although certainly no Orpheus, composed with elegance and purity, and has written many verses that can be read with pleasure. The following Romance, for instance, is not wanting either in truth of expression or in unaffected pathos,—qualities not excessively abundant in any French poet.

THE FORSAKEN.

Wherefore fear thine eyes to sate
With forsaken Love's despair!
'Tis to thee I owe my fate;—
Doomed by thee to shame and care.
I had all but died when told,—
Stricken by a wound too deep,
Now my sorrow's half controlled,
And mine eyes again can weep.

Too sincere, my looks have shown
All thy influence, all my love;
O! had mine remained unknown
Thine had never sought to rove.

Far from thought to hide my heart,
Still I feared not half to tell:—
Others may enchain with art,
I had none but loving well.

To the fickle world restored,
Canst thou real pleasures find?
And the mistress now adored,
Will she fix thy restless mind?
Dearly, at the price I rue,
Should thy new desires be blest:
Can thy heart have turned untrue,
Yet be further still from rest?

Ill thyself thy heart has known,
Doomed its error soon to feel.
Vain ambition urged thee on
More than one weak heart to steal.
Nature soon resistless felt,
Weaker claims will bid decline:
She has formed thy heart to melt;
She has formed thy heart for mine!

When of faithless Beauty's guile
Tired, thy heart for freedom yearns;
When, ashamed of conquests vile,
To thy cheek a blush returns;
Truant, then this love recall,
Trust thy fate to her once more;
She can love in spite of all;
One regret will all restore.

Fear thou not revenge will rise
In an hour like this to wound,
In the soothing of thy sighs
Love will all my triumph bound.
Nay, against myself 'twill plead,
When my lips thy pardon sign,
That the cause I serve indeed,
And the gain, are solely mine!

Ducis, another of the octogenarian minstrels, is admitted here rather because of his attempts to give the French a translated Shakspeare, than for the sake of his own proper creations. The best of these cannot pass for more than versified prose; utterances of becoming and amiable feelings conveyed in melodious language. But he is not a mere drawing-room flutterer; and sometimes almost falls into real poetry, through a vein of pensiveness, which gives a certain charm even to common-place ideas. A sincere lover of the retirement in which his later life was spent, he has celebrated it in many strains,—one of which we repeat below; addressed to his Flower-garden. Its extreme naïveté a sour critic might term almost childish: yet the author ventured to translate Lear!

Tiny plot, from whence I choose
Flowers to deck Eliza's hair,
Sweet with odours, fresh with dews.
Nest where linnets sing and pair,
Charm my eyes with all thy hues.
Welcome! smiling violet,
Simple beauty, fond, discreet,—
Such was once La Vallière:
Meek, like thee, and innocent,
Ne'er on power or pride intent,
Nought but love in love she meant,
Hating art, and noise, and glare.
Thee, in sumptuous hoop of red,
Dangerous poppy, hence I ban,
Toss elsewhere thy haughty head,
Thou recallest Montespan.
So! and thou, my modest pet!
Show me, daisy, pretty child,
All thy tiny beauties neat,
Drops of silver golden piled.
Lily Queen! the earliest light
Sees me watch thy opening hues,
Pure and virgin-fresh, and bright,
With the morning's fires and dews.
—Dearer thou than all the rest,
Rose! or rather Love's own bloom!
Whom Idalia's charming breast
Tinges, and her lips perfume,—
Live, and charm me all ye may,—
We have both but passing stay.

Three of her best love-poets, France received from the tropics, nearly at the same period;—a circumstance notable from the rarity of such imports from colonies in general. Léonard, a native of Guadaloupe, came young to France, and soon distinguished himself by the tenderness and melody of his compositions, the most admired of which were his Idyls. It is amusing to observe the actual habits of French life growing daily more artificial, while the Arcadian prattling of swains and shepherdesses was still the favourite vehicle of poetical sentiment:—a proof how thin was the growth of true national poetry, that could be supplanted by such exotics. The traditional affectation was, however, graced by Léonard, with more warmth and sincerity of manner than are commonly found in the carpet-pastorals; and his playful minor pieces have an archness very captivating. The reader may judge of this from two specimens, taken almost at random;—

THE INDISCREET QUESTION.

Yesterday I asked my maid;—
"Ere Lucille my love had blessed,
And my heart with hers repaid,
Had it known no former guest?"
—Straight the rogue with fingers ten
Gravely seemed to count the tale;
While my forehead glowed, and then
At the lengthened list grew pale.
"Mercy! 'twould a saint provoke;
What! a dozen past amours!"
"Hush!" she said, "before I spoke,
"First I thought I'd number yours!"

THE USELESS PROHIBITION.

A shepherd crept behind Lisette:
"Come, beauty, to the woods," he said;
"They're dancing to the hautboys yet,
And nutting in the hazel-glade."
—To free her arm the maiden tried,
But strove too gently in his hold:
"What calls me to the wood?" she cried;
"Have done!—indeed you are too bold,—
Mamma will scold!"

And so Lisette, against her will,
Stole to the woods beside the boy:
Who, as they plucked the filberts, still
Kept glancing at the maiden coy.
Then seized and kissed her fingers white,
Lisette a languid sigh controlled,
And striving with her heart's delight,
Cried, "Cease! indeed you are too bold,—
Mamma will scold!"

Ere long her threatenings milder grew;
Within his clasp her hand she left,
And Colin on her lips of dew
Was tempted to a sweeter theft.
With sudden anger flushed the maid:
"Hence! leave me Sir;—you're over bold!"
—A second kiss her anger stayed:
And scarce she seemed to whisper: "Hold!
Mamma will scold!"

Ah! see how fast in gentle hearts
A dawning passion spreads and warms!
Lisette no longer frowns or starts,
But blushes in her lover's arms.

And, proffered with a sweet caprice,
A charming kiss her fondness told;
While Colin archly whispered: "Cease,
And leave me; fye! you're very bold,
Mamma will scold!"

The second, BERTIN, (only a few years younger than Léonard, who survived him,) was a native of the Island of Bourbon, and brought with him to France all the warmth of that torrid climate. His elegies, entitled Les Amours, are remarkable for their passionate glow, and for an earnestness derived from the reality of the adventures described, which were his own:—while the delicacy of his language only renders their extreme voluptuousness more dangerous. They are poems no young reader can safely touch—for to lay them down when once begun is not easy. Of this amorous writer we can only give a light specimen: his best poems unhappily are, in one sense, his worst.

TO MADAME * * *

Lady! by my youth besought,
And my mad and merry lays,
Critic far too kind, you praise
Songs in idle moments wrought
For enticing beauty's gaze.
While my vanity you raise,
Should my fondness go for nought!
I adore you! twenty-one
Little cares for wreath of bay;—
Silken hand, my chains put on!
Deck my muse with ribbons gay,
With Dione's myrtle spray
And the spoil from April won!
Glory tempts the suitor young,
But 'tis love his sighs implore:
Praise a little less the song,
Love the bard a little more!

And yet, with all its selfishness and coxcombry, and want of true elevation, the Love of that artificial world was, after all, the most natural and amiable of the passions ruling there. This may account for the universal chorus of love ditties, from which there is no escaping:—the poetic Sylva is a mere grove of the temple of Gnidos, and the sound of cooing trembles on every leaf. Here is another courtier, DE BONNARD, from whom we can get nothing but dialogues on kissing;—and yet this modern Johannes Secundus was the person honoured for a while with the grave charge of tutor to the present king of the French!* He was a soldier too, as well as a writer of verses,—more fitted perhaps to succeed in either capacity, than in that of preceptor of youth.

"Leave me! if my strength be spent,
And my hands no more resist,
Think not that my lips consent,
Or by aught but force are kissed;
Who would prize, that love has learned,
Kisses snatched, but not returned?"
"Say for whom were kisses meant,
But for one that Love has learned?
How can kisses never lent
Be by maid so coy returned?
Let me then be snatching still,
You can pay them when you will!"

The Judgment of Paris, by IMBERT, will long deserve a place amongst the choicest productions of the voluptuous school; and the youth of the author may in part excuse its warmth. Besides this considerable poem, he wrote not a few epigrams, tales, and fables, before his career was prematurely closed. In the former he is humorous, without reaching the finesse of some of his predecessors;—in his apologues clearness and ease do not quite compensate for the want of the playful grace which delights us in La Fontaine. One of each may suffice.

EPIGRAM.

One Friday, honest brother Polycarp
Came bustling up to give the prior warning:
"Your reverence! avoid the carp!
The cook—I saw him—larded it this morning!"
The hungry prior, at the news dismayed,
Frowned on the cause that baulked his palate itching:
"Confound you for a busy fool!"—he said;
"What business had you in the kitchen?"

THE FLY AND THE MOTH.

A fly too liquorish and free,
Buzzing too near sweet malmsey in a glass,
Grew dizzy, and fell in: more silly she!
Beware of gluttony, it brings disgrace!
She's past redemption. "Fye! imprudent thing!"
Sneered the light-winged moth, who saw her drowned;
"Would I be tempted so?—on safer wing
I love to wheel, and sport my lamp around."
And, fluttering, touched the flame. The greedy blaze
Scorches his plumes—he falters, frantic turns,
And falls: the source of light that charmed his gaze
Becomes the pile on which he burns.
Man ever vaunts his worth beyond its due.
On his own wisdom pompously dilates,
And shines in precepts:—but his actions view,
You'll find him tripping, even whilst he prates.

PARNY, the third and most admired of the foreign-born trio, like his friend and contemporary Bertin, came from the Isle of Bourbon;—and sang of love far too fervidly for virgin ears. He is reputed the most perfect of the later tribe of amatory poets; but we praise him more willingly for a trait which does honour to his heart. A poem on the Loves of the French Queens, the work of many years, and his best, had long been eagerly expected: at the moment when it was finished the Revolution broke out; and the poet had the generosity to burn his favourite MS., lest he might seem to assail a throne on the point of falling. He died a member of the Institute, in 1814, aged 61. The lines translated below are of a sadder tenor than is usual with him; but are not without his usual elegance.

She had dried the bitterest tears
E'er by injured lover shed:
Soothed by vow on vow, my fears
From this doating bosom fled.
Parting kisses, warm and sweet,
Lulled suspicion, charmed my mind:—
O! the easy task to cheat
One that seeks himself to blind!
Timid eyes that sought the ground;
Artless voice of plaintive tone;
Arms entwined my neck around;
Lips delayed my lips upon—
Love in all the sweets was none!
Till to-day, deceived and bound,
Even her faults I could adore;
And with silly faith possessed
Trusted all the truth professed
In her lightest vows:—but more,
More than all—when thus caressed!

* He preceded the Countess of Genlis in the governorship of the children of the Duke of Orleans.

Wo! the vanish'd spell has spoil'd
All that makes existence sweet:
Ever seeking truth unsoil'd,
Ever more I find deceit.
O'er my heart has passed a blight:
I abjure delusions bright,
I abjure that fair deceiver,
And in sorrow plunged for ever,
Even repent my past delight!

The name of FLORIAN is well known to the tender students of French literature—who have sighed over the flowery paragraphs of Numa, and committed to memory his fables. These last are his only real title to notice; and Voltaire, whose pupil he boasted himself to be, gave him, with his usual happiness, a true character, in the diminutive name, Florianet. In his small way, however, he is not without prettiness, and can deliver himself of a borrowed thought very neatly, after giving it a stamp of his own, e. g.

THE HAWK AND THE PIGEON.

A falcon rifling of a timid dove,
Said: "Ill-conditioned reprobate, I know
Thee and thy fellows, and how little love
They bear my name: but now I conquer. Lo!
There still are powers that punish!"—"Would there were!"
Sighed the poor victim. "Prodigy of crime!"
The hawk exclaimed: "What, miscreant! dost thou dare
To doubt that verity? I meant this time
To pardon thee, but zeal for truths sublime
Forbids me now to spare."

The procession of Minor Poets is closed with one who almost belongs to another race, and who might, with longer life, have deserved a higher name. Although MILLEVOYE in his love-poems followed the established manner, one perceives in them a tone breathed, as it were, from an opener atmosphere. In his elegies and romances this freshness is still more perceptible, and in reading them we feel as if treading on the real earth at last. Part of this doubtlessly belongs to the peculiar disposition of the writer; but the preference of pathos to luxurious elegance, the interest sought in a wider range of characters and objects, and a truer approach to natural feelings, bespeak the efforts of a poet nursed in a time of change, to move the hearts of a new class of readers, who could not be amused with merely elegant toys. Besides this peculiarity, his affectionate temper, and purer aspirations, as well as the struggles of his youth and the untimely close of his career, at the age of 34, give to Millevoye's productions a peculiar interest; and enable us to dwell on the last of the Minor Poets with a kind of sympathy which cannot be felt for the others. In these narrow limits, the progressive differences in his style cannot be fully shown; but the specimens we translate may in part disclose the character given above.

This is as airy and petulant as if a petit maître had written it.

THE LAW OF NATURE.

In vain beneath this shade my sweet
Protests her love will never vary.
O! Happiness! thy pleasing cheat
Is but a morning dream's vagary.
And as the Law of Change has run
Time out of mind, all Nature over,
These trees will change their verdure soon,
And Caroline will change her lover.

How different in tone this inscription for a tomb, pointing to a sadder change!

Sleeps one so loving from her lover torn?
Heaven to itself recalled that spirit fair.
Youth, virtue, grace, my heart, my life forlorn—
All—all are buried there!

Until now, we have seen no attempt of the Minor Poets to wander beyond a very limited circle; and monotony of subject has been not their least characteristic feature. Here, at last, we find the poet, tired of perpetual imitation, endeavouring to forget himself, or his standard models, and to embody some new condition of life. The execution may not be very superior, but the advance in the right way, implied by the very attempt, is notable. We see that poetry had, at last, broken her gilded cage, and begun to flutter abroad; and we must not be surprised if the flight, at first, was but a confused one.

THE ARAB AT THE TOMB OF HIS COURSER.

My noble friend, whose course the wind outsped,
Beneath the desert's moving sand lies dead!

Come, traveller, listen to my sighs;
With sighs increase my vain lament!
The King of Swiftness fallen lies,
And wakes no more at Battle's scent.
Lies, fallen in his noonday track!
The fatal arrow thrill'd his side:
His generous blood, in gushes black,
The fountain's crystal waters died.
My noble friend, &c.

Short was the slayer's vaunt, and sore!
Soon rolled on earth his ghastly head.
This lance was dabbled with his gore.
I spurn'd him long with furious tread:
Then, looking at my breathless steed,
I call'd him, sadly, thrice—in vain!
His ear had ceased my voice to heed:—
I gave him burial in the plain.
My noble friend, &c.

And since that day it haunts my mind:
No happy sun for me hath past;
To pleasure dead, to glory blind,
A weary man I roam the waste.
This Araby, so loved of late,
But seems since then a larger tomb;
I shun the camel's track, and hate
The fragrant plain, the spicy bloom.
My noble friend, &c.

When in the south the sun burn'd sore,
To friendly shades he was my guide;
With me he fought against the Moor,
And still my buckler was his side.
Brave comrade of my toils! thy neigh
So proudly hail'd the dawning glow,
When, swift as light, we sped away
To meet my lady, or my foe!
My noble friend, &c.

That young Azeid thou oft hast seen,
Love's treasure, Beauty's marvel bright!
Her faithless tongue has praised thy mien,
Thy neck she soothed with fingers white.
Soft as the shy gazelle her eyes,
Fresh as young palms her lips of dew:—
A Persian robb'd me of the prize—
She fled! but thou wert ever true.

My noble friend, whose course the wind outsped,
Beneath the desert's moving sand lies dead!

A deeper interest will be felt in the following pathetic lines, written by the poet within a few days only of his death. We are here in the region of genuine human feeling, and know no distinction now between the man and the poet. The piece, in itself, is of considerable beauty; indeed, what simple utterance of natural emotion ever was wanting in it?

In the hamlet, lone and still,
Brooding o'er his life's decay,
With a slowly-wasting ill,
Dying long, the sufferer lay.
"Village people! 'tis the hour
For the vespers," murmur'd he;
"Tolling from the belfry tower.
You that pray, O! pray for me!

"When yon boughs, with deeper shade,
Veil the chiding torrent's breast,
You shall say: the sufferer's laid,
Free from all his pain—to rest.
By the river, as ye go,
Such your pensive song shall be;
When the bell is tolling slow,
You that pray, O! pray for me!

"While, with Hate and Fraud at strife,
Time and Truth I made my shield;
Of a pure and upright life
Comes the sudden close—I yield.
—Short has been my pilgrimage;
Ending—'tis a hard decree—
In the springtide of my age—
You that pray, O! pray for me!

"Only friend, sweet mistress, mine!
True affection's prize and stay;
All my life was promised thine,
Ah! and scarce I lived a day!
Village people, soothe my flower;
When, too soon, at evening she
Wanders near the belfry tower,
Faintly sighing—'Pray for me!'"

And now, what, in a few words, is the conclusion of this hasty survey? That an artificial atmosphere may force some poetical flowers, the gayest, perhaps, but not the most fragrant, into a surprising bloom:—but that no robust or various growth will arise where a free current of the human spirit does not blow upon the soil.

Unequalled we may admit the minor French poets to be, in gracefully flattering the passions nursed by idleness, and as ministers to elegant self-indulgence; but, in freshness, and truth, and excursiveness, they must not be compared with our own, or even with the German. On the one side, we see the enfant gâté of a pampered class; on the other, the wanderer trained in the school of common life—the fruits of whose healthier tuition more than compensate for the want of the nice refinement learned in antechambers and boudoirs. But admitting this preference, and, in part, even because of it, the finished productions of the artificial system will always be of high interest to those who take a thoughtful pleasure in the study of poetry; and the more numerous class who seek for amusement only, may find some entertainment in the attempt to recall strains which once lulled the silken Pompadours and Richelieus of the most pleasure-seeking race that the Christian world has yet seen, or is likely ever to see again. ROYAL DAN AND THE GOSPEL OF NO-POPERY.

[A new Song. Air—"British Grenadiers."]

Some talk of Alexander, some of Napoleon,
Some talk of Ney and Blücher, and some of Wellington.
But of all the world's brave heroes, there's one that leads the van,
Spite of No-No-Popery—'tis Erin's Royal Dan.
But, &c.

Full many a valiant hero has fought for Erin green;
But each was as a glimpse of joy with nights of woe between,
Till God, to base truth's temple sure, a billow-breasting man,
Apostle of the friendless poor, sent broad and Doric Dan.

Of old was preach'd a gospel, "Thy neighbour as thyself
Love;" and beware the Devil, the root of evil—pelf;
And tho' thou art a bishop big, 'tis in that gospel's plan,
Thou shalt not leave him bleeding there, the poor Samaritan!

But the Tories in green Erin, they preach'd for many years
The gospel of No-Popery to ancient ladies' fears;
And of this modern gospel the text precisely ran,
"Unless thou art a Pharisee, thou shalt not be a Man!"

Christ's white and virgin banners they dyed in human blood—
Themselves on purple cushion'd, their brothers in the mud—
Till God, in his good season, despite of bishop's ban,
Against their wild No-Popery, firm planted Royal Dan.

He preach'd the ancient gospel—Love Erin as thyself,
And grudge not some poor Papist a penny of the pelf;
God's golden rule of duty, "Man, love thy brother Man,"
Practise; then fear the palace, and then the Vatican.

The Tories him rude pelted with thick bedevilment,
The free fee of our true love they call'd it beggar's rent;
But, spite of Tory slander, and Orange-bigot ban,
The gospel of our Freedom spreads wide by Royal Dan.

Then look up, brave hearts, cheerily! though now we tug and toil,
Not distant is the day when our children they shall smile,
To think with what hoarse rattlings the death-doom'd Tory clan
Preached No-No-Popery in vain against King Dan.

HOWITT'S RURAL AND DOMESTIC LIFE OF GERMANY.*

THIS volume would be sure of a warm welcome from us, were it no more than as it vindicates our critical sagacity. When Mr. Howitt translated the ponderous and uncalled-for work of Dr. Cornelius, on the Student Life of Germany, which found so ungracious reception in England—which was indeed treated as a piece of sheer and rather clumsy book-making—it was said in Tait, That if the Translator had only given himself a little leisure to look about him, and then related his own observations and experiences of German life, he could not have failed to produce an original work, which would at once instruct and entertain his countrymen, and be cordially received by them. After all, the prediction required no very profound foresight; and here is the prophecy more than fulfilled. Mr. Howitt and his family have been stationary in Heidelberg for the greater part of three years; and in the autumn of last year, he, with Mrs. Howitt and their daughter, made a tour of three months to the principal capitals of Germany, and other places of note—the Baths and old castles, of course, included. His book is thus one of Travels, and also the substance of the experiences and observations of a protracted residence; and these not merely his own experiences, but including those of his accomplished partner, who, though she does not come prominently forward, may be imagined in many a scene, while not visible in any single page. The Book opens with the first vivid and sharp impressions of the Travellers on entering Germany, the author wishing to introduce his readers to that new land as nearly as possible in the manner in which he was introduced himself. The Rhine and its scenery must, at first sight, have been disappointing; but all came right at last. People go abroad, forgetting that the Rhine and the Rhine land are more captivating through historical and poetical associations than by the actual grandeur or picturesqueness of their scenery; and that the Rhine, without its castles, and convents, and ruined towers, and quaint old towns and villages, each the scene of some memorable fact, historical event, or wild legend, would of itself be of inferior interest to hundreds of the unsung rivers which ripple the surface of our globe.

Those who, last year, fancied that the Howitts had become too German, and that they unduly depreciated their own country and its people, will, in the present work, find no blemish of this unnatural kind. England is lauded, and proudly contrasted with Germany on many, and indeed on every point, in a manner which must satisfy the most thoroughly English Clay among us, if he possess any conscience. The Thames, accordingly, though somewhat out of place, receives a warm and filial tribute of praise, before it is hinted that "the exulting and abounding river" of Germany has a somewhat longer course; and contains a more majestic body of water in its bed, and has a more vigorous, though placid current.

Up the Rhine the Traveller is now ascending, somewhat disappointed in the altitude of the hills, and grievously so in the stunted growth of the timber that clothes the river banks, though forests were afterwards seen in the Land of Oaks worthy the name. Yet it cannot be a dull thing to sail up the Rhine, independently of its myriad associations and memories.

As the steamer ploughs its way, its swell rushes, in living ripples, amongst the grass and hanging flowers on its margin, or scours in curling silver the black adamant of its rocks. People in gay costumes enliven its smiling vineyards; and a life of boats, trade barges, and rafts, moves everywhere on its surface. The rivers of Germany are generally the great highways of its commerce, and its population gathers thickly on their banks. This is preëminently the case with the Rhine.

When you land in its towns you then become sensible of their peculiar character, and of the life in their hôtels. The bustle that appeared upon the stream, its banks and quays, here has disappeared again. All is quaint, old, still, and none of the sweetest. You see, as you land, plenty of solemn custom-house officers, in half military dress, and well mustachioed. As you proceed through the streets, you find around you gabled and picturesque white buildings, old squares and markets, with avenues of limes, or of dwarf acacias; people, many of them in the garb of centuries ago; and dreadful pavements. Coleridge has celebrated the six-and-thirty stenches of Cologne, and the invention of Cologne water to cover them; but a wide acquaintance with German towns leaves me the conviction that Cologne can boast no more queer odours than any other of the towns of the nation; for in most of them, as we shall have to show, every street, almost every house, and every hour, has its own appropriate, peculiar, and by no means enviable smell. The pavements, with a few exceptions, are of the most hobbly and excruciating kind. There appears no evidence of any systematic attention to them, or management of them. To pass through a German town or village in a carriage is one of the most rib-trying events in this life. But to walk through one is not much less hazardous. Russell, in his day, tells us, that to avoid being run over on the pavé by a barrow, you often step into the peril of getting your head split with an axe, or your arm torn off by a saw, from the people who are cutting up piles of firewood before the doors. This is pretty much the case yet. The pavés, where there are any, seem appropriated to every purpose but that of walking.

In short, the pavement and lighting are very much in the condition now that our provincial towns and some of our soi-disant capitals were within the last half century. Gas has not yet reached Vienna; and the streets in most of the towns are lighted by lamps suspended on ropes across them; while the cellar-doors opening on the street are still in the condition of the laigh shops of the High Street of Edinburgh, as described in The Antiquary. These, and similar annoyances, and the overpowering compound smells, are what first strike an Englishman in a German town; for people of other nations may not be so strongly affected, nor so exquisitely nose-wise. The inns fall next under notice:—

your mind with their great and naked-looking rooms; their great stone staircases, not particularly clean; their large table d'hôte rooms, with painted walls and ceilings, naked boarded floors, lots of smoking people, and muslin curtains with festooned hangings, of alternating colours, often of those belonging to the State in which they are. Their uncarpeted chambers, but with generally very cleanly scoured floors in pannels of different-coloured wood, the main part, however, being mostly of deal; their little beds, or rather cribs, without posts or curtains; and their peculiar cooking, and serving of the table, are what first fix your attention.

Yet the inns of Germany, and especially the hôtels at the more fashionable watering-places, have improved amazingly since the continent was thrown open to the English by the general Peace. When Miss Pigott—a traveller who has given us one of the best accounts of the domestic manners of the Germans which, prior to Mr. Howitt's work, we possessed—was at Baden shortly after the Peace, it was with difficulty that she found a lodging in a convent converted into an hôtel, of which she gives a humorous description. Mr. Sharpe (Conversation Sharpe) philosophized upon the utility of an English fine lady doing penance in a small whitewashed chamber, and a bed without curtains, as a salutary adversity; though he exhorted the maids to scrub the floor, the table, and chair; which the lively English lady rendered imperatively necessary, by overturning a pail of water in her apartment. We quote her description, to show the rapid march of improvement between the period of her visit, and that of the Howitt family. The ancient refectory of the convent had been transformed into the saloon of the table d'hôte.

The dinner passed pleasantly, for the Germans near me had the politeness to seek my conversation; and on rising from table, the Baron de Cotter, "Ecuyer du roi de Wurtemberg," led me to my room; it was floating in water, the chambermaids were still ejaculating on the deluge, or as they termed it, "the scandalous waste of water." "Grand dieu!" exclaimed my cavalier, in dolorous tone, "je connais cette chambre, et je vous plains; je ferai mon possible, pour vous procurer un autre plus commode." I found him to be son of the proprietor of the old convent, an eminent librarian at Stuttgard. The hôtel is rented by an old Frenchman, decorated with the ancient aristocratic "Ordre de St. Louis." I put on my hat to hurry out of this flood, and sallied forth alone, through the extensive, beautifully-laid-out walks on the hill that rises behind the hôtel, from whence is a commanding prospect up the narrow rich valley, that is irrigated by a quiet winding stream. This is not unappropriately called the Eden of Germany. The scene was beautiful, and might well win the heart to happiness.

The first patricians of Germany and France, resort yearly to them, [the baths;] also the Courts of Bavaria, and of the Duchy of Baden; it is therefore strange that the arrangements of the baths are not better attended to. Those in this barrack of an hôtel, are so appalling that I retreated in disgust; they are of the most common porous stone, in small dark cells, where we may suppose the sinning monks were confined for penance; the floors of uneven stone, without carpets or other necessary comforts. When I remonstrated, the unanswerable rebuke made me was, "The King of Bavaria and our own Grand Duke are perfectly satisfied with the accommodations, and receive great benefit to their chronic diseases, and to be sure they suffer greatly." After this able reply, I ascended to my whitewashed cell better pleased with it, where the moonbeams played o'er my couch, and the mice entered under the door, and frisking and capering with daring license, returning ever and anon into the corridor, to visit Mesdames Marmont and Lallemande, with others of my distinguished neighbours; but who would inhabit the hôtels in the town, when they can inhale uncontaminated breezes, and gaze from each window on paradise scenery, at the cost of these temporary sacrifices of comfort! . . . . . .

On producing my travelling breakfast service, and demanding hot water, they inquired what I meant by a kettle, and brought me an earthen jug of water well cooled. I found seated there, the family of L——e, last from Brussels; he was the captain of a trading vessel to China, imagining himself ennobled by his union with the sister of an M.P.; their daughter and reverend son have accompanied them; but there are few English, for Baden is not yet known to those travellers.

We have only the Irish family of Brabazon, the witty Mr. W. Spencer, Mr. Hoare, and the youngest son of Sir Robert Wilmot. . . . . For persons who love to study character, how much information and entertainment, as well as profitable lessons, may be gleaned; how many advantageous connexions in life may be formed, by availing ourselves of the custom throughout Germany, the mart of literature, by frequenting the table d'hôtes. We there find travellers of every nation, on less formal terms with each other, and under less disguise than in their private saloons; and those who study butterflies, birds, and insects, would do well to add the study of mankind. The English, from a sentiment of spurious pride, prefer a sulky repast in their own "chambre a coucher," (for private saloons, as at an English inn, are seldom to be procured,) to eating at the same convivial board with those of inferior rank, though he is almost certain to meet also with others of equal and superior station to himself; for all etiquette of this nature is waived,—the prince and the untitled hero mix in social converse; the waiter, who generally carves each dish at the sideboard, also assigns your place at the table, from the date of your arrival. While the English continue in this humour to avoid the natives of those countries their restless spirit induces them to invade, they might save themselves the expense of quitting their native isles, and content themselves to inspect the numerous picturesque beauties, the woods, wilds, the mountains and the lakes, and all the other picturesque scenery, wild and cultivated, the bounteous hand of God has scattered over the surface, and of which one half of those wandering people know nothing. I am more diffuse on this point, perhaps, from having already formed a most agreeable and eligible acquaintance in the old and respectable Baroness de Bleitwitz, the Baron her husband, and her sweetly modest and pretty daughter; they are of the little German court de Saxe Meiningen; the Baroness was dame d'honneur to the Duchess, mother of the princess who espoused our Duke of Clarence, and to whom we now look to extend our line of kings. On naming, accidentally, this recent royal marriage, commenced our intercourse. The old Baroness is enthusiastic in her panegyrics on the mild virtues, the gentle and pious character of her who may one day fill the throne of Great Britain. The Baroness, to use her own expression, received her at her birth "in my apron." Madame Bleitwitz was the chosen youthful companion of her highness, who, on bidding her farewell, presented her a little mother-of-pearl model of a ship, as a souvenir, her highness added, of her wish that Mlle. would visit her in England.

Every body has now seen or read of Baden; but Miss Pigott saw it early and well. She had letters to the Princess Amalie of Baden, and was invited to dine with the Queen of Bavaria, by the lady in waiting, whose homely accommodations are described in her neglected book.

The Queen of Bavaria and her suite are now here; her sister, the Princess Amalie of Baden, is with her. The King has been here, as also the Grand Duke of Baden, but they left before my arrival. These two sisters are much attached, and it is a great enjoyment to them thus to meet every summer, without the embarrassments of court etiquette. They occupy a small house opposite this hôtel; so small, that they go for dinner, and their receptions, every day to a larger house in the town, which has the windows closed during the morning, to keep it cool and fresh for their arrival. My letters were for the Princess Amalie of Baden; I remitted them, with cards for the lady in waiting. The next morning came the lady, Mlle. la Baronne de Bode, a charming young woman, and an elegant figure, freckled with the small-pox; but her fine dark eyes beam with intelligence and kindness. She is of Russian extraction, and, on the maternal side, the nearest remaining relative of the lately deceased Marchioness of Ormond.

Miss Pigott was told that a very plain toilet might suffice for a visit to the Princess—"a simple muslin robe, and smart cap or bonnet;" and when the English lady apologized for her poor chamber and unmade bed, the court dame assured her that hers was much inferior, and that she had no table of any sort. She said—

"I am obliged to place my mirror upon my bed; and I am also forced, in the intense morning sun, to trudge down and up the hill every day to my princess;" a lesson this that would astonish our courtly dames, and exclusive fine ladies; even their English abigails would rebel under such severe service, as they would denominate it.

While Miss Pigott was at Baden "the Coxe Hippesleys," a super-refined English family, suffered martyrdom under German ignorance of savoir faire, and German dirt. They afford an edifying specimen of both nations, as we see the German manners reflected in their fastidious niceness.

The Coxe Hippesleys have also left us, after her ladyship had made the tour of all the table d'hôtes in Baden, without succeeding in finding one to her satisfaction. She had commenced by presenting herself at this hôtel, and interrupted our cheerful sociability by her loud unfavourable criticisms of each dish, and of everything presented to her acceptance. Addressing her complaints to me, "the table-cloth is dirty."—"That is true," I answered, "but follow my example; bring your own clean napkin, and spread it wide under and around your plate."—"The salt-cellar has no spoon."—"Bring your own salt," at the same time pointing out to her observation my portable salt-box. "The knives and forks are detestable; moreover, they serve as tooth-picks to the company, and afterwards to the waiters, and who knows whether they will be cleaned on the morrow!"—"Bring your own, my lady, as I do."—"So I could, but I will not."—"Although you have them at your apartment!—two servants are at this moment in attendance behind your chair, who might have brought them, and Sir John sitting so contented by your side!"—"Oh! he is used to these practices amongst his old cronies, and I do believe, likes all this barbarous filth;" so saying, her peevish ladyship rose to begone. "Then go to the hôtel de Saumon," said I, quite cross at this determination to make herself uncomfortable—and to the Saumon she went, and afterwards to search the town, for the means of having her dinner half warm, served in her own apartment, very angry that I did not display more kindliness of feeling for her self-created evils.

Matters are greatly changed and improved since those days, though in some quarters they are bad enough still. The "honest Germans" can also, according to Mr. Howitt, be a little extortionate occasionally; though this must hold more or less of horse-hirers and innkeepers the whole world over.

The absence of the dwellings of a resident aristocracy, and of the rural villas of an affluent middle class, and also of domestic animals, all the cattle being stalled nearly the whole year round, gives the landscape a heavy, dreary look in English eyes. This, in a country where, in spite of great apparent slovenliness, and the rudeness of the agricultural implements, the most is made of every inch of the soil by the numerous peasant proprietors, who are themselves the cultivators of their own fields, must be found the most advantageous mode of managing cattle, especially where the mountain tops are covered with wood for fuel, the slopes with vineyards, and the plains with corn, It besides saves the expense of enclosures. There are consequently few pastures—

You look in vain for anything like the green fields and hedge-rows of England, with their scattered trees, groups of beautiful cattle or flocks grazing in peace, and sweet cottages, farm-houses, and beautiful mansions of the gentry. It is all one fenceless and ploughed field. Long rows of trees on each side of the roads are all that divide them from the fields, and in the south these are generally fruit trees. The beauty of Germany lies only, or with few exceptions, amongst its hills. . . . . All here is open and bald; the people are collected into villages of the most prosaic kind, and no gentry reside among them. In fact, what we call country life in England is here unknown. . . Far and wide, the country, without a single fence, covered with corn and vegetables, as seen from the heights which bounded it, presented a most singular appearance to an English eye. Its predominating colour, at that time of the year, was that of ripening corn, but of different hues, according to its different degrees of ripeness, and the different kinds of grain. This is not planted in those vast expanses which you see in the corn-farms of Northumberland and Lincolnshire; but in innumerable small patches and narrow stripes, because belonging to many different proprietors. Some is also sown in one direction, and some in another; with patches of potatoes, mangel-wurzel, kidney-beans, &c., amongst it; so that it presented to the eye the appearance of one of those straw table-mats of different colours which one has seen.

Here and there you saw villages lying in the midst of the corn plain, and large woods, but not a hedge, and few scattered trees; the long rows of those marking out the highways, being the only dividing lines of the country. As we passed these trees, we observed that they were principally apple, pear, plum, cherry, and walnut trees. One could not help feeling how these trees would be plundered in England, being set, as it were, by the very road, for that purpose; and, indeed, here thorns fastened round the boles, and stuck between the branches of the cherry trees, where the fruit was ripening, spoke clearly of marauders. . . . . .

We passed through several of the Dorfs, or villages. They had a primitive, heavy, and thoroughly agricultural air. The houses are built of stone, large and heavy, and each having a great round-headed gateway leading into a sort of inner court, or farm-yard. We observed numbers of women at work in the fields, without shoes, stockings, bonnets, or caps. They were healthy, contented, sun-burnt creatures, many of them picturesque enough for any painter of primitive life. What, however, riveted our attention quite as much, were the country wagons and horses. The wagons are the oddest old jumbling things imaginable. What a contrast to the jolly fat horses, and ponderous painted wagons of the English farmer! The set-out of a first-rate English farmer or miller, to say nothing of the wagons and drays of the London brewers, cannot frequently be of less value than £300. Most of these vehicles may be worth from five pounds to five shillings, and are drawn by two or three horses a-breast; the horses of a lightish bay or black, of a slouching look and gait, and harnessed in ropes; if there be four, the two foremost a long way a-head of the other two.

The gentlemen's carriages and "turn-out," and the public vehicles, are treated with something almost approaching to contempt by one trained from childhood to the "right and tight" and universally handsomely appointed equipages of England, whether they be those of the duke or the drayman. No English tradesman would show his face or his wife's bonnet in a carriage like that in which the Duke of Brunswick arrived at Heidelberg. The wagons of the peasants or Bauers seem more to resemble the vehicles in which the Irish drag their turf from the bogs than any sort of carriage which is to be seen in England.

Here comes one wagon with one horse, of course, on one side of the long great pole, with nothing on the other; here another with three horses abreast, and straggling so far apart as to fill the whole road, and make you look about to see how they are to pass without your being run over. They are generally on the trot, driven by a Bauer, in his proper and peculiar costume;—in Baden, a large black cocked-hat, a long blue coat or blue jacket, a pair of blue hempen trousers, and strong boots. They sit in front of their wagon, and, with pipe in mouth and heavy whip in hand, go on smoking and cracking their whips over their horses' heads. All the drivers, in fact, in this country, whether of wagons, eil-wagons, coaches, omnibuses, stage-wagons, or of the indescribable variety of odd vehicles that you see, keep up an eternal smoking and cracking of whips. The postilion with his four or six horses, setting out with some nobleman's carriage, goes off making the street resound with the thunder of his whip, which is only exceeded in noise by the clatter of his horses and the rumble of his vehicle over the rough stones.

But we must not yet leave the Bauer and his wagon for the postilion—of him more anon. The Bauers come trotting along to the market-town with all kinds of country loads; bags of corn, hampers of fruit and vegetables, straw and hay. Often, but more frequently in returning, they have loads of country people, presenting the most varied groups and dresses;—women, old and young, smart and homely, without caps or bonnets, or in the little close things which are cap and bonnet both; and men of all sorts are seen in these wagons, sometimes from the gentleman to the sunburnt labourer. The postilion, returning with his horses, ties them to the tail of the wagon, gets in, and with his miscellaneous companions, sits laughing and chatting. Every one, or nine out of ten, has in his mouth his long pipe with a large earthenware head, and all are smoking and merry.

The wagons are often drawn by bullocks, and even by cows, for in Germany sex, and the peculiar duties it imposes, give no immunity from slavish field labour. But German wagons, like other things German, have their bright side. They carry good big loads for one thing; and they are light and elastic; and after all—

Might be introduced in England, to the great advantage of small proprietors, as well as for general use, where the country is hilly and the roads rocky. They will bend in an uneven way like a snake, and their lightness makes them far more fit for many purposes than our heavy and unyielding, and much more expensive carts. For such districts as Scotland, Wales, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and the hilly tracts of Derbyshire and Yorkshire, they would be admirably adapted.

Mr. Howitt is quite poetical on the subject of the happy English cow luxuriating in rich pastures and by still waters, when compared with her hard-worked and imprisoned German counterpart.

The village of Rohrbach a haunt of the inhabitants and students of Heidelberg, is selected as a fair specimen of the German dorf or village in general.

The houses had the same heavy look which the houses of the German dorfs commonly have, with plenty of old, tall roofs, and leaning gables turned towards the street; and great round-headed gateways in the farm-houses leading into their yards. The streets, as is usual, were long, and paved with huge uneven stones. One side of the street was left unpaved for a little brook to run down it, and over this bridges of great stones were laid to the houses. Down the other side of the street ran another little stream in a gutter, and in this the geese were sitting and forming dams with their bodies, in which they nibbled, and ducked, and washed themselves. The whole long street, from bottom to top, was full of these geese. Some of them, in flocks, were flying up and down, and making no little clangour. As usual, there were the brunnens spouting out their never-ceasing water into their great troughs, and women collected with their tubs about them, in full gossip; and the cows, released at this the peasant's dinner time, half-past ten, from their yokes and labour, also crowding round the troughs to drink. Plenty of funny-looking children, and some other grown-up people completed the scene.

The children are odd little objects; thick, well fed, and with plenty of hair, in German fashion; the little girls in bodices, which seemed ready to burst with plumpness, and all, however small, with their hair in tails; the larger having their tails hanging down their backs, and the smaller, having theirs brought from the sides of their heads in hanging bows to their ears, over which they pass. Most of them were without shoes and stockings. The boys were going in groups, with creels on their backs, to the plain to collect grass for the cows.

One picturesque group, having amongst them a lad with his father's cocked hat on, we prevailed upon, by the offer of a kreutzer, the third of a penny, to stand and be sketched.

Such groups are represented on the page by spirited wood-engravings from designs by Sargent; and we may say of all these marginal and other embellishments, that they are truly illustrations of the text, and not merely decorative irrelevancies or pretty impertinences. The peasants of this dorf are said to be Jews, agricultural Jews! a thing not easy for an Englishman to conceive.—Here is a pleasing out-door picture, which moreover tells a story of national manners.

As we returned, we saw large groups of peasants dining under the trees in the fields. Women were bringing from Heidelberg large baskets on their heads containing provisions. The dinners seemed principally contained in two large pans or dishes; one of soup, and one of small puddings called noodles, floating in sauce, or something of a pudding kind in a fluid state. Some of these puddings were little balls of flour and potatoes, dotted with little lumps of fried black bread, and which to a too fanciful eye looked like raisins. The people lay or sat, men and women, round the large dishes, all eating together out of them with long spoons. They formed picturesque groups: the men stripped; the women, many of them, in bodices of red-stripped linen, of which the Germans make their bed-ticks, and which look very lively. Many of the girls too, bronzed with the sun, looked all health and solidity. About stood boots, which the men had pulled off to cool their feet as they lay at rest, baskets and stone bottles. Two boys were dining under a tree on brown bread and little pears, which they drew from a bag, and seemed to divide very carefully between them. These boys had nothing to drink, and said they were accustomed to have nothing to drink to their field dinners, not even water. The homeliness of the fare of these peasants would no little astonish the stomachs of our bean-and-bacon devourers of our harvest-time in England.

Mr. Howitt was particularly struck by the universal Sunday practice of the people of the towns all over Germany, whether Protestant or Papist. With one consent they run away to the country:—

It would shock the religious of England to see how, on a Sunday, the Germans of all classes are flocking off into the country, as on all other leisure occasions, in the summer: to see, early on Sunday mornings, families of sobriety and of high standing, and even those of grave professors, setting forth for a long day's excursion. By seven o'clock you will see them going out, having not the least idea that to resort to some distant village amongst the hills, perhaps to go to church there, perhaps not, but at all events to proceed to some rural inn, and there, or in the woods, spend the day in social enjoyment, has anything at all amiss in it. Nothing is more common; and on these, and on all such occasions, they will do what would never be thought of in England. They will take tea and sugar, and if necessary, fine bread; and eating and drinking of their own, will pay the good-natured landlord for his attendance and the use of his house.

One delightful Sunday in August '41 was thus spent by Mr. Howitt and his family, among the hills and woods, with some German friends. Of this adventure there is a beautiful description, of which we shall merely notice the close; premising, as Mr. Howitt carefully does, that before setting out on their rural ramble they had attended service at nine o'clock:—

As we approached Guiberg, we saw it standing amid its corn-plots; its garden-plots all unfenced, its green sloping fields, and its scattered fruit trees, having a very sweet but very German look. When we entered the village itself, of course it was like all German villages—the same scene of heavy houses, most of them having their lower story occupied by their cows; of heaps of wood, ploughs, and wagons; but around it lay delightful old bowery orchards, and in one of these belonging to the Wirthshouse, or inn, we dined. With a bottle of the country wine, some roast beef, and plenty of cherries, for which this village is famous far and wide, we made as merry as if we had been dining with Joe Miller himself. The children from the neighbouring orchards came about to look on, to whom we gave bread and meat, which they were at first too shy to take, but when we turned our backs it vanished with a wonderful velocity. Two boys were set by a gentleman of the party to see which could soonest devour a piece of black bread for three kreutzers—one penny—which they did to their own danger of choking, and great merriment of the spectators. Others were set to hop for a kreutzer; and watching this, and a set of bauers playing at nine-pins, the time soon fled by. We went on, and took tea at Bommerthal, where the hostess, a village belle who had probably never seen tea before, for the party took it with them, boiled it in a dirty pan, and made an awful and untouchable mess of it. The bauers were in the public-houses in this village, singing and drinking in a manner that would have horrified Sir Andrew Agnew, and made us think that, for a serious and sentimental nation, the Germans had the least show of being a religious one imaginable.

We proceeded in a fine calm and shining evening to the last village before our return, Neckergemünd, down a green valley, at the feet of steep old beech-woods, and past old water-mills of a primitive character. The whole country in itself was charming, but was like a country in a dream,—a country without animals. There were neither cow, horse, sheep, swine, hare, pheasant, partridge, or scarcely any bird to be seen. In such a country in England we should have seen flocks and herds; and, towards evening, the hares and pheasants would have been seen feeding on the outskirts of the woods in scores, and we should have heard the partridges calling each other together for the night. Here was nothing, even of a winged nature, except a few small birds and one solitary crow.

They reached Petersthal, or the Valley of Peter, lying among the hills, and swarming with human life. The people here were Catholics:—

Everywhere in these valleys you see the people busy in their possessions. Men and women and children are at work in the fields. Down the hills come women and children from the woods, carrying on their heads loads of fuel, or dragging great bundles of boughs down the narrow hollow ways after them. Others are cutting grass for the pent-up cattle;—women are mowing much oftener than the men. Below are groups of women with bare legs, washing by the clear stream. Quantities of linen are spread out to dry and to bleach; and round the houses are stalking plenty of fowls, while a large dog barks at you from his kennel as you pass the mill, or little poodles, with cock-a-side tails, bark at you from the cottages, and geese clap their wings and clangour in the brook.

This Petersthal is a great place for bleaching and washing, and all along lay the white patches of linen on the green meadow grass, and groups of the stoutest and most healthy-looking girls stood washing by the doors as we passed; while numbers of children ran about, many of them with nothing more than a shirt on. Here was one holding two cows by a rope tied to the horns, to graze by the wayside, and here another holding a goat. It was harvest time, and hot weather. The women were cutting their harvest, the men being gone to the greater harvest of the plain.

The Catholic character of the valley was obvious by the little images of the Virgin in niches in the front of the cottages as we passed. These images are of the most wretched kind; little things of gaudily-coloured plaster, bought of the wandering Italian dealers. But at the head of the glen stood a little chapel, which is a perfect specimen of what you find so commonly in Catholic districts, at once indicating so much devotion and so much poverty.

We do not learn that Mr. Howitt thought his Sunday ill-spent, nor do we think it was; though the Sunday, every Sabbath, thus spent not only without public worship, but without the deeper sanctity of serene stillness, and unbroken solitude, and the self-communion of the immortal spirit with itself, would seem a strange perversion of the institution.

The peasants of Germany appear to lead a hard life. Not only the direct stimulus of interest, but dire necessity render these small proprietors industrious. "They labour busily early and late," not only because they are labouring for themselves, but because they must work, and work hard, or else starve:—

The women and children all work as well as the men, for it is family work; nay, the women often work the hardest. They reap, thrash, mow, work on the fallows, do anything. In summer, without shoes and stockings, clad in a dark blue petticoat and body of the same, or in other colours, according to the costume of the neighbourhood, and with their white chemise sleeves in contrast with their dress, and with their hair burnt of a singed brown, or into different hues, with the sun, they are all out in the hot fields. Nay, you may even see women driving a wagon, in which two or three men are sitting at ease smoking. They take the dinners to the fields; frequently giving to the lesser children a piece of bread, and locking them up in the cottage till they come home again; the older ones being at the school till they join them in the afternoon.

This would be thought a hard life in England; but hard as it is, it is not to be compared with the condition of labourers in some agricultural parts of a dear country like England, where eight or nine shillings a-week, and no cow, no pig, no fruit for the market, no work in the winter, but dependence for everything on a master, a constant feeling of anxiety, and the desperate prospect of ending his days in a Union workhouse, is too commonly the labourer's lot. The German peasants work hard, but they have no actual want. Every man has his house, his orchard, his road-side trees, as we have seen, commonly so hung with fruit that he is obliged to prop and secure them all ways, or they would be torn to pieces. He has his corn-plot, his plot for mangel-wurzel, for hemp, and so on. He is his own master; and he, and every member of his family, have the strongest motives to labour. You see the effect of this in that unremitting diligence which is beyond that of the whole world besides, and his economy, which is still greater.

The Germans, indeed, are not so active and lively as the English. You never see them in a bustle, or as though they meant to knock off a vast deal in a little time. You never witness that scene of stir and hurry that you often do in England; that shouting to one another, and running, where the need of despatch rouses all the life and energy of the English character. They are, on the contrary, slow, but for ever doing. They plod on from day to day, and year to year—the most patient, untirable, and persevering of animals. The English peasant is so cut off from the idea of property, that he comes habitually to look upon it as a thing from which he is warned by the laws of the large proprietors, and becomes, in consequence, spiritless, purposeless, and at once the terror and the victim of the capitalists. The German bauer, on the contrary, looks on the country as made for him and his fellow men. He feels himself a man; he has a stake in his country, as good as that of the bulk of his neighbours; he is content with his black bread, because his labour has at once created it and sweetened it to his taste, and because no proud man can threaten him with ejection or the workhouse, so long as he is active and economical. He walks, therefore, with a bold step; he looks you in the face, with the air of a free man, but of a respectful one; and he knows that when he dies, he shall not be buried between the vile boards of a pauper's coffin, threatening to fall asunder before they reach the grave, nor be consigned to the knife of the surgeon; but his children will lay him by his fathers, and plant the rose, the carnation, and the cross on his grave—Zum Andenken des frommen Vaters to the memory of the good father—and will live the same active and independent life, on his native soil, or seek it in America or Australia.

Hence his continual activity and content. He has no ambition to be other than he is; he wears the costume which his fathers wore; the long coat, and cocked or hollow-sided hat, the bauer's costume, and he turns everything about him to account.

We have already seen how perseveringly the women and children gather grass and weeds everywhere for the cows. Nothing that can possibly be made use of is lost. The children may be seen standing in the stream in the villages carefully washing weeds before they are given to the cattle. As we meet them and the women with large bundles of grass on their heads tied in large cloths, one cannot but call to mind the immense quantities by our highway sides and great green lanes in England, and by wood-sides, which grow and wither, which might support many a poor man's cow.

We leave it to our readers, in contrasting these conditions, to draw their own inference. The German peasants turn everything that grows to account, and improve every inch of the soil, so that a slovenly-looking surface is in reality more productive than the trimly-dressed fields of our most scientifically cultivated farms. The great drawback on German domestic life in the eyes of the English is, of course, the dirt, and carelessness or sluttishness, which converts their humble homes into a kind of purgatory to cleanly people. It is however truly said, that women, whether matrons or maidens, cannot be at the same time occupied in hard field-labour, and, like the English housewife, washing, scouring, mending, and making the cottage home a paradise of neatness and beauty. The houses of the German peasants are generally their own. They are substantially built of stone, and are roomy; and, what is more to the purpose—

It is probable that they have less real anxiety in them than those of the English; but, in all else which makes our humble homes attractive, what a contrast! Outwardly, there is little of the picturesque or of neatness about them, except their orchards and vineyards; inwardly, how dingy, and dirty, and cheerless! In winter, instead of the blazing fire casting its pleasant glow on all the walls, a black iron stove in a corner seems to make the gloomy place gloomier. There are troops of children, none of the cleanest, often seeming to have their large heads set on as large bodies, with very little neck, and with very unkempt hair; and the smells which proceed from one thing or another are inexpressible, and often almost stifling. This want of cleanliness and neatness, and these repulsive smells, meet you in all the houses of the common people. In country inns, where the English have not been accustomed to go, you find it a most difficult matter to harden yourselves to the endurance of passing a night. In the houses of the burgher class it is too often the same. A sense of want of cleanness, a feeling of grit and dust under your feet on the naked floor, fill you with disgust to everything; but how the pungent and peculiar smells of common German houses are compounded it would be difficult to say. Even in good houses in cities, where suites of rooms are let, especially where there are shops below them, you have such over-powering odours as make them intolerable. With this nuisance, no doubt, sour-krout, sour paste—with which, spite of the superiority of yeast, they still persist to leaven their bread, and which therefore stands long fermenting in their kneading-tubs—a sort of sour curds, and soft cheeses, with which you see the children's faces often smeared from eyes to chin; their tobacco, their oils and vinegar in their perpetual salads, have pretty close connexion. Into such houses as I have had occasion to enter, as into country inns, bauers' houses, and those of tradesmen, many of them carrying on much business, I have seldom or never been surprised by an air of neatness and cleanliness, but have often been so nearly stifled as to be obliged to make a speedy retreat. One cannot conceive how these people can live in it; but custom has made them entirely unconscious of all this, and probably these "aromatic gales" and rich atmospheres may even to them have become charming.

Mr. Howitt has not yet, we suppose, seen the Sanitary Report lately circulated; nor the Vicar of Norham's Tract on the wretched cottages of the industrious Northumbrian peasants. Many of these rack-rented hovels, from which the tenants are liable to be ejected every half-year, are, we make no question, kept with as great neatness as is possible, and are, in the season, embowered in roses, and creepers. But something more is required. When Mr. Inglis travelled in Ireland, he, at first, as he tells us, was delighted to see a cottage with a rose or honeysuckle trained to its walls; but by and by he knew better, and hailed, instead of these flowery decorations, the reeking dung-heap—which spoke of potatoes in harvest, and "the bellyful;" now the great want of England, as it ever has been of Ireland.

In Germany the Scottish saying, that "women's wark is never done," is peculiarly appropriate. There must ever be some kind of out-door work going forward for women, where there is as constant a rotation of crops as those of a market gardener; carrots, poppies, hemp, flax, saintfoin, lucerne, rape, and all sorts of turnips, with peas, beans, vetches, madder, Indian corn, tobacco, millet, &c., &c., coming each in turn.

You may see the Rhine-plain cleared in fine weather in a fortnight of all its corn, the greater part of the ground where it stood again ploughed up and prepared for turnips or green food for autumn; and the girls in their great straw-hats busy hoeing the tobacco.

These girls, as I have said, are very picturesque; most of them bare-legged, and, according to the part of the country in which they live, in the quaint and showy costume of the district. In one place, in those great broad straw-hats, wide as umbrellas; in another, in little white caps or little black ones, covering just the back of the head; here with a black handkerchief thrown over the head in the form of a hood; there with a red one in the same style; and in a third district with a white one. In one part they have the head tied in a red handkerchief, much in the French style; in another, with broad black ribbons hanging from the back of their high-peaked bonnet down their backs; in others, a black hat, much like the Welch women; and in others, with nothing at all on their heads, but having them exposed to the full blaze of an intense sun. Everywhere they are as healthy-looking as possible; and as they go from the field with their hoes on their shoulders, you cannot avoid remarking their upright figures and their free gait. Few of them are of more than the middle size, most under it; but they are built broad and strong, like little towers; and yet, spite of modern notions, have a most wholesome, heartsome, agreeable, and good-natured look. In fact, they far surpass in general the ladies of the educated classes, who, owing to the absurd system of swaddling in their infancy, and to tight-lacing and little exercise afterwards, present frequently the most lamentable spectacles of high-shouldered women imaginable. It is well for the beauty of the rising damsels that this swaddling system is now falling into disuse; but the grown-up young ladies are so strikingly marked by it, that you may almost to a certainty know a German girl from an English one, by only looking at their backs at a distance.

The old women look like ugly good-natured witches, and they labour on contentedly and industriously to the last.

When one remembers that each peasant family is labouring for itself, the following picture does not lack attraction. The corn harvest is over, and the groups of reapers have returned from the great plains :—

The latter part of the year, of course, is fully employed in gathering in their various crops. Pulling their hemp and flax, which you may sometimes see them besting the seed out of, in the fields, into an outspread sheet; getting their tobacco, and drying it in the upper parts of their houses, where they have contrivances for lifting up the tiles with little pegs to let in as much air as they want; or by hanging it to dry in open sheds, and on the walls of their houses, under shelter of the projecting roofs. In gathering and pitting their turnips, potatoes, mangel-wurzel, and other roots; and in their fruit-gathering. About the end of October the walnuts are battered down with poles, and the leaves all carefully swept up for manure. There are ladders everywhere reared into the trees. Those fine blue plums which hang by such millions by the waysides, and would tear the trees to pieces if they were not carefully secured, are gathered and converted, some into prunes, some into brandy, and others used for those nice large plum tarts or cakes, of half-a-yard wide, which they bake on tins, with the plums cut in halves, and stuck with the split side upwards all over them. Wagons are standing under the road-side apple-trees, with their patient cows, awaiting their loads. The families are all abroad, father, mother, and children, collecting their stores. Baskets full of ruddy apples are standing about, and showers of golden apples are lying in the green grass. A great portion of this fruit is intended for cider, or as they call it, apple-wine, for their own consumption.

Next comes the vintage, the crowning harvest of the year, which does not commence till about the 12th of October, though, of course, this must be regulated by the particular season. Vineyards do not seem profitable to small proprietors.

The vine culture is not considered a profitable one, and the growers are, for the most part, poor. Here and there a celebrated tract is a valuable property; but the small proprietor of an ordinary vineyard, like the small proprietor of corn-land, is compelled to rush into the market at the very earliest day with his produce, and receives but the jackal's portion of the profits. They are the dealer and capitalist in this, as in everything else, who make the golden harvest. They who know how, not only to buy, but to hold, to mix, to give fine and fashionable names to the growth of nameless hills, in short, to impose cleverly on the credulous world.

The vintage over, the simple peasantry, who have pouched only a lean price for the harvest of all their labours, are busy again carrying up fresh manure into their vineyards, and dig and work there till winter stops them, which, indeed, now strides on apace. In November you see the Germans, men and women, envelope themselves in their great cloaks whenever they appear abroad, which they never lay aside again till spring.

But the plodding industrious Germans have their seasons of leisure and relaxation, and their out-of-door pleasures, as well as their hard tasks. They have not forgotten the maxim, which has almost fallen into oblivion, even among the little children of manufacturing England, that

All work and no play
Makes Jack a dull boy.

In the towns the working classes have their balls and concerts; and, happier still, they have, in the country, places of resort, where the different classes meet to dance in the open air; and their village wakes, the Kirchweighs, are as regularly celebrated as were the parish Ales and Wakes of England three centuries ago. The nature of these amusements is illustrated by a description of a wake held at the Wolfsbrunnen, a favourite holiday resort of the people of Heidelberg. It is a sweetly rural spot, in the valley of the Neckar, embosomed in solitary woods and high hills; and an inn, near the Brunnen, affords, in its grounds, the kind of sylvan shades, and rustic bowers and benches, which makes the place, in some degree, approximate the tea-gardens of our large cities.

On most days in summer, but especially on Sundays and holidays, people flock hither both from the town and the country. Groups are found sitting at the tables, under the trees and sheds, with wine, beer, and pipes, curds, coffee, and other refreshments. Some are strolling about the private walks in the woodlands; some are lying on the dry turf of the hill slopes; and others are looking in admiration at the fish in the fountain, the pools, or the little brook beyond. . . . . .

On Tuesday the 12th of July, was one of their wakes, or kirchweighs, at the village adjoining, and it was of course a great day at the Brunnen. As we dressed in the morning, we saw crowds of people going out that way; young people in their best, and musicians with their books and instruments. In the evening we walked thither, and a gay scene it was. All along the way parties were going and coming. They were of all classes, but chiefly of those from the tradesmen and their families down to the working classes. All were well dressed; the young shopmen and mechanics, of course, imitating the students in dress and manner as much as possible; the young women were very well dressed, but all without caps or bonnets, as is the universal custom of those of the ordinary class. They have generally very well-shaped heads of dark glossy hair, which is dressed in a very nice and graceful manner, and nothing can be more pleasing than their appearance, as they thus walk out into the country, having on nothing more than they wear in the house, except a shawl. Many of them are pretty, and all, from their simple and out-of-door habits, have a clear hue, and tone of health and glad-heartedness about them, which is a beauty itself.

As we approached the Brunnen, we saw a dense crowd there. The sheds and tables were all occupied. There were groups of fierce-looking, whiskered and smoking students; other groups of families, with their choppin, or glass measure of wine, and bread and butter, or cheese, and sundry cakes, enjoying themselves in quiet as they looked on the gaiety around them. The upper outside galleries of the house were filled with gay spectators. Donkies were standing ready saddled for such as chose to hire them for the young women returning to the town, and music announced that dancing was going on near. This we found was in a large shed close to the inn. Several of the trout reservoirs were planked over to prevent people walking into them, and a throng of gazers surrounded the dancing scene. There was a sort of orchestra at one end, at which twenty couples were waltzing. It would have looked strange in England to see shop-boys and girls, nay, shoemakers' and tailors' apprentices, joiners, smiths, boots, or anybody, waltzing with their smart-dressed girls in the shed at a country wake. It would want but this to put waltzing out of fashion with all the other classes of our countrymen. But Germany is the country of waltzing; the waltz is the universal and almost only dance of the people, and they could just as well live without tobacco as it. From the highest saloon in Vienna or Berlin, to the lowest shed in the village, or to the village green, round spin the Germans, and are as happy as if they were in Paradise; nay, what would Paradise be to them without a long pipe, a tall glass of beer, a smart girl, and a brisk waltz! The dancing indeed, here, would not have disgraced a splendid saloon. . . . . Here and there was a student in the circle, dancing with some pretty girl of Heidelberg; and we could not avoid being reminded of Goëthe, as he describes himself in his life, mixing in such scenes at Frankfort, with the fair girl destined afterwards to figure as Margaret in Faust.

There was no quarrelling nor drunkenness; and though the gaiety was kept up till a very late, or rather early hour for Germany, many of the revellers were seen sauntering back to town by eight o'clock. The non-observance of Sunday in Germany is deprecated by Mr. Howitt, though not upon the Agnew principle. He wishes to see the Sabbath a day of complete rest for artisans, and as far as is possible for servants and shopmen.

It is melancholy to see young men, who have been confined all the week, dangling about in the shops, where they have seldom anything to do, leaning with their shoulders against the door-posts, when they should be in the free air, breathing health of both body and mind.

The Kirchweigh of every village is celebrated for several successive days. It is a season of general rejoicing and visiting; of eating and drinking, dancing and playing, and social merriment. It is like the Handsel Monday and Handsel Tuesday, &c. of Scotland. Monday and Tuesday are the great feast days, but Sunday is the grand holiday; and, on Tuesday afternoon, they bury the weigh, that is, the garlands that have been used, and conclude the festival with a grand drinking-bout.

Field-sports, from the tenure of the land, are little known in Germany, Free, happy England is, comparatively, since the French Revolution, the great country where game is exclusively preserved, at the expense of the industrious, for the amusement of the rich. Hunting and coursing in their fields, will not be submitted to by the sturdy German peasantry, though the attempt has been made to introduce those sports, and English packs of hounds imported by some of the Princes; but the peasants resolutely and wisely resist the innovation, wherever it has been attempted to hunt on their lands.

The German bauers and farmers have no faith, and it is quite impossible to persuade them, as it has been attempted to persuade the farmers in England, that it does their corn good to have it in winter ridden over and torn to pieces by a troop of horsemen. On the contrary they insist on wild-schaden, or damages done by game, wherever deer, hares, or other game are encouraged by the nobility to the injury of their crops; and the laws support them strongly in this, and give them damages strictly, so that many nobles and princes have yearly large sums on this score to pay.

There is thus some shooting in the corn plains, but very little hunting. Where the nobility hold vast possessions in their own hands, as in Lower Austria, and in Bohemia and Moravia where the peasants are serfs, the pleasures of the chase are enjoyed by the nobility in all their amplitude and magnificence.—These amusements of the nobles are, however, less attractive to us than the out-of-door pleasures of the peasants. Considering that the climate is severe for many months of every year, the Germans live more in the open air than any other European people. Many of their social pleasures—their wine, beer, and coffee-drinkings and concerts—are enjoyed in the open air.

It is the same in every village, in every town, in every capital. Public walks, public music, cafées, and cassinos, coffee and wine-drinking, and smoking and knitting under trees, call out the whole population, high and low, great and small, old and young; and there does not seem a care from Berlin to Strasburg, from Cologne to Pesth. Nay, much as the French live out of doors, the Germans far excel them in this species of life. All their musical art is called forth, and their greatest masters are employed, to give a charm to this mode of social existence. Every means is adopted to give facility to the enjoyment of this taste. . . . . .

There is one advantage that their towns universally possess over ours; and that is, in the abundance of public walks, and public gardens and promenades, where every citizen can wander, or can sit and rejoice with his family and his friends. All round their towns, in general, you find these ample public walks and promenades planted with trees, and furnished with seats. . . .

In England, every man takes care of himself, and makes his own nest snug; besides lighting and paving, little seems done for the public in our towns. Here, on the contrary, the public enjoyment seems to be the favourite and prevailing idea; and you see around you perpetual evidences of its working. The people have, in the outskirts of their cities, their vineyards, and their summer-houses in them, where they can go with their families and friends. But they have, again, their great public gardens and woodlands all round their large towns, to ten or a dozen miles' distance. They have similar places of more rustic resort, often on the most beautiful mountain heights, and in mountain valleys, to which they pour out on all Sundays and leisure days, in carriages and by railroads, by thousands. Here they have wine, and curds, and often dinners. Here they even come with their families, taking whole troops of children with them; and there you find them in old orchards, amid castle ruins, under the trees, and, in short, through all the surrounding hills and valleys. They dine in great family groups—the men sitting often in their shirt-sleeves; the children rolling in the grass; and the landlords hurrying about, dealing out plates and viands to hungry people, in a broil of what seems hopeless hurry. They afterwards smoke their pipes, drink their coffee, and go home at an early hour as happy as this earth can make them. In every country town and village it is the same.

This constant source of humanizing pleasure, must add greatly to the cheerfulness and content of the mass of the people, and tend to keep them from grumbling at the political institutions of their country—

All royal gardens, too, are open, and the people walk in them, and stream round the palaces, passing, in many instances, through their very courts and gateways, just as if they were their own. Nay, the royal and ducal owners walk about amongst the people with as little ceremony as any of the rest. The Emperor of Austria, or the King of Prussia, does the very same. You may meet them anywhere; and little more ceremony is used towards them than is used towards any other individual, simply that of lifting your hat in passing, which is done to all your acquaintance, and is returned as a mark of ordinary salutation. You will see princes sitting in public places with their friends, with a cup of coffee, as unassumingly and as little stared at as any respectable citizen. You may sometimes see a Grand Duke come into a country inn, call for his glass of ale, drink it, pay for it, and go away as unceremoniously as yourself. The consequence of this easy familiarity is, that princes are everywhere popular, and the daily occurrence of their presence amongst the people prevents that absurd crush and stare at them which prevails in more luxurious and exclusive countries.

The same open and general enjoyment of scenery extends to all other estates and gardens. The country-houses of the nobility and gentry are surrounded on all sides with public and private walks. They have seldom any fences about anything but their private gardens. The people go and walk everywhere, and never dream of trespassing, nor are ever told of such a thing. This is one of the great charms of this country. All woods, with the rare exception of a deer park, are thus entirely open and unfenced. You wander where you will, with the most perfect feeling of giving no offence. Here are no warning-boards, no threats of steel-traps or spring-guns. A wisp of straw stuck on a pole, the usual sign in Germany of warning, in vintage time, gives you notice that a private walk, which all the rest of the year is open, is then closed; or a wisp hung on the bough of a tree in the forest, tells you that the common people are not to cut boughs there, or that young trees are planted, and you are not to tread them down. Everywhere else, you go where you please, through woods, valleys, meadows, gardens, or fields; and while property is sacred to the possessor, nature is, as it should be, unrestrictedly yours, and every man's.

In this blessed freedom, and with this simple and thorough line of nature and of society, there is no country in the world where social and summer life are more enjoyed than in Germany. You are perpetually invited to join a party to a wood-stroll, to go to some lovely village in the hills or the forest, or to some old farm-house, where you get milk and coffee, and take bread with you perhaps; where you find a Tanz-boden, or shed, where the young people can have a dance; where the old sit, and look on, and smoke, and talk, and knit. Or to some old mill, where you have the same accommodations; or to some inn, on an eminence overlooking a splendid country, as that of the Rhine or Danube, and where, on the terrace, the whole company will play at those simple games so much liked in Germany, as the black man, the blind cow, and others; where all, high and low, old and young, run and laugh, and are as merry as so many boys and girls.

But it is in the capitals that this social out-of-door life is carried to the greatest extent, as well as to the highest pitch of perfection. The most celebrated bands, band-masters, and musical composers of Germany, are in daily requisition to give the highest impetus and enchantment to the popular enjoyment. . . . . .

Vienna is the capital not merely of Austria but of German gaiety. Every day, instead of announcements of auctions and sermons, its walls are plastered with those of concerts, balls, soirées, music vereins, operas, plays, and Belustigungen or pleasure-meetings of a hundred descriptions; mingled with pilgrimages to celebrated shrines—things not less picturesque and amusing, and often not less gay and festive. Every day the lover of pleasure, and the student of human nature and its vagaries, finds himself not at a loss for employment, but distracted with a host of advertisements of the most bewitching spectacles and entertainments. Here is Strauss, there Lanner; here is Staudigl, there Lutzer; here is a ball at Sperls or Zum Zeisig; the Prater is to be magnificent with fire-works and Volks-freude; the roundabouts will all be in full action; the entertainment at the Lust-haus most alluring; the stream of carriages and fashionable people on the drives most splendid. Go where you will, you will find thousands and tens of thousands seated in the gardens, netting, knitting, talking, listening to the musical bands, parading in the circle round the orchestra, drinking coffee or sugar-water, eating confections and ices in the cassino. The Folks theatre will call you one way with its drolleries, the opera another; and at Sperls, or the fashionable Dommayer's at Hitzing, you will find the dance going on in the saloon, and the same crowd of family or friendly parties, seated in the area under the trees, which are all hung with lamps, supping and knitting, giving at the same time one eye to the dance in the saloon, and one ear to the music in the orchestra. There are no people on the face of the earth that all summer long enjoy themselves like the Germans in their gay capitals; but autumn approaches, and the great climacteric of the year is reached. The whole nation is astir. Not a man or woman can rest long.

And so they roam abroad through the cities, and watering-places, and fine scenery of their country, or go into Switzerland, but seldom stray farther. Religious processions and pilgrimages are still among the amusements of the Catholic parts of Germany, and also mummeries and grotesque dramatic representations resembling those which have long since become obsolete among our sober and ever-working people. The observances of the Carnival, the New Year, and other great holiday times, are very fully detailed in the "Social Life of Germany," and have a wonderful charm, were it only from reviving the memory of the merry old times of Merry England. But there is change in progress even in stereotyped Germany; and the "genteeler circles" are taking to the self-same dull road in which we have so far outstripped them. Mr. Howitt quotes a writer in the public papers who eloquently laments the departure of the good old times, and the decay of the old German spirit, particularly in Munich, where,—

The increasing importance of the city, the more intimate connexions with the rest of Germany, the flourishing of the arts, and the resort of so many strangers, have introduced a new element of life, which, attacking that old south-German spirit on all sides, has driven it pretty nearly out of the field.

"Before this became the case, the tone of large companies was easy, free, and familiar. Every one was suffered to feel himself of some account in them; every one felt glad to be spoken to by another, though he had never seen him before; instead of making himself exclusive, every one was disposed to make advances. People were on this account more pleased to be amongst strangers, because all was put on a very household footing. It was good gossiping with the old fathers, and the worthy venerable mothers. The young ladies were easily satisfied with the harmless chit-chat which the young gentlemen engaged in with them in the homely high German of Munich. But now people draw into narrower circles; they become more select, more exclusive; society assumes a finer tone, address clears itself of its negligence. Those of maturer years, whom you are able to approach, are become more modish; the young people, in their external demeanour, elegant; the young ladies more chary. The great world begins to grow cold, and people speak more and more of family life; friends and relations draw together into household circles, make unions for the winter entertainments, and give select home balls and concerts. Even the pic-nics, which become more frequent than ever, display the same tendency; people rejoice themselves in the illusion of being in a family circle.

"In close connexion with this state of things is the growth of tea-drinking. Numbers have already freed themselves from the evening bumper, and numbers more threaten to do it; to such a degree that the first journal of polite literature, which after an absence of many years, was lately brought out here, held it in contemplation whether it should not style itself 'The Munich Tea-leaves.' While breweries are rising on all hands to furnish Bavarian beer to every quarter of the world, here, at the fountain-head, young gentlemen are quenching their thirst with water and milk; and ladies who formerly ordered a good cordial night-cap at least from the doctor, now blush lest they should be thought to sip a little in secret. Truly there are yet jolly fellows, who at the evening Wirthshaus table sing boisterous student-songs, and war-songs from Körner, talk loud and vehemently, and send over their heads clouds of smoke and fumes of beer, while they whisper to one another how drearily the fine tea-drinking folk drag through the winter, and how glad they are at the first burst of fine weather to fly off to the Alpine regions that show themselves so temptingly in the distance, and where a gay life still maintains itself with sound of guitar and Alpine song, the report of rifles, and jubilee of kirchweighs, which may almost be heard in the streets of our city.

"But we don't merely drink tea and grow exclusive, we are full of interest for the new literature. We talk of art and science. The English language is everywhere studied, even more than the French. An English leaven, diffused through south Germany, has reached us; and works daily, growingly, mightily, more and more. It has seized on our old habits by the very throat, threatens to annihilate them, and parades boldly before us, with high pretensions of style and refined accomplishments. The leaven works, not merely upwards, but down into the lower grades. It has seized on the burgher-class. Those practices which a while ago were regarded as the privileges of a high sphere, are now pronounced to be indispensable to all. The burgher ladies take off the Riegelhauben (the pretty little caps of gold or silver tissue, worn only on the back of the head so becomingly, and which are peculiar to Munich,) and put on silk bonnets. They subscribe to the circulating library, and engage a box at the theatre. The daughters speak written German; they go no longer with the distaff into the Heimgarten, but make formal visits, in order to speak to one another in French. So far as the increase of intellectuality and intelligence go 'tis well, but 'tis not so well to see the old cordial jollity of the carnival turned into a stately frost; and instead of the good old German dancing, laughing, bandying of wits and humours, during which many a love-sign snugly passed, many an explanation found happy opportunity, and many a half-understood case a prosperous issue; a mere walking in crowds through gilded rooms takes its place, with stately salutations and gentility without heartiness."

We can hardly bring ourselves to sympathize in all of the worthy elder's distresses.

Many charming snatches of those popular rhymes of Germany which are connected with holiday times and observances, and of the little songs and rhymes of the children in their sports, occur in the work. It strikes us, that if as purely nonsensical, they are more poetical than our own nursery rhymes; but this they may owe to the graceful English garb in which probably Mrs. Howitt has attired them.

Mr. Howitt gives a graphic and minute account of the wandering handicraftsmen of Germany; a race even more interesting than the students. But their singular customs are already pretty well understood among us. These customs are, in Mr. Howitt's opinion, less pernicious to the morals and character of the young men than might be supposed; but their actual utility in making good workmen is at once disposed of by the fact, that in handicrafts, and especially in blacksmith and ordinary carpentry work, Germany, with its ancient wanderschafte, is whole centuries behind England. Three months spent in London or Sheffield would do much more for these young artisans, if a perfect acquaintance with their craft were the object of their wandering, than the three years which it is the rule to spend in vagabondizing and begging. On the other hand, the young men, in the course of their travels, acquire a more enlarged experience of life and knowledge of their own country, than our artisans, chained to the oar from boyhood to premature old age, have any opportunity of doing. Their rambles, at the period of life they are taken, may also tend to the formation of a firm constitution and a sound state of health; as the craft usages and the customs of the country prevent them from being exposed to great hardships or want of food, clothing, or lodging, while on their travels. In short, before we are done with the wandering German artisans, we begin to wish that our hard-working youth could enjoy the same long season of leisure and thought, in which to store up knowledge, health, and poetical images, and ennobling recollections, to grace the whole of their future life; provided always that their wander-years were free and voluntary.

The festivities of Christmas—the Christmas-tree, the Christ-child, and Pelznichel, or Knecht Rupert, the rewarder of good children and the chastiser of the naughty little ones,—draw forth all our author's poetry. And yet he justly questions the wisdom, nay the morality of this systematic playful trickery, and cheating of little children, which he doubts may have a tendency to lessen the veneration for truth in young minds. At all events a very heavy charge made against the whole nation is, that truth is "far from being held so sacred among them as it should be,—the heroes of their most celebrated writers, of Goëthe and others, tell any kind of fibs to help themselves out of scrapes. Whoever has seen much of the private life of Germany, will, we fear, have experienced a similar surprise, spite of the national boasts of the Deutsche Treue und Deutsche Wahrheit; German faithfulness and truth. This is a fact which merits the most serious attention of a people so proud of their improvements in education; and it seems wonderful," continues Mr. Howitt, "that it has not struck them, that all the essential and beautiful of this Christmas practice will remain independently of these fictions." As the Christmas Tree has some chance of being introduced into this country, among the other less harmful picturesque customs of the Past, of which there is at present an ominous revival, we deem this hint worthy of especial attention. The customs of the New Year bear a close resemblance to those now deemed old-fashioned, though not forgotten, in Scotland. One of the sports proper to the season, is identical with that which put into so furious a passion "Auld Uncle John," in Burns's "Hallowe'en." It will be remembered that the testy bachelor drew a blank in the matrimonial lottery,—and that because he—

Gat the toom dish thrice,
He heaved them on the fire
In wrath that night.

Besides the numerous stated national holidays in the German towns, circles of friends and neighbours of congenial tastes form small societies, which they name their Krauchen; literally little garlands. These signify the practice the members have of making circulating visits once a-week, on fixed evenings, to each others houses; when they take tea, talk, read, and dance or play, according to the age or humour of the parties; and knit of course,—for no knitting, no German woman. Sledging is one of their winter amusements; and Mr. Howitt describes a favourite pastime of the children on the ice, which is exactly the hurly-hacket, of which the name is now almost lost in Scotland, though in country places the amusement is still known. Instead of the skull of a horse, or any thing that will move, which the Scottish children adopt as a sledge or ice-seat, the little Germans purchase, at a very cheap rate, small vehicles adapted to this sport. Hurly-hacket, according to Sir David Lyndsay, was in Scotland a royal pastime. It is alluded to by Sir Walter Scott. The Germans, like every other nation, entertain several absurd and prudish customs or etiquettes. Thus, for instance, though a damsel may be spun about like a whirligig, hour after hour, by a youth, or run away with by him in his sledge, tête-a-tête, far into the country, taking his arm in the streets, or anywhere else, would be considered either a flagrant breach of decorum, or equivalent to the announcement of a betrothal. In their very marriage processions, the men walk first and the women follow; and in church they sit like the Quakers, the sexes apart. Young people, though brothers and sisters, cannot live together in the same house if their parents are dead or distant; and a bachelor cannot have a sister to keep house for him, without shocking German notions of decorum. Having endeavoured to harmonize the apparent phlegm, the exterior solemnity or formality of the demeanour of the Germans, with their inward sensitiveness, Mr. Howitt proceeds, in the following passage, to give the most elaborate and connected account of his idea of the German social character that occurs in the volume; and it is probably, at least in substance, a correct estimate:—

There is not a more social and affectionate people than they are. They are particularly kind and attentive to each other; sympathize deeply in all each other's troubles and pleasures, successes and reverses. They form the strongest attachments, and maintain them through life. Young men entertain that brotherly feeling for each other that you seldom see in England. They go, as youths, often walking with their arms about each other, as only school-boys do with us. They put their arms over each other's shoulders in familiar conversation in company, in a very brotherly way. I say nothing of that hearty kissing of each other on meeting after an absence, that to an English eye, in great rough-whiskered and mustachioed men, has something very repulsive in it. They make presents of memorials to each other, and maintain a great and lasting correspondence. The correspondence of many Germans is enormous. Ladies who spend the morning in household affairs, will also in the afternoon be as busy in writing to their numerous friends. It is in private social intercourse alone that the Germans display the genuine vivacity and heartiness of their character. In the social and select circle of approved and approving friends, they throw off all formality, and become as frolicsome and joyous as so many boys and girls. These same young men that in the street will go by you as swift as a steam-engine, and as dark as a thunder-cloud, there become the very imps of mirth and jollity. They are ready to enter into any fun, to act any part—to sing, to romp, to laugh, and quiz each other without mercy.

They have indeed the faculty of becoming children, and even buffoons, without becoming ridiculous. They do not feel themselves foolish, and therefore don't become so. None but children in other countries can give themselves, body and soul, to the flow of their spirits, and throw themselves headlong, and yet with safety, into the whirlpool of active enjoyment. The grave Germans, strange as it may seem, can retain their boyhood and girlhood through life, and at any moment be as frolicsome, as artless, as noisy, as happy as children; yet without ever letting go for an instant the saving guidance of a manly discretion. The fact is, that they have a purity and elevation of moral feeling, which is at once their safety, their dignity, their honour, and their happiness. It is this which gives and preserves so much manly attachment in their friendships, so much propriety and endurance in their loves, so much confidence and esteem in their social intercourse.

In similar circumstances, young men of other nations are apt to become impertinent and indecorous. We have heard English young ladies say, that, in all the familiarities of waltzing and festive parties, the German gentlemen have never shown the slightest disposition to pass the bounds of the utmost delicacy. They have given none of those looks, those squeezes of the hand, and those private signals which English young men are but too apt to allow themselves. Yet here, again, is another mark of the sensitiveness of the German character. These same young men, who, in a particular circle will thus combine and be as gay and alert as grashoppers, will, if one individual come in on whom they have not the same reliance, at once involve themselves in their cold formality; as a hedgehog, at the slightest approach of danger, wraps himself in his globe of spines, or as a snail retreats into its shell. . . . . It would be the most hopeless attempt to endeavour to engage them to be funny in any but their most approved circle; a thousand bugbears of ridiculous offence would start up before them, and daunt them past all power of action or desire to please.

There is no doubt that their political institutions and habits have had a great effect in producing this excess of sensitiveness.

The effect of their political institutions on the character and habits of the German people has been of late so ably discussed by Mr. Laing, that we are content, upon this head, to say, that Mr. Howitt holds nearly the same opinions. Their caution is found to be extreme, and even, according to Mr. Howitt, appears phrenologically in the round, broad heads of the children. This excessive caution is, it would seem, even carried the length of unmanly cowardice. A German will rarely risk his own safety to see fair play—or for the sympathetic love of justice—or indignation at wrong done to the helpless. He dreads coming in for the "redding-straik." But when elevated and exhilarated by wine or music, or rather by their influence combined, a German will throw off his habitual caution. "A song," says Mr. Howitt, "will thrill through the heart of the whole empire like an electric stroke, and produce the most instantaneous and universal enthusiasm; as was evidenced by the 'Rhine song,' on the threat of invasion by the French in the autumn of 1840." But in this, and in all such cases, was the song anything more than the blazing match applied to the ready-prepared combustibles?

To the large—the ultra cautiousness of the Germans, Mr. Howitt attributes their slow driving, and happy exemption from fatal accidents on their railways; and to their characteristic phlegm he ascribes their indifference or quiet submission to trifling ills or annoyances, which one second of well-directed energy might obviate. This characteristic indolence, or canna-be-fashed principle, belongs, however, as much to a condition, or to a certain stage in the practical department of the social progress as to national character. Neither the plodding Scotch, nor the mercurial Irish, would too probably have dealt otherwise with the offending nail, which serves Mr. Howitt as an illustrative example, than did the phlegmatic Germans. This was a nail in a plank which tore the gown of every lady entering a steamer, and made the gentlemen stumble as they passed; but which no German ever dreamed of knocking on the head by one stroke, until Mr. Howitt, on seeing his wife's gown caught, disentangled the robe, called for a hammer, and suggested the simple prompt remedy which made him at once be recognised as an Englishman by an American present. Yet this is not exclusively German. The cottars of Glenburnie submitted to the "broken brig" from day to day though it frequently upset their carts, and occasioned hours of toil and trouble; and poor Thaddy, in Castle Rackrent, acknowledged, that the big pin by which, in place of the proper button, he fastened his cotamors, pricked his chin a hundred times a day, yet he could not be troubled to get the button sewed on. Other instances which are cited to illustrate the obtuseness or apathy, and, indeed we must say it, real hard-heartedness, and at least passive cruelty of the national character, are somewhat narrow for the object in view; and may be rather individual instances than national characteristics. In apprehending strokes of wit and humour, the German seems to be what is called "a slow coach." A joke needs to be deliberately explained to him, or at least to some of the nation; now the subtle essence of the very best joke evaporates in explanation. We have, however, seen this sort of dulness occur nearer at hand than Germany.

As Mr. Howitt's work is really more valuable for its insight into domestic life, and the minuteness of its touches, than for what may generally be esteemed its more attractive qualities, we select the following illustrative homely passages in preference to those descriptive of city manners and shows, and picturesque scenery.

Some of the German ladies have an overstrained delicacy and prudery about them, that form the most ridiculous contrast to the homeliness of their manners and language, and remind you of what Sam Slick [Captain Marryat ?] says of the young American ladies putting the legs of their pianos into trousers. They use no circumlocution in expressions which, in England, are at least smoothed over, and reduced to a very convenient indefiniteness. Some of them will talk of sweating, and hawking and spitting, and will perpetrate these things too in company, as well as say them. But there is nothing which tends so much to confound ranks, and puzzle you as to the real standing of people, as the practice in this country of several families living in one house. Nobles may, and often do, let one or two stories of their house. You may have a Graf for your landlord, or a shoemaker. This, while it is considered no degradation to the man of real property and rank, affords a serious opportunity to others, whose trade and dependence consists in letting lodgings, to impose on the English, and creates in them, while fresh to the country, the strangest uncertainty; at the same time that it leads them to the oddest conclusions as to the manners of the better classes of German society. While the graf or the professor lets part of his house, the genuine lodging-house keeper pretends to be a graf, or something approaching one. Our landlady, on our arrival at Heidelberg, pretended to possess a Baden patent of nobility, and to be somebody. She was, in fact, a very silly and mischievous woman; and while on the one hand she would affect to be frightened at the sight of a man in his morning gown and slippers, would, on the other, sit, of an afternoon, eating goose-grease with a bread-crust instead of a spoon, as a luxury! With such strange mixtures of ranks and personages, it requires, at first, in the foreigner, the nicest discernment to decide who are, and who are not, real gentry, and to avoid the oddest errors, in judging of established manners. . . . . Shaking hands is a custom considered entirely English, especially with ladies. The Germans rush into each other's arms; and with such impetuosity, on some occasions, that we are acquainted with a youth who is lamed for life through the very curious circumstance of having entangled his legs with those of a young and dear friend whom he unexpectedly met, after a long absence, and was thus thrown down, and one of his legs injured. But they do not shake hands; and we advise all English gentlemen, on first going to Germany, to be careful not to shock the feelings of the ladies, and especially the young, with offering their hands. The great German salutation is that of lifting the hat to one another, and to the ladies; and to such an extent is this carried, that a humorous, as well as argumentative pamphlet has been lately published, by a very clever man, in Erfurt, who has been a good deal in England, recommending in preference, on many accounts, the English mode of salutation. He calculates that not less than six millions of dollars are yearly spent in the extra wear and tear of hats and caps in Germany. . . . . .

Before the French invasion, what an old-fashioned state must Germany have been in! The Germans are naturally a most contented people. Contented with their mode of living, the daily round of their pursuits, with the state of things as they find them. There is no people of the same numbers, or possessing a territory of the same extent in Europe, who have shown themselves so little disturbed by a thirst of foreign conquest and aggrandizement. If their neighbours would but let them alone, they would never meddle with their neighbours. . . . . In fact, before that period, the Germans seem to have lived pretty much as the Dannites did of old, "every man doing what seemed good in his own eyes." Little could have been the alteration in anything for many generations. They must have lived on and on,—the bauers cultivating, the professors teaching and dreaming, the gentry hunting in the woods, and the ladies cooking and knitting, just as their ancestors had done for ages. By what we see now, they must have been in a very homely condition indeed. The manual arts must have been very humble; their houses must have been very old-fashioned, ill furnished, and none of the cleanest. Their clothes, what an antique cut they must have had! Their locks, door-handles, keys, all sorts of household utensils, their furniture, their carriages, their everything, how rude and homely they must have been! What a length their hair must have grown then; what a length their coats must have been then; what a length their pipes; what a length their dreams! Washing could not have been much in fashion; for, even now, they are amazed at the English; and in the inns they more commonly give you a wine-bottle and an oval pie-dish, instead of a good capacious ewer and basin, than anything else. Such a thing as a piece of soap, or a slopjar, you never see in the bed-room; and if you ask for water and a napkin, to wash your hands before dinner at an inn where you are not staying the night, they stare at you, and make a charge in the bill for it. As Diogenes said, on walking through the city, so would the old Germans have said, had they gone through a city in another country, "What heaps of things are here that I have no need of." Roads even they had none—they did not want them—they wanted only to stop at home, eat their sour kraut and sasuages, smoke their pipes, and drink their beer.

The cheerless and comfortless, dirty and odorous, but substantial dwellings of the common people, we have already adverted to. The visible furniture is much the same as in English cottages, with the addition of the stove and the spinning-wheel, and the difference of the beds, which in Germany are universally small, stump beds, fashioned to hold but one person. It is to be feared that the Germans must consider the large beds of England, in which from two to a half-dozen individuals are sometimes stowed away, as an indecorous and shocking arrangement. Individuals even of the lowest rank, accustomed from infancy to the delicacy of the exclusive single bed, must, there can be no question, find our custom more revolting than we should a spoon, fork, towel, tooth-brush, or comb, used in common.——Among the working-people, the men,

As in England, are great frequenters of the public-houses, where they all talk, smoke, and drink together, while the women at home get their children to bed, do the necessary mending and ordering of their affairs, and gossip a little besides. In winter, when they cannot go much out, the neighbours get often together around the stove, especially in the evenings, and tell over all the sagas and legends of the country, of which every place has abundance, or read their kalendar, or their folks-books, cheap little books bought at the fairs, which contain many of the old legends and stories extracted from the old romances.

It is through the winter that they are busy dressing their hemp and flax, and the women all spinning and knitting. In an evening it is a common custom for the women to take their wheels and meet together at their houses in rotation, where they tell endless stories, and make themselves very merry, while their husbands are at the wirthshouse; and these, as in all other countries, are "the short and simple annals of the poor."

This is exactly the custom described by Burns:

> On Fasten's Even we had a rocking,
> To ca' the crack, and weave our stockin',
> And there was muckle fun and jokin'
> Ye needna doubt;
> At length we had a hearty yokin'
> At sang about.

The Rockings, which were not confined to Fasten's E'en, were either spinning, knitting, or do-nothing social meetings of young people, for fun and song. They are described in the old Statistical Account of Scotland, and are alluded to by many of the rustic Scottish poets in their songs.

The manners of the middle classes present a stronger contrast to English modern usages, than do those of the country people. They,—

Like the Scotch, prefer houses in which a family can live on every separate story, and there are commonly two or three families of the most respectable and wealthy class in one house. One of those round-headed doorways, already spoken of, often forms the entrance; and it is quite a tour of discovery to find the family you want in it. You see two or three bell-handles on the outside, sometimes with Oben written under one, Unten under another, and Dritten Stock under a third. If you have not already possessed yourself of the exact information in which stock or story the family that you want resides, you must pull a bell at guess, for the name of the occupier of each stock nowhere appears. When you have done this, in a while you hear a click, and the door opens itself an inch or so. This is a sign that you can enter.

The want of the easy device of name-plates on the doors, or under each bell-pull, leads to great inconvenience in seeking out one's friends. The whole matter is ill-arranged. In the great common stair-case—a perpendicular street—the stranger is as much astray as if in a wood. He feels, in the solitude of many closed doors, as if in an enchanted castle. If he has not beforehand informed himself of the exact etage on which his friend lives,—

His only plan is to knock at the first door that he comes to; if somebody answers, to enter; and, if he be lucky, he will soon see a dirty maid-servant most probably issue from her kitchen, or come out above and look down through the banisters of the stairs at him, from whom he may learn where the family he seeks may be found. It is, however, quite as possible that at the very first door at which he knocks, he will hear somebody within call out "herein," "come in," for this is the usual practice. Instead, when a knock comes, of some one opening the door, as we do, they are so accustomed to have the wrong persons coming, that they let them take the trouble of coming in themselves. They therefore call out "herein," and you must open the door and march in, when it is very probable that, instead of your friends, you will find yourself in the midst of a large party at dinner; or in the study of a rusty old professor, five fathoms deep in his books and his next lecture; or will disturb the tête-à-tête of two lovers, or two ladies plunged in matters of as deep moment; or will rouse some worthy Hofrath from settling the affairs of the state. Though these mistakes are rather annoying to you, they are generally taken in the best humour by those thus broken in upon, for they are matters of daily occurrence. We have, however, witnessed instances in which the unlucky visiter has been received with very freezing and disdainful looks, which said as plainly as looks could do,—"Mr. Blockhead, do mind another time and inform yourself of the stock."

The living, indeed, in these houses, exposes you to many visits that, to say the least, are troublesome. As there is no porter, anybody walks in that is so disposed. The bell is pulled, the door is opened, and the house is at the mercy of the enterer. Whatever he be, he has now the range of the house before him. He has only to present himself at every door in turn, and he is bade to walk in. You are thus often surprised by the most unexpected guests. Now it is a beggar, with a troop of ragged children at his or her heels. Now a wandering gesell, or journeyman, with his knapsack on his back, who wants to beg a trifle too, to carry him to the next town, or, as has occurred to us, has taken the house for an inn, and wants to know if he can stay all night. Now it is a wandering tradesman, a seller of Eau de Cologne or some such thing, or a tradesman out of the town, who stalks in with a great bundle, makes his bow, and with all imaginable gravity begins unfolding his wares, and informs the lady that he thinks this and that is just what the "gnädige Frau" has sent for; when both you and he at the same moment become aware, to mutual astonishment, that it is the "gnädige Frau" upstairs, or downstairs, that the good man really intends. In this manner, too, enter your rooms collectors of subscriptions, proposers of plays and concerts, speculators in lotteries; and in Catholic cities, monks with their little savealls in their hands, collecting for the hospitals. As your bed-rooms are all on the same floor, it is quite as likely that such early visiters as the monks or begging students will walk into your bed-room as your sitting-room. . . . . .

The interior of German houses have, to English eyes, always a somewhat naked look. This arises, in a great measure from the absence of carpets. You approach by uncarpeted stairs, and then find yourself on naked boarded floors. These floors are generally made of broad boards of pine, laid in squares of a large size in framework of oak. The pine is generally kept clean scoured, and the framework dark with paint or oil. In others, the floors are coloured of a reddish yellow, with a preparation of wax, which is kept bright and clean by a hard and heavily-weighted brush. And, here contrary to the condition of the houses of the common people, and of too many of the lower grade of the burgher class, all is extremely neat and clean. The floors, though of deal, are so white, or are so bright where coloured; that they give a very agreeable feeling of cleanliness, and the furniture, though often plain, is equally clean and neat too. There is an air of elegance about a good house, which makes up, in some measure, for the richness and wealth of ornament that we are accustomed to in England. In many cases, again, the floors are of hard and handsome woods, laid down in squares, or in graceful patterns of different colours, in a mosaic style and richly polished. In the palaces and houses of the nobility and wealthy gentry, in winter, carpets are laid down; and in summer these inlaid floors are very tasteful, agreeably cool, and sometimes of singular classic beauty.

The Germans too are very fond of handsome ceilings; and these have often more labour and expense bestowed on them than any other part of the house. They are fond of having them painted in broad arabesque borders, and departments of gay colours; of having the walls too painted in a similar style, in a deep band below the cornice, of classical figures and scenes in fresco, on these and on their ceilings. Paintings in frames are not so numerously found in private houses as in England. These belong more to palaces and galleries. But you find casts, good engravings, and books in abundance. Add to these a not too crowded number of chairs, tables, looking-glasses, bureaus, and chiffoniers, in many parts of Germany, of beautiful dark walnut wood, and you have a tolerable idea of a German drawing-room. Nowhere, not even in palaces, do you find that air of richness, of snugness, of splendour,—in short, of general wealth and luxury, as you do in England; you find a plain and tasteful, and often more classic elegance. The stove is often a great eyesore to the room, being of black cast iron, with its pipe carried up in various winding shapes so as to throw out as much heat as possible. Smarter ones, of square cast-iron work painted, are frequent, and still handsomer ones of porcelain; but what is gained in beauty is generally lost in heat. Many of these stoves have no opening in the room, but are fed from the passage without, into which all the stoves of the story open, and where their mouths are concealed by doors, looking like so many cupboards; and in winter it is a good part of the work of one servant in a large family to go round and keep the fires in order.

The Germans endeavour to persuade themselves and you, that these stoves are much superior to our fireplaces. That our backs are starved in our rooms while our faces burn, and so on; but nothing can make up to the English for the cordial brightness and friendly glow of their hearths; and we find that when Germans come to England, they are invariably enraptured with our fires, and the beauty of our chimney-pieces, and all their ornamental accompaniments. Stoves are a great comfort in chambers, where you want the air tempering only; but in sitting-rooms, nothing but the absence of coals and the dearness of wood are the real causes of the use of stoves. In Germany, coal is uncommon, and wood is generally as dear as coal in London. A house with four fires cannot be well supplied with wood under £30 a-year.

Mr. Howitt gives a ludicrous account of the chimney-sweeps, who are, like most things, under the regulation of the police, and who sometimes arrive to sweep the chimneys when least expected, and not at all welcome—that is, exactly when it suits themselves. Every one must admire the handsome ceilings of the continent, and those of England must have a very meagre and beggarly appearance in the eyes of foreigners; one also likes to hear of the chimney-sweeps being under the superintendence of the police,—as the profession lies somewhat open to the charge of dishonesty and extortion,—though we should certainly demur to the sudden thumping and rushing in the drawing-room chimney, while we sat quietly at our writing-desk, and at all the other awful consequences. The chimneys seem to be swept as in Edinburgh, and other Scotch cities. Conceive Mr. Howitt writing the description of his excursion to the Brocken, when all at once a mysterious rumbling and thumping is heard in the chimney.

Presently the stove-pipe, where it entered the ceiling, was driven violently down. A round iron ball, as big as a cricket-ball, made its appearance, and after it a sort of besom. The sweep had dropped his machinery into a wrong flue, and finding it did not descend so far as he wanted it, had dropped his weight with such force that it carried all before it. Astonished at this sudden apparition, and at the stove-pipes tumbling into the room, I ran out, and alarmed the active but unconscious operative. The maid had just left all in nicest order; the wood soot had burst out in a dense cloud and filled the room, settling on chairs, tables, curtains, everything, enough to craze the brain of a housemaid, and more especially of the mistress. "Ah!" said the black knight, "it is nothing particular, nothing at all particular." He clapped his sooty ladder against the beautifully light-coloured and perfectly new paper; knocked up the stove-pipes again, trod the soot and dust unmercifully into the nicely waxed floor, let fall his heavy iron scraper, of at least four pounds weight, on the toe of a bystander, and repeating that it was nothing at all particular, asked for his money, and withdrew.

Early hours and simple living distinguish the Germans. Three meals a-day are the usual order. The common people are astir extremely early, especially in summer, when wagons and carriages begin to roll about at two o'clock; and after that time, every hour becomes more lively with the country people proceeding to the town with articles for market. The cooks and good housewives are off to market to make their purchases for the day at five and six o'clock. The peasant girls, of course, before that hour, are going along in streams, with their tubs or baskets on their heads, full of vegetables, eggs, milk, fruit, &c. Men who get up early to study, or to work, often take some coffee directly they come down, and then breakfast with their family at six or seven o'clock in summer. This breakfast is, generally, simply coffee and bread, mostly without butter. Dinner is on table at twelve or one. The German cookery abounds in soups, vegetables, and sausages, of various kinds, sour kraut, of course, salads of as many kinds, amongst which a particular salad, made of cold potatoes with vinegar and anchovies, is a great favourite. Their meat, like most continental meat, is very lean. Their beef, though lean, good; their bullocks being fine, but killed just at that state in which we should begin to feed them. Their mutton is generally very bad; the sheep being kept principally for the wool, and never fed like ours. Veal is killed at about a week old, and is very poor and tasteless. Hood's description of a big man, with a big stick, and a big dog, driving a week-old calf, is of every-day realization in the street. Lamb has no resemblance whatever to that most princely of luxuries in England; and, what is worse, the green peas are always spoiled by being gathered before they have any kernel, and by being cooked with sugar. Fowls they have in plenty, and cheap, but never well fed. Geese, on the contrary, are regularly crammed, when alive, with Indian corn; and are stuffed in the cooking with chestnuts. They are often, however, to our taste, spoiled by the plentiful addition of raisins. Hares are cheap; the common price being a shilling, and are good. Cheese is very indifferent, and little eaten at table. Their beer is a weak table-beer, very strong of hop, very wholesome, and, with a little use, very agreeable; but, in the wine districts, wine is much more drank at table, being quite as cheap, and in summer being very pleasant, from its weakness and its sub-acid flavour.

Of puddings they have a variety, and very tolerable. After dinner, a cup of coffee is generally taken. Tea is by no means a general afternoon beverage. Of late years it has been more and more introduced; but in the greater number of families is not drank except when they have visiters, and then one or two cups is all that they can master. They complain that tea makes them drunk, makes their heads ache, heats them, gives them red noses, and, in fact, has all the effects of spirituous liquors on them. The mode in which the English drink off their three, four, or five cups occasionally, is to them amazing, but more so the strength of it. You have to water your tea for your German visiters till it is really not tea, but milk and water; and if you allowed the waiters at inns to make tea for you, it would require a good microscope to find the tea-leaves in the pot. Such is the effect of custom. German families, in general, therefore, have their Abends-essen, or supper, about seven o'clock. This consists very much of cold sliced meat, sausages, potato-salad, and such like. The eating of meat suppers and drinking of no tea probably produces the common effect, that they require in the morning to supply themselves with that fluid which we take at tea-time. The first thing, therefore, that you see a German do at breakfast, is to toss off a large glass of cold water. Numbers, if they did not get their dose of cold water, could not eat a bit of breakfast.

The coffee is pronounced excellent; and a German servant maid, though she may be fit for nothing else, can still roast coffee to a nicety. The farther description of the Social or Domestic Life of the Germans shows the routine of the ordinary day.

During the day, while the men are at their various avocations, the ladies are busy in their kitchens, or amongst their linen, or are sewing or knitting, as if their lives depended on the labour. The hoarding of linen and of stockings is just as great a passion with most German ladies as with the Frau von Westen.* Spinning-wheels abound, and are to be seen in the houses of many people of great pretensions; in still more of the burgher class, and in every house of the common people. The rock is often bound about with a gay broad ribbon, and the wheel itself is very neat. Linen is hoarded up in such quantities, that washing-days come in very many families but once a quarter, in many even but once a-year; and I have heard of one wealthy family where the master's shirts were only gone through in six years. Most gentlemen now have their gross of shirts, and other things in proportion. The quantity of beautiful table-linen, napkins for the table and the chambers, and all such things, would be a cordial to any good housewife's soul. The knitting of stockings is an everlasting job. At home and abroad, Sundays and week-days, in private parties and at public out-of-door concerts and in public gardens, the dear, good, industrious souls sit knitting and smiling and gossiping in the seventh heaven of delight. It is to be hoped that there is a German heaven where knitting is one of the appointed rewards of virtue; for without the idea of the eternity of knitting-needles, what German lady could look forward with any comfort.

Cooking is equally a lady's pleasure. The education of a German lady is to us a very singular one. It is composed of the two extremes of household usefulness and social ornament. Accomplishments are carefully taught. All that tends to give the ladies éclat in the ball-room and in large companies, they are more regularly drilled into even than ours. Music and dancing are indispensable. The French language has long been universal, and English is now becoming so. Their greater intercourse with foreigners keeps in use their French. Music is so much a national enjoyment, that not only all young women, but almost all young men, play on the piano and sing. This is not only a great relief to the monotony of private life, and an elegant and refining enjoyment for the evening circle, especially to weary men, harassed or exhausted by the daily tug of their affairs, but is conducive to the pleasure of those agreeable little parties which abound so much amongst the Germans; where singing, a dance, and simple games, pass away rapidly the hours. Here there requires no hired musicians; one after another will sit down to the harp or piano; others will join in singing; and thus social pleasure can go forward most independently. So general are such accomplishments, that they are much less thought of—individuals pride themselves much less upon them than in England. They are rather regarded as the indispensable parts of education, as much so as reading and writing are.

But the accomplishments of cooking and of domestic management are not the less cultivated. Ladies of rank and fortune are still plentiful, who spend their mornings in the kitchen, and are not contented with directing what shall be done, but are up to the elbows in flour, and as busy compounding salads and puddings as ever an old alchymist was in preparing his elixir of life. English notions on this head are now very much infusing themselves, and no doubt it will not be long before it will be found that a lady can do far more with her eyes and her commands, than she can do with her hands, and that it is a much better division of employment for servants to do the menial work, and for the ladies to be able skilfully to see that all is done. In the present day, however, the old school has the predominance. Ladies are too much of practical cooks and housewives to be much visible before dinner; and there are those who have been for more than a year regular attendants of the kitchen of some great hôtel, in order practically to learn all the sublime mysteries of cooking.

The great defect of German female education is, that household and social accomplishments are made the sum of their instruction. The ladies of Germany, with many exceptions, are far below the English ladies, as desirable intellectual companions. Kinder or more attached and affectionate creatures cannot exist; but the good creatures must excuse me when I say, that they too often resemble kind, dear creatures in England, that one might pick up out of the class of our maids and housekeepers, with the exception of the knowledge of music and French, who would make very inadequate companions of our intellectual tastes and pursuits, though they might possess all other virtues under heaven. They are not instructed in the more solid parts of general learning. In history, in geography, in the wide field of the world of polite literature, in which our English ladies are as much at home as ourselves, they are far, far behind these ladies. They read, indeed, the romances and novels, and poetry, not only of their own country, but almost all the new novels of France, and England too; and truly, it must be confessed, show very little discrimination in their taste for these. Not only the works of Bulwer, Boz, Marryat, James, &c, but the most trashy tales of our inferior writers, which are puffed in England, are immediately translated, or reprinted in Germany, and as much read by ladies and the devourers of circulating library pabulum, as they are at home. The men of any standing, from the cheapness of a university education, generally receive such a one; and, as if from jealousy, seem to have a mortal aversion to the ladies possessing the same sort of information as themselves. There is, accordingly, a great vacuum in German literature, which in England is filled by a host of productions which are equally read and relished by men and women; in which all matters of history, science, morals, and religion, are ably and profoundly, though not technically treated.

Here for the present we must stop. The utile we have, as in duty bound, first discussed. The dulce must be left for some future opportunity.

* A character in a play.

APOSTOLIC CHRISTIANITY; OR, THE PEOPLE'S ANTIDOTE AGAINST ROMANISM AND PUSEYISM.*

RIGHT or wrong, it does one good to find a man so alive and earnest in his work as the Rev. James Godkin, a gentleman of whom, by the way, we knew nothing whatever; though he appears to be a missionary minister in the north of Ireland. Many have expressed to him a wish to see a work on Romanism and Puseyism, at once comprehensive and brief, solid in argument and lively in style, mild and conciliating in its tone,—yet firm in defence of principle; and free from the bitterness, dryness, and harshness of polemics;—and here is one, the best the author's "circumstances allowed." We can answer for the general curiosity awakened about this new Anglican heresy, or new modification of Romanism, which is nick-named Puseyism, after one of its first and most zealous promulgators, Dr. Pusey.

Though the main stress of the entire argument falls on the creed of the Roman Catholics, the new sect, where not included in the same category, is not spared; and to it alone we shall devote our attention, in a very brief and cursory notice of a really able and strenuous book, and one of a popular character. Passing over the four beginning chapters, we come to that one in which the Puseyites are first directly assailed:—

APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.

IDENTITY OF ROMAN AND ANGLICAN CHURCH PRINCIPLES.

It is a fact, now too notorious to be denied, that a large portion of the beneficed and dignified clergy, not to speak of the great fountains of theological literature, are tainted with a spirit, which differs from Popery less than the blossom does from the seed, to which it is soon to give place. Their hatred of Protestantism is just in proportion to their irregular passion for Catholicism. However the mark of Rome may be detested—with whatever instinctive horror and pious antipathy it may be shunned, when detected on the forehead of Irish Radicalism,—it is certain, that the mystical lady, by whom it is imprinted, is clandestinely fondled by the Apostolical Succession party throughout the United Kingdom. Theirs is > "Not the pure, open, prosperous love,

> That, pledged on earth, and sealed above,
> Grows in the world's approving eyes.
> In the soul's darkness, buried deep,
> It lies like some ill-gotten treasure,—
> Some idol without shrine or name,
> O'er which its pale-eyed votaries keep > Unholy watch, while others sleep."

The violence of this love for the purpled sorceress, vents itself chiefly in inveterate hatred towards those bodies whose principles strike most directly at the root of her power. This bigotry, which has been gathering intensity from the efforts made to restrain it, sometimes forgets its cunning, and breaks forth in the fiercest vituperation.

The following extracts will show why the Puseyites hate the name of Protestant:—"We have neglected the real ground on which our authority is built,—OUR APOSTOLICAL DESCENT." "We, who have been ordained clergy, acknowledge the doctrine of the Apostolical Succession. And for this reason, we must necessarily consider none to be really ordained, who have not thus been ordained. For, if ordination is a divine ordinance, it must be necessary. . . . . As well might we pretend the sacraments are not necessary to salvation, while we use the offices of the Liturgy; for, when God appoints means of grace, they are the means." "This is the unanimous opinion of our divines, that, as the sacraments, so communion with the church, is generally necessary to salvation, in the case of those who can obtain it." "For many years, we have been in the habit of resting our claim on the general duties of submission to authority, &c., instead of appealing to that warrant, which marks us exclusively for God's AMBASSADORS." "By separating themselves from our communion, they separate themselves from THE ONLY CHURCH IN THIS REALM, WHICH HAS A RIGHT TO BE QUITE SURE THAT SHE HAS THE LORD'S BODY TO GIVE TO THE PEOPLE."*

Dr. Hook, vicar of Leeds, writes as follows:—"We ask, what was the fact, and the fact was this: that the officer whom we now call a bishop was at first called an APOSTLE, although afterwards it was thought better to confine the title of apostle to those who had seen the Lord Jesus, while their successors, exercising the SAME RIGHTS and AUTHORITY, contented themselves with the designation of bishops." Another of the Apostolic champions says, that as the second generation of apostles felt themselves so much inferior to the first, they did not deem it necessary to retain their title.

Who will believe that ecclesiastics, knowing the force of names with the multitude, whom they love so well to rule, would be contented with a title less dignified than that which truly belonged to them?—and that they renounced this elevation of rank from the Christian consciousness of not having merit to sustain it? This would be giving them greater credit for humility than is warranted by their history But the modest avowal of inferiority proves, by implication, that the ancient bishops had no just pretension to be regarded as the successors of the Apostles, otherwise a body whose ambition was so insatiable—whose grasping domination grew so enormously from age to age, would never have relinquished such an advantage.

Let us return, however, to Dr. Hook. "Our ordinations," says he, "descend, in an UNBROKEN LINE, from Peter and Paul, the Apostles of the circumcision and the Gentiles. These great Apostles successively ordained Linus, Cletus, and Clement, bishops of Rome; and the Apostolic succession was regularly continued from them to Celestine, Gregory, and Vitalianus, who ordained Patrick, bishop of the Irish, and Augustine and Theodore for the English. And from those times, an uninterrupted series of valid ordinations has carried down the Apostolic succession in our churches to the present day. There is not a bishop, priest, or deacon among us, who may not, if he please, trace his spiritual descent from St. Peter or St. Paul."

To this agrees the language of Dr. Hickes, an eminent church divine of former times, who declares, that bishops "stand in God's and Christ's stead over their flocks; the clergy as well as the people are to be subject to them, as to the VICEGERENTS of our Lord." "And the successors of the Apostles, the bishops, like spiritual princes, exercise the same coercive authority that they did, in inflicting spiritual censures upon their disobedient SUBJECTS."

This reminds me of a clause in the creed of Pope Pius IV., suppressed in the copy appended to the "Faith of Catholics," and also by the late Mr. C. Butler, in his "Book of the Roman Catholic Church:"—"and to take care, as far as in me lies, that it shall be held, taught, and published by my subjects, or by those the care of whom shall appertain to me, in my office."

Well have the Apostolic party in England, not only now, but in all past ages, studied the lessons of the holy mother at Rome, and deeply have they imbibed her spirit! Protestant bishops, too, though bound by oath to an Erastian establishment, must be spiritual princes, and glory in the passive obedience of their miserable "subjects." Such doctrines become those with whom Hildebrand shines out as the best of CHRIST's vicars, Thomas à Becket as the most illustrious of martyrs, and Laud as the paragon of saints.

Lest the reader should suppose me mistaken about Hildebrand, I will quote a passage from Bowden's Life and Pontificate of Gregory the Seventh:—"And it is through their spiritual descent from this Roman bishop and his predecessors, that our primates and their suffragans derive their clearest title to govern the church of Christ in England at this very day. It is not, therefore, for us to look with jealousy upon the ancient glories of our nursing mother in the faith! It is not for us to seek to pare away expressions, or to reduce to their minimum of meaning the glowing testimonies of antiquity, to that mother's purity and honour. She, it is true, has since abandoned us; and because we refuse to bow down before the idols whom in these latter times she has set up, refuses to recognise us as her children. We, however, have not separated from her—we have formed ourselves into no new sect or party, but, by God's blessing, continue within the pale of that Catholic community to which she first admitted us. Nor can her recent tyranny prevent our eyes from reverting to the shining indications of her pristine worth, or our hearts from burning within us, as we gaze, with emotions of exalted pleasure, akin to those with which an affectionate and duteous child delights to survey the cherished mementos of parental excellence."

On perusing this passage—which would be thought very extraordinary, if the church literature of the day did not abound with similar ones,—the following questions will probably suggest themselves to the mind of the reader:—

1. If Rome possessed apostolic power at the Reformation,—as the Anglicans contend,—and if all bishops derived their authority from the Pope, as the vicar of Jesus Christ, how could a small minority of those bishops, living in England, revolt against their head, without being guilty of schism and spiritual rebellion?

2. If they were guilty of that crime, have they not been ever since, not only "abandoned" by their mother, but shut out of the pale of the Catholic Church, whose unity they had wickedly broken?

3. Was it not in obedience to Henry VIII., a licentious, secular tyrant, that the English Church renounced the authority of her Roman mother?—and, is it not a fact, that she was so servile a tool of the civil power, that the number of those priests who kept a conscience, in the reign of Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, never amounted to two hundred? All the rest tamely conformed,—the colour of their creed changing as fast as the chameleon's, according to the light that shone upon it from the court! They did not refuse to bow down to the ever-changing idols, which the temporal sovereign chanced to set up.

4. But, what becomes of all the wonderful virtue, which, as we have seen, high-churchmen ascribe to the succession, if the very power, to whom it was committed by Apostolic hands, and by whom it is transmitted to others, could, after all, "set up idols,"—and such idols as even the Anglican hierarchy had too much conscience to worship? How comes it to pass, that the most apostolic church in Christendom is also the most idolatrous?

Contrary to the nature of all holy things, this mystical power seems to be moved by a strong propensity to ally itself with corruption! It delights to brood, like the sea-bird, on agitated waters, that cast up weeds and mire; and, as if endowed with a charmed life, it survives in a perpetual pestilence, where every other heavenly grace is sure to perish! Forsaking the bright abodes of the virtuous and the free, it selects, as its chosen, its eternal home—the darkest city, the vilest court, the bloodiest throne in Europe!

Mr. Godkin here of course refers to Rome as it was under its most profligate Popes,

Some champions for the apostolicity of mitres,—a sort of half-bred Puseyites,—do not stop to trim their phrases in speaking of the apostacy of Rome. With them she is not merely disfigured by a few superstitions, like an unshaven monk, or an unwashed virgin, or like a cup outwardly defiled, but pure within. She is a "harlot," in face and heart—yea, the very mother of abominations—the fountain-head of all spiritual adulteries—false, hypocritical, licentious, tyrannical, persecuting, anti-Christian, lifted up in pride to the very throne of Deity! Such are the views regarding the Church of Rome, put forth on all occasions, in every variety of superlative malediction, by those who yet contend that she has been the safe keeper of "holy orders!" As if this impure and apostate power,—a power that "framed iniquity by law," and dethroned God in his own temple—that peopled hell with its favourites, and heaven with its victims—had been preserved by the wisdom of Providence, for the express purpose of keeping the SUCCESSION pure and undefiled for the modern Anglicans!!

But they cannot take as much of Popery as they like, and leave the rest. Where one of its doctrines settles, others will follow;—they are mutually dependent, and cannot stand alone. For example:—in order to maintain the sanctity of the Succession, and to support the supreme, irresponsible authority of the episcopal order—an authority said to be derived from the Author of truth and virtue, yet flourishing most in a soil of perfidy, and an atmosphere of vice,—it became necessary to borrow from Rome, also, the principle, that the mystic virtue of the sacraments is independent of the personal character of the administrator. Without this shield, the priesthood would have long since perished by the hands of its own dupes. The principle is so monstrous in itself, that every unsophisticated mind recoils from it;—and to embrace it in the love of it, implies a degree of mental depravity, which the sacerdotal spirit only can produce. . . . . .

What need is there for a priest being a moral man, when he can perform his work of curing souls as well, though steeped to the lips in vice? Scripture says, that the "prayers of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord;" but the "Catholics" teach, that the prayers of a wicked priest avail as much as those of the righteous, for their "efficacy is independent of the personal character of the administrator." Jehovah demands of the ungodly prophet,—What hast thou to do, to take my covenant into thy mouth, seeing thou hatest instruction, &c.? But our church authorities have no hesitation in overruling the decisions of Jehovah, in matters of this kind. The most depraved priest can regenerate immortal souls as fast as they are born within the bounds of his parish! He can forgive the sins of others, while he is laden with sin himself—can sanctify the people with his sacraments, while he is himself "led captive" by the devil at his will, and while his vile example spreads a moral contagion around him; nay, certain spell-words which drop from his lips, can change the bread and the cup, which he holds in his defiling fingers, into the body and blood of Christ. He can offer the "tremendous sacrifice" as acceptably, as if he were the purest of the virgin priesthood. Such are the doctrines taught to an immense body of youthful candidates for the ministry of the Church of England!—"O Lord, how long!" . . . . . .

The Roman and Anglican bishops, it is said, are the successors of the Apostles. It is natural to ask, "IN WHAT do they succeed the Apostles?" When one set of men pretend to succeed another, it is natural to compare them. Paul says, "Not many mighty, not many noble, are called." This is peculiarly the case with regard to the Apostleship. Peter was a fisherman, Paul was a tent-maker—all were poor when called to the office, and continued poor till they died; but the episcopal office has ever been filled, since the temporal establishment of Christianity, by the mighty and the noble. Bishops became princes, and their chairs were converted into "thrones." . . . . . No one is anxious to succeed to Paul's poverty, nor to his labours. The Apostles were sent to proclaim the gospel to all nations. They were, in fact, itinerant preachers, brought from town to town by the bounty of their disciples; and nothing could possibly be remoter from their humble thoughts, than the pomp and circumstance of their imaginary successors,—who fare sumptuously every day—drive in chariots, attended by troops of servants—and vie with the grandees of the earth in all the "pomps and vanities of this wicked world." . . . . . .

But we will come to matters less invidious,—what were the signs of an apostle?

It is enough that, according to our author, few of these signs are to be found in the present race of prelates. One sign there is which the most ignorant may readily recognize:

Do bishops succeed the Apostles, even in that to which not only every clergyman, but every layman may attain—I mean their sanctity! No. They are modest enough here, for here there was no room for delusion. The people may be mystified and confounded about old parish registers, and catalogues of popes—about the power of the keys, and the magic of the crozier; but a child could tell whether a bishop were "sober, righteous, and godly,"—and whether he pursued a life of benevolent self-denial. And every one who opened the New Testament, could see the contrast, in point of holiness, between Apostles and prelates. Hence the maxim, whose unprincipledness was never surpassed, since Satan began to practise his devices,—that the ministrations of a wicked priest are as efficacious in the sight of God, as those of a righteous one. A principle, this, which mingles light with darkness, yokes CHRIST with Belial, and puts the most awful heavenly power into the hands of the vilest of mankind, to be wielded by him at his will: for its saving exercise is made to depend on his intention. Yes, Heaven is made to wait upon the wretch's lips,—and Christ, by this system, is bound to the bidding of a man, who is at once a priest of God and a slave of Satan.

"We (Churchmen) have always embraced the doctrine, that GOD conveys grace only through the instrumentality of the mental energies, that is through faith, prayer, active spiritual contemplations, or (what is commonly called) communion with God, in contradiction to the primitive view,—according to which, the church and her sacraments are the ordained and direct visible means of conveying to the soul what is in itself supernatural and unseen. . . . Indeed, this may even be set down as the essence of sectarian doctrine, to consider faith, and not the sacraments, as the proper instrument of justification, and other gospel gifts." "Christ hath appointed the church as the only way unto eternal life."*

Who that has paid the slightest attention to the terms of salvation laid down in Scripture, but must pronounce the Oxford system to be "another gospel!" Why are its authors allowed to go on poisoning the Church of England, still boasting that they stick to the Rubric? Better, surely, to abandon the Rubric, and keep the Faith.

Are not the Puseyites infatuated? What could induce them to revive such a doctrine in England, in the nineteenth century? Their attempts to ape Rome, will be an utter failure! They are unskilled in the art of concealing their artifices. They are but clumsy imitators at best; and it is too late to pick up and patch together the drapery of superstition, which was desecrated, torn, and trampled under foot at the Reformation. Well was it once said, by an eloquent and zealous member of the Church of England, in reference to the tactics of the Catholic priesthood,—"Their's are the depths of Satan: ours, the shallows."

Having strenuously and unanswerably maintained the Christian and Protestant right of private judgment, our author proceeds to inqure into the grounds for any order of priests usurping authority over Christ's heritage:—

Whence comes this great power, in deference to which, we are called on to deny the Lord that bought us? It comes through the Roman hierarchy! It confessedly depends on the Papacy! What was its character? We have sketched it already, but another touch will finish the picture. "For about three hundred years," says Bishop Burnet, "the Popes were made upon the Emperors' mandate. Nor did the Emperors part easily with this right; but after that, the Othos and Henrys kept up their pretensions, and came oft to Rome, and made many Popes; and the most of the Popes so made, were generally anti-popes and schismatics; yet some of them, as Clement the Second, are put into the catalogues of the Popes by Baronius and Binius, and by the late publishers of the Councils, Labbeus and Cossartius. There was indeed, great opposition made to this at Rome; but let their own historians be appealed to, what a series of monsters and not men, those Popes were; how infamously they were elected, often by the harlots of Rome; and how flagitious they were, we refer to Baronius himself, who could not deny this, for all his partiality in his great work."

This is a pretty spiritual ancestry for the Puseyites! A series of monsters elected by harlots! No wonder they are proud of their pedigree, and teach their priests to despise matrimony. What says the great Cardinal Baronius himself on this subject? Let us hear him:—"Oh! what was then (in the ninth century) the face of the holy Roman Church! How filthy, when the vilest and most powerful harlots ruled in the court of Rome; by whose arbitrary sway dioceses were made and unmade, bishops were consecrated, and—which is horrible to be mentioned—false popes, their paramours, were thrust into the Chair of Peter, who, in being numbered as Popes, serve no purpose except to fill up the catalogues of the Popes of Rome. For who can say, that persons thrust into the popedom without any law by harlots of this sort, were legitimate Popes of Rome? In these elections no mention is made of the acts of the clergy, either by their choosing the Pope, at the time of his election, or their consent afterward. All the canons were suppressed into silence—the voice of the decrees of former pontiffs was not allowed to be heard—ancient traditions were proscribed—the customs formerly practised in electing the Pope, with the sacred rites and pristine usages were all extinguished. In this manner, lust, supported by secular power, excited to frenzy in the rage for domination, RULED IN ALL THINGS."

What holy links of an unbroken line—the grand, exclusive conductor of the fire of Heaven to the altar of God! For nearly one thousand years, says the Rev. Mr. Powell, in his able essay on Apostolical Succession, it does not appear that any person, previously a bishop, was elected bishop of Rome. Indeed, not only laymen, but mere boys were sometimes raised to the Chair of Peter. . . . . .

Bishop Stillingfleet says, that at Rome the succession is as muddy as the Tiber. Canterbury was kept vacant by the king four years from 1089, that he might enjoy the revenues. Dr. Inett acknowledged, that "the difficulties of succession in that See, betwixt the year 768 and the year 800, were invincible." In 1370, the Bishop of Norwich was consecrated by his own archdeacon. According to Fox, in his Book of Martyrs, the first seven of the prelates of Canterbury "were Italians, or other foreigners,"—and, therefore, the creatures of the Bishop of Rome. Many of the primates of England were consecrated by the Pope, his cardinals, or legates;—and some of them by Popes whose own consecration was null and void, according to the canons of several councils, which decreed "that they who were ordained for money might be deposed;"—"that there is no power in ordination, where buying and selling prevail." . . .

During one hundred and fifty years, there had been one hundred Popes, and thirteen schisms in the popedom. That is, there were, on thirteen occasions, two or three rival Popes, each pretending to be the successor of Peter. Yet the succession must work its way down through these scenes of confusion, strife, usurpation, and civil war;—and, often the most artful and powerful faction carried off the Palladium of infallibility! Often, too, the Emperor conferred the holything like a ribbon, or a garter, on whatever licentious favourite he pleased. Many of the Popes were mere laymen, some of them but boys, when they were thurst into Peter's Chair by the courtezans. They hurried on holy orders as they hurried on a state dress, to ascend Peter's throne. Such is the course of THE SUCCESSION, on account of which, the Puseyites would excommunicate and curse all Protestant Christendom!

It is easy for them to talk of the English Church, as of a woman that has washed her face and is still the same. Had Rome nothing worse than a dirty face? Was not her whole head sick—her whole heart faint—and was she not covered with wounds and bruises and putrefying sores! . . . . . .
There is another fatal break in the succession. The Anglicans will find much difficulty in tracing any of their orders even to Rome. The ghost of Elizabeth, their Founder, will rise up before them, with the Act of Supremacy in one hand, and of Uniformity in the other—stamping with anger, and in a stern voice proclaiming—"My Lords Spiritual of England, I am your Founder and Head—from me you derive your ghostly power—these hands conferred on you the mitres and the keys,—will you now ungratefully disown your virgin mother!"

The constitution of the Church, as by law established, is then manifestly, a human thing—a secular institution—the work of laymen, and a woman! This fact is painfully felt by the Puseyites, as appears from their Tract "On Church and State."

Having, in the very words of the Oxford tract "On Church and State," described the woful plight of the Church of England in the unhallowed grasp or at the mercy of the State, our author triumphantly exclaims:—

How different—how happily different is it, with what high-churchmen contemptuously call the schismatics! The promised presence of the Saviour, with any, is dependent on their retaining the truth, and acting according to it. He is with those who teach all things whatsoever he has commanded. Between real Protestant ministers and the Apostles, there is not a single link;—we take the law directly from inspired lips! We open the Bible, and expound the words of Christ to the people—and He speaks by us. We do not receive the grace of God through a series of tainted vessels, becoming more offensive as they descend;—we take the water of life fresh from the fountain, and will never admit that it requires to be filtered by a corporation of priests, arrogantly calling itself the Church, before it is fit for the refreshment of God's people! The Holy Ghost says,—"Whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely." In passing through the wilderness down the track of time, true believers "drink of that spiritual rock that FOLLOWS THEM; and that rock is Christ."

In a chapter on the authority of the Ancient Fathers, and on their claims over posterity, we find, among many pertinent and eloquent remarks on the enervating power of the Past with a certain order of minds, this passage:—

We cannot too curiously explore the foundations of that POWER, whose dark and terrible energy desolated Christendom for so many centuries—that power which the Oxford Divines are now moving (not heaven and earth, but) Church and State to restore, and to which they would again bring the nations of Europe into subjection. . . . . Every Roman Catholic priest has vowed that he will never take and interpret Scripture "otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers." To this principle the Puseyites subscribe ex animo. The Bible is at the opposite end of the long, long "Catena Patrum," and its meaning must come down living along that chain, or they cannot receive it. The Bible must remain mute, till five hundred discordant voices form one harmonious utterance! And how are the laity to know where or when they are unanimous! They must just take it on trust from their teachers, who stand between the people and the fathers, as the fathers stand between the teachers and Christ. But, if the authority of the fathers constitute an infallible rule of faith, the Christian has surely a right to examine it for himself. How else can he fashion his opinions and his life according to the standard? In order, then, to read the Word of GOD with safety and profit, "the laity must for themselves deliberately peruse and compare the multitudinous folios of Christian antiquity—a task for which, from want of leisure, acquaintance with the Greek and Latin languages, and opportunity of access to the remains of ancient theology, the mass of mankind, it is plain, are wholly incompetent. The clause, therefore, is tantamount to a prohibition of the use of the Bible." It took Archbishop Usher eighteen or nineteen years to get through the Fathers, though he read a portion every day, no matter what other business demanded his attention. Is there one of a thousand, even of the clergy, who have read all the Fathers? How can a lawyer tell whether the great legal authorities are for or against his cause, till he has read and compared them? Is he to take the fact for granted, from the interested advocate on the other side?

According to the Oxford Divines, the Fathers are the infallible interpreters of the Apostles—and they themselves are the "inerrant" interpreters of the Fathers. From their lips the "children of the Church" are to receive the "lively oracles." We may push the claims of our Newmans, Puseys, Keebles, and Sewells, aside without cermony; but the Fathers must be treated with the respect due to old age. As the genius of Pascal confounded the anti-christian policy of whole hosts of accomplished Jesuits, when their principles had corrupted nearly every court and college in Europe, so Mr. Isaac Taylor's well sustained attacks have shaken the foundations of Anglo-Catholicism.

In the chapter on Baptismal regeneration, Dr. Pusey's treatise on Baptism is keenly dissected; Mr. Godkin quoting largely and freely the extreme opinions advanced on the alleged efficacy of this mysterious rite. Among these opinions are the subjoined; nor can the Puseyites well say that the passages are garbled:—

"In baptism, we were buried, planted, crucified with Christ,"—(p. 96.) "All infants, therefore, must have died to sin,"—(p. 106.) "All the baptised have put on Christ,"—(p. 109.) "Whoever of us has been baptised, was thereby incorporated into Christ." "All the texts that speak of our being in Christ, are referred to baptism, by which alone that union can be effected,"—(pp. 114, 115.) "Baptism is putting off the old man and his deeds,"—(p. 178.) It is "the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost,"—Passim. "The gift of baptism is above all spiritual gifts,"—(p. 209,) "yet this gift Simon Magus also obtained,"—(p. 233.) "As after receiving the body of the Lord, Satan entered into Judas!! . . . . so after the unworthy receiving of baptism came he into Simon Magus." "He was born in vain—perhaps it had been better for him not to have been born!"—(pp. 236-238.) God has in a wonderful manner, for his own glory, made baptism effectual, when administered in mockery by heathens on a heathen stage!"—(p. 237.)

The passage through the Red Sea, and over Jordan, were types of baptism; and all the predictions in regard to the illumination and purification of the church refer to this awful rite—this "daily miracle"—performed in "the fountain opened for sin and for uncleanliness;" which is, good reader, nothing but the water of baptism. Moreover, Dr. Pusey approves of the Catholic practice of anointing with oil in baptism, and the ceremonies for casting out the "evil spirit that lurks" in the infant,—(pp. 58-60); and signing the cross on eyes, mouth, nose, forehead, ears, breast, shoulders, &c.; as well as the three-fold immersion in the names of the three persons of the Trinity,"—(p. 144-5.)

No wonder Dr. Pusey should say, this doctrine "lies, it is confessed, at the root of the whole system." . . . . . It may well seem strange to a reader of the New Testament, that its ministers should set up a form which man enacts, as necessary to salvation, and that a kingdom "which consists not in meats or drinks, or divers washings," should be entered ONLY by the application of water to the body, and always entered by the use of that infallible ceremony! The whole of the teaching of our Lord and his Apostles, as to the spirit of his economy, would lead us to quite a contrary conclusion.

But the doctrines held by Dr. Pusey, were taught, if not by the Apostles, by the primitive Fathers, who are the Apostles of the Puseyites:—

"The doctrine of baptismal regeneration was inculcated," says Dr. Vaughan, "by nearly all the primitive Fathers—not only by such writers as Clemens Alexandrinus, and Origen, but in the less speculative productions of Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Cyprian." According to Tertullian, the water in this ceremony is sanctified by the Holy Ghost, who never fails to descend upon it as the name of God is invoked by the officiating minister. "The doctrine of the sacraments was so constructed, that religion could neither begin, nor be sustained, nor end, successfully without them. They were the Alpha and Omega; and the priest, as being alone competent to their administration, was to the worshipper in the place of the Almighty, having the destiny of the victim at his pleasure."

Of the bad consequences of these superstitious notions of the mystical virtue of the rite of baptism, it is in another place remarked:—

The notion of baptism which I have refuted, is very pernicious; it works the very worst results in practice; it gives a fatal tendency to the whole course of procedure on the part of the clergy, regarding the salvation of the people. In the first place, parents are deluded by the belief that their infants are lost, if the minister has not been in time to sprinkle them with water. JESUS cannot take up the little child in his arms and bless it, till the priest arrives; and thus the salvation of these immortal creatures, before they can discern the right hand from the left, is dependent on the indolence, the illness, the caprice, the distance of the minister, or other ten thousand accidents, which may delay the rite of baptism till the child has died! Christ is there, but he cannot act, because the priest, who is his right hand, is sick or asleep, or on a journey! In consequence of this the dear departed infant "can never see the face of God!"

In the second place, all baptised persons are "the members of Christ, the children of God, and the inheritors of the kingdom of heaven." All this they were made in baptism. The priest made them members of Christ's "body, of his flesh, and of his bones"—vitally uniting them to the living head in heaven—engrafting them in the mystical vine—adopting them into the redeemed family of God—washing out their sins—renewing their hearts—and constituting them the heirs of God, and joint-heirs of Christ! All this the Roman and Oxford priests profess to accomplish. Their water-made heirs of glory are all addressed as "faithful brethren in Christ;" "washed, sanctified, and justified."

To show the truly Protestant spirit of the work, we shall now select a few disjointed, pithy paragraphs:—

THE SUBJUGATION OF HUMAN REASON.

I always suspect the creed that cannot be defended without vilifying reason. It reminds one of a man who should dig up the foundation of a house, in order more effectually to prop its walls. It is the province of Reason to ascertain whether God has revealed his will to men—to inquire into the meaning of his revelation; and when that is found, her business is to submit to the heavenly teaching. She need not cavil about the how, but embrace the fact, and adore the wisdom that ordained it. What is above her capacity, she has no right to question. But if the thing which purports to be a revelation from God, shocks her first principles, and does violence to her unavoidable, universal dictates, that is enough: it cannot come from the Author of the human mind; and His honour calls loudly for its rejection.

Speaking of the Ancient Fathers, those worthies whom the Oxford Divines exalt above humanity, and call on the modern world to bow down before, as its masters in theology, it is remarked:—

We must think leniently, then, of the first Christian anchorets. Still they should have remembered the example of their Lord, who went about doing good—of his Apostles, who bore the rude contact of an evil world, that they might bless men by their instructions and social influence. The soldier of the cross should not desert the path of duty, because it is encompassed with danger. Apostolic Christianity is active, practical, self-denying, benevolent. When "the lights of the world" went into the wilderness, of course the world was left in deeper darkness. When the "salt of the earth" was removed from the mass which it should have penetrated and purified, the process of corruption went on the more rapidly; and the salt, when thus collected in a heap, was subjected to an influence which deprived it of its savour, and made it fit only to be trodden under foot of men. It was not the world alone that suffered by the passion for the monastic life—the monks and hermits themselves were its victims. "It is not good for man to be alone." Female society softens our manners, refines our intellects, purifies our affections, enlarges our sympathies, and ennobles our sentiments. The martyrs of truth, and freedom, and philanthropy have not all come from the ranks of the single.

The Oxford divines, it would appear, without yet openly advocating the celibacy of the priesthood, pronounce it "the more excellent way:"—

What a contrast (continues our author) between the Nicene saints and the Apostles! These affected nothing singular in dress or manner. Their excellence was moral; it was in the inner man of the heart, and in their useful lives. Anthony, the patriarch of hermits, wore one sheepskin for fifty years. Some of his unhappy followers condemned themselves to perpetual silence. Through their "voluntary humility and neglecting of the body," they allowed their hair to grow, and, glorying in their filth, were sometimes taken for bears and hyænas! A female anchorite deemed it a sinful conformity to the world to wash more than the tips of her fingers. The tendency, and indeed the avowed aim of this system, was to extinguish all "natural affection." Wives and children were abandoned, not only without remorse, but with the proud consciousnes of having acted heroically. To marry was to lose caste in this new spiritual aristocracy, which had appropriated to itself all the most difficult precepts and most precious promises in the Bible, leaving the crowd of vulgar Christians to a laxer morality and a lower reward. . . . . .

As to the "doctrines of devils," or demonology, the church was full of it during the third and fourth centuries. It was believed that the fallen angels had become the gods of heathenism—that they frequently also took possession of men and women. They were tortured, however, and cast out by the touch of a martyr's bones; or by the sight of the shrine where they were deposited. Awful ceremonies of this kind were practised in the most celebrated churches, in which such men as Chrysostom and Athanasius were the chief actors! Every child was supposed to be possessed by an evil spirit till it was baptised. The Council of Carthage, anno 256, decreed, therefore, that exorcism should precede baptism. How very ancient, then, is the present superstition in Ireland, both among ignorant church people and Roman Catholics upon this subject! Had the Rev. Mr. Carroll, who killed a child in Wexford, while endeavouring to cast a devil out of it, flourished in the third century, he would have been canonised as one of the great thaumaturgues of the age, instead of being shut up in a lunatic asylum for life! But, alas for the Puseyites, this is a degenerate age! There is little faith now even in Ireland, although the Quarterly Review says there is more in it (among the Roman Catholics) than in any nation in Europe; and, therefore, Oxford Christians look on it with most hope.

MORE ABOUT THE FATHERS.

The most renowned of the Fathers flourished in the fourth century. Among these was Gregory, son of the Bishop of Naziensus. Within sixty years after the establishment of Christianity, he thus addresses the Governor of the city:—"The law of Christ subjects you to my power, and to my pulpit; for ours is the authority—an authority greater and more excellent than that which you possess, unless indeed spirit is to be subject unto flesh, and heaven unto earth."

This is the true Catholic spirit of church ascendency—the spirit, too, of the Nicene age. The most holy of the Fathers appealed to the civil sword to execute their canons, and punish their adversaries. Athanasius protested against the recall of Arius from banishment.

Ambrose, who, like Plato, was fabled to have been visited, when an infant, by a swarm of bees, which reposed on his lips, and then ascended high in the air, was made bishop on the eighth day after baptism! He was the first great champion of church ascendancy, and he compelled the Emperor, Theodosius, to perform public penance as a condition of his reconciliation to the church. This great victory of the ecclesiastical over the civil power, occurred in the year 390.

St. John Chrysostom was a great man, and a reforming bishop. But, says Waddington, a writer disposed rather to extenuate than aggravate the faults of the Fathers—"he was not exempt from the errors and abuses of his day. He exalted the merit of celibacy; he strongly inculcated the duty of fasting, and the sanctity of a solitary and ascetic life. He encouraged the veneration for saints and martyrs; but the practical nature of his piety sometimes shone through the mists of his superstitious delusion." He also held the coporeal presence in the eucharist. Such were the errors of his day.

The great St. Jerome had an excessive admiration for the "monastic excellence." He was a monk himself, and from his convent at Bethlehem, he expatiated on the justifying merits of mortification, celibacy, and pilgrimages: and "though in the birth-place of Christ, at the very fountain of humility and peace, he vented even against his Christian adversaries a malignant and calumnious rancour."

Erasmus says, that Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, allowed to be the most eminent of the Fathers, began to read Paul's epistles with no instructor when near thirty years of age—that he was immediately hurried to the episcopal office, and compelled to teach others what he had not learned himself; and that he had not sufficient knowledge of Greek to enable him to study the commentaries of the Greek writers. He gave the authority of his name to the maxim, that it is right to punish religious errors by civil penalties, and thus sanctioned the diabolical principle of persecution, which has so disgraced and desolated the Christian Church in every age; and which lurks, like a cowardly demon, in certain corners of it still. His motives for embracing the Catholic faith, would not weigh much with a modern sceptic, though they might influence a congregation of ignorant peasants.

According to Mosheim, and other learned authors, the value of the writings that remain of the Apostolic Fathers, is very little, except as historical witnesses of what prevailed in their day; and even in regard to this, as Mr. Taylor has justly remarked, the testimony of heathen writers, such as Pliny and Tacitus, would be quite as good. . . . . .

Of the merits of the primitive Fathers, as moralists, Mosheim delivers the following judgment, which is fully borne out by their writings:—"Before the question mentioned above, concerning the merit of the ancient Fathers, as moralists, be decided, a previous question must be determined, viz., what is meant by a bad director in point of morals? And if by such a person, he meant one who has no determinate notion of the nature and limits of the duties incumbent on Christians—no clear and distinct ideas of virtue and vice; who has not penetrated the spirit and genius of those sacred books, to which alone we must appeal in every dispute about Christian virtue, and who, in consequence thereof, fluctuates often in uncertainty, or falls into error in explaining the divine laws, though he may frequently administer sublime and pathetic instructions; if, by a bad guide in morals, such a person as we have now delineated be meant, then it must be confessed, that this title belongs, indisputably, to many of the Fathers."

Could this be truly said of the very lowest order of Protestant writers of the present day, or of any day since the Reformation? How could the professor of "Christian morals" in the University of Oxford, have the conscience to send the people away from the Bible, and our own excellent practical writers, to learn what is right and wrong from the "wisemen" that lived fifteen hundred years ago? Does not such advice betray great ignorance of the Gospel, or great ignorance of the Fathers—or great treachery to the church in which he holds so important an office?

We might multiply extract upon extract; but we advise, as "the better way," that readers search out the matter for themselves. Controversy of this sort is not much in our way; but on every hand, as we have noticed, it is asked—What is this Puseyism which is bringing to its aid, by what means it best knows, all the great Tory organs of the press, and turning the shallow brains of the Oxford youths with Fathers and Councils, and all manner of superstitions, instead of the races, boxing-matches, hunting, and drinking-bouts, which occupied their fathers and grand-fathers?—and in Mr. Godkin's book we find the plainest reply that we have yet seen. Puseyism is, in the Oxford divines, the very natural manifestation of a sacerdotal corporation beginning to feel alarmed at the boldly innovating, at the "Ultra-Protestant" spirit of the age; while among Oxford young men, the rising aristocracy of the country, Puseyism is the growth of another natural instinct, which inspires the blind desire of consolidating in the hands of Churchmen usurped power, which it is perceived is insensibly, but inevitably gliding from their own order. The Church once courted the alliance of the State as a prop and defence; now the aristocracy begin to cling to the Church as an Ark of safety from the rising waters. Better and surer were their stay could they only think of redressing wrong, and of doing justice to those they fear and hate.

We would here beg to inquire, merely for information, and as among the ignorant laity, whether the Oxford divines allow baptism administered by a Presbyterian or Dissenter to be efficacious; for if not, we suspect that more than one of our Scottish bishops,—Right-Reverend Fathers in God,—bishops of the "Reformed Catholic Church of Scotland!" are still little better than the heathen, though ordination, through unbroken Apostolic succession, may have had some mystical virtue. If not, how is the supposed case to be remedied? Has their subsequent Confirmation the effect? Are such bishops yet baptized, or are they not? In what strange inconsistencies and absurdities do men involve themselves, who cast off not only the authority of Scripture but the plainest dictates of common sense. It would be a singular thing to find a bishop, at the close of his career, not entitled to Christian burial, because he had not in infancy been baptized by a legitimate Successor of the Apostles.

A VOYAGE ROUND SCOTLAND AND THE ISLES. *

Two volumes, and these well filled, seem a pretty considerable bulk of log for a voyage from Greenock round Cape Wrath and back to Leith, though excursions to St. Kilda and the Shetland Isles, and nearly all the island dependencies of Scotland, are included. Good will and skill may, however, accomplish much; so, starting with ample foreknowledge of the ground, the ingenious author, with the help of a good deal of family history and scenic description, a little amateur angling, a little Natural History, and doing gets along swimmingly, and contrives to manufacture an exceedingly agreeable literary melange.

All the gentlemen's seats by the way,

In the watery summer of 1841, Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, on duty as Secretary to the Board of Trustees for Scottish Manufactures and Fisheries, made this small circumnavigation in the Fishery Cutter Princess Royal, and invited Mr. Wilson to accompany him, "for the purpose of making certain investigations into the natural history of the herring." These appear to have been most satisfactorily conducted—especially at breakfast time—both upon the fresh, the red, and the pickled varieties; and the narrative of the voyage certainly does not suffer from the reported results of these and similar branches of scientific inquiry. Sir Thomas Dick Lauder's Sketch-Book and Journal have both been at the service of the companion of his voyage; whom, by the way, many of our readers will more readily recollect, and more heartily welcome, under his sporting appellation of Tom Oakleigh.

The voyagers embarked at Greenock; touched at Bute, Arran, and Campbeltown; and then skirted the coasts of Ayrshire and Wigtonshire, examining the state of the local fisheries—or as often the no-fisheries—angling a little in the freshwater lochs and most reputed trouting streams on the coast; and experimenting on the effect of drinking champagne out of Bohemian-coloured glass—a practice found highly worthy of imitation; and also making frequent trial of the hospitalities of those of the lairds whose mansions lay within range of the Princess Royal. Whether it were in pursuit of herring shoals or the sublime and picturesque, the voyagers took a peep of the Giant's Causeway before running into Bowmore in Islay, and passing "two very agreeable days at Islay House."

Besides descriptions of things as they are, Mr. Wilson gives a frequent retrospective glance to insular clan history; though he leaves some important points, that have long been mooted almost at the point of the dirk, in a rather unsatisfactory state; as, for example, whether the ancestor of Glengarry, or "one Allan of Moidart," was the eldest son of a certain Ranald; of which controversy, with greater levity than so grave and serious a matter warrants, he thus concludes: "Of the actual truth in this matter we are ourselves as ignorant as the child unborn; and if we did possess a knowledge of it, we would hold our peace (especially in the Highlands,) even although we also knew that the representative of the one [Glengarry] had carried both himself and his tail to New South Wales; while the other [Clanranald,] somewhat like Tam o' Shanter's mare, had 'fient a tail to shake.'" This want of reverence in speaking of matters of such vast importance augurs worse for the voyage than the reality bears out.

Colonsay, and the hospitable and modest mansion of its Laird at Killouran, is one of the most attractive of the domestic insular pictures with which the reader is gratified. After a good and ample island dinner at Killouran, where the mutton was black-faced and four-year old—a great rarity according to Mr. Wilson, though our butcher never yet had a sheep under that age in his stall—the evening was wound up, in gallant style, by a Highland-fling danced to perfection by Sir T. D. L., (it makes us young again but to hear of it!) the Lady of Colonsay, and Captain M'Neill, the Laird's kinsman. "And such snapping of fingers and pointing of toes, and ever and anon a shout like a musket shot, were never heard nor seen before in any Western Isle." There should have been an engraving of this among the plates.

The voyagers made a run over to Skerry-vore, or the Light-house, now erecting on those tremendous rocks off the island of Tiree, so named.

The Princess Royal careered and coquetted about the coast of Mull and the smaller islands which cluster around its Atlantic side, while her passengers examined, at their leisure, Staffa and Iona. Indeed they lost no opportunity of exploring every scene of note in the Hebrides, and every ruined castle and tower on their way that was at all approachable from the coast. And these old holds nearly all lie upon the coast. Numerous fine descriptions of scenery of course occur in the work; but Loch Sunart is especially recommended to us, as this tortuous arm of the ocean lies out of the way of ordinary tourists, who have frequent opportunities of seeing many of the finest of the other salt-water lochs, on the different steam voyages to the West Highland coast or to the Isles.

We now struck across from Tobermory towards the mouth of Loch Sunart, one of the most picturesque and finely varied pieces of salt-water scenery to be seen in all Scotland. This far-stretching narrow and tortuous sea-loch, extends about twenty miles among the hills, running westwards beyond Strontian, and within so short a distance of the Linnhé Loch as to give a peninsular character to the great district of Morven, which forms its own southern bounds. The entrance seems at first so closed by islands as to present a most impervious aspect. One of these, called Risca, is of small dimensions, and comparatively low and wooded; but Oronsay, and above all Carnich, are large high and rocky, singularly wild in form, and generally bare of wood. Over the low Risca appear the richly wooded and variously formed steeps and knolls which bound the loch, and these are everywhere backed by bold and broken outlines of what may be better named mountains of rock than rocky mountains. To the right is soon seen the mouth of a branch called Loch Teacus, its narrow entrance opening between two low rocky headlands, the loch itself enclosed and backed by finely formed mountains, with steep slopes and hanging woods; while Carnich continues so to shut the scene, that no one suspects the existence of the narrow strait behind; and so Loch Sunart properly so called, remains not only invisible but unimagined. Turning, however, into a difficult and narrow passage, the upward portion of the scene opens in all its beauty; and a finer combination of mountain precipices, with lower ranges one rising behind another backwards from the water's edge, many of them wooded in the most gorgeous manner, with rocky promontories and intervening grassy slopes enlivened by receding cottages and slips of cultivated ground, cannot be seen among the British islands. The evening was fine, the wind fair, the narrow waters rippled only by a gentle breeze, and we glided most serenely within the darkening shadows of the great mountains, in the eyes of whose lonely dwellers we doubt not the sight of the beautiful Princess Royal, with her full-swelling snowy sails, advancing along those finely wooded shores, must have added greatly to the glory of such a lustrous sunset. .

Loch Sunart seemed well supplied at this time both with birds and fishes. In some particular spots the gulls were literally in thousands, all screaming and tumbling on the top of each other, with a view to get the sooner to the surface, where some small shoals of herring fry were swimming. . . . . The morning of the 8th of July was bright and sunny, so weighing anchor at an early hour, we continued our run up Loch Sunart, as far as Sir James Miles Riddell's residence at Strontian. The upper reaches of the loch are still extremely fine, though not of so peculiar and striking a character as those nearer the entrance. We landed for a short time, while some of our people were foraging for milk and eggs. The house is a pleasant, irregular, old-fashioned, cottage kind of dwelling, very snugly placed, and the environs delightful, being deeply embowered in shrubs, with no want of the larger kinds of forest trees, the walks laid out in a somewhat labyrinthic order, while a sparkling stream comes murmuring down the glen, and is crossed by a bridge which spans it close upon the shore. Some of the lower windows open into the varied parterres of a flower garden, and the sight of moss-roses, mimuli, &c., was refreshing to seafaring men, who enjoy with highest relish during the sweet serenity of a summer morning, the unaccustomed sparkling of the dewy grass, and "Flora's earliest smell." Sir James, we believe, possesses a great extent of property in this peninsular territory of Ardnamurchan; but we can easily conceive from the aspect of its higher portions, that compared with its vast range, it is probably more picturesque than productive. Lord Waterford occupied this portion of the estate not long ago as a shooting quarter, and among other philanthropic exertions, endeavoured, on one occasion, to awaken the benighted people to the performance of more active duties, by tying the parson's horse to the rope of the church bell.

The voyage was diversified by the ordinary salt-water incidents; sometimes a spice of actual danger, or a touch of sea-sickness—though the last mortifying fact is rather indicated than frankly pleaded to.

The wild, rocky, and sea-indented western coasts of Inverness, Ross, and Sutherland shires, detained the Princess Royal and her gallant crew a long while; for now they were beginning to find something like herring fisheries, and sport became earnest. We should have liked to see a little more of the people—the Highlanders; but the object was herrings, and we must be content with very scanty, incidental notices of the other natives. The voyagers landed one day, as they often did, at the Bay of Scourie, on the west coast of Sutherland.

We found a pretty land-locked natural harbour, and some cultivated ground laid out in fields. The houses of the hamlet lay chiefly on some elevated ground to the north, and eastward over the fields are houses here and there. A poor maniac woman was filling the air with her wild cries, ever and anon singing more solemnly a Gaelic song, in which the word "America" was intermingled. Her friends were conveying her in a cart to Dornoch to place her in restraint.

Poor people from the Duke of Sutherland's estates were found about to emigrate at this time, as they may have been in that paternal quarter for many years; which was one cause, probably, of "America" mingling in the wild chant of the poor distracted creature. About the Edderachillis coast, and other places of the late "Reay country," now part of the overgrown property of the family of Sutherland, lobster fisheries were found; welled smacks from the Thames carrying off the trapped lobsters alive, to be devoured in London. The wretched hovels inhabited by the Highlanders could not fail to arrest the attention of the southern voyagers. On a Sunday, they landed somewhere near Pool Ewe, in the parish of Gairloch, on the west coast of Ross-shire.

We followed the Gairloch road which leads along the southern bank, and soon after diverges to the right among the hills. A lofty rocky range prevailed at some distance on that side, the intervening ground being partly cultivated in the form of small patches of grain and potatoes, partly in the more unsophisticated condition of peat-moss. Among these were visible collections of very wretched-looking hovels,—poor even for Highland huts,—with holes for windows, closed up with sods removeable at pleasure. We were at times in doubt if they were actual dwellings, had we not seen so many well-dressed men and women going out and in. The contrast was indeed remarkable between the attire and general aspect of the people, and the forlorn condition of their habitations. Nothing could be more decent and respectable than the groups of natives, all in their Sunday gear. Most of the women had tidy caps, (a few of them extremely smart,) with bows of ribbons on either side, and their hair hanging beneath in well-kept curls; and some had elegantly-formed great-coats made of cloth, and neatly fitted to the person, though without the capes so common with the Irish women. Where they contrive to stow away, or how to preserve unsoiled by soot and smoke, these better garments within their dingy cabins, is what we have yet to learn.

Those mistresses in Edinburgh or Glasgow, who, upon the faith of the exterior of a strapping new-caught lass, thus rigged out, engage her to do the household business of a civilized family, will, we imagine, fairly catch a Tartar. But the minister of the parish says, that they are now beginning to build byres for their cows; and if the cows are once ejected from the dwelling-house, some improvement in domestic cleanliness may be anticipated. In the suburbs of Stornoway, if a town of its size ever rises to the dignity of having suburbs, we are told—

We passed a kraal of wretched-looking huts, some of them so small and sad, so resembling decayed portions of mother earth upheaved by accident, that we did not at first regard them as human dwellings, till we observed a single pane of glass, in one instance, sticking in the thatch. Some were attached together, and thickly built up with sods, in such a way as to look like natural green hummocks, over the tops of which chance had thrown a scanty covering of dirty straw. The interiors were very miserable. Yet the people had a healthy aspect on the whole, and seemed in no way deficient in muscular strength. Black eyes, dark hair, and a somewhat swarthy complexion, were more common than we expected in a country where the Scandinavian blood so long prevailed.

The cultivation was, in general, much of a piece with the dwellings.

Some rather extraordinary facts in natural history were witnessed and recorded during the voyage, of which the following are among the more remarkable :—

As we were rowing ashore from the cutter, we observed a singular kind of encounter on a small island in Loch Laxford, between a troop of goats and a flock of sea-gulls. The goats were all as black as pitch, and the old ones were accompanied by some young retainers, which to us looked not much bigger than jackdaws, though as nimble as monkeys. Our notice was first attracted by seeing some of them descend from their rocky ledges, and gamble over a piece of green, moist meadow ground. They had not done so, however, for more than a few seconds, before they were attacked most fiercely by a flock of gulls, which dived directly down upon them; and each time they did so the goats made a spring, as if they found the horny beaks too much for either their fore or hind quarters. They were in a regular quandary, or what the Germans call a ffunke; and it was curious to observe how the gulls achieved their object, by always keeping the goats between themselves and the rocks, and thus at last driving them upwards from the meadow, where we doubt not lay their "callow young,"—small, soft powder-puffs in woolly garments, which the horny hoof of kidling might have sorely incommoded, but for this brave parental interference. So the goats were gulled, and the gulls not kidnapped. .

Saw around us, for the first time during the present voyage, specimens of the Arctic Gull (Lestris Richardsonii) pursuing, as is their wont, the other kinds of gull, —forcing them to disgorge their food. Observed a feature of this manœuvre which we had never before noticed. When they descend upon what may be called the victim gull, either actually striking it on the back, or with an angry menace seeming so to do, they frequently tumble themselves head over heels beyond and beneath it, so as to hang, as it were, for a few seconds in the air back downwards, but with ready beak, intent to seize the savoury half-digested morsel, disgorged in terror by their timorous cousins.

We ought to have mentioned that our author is a most determined and persevering joker and punster, and that he seems to have been in such ebullient spirits throughout the voyage, that your dull matter-of-fact folks may occasionally feel his inordinate facetiousness somewhat overpowering; and your fastidious people question of its uniform good taste.

St. Kilda was an object of great curiosity; and the voyagers were much gratified by their visit to that speck in the ocean. Mr. Wilson has dwelt long upon the St. Kildeans, with fondness and a kind of enthusiasm. They are a fortunate small picturesque family, to attract so much attention, and to make such a noise in the world. The present population of the island is only 105 souls, including nine in the family of the missionary—not so many persons in all as inhabit many of the high, old, over-peopled lands in the Cowgate or Blackfriars' Wynd of Edinburgh, or the Saltmarket of Glasgow; but who thinks of making a voyage of discovery to these urbane insulated communities, save the police, or Dr. Alison? The little primitive community of St. Kilda is, however, rendered quite fascinating under Mr. Wilson's portraiture; and his narrative cannot fail to interest many individuals in its behalf. The late cold and rainy seasons have been severely felt by the natives, who last year were in danger of starvation. There might be worse deeds than shipping off the entire community some morning for the shores of Newfoundland, and leaving St. Kilda to the sea-fowl, its ancient and fittest possessors. There are, however, other places in the Hebrides which, if not quite so wild and tempestuous, afford little more comfort or shelter to the inhabitants. The Fishery Board have, at considerable expense, formed a harbour named Callicott, near the extremity of the Butt of Lewis :—

There is a road of approach to the harbour, and a considerable extent of curing-houses, some of which were occupied by those engaged in curing ling. Farther on was a kraal of the most miserable houses ever seen, resembling those of Barra in external form, but infinitely worse. The St. Kilda huts in comparison to these were palaces. The first object which met the eye (and nose and feet) within the threshold was a dunghill, from which the visiter has the option of descending either by the right hand into the cow's apartment, or by the left into that tenanted by human beings. Yet many of these people were making handsomely by fishing. A good deal of cultivation prevailed around.

Leaving the western coasts, the Princess Royal made her way to Thurso, and at last to Wick, the head-quarters, and the very heart of the Fishery, then, about the middle of August, at the busiest. And now we do learn something of this important branch of national economy. We, however, can only take a side-glance, premising that the herring-gutters below are often strapping, comely lasses, earning in "the season" great wages, and dressing quite as gaily as the fair inmates of the black huts of Gairloch :—

After breakfast we went ashore to Wick, and there witnessed one of the most extraordinary sights we have seen for many a day. All along the inner harbour, and in every street and quay, as well as within many large enclosed yards and covered buildings, there are numerous square wooden boxes as big as ordinary sized rooms, the containing sides, however, being only two or three feet high. Into these huge troughs the herrings are carried in panniers from the boats the instant they arrive. There they are all tumbled in helter-skelter, pannier after pannier, in a long-continued stream of fish, until the boats are emptied or the troughs are filled. Then come troops of sturdy females, each armed with knife in hand, and range themselves around the trough, —the process of gutting commences, and is carried on with such ceaseless and untiring rapidity, that unless we had used the freedom to request one of the cleanest and prettiest of these evisceratrixes so to moderate the rancour of her knife as to let us see what she was doing, we could scarcely have followed her manipulations with the naked eye. However, we think we are now master, at least in theory, of the refined art of evisceration. The Secretary and ourself had the curiosity to time our fair friend, when left to the remorseless rapidity of her own sweet will, and we found that she gutted exactly two dozen in the minute. Now two thousand women working at that rate, with but brief intermission from early morning till the close of day, must produce an almost incalculable amount of disembowelment. . . .

Before beginning to work they take off their caps and bonnets, and either cover over or exchange their outer garment for a worser, making their toilet with innocent unreserve sub Jove, and so commence their bloody occupation. Towards evening they carefully wash their faces, arms, and legs, and slip on again their better garment. Thus they never appear, except around the gutting board, in otherwise than rather trim array. Indeed many of the most magnificently fine females, whom we saw standing at respectable doors, or looking out of decent windows, or going sedately about their evening occupations from shop to shop, had been assiduously engaged in gutting all day long. The cure of herrings is indeed an object of such paramount importance to the town and neighbourhood, that when an unusual take occurs, and delicate female hands are wanting for the work, a kind of requisition is sent through the town, even to the most respectable inhabitants, to allow their domestics to attend as gutters for a day or two; and in hiring servants it is by no means unusual for the latter to stipulate for leave to gut during a certain number of days, as a perquisite beyond their usual termly wages. To prevent indolence or idleness, all these gutters are paid by piece-work, that is, so much a cran or barrel after the fish are packed. At the rate of 4d. per barrel, each gutter according to her skill and activity, may make from four to seven shillings a-day; and in former times, when so high as a shilling a barrel was sometimes allowed during a press of work and scarcity of hands, their gains were actually enormous. An expert and practised company of three can make up among them sixty-three barrels in a day, or twenty-one barrels each; so that, in the glorious times alluded to, a gutter might have kept her gig, and driven to the scene of action daily.

This is but a small and incidental feature of the fishery, and of herring and cod in general.

After the Secretary's business at Wick was accomplished, the Princess Royal stood away for Orkney, and went as far as the Fitful Head, in Shetland. Sir Walter Scott, who had made and recorded nearly the same circum or elliptic navigation a good many years ago, was often present to the recollection of the voyager; while "Andersons' Guide to the Highlands and Isles," and the new "Statistical Account," lent him more effectual aid. The chief incidents in Shetland were, the Princess Royal being as nearly as possible wrecked; and her nobler passengers eating the tusk while fresh—a glorious fish! By the way, trout, like those of Loch Leven, were discovered in a small lake in Barra. Save a run into Cromarty Bay, and a few friendly calls on the coast, there is nothing more of interest till the Princess Royal happily reached Granton, and her passengers dropt off at the end of a three-months' voyage, which must have afforded them very great pleasure and amusement; one element of solid satisfaction, denied to ordinary travellers, being, that, so far as appears, not a single hôtel or tavern bill was presented during the whole period; all being free where the Princess Royal and Captain Stewart came.——We can promise every class of readers, but especially those to whom the scenes described are new, much entertainment from Mr. Wilson's voyage round Scotland, which only wanted the presence of his brother, the Professor, to render it immortal.

MIDSUMMER EVE.*

This tale is illustrative of the Reformation in England, and of the condition and spirit of society at a memorable stage of its progress. The particular Midsummer Eve on which the romance opens, was towards the close of the short and bitter reign of the "Bloody Queen Mary," while the fires of Smithfield were never dormant, and it closes on Midsummer Night; so that the events are crowded into a very brief space of time. The scene is the heart of London, or the then retired neighbouring village of Islington, and other small suburban hamlets. The construction of the plot, if plot there be, is exceedingly simple, and the incidents are few. The strength of the tale depending upon the dramatic delineation of historical and ideal characters, and lively pictures of the spirit and body of the age. The romance opens pleasantly.——At a point which, in those days, usually bounded the summer evening walks of the citizens of London, and where the high-road, leading from the postern of Newgate through Islington towards Barnet, was intersected by the road from Kingsland and Essex, towards Tottenham, stood the remains of an antique cross, and, near it, a humble and solitary, but exceedingly picturesque cottage, which, though only two miles distant from the city, and not above one from the houses in Smithfield, seemed as lonely and rural as if a hundred miles distant from any town.

In that cottage porch, many a young citizen doubtless observed, with eyes of admiration, a pretty young maiden surrounded with balls of twine and small cord, engaged in net-making. This maid was Annot, the daughter of widow Palmer, who lived in that cottage; and the young girl, through the summer, sat in the porch from morning till night, busily plying her fingers at her beautiful employment. So public a spot as that—the point of intersection of two great thoroughfares, where so many gay citizens walked for pleasure, with more than ordinary liveliness, from having for a time done with trade, might seem not a very proper place for a young and modest virgin to sit, even at work. It might appear that she knew she was pretty, and, loving to be admired and complimented, sat in that place of bustle as a spot where those tastes were most likely to be gratified. But this was not the case: if Annot knew she was pretty, she had learned it from her friends, and not from her mirror, and the words gave her not more pleasure than any other expressive of their affection. Not a particle of feminine vanity was mixed up in her composition: prettiness of face and form gave her no pleasure; a compliment on her person from the gayest noble would not have urged her heart one degree beyond its ordinary motion. Poor girl! one element of woman's joy she was deprived of—she was blind, and had been so from her birth.

The costume of the young girl is elaborately described, and also the dress and appearance of "a man of motley," who stood beside her; "the fool of her patrons, the loyal Sir Thomas Granville and his noble-minded daughter, Lady Anne. They were rigid Catholics, while the blind girl had secretly imbibed the doctrines of the Reformation; which were also held by Master Barker, the curate of the parish of Islington, and a few of his flock. But, to the innocence of the dove, the blind girl united the wisdom of the serpent, and no doubt of her orthodoxy had been entertained until this fatal evening. Upon it the Right Reverend Bishop of London, Dr. Bonner, was returning from a Visitation which he had, by special command of his mistress, been making into Essex, for the purpose of finding more heretical combustibles for his ever-blazing fires, and, in an evil hour, he halted at the cottage at the cross roads to inquire his way, when the ribaldry of Ralph the fool, who knew not in whose presence he stood, brought both himself and Blind Annot into trouble. The cavalcade, consisting of Bonner, Bishop Tonstall of Durham, with several lawyers and doctors in theology, minions of the persecuting fiend, and a few wretched prisoners, had been nearly benighted; and it was, at this period, considered dangerous to approach the city after dark. The fierce and brutal character of Bonner, and the milder nature of the conscientious, and very aged Tonstall, are dramatically brought out in the dialogue which passes while the cavalcade halts before the cottage. When Ralph discovered his mistake, and listened to the boisterous threats of the renegade Bishop, he cried,

* A Tale, 3 vols. Saunders & Otley

"I pray your good lordship not to hurt pretty Annot," interrupted the fool, with great earnestness—"I assure your lordship and all worthy gentlemen, that she follows the good fashion, and holdeth by Queen Mary, and the Pope, and King Philip, and reads not the Common Prayer."

"Peace, knave, and answer me!"

"But your good lordship will promise not to hurt our pretty Annot, for she comes of a good stock."

"Wilt thou be silent knave?"

"Nay, my lord; you will be glad to hear that Annot is daughter of Abraham Palmer, that you and good King Henry burnt because he went along with his mother to mass; so in my poor opinion——"

"Knaves, knaves there! unsling your carabines, leave your horses, and haul me out that devil's brat into the road, and my horse's hoofs shall trample him into hell!"

"Nay, nay, brother Bonner——"

"Brother Tonstall, I will not be gainsaid in this matter. Shall I be mocked and scoffed before mine own grooms? Out with the traitorous heretic there!"

While his reverend lordship was saying this, the serving men had sprung from their horses and rushed into the porch, and now reappeared, dragging the offender by the collar of his doublet into the full moonlight, when the bishop, perceiving the gay colours of poor Ralph's dress, exclaimed,—

"Heyday, my masters, whom have we here. Are we at the May-day gambols, or what mummery is this?"

"Nay, my lord," replied Ralph, consequentially, "I am no Friar Tuck—your lordship's belly would better suit that character. Neither am I——"

"Giles! Edward! fasten me this knave to the belly of your horse. I will see whether I am to abide his gibes," cried the bishop, as he heard his prisoners laughing at the fool's foolish reply.

"And it please your lordship, it is only a poor fool—one that hath lost his way from the neighbouring castle," said one of the serving men.

"Truly, it is," rejoined Annot. "A fool that lives hard by—Sir Thomas Granville's fool, an't please your lordship."

"And what art thou, wench, that consortest with pestilent fools like this, who, I'll be sworn, is more knave than fool?"

"Nay, brother Bonner," said Bishop Tonstall, "I pray thee let us not tarry for this trash. The fool doth but speak after his vocation, and we may not expect words of wisdom from him. Sir Thomas Granville, his owner, is a loyal servant of the Queen's majesty, and a brave man that will not suffer his toy to be spoiled."

"Hold the fool straitly in thy grasp, Giles," cried Bonner, "until we see fit to dismiss him presently with a whipping; but I must speak to the woman. Now, thou light wench, didst thou set on yonder fool to utter his ribald speech?"

"Nay, my lord, I would not willingly give matter of offence even to mine enemy."

"Enemy! dost thou say, I thy bishop am thine enemy?"

"No, my lord. I mean I would not offend."

"Woman, I grievously suspect thee. Before I am many days older, I will make a narrow inquisition of this parish of Islington."

On this night the blind girl found means to steal away to warn Master Barker of the peril in which he stood with Bonner. But Barker, the pupil and ordained minister of Cranmer, felt that now the time was come when every honest man was bound to declare himself. The meekness of wisdom, the beauty of holiness in the poor blind girl, and the fiery zeal of Barker, afford fine contrasts of Christian principle and character. He is cursing in bitterness the bloody persecutors, the defilers of the sanctuary, the slayers of God's servants, when Annot thus expostulates:—

"Dear sir!" cried Annot, "surely your reverence hath forgotten that sweet chapter of the holy Word which you read to me a few days agone, where we are commanded to forgive those that persecute us, and rather do them good than evil?"

"Yes, Annot, poor girl! I can forgive all my particular and private wrongs; but these are wrongs to God, whose servant I am; and I am bound to do for the glory of God what I would not do for myself."

"Alas, sir, what are all the men in the world to avenge the wrongs of the great God? The lightest touch of his wrath would be heavier than the arms of all Christendom. Dear sir, the sacred book teacheth mercy, and that is why the children of affliction love it. If it taught vengeance, it would be unregarded, since we are utterly unable to inflict it: but indeed nothing can be so truly God's word as the commands of mercy; for mercy never erreth; but while you strike down the most grievous persecutor of the saints, perchance you strike one that God had willed to repent and find mercy."

"Thy reproof is just, my gentle friend, and yet my anger is not unjust," replied the priest; "for while I would strike the foe, I would go patiently into the flames lighted for me; whilst thou, who wouldst show him mercy, wouldst hide thee from him. The difference between us is, that I am a man and thou art a woman."

"Nay, sir, that is not all. I too am prepared, if needful, to yield my soul to God amidst the flames; and yet the Bible telleth me not to curse, but to pray for those that despitefully use me, for Christ's sake, who can judge and punish more justly and thoroughly than all the children of men."

"I have taught thee, and now thou teachest me; and I thank God that thou art able to preach a nobler doctrine than mine own—even the charity which, standing above the common altitude of the world, looketh down on the passions of men with the indifference of a superior nature."

"Alas, sir! such a one as I must be just; I can only hear God's Word, and think on it. The passions of the great and the learned, and even of those happy persons that can see, affect not my mind. I must trust humbly in God, as I find his Word commands me; for what other help have I in all the world?"

"Well, Annot," said the priest, "with the help of God, I will school my tongue to prudence and my heart to meekness, that I may not offend these butchers of the saints; but I know not—this night even is a night of peril. The bitterness with which I spoke was not caused by a light thing, for my heart was bursting with grief. Thou knowest that five persons have been excommunicated this day, and are to be burned in Smithfield tomorrow. But thou dost not know that one of them is mine own familiar friend, and father in the faith: I must see him and them: the night shall not pass over without a word of love and admonition, if needful, from my lips, to those who are so soon to enter the presence of our Lord, even if Bonner and the chief justice stood in the way to forbid me."

This Midsummer Eve was to Barker a night of wild and busy adventure. Among the more remarkable of the persons whom he encountered in his perilous ramble in the streets and lanes of London, was Master Steynham, a wealthy London merchant, and a determined adherent of the Reformed cause, who, for commercial reasons, enjoyed the protection of Philip of Spain, the husband of the Queen, and was, by this means, and his popularity among the brave London 'Prentices, able to succour some of the persecuted Protestants in defiance of Mary and Bonner. The character of Steynham is well conceived and well supported throughout. The blind girl was arrested, and that by means of Harry Markham, the lover of her generous friend and patroness, the Lady Anne Granville. His remorse and grief, when he discovers into what cruelty he has been unconsciously led to oblige Bonner, and his profound grief, when he is cast off by Lady Anne as unworthy of her love, or of the name of a gentleman, makes Markham vow to effect, at all risks, the liberation of Annot, or to perish in the attempt. The fierce progress of the persecution—the examinations, and actual burning and torturing of the heretics, and the adventures of Markham, Steynham, and Barker, in rescuing victims from the grasp of the blood-thirsty prelate, fill up the rest of the volumes. These transactions afford many opportunities for the development of the character of the age, and for descriptions of manners, and especially of London in the olden time. The great object of the enterprise of Harry Markham, a Roman Catholic believer but a Christian gentleman, and, above all, the devoted lover of Anne Granville, is accomplished after a world of daring and dangerous adventure; and all the party escape to Geneva through the kindness of Master Steynham and the secret influence of his patron Philip. Then come the happy days of good Queen Bess!—when all the exiled Protestants return, and among them, Blind Annot, Master Barker, and the lover of Anne Granville. Adversity had taught the Protestants charity, when their day of power came. Instead of retaliating upon their Catholic fellow-subjects, they remembered that they had been English men and women before they had been Papists, and that the men, women, and children of that faith were not all devils, though a few of their churchmen and rulers were.—When it is wondered that so brave and gallant a nation as the French could, for one month, or one week, have submitted to the Reign of Terror, may it not be a subject of equal wonder that the English so long submitted to the atrocities of the reign of "Bloody Mary"—or that, in the language of this Tale, "a bold, intelligent, and honest nation, like the English, should have been turned and twisted about in every direction of political and religious bigotry, at the will of any person occupying a certain position, though imbecile, bloody-minded, or mad, or all of them together!" Upon reflection, we can hardly forgive Miss Strickland for those softening shades with which she has, in her late work, tried to invest the character of the unsexed and merciless bigot.

The chief defect of this story is the occasional languor of movement in the very heat and pith of its greatest enterprises; when the reader, instead of being hurried onward, is kept back by collateral details, which, though they display the author's antiquarian knowledge, retard the action and weaken the interest. The Tale, however, possesses many beauties; and, on the whole, the only solid objection which we can urge is, that finding it so close on the mark of excellence, it is not quite up to it. No small merit is its bold and free Protestant spirit. As short specimens of a romance, which, compared with ordinary fictions, is far above the average, we shall now extract a few brief and disjointed specimens.——Markham and Steynham, in their attempt to find and release Annot, kept prisoner in some unknown part of the vast pile of St. Paul's, overhear two of Bonner's Doctors of Theology haranguing Barker, who is chained to a pillar of the Cathedral, now turned into one of the Bishop's supplementary prisons.

"There is no folly or obstinacy in all Christendom so great as yours. With very little or no learning, ye maintain doctrines not allowed by the Church; that is your folly. And although there be divers learned men that talk with ye, and show ye the right way, ye persist in your false opinions; that is your obstinacy."

"But," replied another voice, "I do but believe what the Bible teacheth, and you profess to have your doctrines out of the Bible. Why then talk to me so much of councils, and fathers—can they alter the Word?"

"Nay," was the reply, "fathers and councils do in nowise alter the Word of Scripture; they only declare its meaning."

"But where find you that I am to follow their opinion?"

"The Church declareth that their opinions are to be followed."

"And where hath your Church that power?"

"Man, dost thou not know that the Church and the Scriptures are two ministers that act together by the will of God; and that to doubt the authority of the Church is rank blasphemy all the same as though thou wert to dispute the authority of Scripture? It is a crime that cannot be pardoned: how can the Church pardon the man that denieth her authority? Assuredly thou hast a heart of stone, or thou wouldst feel how terrible a thing it must be to endure the torture of fire, which thou wilt have to undergo in a few days, but which is as nothing compared with that which is prepared for thee."

While listening to this conversation, Steynham had gradually drawn near to the speakers, and as the sentence last quoted was spoken, motioning Harry to guard the door, he laid his hand on the speaker's shoulder, saying—

"A rather uncomfortable kind of argument this, good sir, when the one party threateneth the other with burning on earth and in hell."

"What fellow art thou?—take thy hand from my cloak!" cried the other, endeavouring to free himself from Steynham's vigorous grasp.

"Nay, good sir," cried Steynham, "I hold it not good to set men at liberty that wield such power as ye do."

In the following scene Blind Annot Palmer is undergoing the examination of Bonner, Gardiner, and Tonstall, and their assisting doctors and lawyers. She is urged and commanded to criminate herself, and to inform on her fellow heretics. After Bonner had stormed and threatened, Tonstall spoke—

"Child," said Tonstall, with his usual kindness, "methinks thou art strangely timorous to utter the truth: thinkest thou we lie in wait, like murderers, to do thee harm? We require only a plain answer to our questions; and if thou hast done wrong, and art sorry for thy offence, thou mayest be readily pardoned."

"Annot Palmer," said Gardiner, with a more dangerous mildness, "you mistake the nature of this examination; but it will do you harm to persist in the mistake. There is, indeed, a difference between a criminal and a suspected person; but there is also a difference between this court and a criminal court. His lordship the Bishop of London hath an undoubted right to question you who are suspected, and to let you go after confession; but if you persist in obstinacy, and leave it to him to prove your guilt, you will take yourself out of his hands, and deliver yourself to the sheriff to be tried in a public court, from which there would be no appeal."

"I have never denied your right to examine me," replied Annot; "but I will never say what may bring evil on others. As for myself, I will take all risks of a fair examination; for, perchance, if I confess my faults, knowing not what is laid to my charge, I might confess more than you could prove."

"Knowest thou not, then," asked Gardiner, "that it hath been declared unlawful for any man to expound the Scripture until he hath gotten a license from a bishop now being?"

Annot was about to object to this question, when one of the doctors arose and said—

"My lord, I humbly submit that it is not necessary the prisoner should answer the question: such notoriously is the law, and therefore it is at her own peril if she be ignorant of it."

"Yea, good doctor, such is the custom of the courts," said Gardiner, "but we will go more mildly to work with this prisoner. It seemeth to me, girl, that you show more natural cunning than learning in your answers; but, prithee, remember what the power is of them that question thee. Say, then, hast thou listened to the preaching of any man not duly licensed by his bishop?"

"My lord," replied Annot, "I humbly submit that I am not bound to answer you, but that if I be accused you are to prove the accusation."

"Remember, girl, if we prove it in your despite, you have no claim on our mercy."

"I will take the chance of that," said Annot—"I cannot be worse in an examination than after a confession."

"Say, at least, have you attended mass on Sundays and holidays, according to law?"

To this question Annot made a similar reply, calling on them, as her simple reason dictated, to prove the charge. Then Dr. Bonner arose from his chair in great wrath, and cried—

"When will there be an end of this shilly shally? Thinkest thou, wench, we are to wait here till Christmas for thine answer? By the Lord, thou despisest the holy Church, and shalt have thy reward. But I will go to work roundly with thee, and put questions that thou shalt answer—articles that contain the whole matter. Now, then, say, ought vows of chastity by men or women to be observed by the laws of God?"

"Yea, my lord," she replied, "every vow ought to be observed that harmeth not our neighbours."

"Very well answered," said Tonstall; "be not in haste, good girl; answer directly to the point, and you shall do well."

"My lords," cried one of the doctors, rising, I humbly crave permission to say, the answer containeth a doubt. The girl doth not say but a vow of chastity may be hurtful, for she saith only that good vows should be observed."

"But this vow is a good one," cried Bonner, "and therefore is comprised in her answer."

"With submission, my lord, the girl's answer proveth not that she esteemeth the vow a good one. I appeal to the lawyers."

The learned gentlemen arose to dispute on this point, but Gardiner stopped them by taking the part of the doctor, saying—

"The girl hath a mind to deceive us. How say you, then, girl, is it allowed to God's Word that men and women should make vows of chastity?"

"I have never said the contrary," replied Annot, "and if the Word of God alloweth it, I believe it."

"But the Word doth allow it," said Tonstall.

"Yea," cried one of the doctors, "but the girl doth not say so."

"If you have no other reply to make," said Gardiner, "it must be set down that you refuse to answer."

Annot spoke not, and Bonner continued—

"May priests marry by God's law?"

"To this question Annot gave a similar reply, and Bonner went to the most important of the six articles, whether in the eucharist the real body of Christ was present, and to this Annot replied—

"My lords and gentlemen, I crave your charity and pity while I speak to you. I cannot tell whether all these things be found in God's Word or no; but if they be, your church believeth them, and is safe, and what matters it whether I believe or no?"

"Yea, but there is no more than one Church," said Tonstall, "and when you say, 'your church,' you signify that there is more than one, which is heresy. There is but one Church, and its ministers have power and command over all the earth; and it is our lawful duty to guard all people that are faithful, to examine all that are suspected, to punish all that disbelieve."

"Pray, my lord, bear with me," Annot replied; "I am very unlearned, and know not the art of putting words together clerkwise; yet will I utter to you all my heart, if you will grant me your patience. I cannot tell whether the person of my Saviour be in the sacrament, nor whether priests may marry, nor whether it is good to make vows of chastity."

"Yea, wench," cried Bonner, "thou knowest whether that be good or no, I warrant me, or I had not found thee at night with a man."

"I thank God, I have more chastity than you have charity!" cried Annot, with a loud voice. "My lords, if you will, you may burn me in a fire this day; it will be less grievous than to be accused publicly of deeds which no maiden in England is more innocent of, or hateth more than I do."

At this reply, Dr. Bonner arose in very fierce wrath, and his doctors also arose, their eyes and mouths open with astonishment at the prisoner's insolence. But Tonstall and Gardiner whispered awhile with their brother, and he sat down in murmuring wrath. Annot was then directed to speak, which she did as follows—

"I know not whether these articles be found in Scripture, nor is it fit a maiden should speak of them, or think of them; for what know I of priests' marriages or men's vows? Perchance if I were blessed with sight, and could walk about free from harm and talk with many people, and learn to read, I should find such things in the Bible. But I am like an infant in knowledge; I know nothing of these great doctrines which are the study of learned men. I know only what hath been read to me in the Bible, that God loveth them that are merciful, and patient and dutiful, and long-suffering, and that he will provide for the orphan that trusteth in him. And I am truly an orphan, good sirs; for some of you did put my father, John Palmer, to death in the Queen's majesty's father's time, because he maintained the pope's supremacy, when some of ye did see fit to make King Harry supreme. My mother, too, is bed-rid—a feeble, helpless woman, for whom my hands have laboured early and late from my childhood until now; and there have been times when I would have given up and sat me down to die for very distress, but for the sweet words in God's book, how he looked to the orphan. Judge ye then, sirs, if I have had time or means to examine these learned doctrines, or whether I did not well to learn only that which taught me to be contented with poverty, and blindness, and labour, and made me rejoice to feel every day and every hour, that though blind and unlearned, my hands gat food for my mother when she was otherwise helpless."

To this passionate address neither of the bishops replied; Gardiner was really ashamed for the moment at the contrast presented to his mind by Annot of the different causes in support of which he had become a persecutor; Bonner was silent, half through wrath at the girl's boldness in reminding him of former times, and half through want of ready wit to extricate himself from the embarrassment in which she had placed him; Tonstall's heart was touched by the picture the poor girl had presented to him of her position and her duties, and covered his face with the sleeve of his gown. But the lawyers and doctors had been too much accustomed to discussion to be moved to wrath—too much accustomed to depend on controversy to be put to shame—too much accustomed to the pleadings of criminals and convicted persons, and all the outward expressions of human agony, to feel compassion or tenderness: the business of their lives, the duties of their callings, had begotten an indifference to everything besides argument and law, which perhaps is a more certain cause of cruelty than any active form of misanthropy.

The scene in which the blind girl is subjected to the torture, in presence of Sir Thomas Granville and her afflicted friend Lady Anne, is more powerful, but less edifying, in these Puseyite times. Lady Anne, who is herself a strict Catholic, will not believe that the sweet and gentle maiden entertains heretical opinions; but, at all events, is resolved to save her, notwithstanding the suspicions of her orthodoxy; nor was it every member of "the true church" that Anne would esteem or love, while the blind heretic girl was her most cherished friend. The brutal character of Bonner is broadly displayed as the torture scene closes, and is at other times somewhat exaggerated. Anne had fainted on witnessing the tortures which her gentle friend bore with astonishing constancy, and Barker had been subjected to the gyves in place of Annot, when the brutal priest cries out—

"Ho, Sir Knight, get thee and thy wench away, wilt! for I am going to supper. But look first at this man in the gyves, how he twisteth and turneth in seeking the pleasant place he will not find. Be sure, Knight, thou goest to St. Mary Overie's Church to-morrow morning; for I will have gyves made to fit this stubborn blind girl by then; and by the Lord, she shall have them on, with a whipping on her naked skin. Yea, and by the Lord that made me, I will send her to the Tower, and this Barker too; and I will have them on the rack in each other's sight, until they confess all they're charged withal. So, Sir Knight, be sure you come, and bring your wench there, and I will give orders that you be admitted."

In another style the inquisitorial visit made by Bonner to Master Barker's church at Islington, affords an apt specimen:—

The knight, the bishop, and the chaplains, dismounted, and leaving their horses to their servants, went into the porch, when the bishop burst forth in a very torrent of curses.

This porch was one of the beautiful pointed arches of the fourteenth century, whose simplicity of outline, and elaborate tracery, threw into the shade the finest porticoes of Greece, in the opinion of every mind not prejudiced in favour of classical forms. The spirit of a religion, modified in expression, in its progress through Saxon and Norman customs, seemed to have filled the heart and soul of the architect; and his workmanship was such as to create religious emotions in all who looked on it. But Dr. Bonner looked to be an architect of religion rather than of churches. He saw no beauty in the building; but he saw a monstrous deformity in what it covered. On the left hand, within the porch, was a kind of reading-desk, about four feet from the ground, on which was a well-thumbed folio volume, fastened to it by a strong iron attached to the oak covers. This book he knew at a glance to be heretical—in short, no other than the Book of Homilies fixed in all the churches in Edward's reign.

Justice cannot be done here to Dr. Bonner's eloquence, which consisted of a vast variety of oaths, not pleasant either to hear or read. When a divine does swear, his oaths are richer than all others, deriving great variety from his religious learning. But bishops and priests are privileged in the matter of swearing, because the very language which would be horrible in the mouth of a layman, may be legitimate objurgation or remonstrance in the mouth of a churchman. But Dr. Bonner did not confine himself to the phraseology of his profession, which would have afforded grounds for a Jesuit to prove that his language had the essence of the Fathers: he swore large "hunters' oaths," he talked "like a fishwife," or a catchpole caught in a trap by apprentices. But this must be understood—not related.

"Behold!" said his lordship, "said I not that this was a nest of heresy—damnable treason! Lo! here is a book which hath been for a whole year forbidden by the Queen's council. Homilies, indeed!—stinking and rotten treason! Doth it not deny the Pope's supremacy here in England! Doth it not make that peevish abortion, Edward, head of the church! Doth it not abolish mass, and five sacraments, and priestly celibacy? To hell with the book! Here, knaves, knaves! bring me a hammer, or send for a smith, and wrench me this door open!"

"I crave your pardon, my lord!" cried Sir Thomas Granville; "perhaps the priest liveth close by, in which case it would be well to abstain from violence."

"Violence!—violence!" cried the bishop; "doth not this parish of Islington do violence to our commands! But, Giles!" said the bishop, running into the churchyard, "ride into the village, and inquire for the priest, and bid him come to me; and if thou canst not find him, seek a churchwarden, and when thou hast found him, bring him hither, even if thou tiest him to thy horse; and if he be not there, bring me a smith with a hammer and a bar of iron."

While Giles was gone on this voyage of discovery, the bishop walked muttering about the churchyard, peeping in at the church windows, and examining the tombstones, as though he would have loved to take up the dead to examine into their orthodoxy. What he found in the tomb-stones can never be known, but his glances at the interior of the church were by no means satisfactory, if one might judge by the testy manner in which he walked about, the heat of body which made him loosen the points of his doublet, and the earnestness with which he looked for the return of Giles. At length the serving-man returned, accompanied by an old man with a long beard, who looked like a small farmer, and who was one of the churchwardens.

"Oh!" quoth the bishop, "Sir Priest feareth to meet me. He hath not yet returned from Smithfield; but I will give him enough of Smithfield before I have made an end with him. Now, old man, tell me, dost thou know yonder book!"—"Yea, master, I do know the book," replied the old man; "and a very good book it be."—"What! knave, a good book! Dost thou read in it!"—"Nay, master, sure I never read it, nor any other book."—"What! not thy psalter!"—"No, master."—"And why!"—"Please you, master, I cannot read."—"Not read, thou fool! why sayest thou, then, that it is a good book!"—"I only know what the people and the minister tell me."—"Minister! thou heretic! Dost thou mean thy priest!"—"Nay, master, we have no priests here since good King Edward came to be king."—"Good King Edward! Villain! dost thou know whom thou speakest to!"—"No, master."—"I am thy bishop. Now thou knowest me, and shalt know me better yet."—"An't please your worship, I don't believe you be our bishop, for the bishop that I have seen here were a mild-spoken man, and not fat, and not given to swearing; and his name were Ridley."—"God's curse upon thee, thou fool! I tell thee I am thy bishop, as thou shalt find if thou givest me another saucy word. Hast thou the key of the church! . . . . . I tell thee, man, Ridley was no bishop; but such as he is, he is now in prison, and shall die the death, as thou shalt. Scoundrel! didst thou not receive our mandate to remove from the porch all pestilent books like that, and give us a notice what persons in the parish read or heard them!"—"Nay, master, I know nothing about it. They make me warden, and I see the bells rung, and the wine got, and the noisy boys whipped ———" —"Open the door," interrupted the bishop; "and let us see what order is within—a rare filthy nest I warrant."

When the door was opened, the bishop started back, aghast at the sight; then calling on the knight and the chaplains to follow him, rushed into the church. There was little of a very frightful nature visible: it was a small church, of which the floor was covered with rude seats of ancient wood; the walls of clear white were inscribed with a dozen sentences of holy writ, and the communion table was covered with a plain cloth. But of all the horrors imaginable to man, this was the worst, in the opinion of Dr. Bonner.

"Look there, sirs! look there, Doctor! look there, Sir Thomas Granville! Saw ye ever before such a den of filth as this? By my father's soul, I never saw the like; and I pray God these cursed walls do not tumble on our heads. Follow me, follow me!"

The bishop strode up to the chancel, where was a reading-desk similar to the one at the door: he rushed up to it, and having glanced into the book, wrenched off the iron chain, and threw the folio away with all his might.

"Bibles! Bibles!" cried he; "nothing but Bibles. By God, this parish ought to be burned to the ground with every soul; for if there had been a single Christian in it, such a vile hole as this could not have been so near London, and I not know it. Would you believe, sirs, that yonder book is the Bible—Coverdale's Bible, which was ordered to be destroyed a year past? By God, sirs, the worst book ever brought into the realm! for it hath made more heretics than all other. Now, John Smith—hey, you villain, what art thou?"

The cause of this last exclamation was, that as the bishop turned towards the churchwarden, he observed a person take up the Bible, and place it very carefully on the desk—this person, as he turned about, the bishop discovered to be Master Barker, the minister.

"God-a-mercy, fellow!" quoth the bishop, "thou art bold to take up a book that I have cast down."—"It is the Holy Bible, my lord."—"The holy devil, knave! Art thou the parson of this church?"—"Yea, my lord." —"Then didst thou not receive our mandate, ordering thee to erect a well-favoured rood of goodly stature, and the other necessary ornaments of the altar, while thou hast nothing but a table?"

"Please you, my lord," interposed the churchwarden, "the old rood was pulled down in Edward's time, and now we be so poor we cannot———"—"Get thee out, fool!" cried the bishop, "I will have thee to give answer at my consistory in Paul's; and thence thou wilt go to Newgate. But, Barker, what meaneth these writings on the wall, taken out of yonder forbidden book?"

We cannot follow the scene until Barker had uttered something about conscience, which grated on the ears of the renegade bishop, and he rushed upon him, crying,—

"Turks! thou—thou ribald knave!" and raising his hand, struck at him. Sir Thomas Granville, probably fearing the bishop might commit himself, stepped forward to beg for peace, when his lordship's holy and heavy fist came full on his ear, and sent him spinning against the benches two or three yards off.

"What meanest thou by that, priest?" cried Sir Thomas Granville, highly indignant at this blow; but the bishop made no reply, being struggling with his chaplains to get at Master Barker.

"I ask thee, Dr. Bonner, what thou meanest by striking me?" he cried again. "Let me tell thee that no man, whether priest or soldier, shall strike me with impunity."

"And what meanest thou by thou-ing me, thy bishop? I tell you, Sir Thomas Granville, that I grievously suspect you; and as soon as my suspicions are verified, neither thy knighthood nor thy soldiership shall save thee. Nobler names than thine have been dealt with for heresy, and shall again."

"False priest, I defy thee!" cried the knight. "None of my family have ever been tainted with heresy, and none have borne the chastisement of a priest. I have fought the battles of three monarchs, and my forefathers have been foremost wherever England required brave men, whilst thy ancestors have borne trenchers and scoured pewter in kitchens!—and thou, to strike and revile me! I will appeal to her majesty against thee, and if I do not tie thy hands and thy tongue, never trust me!"

"I spit upon thee, thou heretic!" cried the bishop, out of his senses with passion.

"Englishmen!" cried the knight to the parishioners, who had flocked in considerable numbers to the church —"Englishmen! you hear how this shaven priest reviletth brave men. Take away Master Barker with you, and keep him out of the man's hands. I give you notice I will put up a rood at my own charges, and I will at once appeal to her majesty, who will stop this wild beast."

"These were the times, Mrs. Rigmarole!" Is there any chance, any symptom of their return to Merry England? It is, at least, consolatory to reflect, that they could not long be suffered. Where the Schoolmaster is abroad, the bigot must quickly draw in his horns.

SPECIMENS OF MODERN ROMANCE.

NO. V.—THE LEGAL-TECHNICAL.

THE RUINED WRITER.—A TALE OF PERSONAL DILIGENCE.

[Legal Fictions have long been known as the most perfect of all fictions in this romancing world. Fictions they are, that, like tragedies, move terror and pity in those who come under their operations—shooting, from the skyey heights of imagination, blight and devastation upon the pockets of unhappy litigants. They are the poetry of law—the oases in its wilderness of dusty parchment. But the legal fiction proper is not what we now propose to illustrate. Our dealings are with an entirely new species, which has started up among the reading public quite recently, in which lawyers of all grades are the principal actors, legal phraseology is the prevailing language, and technical subtleties constitute the machinery—Themis, in fact, being the only divinity who "guides the whirlwind and directs the storm." The world is sick of brutal fathers and remorseless mothers—benevolent old bachelors are at a discount—the pangs of despised love can no longer excite a sympathetic sigh—stilettoes have gone out of fashion, and broken hearts are a drug in the market. Nothing short of a writ of ejectment, or of fieri facias can touch our jaded sensibilities. A mysterious murder shall scarcely rouse a sensation, but the thrill of a capias ad satisfaciendum goes to every heart. A hero's death used to be a powerful incident, but a flaw in a Deed of Demise is now the vehicle of the most touching pathos. Omne ignotum pro magnifico, and the jargon of the attorney's office and the Chancery bar is read with an enthusiasm proportioned to the ignorance of the student. "Poor Scott," as Bulwer calls him, did well with Peter Peebles; but he seems to have had no idea of the effects to be produced by filling a novel with a set of characters all talking legal slang and forms of process,

The following is the mere outline of a romance constructed upon this principle, which might easily be filled up with the usual "scenery, machinery, dresses, and decorations," had we the heart so far to abuse our readers' patience. The incidents are simple. A country lawyer naturally enough bungles a mortgage, and is made liable for the debt; and, naturally enough, being unable to pay it, is arrested by his creditor, which is also sufficiently natural. A technical objection arises upon a defect in the proceedings of the messenger, or bailiff, which becomes the theme of a protracted litigation, the result of which—not the least natural of all the incidents—is the total ruin of the whole parties involved in it. An interesting wife and beautiful sister are thrown in, to keep down the vivacity of the legal details, and to satisfy the boarding-schools. Of course the reader is not expected to understand the cabalistic signs of horrible realities, called "charges of horning:"—this, by the way, has nothing to do with an infringement of matrimonial rights—"notes of suspension, multiple-poinding, interlocutors, novodamus," &c. &c. To explain this would be to overload our margin with annotations—an intolerable nuisance—and also to destroy the chief beauty of the tale, which, upon approved standards, lies in its being totally unintelligible to unprofessional readers.]

"WHAT a beautiful season it is, to be sure," exclaimed Mrs. Charles Screever, as, laying down the pelerine which she was hemming, she gazed fixedly through the window upon the gay and golden landscape before her.

"A beautiful seisin, indeed!" replied her husband; "but, alas, my love, like many other beautiful things, it bears a canker in its heart—a fatal flaw—an undeniable erasure in substantialibus!" and with a hollow sigh he threw down a massive document of parchment, folded bookways, which for the last half hour he had been silently contemplating with the fixed gaze of despair.

"Charles, dear Charles, you are ill, very ill!" cried the young and affectionate wife, startled at the unusual tone of the foregoing exclamation.—"That horrid parchment—speak!"

"Sciatis omnes per hoc presens publicum instrumentum," muttered her husband abstractedly, regardless of the anxiety expressed in her beautiful countenance.

"Oh, Charles, Charles, speak to me!" she continued, throwing her arms around his neck.

"Et ego vero notarius publicus et clericus Edinburgensis diocesios—but I dream. It is but too plain—upon the principle in Innes's case, 5 Shaw and Dunlop, page 559, the instrument is worthless, and I am a ruined man."

"Nay, do not say so. Things are perhaps not so bad, and these gloomy forebodings may not be confirmed."

"Would to Heaven the disposition and infeftment were!" replied Screever faintly. "If the superior could be got to grant a Charter of Resignation?"

"Yes, Charles, resignation is our duty under the frown of the superior powers."

"By staff and baton, as use is—"

"But tell me the extent of our loss. May not diligence repair it?"

"Diligence!" exclaimed the young writer, with a hollow laugh. "Diligence repair it! Ha, ha, ha! Oh, Ellen, you know not what diligence yet may do—what diligence has been already done. I tell you, girl, not slothfulness itself—that eating, creeping, crawling, debilitated vice—can prey half so closely on the vitals of a man, as that fearful engine of the law, that so-called Diligence. See here!" and he drew from beneath a bottle containing a viper preserved in spirits—the one cheerful ornament of his writing-table—a folded sheet of written paper marked on the back with certain mysterious hieroglyphics. This little instrument, mark me, has more power upon your husband's fortunes, than the eyes of that pickled serpent ever had over the fascinated and palpitating sparrow. You are surprised, Ellen! Dear girl, this is diligence."

"Diligence—impossible! It is marked letters—"

"Of horning and poinding, is it not? Yes, it is a letter, but one of no ordinary kind. It is a royal mandate—a message from the sovereign; and mark to whom it is addressed—'To messengers-at-arms, our sheriffs in that part, conjunctly and severally specially constituted, Greeting!' Exquisite condescension! Royalty sends greetings to its messengers individually and collectively. Beautiful, most beautiful the link of law that binds the Crown with the concurrent!" and the young writer smiled with the bitterness of a Heraclitus.

"But, Charles," replied his wife, "you are not a messenger. How does this affect you?"

"Affect! Attach you mean. Mark the purport of this gracious message—'Attour, that ye lawfully fence, arrest, appraise, compel, poind and distrenzie all and sundry the said Charles Screever his readiest moveable goods, gear, debts and sums of money, and other moveable goods of every denomination or wheresoever situated—'"

"I never knew you had such a great variety of personal property, Charles," here broke in his wife.

"'Make penny thereof,'" continued Screever, doggedly, "'to the avail and quantity of the foresaid sum of £1500 sterling, interest thereof, and liquidate penalty—'"

"Ah!" screamed his wife, and fell senseless on the hearthrug.

"And why?" said Screever, folding his arms with a resolute air, after having in vain emptied a jug of water upon his wife's inanimate countenance—"why should I seek to recall her to the miseries of this hang-dog existence? Why seek to obtain a Novodamus of breath in her favour—why apply for a renewal of the expired Tack of life? Were it not a quasi-delict to effect an excambion between her registered infeftment within the liberty and regality of heaven, and the poor hope of a widow's terce in the parts, pendicles, and pertinents of that poffle of land my father left me in this miserable burgh of Kinross? Yes, Ellen, thou hast taken refuge in a sanctuary where no messengers may force an entry, nor use her Majesty's keys thereto! Yes, Ellen, we shall meet again beyond the jurisdiction of all earthly courts, and when my wearied spirit shall have obtained a loosing of all arrestments. Like other sinful men, I may have incurred an irritancy of my tenure upon a better world, ob non solutum canonem; but the reddendo of a broken and contrite heart—for mine, alas! is both—and payment of my arrear of duties may, perchance, still entitle me to entry there as a singular successor at least!"

That night Charles Screever was dragged to prison.

CHAPTER II.

About a month had elapsed since the occurrence of the events noticed in the last chapter. Charles Screever, the young writer of Kinross, still lingered in confinement. His wife had not yet recovered from hers. The agitation produced by the sudden shock did not remove her from this terrestrial scene, but merely introduced another actor to it. Ellen Screever was now a mother.

In a romantic plantation of Scotch firs by the side of Lochleven, where the unfortunate Mary pined so long in an imprisonment, uncheered save by the guitar of the dissolute Knox, and the chansons of the gay and accomplished Dryfesdale, sat a young and engaging female, dressed in a chintz gown of the brightest and most diversified colours. Her attitude was one of attention, and she appeared to be listening for the approach of some expected friend.

At last a hoarse and manly voice was heard by the margin of the lake, carolling a ballad to the beautiful old air of "Sir Patrick Spens," the words of which became more distinct as the singer approached. They were nearly as follows:—

The Queen she sat in Holyruid,
A-drinking the bluid-reid wine,
"O whaur sall I find a messenger
Will carry this writ of mine?"

Then up and spake the Lord Lyoun,
Was sittin' beneath her knee—
"It's Jock M'Nab's the wiliest messenger
That ever I did see."

The Queen she's written a braid letter,
And sealed it wi' her seal,
And she's sent it awa to bauld Jock M'Nab,
Was tipplin' at the yill.

When Jock he read the Queen's letter,
A loud lauch lauchèd he!
"Gosh! things hae come to a bonnie pass,
When the Queen sends greetin' to me!

"But wha the deil has dune this deed,
An' tauld the Queen o' me—
That I suld gang at this time o' the nicht
To poind and distrenzie!"

"Weel, Claury, ma wumman, hoo's a' wi' ye?" said the proprietor of the voice, who now presented himself in a faded green coat, yellow waistcoat, and pepper-and-salt smalls; and, jumping over a bramble-bush, he folded the shrinking Clara in his arms.

"Oh, Jock, this is kind!" she replied, dropping her head upon his shoulder.

"Kind! Feint a hair o' kindness is there in't. Deevil a job's gauin' i' the town the day, forbye twa bits of charges on sheriff's decreets, and a summons o' removin', and I got them put by han' an hour ago. So we've lots o' time before us for a' our cracks, my doo!"

"John, John, do not speak of love. The state of my distracted sister—her poor husband's misfortunes—all these must, I fear, form an eternal barrier between you and Clara Constat."

"Maybe ay, and maybe yes!" responded M'Nab, chewing, with considerable agitation, the glutinous butt-end of a rush—"Eternal barrier! Stuff and nonsense! Deil a bit o' me's proud. It's true I'm a messenger in active practice, and Charlie Screever's habits hae been those of a dyvour for some time back—mair by token he is at this present underlyin' the squalor carceris, puir chiel, but I cannot see what for that suld loose the bands o' luve atween us. Here's my hand, Claury, for a' that's come and gane, I'm ready to gang wi' ye afore the minister the morn."

"Hear me, John M'Nab!" cried the maiden, starting suddenly from the turf—the rather, perhaps, that an ant's nest, on which she had inadvertently seated herself, began to vomit forth its inmates—"Rather would I be stung to death—rather crushed like these frail insects whom I thus trample into annihilation,"—and here she danced a mazurka upon the ant-hill—"than ally myself with an honourable man, while the cloud of misfortune lours so heavily upon our devoted house."

"The lassie's in a creel! What'n hoos?" inquired her lover.

"Mine—his—ours—all of them!" cried the agitated maiden, sweeping off from the skirts of her garment a whole holocaust of emmets.

"The sorra's in the beasties!" exclaimed the messenger parenthetically. "There's a sicht o' them cruppen up my legs. But tell me, Claury, my dawtie, gin your gude-brither were a free man and clear o' the Tolbooth, wad ye haud by your bargain, and become the bride o' John M'Nab?"

"Would I not?" replied the maiden, softly, and at the same time crushed an aggressive straggler to death between her forefinger and thumb.—"When that day shall come, ask me. That's all I say."

"Then, as I'm a leevin' man, ye's be Mrs. John M'Nab yet," shouted the enraptured executor of the law. "Charlie Screever shall be discharged in a week, or I wuss I may never tak another invetar."

"'Tis impossible!"

"Impossible!—deil a bit o't's impossible. Oh, wumman, the law's a graun thing, and I ken whaur there's a screw loose. Auld Knuckles executed the horning against your gude-brither without witnesses; and it 'll puzzle him, I'm thinking, to show cause for that afore the Coort o' Session. He's a puir, ignorant brute, at best, and carries mair brandy nor brains in his head at any time. He a messenger!—set him up! We 'll hae a Suspension and Liberation, lass, and an action of damages for wrongous imprisonment, forbye. Five hunder punds at the very least, as a solautium for the injury in credit, stamack, character, an' feelin's."

Clara Constat heard no more. Her cup of happiness was full, and she dropped insensible into the arms of the astute votary of Themis.

CHAPTER III.

[We pass over a detailed and highly interesting description of the procedure resorted to by Mr. M'Nab, on behalf of his brother-in-law presumptive, for his release from "durance vile." A note of Suspension and Liberation in terms of the Act of Parliament thereanent, and the relative act of Sederunt was presented in the Bill Chamber, and appointed by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to be intimated to the incarcerating creditor. This was done; and answers for that gentleman were lodged, showing why the Diligence at his instance ought not to be suspended, nor Mr. Screever set at large; which were followed by the usual and amusing procedure laid down by the forms of process. A multiple-poinding was also brought by a debtor of Screever's, in whose hands arrestments had been used—in which Condescendences and Claims were lodged for about fifty claimants, each claiming to have a snatch primo loco at the bone of contention or fund in medio, as it is called in legal phrase, an interesting deposit which generally turns out to be sufficient to meet the expenses of process and no more. But that space forbids, we might, after the manner of our esteemed friend the author of "Ten Thousand a-Year," present the reader with a very diverting series of extracts from legal style-books and the pleadings of the parties, interspersed with sketches of the various W.S.'s and Solicitors who headed the warfare—their clerks, who copied the papers, and geographical surveys of the varions dens of Trophonius in which these ornaments of the legal profession plied their mystic tasks. But we prefer going on with the main current of the story.]

. . . . . .

It was early morning: the month December; time, ten years ago. The large Hall of the Parliament House, or, as it is called, the Outer-House, creaked to the steps of some twenty of the most juvenile counsel, and about an equal number of the most forlorn of the worshipful fraternity of writer's clerks, whose unshaven chins and dusty vestments told, in the broadest characters, that they entertained the contempt natural to great minds of the minor niceties of the toilette. But, deserted as was the general aspect of the Hall, at one part of it, a dense crowd was assembled. This favoured spot was the bar of the Lord Ordinary, before whom Mr. Screever's case had come to depend, my Lord Switherhaugh, to wit, who, with pen in hand, was bewildering himself in a chaos of notes. Mr. Fiat of the Bill-Chamber was studying The Caledonian Mercury in front of the bar, at which two counsel were engaged in animated debate.

"Looking, therefore, my lud," said Mr. Eckspenses, a counsel of considerable standing, at the close of an able speech, "to the whole circumstances of this case, and more particularly to the terms of the Act 1686, chap. 4, the words of which I have already quoted to your ludship, and need not again repeat,—looking, moreover, to the uniform practice of the large and intellectual body of messengers-at-arms, from the earliest period of our law,—looking also to the implication directly involved in the more recent but not less important Statute, with which your ludship is familiar—"

His lordship nodded an admission of the allegation.

"Looking, I say, my lud, to both the undeniable usage of the profession and the express letter of the statute, I feel assured that your ludship will have no hesitation in passing the note." Mr. Eckpenses sate down, and Mr. William Wadset, a young but acute member of faculty, rose to address his lordship for the defence.

"I hope, my lud," he said, at the close of a luminous argument in which he proved to the satisfaction of—a writer to the signet's apprentice of three weeks' standing, that statutes were to be construed, not according to the letter, but according to what he termed "a large and liberal construction of the intention of the legislature in enacting them, and the convenience of the subject in carrying them into execution"—"I hope, my lud, that I have satisfied your ludship, that this is one of the most groundless and frivolous of the many groundless and frivolous applications that daily come under your ludship's notice—"

His lordship looked indignant, as if he conceived that everything ceased to be groundless or frivolous the moment he was called to adjudicate upon it. Mr. Wadset was a young hand, anxious to say smart things, and had lost a point instead of making one.

"That it is an unworthy attempt, upon the part of my learned brother's client, by a paltry quibble, to evade the operation of the valuable maxim, qui non solvit in ære, solvat in corpore; and therefore your ludship will at once refuse the desire of the suspender, and find my client entitled to full expenses."

Mr. Wadset sat down and all eyes were directed to his lordship to hear the words of wisdom that were about to fall from his lips.

"As this is a summary case," said Lord Switherhaugh, after losing himself in his notes for some five minutes, "and of maist undooted importance to the parties, and the profession at large, and as it is of great importance that uniformity of practice should prevail in all matters affecting the liberty of the subject, and as I do not find any case upon the books directly in point, and as I think that a great deal may unquestionably be said on both sides, and as, in particular, I by no means see my way out of the mess; therefore, and for other reasons on which I need not mair specially condescend, I shall appoint the parties to lodge Minutes of Debate on the haill cause to be seen and interchanged, and boxed to the court by the first sederunt day after the recess; that the parties may have the satisfaction of having this nice question of law settled by the opinions of the whole court."

"At their private expense!" murmured Eckspenses darting from the bar in disgust; while Wadset deliberately gathered up his papers, delighted at having, by his ingenuity, secured further delay, and—the prospect of a heavy fee for writing the minute of debate.

CHAPTER IV.

[A minute and very able analysis of the personal and intellectual qualifications of the whole Judges of the Court of Session with the speeches of senior and junior counsel on both sides is here omitted.]

The thirteen judges were divided. Six were for passing the Note—six for refusing it, and one, Lord Switherhaugh, declared himself utterly unable to make up his mind. After a great deal of discussion and smart altercation, their lordships got out of their dilemma by remitting the cause to the Lord Ordinary, with instructions to his Lordship "to proceed orderly in the cause, as to his Lordship should seem fit."

Accordingly the case once more made its appearance about a month after in the rolls of the Outer House, and was debated for six days. The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following Interlocutor.

"Act. Ekspenses. Alt. Wadset.

"The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties, makes avizandum to himself upon the debate and closed record.

"Note.—As this is a summary case, and of the greatest importance to the parties, the Lord Ordinary intends to peruse the whole process leisurely and repeatedly, and to be well and ripely advised upon the whole points of the case before pronouncing judgment."

CHAPTER V.

Eighteen months afterwards the cause emerged from avizandum, with a judgment passing the Note of Suspension and Liberation, for reasons explained by the Lord Ordinary in a note of forty pages of manuscript, in which the whole law of arrest was luminously gone over. Screever was accordingly liberated. But by this time he was far gone in consumption. His wife and child were dead. Mr. John M'Nab had been persuaded, by a considerate executive, to try the effects of a foreign climate in improving his health and morals; and we regret to add, that on the previous Sunday, Clara Constat, habited in a white sheet, was subjected to some poignant personal remarks, in open church, before a delighted congregation, by the parish minister of Kinross. Ekspenses had been raised to the bench in room of Lord Switherhaugh, who died the evening after he had made avizandum to himself, (he had much better have made it to somebody else,) with a conjoined process of Ranking and Sale, Divorce, Declarator of legitimacy, Tinsel of superiority, and Division of Runrig lands,—a legal olla podrida of the most unctuous description, consisting of 3894 numbers. Wadset bade fair to fall into a sheriffship by dint of unlimited waggery among his brethren of the learned faculty, squibbing at elections, and smashing or supporting fictitious votes at the Registration Courts, as the exigencies of his clique required.

CHAPTER VI.

The agent of the incarcerating creditor actively engaged in prosecuting his client for his account; who, simultaneously with the approval by the Court of the auditor's report upon the charges, applied to their Lordships for the benefit of the cessio.—Screever dead, and the fund in medio in the multiple-poinding going among the agents for the various claimants.

VISITS TO GRAVES.—No. II. THE CHILD'S GRAVE.

"Whom the gods love, die young."

She was one of Nature's Nobles,
With her forehead broad and high;
And the fervent love that sparkled
In her clear and steadfast eye.
She was full of happy fancies
Glancing round her like the light,
And the sunshine of her spirit
Made the Earth and Heavens bright;—

Brighter than to common mortals
They with all their splendour seem;
For her happy soul shed o'er them
Beauty, like a poet's dream.
And she was the noble heiress
Of broad lands that round her spread,
And the hopes of a long lineage
Centred all on that young head.

And she dwelt afar from cities
In her grandsire's princely halls,
'Midst the shade of rocky mountains
And the sound of waterfalls;
And her infant footsteps wander'd
By the brook and through the dell,
And she lived so much with Nature
That she learned to love her well!

For she had no other playmates
Than the birds and bees and flowers,
And she sported gaily midst them
Through the long and summer hours.
Thus she dwelt secluded, lonely,
With one guest in that wide home;
And her tutor, friend, companion,
Was a holy priest of Rome!

For her race held his religion,
In its cause had fought and died,
When the tide of Reformation
Swept the land from side to side.
Lovingly they dwelt together,
He in her forgot his age;
And he feared sometimes her fondness
Smoothed too much life's pilgrimage.

And she gained all learning from him,
Mixed with teachings pure and high
Of the mighty end of living,
And our glorious destiny.
And his eyes would often soften
When they fixed on that young face,
Fearing lest that gentle child might
Share the fate of all her race.

For an early death hath marked them
One by one they passed away,
And the chapel walls were covered
With their names in long array.
But no darksome fear possessed her,
Loving all things under Heaven,
Blithe she rose at morning's breaking,
Blithe she sunk to rest at even.

Glorious summer, always scorching,
Had this year more fiercely burned;
And the cool and mossy verdure
Had to barren dryness turned;
And the fading drooping branches
Of the old ancestral trees
Idly hung in perfect stillness
All unstirred by summer breeze.

And the full and bounding river
Narrower grew from day to day,
And its sandy banks uncovered
Deeper still, and deeper lay.
And the cheeks of that fair maiden
Took a pale and sunken hue;
And her lids cast darker shadows
On her eyes of clearest blue.

"Come, my father, let us wander
To the dark and lonely woods;
If not gales, yet surely coolness
Will be in their solitudes."
As they passed the ancient staircase,
Wherefore did a shadow fall
On the heart of that good father,
Dark as funereal pall?

As they passed her mother's picture
Wherefore did the old priest's eye
Such a mournful look of warning
In that loving face descry?
Wherefore did the wide gate closing
Seem the passing knell of doom;
Wherefore did the old towers' shadows
Seem like darkness from the tomb?

Wherefore did his warning fancy
Shape the likeness of a shroud,
And the nodding plumes of hearses,
In that light and moveless cloud?—
But the fancies past by quickly
When he turned to that fair child,
And her guileless prattle cheered him
Till at length he almost smiled!

And he told her many a legend
Of her race in bygone days;
And he cited monarchs' praises,
And he quoted poets' lays.
And he bade her grow up gentle
To adorn her ancient faith,
To be true and good and humble,
Ready and prepared for death.

Now a sudden wind awakened
And drove fast black clouds along;
And it swept the withered herbage,
And it bent the tall tree strong;
And it struck those old woods hoary,
Which its mighty torrent rent,
With such crashing fitful fury
That it shook the firmament.

And the heavy rain-drops plashing
Fell upon the arid ground,
Withered by a three-months' parching
With a loud and hollow sound.

And the vivid flashing lightning,
Blazing through the earth and sky,
Scathed the trunks and rent the branches
That around in ruins lie.

Undismayed that fair young maiden
With her watchful guardian trod,
Undismayed amidst the tempest,
Trusting to the care of God.
They had reached the wide wood's border
Where a giant oak tree stood,
Towering o'er its noble compeers,
Monarch of the solitude!

They had reached its wide-spread shelter
When a broad and burning flash,
Scathed its hoary top, and smote it
To the earth with one dire crash;
And beneath in that fell ruin
Died that noble gentle child.—
Soon the heavy clouds disparted
And the sun looked out and smiled.

Never did his bright beams shine on Sadder sight than what lay there,—
A young girl in Death's still slumbers,
An old man in his despair.—
And that house's proud possessions
Into stranger hands then passed;
And the chapel's vaults keep watch o'er
Her, the loveliest and the last.

While now joyous children gambol
In the halls that once were hers,
Not a memory of her graces
Through their happy bosoms stirs;
Other feelings, other habits,
Differing faith have come instead;—
Save the priest and old domestics
None are mourners for the dead.

Yet a stranger sadly muses,
When he sees the long array
Of the names that ancient chapel
Bears of those who passed away.
Many dying in life's spring-time,
Some in blaze of deathless fame,
Till the mournful list is finished
By that youngest gentlest name.

Who can grieve that fair young bosom
Never felt the chill of years,
Who can mourn those eyes so fearless
Never knew the touch of tears!
Peace to her deep dreamless slumbers!
Happy must her waking be!
Blest the change and glad the summons
Which have set her spirit free.

AMOR PATRIÆ—BY AN EMIGRANT.

Land of our Fathers! when afar from thee
We think of all that we have left behind:
The cottage in the glen, the moss-grown tree,
It's dark boughs waving in the summer wind.

The wimpling stream that softly rolls along,
Meandering down the rugged mountain's side;
The briery bush; the blackbird's well-known song,
Pouring its raptures in a trilling tide.

The eagle, wheeling high in circle wide;
The red-deer, bounding in the glades below;
The salmon, leaping in the silvery tide;
The humming bee; the cattle's well-known low.

The time-worn tower, whose venerable form
In stilly grandeur breaks upon the view,—
Its grey head towering o'er the howling storm,—
Is it not fixed in Memory's Tablets too?

Borne on the wind, the well-known Sabbath bell
Chimes its soft music to our straining ear,
Entrancing all our senses like a spell:
Ah! sad illusion, never more to hear.

How vivid in our mind the eventful day
Which saw us sailing from our native land.
The lessening hills in distance rising grey,
We gazed thereon—a melancholy band.

But though far distant from our native shore,
Old Scotland ne'er shall hang her head in shame,
For we, though severed by Atlantic's roar,
Will aye uphold our country's well won fame.

Buckingham's America—The Eastern and Western States. 3 volumes, octavo, with illustrative plates. Fisher & Co.

These three large volumes complete Mr. Buckingham's work, which of itself forms no despicable Cyclopædia of the United States. At some future time we hope to present our readers with an analysis of the more original parts of these new volumes; but at present we must rest content with the cursory notice of one urgent fact. In traversing the fertile prairies of Missouri and Illinois, Mr. Buckingham remarks:—

If the legislators of England could but be prevailed upon to remove all restrictions on the importation of food for the half-nourished population of the labouring classes of England, these prairies of the West might be made to yield, in a year or two, food for millions; and as the growers of grain and feeders of cattle which might here be raised, would be as much in want of British manufactures of almost every kind, as our hungry artisans are of the necessary supply of food, the interchange of their respective productions could not fail to be mutually beneficial. . . . . If the trade in corn had been free for the last ten years, the difficulties that now embarrass the United States would not probably have occurred; because in that case her exports of grain and flour to Europe might have fully counterbalanced her importation of manufactured goods; and even now, if the remittal of duties on foreign grain were to be extended by England to America only, she could in a very few years pay the whole of her vast private debt to Britain in this commodity, as well as the interest of the money of the state debts and public works, for which British capital has been advanced, by persons investing it in railroads, canals, and state stocks in that country. But this is certain, that if the restrictive policy be maintained much longer by England, with respect to so important an article as the chief food of man, it will abundantly justify any retaliatory measures which the Americans may take in excluding British manufactures from their markets; and the double operation of these two opposing pressures,—on the one side dear food and heavy taxes, for those who are called on to compete with workmen having cheap food and light taxes, and, on the other side, a constantly narrowing market for consumption, while our rivals have constantly expanding ones, cannot fail in the end so to crush British operatives as literally to grind them to dust, and to leave them no refuge but in emigration.

Mr. Buckingham, in a note, informs his British readers that this was written on the banks of the Ohio, in April 1840. Since then the late severe American tariff has passed, and the general distress arisen, from which there is but one hope of escape.

On the Preservation of the Health of Body and Mind. By Forbes Winslow, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, London.

This is the work of an intelligent man, well acquainted with the general principles of his profession, though it displays as much industry as originality. We must except the subject of insanity, which Mr. Winslow seems to have studied deeply.

The Shipwreck of the Dryad; in a series of Letters to a Sister.

The Dryad was wrecked some days after leaving the Mauritius, in the spring of 1841. The crew and passengers, among whom were several ladies, took to the boats, and after enduring great hardship, were so fortunate as to reach Port Dauphin, in Madagascar. The narrative, which is written in a simple and natural manner, is, like that of every shipwreck, interesting.

Annals of the Persecution in Scotland, from the Reformation to the Revolution. By James Aikman, author of the "History of Scotland." Octavo, pp. 556, with illustrations.

Mr. Aikman's previous studies and warm sympathies with the persecuted Presbyterians, peculiarly qualify him for compiling the annals of what to the people of Scotland is, next to the Reformation struggle, the most deeply interesting period of their national history. The work, which is written in a plain and popular style, embodies all the memorable domestic incidents, family traditions, and traits of heroism which illustrate that remarkable period. It is thus as well adapted to the window-bink of the small Scottish farmer, as to the library shelves of every sturdy Presbyterian.

The Queen in Scotland; a Descriptive Poem. By James Howie, M.D.

We can promise our readers a vast deal of entertainment from this Epic, which properly ought to have appeared among our own Lays of Loyalty. In it nothing is extenuate, from the debarkation at Granton, to the royal departure from the same honoured pier. The poem, we think, reaches the climax at the final surrender of the City Keys. Pass we, therefore, "the white-robed orphans ranged in seemly rows," and the rows, "no less grotesque, of men and women from the Refuge-house," and get to the heart of the matter—to the ——— Applauding throngs,

Resounding now with cheers and deafening, still Increasing, banners, hats, and handkerchiefs,
Waving from windows high and slated roofs,
As the excited gazer gained a glimpse
Of royalty, intoxicating quite!
But loudest rose the shouting where our own
Honoured Lord Provost met the cavalcade,
And put, on bended knee, the city keys
Into the Queen's own hand, which, pleased awhile,
She held half smiling, giving kindly words,
And soon restoring them, the crowd move on!
At length the street grows narrower, and the crowds
Denser and thicker still, as up the old
Lawnmarket wound the gorgeous retinue;
Till, having gained the bannered Castlehill,
The royal train halted, and once again,
Leaning on Albert's arm, I saw our Queen!

The eyes of the bard, thus enriched, flash in a fine frenzy over the glorious landscape commanded by the Castle. By the way, Mons Meg has been strangely neglected by him. On the whole the Queen was pleased; and

The Royal Train,
Escorted by the bright dragoons, now moves
Down Bank Street and the Mound; the brilliant crowds,
Long stationed here, loud greet her as she wheels
Majestically on through Prince's Street.

This must serve as a specimen. We have had nothing to match this since we lost Mr. Fitzgerald. We were lately suggesting Mr. Walker Ord for the Laurel when —distant be the day! it shall become vacant; but here is a Northern aspirant who, in hyperbolical loyalty, beats him all to sticks.

SERIAL WORKS.

KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKSPERE. Part L. The History of Opinion on the Writings of Shakspere. Among the endless criticisms and commentaries on Shakspere which Mr. Knight has industriously unearthed, is Garrick's Oration at the famous Stratford Jubilee, in which some passages occur, soaring far above the wing of the clever player; so far indeed above the greatest known Shaksperian critics of the period, Johnson included, and the cold and precise spirit of the middle of the eighteenth century, that, by a bold and not unfelicitous conjecture, Mr. Knight attributes them to Burke, who was intimate enough with Garrick, to make it not unlikely that, on so momentous an occasion, his aid might be requested. At all events, the beginning and the close of the otherwise common-place oration make it certain that the singular passages referred to must have proceeded from a mightier mind than Davy's. They, in substance, anticipate all that has since been said by the ablest critics of our times; by Coleridge and Hazlitt. The Part has portraits of all Shakspere's biographers and critics.

BLACKIE'S ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF BURNS'S POEMS. Parts I., II., III. These Parts, of a new Glasgow Edition of Burns, have just appeared. The work is to be completed in 21 Parts, and promises to be all that the admirers of the National Poet can desire; complete, accurate, and handsome. The portraits, landscapes, and architectural views, are those which appeared in the late Pictorial work, The Land of Burns. The edition is enriched with the notes of Robert Chambers, and the original annotations of the Editor. With the Life of Burns, by Currie, is to be given Professor Wilson's "words that breathe and thoughts that burn" upon the Poet and his writings, which appeared in "The Land of Burns." Gleanings are also to be made from all the eminent writers who have spoken of the Poet; and the number is not small. We have said this much, as we consider this particular edition worthy of attention.

THE BOOK OF SCOTTISH SONG: a Collection of the best and most approved Songs of Scotland, ancient and modern, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4. Glasgow: Blackie & Son.—This collection is intended to comprehend every approved, and also, we should fear, some rather mediocre, though popular, Scottish songs. The Editor's net is, we suspect, somewhat narrow in the mesh; but the collection must, nevertheless, prove a source of refined and innocent pleasure to hundreds of thousands; and, as such, we cordially welcome it. The little explanatory notices prefixed to many of the songs increase the pleasure of the reader, and the value of the book.

BROWNING'S BELLS AND POMEGRANATES, No. III.: Dramatic Lyrics.

CUMMING'S FOXE'S BOOK OF MARTYRS. Part XVIII. With a portrait of Calvin.

CYCLOPEDIA OF COMMERCE. By Waterston, Accountant. Part V.

CYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL HUSBANDRY. By Martin Doyle. Part VIII.

ELEMENTS OF ELECTRO-METALLURGY. Part VII. By Alfred Shee, F.R.S.

THORNTON'S HISTORY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE IN INDIA. Vol. IV., Part II.

BREWSTER'S CHARTIST AND MILITARY DISCOURSES. Part II.

CANADIAN SCENERY ILLUSTRATED. Part XXX.—This Part completes the work. We are bound to say, that the designer, Mr. W. H. Bartlett, and the engravers, have performed their duty far more satisfactorily than N. P. Willis, who undertook the literary department. A Map of Canada, and a splendid Frontispiece, a View of the Falls of Niagara from the Canada side, are given in this concluding Part.

SCENERY AND ANTIQUITIES OF IRELAND ILLUSTRATED. Part XIX.: contains some fine architectural views in Limerick city and the county; and a few more pencillings of the personal adventures of N. P. Willis in the Green Isle.

THE GABERLUNZIE'S WALLET. Parts XI. and XII.—In these Parts this unique Scottish Tale is ended in the very same spirit in which it commenced; poetical, Jacobitical, kindly, and auld-warld.

THE GIFT-BOOK OF POETRY. Edinburgh: Johnstone. The principle upon which every collection of this kind is formed, renders it next to impossible to make a bad book of popular poetry. If the Collector should not possess the necessary critical judgment or taste himself, he is nevertheless guided by the popular taste; and whatever Mr. Wordsworth may affirm to the contrary, there is, in general, no better criterion of poetic excellence. The Gift-book of Poetry is, however, a very fair collection. It has a freer sprinkling of new, if not original pieces than is usually met with in similar works; and is withal a very neat, little volume.

PAMPHLETS AND TRACTS.

CHANNING'S ADDRESS ON THE OCCASION OF THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE EMANCIPATION OF THE SLAVES IN THE WEST INDIA ISLANDS.

THE DIVINE WARNING TO THE CHURCH AT THIS TIME, &c., &c. A Sermon preached before the Protestant Association. By the Rev. Edward Bickersteth, Rector of Walton, Berks.—A discourse against the revival of Romish principles in the English Church.

SIR ROBERT PEEL AND THE LEAGUERS.

THERE are at present but two paramount subjects of public interest;—the usual idle conjectures which always precede the meeting of Parliament, as to what the Minister of the day is to do; and watching and guessing the course which the compact and energetic central action and widening ramifications of the Anti-Corn-Law League—fast becoming a National League—may compel Sir Robert Peel to adopt.——What can Sir Robert Peel do in the present exigency? How is he to face Parliament?—How to raise the necessary supplies?—How frame the Queen's speech? Expressions of sympathy for the admitted extreme sufferings of the people might do, last session: but something more substantial is required now. The people must have employment, they must have food,—and they have learned what deprives and stints them not merely of the comforts but of the merest necessaries of life. Fair professions will no longer satisfy them. It is no affair of yesterday, no temporary cause, no small amount of wrong and injustice, which has reduced them to their present wretched condition; nor can the atonement and remedy be slight or temporary, if to be effectual. They may have their sugar a trifle cheaper, but that is not enough; they may have some other small solace, or rather the pressure may be removed from one suffering part and laid upon another; but while the drain on their strength and the strangling dead-weight that crushes their energies remain, no effectual relief is to be looked for. It would be giving Sir Robert Peel credit for less perspicacity and political sagacity than he is entitled to, were we to doubt that, individually, he is fully aware that every means which his intelligence and statesmanship, backed by the cordial support of the whole nation, can suggest, is required to renovate the exhausted resources of the country, and to give merely a fair chance of recovery. The immediate and total repeal of the corn and provision laws—the watchword of the hour—the declaration that the oppression and injustice of twenty-seven years is at an end, is so obviously the first true step, that it is idle longer to argue that question. This point we consider virtually conceded; and we are almost as certain it would be triumphantly carried, if Sir Robert could but pluck up heart to dissolve upon it,—as it speedily must be whether he shall be the honoured leader or not. On this absorbing subject, the steadily falling revenue, and the continued and hopeless depression of trade, speak even more convincingly than the indefatigable Leaguers, with all their enginery of tracts, meetings, and lectures. They are doing wonders; but an empty Exchequer and the dried-up sources of its ordinary replenishment are more persuasive still. The deaf adders begin to give ear.

This time last year every one was busied in puzzling out the riddle which Sir Robert Peel had thrown out to amuse the nation during its lenten holidays, and which developed itself in the new-invented Sliding-Scale—that instrument which has proved itself worthy of the savans of Laputa—the Income Tax, and the meddling with the Tariff. The fruits of that grand compound scheme to bring back prosperity, please everybody, and spare "the interests," must have grievously disappointed the projector. Yet what was Sir Robert reasonably warranted to expect? After he came into power, the sufferings of the working-classes were at first denied. We can remember that the Savings'-banks were triumphantly pointed to as evidence of the prosperity of the great mass of the people; a fallacious test at best, although the accumulations had been fact. But what does a steadily declining revenue prove?—that test of physical wellbeing which admits of no delusion or fallacy. The aggravated symptoms of general distress cannot be denied; but now it is discovered that ten years of Whig misrule have produced the whole of these disastrous effects. Whig rule, as such, did not much to deepen the causes of national decline: and certainly not much to avert them; until an attempt was made, when it was perceived that nothing short of the recognition of Free-Trade principles, whether they were approved or not, could longer maintain in power those who had no Tory supporters. When is Sir Robert also to make the greater discovery, that without acting upon Free-Trade principles, and that largely and speedily, all the support that the Tories can lend cannot long uphold him as a minister? He must, by this time, be tolerably well convinced that there is for the minister of England but one proper and safe course to follow. It remains to be seen, and that very shortly, whether Sir Robert will have the wisdom and courage to venture upon that course; or the manliness to confess his powerlessness to serve the country while obstructed by his friends, and to throw up the game. If he did this in the right vein, no prophet is required to foretell the result. Had he the patriotism and true wisdom to avail himself of those elements of strength which the exigencies of the crisis, and a common feeling of danger, are hourly calling forth, his part would be as plain as it would be noble;—that of a great statesman, the saviour, in the hour of extremity, of a falling country. We fear it may be assumed that Sir Robert Peel is destined to play no such part on the stage of the world's history; though looking to what he has done, and been most foolishly and recklessly vilified for doing, we shall not yet despair; nor, for some time longer, believe that the Catholic Emancipation measure is to remain Peel's sole title to the name of a really great statesman. He is, no doubt, hampered by circumstances; but it is for a truly great man to mould circumstances to his purpose—that purpose being the most exalted that a man can set before him; to restore his country to prosperity, to draw down upon himself the blessings of those that are ready to perish. No king, and, certainly no minister, though his heart were as hard, his conscience as dead or seared as those of an intelligent being can be, can look with indifference upon the prolonged sufferings of millions of his innocent fellow-creatures—hastening to the tribunal at which the ruler and the ruled must alike give an account—and, with a strong conviction in his mind of the causes of the prevailing misery, and the remedy in his power, mercilessly withhold it. We cannot believe that the chief of the Tories is so thoroughly cold-blooded as this indifference would augur; and if he has not the power to accomplish his object—he has the power to make the trial. The country is much more united on this question than it was on the Catholic Emancipation measure. The portentous look which Sir Robert is reported to have cast upon Sir Edward Knatchbull, when that most candid and innocent of country gentlemen let the cat out of the bag, and told the truth, that the Corn Laws must be maintained to enable the aristocracy to support their station and dignity, forbids the belief that his convictions are not with the Free-Trade party.——In brief, though we have no trust in Sir Robert Peel in the matter of extension of the suffrage, we will not, until he declare himself by deeds as well as words, believe him the enemy of Free Trade. In the meanwhile, in the dearth of authentic information of any kind, the journalists are attaching most disproportionate importance to certain revelations (asides) made by the elder Mr. Gladstone; who seems to have, at all times, an inordinate itching to have his finger in Sir Robert Peel's pie. We accept this gentleman's revelations at their full value, when we receive them as the expression of what may be his own hopes and wishes about corn and cattle, since he became a landed proprietor. The father of the Vice-President of the Board of Trade is a somewhat comical character. He deals forth his notions and his beliefs as solemnly as did the learned Bartolemus Saddletree, who laid down the law to the admiring neighbours, whom he instructed as to the manner in which the Lords of Session, whose shop adjoined his own, were to deal with the most intricate cases which came before them; foretelling, with edifying gravity, whatever was to come next. Mr. Gladstone is, perhaps, as like the honest city tallow-chandler, who, though retired to enjoy the otium cum dignitate in the suburbs, could not be kept away from the shop on melting days. Sir Robert Peel will, we are certain, not thank Mr. Gladstone for his indiscreet officiousness. He would, we apprehend, approve of him making the concern entirely over to his son; saying, like his Ossianic countryman, "Let the name of John be forgotten among his people. May it only be said, Behold the father of William!" What is more, and, indeed, alone to the point, Mr. John Gladstone knows about as much of the mind of Sir Robert Peel as we do; and for this, among other good reasons, that Sir Robert is, we fear, too experienced a trading statesman, to have altogether made up his mind as to the line of policy which he may pursue, and too enlightened a man not to have in theory, at all events, adopted opinions diametrically opposite to those which are so freely ascribed to him by the elder Gladstone. Before Sir Robert finally make up his own mind, he must both learn, and well weigh the mind of the country. That has been pretty clearly manifested of late on the subject of Mr. Gladstone's epistle; and the question for Sir Robert must, we apprehend, resolve itself into the adoption of the Whig measure of a fixed duty, or of total and immediate repeal; before the Whigs shall anticipate him in the only measure that now either can or ought to satisfy the country. It is as much ground of thankfulness that the Tories (doubtless to their deep regret) opposed the Whig scheme of a fixed duty of 8s., as that they resisted the poor demand of the elective franchise for Birmingham and Manchester, and thereby created the ten-pounders. What is meant by this fixed duty "for revenue?" which, while the revenue is falling off, looks so specious in theory. It must, in the first place, be, in effect, a differential duty as between the foreign and the home grower; which is, in every case, irritating and insulting to other nations, as well as injurious to our own people; a duty, in fact, to favour the landed interest of Great Britain, at the expense of the foreign customers of the manufacturers of Great Britain. This fixed duty "for revenue," will, it is probable, be one of the stalking-horses of the session; and it ought to be hamstrung at the outset. If a fixed duty on food, on the bare necessaries of the most cheaply-sustained existence of a labouring family, on what are, next to air and water, the spontaneous gifts of Heaven to all the children of men; if revenue is to be raised by this stringent means, by a mouth-tax, a poll-tax, a tax on the mere right of existing—for without bread, or bread stuffs, there is no life—then it should surely be one for revenue alone; and not for a barleycorn of revenue, with a bushel of landlords' protection. But, unless the duty be imposed at the mill, or at the mouth of the oven; unless there be an excise on every loaf, and every pound of flour, duty for revenue is a sheer delusion. It is the Corn-Laws in another—they cannot indeed come in a worse—shape. Let every man be on his guard, then, against this duty for revenue, unless it shall fall equally upon the wheat of Lincoln and Sussex, and that of the Ohio and Illinois. If levied upon the grain of every country alike, there will be, we apprehend, little danger of the Farmers' Friends listening to a duty on the People's food that affects their own produce. They will become benevolent; they will, as when the Whigs were smashed, when Peel repudiated a fixed duty, and recommended his new Sliding-scale, be utterly shocked to hear of a tax upon the People's food.

Let us turn from these things to examine our increasing strength,—our own resources. If Sir Robert Peel wishes to know the mind of the country upon the Corn Laws before making up his own mind, that has now been pretty clearly demonstrated. The agitation spreads every day, of which the League is now the centre; though truth and humanity are the source of that great cause, in which, in our own sphere, in season and out of season, we have laboured for ten years, and which we rejoice to see hastening to a happy issue. There can be no hope of allaying that agitation which has, year after year, been steadily widening its basis, and which is supported by increasing knowledge among the people, diffused by the indefatigable energy and perseverance of the Leaguers; by great talent, by vast moral influence; by hard cash; but, above all, by the urgent necessities of the people, who, right or wrong, are convinced that they must have Free Trade or perish. Although the abolition of the monopolies should prove—were that possible—as injurious as it must prove beneficial, the monopolies must fall. The decree has gone forth. They are doomed—and with them all legislation for the benefit of a class at the expense of the whole; —the apparent benefit; for injustice never yet in the long-run benefited any man. It ought to take the last argument out of the mouths of the Monopolists, that the Free Traders, whether mill-owners, shippers, or persons engaged in commerce, are as ready to surrender every vestige of those "protections" of their interests which in the present languishing state of trade might seem to be required, as they are strenuous in their demand for a like measure of justice; for the total abolition of every impost on food. If they will give no protection, they ask for none; and to this they should and will be held.

Even the sagacity of an elder Gladstone could not foresee what is to take place in the approaching session of Parliament. The Whig Opposition may, perhaps, assume a more decided, nay, a more liberal line of policy than they saw fit to take last year. From their ostensible head, Lord John Russell, on the question of the Corn-laws, we expect very little; and, in extension of the suffrage, active opposition. No Liberal need be greatly disappointed by anything that Lord John Russell will either do or forbear to do. But Lord Palmerston is not quite so immaculate an incarnation of Whig notions; and the voluntary declaration of Mr. Fox Maule, at the great Anti-corn-law meeting in Glasgow, of his somewhat sudden, though welcome conversion, together with the oracular response of Mr. Macaulay to his Edinburgh constituents, augur no inflexible hostility in these two members of the late government to "Total and immediate repeal." It is not easy to guess how any argument is longer to be maintained in Parliament on this question. Last year it was virtually abandoned on every ground of reason. The adversaries were literally beaten off the floor of the House of Commons. Every fallacy was disproved, every refuge of lies swept away. That the high prices of food keep up wages, which, of all humbugs, is surely the most impudent, even a Buckinghamshire or Sussex peasant would now laugh at, and disprove from his own hungry experience. That extraordinary burthens fall upon the land, which therefore requires extraordinary protection, is an outcry which the landowners perceive may be carried too far, if it should go the length of provoking inquiry and instituting comparisons between the taxes that fall on land in Great Britain, and in every other country. Nothing then remains but the prophecy that land will be thrown out of cultivation; or, in other words, that our farmers cannot, on fair terms, compete, in the home market, with the farmers of the continent, or those beyond the Atlantic. The League might very safely guarantee a good rent per acre, for every acre that, having once been profitably cultivated, though when prices were exorbitant, should be thrown out of cultivation by the repeal of the Corn Laws.

It is not easy to guess the line of policy which the Pro-corn-Law party can now adopt in Parliament, or how they are to face the impending discussions. The despicable manœuvre of "No House," can no longer avail them against the body of new recruits and converts. The League—the People's representatives out of doors—seem to have "declared the sittings permanent." Every passing year has added to their power and influence. Their head-quarters at Manchester are now like the well-organized central bureau of some vast empire, which, in knowing what it is about, and in regularity and despatch, might afford useful hints to Downing Street. But, perhaps, the most remarkable feature of this agitation is the promptitude with which the country has responded to the call for the necessary supplies, in this season of universal depression and impoverishment; and the sums, small though they be, collected in agricultural districts, and in towns like Edinburgh under the immediate influence of the landed aristocracy, are much more worthy of notice than the large sums raised in the manufacturing districts. People not only flock to the meetings, but "they put money in their purses," which they can often ill spare. But they may, and most correctly too, view this money rather in the light of a profitable investment, than as a sum subscribed for a public object. Sir Robert Peel promised them back the full amount of the extorted Income-Tax in savings on their coffee, cabinet-work, shoes, gloves, &c, &c. The League may more assuredly guarantee the repayment of their voluntary subscriptions, in the reduced price of provisions; in the improvement of trade; in the ameliorated condition of the unemployed and destitute poor. This is solid encouragement to give, not only this year, but in every future year that the system of monopoly with which they war shall endure. These years cannot number many, if they shall be more than one.

We would entreat our readers to remember that these blighting and accursed laws were thrust upon the protesting nation in the borough-mongering times, and at the point of the bayonet; soldiers protecting our representatives in recording their votes against the most vital interests of their constituents. Let all this be now remembered. Nor is it likely to be forgotten. The greatest apparent present danger is of truckling and compromise with the half-and-half admirers of a fixed duty; with those who cling to as much of "protection" as can by any means be retained, and who would juggle the nation by pretending that it is for revenue. O'Connell said well—

Ye fragments of a wondrous dream
Of Glory and of Power,
Of centuries whose shadows stream
O'er battlement and tower,
Of times whose tide rolled bright along
In light of chivalry and song.

Ye stand not there—realities—
Though felt and scanned ye be:
A portion of the Past ye rise
'Mid hoar Antiquity!
And cloud and sunshine fleeting o'er ye
Are blended with the olden glory.

Who gazeth on ye burns to see
The bannered pomp of old,
The plumes of glorious chivalry,
The croslet's broiderd gold,
The knightly arm that tamed so well
The boast of turban'd infidel.

The chieftains of the olden fields,
The tournament and song,
Trilled to the music of the shields
When wine-cups cheered the strong;
The muster and the festal hall,—
The siege, the shout, the battered wall.

The baron on his battle steed,
Begirt with Knighthood's flower,
And bold retainers, good at need,
With axe and arrowy shower,
And vassal hundreds pealing high
The feudal monarch's gathering-cry.

The heroes of the endless strife
Of Scotland's hundred wars,—
When life was grimly given for life,
And scars for bloody scars,—
When Saxon flag, 'mid slogan yell,
Along the tameless Border fell.

Upon her gallant knight,
That shone the battle-waves above
In all its stainless white,
And bore to Syria's land of flame
The dark-eyed ladye's peerless fame.

RECOLLECTIONS OF AN OLD SAILOR.

NO. I.—THE MUTINY OF THE GLATTON.

MANY of my readers will recollect that the Mutiny at the Nore, and in the North-sea fleet, took place after that in the Channel fleet had been quelled by the redress of those grievances which had given rise to it. Therefore, when the soi-disant Admiral Parker* hoisted the red flag at the Nore, and was speedily joined by nearly the whole of the North-sea fleet, the alarm throughout the country became general, even to the extent of believing that our navy was about to be surrendered to the enemy. To prove that such a belief was unfounded, and to do justice to the character of the British sailor, I shall here narrate what occurred in my presence on board the Glatton during her short-lived insubordination.

At this period (1797) the Glatton was commanded by Captain Henry Trollope, who, a short time prior to the mutiny, had distinguished himself by one of the most brilliant naval actions on record,—having, in the short space of forty-nine minutes, beaten off a French squadron consisting of five frigates, a brig, and a cutter. This extraordinary exploit may appear incredible to many of my readers; but it must be remembered that the Glatton, though carrying only fifty guns, threw more weight of metal at each broadside than any three-decker then in the service.

When all the rest of the mutinous ships in the North-sea fleet were nearly out of sight on their way to the Nore, the Glatton was the last to desert the two admirals, Duncan and Onslow. We were at this time off Yarmouth, steering under easy sail towards the Texel.

At length, when the other ships which had left us for the Nore were waning on the distant horizon, the Glatton's Captain of the forecastle, accompanied by a boatswain's mate, and two or three more of the leading mutineers, came to the quarter-deck and announced to the officer of the watch the wish of the ship's company that they should proceed to the Nore: stating, at the same time, that they had nothing to complain of, and were perfectly satisfied with their officers; but that if they did not follow the example of their comrades, they would be afraid to meet them on shore. Remonstrance on the part of the Captain and officers was vain: the red flag was hoisted, and our course directed towards the Nore. No sooner was this perceived by the Commander-in-Chief, than he hoisted his colours! The force of such an appeal can be appreciated by sailors only. On this occasion, however, it was ineffectual. The Captain, with tears in his eyes, and in a state of mind not to be described, begged and entreated his men to return to their duty; pointed out to them the high compliment the Admiral had paid them; remarking, that it was tantamount to asking them the question, "Will the Glattons also desert me?" But the will and better feelings of the majority of the crew were now, unfortunately, controlled by a few desperate and depraved characters, under the title of Delegates, who responded to the prayers and entreaties of the Captain, with cries of "The Nore!—the Nore!" Accordingly, under these painful but unavoidable circumstances, the Glatton proceeded to Hosely Bay, where we anchored for the night.

* This man, Richard Parker, was a seaman who had been placed at the head of the Council of Delegates elected by the mutinous sailors at the Nore. He took the command of the Nore fleet, fomented the mutiny, and committed various acts of robbery and violence. He and some other mutineers were executed in 1797.

The next morning, matters assumed a more serious and threatening aspect. The men had now discovered—or rather the ringleader ruffians had pretended to discover—that three of the officers had treated them with tyranny, and therefore deserved to be punished. The men had also stuck up a paper on the Bitts,* in which they stated, that the marines and ship's company having bound themselves by a solemn oath to support each other on this occasion, any officer attempting to dissuade any one of them from the observance of that oath should be immediately punished with death; for which purpose yard-ropes were already suspended from each arm of the fore-yard.

Shortly after this a letter was sent to the Captain, stating the determination of the ship's company to punish an officer immediately, without mentioning his name or crime. The first Lieutenant and Surgeon were immediately sent for into the cabin; and, in a few minutes, every officer was ordered to appear on the quarter-deck, and to arm himself with a brace of loaded pistols and a cutlass. While these orders were being executed on the poop, the ship's company were not idle on their part. The guns on the forecastle were pointed aft, loaded with grape and canister; while, on the lower-deck, as many of the 68-pounders, as could be elevated, so as to reach the poop, by firing through the deck, were also pointed in that direction. The critical situation of the officers, at this moment, may be imagined, when I say, that if a pistol had gone off by accident, among the officers, while loading, that would have acted as a signal for the men on the lower deck to have fired the 68-pounders, which they had made ready and elevated; and few, if any, of the officers, standing at their perilous post, could have escaped instant destruction from such an upward discharge of shot through the upper deck, accompanied by tearing up of planks, splinters, &c. Not to mention that, of course at the same moment, the forecastle guns would have sent a storm of grape and canister among the devoted officers on the poop. Such a fearful crisis, within the narrow limits of a British Indiaman,†—one of the most gallant and effective in the service,—it is not easy for a landsman to appreciate in its full force of danger and anxiety. The evil passions then domineering over a courageous ship's company, often tried in battle,—the deeply painful thoughts of their brave officers, who had treated so kindly, and so often led to victory those misguided men, against whom duty now called upon them to present themselves as armed enemies,—the deadly preparations on both sides for mutual destruction: violent mutiny on the one side,—cool, but regretful determination to follow the line of duty, altogether presented such a scene, on that eventful morning, as I hope never to witness again. It was, to the last degree, distressing and appalling.

When all was prepared among the officers for resistance, the Captain and first Lieutenant went coolly and boldly forward among the ship's company, and demanded the name and the crime of the officer who had been pitched upon for punishment by the mutineers. The answers made it appear, that the officer was a master's mate named Ricketts, who had been overheard mentioning the names of the ringleaders to the Captain. When the men were told that not one officer would live to witness such an unwarrantable attempt at punishment, the men proposed to delay the punishment until the ship got to the Nore. Deeming it more prudent to temporize on this occasion, and to try what gentler means might effect among the misled men, the officers were accordingly desired to replace their arms in the arm-chest. Most of the officers then retired below, the Captain and the first Lieutenant only remaining among the ship's company, and trying to prevail on them to return to their duty. At this period of the mutiny, hardly ten minutes had elapsed when the gunner's mate, followed by one of the jolly-boat's crew (one of the worst characters in the ship), passed me on the quarter-deck, and went upon the poop, unobserved by the officer of the watch, who was in deep conversation with the surgeon. I watched them, and saw them go to the arm-chest, and begin to unlash it from its fastenings to the deck. I called the attention of the officer of the watch to this proceeding, who went immediately to the Captain; but, before the latter could get on the quarter-deck, the arm-chest was on the brink of the poop-ladder, with the gunner's mate standing on it, waving his hat for assistance. The sight of this was too much for even the temper and prudence of Captain Trollope, who instantly drew his dirk, and, running up the ladder, leaped upon the chest, made a blow at the gunner's mate and wounded him in the face; at the same time telling him, that if he did not instantly go forward he would run him through. The fellow, conscious of his own delinquency, and awed by the determination of his Captain, skulked away with his companion; both muttering that they had no wish to hurt the officers, but only wanted to protect themselves.

A few minutes after this painful and dangerous occurrence, the Captain returned to his now almost hopeless task of persuasion. At length, however, amid this gloomy and anxious scene, a ray of more hopeful light appeared. Three or four of the Captain's oldest followers came aft and joined the officers.

This suggested the propriety of a general muster, which immediately took place. Then every man was required to declare whether he would obey the Captain, or the delegates of the mutineers. The result was favourable to the Captain; for the first names on the ship's books were his oldest followers, —men naturally more attached to the ship and officers than the new comers. Nearly thirty of those names passed muster in favour of the Captain, without a dissentient voice. The lookers-on, seeing that the tide was about to turn against them, thought it prudent to swell the number; so that, at the end of the muster, the delegates remained with a very small minority who had taken so active a part in the affair, that their sentiments could not be concealed by voting. This was a glorious moment for the Captain and officers; and it would be hard to say whether their feelings were more intensely happy and pleasurable on this occasion, than they had been wretched and painful but a very short time before. In the one case, their loved and valued men—friends and companions in battle against the enemy—were arrayed against them in mutiny and deadly purpose of destruction; and in the other case, the same men (all the best men) were ranging themselves around them in recovered rule of duty and discipline, and a determination to stand by and protect their officers, not only on board of their own ship, but against every enemy that might appear at sea or on shore. This was a glorious day for the true-blue and stanch sailors of the British navy,—a sample of what their better feelings are when not perverted or fettered by bad advisers and malignant rulers of mind and body.

No sooner was the result of that memorable muster known, than the red flag was immediately hauled down, and the order given from the quarter-deck—"All hands up anchor!" At this order the men flew promptly to their stations—the ship was quickly under weigh—and a course steered for the Downs. Soon afterwards, the delegates and their few friends that remained, sent to the Captain to say that they also were ready to return to their duty, in the hope that what had passed would be buried in oblivion; which he assented to. A few hours after the Glatton had taken this course, two large sail, on the larboard-bow, were reported from the mast-head; and, as we were sailing nearly in an opposite direction, it was soon ascertained that they were men-of-war—one a large French eighty-gun ship, the other a seventy-four. No private signal was made on either side; and our Captain, pronouncing these two ships to be enemies steering for the Texel, ordered the first Lieutenant to beat to quarters. Whether or not our Captain believed the ships to be enemies, I will not pretend to say; but, at any rate, the Glatton was ready for action in ten minutes; and, with the desire her crew now had to wipe off the stain that so recently shaded their loyalty, I believe every man on board would have gone into action against those two French ships with full confidence of victory, notwithstanding the fearful odds. The late brilliant action of the Glatton, above alluded to, might well warrant such confidence. As we approached nearer the two ships, one of them threw out the signal for us to show our number. The numbers were exchanged; and we then learned that the eighty-gun-ship was the Sans Pareil, (taken on the first of June by Lord Howe,) the other the Russell.

We then proceeded to the Downs, where we found the Overyssel and Beaulieu frigates, with the red flag flying. We anchored on the quarter of the former, and the latter got under weigh, and anchored on our bow, both ships believing that we had come to reduce them to obedience. In such belief they slept three successive nights at their quarters, for no communication was allowed with the Glatton; and in this state we remained until the business at the Nore was happily terminated, and we were ordered into port to refit.

I cannot conclude this narrative without recording a noble trait in the character of the senior marine officer's servant, an Irishman, who came aft while the officers were arming themselves on the poop, to resist the mutineers; and who, on being questioned by the first Lieutenant why he made his appearance there, answered—"I am come to die with my master!"

Nor ought I to omit to record the valuable assistance which the Captain received on this trying occasion from the counsel and determined courage of the first Lieutenant, R. Williams, and the surgeon, Stevenson Eden. The first Lieutenant I believe to have been beloved and esteemed by every officer and man in the ship. The surgeon, though one of the most generous and kind-hearted of men, did not fare so well in the estimation of the crew; for, unluckily, he happened to find among them, occasionally, a character much more common in the navy then than at present; that is to say, a skulker—a man feigning disease in the hope of getting out of the service. It naturally followed that such characters were seldom pleased with their medical treatment; and, in this way, my friend Eden subjected himself to the charge of tyranny, for which he was included in the number destined by the mutineers to be tarred and feathered, at the commencement of the outbreak in the Glatton. This may partly account for the zeal he displayed at the moment we were arming ourselves on the poop, where, I believe, he loaded half of the pistols himself. To him also were we indebted for the happy thought of mustering the ship's company, by which proceeding this formidable mutiny was so fortunately terminated.

BORROW'S BIBLE IN SPAIN.*

The most striking feature of this work is, perhaps, the personal character of the author, as it is broadly revealed in every page. Bible-Borrow is, however, not entitled to this devout appellation for anything resembling the causes which made Cromwell's old military expounder be christened by Scott Bible-Butler; for Mr. Borrow differs, in few respects, from other contrabandists, save in the nature of the commodity which he introduced into the varied scenes of his labours. Conceive a vigorous man, of about thirty years of age, standing six feet two in his stocking-soles, who, from boyhood, has been engaged in all manner of adventures in every country of Europe; who is a daring and fearless rider; an adept in the use of his weapons; gifted with great personal and mental intrepidity, and by no means destitute of modest assurance; conceive him, familiar with the lowest haunts of vice, as it is seen in mendicant and gypsy life; a horse sorcerer and whisperer; speaking fluently every European language, and pattering every slang, lingua, and lingo, of Frank, Jew, and Gypsy; capable of adapting himself to every variety of circumstance; of not only "becoming all things to all men"—though not exactly in the sense of the apostle—but actually personating all kinds of men; and you have a faint idea of the singular individual whom the British Bible Society, probably looking more to the end than the means, sagaciously chose to introduce the Scriptures into Russia, and latterly into Spain and Portugal. We find Mr. Borrow in Paris, a spectator, if not an actor, in the Revolution of the Barricades; in the Peninsula; in Norway; in Russia; among the Bohemians, the Tartars, the Turks—everywhere; and, last of all, in Barbary; a kind of wandering Jew, in short, whose adventures necessarily comprise many romantic rencontres and strange vicissitudes, and perhaps some questionable or rather indecorous proceedings.

The work before us, "The Bible in Spain," is, however, limited to scenes in the Peninsula; though the author is often led to refer to his previous wanderings; and he also frequently stumbles, in the most unexpected places, upon individuals of his own nomade, or cosmopolitan species, whom he had first met with in far distant countries.

One would, in these days, give some money for a true narrative of how the Scriptures, and the heterodox writings of Martin Luther and his contemporaries, were first smuggled from Holland into our own seaport towns; and secretly disseminated, not by wholesale as in Spain, through the active agency of Mr. Borrow, but in single, highly-prized copies; stealthily procured, timidly lent, and zealously studied. At a little unlawful traffic, or of veritable smuggling of this description, wise men must, under certain circumstances, wink; as they must sometimes do at the wild justice of a little well-regulated Lynching, in a country where law is still too feeble to repress crime and protect person and property. We therefore consider Mr. Borrow's efforts to fulfil his duties to his constituents, of the Bible Society, as not merely venial, but meritorious. They have also, on the whole, been more successful than could reasonably have been anticipated. The very disorganisation and political disorder of Spain seem to have been of some advantage to Mr. Borrow's leading object,—the printing and diffusion of the Scriptures,—from the liberals being found disposed to view the attempt with favour, were it but from the spirit of contradiction; and the clergy being less prompt and united in their opposition than they might have been found in tranquil times. Their opposition was, at last, sufficiently virulent. The dealers, and especially the regular booksellers, in the different towns and villages were generally ready and often eager to sell the Bibles supplied to them, and the people were willing and in many instances eager to purchase both Bibles and the New Testament which was printed in Spain. But, as of old, the scribes and ruling Pharisees were set on by the priests; and, save for the powerful protection of the British embassy, Mr. Borrow, who did meet with some personal annoyance, might have encountered very serious inconvenience. He found, throughout, a powerful and even zealous protector in the British ambassador, Mr. Villiers (now Earl of Clarendon,) to whom the cause of Bible dissemination in Spain owes as much as the Anti-slavery cause; and who appears to have been as anxious that the people of Spain should be permitted freely to procure Bibles, as is his excellent brother that the people of England, who have free Bibles, should also have Free Bread.

Mr. Borrow seems to have spent nearly five years in his mission to the Peninsula; though, at one period, he was compelled to return to England for some months on account of illness, and at another time on business. His wanderings during this protracted sojourn were widely extended; and his adventures are as various as were those of Gil Blas of Santillane. Our readers will be enabled, by our extracts, to judge of his powers of observation and description, which are of no common order. Like that other brave missionary and African Lion-queller, Mr. Moffat, his matter is too copious to leave any space for the trivial graces and artificial adornments of the word-hunters; but he tells his story clearly and even eloquently; because his mind is stored with that information, and with those thoughts and images which are best expressed in unstudied language. In the preface the author alludes to, without feeling called upon to apologize for, the strange scenes and characters which are introduced into a work of the grave description of his. He is conscious of having had better opportunities of becoming acquainted with the peculiarities and hidden things of Spanish social life "than were, perhaps, ever yet afforded to a foreigner;" and it is but right to give his readers the full advantage of his knowledge. The years he spent in Spain, of which this work is the record, were, besides, "the happiest years of his existence." Long before he had seen that romantic and chivalrous land, her strange history had filled the day-dreams of boyhood; and he still regards Spain as "the most magnificent country in the world;" "probably the most fertile, and certainly with the finest climate." "Whether," he remarks—

Her children are worthy of their mother, is another question, which I shall not attempt to answer; but content myself with observing, that, amongst much that is lamentable and reprehensible, I have found much that is noble and to be admired; much stern heroic virtue; much savage and horrible crime; of low vulgar vice very little, at least amongst the great body of the Spanish nation, with which my mission lay; for it will be as well here to observe, that I advance no claim to an intimate acquaintance with the Spanish nobility, from whom I kept as remote as circumstances would permit me; en revanche, however, I have had the honour to live on familiar terms with the peasants, shepherds, and muleteers of Spain, whose bread and bacalao I have eaten; who always treated me with kindness and courtesy, and to whom I have not unfrequently been indebted for shelter and protection.

> "The generous bearing of Francisco Gonzales, and the high deeds of Ruy Diaz the Cid, are still sung amongst the fastnesses of the Sierra Morena."

I believe that no stronger argument can be brought forward in proof of the natural vigour and resources of Spain, and the sterling character of her population, than the fact that, at the present day, she is still a powerful and unexhausted country, and her children still, to a certain extent, a high-minded and great people.

It must, to Mr. Borrow, be a grateful reflection, that his time in Spain was spent in endeavouring to sow those seeds of the highest and purest of all knowledge which must tend to make this fine people more worthy of their magnificent country.

He landed at Lisbon in November 1835, and his first excursion was in the Alemtejo. His first impression, from the insolence of the custom-house officers, and the dirt and expense of living in Lisbon, were unfavourable; and he wished himself back in Russia, as a more friendly and civilized country. It does not appear that Mr. Borrow at any after-time extended the liking which he conceived for Spain, to Portugal. In about a fortnight, by following the subjoined useful recipe, he found himself conversing in Portuguese with tolerable fluency.

Those who wish to make themselves understood by a foreigner in his own language, should speak with much noise and vociferation, opening their mouths wide. Is it surprising that the English are, in general, the worst linguists in the world, seeing that they pursue a system diametrically opposite!

Lisbon, to his fancy, still exhibited traces of the terrible earthquake by which it was devastated some eighty years ago; but with all its ruin and desolation, it is, where it stands on its seven hills, in Mr Borrows eyes, still the most remarkable city in the Peninsula. The Water Works, and especially the edifice named The Mother of the Waters, he considers among the grandest of the monuments of human art. There is another sight. Travellers in Lisbon—

If they be of England, may well be excused if they kiss the cold tomb, as I did, of the author of "Amelia," the most singular genius which their island ever produced; whose works it has long been the fashion to abuse in public, and to read in secret. In the same cemetery rest the mortal remains of Doddridge, another English author of a different stamp, but justly admired and esteemed.

Mr. Borrow certainly cannot be charged with cant or sanctimoniousness; yet we should fear that many sober-minded Christians will be less repelled by his freer vein, and his wild gypsy adventures, than by the incongruous pious ejaculations, the prayers and notices of preachings, and exhortations with which he has seen meet to interlard the early part of his narrative; as if he felt it the duty of every man engaged in the service of the Bible Society to adopt a certain pious slip-shod phraseology. We could well have spared many of these tags and garnishings, which it strikes us are neither very congruous nor very reverent. But though our author may be accused of what to some may seem levity, we entirely acquit him of insincerity.

Mr. Borrow was furnished with letters of introduction to all those individuals that could be reached who were thought likely to aid his enterprise; and though these were few, he, upon the whole, met with much friendly encouragement, both from natives and foreigners settled in Spain. One of his first attempts was upon the schoolmaster of a romantic village on the mountain of Cintra, who, in a small room, taught about a dozen children their spelling-book, in a government-supported school, and received no salary. So much for Government schools. What this man called a copy of the New Testament which he had, turned out to be the Epistles by Pereira, with copious notes.

I asked him whether he considered that there was harm in reading the Scriptures without notes; he replied that there was certainly no harm in it, but that simple people, without the help of notes, could derive but little benefit from Scripture, as the greatest part would be unintelligible to them; whereupon I shook hands with him, and on departing said, that there was no part of Scripture so difficult to understand as those very notes which were intended to elucidate it, and that it would never have been written if not calculated of itself to illumine the minds of all classes of mankind.

At Mafra, the fine library, so often celebrated by travellers, was found abandoned and neglected; the monks, who had long acted as its conservators, having been driven forth to beg or steal; or serve under the banners of Don Carlos. One of the friars was found lingering in the neighbourhood, "a learned man," for "he spoke French and Greek," and now taught a few boys, probably for a morsel of bread, though he was unwilling to confess the degradation. Of a boy, one of the friar's pupils, Mr. Borrow inquired—

Whether he or his parents were acquainted with the Scripture and ever read it; he did not, however, seem to understand me. I must here observe, that the boy was fifteen years of age, that he was in many respects very intelligent, and had some knowledge of the Latin language, nevertheless he knew not the Scripture even by name; and I have no doubt, from what I subsequently observed, that at least two-thirds of his countrymen are, on that important point, no wiser than himself. At the doors of village inns, at the hearths of the rustics, in the fields where they labour, at the stone fountains by the way-side where they water their cattle, I have questioned the lower class of the children of Portugal about the Scripture, the Bible, the Old and New Testament; and in no one instance have they known what I was alluding to, or could return me a rational answer, though on all other matters their replies were sensible enough; indeed, nothing surprised me more than the free and unembarrassed manner in which the Portuguese peasantry sustain a conversation, and the purity of the language in which they express their thoughts, and yet few of them can read or write.

With the purpose of establishing depôts of Bibles in the Alemtejo, or province beyond the Tagus, which is a very benighted region, an excursion was made into that country in the depth of winter. The Alemtejo was infested by banditti; and their dilapidated strongholds, and the hostelries which they frequented, were sometimes seen on the road. One of these at Pegoens, a small and wretched hamlet, affords us a view of the interior of a Portuguese country inn.

In the whole of Portugal there is no place of worse reputation, and the inn is nicknamed Estalagem de Ladroes, or the hostelry of thieves; for it is there that the banditti of the wilderness, which extends around it on every side for leagues, are in the habit of coming and spending the money, the fruits of their criminal daring; there they dance and sing, eat fricasseed rabbits and olives, and drink the muddy but strong wine of the Alemtejo. An enormous fire, fed by the trunk of a cork tree, was blazing in a niche on the left hand on entering the spacious kitchen. Close by it, seething, were several large jars, which emitted no disagreeable odour, and reminded me that I had not broken my fast, although it was now nearly one o'clock, and I had ridden five leagues. Several wild-looking men, who, if they were not banditti, might easily be mistaken for such, were seated on logs about the fire. I asked them some unimportant questions, to which they replied with readiness and civility; and one of them, who said he could read, accepted a tract which I offered him.

My new friend, who had been bespeaking dinner, or rather breakfast, now, with great civility, invited me to partake of it, and at the same time introduced me to the officer who accompanied him, and who was his brother, and also spoke English, though not so well as himself. I found I had become acquainted with Don Geronimo Jose D'Azveto, secretary to the government at Evora; his brother belonged to a regiment of hussars, whose head-quarters were at Evora, but which had outlying parties along the road,—for example, the place where we were stopping.

Rabbits at Pegoens seem to be a standard article of food, being produced in abundance on the moors around. We had one fried, the gravy of which was delicious, and afterwards a roasted one, which was brought up on a dish entire; the hostess, having first washed her hands, proceeded to tear the animal to pieces; which having accomplished, she poured over the fragments a sweet sauce. I ate heartily of both dishes, particularly of the last, owing, perhaps, to the novel and curious manner in which it was served up.

Sometimes Testaments and Tracts were left by the wayside, at spots where they were likely to attract attention and curiosity. Before approaching Evora, the country improved somewhat; Monte Moro, an ancient town of the Moors, which is a much more singular place than the larger cities of the Alemtejo, was found very picturesque, situated at the head of a range of hills, and with many of the houses, built in the Moorish fashion, still standing. There is here a convent of giggling nuns, who make delicious cheese-cakes. So nunneries are good for something. At Evora, he says,

I and my servant went to the Largo de San Francisco, in which the muleteer informed me was the best hostelry of the town. We rode into the kitchen, at the extreme end of which was the stable, as is customary in Portugal. The house was kept by an aged gypsy-like female and her daughter, a fine blooming girl about eighteen years of age. The house was large; in the upper story was a very long room, like a granary, which extended nearly the whole length of the house; the farther part was partitioned off, and formed a chamber tolerably comfortable, but very cold, and the floor was of tiles, as was also that of the large room in which the muleteers were accustomed to sleep on the furniture of the mules.

In Evora there was neither a school nor a bookshop. The people of the middle class, without knowing anything of true religion, detested the lazy friars, who had eaten up the fat of the land; while the peasants regretted the expelled brethren, who had distributed alms among them. In his religious conversations with the people around the fountains, which are the common muster-places in the Peninsula, Mr. Borrow appears to have displayed as much zeal as discretion; though, when vituperating the Pope as the Head Minister of Satan, and the friars as his agents, he met with no obstruction or insult; so that it is probable he was sometimes not fully understood. Don Geronimo, alluded to above, was quite aware of the deplorable ignorance of his countrymen; and he willingly undertook to distribute the Bibles intrusted to his care. The conditions of that trust were not of a kind to alarm any educated man; for Mr. Borrow carefully impressed upon him that he Did not come to Portugal with the view of propagating the dogmas of any particular sect, but with the hope of introducing the Bible, which is the well-head of all that is useful and conducive to the happiness of society,—that I cared not what people called themselves, provided they followed the Bible as a guide; for that where the Scriptures were read, neither priestcraft nor tyranny could long exist, and instanced the case of my own country, the cause of whose freedom and prosperity was the Bible.

At this place was seen a man whose business it was to travel between Evora and Palmella, and who believed, (though he took care always to travel in company with others,) that his best protection from the attacks of banditti was a charm which he wore suspended round his neck in a bag. Mr. Borrow obtained a sight of this monkish spell, which was written in bad Portuguese; and he was at the pains to translate its jargon, in which the Virgin Mary figures prominently. He relates—

The woman of the house and her daughter had similar bags attached to their necks, containing charms, which, they said, prevented the witches having power to harm them. The belief in witchcraft is very prevalent amongst the peasantry of the Alemtejo, and I believe of other provinces of Portugal. This is one of the relics of the monkish system, the aim of which, in all countries where it has existed, seems to have been to besot the minds of the people, that they might be more easily misled. All these charms were fabrications of the monks, who had sold them to their infatuated confessants.

On the Sunday, the daughter, who adhered to the expelled friars, said, that she had ceased to confess, or to attend mass; because the government priests had no spiritual power nor unction. She, on this day, produced her library for the entertainment of the stranger. It consisted of popular stories, lives and miracles of Saints, and a Portuguese translation of Volney's Ruins of

Empires, which the zealous Missionary or pious Contrabandist represented in so atrocious a light, that the girl immediately put it into a blazing fire, kindled for the purpose of destroying it, telling her beads till it was consumed. The Spanish Contrabandists, who frequented this Inn, were not nearly so good Catholics as the girl. They were clamorous for tracts. They said they cared as little for the Pope and his monks as for Don Carlos; the latter being a dwarf and a tyrant, the former plunderers and robbers. The smugglers, though emancipated from spiritual or priestly terrors, had not, however, overcome their dread of witches. On the same stormy night on which they had declared their contempt for the Pope and Don Carlos—

At about nine we heard a galloping towards the door, and then a loud knocking; it was opened, and in rushed a wild-looking man, mounted on a donkey. He wore a ragged jacket of sheep skin, called in Spanish zamarra, with breeches of the same as far down as his knees; his legs were bare. Around his sombrero, or shadowy hat, was tied a large quantity of the herb which in English is called rosemary, in Spanish romero, and in the rustic language of Portugal, alecrim; which last is a word of Scandinavian origin (ellegren), signifying the elfin plant, and was probably carried into the south by the Vandals. The man seemed frantic with terror, and said that the witches had been pursuing him, and hovering over his head for the last two leagues. He came from the Spanish frontier with meal and other articles; he said that his wife was following him and would soon arrive, and in about a quarter of an hour she made her appearance, dripping with rain, and also mounted on a donkey.

I asked my friends, the contrabandistas, why he wore the rosemary in his hat; whereupon they told me that it was good against witches and the mischances on the road.

Next morning, Mr. Borrow was to set off on his return to Lisbon. He says—

I rose at four, and after having taken some refreshment, descended, and found the strange man and his wife sleeping in the chimney-corner by the fire, which was still burning; they soon awoke and began preparing their breakfast, which consisted of salt sardinhas, broiled upon the embers. In the meantime, the woman sang snatches of the beautiful hymn, very common in Spain, which commences thus:—

"Once of old, upon a mountain, shepherds overcome with sleep,
Near to Bethlem's holy tower, kept at dead of night their sheep;
Round about the trunk, they nodded, of a huge ignited oak,
Whence the crackling flame ascending, bright and clear, the darkness broke."

On hearing that I was about to depart, she said, "You shall have some of my husband's rosemary, which will keep you from danger, and prevent any misfortune occurring." I was foolish enough to permit her to put some of it in my hat.

Adventures with mule-hirers, though characteristic, are less rare than encounters with the native fidalgos, who are not so often abroad; so we pass a series of amusing incidents, to introduce a specimen of the genuine Portuguese Squire.

I found the inn at Vendas Novas thronged with people, and had some difficulty in obtaining accommodation and refreshment. It was occupied by the family of a certain Fidalgo from Estremoz; he was on the way to Lisbon, conveying a large sum of money, as was said—probably the rents of his estates. He had with him a body-guard of four-and-twenty of his dependants, each armed with a rifle; they consisted of his swineherds, shepherds, cowherds, and hunters, and were commanded by two youths, his son and nephew; the latter of whom was in regimentals; nevertheless, notwithstanding the number of his troop, it appeared that the Fidalgo laboured under considerable apprehension of being despoiled upon the waste which lay between Vendas Novas and Pegoens, as he had just requested a guard of four soldiers from the officer who commanded a detachment stationed here: there were many females in his company, who, I was told, were his illegitimate daughters—for he bore an infamous moral character, and was represented to me as a stanch friend of Don Miguel. It was not long before he came up to me and my new acquaintance, as we sat by the kitchen fire: he was a tall man of about sixty, but stooped much. His countenance was by no means pleasing: he had a long hooked nose, small, twinkling, cunning eyes, and, what I liked worst of all, a continual sneering smile, which I firmly believe to be the index of a treacherous and malignant heart. He addressed me in Spanish, which, as he resided not far from the frontier, he spoke with fluency, but, contrary to my usual practice, I was reserved and silent.

This family were next day overtaken on this dangerous road; which was found in a condition that justified their anxious precaution.

A visit to the English Catholic College in Lisbon offers some attraction, though there are many provoking blanks left in the narrative. The allusion to Mr. O'Connell in the subjoined passage is, however, plain enough. The speaker is the Rector of the College:—

At present the English * * * * * are the most devoted subjects of our gracious sovereign. I should be happy if I could say as much for our Irish brethren; but their conduct has been—oh! detestable. Yet what can you expect? The true * * * * * blush for them. A certain person is a disgrace to the church of which he pretends to be the servant. Where does he find in our canons sanction for his proceedings, his undutiful expressions towards one who is his sovereign by divine right, and who can do no wrong? And, above all, where does he find authority for inflaming the passions of a vile mob against a nation intended by nature and by position to command them?

Myself.—I believe there is an Irish college in this city?

Rector.—I believe there is; but it does not flourish: there are few or no pupils. Oh!

I looked through a window, at a great height, and saw about twenty or thirty fine lads sporting in a court below. "This is as it should be," said I; "those boys will not make worse priests from a little early devotion to trap-ball and cudgel-playing. I dislike a staid, serious, puritanic education, as I firmly believe that it encourages vice and hypocrisy."

We then went into the Rector's room, where, above a crucifix, was hanging a small portrait.

Myself.—That was a great and portentous man, honest withal. I believe the body of which he was the founder, and which has been so much decried, has effected infinitely more good than it has caused harm.

Rector.—What do I hear? You, an Englishman and a Protestant, and yet an admirer of Ignatius Loyola!

Myself.—I will say nothing with respect to the doctrine of the Jesuits, for, as you have observed, I am a Protestant; but I am ready to assert that there are no people in the world better qualified, upon the whole, to be intrusted with the education of youth. Their moral system and discipline are truly admirable. Their pupils, in after life, are seldom vicious and licentious characters, and are, in general, men of learning, science, and possessed of every elegant accomplishment. I execrate the conduct of the liberals of Madrid in murdering last year the helpless fathers, by whose care and instruction two of the finest minds of Spain have been evolved—the two ornaments of the liberal cause and modern literature of Spain, for such are Toreno and Martinez de la Rosa.

This is so far good, as Mr. Borrow by no means spares the Roman Catholic faith, or its priests.

The following passage is characteristic of the actor, who would seem to have a wonderful talent at personation, be it of Jew, Gentile, or Gypsy. It could not be easy to deceive not one Jew, but many sharp, vagabond Jews:—

Gathered in small clusters about the pillars at the lower extremities of the Gold and Silver Streets in Lisbon, may be observed, about noon in every day, certain strange-looking men, whose appearance is neither Portuguese nor European. Their dress generally consists of a red cap, with a blue silken tassel at the top of it, a blue tunic, girded at the waist with a red sash, and wide linen pantaloons or trousers. He who passes by these groups generally hears them conversing in broken Spanish or Portuguese, and occasionally in a harsh guttural language, which the oriental traveller knows to be the Arabic, or a dialect thereof. These people are the Jews of Lisbon. Into the midst of one of these groups I one day introduced myself, and pronounced a beraka, or blessing. I have lived in different parts of the world, much amongst the Hebrew race, and am well acquainted with their ways and phraseology. I was rather anxious to become acquainted with the state of the Portuguese Jews, and I had now an opportunity. "The man is a powerful rabbi," said a voice in Arabic; "it behoves us to treat him kindly." They welcomed me. I favoured their mistake, and in a few days I knew all that related to them and their traffic in Lisbon. I found them a vile, infamous rabble, about two hundred in number.

These off-scourings of the Hebrew nation pretend to work in silver and gold, and to keep small peddling shops; while their real or main business is dealing in stolen goods. There seems a touch of exaggeration in the unqualified account given of the Jews of Lisbon; nor must we forget the adage, "Give a dog an ill name, and hang him." There is, however, a better class of Jews in the city. Mr. Borrow went from Lisbon to Madrid, by way of Badajoz. In the journey, he often saw some of the worst consequences of those intestine contentions of faction, which have inflicted far more suffering upon Spain and Portugal than was ever caused to them by the presence of invading armies. The peasants, and with good reason, curse "both their houses." Whatever faction triumphs, they are the sufferers. The following incident displays the true ruffianly character of the Portuguese soldiers. The party in question were escorting stores and ammunition into Spain, and were met near Arroyolos:—

Six or seven of these soldiers marched a considerable way in front; they were villanous-looking ruffians, upon whose livid and ghastly countenances were written murder, and all the other crimes which the decalogue forbids. As I passed by, one of them, with a harsh, croaking voice, commenced cursing all foreigners. "There," said he, "is this Frenchman riding on horseback," (I was on a mule,) "with a man" (the idiot) "to take care of him, and all because he is rich; whilst I, who am a poor soldier, am obliged to tramp on foot. I could find it in my heart to shoot him dead, for in what respect is he better than I? But he is a foreigner, and the devil helps foreigners and hates the Portuguese." He continued shouting his remarks until I got about forty yards in advance, when I commenced laughing; but it would have been more prudent in me to have held my peace, for the next moment, with bang—bang, two bullets, well aimed, came whizzing past my ears. A small river lay just before me, though the bridge was a considerable way on my left. I spurred my animal through it, closely followed by the terrified guide, and commenced galloping along a sandy plain on the other side, and so escaped with my life.

These fellows, with the look of banditti, were in no respect better; and the traveller who should meet them in a solitary place would have little reason to bless his good fortune. One of the carriers, (all of whom were Spaniards from the neighbourhood of Badajoz, and had been despatched into Portugal for the purpose of conveying the stores,) whom I afterwards met in the aforesaid town, informed me that the whole party were equally bad; and that he and his companions had been plundered by them of various articles, and threatened with death if they attempted to complain. How frightful to figure to oneself an army of such beings in a foreign land, sent thither either to invade or defend.

At Estremoz, though still in Portugal, we find a very Gil Blasian kind of inn—

The cold was far too terrible to permit me to remain in the chamber to which I had been conducted; I therefore went down to a kind of kitchen on one side of the arched passage, which led under the house to the yard and stables. A tremendous withering blast poured through this passage, like the water through the flush of a mill. A large cork tree was blazing in the kitchen beneath a spacious chimney; and around it were gathered a noisy crew of peasants and farmers from the neighbourhood, and three or four Spanish smugglers from the frontier. I with difficulty obtained a place amongst them, as a Portuguese or a Spaniard will seldom make way for a stranger, till called upon or pushed aside, but prefers gazing upon him with an expression which seems to say, I know what you want, but I prefer remaining where I am.

I now first began to observe an alteration in the language spoken; it had become less sibilant, and more guttural; and, when addressing each other, the speakers used the Spanish title of courtesy usted, or your worthiness, instead of the Portuguese high flowing vossem se, or your lordship.

The adventures at this inn were quite in keeping with the locality. Lavishly as the English have poured forth their blood and treasure for the alleged advantage of foreign nations—and especially in the Peninsula—bitter hatred seems to be the prevailing feeling, where warm gratitude might have been looked for. The general feeling is, that all the sacrifices made by the British were to serve their own selfish purposes—to promote their own aggrandizement. Even in better-informed Germany, this opinion is nearly universal. At a sort of news-room in Elvas, kept by a Portuguese who had served in the British army, a good-looking young officer, who commanded at the gate of the town, came in while Mr. Borrow was there. After a few observations this person, we are told,

Began to burst forth in violent declamation against the English nation and government, who, he said, had at all times proved themselves selfish and deceitful, but that their present conduct in respect to Spain was particularly infamous; for though it was in their power to put an end to the war at once, by sending a large army thither, they preferred sending a handful of troops, in order that the war might be prolonged, for no other reason than that it was of advantage to them. Having paid him an ironical compliment for his politeness and urbanity, I asked whether he reckoned amongst the selfish actions of the English government and nation, their having expended hundreds of millions of pounds sterling, and an ocean of precious blood, in fighting the battles of Spain and Portugal against Napoleon. "Surely," said I, the fort of Elvas above our heads, and, still more, the castle of Badajoz over the water, speak volumes respecting English selfishness, and must, every time you view them, confirm you in the opinion which you have just expressed.

The Englishman became most patriotically angry, gave the Portuguese what is called a good setting down, and turned the laugh against him. Mr. Borrow was not even allowed to enter the fort at Badajoz, which tempts him to exclaim—

This is one of the beneficial results of protecting a nation and squandering blood and treasure in its defence. The English, who have never been at war with Portugal, who have fought for its independence on land and sea, and always with success; who have forced themselves by a treaty to commence to drink its coarse and filthy wines, which no other nation cares to taste, are the most unpopular people who visit Portugal. The French have ravaged the country with fire and sword, and shed the blood of its sons like water; the French buy not its fruits and loath its wines, yet there is no bad spirit in Portugal towards the French. . . . . There is no country in which the English are so popular as in France; but, though the French have been frequently roughly handled by the English, and have seen their capital occupied by an English army, they have never been subjected to the supposed ignominy of receiving assistance from them.

At Elvas, however, a Portuguese phœnix was discovered, a worthy tradesman, a man of talent though of rough manners, who hated the Papal system, and frankly volunteered to sell Bibles, scoffing at the idea of fee or reward, save being allowed to coöperate in a good cause.

At last the frontier was crossed, and Spain was entered; the traveller characteristically hailed by one of those Gil Blasian, sturdy, wine-bibbing, mendicants, who are as prompt with their curses of the niggard, as with their blessings on the liberal alms-giver.

It should be understood that the distributor or smuggler of the Bible in Spain is the very counterpart of the renowned Bampfylde Moore Carew, not merely in his familiarity with the gypsy haunts, habits, and lingo, but in his romantic attachment to that singular race. In reference to the scenes more fully described in his former work, "The Gypsies in Spain," he here relates—

It was at this town of Badajoz, the capital of Estremadura, that I first fell in with those singular people, the Zincali, Gitanos, or Spanish gypsies. It was here I met with the wild Paco, the man with the withered arm, who wielded the chakas (shears) with his left hand; his shrewd wife, Antonia, skilled in hokkano baro, or the great trick; the fierce gypsy, Antonio Lopez, their father-in-law; and many other almost equally singular individuals of the Errate, or gypsy blood. It was here that I first preached the gospel to the gypsy people, and commenced that translation of the New Testament in the Spanish gypsy tongue, a portion of which I subsequently printed at Madrid. . . . . During my stay at Badajoz, I had but little intercourse with the Spaniards, my time being chiefly devoted to the gypsies, with whom, from long intercourse with various sections of their race in different parts of the world, I felt myself much more at home than with the silent reserved men of Spain, with whom a foreigner might mingle for half a century without having half a dozen words addressed to him.

After remaining for three weeks at Badajoz, and seeing a great deal of his vagrant friends of the gypsy blood, who at once received him as a Calé, or one of themselves, he set off for Madrid, under the guidance of one of the number, who was bound "on business of Egypt," to a distant place. In withdrawing rather secretly from the town, the traveller went early one morning to the dwelling of his guide. We cannot say that we are particular admirers either of the gypsy jargon or manners. Still both are wild and curious.

It was a small mean building, situated in a dirty street. The morning was quite dark; the street, however, was partially illumined by a heap of lighted straw, round which two or three men were busily engaged, apparently holding an object over the flames. Presently the gypsy's door opened, and Antonio made his appearance; and, casting his eye in the direction of the light, exclaimed, "The swine have killed their brother; would that every Busno* was served as yonder hog is. Come in, brother, and we will eat the heart of that hog." I scarcely understood his words; but, following him, he led me into a low room in which was a brasero, or small pan full of lighted charcoal; beside it was a rude table, spread with a coarse linen cloth, upon which was bread and a large pipkin full of a mess which emitted no disagreeable savour. "The heart of the balichow is in that puchera," said Antonio; "eat, brother." We both sat down and ate, Antonio voraciously. When we had concluded, he arose:—"Have you got your li?" he demanded. "Here it is," said I, showing him my passport. "Good," said he, "you may want it; I want none, my passport is the bar lachi. Now for a glass of repani, and then for the road.

We left the room, the door of which he locked, hiding the key beneath a loose brick in a corner of the passage. "Go into the street, brother, whilst I fetch the caballerias from the stable."

Towards night they reached Merida; and the real gypsy left the imagined one without the walls until he had reconnoitred. The following adventure, and much that is to come, places an agent of the Bible Society in a rather awkward position:—

I dismounted from the horse, and sat down on a stone beneath the ruined wall to which Antonio had motioned me. The sun went down, and the air was exceedingly keen; I drew close around me an old tattered gypsy cloak with which my companion had provided me; and, being somewhat fatigued, fell into a doze which lasted for nearly an hour.

"Is your worship the London Caloro?" said a strange voice close beside me.

I started, and beheld the face of a woman peering under my hat. Notwithstanding the dusk, I could see that the features were hideously ugly, and almost black; they belonged, in fact, to a gypsy crone, at least seventy years of age, leaning upon a staff.

"Is your worship the London Caloro?" repeated she.

"I am he whom you seek," said I; "where is Antonio?"

"Curelando, curelando, baribustres curelos terela," [Doing business, doing business—he has much business to do] said the crone: "come with me, Caloro of my garlochin, come with me to my little ker, he will be there anon."

I followed the crone, who led the way into the town, which was ruinous and seemingly half deserted; we went up the street, from which she turned into a narrow and dark lane, and presently opened the gate of a large dilapidated house: "Come in," said she.

"And the gras?" I demanded.

"Bring the gras in too, my chabo, bring the gras in too; there is room for the gras in my little stable." We entered a large court, across which we proceeded till we came to a wide door-way. "Go in, my child of Egypt," said the hag; "go in, that is my little stable."

"The place is as dark as pitch," said I, "and may be a well for what I know; bring a light, or I will not enter."

"Give me the solabarri, (bridle,)" said the hag, "and I will lead your horse in, my chabo of Egypt—yes, and tether him to my little manger." She led the horse through the doorway, and I heard her busy in the darkness; presently the horse shook himself: "Grasti terelamos," said the hag, who now made her appearance with the bridle in her hand; "the horse has shaken himself, he is not harmed by his day's journey; now let us go in, my Caloro, into my little room."

We entered the house, and found ourselves in a vast room, which would have been quite dark but for a faint glow which appeared at the farther end; it proceeded from a brasero, beside which were squatted two dusky figures.

* The Busné are the Gentiles, including the Portuguese; or rather, all nations who are not gypsies or Calés.

"These are Callees," said the hag; "one is my daughter, and the other is her chabi: sit down, my London Caloro, and let us hear you speak."

I looked about for a chair, but could see none; at a short distance, however, I perceived the end of a broken pillar lying on the floor; this I rolled to the brasero, and sat down upon it.

"This is a fine house, mother of the gypsies," said I to the hag, willing to gratify the desire she had expressed of hearing me speak; "a fine house is this of yours: rather cold and damp, though; it appears large enough to be a barrack for hundunares."

"Plenty of houses in this foros, plenty of houses in Merida, my London Caloro; some of them just as they were left by the Corahanoes: ah, a fine people are the Corahanoes; I often wish myself in their chim once more."

"How is this, mother," said I; "have you been in the land of the Moors?"

The old gypsy told the wild and marvellous adventures of her life, which we are forced to believe are somewhat indebted to the embellishments of the reporter. When she concluded her tale,

She commenced laughing loud and long, and when she had ceased, her daughter and grandchild took up the laugh, which they continued so long that I concluded they were all lunatics.

Hour succeeded hour, and still we sat crouching over the brasero, from which, by this time, all warmth had departed; the glow had long since disappeared, and only a few dying sparks were to be distinguished. The room or hall was now involved in utter darkness; the women were motionless and still; I shivered and began to feel uneasy. "Will Antonio be here to-night?" at length I demanded.

"No tenga usted cuidao, my London Caloro," said the Gypsy mother, in an unearthly tone; "Pepindorio [the Gypsy word for Antonio] has been here some time."

I was about to rise from my seat and attempt to escape from the house, when I felt a hand laid upon my shoulder, and in a moment I heard the voice of Antonio.

"Be not afraid, 'tis I, brother; we will have a light anon, and then supper."

The supper was rude enough, consisting of bread, cheese, and olives. Antonio, however, produced a leathern bottle of excellent wine; we despatched these viands by the light of an earthen lamp which was placed upon the floor.

"Now," said Antonio to the youngest female, "bring me the pajandi, and I will sing a gachapla."

The girl brought the guitar, which, with some difficulty, the Gypsy tuned, and then, strumming it vigorously, he sang:

"I stole a plump and bonny fowl,
But ere I well had dined,
The master came with scowl and growl,
And me would captive bind.

"My hat and mantle off I threw,
And scour'd across the lea,
Then cried the beng [devil] with loud halloo,
Where does the Gypsy flee?"

He continued playing and singing for a considerable time, the two younger females dancing in the meanwhile with unwearied diligence, whilst the aged mother occasionally snapped her fingers or beat time on the ground with her stick. At last Antonio suddenly laid down the instrument, exclaiming:—"I see the London Caloro is weary; enough, enough: to-morrow more thereof—we will now to the charipé (bed.)"—"With all my heart," said I; "where are we to sleep?"—"In the stable," said he, "in the manger; however cold the stable may be, we shall be warm enough in the bufa."

A strange house of entertainment this in which Mr. Borrow remained concealed for three days, while his companion was daily engaged abroad on "business of Egypt"—the gypsy phrase for schemes relating to cheating, stealing, and robbing. We were afraid that Mr. Borrow was about getting into the same sort of scrape with the gypsy sowanee, or sorceress, into which Captain Clapperton fell with the amorous and ambitious widow Wowwow; but it was only the hand of her accomplished granddaughter that the old lady earnestly tendered to the tall "London Caloro;" and this delicately, while the fair subject of their conversation was abroad in the town telling fortunes. The matrimonial affair was placed in a very tempting light; and, when the stranger pleaded that he could not support a romi, and also did not choose to settle in this chim, the old lady obviated all objections. Her granddaughter, she averred, could cheat, tell fortunes, and steal; and at Madrid would not fail to make a fortune, and wear silks and satins; while her ro rode about on his black-tailed gra;—or—

The chabi can cross the pani. Would she not do business in London with the rest of the Caloré? Or why not go to the land of the Corahai? In which case I would accompany you; I and my daughter, the mother of the chabi. . . . . Take the chabi, therefore, and go to Madrilati to win the parné, and when you have got it, return, and we will give a banquet to all the Busné in Merida, and in their food I will mix drow, and they shall eat and burst like poisoned sheep..... And when they have eaten we will leave them, and away to the land of the Moor, my London Caloro.

The "business of Egypt" did not carry Antonio so far as Madrid; and the London Caloro parted from the Badajoz Caloro in a wild pass; previous to which this singular conversation took place:—

Antonio.—Brother, I cannot imagine what business brought you to this country?

Myself.—Perhaps the same which brings you to this moor,—business of Egypt.

Antonio.—Not so, brother; you speak the language of Egypt, it is true, but your ways and words are neither those of the Calés nor of the Busné.

Myself.—Did you not hear me speak in the foros about God and Tebleque? It was to declare his glory to the Calés and Gentiles that I came to the land of Spain.

Antonio.—And who sent you on this errand?

Myself.—You would scarcely understand me were I to inform you. Know, however, that there are many in foreign lands who lament the darkness which envelops Spain, and the scenes of cruelty, robbery, and murder which deform it.

Antonio.—Are they Caloré or Busné?

Myself.—What matters it? Both Caloré and Busné are sons of the same God.

Antonio.—You lie, brother; they are not of one father nor of one Errate. You speak of robbery, cruelty, and murder. There are too many Busné, brother; if there were no Busné there would be neither robbery nor murder. The Caloré neither rob nor murder each other, the Busné do; nor are they cruel to their animals, their law forbids them. When I was a child, I was beating a burra, but my father stopped my hand, and chided me. "Hurt not the animal," said he;" for within it is the soul of your own sister!"

Myself.—And do you believe in this wild doctrine, O Antonio?

Antonio.—Sometimes I do, sometimes I do not. There are some who believe in nothing; not even that they live! Long since, I knew an old Caloro, he was old, very old, upwards of a hundred years,—and I once heard him say, that all we thought we saw was a lie; that there was no world, no men nor women, no horses nor mules, no olive trees. But whither are we straying? I asked what induced you to come to this country—you tell me the glory of God and Tebleque. Disparáte! tell that to the Busné. You have good reasons for coming, no doubt, else you would not be here. Some say you are a spy of the Londoné, perhaps you are; I care not. Rise, brother, and tell me whether any one is coming down the pass.

Antonio must surely have heard of the writings of Berkeley, incredible as that may seem. If the reader cannot believe this, he may adopt any other hypothesis he pleases.

The remainder of the journey to Madrid was prosecuted solitarily, the traveller riding upon a beautiful ass, which he had purchased from the gypsy. His next striking adventure is even more extraordinary than his entertainment among the gypsies, as it is next to impossible to conjecture by what spell, save his wonderful power of personating Jew, Moor, or Gypsy, he was able to unlock the breast and tongue of the fellow-traveller who was thus overtaken, after a long ride in the dark:—

At length the moon shone out faintly, when suddenly by its beams I beheld a figure moving before me at a slight distance. I quickened the pace of the burra, and was soon close at its side. It went on, neither altering its pace nor looking round for a moment. It was the figure of a man, the tallest and bulkiest that I had hitherto seen in Spain, dressed in a manner strange and singular for the country. On his head was a hat with a low crown and broad brim, very much resembling that of an English wagoner; about his body was a long loose tunic or slop, seemingly of coarse ticken, open in front, so as to allow the interior garments to be occasionally seen; these appeared to consist of a jerkin and short velveteen pantaloons. I have said that the brim of the hat was broad, but, broad as it was, it was insufficient to cover an immense bush of coal-black hair, which, thick and curly, projected on either side; over the left shoulder was flung a kind of satchel, and in the right hand was held a long staff or pole.

There was something peculiarly strange about the figure; but what struck me the most was the tranquillity with which it moved along, taking no heed of me, though of course aware of my proximity, but looking straight forward along the road, save when it occasionally raised a huge face and large eyes towards the moon, which was now shining forth in the eastern quarter.

"A cold night," said I at last. "Is this the way to Talavera?"

"It is the way to Talavera, and the night is cold."

"I am going to Talavera," said I, "as I suppose you are yourself."

"I am going thither, so are you, Bueno."

The tones of the voice which delivered these words were in their way quite as strange and singular as the figure to which the voice belonged; they were not exactly the tones of a Spanish voice, and yet there was something in them that could hardly be foreign; the pronunciation also was correct, and the language, though singular, faultless. But I was most struck with the manner in which the last word, bueno, was spoken. I had heard something like it before, but where or when I could by no means remember. A pause now ensued; the figure stalking on as before with the most perfect indifference, and seemingly with no disposition either to seek or avoid conversation.

"Are you not afraid," said I at last, "to travel these roads in the dark? It is said that there are robbers abroad."

"Are you not rather afraid," replied the figure, "to travel these roads in the dark?—you who are ignorant of the country, who are a foreigner, an Englishman!"

"How is it that you know me to be an Englishman?" demanded I, much surprised.

"That is no difficult matter," replied the figure; "the sound of your voice was enough to tell me that."

"You speak of voices," said I; "suppose the tone of your own voice were to tell me who you are?"—"That it will not do," replied my companion; "you know nothing about me—you can know nothing about me."—"Be not sure of that my friend; I am acquainted with many things of which you have little idea."—"Por exemplo," said the figure.—"For example," said I; "you speak two languages."—The figure moved on, seemed to consider a moment, and then said slowly, bueno.

"You have two names," I continued; "one for the house and the other for the street; both are good, but the one by which you are called at home is the one which you like best."

The man walked on about ten paces, in the same manner as he had previously done; all of a sudden he turned, and taking the bridle of the burra gently in his hand, stopped her. I had now a full view of his face and figure, and those huge features and Herculean form still occasionally revisit me in my dreams. I see him standing in the moonshine, staring me in the face with his deep calm eyes. At last he said:

"Es usted tambien de nosotros?"

. . . . . .

It was late at night when we arrived at Talavera. We went to a large gloomy house, which my companion informed me was the principal posada of the town. We entered the kitchen, at the extremity of which a large fire was blazing. "Pepita," said my companion to a handsome girl who advanced smiling toward us; "a brasero and a private apartment; this cavalier is a friend of mine, and we shall sup together." We were shown to an apartment in which were two alcoves containing beds. After supper, which consisted of the very best, by the order of my companion, we sat over the brasero, and commenced talking.

Myself.—Of course you have conversed with Englishmen before, else you could not have recognised me by the tone of my voice.

Abarbenel.—I was a young lad when the war of the independence broke out, and there came to the village in which our family lived an English officer in order to teach discipline to the new levies. He was quartered in my father's house, where he conceived a great affection for me. On his departure, with the consent of my father, I attended him through both the Castiles, partly as companion, partly as domestic. I was with him nearly a year, when he was suddenly summoned to return to his own country. He would fain have taken me with him, but to that my father would by no means consent. It is now five-and-twenty years since I last saw an Englishman; but you have seen how I recognised you even in the dark night.

Myself.—And what kind of life do you pursue, and by what means do you obtain support?

Abarbenel.—I experience no difficulty. I live much in the same way as I believe my forefathers lived; certainly as my father did, for his course has been mine. At his death I took possession of the herencia, for I was his only child. It was not requisite that I should follow any business, for my wealth was great; yet, to avoid remark, I followed that of my father, who was a longanizero. I have occasionally dealt in wool; but lazily, lazily,—as I had no stimulus for exertion. I was, however, successful in many instances, strangely so; much more than many others who toiled day and night, and whose whole soul was in the trade.

Myself.—Have you any children? Are you married?

Abarbenel.—I have no children though I am married. I have a wife and an amiga, or I should rather say two wives, for I am wedded to both. I, however, call one my amiga, for appearance sake; for I wish to live in quiet, and am unwilling to offend the prejudices of the surrounding people.

Myself.—You say you are wealthy. In what does your wealth consist?

Abarbenel.—In gold and silver, and stones of price; for I have inherited all the hoards of my forefathers. The greater part is buried under ground; indeed, I have never examined the tenth part of it. I have coins of silver and gold older than the times of Ferdinand the Accursed and Jezebel; I have also large sums employed in usury. We keep ourselves close, however, and pretend to be poor, miserably so; but on certain occasions, at our festivals, when our gates are barred, and our savage dogs are let loose in the court, we eat our food off services such as the Queen of Spain cannot boast of, and wash our feet in ewers of silver, fashioned and wrought before the Americas were discovered; though our garments are at all times coarse, and our food for the most part of the plainest description.

Myself.—Are there more of you than yourself and your two wives?

Abarbenel.—There are my two servants, who are likewise of us; the one is a youth, and is about to leave, being betrothed to one at some distance; the other is old: he is now upon the road, following me with a mule and car.

Myself.—And whither are you bound at present?

Abarbenel.—To Toledo, where I ply my trade occasionally of longanizero. I love to wander about, though I seldom stray far from home. Since I left the Englishman my feet have never once stepped beyond the bounds of New Castile. I love to visit Toledo, and to think of the times which have long since departed; I should establish myself there, were there not so many accursed ones, who look upon me with an evil eye.

Myself.—Are you known for what you are? Do the authorities molest you?

Abarbenel.—People of course suspect me to be what I am; but as I conform outwardly in most respects to their ways, they do not interfere with me. True it is that sometimes, when I enter the church to hear the mass, they glare at me over the left shoulder, as much as to say—"What do you here?" And sometimes they cross themselves as I pass by; but as they go no further, I do not trouble myself on that account. With respect to the authorities, they are not bad friends of mine. Many of the higher class have borrowed money from me on usury, so that I have them to a certain extent in my power; and as for the low alguazils and corchetes, they would do anything to oblige me in consideration of a few dollars, which I occasionally give them; so that matters upon the whole go on remarkably well. Of old, indeed, it was far otherwise; yet, I know not how it was, though other families suffered much, ours always enjoyed a tolerable share of tranquillity. The truth is, that our family has always known how to guide itself wonderfully. I may say there is much of the wisdom of the snake amongst us. We have always possessed friends; and with respect to enemies, it is by no means safe to meddle with us; for it is a rule of our house never to forgive an injury, and to spare neither trouble nor expense in bringing ruin and destruction upon the heads of our evil doers.

Myself.—Do the priests interfere with you?

Abarbenel.—They let me alone, especially in our own neighbourhood. Shortly after the death of my father, one hot-headed individual endeavoured to do me an evil turn; but I soon requited him, causing him to be imprisoned on a charge of blasphemy, and in prison he remained a long time, till he went mad and died.

Myself.—Have you a head in Spain, in whom is vested the chief authority?

Abarbenel.—Not exactly. There are, however, certain holy families who enjoy much consideration; my own is one of these—the chiefest, I may say. My grandsire was a particularly holy man; and I have heard my father say, that one night an archbishop came to his house secretly, merely to have the satisfaction of kissing his head.

Myself.—How can that be? what reverence could an archbishop entertain for one like yourself or your grandsire?

Abarbenel.—More than you imagine. He was one of us, at least his father was, and he could never forget what he had learned with reverence in his infancy. He said he had tried to forget it, but he could not; that the ruah was continually upon him, and that even from his childhood he had borne its terrors with a troubled mind, till at last he could bear himself no longer; so he went to my grandsire, with whom he remained one whole night; he then returned to his diocese, where he shortly afterwards died, in much renown for sanctity.

Myself.—What you say surprises me. Have you reason to suppose that many of you are to be found amongst the priesthood?

Abarbenel.—Not to suppose, but to know it. There are many such as I amongst the priesthood, and not amongst the inferior priesthood either: some of the most learned and famed of them in Spain have been of us, or of our blood at least, and many of them at this day think as I do. There is one particular festival of the year at which four dignified ecclesiastics are sure to visit me; and then, when all is made close and secure, and the fitting ceremonies have been gone through, they sit down upon the floor and curse.

Myself.—Are you numerous in the large towns?

Abarbenel.—By no means; our places of abode are seldom the large towns; we prefer the villages, and rarely enter the large towns but on business. Indeed, we are not a numerous people, and there are few provinces of Spain which contain more than twenty families. None of us are poor; and those among us who serve, do so more from choice than necessity, for by serving each other we acquire different trades. Not unfrequently the time of service is that of courtship also, and the servants eventually marry the daughters of the house.

We continued in discourse the greater part of the night; the next morning I prepared to depart. My companion, however, advised me to remain where I was for that day. "And if you respect my counsel," said he, "you will not proceed farther in this manner. To-night the diligence will arrive from Estremadura, on its way to Madrid. Deposit yourself therein; it is the safest and most speedy mode of travelling. As for your Caballeria, I will myself purchase her. My servant is here, and has informed me that she will be of service to us. Let us, therefore, pass the day together in communion, like brothers, and then proceed on our separate journeys." We did pass the day together; and when the diligence arrived I deposited myself within, and on the morning of the second day arrived at Madrid.

This is a long extract; but, besides its air of the marvellous, it is profitable as a true picture of a class which certainly still exists in Spain, and in considerable numbers.

Through the prudence and friendliness of Abarbenel, the agent of the Bible Society entered Madrid in a more respectable guise than he had quitted Badajos. Pious frauds, as those tacitly allowed, if not actually practised on Jew and gypsy, Carlist or Christino, never seem to have troubled his conscience. He had his "Bible business" to serve, and was invariably of the politics of the parties among whom he was placed; and we should imagine, that if he did not occasionally tacitly conform to their religion also, he gave no sign of difference of opinion. Mr. Borrow established himself in Madrid with a very fat, grandiose landlady, who said of her large empty saloon and small chamber—"Did you ever see so magnificent an apartment? Last winter it was occupied by the great General Espartero!" Her second boast was of her son, Baltasar, who was a swaggering, vapouring tailor in the Nationals—intensely Spanish, though of the Gascon breed, and not a little amusing. Mr. Borrow had no letters brought to any individual in Madrid, which is somewhat singular, as the members of the Bible Society must have had some means of introducing their agent to influential persons in the Spanish capital. Thus left to his own resources, he took the liberty of waiting upon Mr. Villiers, to solicit his interest for obtaining an interview with Mendizabal, who, at the moment, enjoyed unbounded power. After shivering for three hours in the ante-chamber of the Minister, he was received upon the strength of Mr. Villiers' letter—and, behold! Mendizabal—

He stood behind a table covered with papers, on which his eyes were intently fixed. He took not the slightest notice when I entered, and I had leisure enough to survey him: he was a huge athletic man, somewhat taller than myself, who measure six feet two without my shoes; his complexion was florid, his features fine and regular, his nose quite aquiline, and his teeth splendidly white: though scarcely fifty years of age, his hair was remarkably grey; he was dressed in a rich morning gown, with a gold chain round his neck, and morocco slippers on his feet.

His secretary, a fine intellectual looking man, who, as I was subsequently informed, had acquired a name both in English and Spanish literature, stood at one end of the table with papers in his hands.

After I had been standing about a quarter of an hour, Mendizabal suddenly lifted up a pair of sharp eyes, and fixed them upon me with a peculiarly scrutinizing glance.

"I have seen a glance very similar to that amongst the Beni Israel," thought I to myself. . . .

My interview with him lasted nearly an hour. Some singular discourse passed between us: I found him, as I had been informed, a bitter enemy to the Bible Society, of which he spoke in terms of hatred and contempt, and by no means a friend to the Christian religion, which I could easily account for. I was not discouraged, however, and pressed upon him the matter which brought me thither, and was eventually so far successful, as to obtain a promise, that at the expiration of a few months, when he hoped the country would be in a more tranquil state, I should be allowed to print the Scriptures.

As I was going away he said, "Yours is not the first application I have had: ever since I have held the reins of government I have been pestered in this manner, by English calling themselves Evangelical Christians, who have of late come flocking over into Spain. Only last week a hunchbacked fellow found his way into my cabinet whilst I was engaged in important business, and told me that Christ was coming. . . . . And now you have made your appearance, and almost persuaded me to embroil myself yet more with the priesthood, as if they did not abhor me enough already. What a strange infatuation is this, which drives you over lands and waters with Bibles in your hands!! My good Sir, it is not Bibles we want, but rather guns and gunpowder, to put the rebels down with; and above all, money, that we may pay the troops. Whenever you come with these three things, you shall have a hearty welcome; if not, we really can dispense with your visits, however great the honour."

Myself.—There will be no end to the troubles of this afflicted country until the Gospel have free circulation.

Mendizabal.—I expected that answer, for I have not lived thirteen years in England without forming some acquaintance with the phraseology of you good folks. Now, now, pray go; you see how engaged I am. Come again whenever you please; but let it not be within the next three months.

The interval was occupied by "Don Jorge"—the style of Mr. George Borrow in Madrid—partly in seeing the sights of the capital; of which he thus speaks:—

I have visited most of the principal capitals of the world; but upon the whole none has ever so interested me as this city of Madrid, in which I now found myself. I will not dwell upon its streets, its edifices, its public squares, its fountains, though some of these are remarkable enough; but Petersburg has finer streets, Paris and Edinburgh more stately edifices, London far nobler squares, whilst Shiraz can boast of more costly fountains, though not cooler waters. But the population! Within a mud wall, scarcely one league and a half in circuit, are contained two hundred thousand human beings, certainly forming the most extraordinary vital mass to be found in the entire world; and be it always remembered that this mass is strictly Spanish. The population of Constantinople is extraordinary enough, but to form it twenty nations have contributed; Greeks, Armenians, Persians, Poles, Jews, the latter, by the by, of Spanish origin, and speaking amongst themselves the old Spanish language; but the huge population of Madrid, with the exception of a sprinkling of foreigners, chiefly French tailors, glove makers, and perruquiers, is strictly Spanish, though a considerable portion are not natives of the place. Here are no colonies of Germans, as at Saint Petersburg; no English factories, as at Lisbon; no multitudes of insolent Yankees lounging through the streets, as at the Havannah, with an air which seems to say, the land is our own whenever we choose to take it; but a population which, however strange and wild, and composed of various elements, is Spanish, and will remain so as long as the city itself shall exist. Hail, ye aguadores of Asturia! who, in your dress of coarse duffel and leathern skull-caps, are seen seated in hundreds by the fountain-sides, upon your empty water-casks, or staggering with them filled, to the topmost stories of lofty houses. Hail, ye caleseros of Valencia! who, lolling lazily against your vehicles, rasp tobacco for your paper cigars whilst waiting for a fare. Hail to you, beggars of La Mancha! men and women, who, wrapped in coarse blankets, demand charity indifferently at the gate of the palace or the prison. Hail to you, valets from the mountains, mayordomos and secretaries from Biscay and Guipuscoa, toreros from Andalusia, riposteros from Galicia, shopkeepers from Catalonia! Hail to ye, Castilians, Estremenians and Aragonese, of whatever calling! And lastly, genuine sons of the capital, rabble of Madrid, ye twenty thousand manolos, whose terrible knives, on the second morning of May, worked such grim havoc amongst the legions of Murat!

And the higher orders—the ladies and gentlemen, the cavaliers and señoras; shall I pass them by in silence! The truth is I have little to say about them; I mingled but little in their society, and what I saw of them by no means tended to exalt them in my imagination. I am not one of those who, wherever they go, make it a constant practice to disparage the higher orders, and to exalt the populace at their expense. There are many capitals in which the high aristocracy, the lords and ladies, the sons and daughters of nobility, constitute the most remarkable and the most interesting part of the population. This is the case at Vienna, and more especially at London. . . . . But with respect to the Spanish aristocracy, the ladies and gentlemen, the cavaliers and señoras, I believe the less that is said of them on the points to which I have just alluded the better. I confess, however, that I know little about them; they have, perhaps, their admirers, and to the pens of such I leave their panegyric. Le Sage has described them as they were nearly two centuries ago. His description is anything but captivating, and I do not think that they have improved since the period of the sketches of the immortal Frenchman. I would sooner talk of the lower class, not only of Madrid but of all Spain. The Spaniard of the lower class has much more interest for me, whether manolo, labourer, or muleteer. He is not a common being; he is an extraordinary man. He has not, it is true, the amiability and generosity of the Russian mujik, who will give his only rouble rather than the stranger shall want; nor his placid courage, which renders him insensible to fear, and at the command of his Tsar, sends him singing to certain death. There is more hardness and less self-devotion in the disposition of the Spaniard; he possesses, however, a spirit of proud independance, which it is impossible but to admire. He is ignorant, of course; but it is singular, that I have invariably found amongst the low and slightly educated classes far more liberality of sentiment than amongst the upper.

CHAPTER VII.

A GROUP of officers of the brigade were standing in the verandah, when Colonel Waldenberg joined them.

"Captain Osborne," said he, addressing one of the officers, "take a hundred of our best rifles, and advance to Bellgrove plantation. The surrounding country must be protected from the incursions of the Indians. I have made arrangements for your proceeding in canoes, so that you will not be fatigued marching through the forests."

Osborne bowed, and was retiring to issue orders, when Joolay came up, and catching him by the arm, dragged him into a corner.

"My dear fellow," said Joolay, with a most melancholy and imploring look, "I understand that you are proceeding to Bellgrove with a lot of your young chaps, to garrison the plantation."

"I am," said Osborne. "Do you go with us?"

"Can't get just now," said Joolay; "but tell Mr. Bellgrove that his son is safe. Please hand him that letter from his niece, which will explain all. Tell him we expect him here to-morrow. And I say, Captain, let the young chaps you take with you be the most steady, sober, cool-blooded fellows in your whole brigade."

"Why so?" inquired the Captain.

"You see," said Joolay, with a knowing look, "there are some fine nigger wenches about Bellgrove; and I beg, earnestly beg, Captain, that you'll issue a standing order, that your young fellows are not to meddle with them."

"You surprise me, Mr. Joolay," said Osborne.

"Oh! maybe I do," replied Joolay; "but you see, Captain, it looks horrid ugly to see a plantation peopled with mulattoes; and in that case, the overseer generally gets the blame. Now, my dear fellow, I've got a character,"—and here he laid his hand on his heart,—"and for my sake keep your young chaps well in. You understand me, eh?"

"You must issue the same orders here," said Osborne, laughing.

"No, no," answered Joolay. "You see there are no overseers here; so all the blame shall rest on the Cadets themselves."

"We shall see to it," said Osborne, as, turning to his brother officers, he told them Joolay's orders, which gave rise to much mirth, which was still farther increased as the overseer marshalled them to the dining-room, and, in absence of the lady of the mansion, did the honours of the table, boasting, in the most magniloquent terms, of his own military talents, and placing himself above all heroes ancient and modern.

Zada, in passing the door of the apartment, observed her brother enter, and heard him request of Joolay to allow him to return to Bellgrove with the canoes.

"No," answered Joolay; "Whackie and you stay here till I go. Gentlemen," continued he, addressing the officers, "there's a nigger for you—a rigglar wild-cat. Lord! if you had seen how he walloped the Indgines!"

The proud spirit of Zama could ill brook the contemptuous and haughty looks of the young planters, as they glanced at him, and with a proud look he folded his arms and returned their gaze.

"What a saucy, impudent dog," remarked some of them as they turned away.

"Ah!" cried Joolay, "he's a clever chap, Zama—worth a thousand dollars in any market: devil of a pity he's a nigger. If he'd been a white man, like me, he'd gotten on famously!"

Zama heard no more, for, turning on his heel, he suddenly left the apartment.

Zada followed her brother, and found him leaning against one of the pillars in the verandah, groaning in bitter agony of soul.

"Zama," said the affectionate girl, as she threw her arms around his neck, "Zama, what means this burst of grief?"

"Oh, Zada, can it be otherwise," he answered, leaning his forehead on her shoulder, "when I reflect that I am a slave."

"Then, my brother, look around you, and behold how many thousands, nay, millions of our race, are the same."

"That is the worst of it," replied Zama, bitterly; "for even were I free, the curse of Heaven would still cling to me, and the white man would despise and spurn me for my complexion."

"Oh! cease to talk thus," said Zada, reproachfully, "nor raise thy voice in vain upbraiding against that Power who made thee what thou art."

"Zada, my dear Zada," he exclaimed, "I have done deeds this day which, had my features been white, instead of Ethiopian dye, would have entitled me to esteem and honour. As I am, what have I gained by it? Insult and contumely! A slave I am—degraded, lost, dishonoured—a slave I must remain!"

"Alas, Zama, what wouldst thou be?" inquired his sister.

"I would be free, my sister—free as the eagle that soars o'er yon forest. Oh, God! how glorious the thought, that man should bend to nought but his Creator!"

"Ah, Zama, Zama, 'tis a wild and a vain thought. Look around you, and ask where is freedom to be found? Mark the young white men whom you envy so much: the greater number of them are compelled to toil through life like slaves, ay, worse at times than the poor negro they despise. Oh! Zama, I could tell you of some noble-minded youths, the sole support of helpless, aged parents, whose lives are gall and wormwood, bound to submit to every capricious whim, and every insolent word of brutal and tyrannical employers. They dare not murmur; for if they did, they would be driven to the world, without hope, without succour: yet with galled spirits, and broken hearts, they must submit and toil on. Contrast them with the poor negro: in many cases the latter has the advantage."

"What!" exclaimed Zama, angrily, "wouldst thou argue me into love of slavery? Art thou so fond of our degraded lot?"

"Not so, my dear brother," she answered; "but when I look upon young white females, who are dependent upon others, and who, to gain a morsel of bread, must submit to the vilest drudgery, and calmly bend to insolent and tyrannic pride, I have thanked Heaven that my lot was cast with one whom, next to my God, I honour and adore —my own beloved and loving lady! You tremble, Zama: have I offended you?"

"No, dearest—thy lady! Yes, love dwells in all around her—air, earth, and sky seem hallowed with her presence; let us talk no more of her, Zada. Alas! were I free, I'd seek for other lands where the tincture of my skin would be no barrier to bravery. I'd live a soldier's life, and seek a soldier's grave."

"A soldier's life, Zama!—a slave of slaves. Is not the soldier but the bond-slave of his superiors? I have often read and heard that the poor soldier is lashed, at times, worse than ever any negro was."

"What sayest thou to a sailor's life, then?" inquired Zama.

"The same objection that I have to a soldier's; but often more toil and worse usage," she answered.

"But it is only the vile and bad of them who are kept down," he argued.

"The same with the negroes," answered Zada. "'Tis only the vile and bad of them who suffer punishment. Didst thou ever behold a well-behaved negro punished? Did Mr. Bellgrove ever punish his negroes wantonly?"

"Never, Zada—never. He treats them as a father would his children."

"Then, Zama, repay him with the affection you ought, and repine not. Believe me, you will find the white man oftener in worse bondage than the negro ever could be."

"Cease, Zada—cease to talk thus!" exclaimed Zama, fiercely. "Thy reasoning can never remove the bitter sting of slavery which thou, and I, and all our hapless brethren writhe under."

"And which thy offspring and theirs must ever endure!" exclaimed a deep, stern voice, from beneath the verandah.

With an exclamation of terror, Zada clung to her brother, who looked around for the intruder, but could discover no one.

"We have been overheard, Zada. Retire; no one dare harm thee while I am nigh," said Zama.

A slight rustling amongst the shrubbery was now heard; and Zada, loosing herself from her brother's embrace, murmured—"Good night," and hurried to rejoin her mistress.

"Who, and what are you?" cried Zama, as a dark figure emerged from the shrubbery.

"An old friend and comrade," exclaimed the stranger, advancing.

"Thy name?" inquired Zama.

"PERAULT!" exclaimed the stranger, as he leaped over the balustrade into the verandah; and, catching Zama in his arms with a firm embrace, said—"Hast thou forgotten me!"

Zama returned the embrace with much cordiality, and expressed his joy at the meeting. "'Tis so unexpected," he said. "How came you here?"

"In the honourable capacity of guide to my master's horse," said Perault, with bitterness. I had not long arrived, and tired of attending on him who owns me, I strolled forth to hear the bull-frogs croak, and the locust and grasshopper chirp their vesper hymn. Hearing thy voice, I turned hither, and overheard thee repining at thy bitter lot. But where is Zada?"

"She was alarmed, and fled," answered Zama.

"'Tis a pity," said Perault, heaving a deep sigh; "a great pity that a girl so noble-minded as Zada, should be dragged forth to a public market, like a beast of burden, exposed to the view of the rude and vulgar, and sold to the highest bidder."

"What mean ye, Perault?" cried Zama, with a shudder, as he placed his hand on Perault's arm.

"And then," continued Perault, as if unmindful of the interruption, "to see the monsters feeling her joints, and passing their brutal jests on her; to behold her bathed in tears, looking with imploring eyes for succour!"

"Death and hell!" exclaimed Zama, as he clutched Perault firmly by the throat; "utter but another word in that strain, and by heaven I will strangle thee!"

"Stay, my friend, unloose thy grasp; I speak but of the fate of slaves," said Perault, as he gently relaxed the hand of Zama. "Are we not liable to be sold when it suits the whim of our masters? Suppose it should be thyself who stood upon the hated platform in the slave-market, how would thy haughty spirit brook the ruffian jests of the detested slave-dealers, and the disdainful looks of the haughty planters: to have thy good qualities bellowed out to the gaping crowd, and paced up and down like a horse for sale?"

"Perault, I give thee fair warning," said Zama, his voice quivering with rage. "Beware! and provoke me no farther."

"Then suppose 'twas I—Perault, the favoured slave amongst a thousand," said the negro, still urging his point. "I who am pointed out by the passers-by as the haughtiest slave in the city: how would I feel, stationed on the market platform, and the accursed placard o'er my head, 'For sale, Perault, an educated Negro?' Mark me, Zama! Colonel Waldenberg will soon be married to the lady of this mansion. Ha! you start at that? I, his favourite slave, will be discarded; Zada, thy sister—her favourite slave—will be given up. What have we to look to? The slave-market!—sold to some brutal tyrant! We are unfit for labour—the whip must force us on to toil! 'Tis a pleasing prospect, is it not?"

"In mercy cease this theme!" said Zama, faintly; "it sickens me almost to death!"

"Most gladly would I cease," rejoined Perault, "if thou could'st cause the slave-dealers to cease also."

"Alas! what can we do?" cried Zama.

"We are men," said Perault, "and can strike for freedom!"

"Only to meet with defeat and death," said Zama.

"Better to die in freedom's cause, than live in bands of slavery!" said Perault. "Now, Zama, suppose that fifteen thousand negroes were at this moment leagued to vindicate their freedom, and wrench the chains of slavery asunder—wouldst thou join them?"

"With heart and soul!" exclaimed Zama.

"Wilt thou be true and secret?" said Perault.

"Both," answered Zama; "or may my soul pay the forfeit!"

"Thy hand on't, my noble Zama! Then learn," —and here Perault's voice sunk into a stern, low whisper,—"I have stirred the negroes in the city on to revolt: full fifteen thousand, fully armed, await my signal to wrap the city in flames,—then seize the shipping, and escape to Hayti."

"You amaze and confuse me, Perault," said Zama, starting up. "What if this plot should be discovered?"

"Our plans are too well laid," answered the conspirator. "I have just now returned from Hayti, where King Christophe and his free negro subjects have already assigned us a rich and fertile portion of the island, and await with open arms our coming. Ha! my Zama, with fifteen thousand well-armed followers at our back, e'en King Christophe might tremble on his throne, and from the hills of Hayti the negroes' name might ring throughout the western world!"

"I am so confused," said Zama, "that my very brain seems swimming round."

"A new light hath burst upon thy mind," replied Perault; "a field of fame and glory lies before thee. The seeds of sedition are sown throughout the whole plantations, and scarcely a family in the city, or for miles around it, but have their negroes in the plot. Even on this plantation, and on Bellgrove, there are parties in it."

"Perault," said Zama, "I cannot consent to this. I will not, cannot harm my good, kind master; and Miss Bellgrove,—so young, so lovely. No, Matilda; no—that cannot be."

"So ho! friend Zama, sets the wind in that quarter? What, injure her? No; for thy sake she shall be safe. Nay, more, Zama, what will prevent thee carrying her off to Hayti? Trust me, were she once there, and none but negroes around her, she would cling to one who could, and would protect her."

"Cease, Perault, cease!—I feel fatigued and sick at heart. To-morrow we will talk of this."

"To-morrow, at day-break, meet me in yonder citron grove. Good-night, Zama,—dream of liberty, power, and love!" So saying, he parted from Zama, who, with swelling bosom, sought the apartment of Joolay; but finding that he was still carousing with the young officers, he left the care of the overseer to Whackie, and retired to the apartment allotted to himself.

CHAPTER VIII.

"How do you feel after yesterday's work?" said Captain Waldenberg to his friend Galliard, as they met on the banks of the Wandoo.

"Confoundedly fatigued, I assure you," answered Galliard; "and I have been annoyed all morning with that chatterbox of a negro of mine, who arrived with the rest of our servants last night."

"What, Tom? he is a genuine negro dandy!" said the Captain, laughing.

"Yes," said the Lieutenant, laughing; "too much so. The rascal makes free with my clothes on all occasions: gives his tea and supper-parties too. I caught him, a few nights ago, figuring in a dress-coat of mine; and when I swore at him for it, the fellow grinned in my face, and told me 'he hab a ball and a card-party in de ketchen, an' he mos' look like a genelum for my credit!' I could have kicked the scamp out of the room!"

"You are too easy with him, Galliard. But, heigho! it's the fault with us Carolinians,—we allow the rascals too much liberty. By the by, how are you going to kill time here? for it seems we'll not kill aught else, since the Cherokees have taken leg bail."

"Suppose we take a look at this plantation, and see how it thrives under petticoat government?"

"Agreed; and, in the first place, we'll take a peep at the negroes and the pigs."

Arm in arm, the two friends sauntered past the negro huts. Some were neatly painted white, and the windows green; while around others the vines, the jessamine, honeysuckle, and the Mexican rose, were trained, so that the huts looked like lovely bowers. In front of each was a neat garden-plot, decorated with orange, pomegranate, and fig trees, while the beautiful shady pride-of-India trees, threw their canopies in front of the entrances. Hearing the voices of children proceeding from one of the larger huts, the friends bent their steps thither; and looking through one of the low windows, witnessed a scene which excited their mirth. The hut was one of those where the children of the negroes are committed to the charge of the elder females during the space the parents are at work—a sort of juvenile negro-school, where the old negresses inculcate the greater part of the moral education which the negroes ever receive. In this hut were assembled about a score of little blackies, the eldest of whom would not be above five years of age. All were dressed in short frocks of clean white Osnaburg, and their round chubby faces bore the very look of happiness.

It was their breakfast hour, and the little ones were all busy at their messes of hominey and molasses, while the old negress was sipping her coffee in a corner by herself. One little urchin had seized upon a large pot full of hominey, into which he had poured a double allowance of treacle, and was defending his possession against other two little negroes who stood close by him with wooden spoons, looking most indignantly at the little glutton, as he sat with the dish between his legs, and eating with all possible speed—now and then knocking aside the spoons of the excluded members of the mess, as they vainly endeavoured to partake with him.

"I take some hominey wid you, Billy?" said one of the urchins, as he set himself down coaxingly at the side of the devourer.

"No!" cried the young rascal, with a growl, such as a dog would salute a canine friend with, which, self-invited, wished to partake of a bone. "No!" and he grasped the dish firmer, and whisked his back to the proposer.

"Mumma Wenus say we mos' take our breakstuff wid you," said the other, flourishing his spoon, and making a dive at the hominey.

"No!" cried the selfish rogue, as he filled his mouth, and grasping the dish closer to him, twined his legs around it.

"You no gone for sup him all, Billy?" said one of the boys, with a melancholy whine.

"Iss I is!" cried Billy, whisking himself round again.

The two young urchins perceiving that Billy was resolved to maintain his illegal possession, instantly resolved to deprive him thereof by a summary process. Seizing him by the shoulders, they endeavoured to drag him from the dish; but Billy would not untwine his legs, till one of the little negroes hit him a smart rap over the shins with his spoon. A sharp struggle now ensued; but Billy, finding he was likely to be defeated, exclaimed,—"No, you no get none! You sup him now?" cried he, with a chuckle, as he thrust his dirty foot into the dish.

"Oh! you nasty beast!" cried the two boys.

Billy, too eager on his revenge, had forgot that the hominey was hot, and, with a loud yell, he hastily drew his foot back, severely burned.

"Wot's de matter now?" cried the old nurse.

"He Billy, ma'am!" responded one of the boys.

"Wot is Billy do now?" inquired she.

"He put him foot in de hominey, ma'am, to keep Coopid an' me from sop wid him."

"Oh! de dorty dam leely blagart!" exclaimed the nurse, flouncing round in her chair. "Bring me dat dere cowskin!"

The boys started forward, and presented the dreaded cowskin to the nurse, with more awe and reverence than ever minister of state presented a sceptre to his liege lord.

"Come here, you leely dorty piccaneeny!" cried the nurse, as she shook the cowskin at the culprit.

"I can't come, ma'am!" whined Billy.

"Why you no can come, eh?" inquired she.

"'Cause I bu'n my foot!" he whined. Billy, however, was forced to limp up.

"Down on you knees, Sar," said the nurse; "if you cry one single word, I flog you ten time more. Now, you leely boys and gals, see what nigger boy get for put him foot in hominey." Whack-whack-whack. "Hold you tongue, you leely blagart!" Whack-whack-whack. "Now, Sar; ax pardon of leely Coopid and Bacchus for spoil him breakstuff, an' say you no spoil em hominey an' molasses no more."

Billy obeyed orders, and was dismissed with an application of the cowskin, which made him run off, forgetful of his burned foot—as he rubbed the affected part most strenuously.

Laughing heartily at the old dame's method of administering justice, the two friends turned from the hut, and observed a handsomely-dressed female in one of the gardens, conversing with some negro children, who were training the tendrils of some vines, so as to form a porch over the garden gate. "There's an elegant figure," exclaimed Waldenberg. "I have never seen a female form of more beautiful symmetry!"

"Suppose we accost her," said Galliard. "Oh! we're too late; there she goes into the hut. What a noble gesture she has! Come, Captain, I don't care if we call on the negro 'Massa' of the next hut, to see this damsel."

With hasty steps they approached the gate, and entered into the garden. "Who lives here, my girl?" said Galliard, to a happy-looking little negress.

"He Mumma Kattey, Sar," answered the girl, dropping a curtsey: "Mumma Kattey been werry sick for long time, an' we come for help she."

"Is there a lady with her just now?" inquired Galliard.

"Yes, Massa; he Zada wid him—jost gone in," answered the little negress.

The friends advanced towards the hut, but hesitated to enter.

"I am glad you are getting better, Mumma," said a soft sweet voice, which sounded on the ears of the young men like the notes of a mellow flute.

"Tankee, Missee Zada," answered the old invalid; "I is get betta; tanks for you kindness, an' my good sweet lady."

"She is coming to see you, Muma," said the sweet voice again.

"La, yearee dat!" exclaimed the old negress. "Has my sweet Missee got betta so soon, and come for see I?—well, I is glad!"

"She is quite recovered, and quite happy now," said the damsel.

Galliard and Captain Waldenberg now entered the hut; and both drew back with surprise, when Zada, startled at their appearance, looked round.

"'Sdeath! its only a negress!" exclaimed Galliard, peevishly.

Waldenberg, who instantly noticed the regularly formed features of the girl, said, half bantering, "Ah! my lovely girl, can't you withdraw the dark veil that covers those beautiful features?"

Zada stepped back—her large eyes kindling with indignation as she answered—"When the officers of the Cadet Brigade can act like gentlemen, then the poor negress may change her colour!"

Both the young men keenly felt the rebuke, and the blush of anger and shame rushed to their cheeks. Galliard bit his lip as he haughtily said—"The Cadet Brigade respect your whole sex—no matter what the colour may be."

Here the old crone struck in with a "Yeh! you two imperant buccra wagibone, wot you mean; who send for you here, eh? Get along wid you."

"Nay—nay, Mumma, don't be angry; we only come to ask for you," said the Captain, laughing.

"Wot you know 'bout I—eh?"

"Oh! we heard you were sick, and came to give you a dollar or two, to buy something nice to cure you."

"An' wot I buy on de plantation—eh?"

"You can send to town for what you want."

"My Missee gib me all I want, and I no need you money, Sar!—Much oblige to you, tho'."

The sound of voices approaching the hut caused Galliard to turn, and he hastily addressed Waldenberg:—"Here we're fairly caught—here comes Perault and another negro: no doubt your brother and the rest are here also."

Perault and Zama now entered the hut, and both looked with surprise on the two officers. Perault bent a keen glance at Waldenberg, and another at Zada, and his lip curled with a disdainful smile.

"You are surprised at finding us here, Perault," said Galliard.

"Not so," answered Perault, in a smooth sly tone, while he shrugged up his shoulders. "Wherever a sweet-tongued female is to be found, 'tis a sufficient lure for young gallants!"

Zama started, and cast an angry look at Zada, then exchanged glances of deep meaning with Perault; while Galliard and Waldenberg felt as if they could have knocked him down. A loud cry of alarm from the garden now attracted their attention, and one of the negro children rushed into the hut, shrieking, "Obi! Obi! hide me—hide me!"

"Hush, child!" said Zada, as the little one rushed into her arms. "Obi will not harm you."

An aged personage tottered into the hut. The stranger was dressed in a long, flowing dark robe, and the face was almost entirely enveloped in a large dark shawl twisted like a turban, and veil; part of the forehead was exposed, and bore a deep scar in the centre.

"We are going to have a snug family party, I see," said Galliard. "Are you coming, Waldenberg?"

The Obi uttered a piercing cry, and reeled towards the door, exclaiming, "Waldenberg, said he?"

"What ails the old hag?" said the Captain. "Here, Obi, tell me my fortune!"

"Mercy—mercy! spare me!" shrieked Obi, rushing from the hut.

"Plague take the frantic fool!" exclaimed the Captain.

"Allow me to follow the silly wretch," said Perault, and he hurried after the Obi, whom, after a smart chase, he made up to, and caught hold of the fancied charmed dress.

"I am innocent! I am innocent!" shrieked the Obi, falling at the feet of Perault.

"Fool! arise: who talks of guilt?" said Perault. "Answer me this: when did'st thou hear from Woonah?"

The Obi fell prostrate, and exclaimed, "Spare me—I will tell all!"

"Look up," said Perault; "behold one of thy tribe! By the mark on thy brow I know thee. Behold! I bear the same. Rise, thou art safe!"

Trembling and fearful, the Obi arose, and with timid looks gazed on the mark on the brow of Perault.

"Be satisfied," said Perault; "but, mark me! thou art surrounded by danger here. Hie to thy dwelling: give me the clue to find thee."

"In the deep shade of the forest, about three miles from this, stands a lone hut. It is in that direction," and he pointed westward. "There Obi dwells, lonely and unprotected."

"I will meet thee there at midnight. Place a torch in thy window to guide my footsteps through the swamp. Alone I will come. I wish thy advice, good Obi, in a matter interesting to all our poor negro race. 'Tis against our hated oppressors. To-night I will meet thee. Away!" So saying, he turned, leaving the Obi to wend through the forest.

Perault had not proceeded far on his return to the plantation, till he observed the Colonel and Mr. Joolay approaching. With a deep muttered curse, he turned from the path, and perceiving a small gate which led into the garden, pushed it open and entered. Here the sound of female voices caused him to pause, when, observing Miss Bellgrove and Letia on the footpath, he again turned, and ascended an artificial mound, around which a winding footpath led to the summit. The mound was covered with the rarest and most brilliant shrubs and flowers, and even the eye of the discontented conspirator wandered with delight over the fairy scene. At length he reached the summit, and gazed with rapture on the glorious landscape, which lay stretched like a map before him. At a short distance from him stood the mansion-house, embowered amid orange and citron trees, from the dark green leaves of which, the golden fruit burst forth, and glittered in the morning ray, while clumps of myrtle and roses diversified the lovely scene; farther on lay the negro huts, surrounded by their beautiful gardens; while the orange, mulberry, pomegranate, and fig trees, united with the spreading pride-of-India in forming a grateful and a pleasing shade: here the high cocoa and the palm-tree, threw forth their crested heads, towering proudly over the other trees. Again his eye rested on the clearings, in which the negroes were scattered in small groups, hoeing the soil; where the bright green leaves of the cotton shrub, diversified with its lovely flowers, looked like a sweet garden. Wandering from these, his eye rested on the broad expanse of the noble Wandoo, its banks spread with rice-grounds, from which the green crop was waving; and, in the back-ground, lay the boundless dark forest and its dreary wilds. Various and conflicting feelings arose within the bosom of Perault, as he looked on the fair scene before him. Shouts of laughter from the negroes, mingling with their gay songs, came on his ear; while the richest perfumes arose from earth's rarest flowers, and floated richly on the luxuriant balmy gale.

"Here, at least," said he, "my unhappy race have met with peace. 'Tis a pity that a spot so fair as this should be polluted by the breath of slavery. When the volcano bursts o'er nature's brightest scenes, does it feel for the lovely vine yard it destroys? No: when the burning lava rolls on its fiery course, earth's gayest gardens and its proudest palaces, are wrapped remorselessly within its blazing, wild embrace. I will yet lead those bands to happier lands, and fairer scenes than this; and they will soon forget this spot, over which the angel of destruction now hovers."

CHAPTER IX.

At the entrance to the garden, Letia and Matilda met Waldenberg and Joolay.

"Ha! my beauties," cried Joolay, "there you are. Letia, my charming little laughing gipsy, I'm glad to see you. Your father told me last night you were almost dead; don't wonder at it; fearful work yon!" and Joolay shook his head, and looked as grave as an over-laden donkey.

There was a vast contrast in the rough salutation of the overseer, and the polished address of the Colonel. Nowhere is there deeper homage paid to the fair sex than in Carolina; and Colonel Waldenberg threw into his manners all the deep devotion of the friend and the admirer. To both, his looks and language were apparently dictated by the feelings of refined delicacy; and it was only in the soul-telling glance, and the more softened expression of the countenance, as he turned his eyes on Matilda, that one could read the emotions of his heart.

Conversing on the events of the foregoing day, they rambled onward; when the sound of lamentation arose on their ears, and a young negro girl was seen sitting beneath a pomegranate tree, weeping very bitterly.

"Sally," said Miss Bellgrove, "why do you weep thus?"

"Oh! ma'am," sobbed the girl; "I been insulted, ma'am!"

"I'll take a bet," said Joolay, "that some of these young wags of yours, Colonel, have been making love to that wench."

"You tell falsehood, Massa Joolay," said the girl, rising indignantly. "I tink more ob myself, dan listen to the young buccra genelem. Oh! Missee, he Haman insult I." And she again fell a-crying.

"Haman," said Matilda; "he is a sad rogue! What new mischief has he been about now?"

"He make song on me, ma'am; and make all de niggers laugh at me. I shall cry myshef to death, so I shall!" And she gave evident tokens of her suicidal intention, by roaring most grievously.

"He is always making songs on somebody," said Matilda. "You know, Sally, he makes them even on me; but you should not cry so—laugh at him; and when he finds he can't vex you, he will compose no more songs on you."

"I can't laugh, ma'am," sobbed the girl, "when he cause—my Joe and Jim go fight about me—and all de rest—stan' by and laugh at 'em."

"Why, Sally," replied Matilda, "you keep these two poor fellows continually fighting; you should marry one of them, and then you would live quietly and happily."

"Oh no, Missee!" said the girl, with an indignant toss of her head; "nigger girl may hab two sweetheart as well as white lady. And if Joe and Jim go fight for me, I know some white genelem do de same for white lady, and fight far worser."

Matilda's face flushed with shame and displeasure; and Colonel Waldenberg felt the blood tingling in his cheeks, at the impertinent remark of the negress; while Joolay, with a loud roar of laughter, bellowed,—"Capital! capital! keh, keh, keh! Colonel, that's a hit at you and Maitland fighting a duel about a certain lady. Oh, Lord! the idea of you two being compared to two niggers! ha, ha, ha! two niggers fighting a duel! keh, keh, keh!"

"Mr. Joolay," said Waldenberg, with tones most bland, while his eyes were sparkling with fury, "there are ladies here, whom common sense—I talk not to you of good breeding—might teach you to respect."

"Phoo! my dear Colonel, it's all a joke. None of your honey and arsenic words to me: mixing sweets with poison won't do. Miss Bellgrove, I'm a most unlucky dog; when I get merry I'm just like the donkey dancing amongst the eggs—always sure to do some damage; so just forgive and forget, my darlings!"

"Oh, Missee!" cried Sally, starting up, "dere is dat imperant wagabone, Haman, come here; do gib him good scold."

"I'm not very good at that work," said Matilda, while she smiled at the earnestness of the girl. "But here is Mr. Joolay; and we'll hand Haman over to him."

"Is that the nigger that made me run after him yesterday?" said Joolay, "and then sung a blasted nigger song about me, because I couldn't catch him? If it is the same Haman, I'll serve him out in style: by the hookey, I'll do to him as old Queen Esther's husband, Ahasuerus, did to Haman of old."

"Nay, nay," said Matilda; "Haman is a good and faithful negro: he is a natural improvisatore; and his songs and satires keep us always in humour. The negroes dread his satirical songs more than they would do your whip. Here he comes, and a stranger with him."

"A stranger!" cried Joolay; "blow me if it isn't a rigglar nigger dandy!"

"Bless me!" exclaimed Letia, "who is that?"

"That is Lieutenant Galliard's valet, negro Tom; a negro dandy of the first water," answered Colonel Waldenberg, smiling; "but he seems wonderfully zealous, and excited in his language and gestures; don't let us interrupt them;" and the Colonel, along with the party, walked into another path. Tom's loud tongue, however, was going as if it had been swung in the middle; and the conversation of the two negroes was distinctly heard.

"I tell you wot it is, my good friend, Massa Haman," said Tom, "you is a most complete genises."

"Genesis?" inquired Haman; "wot you call dat?"

"Lor! how ignoram you is," responded Tom.

"Genisse, my dear Sar, is de French language for —dam clever fellow!"

"Is he?" said Haman. "'Pon soul, I tink you is flatter me!"

"De language ob de heart, Sar, is not de flattery," said Tom, "as Massa Shakimpear say."

"Shakimpear?" inquired Haman; "who nigger he is?"

"Gor Ormighty!" exclaimed Tom; "you no know Massa Shakimpear? I no know wheder him was buccra or nigger; but him make play. See him often. Him dead now. Him was die at New York ob yellow fever!"

"Poor debil!" ejaculated Haman.

Tom's sketch of the life of Shakspere fairly upset the gravity of the company who overheard it; and the ladies had given way to the most uncontrolled laughter when the cause of their mirth, arm in arm with Haman, suddenly confronted them. His appearance was nowise calculated to allay their merriment; and even Joolay joined in the loud laughter, as he examined the negro's dress, and exclaimed, "Dash me, if ever I saw a nigger maccaroni before! Keh, keh, keh!" And he chuckled long and loudly. And Tom was a buck —a leading dandy, of the first water, and a flash-swell of the negro world, of the city of Carlville; and the dress with which he had adorned his elegant person (for Tom thought himself the most fashionable and handsome negro on earth) displayed the refined taste of this sable Adonis. His unmentionables were white, and fitted tight to his shape, displaying his cucumber legs and bullet calves to great advantage; while a pair of buff boots, with huge white tassels dangling in front, completed his nether sheathing. Next came a flaming red vest, from the open bosom of which a plaited shirt-frill, of most formidable width, obtruded like a chevaux de frize. Next came a bright red high stock, sticking tightly under the chin, elevating his face to the skies, as if he scorned to look on the earth, and was watching the firmament; then, on a level with the eyes, arose the shirt-collar, from each side of which appeared the countenance, looking like a singed sheep's head; then came a very light-coloured blue coat, exceedingly short in the waist, and excessively long in the tails, which tails dwindled away to the sharpness of a boatswain's marlinespike. On his woolly pate a small hat was most jauntily fixed to one side, and over the shoulders of the coat appeared a flashy red ribbon, which sustained a quizzing-glass of huge dimensions. To complete the effect, Tom carried in his hand a dashing, purple stick, ornamented with a huge brass head, from which was suspended a red worsted cord and tassel. Tom, on approaching the parties, raised his hat, with refined elegance, between his finger and thumb, and, bowing and scraping, as if his back-bone went on a spring, gently murmured, "Your slave, ladies! Genelem, your sarvant!"

"Well, Tom," said Colonel Waldenberg, "what has become of your master?"

"Massa is follow my example, Sar," responded Tom; "him is spend him time to de best advantage."

Haman had stood grinning at Joolay, who was muttering some hard oaths between his teeth at the negro. Matilda, being apprehensive of an outbreak from Joolay, addressed Haman very gravely.

"I am sorry to hear that you have been insulting poor Sally. I will not suffer this; so, Haman, you must take care in future."

"Lor! Missee," said Haman, "I no insult Sally. Dat gal keep de whole plantation in uproar wid her sweetheart. When white genelem quarrel about dere sweetheart, dey go get pistol, and shoot one anoder decene like; but when nigger quarrel about dere sweetheart, Goley! dey break 'em hoes ober one anoder heads, and put de plantation to expense. Now, dat no do; so Sally must behave heshef. Sally hab bow-leg Jim, and knock-knee Joe, for sweetheart, and dey fight like de berry debil about she: so I compose song on 'em. You like for yearee de song, Missee? Stop I tune my bango!" Without any farther prelude, Haman struck his fingers on a little African drum which he carried, and sung with great glee:—

Our wench Sally
  She hab two beau,
Dere's bow-legged Jim
  And knock-knee Joe.
To win dis gal
  To dere embrace,
Poor Jim and Joe
  Would try a race.
Jim couldn't run,
  For tread him toe!
De skin rub off
  De knees of Joe!
Oh! Sally look sad,
  And cry at de disgrace,
Dat neider Jim nor Joe
  Were made to run race.

The ludicrous grimaces, and uncouth contortions of the features, with which Haman sung his song, would have convulsed any one with laughter; but Tom's laughter surpassed all bounds, while his cry of "Debelish good!" at the conclusion, made the ladies look very grave, and put Joolay into a rage.

"I say, you nigger dandy," said the overseer, "where was you catched?"

"Me, Massa? I neber was catch,—I neber run away," answered Tom.

"Indeed, it's a pity for your master! Where did you get your breeding?" inquired the overseer.

"Oh! Sar, I citizen ob Carlville. I born and bred in de city. Always move in de first society," and Tom drew up his shirt collar a little bit higher.

"Indeed," said Joolay—"I thought you had belonged to some grog shop, seeing you had the bottom of a dram-glass in your bosom."

"Lor, Massa, you is surely blind!" exclaimed Tom, as he glanced at a large crystal ornament, stuck at one side of his shirt-frill; "dat is breast-pin, Massa. He is genooine diamond, Sar; him was present from king in Africa to ancestor ob mine."

"To hang at his lovely flat nose, I suppose," said the overseer. "I wish I had the drilling of you for a week; I'd teach you more than ever you saw in the city."

"I hab great many fashional acquaintance dere," said Tom. "Can't leave 'em."

"Indeed," said Joolay. "I'd like to introduce you to my horse-whip. You'd be in close terms of intimacy, I assure you."

"I cut such connexion, Sar!" rejoined Tom, most indignantly.

"The connexion would cut you, I'll be bound!" cried the overseer.

Zada, accompanied by her brother, now approached them, and the eyes of the girl beamed with delight as she looked at her mistress.

"Well, Zada, love!" said Matilda; "how did you leave Muma Katey?"

"She is getting better," answered Zada, "and overjoyed,—as, indeed, we all are,—at your recovery."

"And you, my brave Zama," said Matilda; "have you recovered from your fatigue?"

Zama started. His eye wandered restlessly over the features of the lady; but, afraid to trust to his tongue, he bowed lowly to her, sighed, and turned away. While Tom, raising his quizzing glass to his eye, stood admiring Zada, who stared at him as if he had been a wild beast newly caught.

"Ha!" said Joolay, "here comes Captain Waldenberg and Lieutenant Galliard. Massa nigger Dandy Tom, you'd better sneak off, I guess."

Young Waldenberg and Galliard now joined them; and Galliard was chagrined and enraged on beholding the grotesque appearance of his valet. Calming his passion, he paid his devoirs to the ladies; then, turning to Tom, said, "I have some business for you, Tom—follow me."

Tom raised his hat from his woolly head, grinned, and bowed to the ladies, and followed his master. After walking a short distance, so as to be out of hearing of the company, Galliard turned suddenly round,—his face was glowing with anger.

"You infernal black mountebank," he exclaimed; "am I ever to be annoyed with your cursed folly? Who equipped you in that ridiculous garb? Confound you, Sir, you look more like a ring-tailed monkey than a human being!"

"Ring-tail monkey!!" exclaimed Tom, in alarm, as he receded a pace or two, and anxiously drew his hand down his back. "Oh no, Massa, you joke. I no got no tail!"

"Where did you get that mountebank dress?" said Galliard angrily.

"Lor! Massa," rejoined the negro, "dis dress be de werry height ob de fashion. He all for you respecability, Massa, dat I was dress so gonteel."

"My respectability, you impudent dog!" exclaimed Galliard, as he snatched the stick from the negro's hands; but Tom, more mindful of his ornaments than his person, cried out,

"Take care, Massa. Lor Amighty! you break my cane!"

"Return instantly to the house," continued Galliard, "and put on your livery. If I catch you out of your livery dress again, I'll cane you while I can stand over you."

"You is wery kind, Massa," growled Tom, with a rueful look; "but I is suffer enough already."

"Begone," said Galliard, throwing him a dollar, "and obey my orders."

"Wid werry great pleasure and moch joy," said Tom, as he picked up the coin, bowed, and walked off.

Galliard looked after him, and laughed to see the alacrity with which Tom walked along.

"I cannot find it in my heart to use him ill," said Galliard; "though he often deserves it. Had I not been accustomed to him from my earliest infancy, I would sell the rascal, to get rid of his plaguy conceit and impudence."

Turning, he again joined the ladies and their party.

"Come away, Mr. Galliard," cried Joolay; "I'm just proposing a turn round the plantation. The Colonel and Miss Bellgrove are for a private confabulation, Miss Norrisville has seized hold of Zada, and Captain Waldenberg is quite sulky at going alone—so come along, my boy; you'll bear him and me company. You are two young stout fellows; so let an old man like me hook in between you." So saying, he seized hold of the two young officers by the arms, and dragged them along with him.

"You are in a hurry, gentlemen," cried Matilda. "Recollect you must all appear at the dinner-table."

"No danger of forgetting that," cried Joolay; "I'm the very one, I guess, to remind 'em of it. Come with me, Zama, and leave your sister and Miss Norrisville together."

"With your permission, Sir, I will watch at the landing-place for Mr. Bellgrove," said Zama, bowing.

"Quite right, my noble fellow," answered Joolay. "Dash me!" he continued, as Zama went away, "I would not part with that nigger for his weight in gold."

CHAPTER X.

"And now, Zada, that I have got time to speak to you," said Letia, "I must know what has been the cause of cousin Matilda's long illness. After I received your letter I could not rest till I saw her."

"You must know, then," answered Zada, "that last season in the city was uncommonly gay, and my young lady took the lead in all parties of pleasure. Colonel Waldenberg was her constant attendant, and she latterly accepted the offer of his hand. While preparations were making for the marriage, young Maitland arrived from Havannah, where he had resided for some time, and, being a very intimate friend of my lady's, renewed his acquaintance with her."

"But I do not recollect of hearing of Maitland before," said Letia.

"You have doubtless heard of old Tenda, the wealthiest merchant in town?" said Zada.

"The old miser?" answered Letia; "I have often heard of him."

"Old Tenda had an only daughter named Laura," continued Zada, "who, being her father's reputed heiress, was surrounded by many suitors; her affections, however, were placed on a young man, named Maitland, who acted as her father's head clerk. Young and foolish, they, in an evil hour for themselves, were privately married. It could not be long concealed; and old Tenda was transported with fury at the discovery. He drove his unhappy daughter from the house, and dismissed her young husband from his employment,—at the same time holding out threats of vengeance against any merchant who dared to employ the young man. Maitland was thus driven to ruin and beggary; and his young and delicate wife, almost broken-hearted, found a sad change in her lot. Ah! Miss Letia, there are many fond hearts who think that this earth is all joy and rapture; and when led astray by love's magic power, fancy life's path strewed with roses. Viewed with the eyes of fond affection, what a world of pleasure this appears! Love's overruling power can make the desert bloom like the fairest garden; but, oh! when the chilling blast of adversity sweeps o'er the heart, the gay hopes, the fairy visions, all vanish; and stern reality shows that this earth is only a place of pain and suffering."

"Fy, fy, Zada," said Letia; "can you not fancy, that when two fond hearts meet they become all in all to each other?—sharing in each other's joys, lightening each other's sorrows. What is the world to them, when they are all the world to each other? Peace, hope, happiness, find their abode within those loving hearts, and heaven itself spreads its lasting sunshine within such bosoms. Life like this, my good Zada, is but a foretaste of Paradise: cheered by each other through life's pilgrimage, their own pure hearts their safest guide, love and joy continually surround them; and when the journey ends, those loving hearts are blended for ever in the realms of the blessed."

"I could fancy such," said Zada; "but, alas! such only exists in fancy. Hearts such as you describe, must be formed of more than mortal mould, and are totally unfitted for a world of sorrow like this. So it fared with Maitland and his young bride: they had looked upon the world as a place formed only for love and joy; they found it one of misery and oppression. Filled with pity at the sad fate of the young pair, some kind friends exerted themselves on their behalf; but all they could do was to obtain a situation of trust for Maitland in Cuba. Accompanied by his wife and a faithful female domestic, Maitland sailed to Havannah, and shortly after their arrival Laura gave birth to a son."

"I suppose," said Letia, "that this son is now Major Maitland."

"The same," said Zada. "Shortly after the birth of young Maitland, the yellow fever broke out in the island, and among the first of its victims was his father. Poor Laura! it was with difficulty she was dragged from the dead body of her husband: the shock was too heavy for her already broken spirits. A few hours after her husband's death she was a lifeless corpse; and within one grave the unhappy pair were laid to lasting rest."

"And what became of their son?" inquired Lara.

"Immediately after the death of the parents, the infant was taken charge of by the domestic they had taken with them. With difficulty she obtained a little money, and took her passage to Carlville with the child. On her return she waited on old Tenda, vainly thinking that, as the unhappy cause of his hatred was gone, he would have compassion on the helpless offspring of his daughter. She told her sad tale to the flinty-hearted wretch, who coldly answered, 'I reared my daughter like a princess: she had her marble palaces, and their gilded halls to dwell in,—she had a thousand obsequious slaves, crouching at her every beck,—she had unbounded wealth at her command,—and, more than all, she had a fond and doating parent's love to rely upon. She stooped from her state—she spurned her father's love—fled from his protecting care, and threw herself into the arms of a beggar! What could she expect? If ruin, beggary, and destitution followed, who brought them on her? It was herself—not I. I would have made her the first in the land: she brought herself to nothing. And who was the object of her choice? A man whom I had taken to my confidence, and who was depending on me for his daily bread. I was his friend, his benefactor. I nourished the viper till it stung me. He robbed me of all my heart held dear—repaid my kindness with black ingratitude. What could she expect at my hand?—what could he look for? And do you think that this child, the offspring of such ingrates, will receive from my hand more than its parents did? Woman! if so, you are mistaken.' He rose, and would have left the place; but the faithful woman, nothing daunted, placed the infant at his feet, and answered—

"'If that poor child's parents wronged you, you have punished them to the death. Vengeance should not extend beyond the grave. There lies the infant, stretching out its little arms to you, its sole protector. Behold in it the features of your own once lovely and beloved daughter,—a daughter whom your cruelty hurried to an early tomb.'

"'Silence! woman,' cried Tenda. 'Begone! and take the brat with you.'

"'Never,' she answered, 'shall my hand remove the poor infant from those who are bound to protect it.'

"'Take up the child, or I will toss it from the window!' cried Tenda, in a fury.

"'Yes!' said she, 'and kill it as you killed its parents.' She turned, and was leaving his presence, when, in a furious rage, he stooped and rudely snatched up the infant. Its lovely, soft eye met the enraged glance of Tenda: his heart thrilled, and his passion seemed calming, as he stood rooted to the spot, gazing on the babe, who, sweetly smiling, stretched out its little hands to him, and, throwing its little arms around his neck, nestled its cheek on his bosom. Tenda was overpowered. With a convulsive sob he pressed the infant to his breast; and tears, such as Tenda had not for many a year shed, fell fast from his eyes upon the fair head of his infant grandson."

"And so," said Letia, as she wiped the tears from her own eyes, "this was Maitland's first introduction to his hateful grandfather. The old wretch! was he kind to the poor child?"

"He was," answered Zada; "and the boy grew up, and became the idol of all who knew him. His life, however, was one of mingled joy and grief, and his spirits were sadly crushed by his grandfather. At times the old man would fancy, that in the looks and gestures of the boy he again beheld his beloved and unhappy Laura; and in those hours the old man's fondness knew no limits. If the boy smiled on another but him, the old man got churlish, and upbraided him, alleging that he had all his mother's ingratitude. If the proud spirit of the boy was aroused by these insults, and he dared to reply, then the old man discovered in the fiery glance, and the bold words of the boy, the looks and language of his unhappy father, and with curses would drive him from his presence. At length the old man resolved on sending young Maitland to England for his education; and at that time Mr. Bellgrove invited the youth to spend some time at Myrtle-grove previous to his leaving America. He came; and a number of young friends were likewise invited to enliven the time. We were then mere children, but I recollect as well what happened then as the events of yesterday. Young Waldenberg was one of the party—Colonel Waldenberg I mean, for his younger brother, Captain Waldenberg, lived with an uncle in the State of Georgia, from whence he has but recently returned. Nothing could be more opposite than the characters of Waldenberg and Maitland; the former was the ringleader in all mischievous frolics; the latter, sensitive, mild, and gentle, shy of mixing among the youthful party around him. Maitland spent his time in lonely rambles through the forest, and along the banks of the Wandoo. The whole plantation was often thrown into alarm by his absence at nightfall; and, after diligent search, young Maitland would be found seated beneath a fig-tree or spreading pride-of-India, listening to the tales of African warfare from the lips of some aged negro. One incident I recollect well: A number of the boys had gone out to shoot. They had not gone far from the mansion-house when a shot was heard, which was instantly followed by a lamentable cry. On reaching the spot, we found Waldenberg binding up Maitland's arm, from whence the blood was freely flowing. It appeared that Waldenberg, hearing a fluttering amongst some myrtles, levelled his fowling-piece; and Maitland, perceiving a pair of lovely turtle-doves in the bush, rushed between them and the gun. The gun went off, and part of the shot struck Maitland in the arm, while the rest killed one of the poor doves. Careless of the wound, and with eyes streaming with tears, the gentle boy lifted the dead dove, and strove to bring it to life in his bosom.

"'I had watched them so long,' he sobbed, 'and the poor things seemed so fond of each other, always sitting on the same myrtle branch, partaking the food from each other's bills, and so soft and beautiful were their fond, plaintive cries! I would rather have lost my life than injured them. It is of no use to cherish it,' he said, as he drew the dead dove from his bosom. 'Poor thing! it is quite dead.'

"The surviving bird was fluttering around the bush with melancholy notes, calling on its mate, till, perceiving the dead bird in the hand of the boy, it flew fearlessly towards him, and, alighting on his hand, gently pressed its bill to that of the dead one, and with faint cooings seemed anxious to wile it away. We were all affected at the sight. Every effort to drive the survivor away was answered with its plaintive, fond cry, as it clung to its dead partner.

"Weeping bitterly, Maitland carried both the birds to the mansion-house, and tried all that he could to separate the living from the dead; finding this impossible, he placed them together, and in a few hours afterwards the bereaved one was seen walking anxiously around the other; then it paused, and, stretching its wings over it, fell.—Poor thing! It gave one faint cry, and dropped dead by the side of its partner. Young Maitland exclaimed, 'They reminded me of my poor parents;' and he wept as if his heart would have broken.

While he remained on the plantation, he was adored by the whole of the negroes; every one of their histories he knew, all their little griefs were freely confided in him, and his heart and purse were alike open to every call of humanity. At length he was recalled by his grandfather, and many a bitter tear was shed at his departure. The negroes mourned it as a general loss, and old and young poured their blessings on him. But if it was a sad parting with us, it was still worse when old Tenda came to bid him farewell. Even at parting the old man found fault. He accompanied the boy to the vessel in which he was to sail, and chided him for the alacrity with which he ascended the side of the ship, alleging it was ingratitude, and displaying an anxiety to get away from him. When the moment came to part, and Maitland threw himself into the arms of his grandfather, the old man folded him closely to his heart, and wept like a child. With difficulty they removed him; but after leaving the vessel he remained upon the wharf, wringing his hands, and exclaiming, 'He's gone. I'll never again behold him. So like Laura, too. Why did I part with him?' There he stood, wrapped in bitter grief, till the ship crossed the Bar and her masts disappeared in the distance. He returned to his halls again; they seemed deserted and dreary. He glanced his eyes around his apartment; they rested on a portrait of his ill-fated daughter, taken when she was a happy child; he turned from it, and glanced towards a portrait of his grandson,—the striking resemblance of the two portraits to each other completely overpowered him. He sunk into a seat and remained for some time overwhelmed with grief; then starting up, commanded his slaves instantly to fit out the swiftest sailing packet-boat, and pursue the ship—promising a thousand dollars to any one who brought back his grandson. They obeyed—the boat sailed. All that night the old man slept not. Next day, he paced up and down the beach; in vain did his servants entreat of him to take rest and food. Night came on—the boat returned. Vain effort!—the ship was too swift for them.

"From that hour Tenda became a changed being—avaricious, grasping, greedy, and oppressive! The city became filled with stories of Tenda the Miser. He heeded them not. Years rolled on, and the glad tidings came that young Maitland was returning. Old Tenda was almost mad with joy. He was seen hurrying through the streets. His sole cry was, 'He is coming back!—he is coming back!'

"At length the vessel which bore young Maitland entered the bay. The old man grew almost frantic when he beheld the signals of the vessel flying. From the highest verandah of his house, he looked upon that splendid expanse of water, with its lovely scattered islands. A boat was seen launched.

"'I see him!' cried Tenda, starting up. 'Fly, slaves—welcome him!—welcome him like a prince returning to his territory!'

"He sunk back into the arms of his attendants, overpowered with excess of joy. Hasty steps were soon heard. The loud and joyous cries of a host of slaves announced the approach of their much-loved young master. The entrance to the verandah was thrown open, and Maitland, springing forward, caught the old man in his arms. Tenda gave a feeble cry as he sunk on the bosom of his grandson. He raised his head, and looking fondly on the face of the youth, murmured, 'Image of my murdered Laura!' drooped his head upon the shoulder of the young man.——Alas! the excitation of his feelings had proved fatal to the old man; and in that fond embrace he sunk a lifeless corpse!

"The death of his grandfather was a severe shock to the feelings of Maitland, who loved the old man sincerely; nor could the possession of his immense wealth blunt his grief. Immediately after his grandfather's funeral, Maitland arranged his affairs; and finding himself the sole heir to old Tenda's estate, sailed to Havannah, where he erected a splendid monument over the grave of his parents; thus paying them the only tribute of filial affection that was left in his power.

"On his return to Carlville, his society was much sought after; and, among others, he renewed his friendship with Miss Bellgrove. There was little change in his generous heart. Accomplished as he was, he seemed still the same generous and affectionate youth, who had risked his own life to save that of a poor turtle-dove, and who had wept tears of unavailing sorrow over it.

"Every attention and honour which could be paid to him was shown. The young Cadets elected him one of their body, and the public voice soon named him Major of the Brigade. Many a mother thrust her daughter in his way; but Maitland seemed cold and distant to them: he sought a heart to match his own. Mild, sensitive, and gentle, he soon found there were very few such. The outward glare of accomplishments pleased him not; he sought something deeper—the refined mind, the intellectual soul."

"Surely my cousin did not act the coquette with him?" said Letia.

"Heaven forbid she should be so heartless a character," exclaimed Zada; "she esteemed him as a true and sincere friend. But mark the result. One night at the assembly, Major Maitland was paying the most marked attention to my lady, when Colonel Waldenberg entered. He advanced towards Miss Bellgrove, and seemed violently agitated. He paused, and turning to his servant, Perault, addressed a few words to him. Perault bowed, and left him. He then advanced, and without taking any notice of Major Maitland, bowed haughtily to Miss Bellgrove, and made a few sneering remarks on the company. My lady felt annoyed, and replied very coldly, and immediately after rose to dance with Major Maitland. The Colonel suddenly left the room; and, in a few minutes afterwards, Perault entered, and requested a private conversation with the Major. They retired, and immediately thereafter the company were alarmed by the report of pistols; and a cry arose, that Major Maitland had been assassinated. Miss Bellgrove was carried home in a state of insensibility; and next morning it was reported that Maitland had died of wounds received in a duel with the Colonel, who had fled. Doubts were thrown out as to the fairness of the duel; and the Colonel was openly branded as a murderer. Unable to look upon her friends, my lady retired to Myrtlegrove, and prohibited all intercourse with the city. She became completely changed, sad, and heart-broken; and being desirous that some friend should be near her, I wrote to you, without her knowledge, pressing you to come. What has occurred since, you know as well as I do. But, see," exclaimed Zada, as she pressed Letia's arm—"see, here comes Colonel Waldenberg's favourite slave, Perault, of whom I spoke."

"He is a noble-looking negro," said Letia, as she gazed on the conspirator as he approached. "He is splendidly attired, too," she added.

"Yes, Miss Letia," said Zada; "but the gaudy skin conceals the poisonous snake."

With folded arms, and wrapt in deep thought—his eyes bent steadfastly on the ground—Perault approached them. He raised his eyes, and perceiving Letia and Zada, started, and seemed confused. Instantly recovering himself, he advanced, and, with a low salaam, said—"Your servant, lady." Letia bent her head, acknowledging his courtesy, when Perault, looking at Zada, said—"You have a lovely abode here. It is a fitting paradise for an angel like your lady." And he bowed again to Letia.

"This is my lady's cousin—Miss Norrisville," said Zada.

"Indeed," said Perault, "there is a strong resemblance, then. I took the lady for Miss Bellgrove, the mistress of this heavenly spot." So saying, he bowed low and passed them.

"He is very polite," said Letia.

Zada smiled as she answered—"Flattery always sounds agreeable. Satan himself gained Eve by flattery: and Perault is a villain. I like him not."

CHAPTER XI.

Whackie was discussing the merits of a cold roasted fowl, with some sweet-potato bread, and sassifrass beer, when an order to attend Mr. Joolay caused him most reluctantly to suspend his operations.

On entering the overseer's apartment, Whackie beheld Joolay enveloped in a cloud of smoke, puffing away at a cigar, with a brandy bottle before him.

"Whackie," said Joolay, looking at him, "I think you are an honest, good fellow."

"Werry much so, Massa," answered Whackie, chiming in with the encomiums on his own character.

"So, as your master will not be here till this evening, I mean to retain you near my person," added Joolay.

Whackie gave the overseer a rueful and bewildered look, as he inquired—"Wat you gone ado wid I, Massa Joolay?"

"Make you my own servant," answered the overseer, with an air of importance. Whackie looked as if he would have declined the honour intended for him.

"You see, Whackie, we are going to dine with the young ladies to-day," continued Joolay.

"Tankee, Massa," grinned Whackie.

"And," said the overseer, "there will be a band of these young whelps of Cadets dining with us, and they'll be telling some tarnation cracks about their shooting, and so on; now, you are a favourite with them—"

"Much oblige," grinned Whackie.

"So," added Joolay, "I must tell some things too, for the credit of our own plantation; and, if I say you saw it—never mind what it is—swear that it 's a fact."

"Yes, Massa—fac', Massa!" was the answer of the apt scholar.

"Now, Whackie, here's a glass of brandy for you," added Joolay.

Whackie gave a broad grin, showing his teeth from ear to ear, like white keys on a black hurdy-gurdy, as he took the glass, swallowed its contents, and, with a long gasp for breath, handed it back to Joolay.

"Is that good?" inquired the overseer.

"Capal! werry nice!" answered the negro, smacking his lips.

"And now, Whackie," said Joolay, in a languishing tone, "how do I look to-day?"

Whackie fidgetted about, and scratched his head, as if loath to answer.

"Come," said Joolay, "don't be afraid; speak out. How do I look—eh?"

"Dam ugly, Massa!" was the earnest response of the unsophisticated negro.

"Out, you baboon!" cried Joolay, starting up in a fury.

"Beg pardon, Massa!" cried Whackie, stooping to avoid the kick aimed at him; "you looka bootiful—neber see you look betta in all a life."

"Guessed so myself," said Joolay, as he resumed his seat, highly pleased with the somewhat ambiguous flattery of his servant.

"Now, Whackie, go and get the loan of a livery coat, and come back and help to rig me out."

Whackie bowed and departed.

The second dinner-bell had rung, and Joolay, followed by Whackie in his borrowed plumes, bustled into the dining-room. On entering the room, Whackie uttered a very audible "Lor', Massa—how grand!" The guests were all seated; and at the back of every third chair stood handsome negroes, gorgeously apparelled, holding long fans of brilliant feathers, which they waved gently from side to side, to prevent the insects, which buzzed around, from annoying the company, and which, at the same time, gave a delicious coolness to the air. The table groaned beneath the display of massy plate. The walls of the apartment were painted so as to seem a beautiful garden, and the ceiling to resemble the sky. Glancing his restless eyes along the brilliant draperies of the apartment, the overseer at length looked towards the head of the table, where sat the fair hostess. A murmur of admiration burst from his lips as he beheld the change in her appearance. Her eyes were sparkling with joy; and the peachy bloom on her cheek, gave to her features a more than earthly beauty.

"Ah! Mr. Joolay," said she, "you are late—be seated." Colonel Waldenberg motioned him to a seat beside himself. "Come, Mr. Joolay," said he, "you must support me at this end of the table." Joolay bowed, and stepped forward to the chair, when his eye encountered the rich Mameluke dress of PERAULT. The overseer started. "I have seen that dress before, surely?" he muttered. He gazed on the features of Perault most earnestly; but the calm dignified look, and the full dark keen eye of the negro, as he returned the stern scrutiny, puzzled and bewildered the overseer.

"The sight of that fellow makes my head ache!" said Joolay. "Blow me, if I don't think it was he who——" Here Joolay filled up the sentence by rubbing his cranium—took another fixed look at Perault, and then sat down.

"You seem to admire my servant, Mr. Joolay," said the Colonel; "have you seen him before?"

"Is that your nigger?" said Joolay, as he pointed to Perault. "I say, Blackie, did you ever see me before—eh?" and Joolay put on a tremendous look.

"We have not met that I am aware of, Sir," said Perault, with a somewhat contemptuous smile; "and your face is one that cannot easily be forgotten."

"Is it?" said Joolay, bitterly. "It's better than your ——— black mug, any how!" The overseer was on the point of bursting into a fury; but Captain Waldenberg perceiving the storm arising, dexterously diverted Joolay's attention to something else; when the door was thrown open, and Haman, with a stentorian voice, sung out—"Here be a stranger, Genelum."

"Bid him enter, and welcome," answered Matilda.

A tall gaunt personage, with a pale meagre face, and attired in a suit of rusty black, entered; and making a stiff and awkward bow, stood at the door, as if amazed at the display before him, hesitating whether to advance or retire. "I am afraid," he said, "that I am intruding on the company: I am a stranger."

"The stranger is ever welcome to the halls of the Planters," answered Matilda. "Be seated, Sir, and consider yourself at home. Haman, attend the gentleman." R. K. R.

HOWITT'S RURAL AND DOMESTIC LIFE OF GERMANY.

As a work of information, the superiority of Mr. Howitt's picture of the Germans consists, almost wholly, in those sketches which a protracted and intimate social intercourse with the people whom he describes, enables him to make. He has not only travelled in their country, but been domesticated among them en famille. He has, moreover, transferred the love of rural life, and the fondness of old customs and usages, which distinguished him at home, to the land of his temporary sojourn; and this imparts gusto to his homeliest pictures. The state of literature, and the literary tastes of the Germans, naturally excited the curiosity and interest of Mr. Howitt. From a late statist we learn, that ten millions of volumes of one sort and another, issue every year from the prolific press of Germany; and yet, with this immense shoal, the Germans, according to Mr. Howitt, are not a literary people. It is alleged that they know little of the great living poets of Britain, and nothing of our long list of female writers. But Mr. Howitt may have drawn his conclusions from narrow premises, and have been unfortunate in his acquaintanceship among the ladies. It would be quite possible to plunge into many a circle of affluent and respectable people in the metropolis of England, in which there were no tokens whatever of literature, beyond, perhaps, a number of Boz, chiefly admired for the illustrations. Ten millions of volumes, allowing many of them to be schoolbooks, and trash, does suppose a considerable body of readers, among whom there must be many women. But if the German ladies may not be the intellectual companions of their husbands and brothers, it is allowed that they are kind and affectionate domestic companions, and most notable housewives—though there may be too much of that last good thing; and they are satisfied without expensive pleasures, huge parties, splendid dresses and equipages, and all the wasteful and unsatisfying dissipations of a more luxurious society. We quite agree with Mr. Howitt in an opinion in which, indeed, all modern travellers are at one; namely, that the simple and unexpensive manner in which the Germans, and all continental nations, entertain their friends, and pass their social evenings, might be introduced with infinite advantage into England.

A simple cup of tea at six o'clock, music, perhaps a dance, and then a simple supper of sandwiches, slices of sausage, a potato or other salad, a cake ornamented in various ways, but generally a sponge, a chocolate, or a fruit cake, a snow tart, with a few bottles of cheap wine,—these form the staple refreshments of those social evenings, which break up about ten or eleven o'clock.

The young people on these occasions amuse themselves also with a vast variety of games which in England would be thought to be adapted rather to children than grown-up people, but which, however, occasion plenty of mirth, and indicate a state of society much more homely and ready to be pleased than ours. Among these stand eminent in favour "Die blinde Kuh," the blind cow; another name for Blind-man's buff. They have various other games of forfeits. They write romances; each person furnishing a sentence without knowing what is written before him, so as to produce the most ludicrous medley. They put down the names of their acquaintances, each adding, without knowing to what name it is attached, a character, a circumstance, and what the world thinks of it; which, when read aloud and in connexion, produces, through the oddest combinations, great merriment. They write questions and answers on separate strips of paper, which being hustled together and then read, the answers falling to the questions as it may happen, are generally very amusing. They have various card-plays of the same nature, chief amongst which stands Black Peter, which consists in a pack of cards being equally divided amongst the company, and those which are of equal numbers being thrown out. He who is first out becomes the holder of a burnt cork, with which he makes a streak on the face of him or her who is found at last with Black Peter or the Knave of Clubs. The dislike of receiving this mark, especially by the ladies, and the different whims of making mustachios, whiskers, strokes down the nose, and so on, by the inflictor, produces all the fun. They have a game also with flour, equally popular. The young people sit round a small table, on which a basinful of flour, tolerably hard pressed, is turned out on a plate, and on its top is laid a ring. Each person cuts a slice from the flour with a knife, and he or she at whose cut the centre flour falls, has to take the ring out of it with his or her mouth. This generally gives a very mealy visage and much laughter.

Happy are the people where whole companies can amuse themselves with such simple usages. The worst custom, however, of German social life, is that in evening parties of dividing the married from the unmarried, and often the men from the women. This is a custom now much gone out in the higher circles, but still very prevalent in all general society. You enter a house, the young and unmarried of your party are shown into one room, you are conducted into another; the ladies get round one table, the gentlemen round another. The women talk of the gossip of the day; knit and talk of their knitting, of their servants; and the gentlemen of politics, or the like. Nothing is so admirably contrived as this old-fashioned practice to destroy all the advantages and pleasures of social intercourse.

This old-fashioned usage, originating in contempt of the sex, and the implied idea of its inferiority, prevails more or less over all the north of Europe. We find it eloquently reprobated by the brilliant author of the Letters from the Baltic, as the uniform custom of the Province of Esthonia. But it must give way; and in this particular instance it may hold, that one useful social reform, instead of progressing upward, must descend from the higher classes. The well-educated English, who, next to the French—if not, indeed, before them—best understand the charm of the mixed society of men and women, naturally detest the rude custom which drives the men into smoking knots, and the women into either lively gossiping or languid knitting circles. The German young ladies have an institution equivalent to that to which the American fair give the imposing name of Dorcas Societies—institutions which are sometimes found highly favourable to gossiping, if that be not indeed their main business, though, in a secondary way, they may be of some small social advantage. In Germany, too,

There are tea, coffee, or chocolate parties, where only ladies are admitted; or where, as in the second, only young unmarried ladies are admitted. Here the young ladies boast that, freed from the restraint of men's presence, they can laugh and chatter to their hearts' content. In their meetings the women can talk on womanly affairs; if they are fond of books, can have one read aloud to them; can discuss matters of domestic arrangement, and so on. But we have heard it whispered, out of school, that those meetings are the least in the world dull, and that the grand topic of discourse is the badness of servants.

Of German servants we may here say a word. The genuine German maid-servant is one of the most healthy, homely, hard-working creatures under the sun. Like her fellows who work in fields, barns, and woods, she is as strong as a pony, and by no means particular as to what she has to do. She wears no cap or bonnet at home or abroad. Has a face and arms as stout and red as any that our farm girls can boast; and scours and sweeps, and drudges on, like a creature that has no will but to work, and eat, and sleep. She goes to market with bare head, and in a large cloak. She turns out on a Saturday afternoon, with all the rest of her tribe, with bucket and besom into the street, and then, about three or four o'clock, makes a perilous time of it in the city. Before every door, water is flowing, and besoms are flirting the dirty puddle about. Each extends her labours not only to the pavement, if there be one, but to the middle of the street; so that they are, in fact, the city scavengers. German housewives complain dreadfully of their maids; but the maids themselves certainly lead hard and most laborious lives, such as our servants would not do. They address you with a sort of family familiarity which would be thought strange in England, but yet without anything like insolence, and are much more willing than English ones. You are not afraid, as you are in England, and especially in the neighbourhood of London, that, at any order to do their work properly, they will turn and say, "If I can't give satisfaction, I beg you to suit yourself with another." The worst of them is, that their German mistresses are accustomed to be so much with them, and give them immediate orders for the doing of almost everything, that they have seldom any idea of doing anything but what they are then and there told. They seem to act rather than to think, and to follow orders rather than to exercise foresight; so that, with English mistresses, they are continually letting out fires, leaving things uncooked, and committing similar negligences, totally because they live under the direction of their German mistresses, with no occasion to exercise their heads at all, but merely their hands.

On the other hand, German servants have customs and privileges that would astonish both servants and mistresses in England. They have their public balls, and their invitations to the tradesmen's balls. These they expect to attend just as much as they expect to have their daily food. At least twice in the winter is stipulated for. They have carriages sent to fetch them and bring them back, and go off as smart as their masters and mistresses would. The girls have their ball books, wherein to enter their engagements for the dance, just as well as any of their young ladies, and in short, for these evenings are as much ladies as the best of them. At the burgher balls, the maid-servants will often dance with some of the most respectable young tradesmen, and of course feel no little proud of it. An English housemaid whom we brought to Germany with us being about to return again to England, we were surprised to find that the nurse-maid had made her a parting present of a ball-book, the said housemaid never having learned a step in her life, and never being likely to require her ball-book when in England.

The conduct of servants, as well as everything else in Germany, is kept strictly under the surveillance of the police. Each servant is furnished with a character book, which contains all legal regulations respecting servants, and the engagements between them and their employers, being quite a little code of menial service. In this book, when a servant leaves his or her place, the master or mistress writes his or her character. This book is then laid up at the police-office, and before a servant can procure a fresh place this book must be fetched, and the character written in by the party whom the servant is leaving, and the book with all its characters must be taken to the party with whom the servant wishes to engage. Thus a powerful check is kept on the conduct of servants, and it is not easy for a bad one to get employ, or to avoid the sharp notice of the police-officers.

Amongst the domestic festivals, the chief besides those noticed, as Christmas-eve, New-year's eve, &c., are birthdays and Verlobungen, or betrothals. Betrothals in Germany are much more marked and ceremonious things than in England, and in former years were much more so. When money matters had to be settled, dowries, and so on, these were all settled at this time. Now, much of the formality is done away, and it is a pleasant family festival to which the friends are invited. Here the fact of the betrothal is announced by the father, rings are exchanged by the lovers, each containing the name of the party presenting it. The friends congratulate, and drink the health and prosperity of the betrothed. Betrothal cards are sent out to the whole circle of acquaintance, and in many places the betrothal is formally announced in the newspapers. We have before noticed the ceremonious distance at which the young of both sexes keep in public, not even walking arm-in-arm on any occasion.

The betrothed pair may not be married for years—nay, for many years, after the ceremony takes place which sets them apart from all others, and destines them to be one. Mr. Howitt finds them a little too loving for general society. They stand together, they sit together, they talk together, they sometimes kiss and coo a little on the sly, and totally forget Sandy Rodger's exhortation, "Behave yoursel' before folk:" though we cannot help thinking that this tabooed condition has its advantages; and that betrothal is among the very best forms of "the prudential check;" keeping the heart pure, hope alive, and the affections warm. If, as has been said by a sage, "courtship is the happiest period of life," these protracted courtships—courtships without anxiety, have much to recommend them. Instead of seeing the lovely girls of England pining and passing into old maidenhood, consumed with "a green and yellow melancholy," one might be brought to tolerate the too lively demonstrations of the betrothed fair of Germany; though they seem to have been at times too much for the sufferance of Mr. Howitt. If custom schools our young ladies to the suppression of every natural emotion, and to high and even heroic endurance, it is yet to be questioned whether they are really the better, as they are certainly not the happier for their enforced stoicism.

The conduct of the girls would often surprise our English damsels, who are taught to keep their loving and cooing at home, and to go out for the general amusement. One girl, the daughter of our landlady, used to amuse us by carrying this folly to the most extraordinary height. When invited to our parties, she would station herself in the room opposite to the door, and thereon fixing her eye in anticipation of the lover's arrival, you might speak to her a hundred times, but would obtain no other reply than—"Was!" "Wie!" or "O ja!" or "O nein!" Whether the beloved youth was absent or present, she had neither ears, eyes, nose, nor mouth for anybody, or anything else. If he were not present, and the company were requested to be seated, she reserved a chair for her swain, and warned every one away from it, even the master of the house. This must seem very extraordinary to English eyes, but used to attract very little notice here.

Birth-days are joyful days. A party of friends is invited to celebrate the birth-day. The dining-room is adorned with garlands, and a splendid garland, sometimes in the shape of a lyre, is hung at the head of the room. Presents are made to the person whose day it is. These are generally laid on the breakfast-table by the person's plate, and form an agreeable surprise on entering the room. Garlands of beautiful flowers, in spring, often wholly of violets and their green leaves, are sent in by friends. These garlands you will often see hanging in houses as grateful memorials of the affections of friends; yes, even in palaces, as grateful memorials of the affection of the people. They who have visited the palace of San Souci, at Potsdam, will recollect seeing some very beautiful ones there, which had been sent in on the birth-days of the king and queen by the neighbouring people. . . . . Perhaps even a still more affecting tribute of this kind is yet to be seen in the house of an old schoolmaster near Hanua, where the walls are almost covered with the garlands which have been presented by his scholars through a course of no less than fifty years. On the supper table is sometimes found a cake in the centre, with as many wax-lights burning round it on the dish as are the years of the person celebrated. This has a very beautiful effect. At the dinner, or supper, which is more generally the meal, the health of the party is drank with clinking of glasses and much jubilance.

But the general family festivals in Germany are the Silberne and Galdene Hochzeit, or silver and golden marriage; that is, the twenty-fifth and the fiftieth anniversary of married life. These are kept with great festivity, much in the manner of birth-days; and in the instances where the latter is arrived at, the whole circle of acquaintance is anxious to be there, as an occasion which, to the aged pair, can never possibly come again. It is a sort of anticipatory farewell.

A pleasing feature in German social life is the language of flowers. This, which is quite extinct with us, is with them as real and poetical as in the East. They have written and printed this language, and it is carefully used or avoided in all presents of nosegays in the little bouquets presented in dancing cotillions; and it extends itself even to colours, some of which, to us lively and pleasing, are to them expressive of violent or hostile qualities. Red and yellow are expressive of pride and state. Thus the flowers and ribbons introduced into all their nosegays, and the bushes which they hang out on all occasions of festivity, days of national or other joy or triumph, have all their precise, and to them very significant, language,—as the tree adorned with flowers and ribbons, set up on the roof on the covering in of a new house; the garlands which they suspend on the little crosses on the graves, and the garlands of the bride, and the funeral. Garland-making is a distinct trade; and you see these expressive and poetical ornaments borne through the streets in all directions, by the makers, to the houses where they are ordered. By following one of these to the place of destination, you could, without asking a question, perfectly satisfy yourself that there a marriage, a birth-day, or a funeral, was about to be solemnized; and in the latter case, whether the deceased were a man, or woman, or child, whether married or not.

Having dwelt at such length upon the domestic life and social customs of the Germans, as they are delineated in our agreeable and instructive guide, we have little space left for his characteristic sketches of the capitals and the University towns, or the fashionable watering-places, nor even for the remarkable scenery of the country, which was examined during a leisurely family tour. Instead, therefore, of matters which have been discussed by numerous Travellers, we reserve our space for what is not to be found elsewhere, and is ever interesting—namely, descriptions of eminent living men. At Stuttgard the tourists visited the studio of Danecker, but the artist it was no longer unmingled pleasure to see; and criticism on Art does not strike us as Mr. Howitt's forte, though his perceptions of the beautiful cannot be false. Danecker, since deceased, was then in extreme old age; very feeble but not imbecile. The next specimen is more truly German; for the aged sculptor, Danecker, might have been of any country—

The next visit in Stuttgard which gave us the most pleasure, was to Gustav Schwab, one of the most hearty and popular of the living writers of Germany. Gustav Schwab is a Protestant clergyman, and a perfect specimen of "Der gute Swaben." He has written poetry, history, and much miscellaneous literature, all characterized by great talent and kind-heartedness. He seems particularly to delight in whatever does honour to his beautiful native state Würtemberg. He has described in graphic colours the interesting region of the Swabian Alps. He was the friend of Hauff, the young and popular romance writer, who was cut off too soon for his own full fame and the public enjoyment. We found Herr Schwab inhabitating a large old-fashioned parsonage, and just returned from delivering his forenoon sermon. He received us in the heartiest manner; and, in truth, you saw at the first glance more conspicuously his native good cordial-heartedness, than his poetical character. He is about the middle height, broad built, with a reddish face, very round brown eyes, and a deal of rough, short, straight grey hair. He entered from a side door, with a profound bow and a wondering air; but when we made our explanations, he welcomed us in the warmest manner, and in a few moments we were talking of Hauff, of Lichstenstein, of Swabia, of poetry, as if we had been acquainted for years. He took us into his study; a large old room full of books, and ornamented with a bust of Hauff and a portrait of the poet Uhland. He introduced us to his daughter, and to his wife; the latter, to all appearance, a genuine German housekeeper. He appeared delighted to learn that I had translated, in "The Student Life of Germany," one or two of his Student songs, in particular his "Bursche's Departure." He told this to his wife with great animation, saying to us, as he pointed to her, "There is the Liebchen of the song!"

The old-fashioned university town of Tübingen is not only a good specimen of the true German town of the olden time, but the residence of Uhland, which gives it a double claim to the attention of a literary visiter—

It is sweetly seated by the Neckar, in an opening in a range of hills that stand in the level country; has steep streets, an old castle, an old University, (a new and splendid one is now building,) old houses, an old-world-looking set of long-haired students; an old inn, with old looking-glasses set aloft on the walls for giants to look into them, but quite out of the reach of ordinary men; and an old table d'hôte, where some of the oldest-fashioned and blacksmith-looking people were assembled that we ever saw, all of whom we were assured were noble, with some young men, also noble, part of them being modern and fantastic, and part antediluvian. But in this town, which has educated numbers of the most celebrated men in Germany, and has stood many a siege and storm in the stormy times of the nation, lives Uhland, one of the oldest and one of the finest lyrical poets of his country. Like his town and townsmen, Uhland has somewhat of an old-world look. He has never travelled much from home; has a nervous manner, and that the more remarkable in a man who, as a member of the Würtemberg parliament, has distinguished himself as a bold speaker and maintainer of the most liberal principles. In consequence of his very liberal political creed, he has now withdrawn both from the chamber and from his professorship in the University; and possessing a competent fortune, devotes his life to life's happiest, and one of its most honourable pursuits, that of poetry. It has been said of him, by a witty townsman, that he is a genuine nightingale; to be heard and not seen. But this is a little too severe. Though somewhat plain in person, and fidgety in manner, these are things which are speedily forgotten in the enthusiasm of intellectual conversation. He lives in a house on the hill-side overlooking the Neckar bridge, as you go out towards Ulm. Above lie his pleasant garden and vineyard, and hence he has a full view of the distant Swabian Alps, shutting in with their varied outlines one of the most rich, beautiful, and animated landscapes in that pleasant Swabian land. His wife, a bright-looking cheerful lady, came in from the garden with her work-basket, in which was an English edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, which she had been reading. She appeared well used to society, and very well read and intelligent. They have no children, but have adopted a very pretty sharp boy as their foster son. Uhland, indeed, appears to lead a happy and independent life here. Happy in his amiable and sensible wife, who highly admires his genius, and in the midst of his native scenes, to which, like all Swabians, he is much attached, and enjoying throughout Germany a high and firm reputation.

Uhland has rarely attempted any poems of much length. His forte lies in lyrical harmony, and felicity of expressing the poetry of human life and of the national taste. Simplicity, elegance, and imaginative essence, eminently characterize his productions. In simplicity he often reminds you of Wordsworth in his small poems, as his "Lucy Grey," his "Ruth," his "We are Seven," &c.; but unlike Wordsworth, he is never metaphysical. . . . . Uhland's "Der Wirthin Töchterlein,"—the Landlady's Daughter,—is a perfect specimen of truest pathos in the extremest simplicity. It is set to music as purely simple, and is sung and played with enthusiasm all over Germany.

The ramble onward by dorf and Schloss is varied and charming; yet we must resist its fascinations in all save this one instance. The travellers had passed the night at a primitive German dorf, and been roused at five o'clock by the watchmen chanting Luther's Morning Hymn from the church-tower, ere they took their way to Ulm;—

A lovely morning it was, and a lovely country we were in. Pleasant hills, covered with the most attractive woods, through which we walked at leisure; fields with far-off views; people busy in their corn; free airs blowing over us, and as we reached an open eminence what a startling surprise awaited us. It was the Alps! Filling the whole horizon to the south, they stretched themselves into the blue ether, and glittered and flashed their eternal snows in the morning sun like the very hills of heaven. The sight was so sudden, so totally unexpected, so overpowering in its beauty and silent sublimity, that after an exclamation of astonishment we stood rooted to the spot in indescribable emotion. There needed no inquiry to learn what they were, though we had no idea that such a pleasure awaited us before we reached Munich—the magnificent features of that glorious mountain region were not for a moment to be mistaken. The feeling they inspired was too peculiar and exciting to be ever again effaced. . . . . At this moment we could not be less than sixty English miles from the nearest point of this great mountain range, and more than twice that distance from some of the chief peaks which were visible.

Some parts of the territory of Catholic Germany are as much distinguished by misery and beggary as the States of his Holiness the Pope. Crosses and shrines of the rudest sort, and troops of impotent beggars, importunate and loathsome, form an unpleasing contrast with the luxury of the capitals. But these are a far way off. Parts of the kingdom of Bavaria are in a very prosperous condition; while its capital is a very treasure-house of modern Art, created by the taste and munificent patronage of the King. Those who consider the encouragement of the Fine Arts as at best but the secondary duty of rulers in a country where much remains to be done of the solid or utilitarian kind, will not be able fully to participate in Mr. Howitt's extravagant admiration of the King of Bavaria and his magical creations. Among these the Tourist seems to have been in some danger of losing himself; so we are content to fall in with him again, after the excitements of Munich are over. Besides, that city has been often, of late, handled as a favourite text by amateurs and critics in Art, so that one is tantalized by hearing a great deal about pictures, statues, and churches, and seeing nothing—seeing being proverbially believing. We, indeed, see the costumes of the women of the lower classes in neat woodcuts. They are pretty but theatrical, and cannot be of any great antiquity.

In leaving Munich for Vienna the Tourists obtained this passing glimpse of the homely royalties of Germany—

At a post station, about ten English miles from Munich, we met the Elector of Hesse-Cassel returning from Bad-Gastein. In two or three plain sort of travelling carriages were the Elector, the Electress, and their suite. The Elector is a stout-built old man, with a very active manner, and very white hair, eyebrows, and whiskers. He came out of the carriage, and clapped himself down on a wooden bench at the house-end; but as this did not seem quite to satisfy him, as being too much in the sun, he retreated again to the carriage, and two of his servants speedily brought from the inn a tall glass of sugar-water, with its tall wooden spoon, for the Electress, a large, jolly dame, and for him bread and cheese and Bavarian beer. With a truly ploughman's appetite, and in ploughman style, he cut a good hunch of bread, clapped it into the palm of his left hand, and a corresponding piece of cheese, which he took between the thumb and forefinger of the same hand, and with a large pocket-knife began to play away at these homely viands with the keenness of a hunter, or of a Cossack after a day's pursuit of the enemy. He drank off the deckel-glass of beer, a sort of glass tankard holding more than a pint, and despatched one of the men for a second. In less than ten minutes he had given unquestionable evidence of his appetite for bread and cheese and beer being as sharp as his appetite for play. The bread and cheese had vanished; the two tankards of beer after it; he wiped his moustachios, the whips cracked, and away went the carriages, the Elector having laid a tolerable foundation for his dinner at Munich.

At Vienna, or rather in its neighbourhood, perseverance, or some other useful quality in a professional sight-seer obtained for Mr. Howitt admittance into the wild-boar park of the Emperor at Hüttelsdorf. How he made his way within this tabooed, or sacred enclosure, we shall not tell; but the spectacle is so rare and racy, and carries one so far back into rural antiquity, that we select his description of the swine herds in preference to the more imposing shows of the capital—

The young man, a keeper, seemed a good-natured fellow. He took us up the park to a certain hollow, where various wild swine were to be seen under the trees around. This seemed to be the extent to which he deemed himself commissioned to go, but a couple of gulden put into his hand, extended his commission at once; the fears of Imperial edicts, and even of dinner waiting, a great event in daily life in all countries, seemed to vanish. We marched on; glade after glade of the old forest opened before us; he not only was ready to advance as far as we pleased, but assured us that in a few days would be a hunt, and that if we would come, he would take care to admit us. The sight, in fact, was worthy of the trouble we had taken. Numbers of wild swine, of all ages and sizes, from the grisly old boar to the sow with her troop of sucking pigs, were encountered on all sides. Here some grim old fellow, black as jet, or of a sun-burnt and savage grey, lay basking in the deep grass, and at our approach started up with a tremendous guff, and bolted into the woods. Others were seen lying at their length under the broad trees; others running with cocked tails, and at a most nimble rate. The sows with their young ones appeared the most savage and impatient of our presence. Others were so tame as to come at the whistle of the keeper, and scores ran voraciously as he shook one of the wild cornel trees which grew plentifully in the forest. These trees, unknown in England, are as large as apple trees, and in autumn are covered with fruit of a coral red, as large as cherries, but oblong. They make a beautiful show; and the fruit, of a fine sub-acid flavour, is used for dessert. The wild swine are prodigiously fond of this fruit, and as the trees were shook, and it pattered to the ground, they came running on all sides, and stood in the neighbouring thickets eager for our departure, when they rushed forward and ravenously devoured it.

There is not much political discussion in any part of Mr. Howitt's work; and the cursory remarks which do occur breathe no obstreperous Liberalism. It is not, however, in Vienna that the tender mercies of the "paternal government" of Austria are the most visible; and in the present condition of the people of England we are not surprised that a traveller should be disposed to overlook every abstract question, and dwell upon the general wellbeing, the signs of comfort and contentment visible among the working classes of the country where he sojourns. "The ideas," says our author, in summing up his view of Austria, "which we cherish at home, that Austria is a gloomy and severe despotism; that you cannot move without a spy or policeman at your elbow, disappear here [in Vienna] entirely.

In no city do you see so little palpable evidence of surveillance and police as in this. You are, after delivering your passport, as free and unshackled in your motions as in London; and if you do not go out of your way to assail the government, the government will not interfere with you. The whole of this is, however, the result of a sagacious and worldly-wise political system. Everything is planned and calculated to divert the thoughts of the people from political matters. For this purpose public and social pleasures are promoted. If poverty cannot wholly be prevented, for the state has a large debt, and pauperism in 1836 was stated to be in proportion of about four persons in the hundred, yet distress is alleviated; and in no country do you see less symptoms of it. The grand principle of despotic government is, indeed, and must be, to maintain its people in comfort: without which no government could long be popular. Austria, therefore, educates, and was amongst the first nations of Europe to educate its people, so far as is necessary to the conduct of human affairs. The administration of justice is cheap. Law, unlike what it is with us, is within the reach of every man's purse; if not, the poorest man can seek justice from the highest quarters. Even the Emperor devotes one day every week to the personal hearing of any complaints that individuals, however humble, desire to lay before him. What would be thought of such a paternal practice in our own monarchs! Thus, even despotism has its sunny side. If a people can be content to leave the management of political affairs entirely in the hands of the government, and to eat, drink, and be merry, going through the world in great bodily comfort, Austria is an evidence that they may do this in the highest degree. Compared with the frightful and wholesale distress of our own country, Austria is a paradise. Nowhere in the world can such frightful masses of misery be found as in our manufacturing districts; and well may the Austrian ask us, what good does our liberty of speech do those who purchase it at such a cost!

One could easily find something to say in reply to this; but this is not the place; and we have a pleasanter immediate duty in accompanying the tourists on a charming steam voyage on the Elbe, from Prague to Dresden; a navigation that was then just opened; and which, no disparagement to the Rhine or the Danube, affords one of the most delightful and interesting voyages to be met with on any of the German rivers, stretching, as it does, through the very heart of the Saxon Switzerland—

The early part of the scenery was by no means romantic, but it was very agreeable. Rich banks, a broad and finely flowing river, a country of cheerful hill and dale around; here and there a distant town, or castle; and at every village on the banks, thousands of the peasantry collected to see the wonder of the passing steamer. It was Sunday, too, and thus all the population in their best clothes seemed collected on the banks of the Elbe. Anon, however, near Aussig, the scenery began to assume a striking character. High rocks hemmed in the river; mountains crowned with forests, and bold and lofty precipices, surrounded us; and the views both up and down the river became beautiful in no ordinary degree. Between the banks and the feet of the rocks hung the most delicious slopes with vineyards, villages scattered here and there, and people out, as if enjoying greatly their own charming scenery. Behind these the rocks rose in lofty precipices, bold, splintered, with ever changing variety of form, and with openings between them into the heart of the mountains of the most dark and yet inviting description. Above hung thick woods, often of pine; and wherever the eye turned, it was met by scenes of wildness, bold beauty, and an Arcadian sweetness and cheerfulness that were most delightful. Here you passed a lofty castle; there, the isolated rocks called the Jungfernsprung, or Maiden's Leap; and numerous traditions are related to you of these places by the passengers.

Dresden does not tempt us; of its galleries we have all heard enough; so these somewhat hackneyed themes, and a mysterious eulogium on Madame Schroeder Devrient, we pass, to come at Retsch, the well-known imaginative illustrator of Goëthe and Shakspere, who, in the summer season, lives in his vineyard, a few miles from the city—

A pleasant drive down the valley brought us into this region of vineyards, which in the bright colours of autumn did not want for picturesque effect. In the midst of these we found the very simple cottage of the artist. His wife and niece compose all his family, and he can muse on his Fancies at will. His house was furnished, as German houses often are, somewhat barely, and with no trace of picture or print on the walls; but a piano and heaps of music told of the art of which his wife is passionately fond. While noticing these things, a very broad and stout-built man, of middle stature, and with a great quantity of grey hair, stood before us. By portraits which we had seen of him, and which are like and yet unlike, we immediately recognised him. Though polite, yet there was a coldness about his manner, which seemed plainly to say who are these who come to interrupt me out of mere curiosity, for they are quite strange to me. When, however, he understood that Mrs. Howitt was the English poetess in whom he had expressed so much interest, a mist seemed to pass from his eyes; he stretched out his arms, grasped her hand in both his, and shook it with a heartiness that must have been felt for some minutes after. He then gave one of his hands to our daughter, another to myself, with equally vigorous demonstrations of pleasure, and set about to display to us everything that he thought could gratify us. Through various narrow passages, and up various stairs of his rustic abode, he conducted us to his own little study, where he showed to us from the window his vineyard running up the hill, pulled from a shelf a copy of Mrs. Howitt's "Seven Temptations," and sat down to a little table, where he told us he had sketched most of the outlines of Faust and Shakspere. He exhibited to us drawings and paintings in profusion, till his niece appeared with a tray bearing splendid wine and grapes from his own vineyard; a perfect little picture in itself, for in the pretty and amiable-looking niece we could see the prototype of a good many of his young damsels in his sketches. He then drew forth from under a heap of drawings the Album of his wife, a book which, from Mrs. Jameson's interesting description, we had a great desire to see. This is unquestionably the most valuable and beautiful album in the world. It is filled with the most perfect creations of his fancy, whether sportive or solemn, as they have accumulated through years. . . . .

We had gone so far with the Herr Professor, as he is there called, into the fairyland, or rather heaven of poetry, that we were startled to find the day going fast over. As we had turned over these charmed leaves, the artist sate by and read to us his written description of the various sketches, ever and anon breaking away into half moralizing, half sentimental and poetical observations, quite in the spirit of his fancies. We were extremely sorry that the arrangements for our further journey did not allow us once more to return to this simple and happy retreat of the Muses of Poetry and Painting. With true country cordiality, himself, his wife, and lovely niece, accompanied us to our carriage, and as we whirled away through the ocean of vines, the good-hearted man stood and waved his cap to us, till the last turn shut out from view him and his house.

One of the most interesting visits which Mr. Howitt made in Germany, was to Herrnhut, the original settlement in Saxony, nay the very cradle of the Moravians. The account of the rise of this philanthropic and amiable sect, whose history and missionary enterprises, possess, for young minds, all the charm of romance, occupies a good many pages of the volume, as the Moravians are naturally enough admired to enthusiasm by William Howitt, were it only from early association. He traversed their little original town with warm and lively interest. The neat town of Herrnhut contains only about 1100 inhabitants.

In a spacious square stand the little inn, the Meeting-house, the Single Brethrens' House, and other buildings belonging to the community. The Single Sisters' House stands also near, facing the lower end or rather front of the church. Many private families live in their own separate houses. All is extremely neat, clean, and profoundly quiet. Few people are at any time seen going to and fro; and such a thing as a child playing in the street is not to be seen. In respect to education, they are very strict in their notions; and children, like John Wesley, are probably "taught to fear the rod, and cry softly." At all events they are not allowed to play in the street; and you hear so little of them playing anywhere, that you would be quite inclined, did you not meet some under the care of nurses in walks and gardens, to believe there were none; or, as has actually been the case here once, only one child born in the year! A profound silence hovers over the whole place; and it is amazing that so many active persons should go forth to all parts of the world from a centre which seems the very centre of the realms of sleep. They call it themselves Life in Stillness. The whole manner and bearing of the people are those of such as have nothing to do with the passions and agitations of this world, but are living entirely in preparation for another. A worthy old officer, Major von Aderkas, whom we found here, said smiling: "I have had a stormy and troubled existence, and longed for a quiet haven, and thank God I have found it, and enjoy it from my soul; and here I shall end my days with thankfulness. But many come here who at first are struck with the repose of the place, and thinking nothing would be so agreeable as to spend their lives here, they try it, and generally think a month long enough. No, Herrnhut is not the place for those who have not weaned themselves thoroughly from the world, nor have arrived, through troubles and treacheries, at an abiding weariness of it."

To the Herrnhuters themselves, their daily labour, their religious and social meetings, their prayer and singing hours, and the discharge of their duties to the communities, are enjoyments sufficient. Every now and then they have, too, meetings for the reading of the news from their different missionary stations all over the world; and these must be times of great excitement. We went through the brethren and the sister house, and were much pleased with the quiet and neatness of everything. Three or four persons form a little company, have one sitting-room where they can also work; and each company has its overseer for the maintenance of order. The men, most of them, work out in the village; the women in the house, sewing, knitting and doing other women's work; and there is a room where all the articles made are exposed for sale. The Sisters' House is large and very clean, and has a nice garden. We saw many young girls at various employments, and were told that it required diligent labour for one of them to earn three Prussian dollars, about nine shillings, weekly. It was interesting to see in both houses persons who had been into distant and very different parts of the world, into the hottest and the coldest regions, in the missionary cause; and the children of missionaries who had been born amongst the Caffres or the Esquimaux. Each community had its common dining-room, where they all dined; but at three different tables, each at a different rate of charge, so as to accommodate all persons. Poverty amongst them is no disgrace, except as the result of indolence or imprudence. Each community had also its prayer-room and assembling-room. Music is much cultivated amongst them; and we observed in every room appropriated to public or private worship an organ or piano, and in every sitting-room that we entered was a violin, a guitar, or flute. It was amusing to see the sleeping-room of the women, which, like the dining-room, was for general use, and stocked with a whole host of little German beds, each for one person. The women in their little white muslin caps had a certain resemblance to Friends, but were distinguished into married and unmarried by the ribbons which tied their caps being of different colours. The young girls had deep red; the unmarried women, pink; the married women, blue; and the widows, white or grey. In the Brethren's House is a very excellent collection of stuffed birds and other objects of natural history, which missionaries from different countries have enriched. Their church very much resembles a Friends' meeting.

On no part of the work have we lingered with more pleasure, than the picture of the present condition of the birth-place of this primitive and philanthropic sect, who may be described as poetical Quakers, as the beau-ideal of Sectarians.

Berlin, the Hartz country, the ascent of the Brocken, and even Weimar and Jena, we must hurry past, pausing, however, in reverence, over one sacred spot of earth at Weimar. In the vault of the new cemetery there, lie the remains of Schiller and Goëthe, with those of their patrons and friends the Duke and Duchess of Weimar. Mr. Howitt tells that the sexton

Appeared proud of being the keeper of the remains of the two great poetical lights of Germany. "Many," said he, "have seen their place of rest, but I laid them there." He had assisted to remove the body of Schiller from the Stadtkirche where it was first interred, to this vault, when it was prepared for the Grand Duke.

The coffins of the illustrious poets had been recently covered with garlands of evergreens. At the proper place, at Carlarhue, we neglected to commemorate the heart-homage which the Tourists paid at the grave of Stilling, which was to them one of the most interesting spots of the whole city. If less distinguished by splendour of genius than his illustrious friends, his example, and the beautiful lessons shown forth by his character and life, entitle Stilling to equal love and reverence. The German life is not more truly and vividly portrayed in the fictions of Goëthe, than in the simple and tender autobiography of this primitive professor.*

A view of the present state of Literature, Education, and Religion in Germany, concludes the work. One young poet, Freligath, is highly spoken of; we hear of no new writer of prose imaginative works. The far greater part of the daily supply for every-day readers is, at present, obtained from England, France, and America, in good translations; though the translators seem not particular about what works they select; nor will they, while what is provided serves the day. On the subject of education a great deal is conveyed in the remark, that the Germans are thoroughly taught in their schools, though somehow the less systematically-trained English, contrive to scramble up more knowledge. The English mechanic has fewer well organized schools; but he has his library, his newspapers, his periodical works, his cheap yet handsome editions of the standard works of his country; while the state-educated German peasants are still reading only the Catholic legends or chap-books of three centuries ago. The state of religion, in Germany, according to Mr. Howitt's opinion,—and, though a religious man, he is no bigot,—is far from being satisfactory. He takes the same view of our commercial relations with that country, which is forced upon every thinking man. "We had only to consent to feed our hungry manufacturers with their corn and cattle, and they offered in return their sixty millions [including the Austrian Italian States,] of backs to clothe, besides the importation of various of our articles of colonial produce. By the grossest political stupidity we have shut out their corn, and starved our millions of spinners. We have excited a system of counteraction; for Germany has closed itself to us, and become a rival manufacturing country. Every town of our manufacturing districts stands at this moment a frightful spectacle, upbraiding us, in the attitude of Chartism and the language of despair, with our irremediable folly."

Let not those readers who seek only for information, in an agreeable form, and entertainment, take alarm at this passage. There is but a slender admixture of politics or grave discussion of any kind in the work; though the little given is of the right sort.

In taking leave of this work, which, whether we look to the actual amount of valuable original information, relating to a people with whom we have many close ties and common sympathies, or its execution, may be regarded as the most abiding or standard work that its author has yet produced, it is a duty to the literary labourer, as to the public for whom he toils, to commemorate the care and pains in every minor as well as essential point, which Mr. Howitt has bestowed, to render his book worthy of the favour to which we consider it eminently entitled. It is no flimsy, hastily got-up catch-penny affair, to be floated off under a press of sail and a popular name, and then to sink into the oblivion, which from the first, if thus constructed, it would have merited. It is calculated to please the eye as well as to satisfy the understanding; and we cannot doubt but that its success will correspond with its intrinsic merit, and external attractions.

AFFGHANISTAN.

O TRAMPLE to dust the inglorious banner,
That once proudly waved o'er the ranks of the free;
It is foul with the ensigns of blackest dishonour,
O bury its folds in the depths of the sea.

Shall henceforth the rose round the neck of the raven,
The thistle around the pale crescent be twined!
The shamrock be worn by the tyrant and craven!
Dishonour with glory and fame be combined!

Is freedom no more than a name—than a shadow?
Let the life-blood of heroes and martyrs declare,
That stained the rich blossom of mountain and meadow,
When the sword of the despot was shivered in air.

Shall the sons of the clime, where the cairn on the mountain
Hath guarded for ages the rest of the free,
Sell their hearts' dearest blood as a life-streaming fountain,
To feed the dark poison of Slavery's tree!

O breathe not the thought, that when Liberty's chalice
The Affghan is eagerly longing to sip,
The hero-descendants of Hampden and Wallace
Should haste the bright nectar to dash from his lip:

Should plough the vast ocean, and breast the steep highland,
Where the genii of tempest for ages have moaned;
Should lavish the wealth and the hearts of our island
To aid the dark hopes of a tyrant dethroned.

Yes! Victory's sunburst may flash on the standard
Ye bear to the front of Affghanistan's war;
But disaster and death, with your treasury squandered,
For the honour of England were better by far.

But revenge is the war-word—the old English Lion
For glory insulted must drink of the tide
That pours from the heart of Affghanistan dying,
Lest cowards should mock at the fall of his pride.

The revenge of a felon! whose brow has been branded
With the fire of omnipotent justice for crime,
For defiance of rights, which your fathers commanded
To respect in each country, each colour, and clime.

Let the wretches who wedded the stainless old banner
To craven injustice, be wedded for aye
To darkest remembrance of freedom's dishonour,
Of England's disgrace, and her glory's decay.

CYRUS.

JUDGE THOMSON—A LOVE STORY.

In the spare corner of some newspaper there appeared, a good many years back, a copy of verses of some mark, in which the nameless writer, himself in the heyday of youth and passion, moralizes with tenderness on the common lot, and expresses wonder whether the serene or indifferent old men, whom he saw far advanced on the downward path of life, had ever possessed as warm a heart as his, or been agitated by feelings akin to those which filled his own breast. Following out this train of musing, he comes to the conclusion—

> Yes! each has had his dream of joy,
> His own unequalled, pure romance,
> Commencing when the blooming boy
> First thrilled to lovely woman's glance.

These fugitive lines were forcibly brought to recollection on perusing the subjoined Letters; to which it is our duty to prefix a short explanatory preface.

With all the caution, prudence, and keenness of acquisition, which is said to distinguish our countrymen—be it the acquisition of knowledge, or of pounds shillings and pence, dollars, rupees, or pistoles, there is often lurking at the bottom of the heart of the genuine Scotsman, a fund of latent romance, which will sometimes break strongly out where it is the least suspected to exist. Sir Walter Scott, both in the strength and the weakness of his character, was an eminent exemplar of this peculiarity of the national character; of this double nature, or racy mixture of the shrewd and prudential, with the enthusiastic. Like the hero of our true tale, Scott seems to have cherished, to the latest moments of his life, the memory of an unfortunate early attachment; though most unlike that excellent person in almost every feature of character, in which one good man can differ from another. It was our intention, at first, to tell this "True Tale of a true love" in the form of a narrative; but upon second thoughts we shall give the original letters. One letter from Judge Thomson to the long-beloved it would be sacrilege to touch; though it were only to correct the ungrammatical thee, so characteristic of the engrafted Quaker.

LETTER I.

From A. D., Manchester, to H. W., Esq., Banker, Ludlow.

Manchester, 29*th Sept.*, 1842.

My dear Sir,—I am pretty sure you will be gratified with the perusal of what follows.

You know the town of Kirkcudbright, with its old castle, its quay, and its tall jail tower? Well, some sixty years ago and more, a group of playful children might be seen daily wending their way to and from Kirkcudbright school, their homes being two or three miles distant from the town. Two of the group, a boy and a girl, about the same age, were generally seen hand in hand, seemingly more attached to each other than the rest. The girl's name was Mary Sharpe, the daughter of Adam Sharpe, a small farmer on the Selkirk estate; and her companion's name was William Thomson, the son of a neighbouring ploughman or cottar.

More than twenty years passed away, and a man, still in the prime of life, visited Kirkcudbright, after many years' sojourn in the West Indies.* He had gone to push his fortune, and had not been unsuccessful. Though his face was bronzed by a tropical sun, his heart still beat warmly at the recollection of old scenes and old friendships. He was William Thomson, the cottar's son; and he inquired anxiously for Mary Sharpe, the companion of his childhood. He found her in Liverpool, the wife of Captain Cunningham, the master of a foreign ship, with two or three children playing around her knee.

Forty more years rolled away. An aged and infirm female called upon my friend, Mr. John Rae, ship-owner in Liverpool, and formerly one of the magistrates of Kirkcudbright. She was decently dressed, and had evidently seen better days, but had latterly tasted the bitter cup of poverty in her declining years. She told her tale, and found ready sympathy from Mr. Rae. She was Mary Sharpe,† now Widow Cunningham, and the inmate of an alms-house. Mr. Rae, in the kindness of his heart, administered to her pressing wants, and promised to exert himself in her behalf. He immediately addressed a letter to the Earl of Selkirk, on whose estate her family had been tenants for some generations, and four of whose uncles and aunts had been nursed by her (Mary Sharpe's) mother. His Lordship, however, did not reply. Mr. Rae wrote to others connected with the widow's family with no better success. On communicating the disappointment of his hopes to the aged widow, Mr. Rae inquired of her if she could think of any other friend to whom he could make another appeal on her behalf. She said there was only one person, an old schoolfellow, who, she was sure, would befriend her, if he was still alive, and had it in his power. "What is his name, and where is he to be found?" inquired Mr. Rae.—"His name is William Thomson; he sailed for America forty years ago, where, I believe, he settled; but I have never heard of or from him since."—"This is a wide address, and, I fear, a hopeless chance," said Mr. Rae; but he is not easily baffled when good to a deserving and suffering fellow-creature is the object. He knew something of a worthy and benevolent Gallovidian citizen of New York, a Mr. Johnston;‡ and he at once penned a letter, detailing all the circumstances of Widow Cunningham, the Mary Sharpe of other years, addressed it "William Thomson," and despatched it, under cover, to Mr. Johnston of New York. Mr. Johnston knew a Judge Thomson of Broome County, who, he thought, answered the description given by Mr.

* See Mr. Thomson's letter subjoined, where he details the circumstances of his voyage out to Jamaica, &c.

† The following are a few particulars of Mary Sharpe's intervening history:—Her parents being poor, she went to service in the house of an aunt of the third Lord Selkirk, where she remained some years; and being a handsome girl, she had several admirers; and amongst the rest, Mr. Lennox, afterwards of New York, and the father of the Mr. Lennox who purchased Dalscairth, near Dumfries, some years ago. She removed to Liverpool, and was soon afterwards married to Mr. Cunningham, Master and Supercargo of a large ship. He died 35 or 36 years ago at Surinam, leaving his widow with four young children, their only provision being the industry of the widow. She, however, contrived to bring up her family in respectability; and when they were all able to do for themselves, she once more went to service at Stobo Castle, near Peebles, the seat of Sir James Montgomery, whose Lady was Lord Selkirk's aunt. Three of her children having died, and age and infirmity coming upon her, she some years ago took shelter in the alms-house at Liverpool.

‡ It is singular, that this Mr. Johnston, to whom Mr. Rae addressed his letter, should happen to be the only surviving acquaintance which Judge Thomson had in New York.

Rae. He forwarded the letter to him, and he was the man! Read his letter, of which I enclose a copy.

I may tell you that Judge Thomson is now dead;* but the widow Cunningham still lives. He left her £600 by his will: which will render her comfortable in her old age; and probably leave a handsome sum to her daughter, (an unmarried woman) who has, for several years, attended her mother in the most dutiful and affectionate manner. * * * * *

LETTER II.

From Judge Thomson to Mr. Rae.

Binghamton, Broome County, State of New York, Aug. 23, 1841.

John Rae, Esq.

Dear Sir,—Your favour of the 19th ult. reached me on the 9th instant. I have to return you my sincere thanks for the Herald newspaper; though the intelligence conveyed of the result of your elections grieved me exceedingly. Our late elections have also resulted in the overthrow of the liberal, or democratic cause. This I regret; as the progress of Liberalism, in the two freest countries on earth, must be arrested in its onward course—at least, for some time. The monied power seems, for a while, to be in the ascendant; and I doubt whether there ever will be sufficient virtue in the masses to effectually contend with it. I perceive, in your country, that whenever a few beneficial reforms have been adopted, the popular claims (as it were) run riot, and call for Chartism, Socialism, and every ism that is impracticable in a well-regulated community. All that the masses can reasonably demand is, that there be no impediment or bar to their rising in the world: such as that a private soldier may fight his way to the office of General; a sailor, who enters before the mast may be, by his courage and conduct, promoted to the rank of Admiral; and that public offices be impartially bestowed on the most capable and honest. I perceive that the constituencies of Ireland, Scotland, and the English boroughs are sound,—that Toryism being triumphant is owing to the landed aristocracy of England—alas! no longer Merry England. Enough of politics. I am truly happy to hear that my dear and early friend, Mrs. Cunningham, is well. The explanation you gave of the institution where she resided was perfectly satisfactory. I should like to know the name of the benevolent founder. I hope your business will permit you to see Mrs. Cunningham frequently. Say everything kind to her for me. In November, our mutual friend, John Johnston, forwarded you a draft for her use, (say £20 sterling.) You will oblige by sending occasionally a Galloway newspaper. After an absence of sixty years, it does not appear that much change has taken place in the landed property in the stewartry, or in Wigtonshire. You are desirous to know my native place. My father was from Dalry, my mother from Borgue. Fortune brought them together about the middle of the last century, as servants, at the house of Mr. M'Millan of Barwhinnock, in the parish of Twynholm. They were married there, and went to live, as cottars, with Mr. —— of ——, who, I have often heard my mother say, was one of the cruellest and profanest of men. My parents soon left Lochfergus and went into Borgue, in the same humble capacity. There I was born on the 17th of July, 1765. After being some years at the parish school there, I was put to board at an uncle's, who farmed Castlecrave in the parish of Berwick,† and walked three miles daily, in the summer, to Mr. Gordon's school in Kirkcudbright. In the winter, I boarded at the house of Hugh Johnston in the Milburn. I recollect a family of your name there, that were wrights. During several summers I passed the house of Adam Sharpe, Mary's father; and his children, of which Mary was the eldest, also went to Mr. Gordon's school. We generally went and returned together, and formed an attachment founded on the most innocent love and youthful friendship; and had I been the heir of the fairest estate in Galloway, Mary would have had the offer of my hand: but, alas! poverty was an insuperable bar, and we were but children of about fourteen years of age. Mary's parents were both from Borgue, and there was only a few months' difference in our ages. I cannot consent to my friendly feelings to my schoolmate being made public. The good old bookseller is not to let the left hand know what the right hand doth. My means of liberality were all disposed of previous to my knowledge of Mrs. C.'s situation. I wish she would get her daughter to write a letter for her to me. I have, if my executors are honest—which I hope they are—secured to Mary £600, which will support her in comfort, and something be left to reward her daughter. My schoolmates that I recollect, were James Mitchel, son of the ancient Dr. Mitchel; Alexander Gordon, son of our schoolmaster; Thomas Bean, James Bean, James Liddesdale, David M'Lellan; James, John, and Robert Clarke, sons of Dr. Clarke. William Johnston, and his brother John, went to Mr. Monnoch's school. My health is such, that I have little prospect of surviving the coming winter. Should it be so, I cannot complain: my days of pilgrimage have already surpassed the ordinary age allotted to man. My ancestry are truly plebeian, and my poor father, out of twenty years' penurious economy, laid up what paid for a steerage passage for me in a Glasgow ship to Jamaica, where I landed in May, 1783, a poor lad, unbefriended and penniless. I lived there fifteen years, and left in August, 1798. I was one of twenty-four young men who were my fellow-passengers in the Glasgow ship; and have been for the last forty-two years the only survivor, and the only one of them that had saved any property worth notice. I have been two weeks writing this letter. Should you not again hear from me, you will hear of me from your friend John Johnston, who is very wealthy, and as respectable as any man can be. Since the death of my ancient friend Robert Lenox, he is the only one left to me in the city of New-York. I am exhausted, and must finish. Most truly your friend.

(Signed) Wm. Thomson.

Binghamton, Broome County, New York, 16 October, 1841.

Mr. John Rae.

Dear Sir,—By a letter from our mutual friend, John Johnston, Esq., he informs me that on the 29th ultimo he has remitted to you, on my account, for the use of my dear friend, Mrs. Mary Cunningham, a set of exchange for £21, 2s. 2d. sterling, which I doubt not will come to hand safe, and be duly honoured. This sum I hope, together with the other little perquisites she at present enjoys, will place her in tolerably comfortable circumstances. Be so kind as to present to her my sincere love and regard; and [say] that she may depend on the like sum annually, during my life. I have also by will left her £600 sterling, payable in two years from my decease, the interest annually. But, my dear Sir, it would probably be best that little should be made public on this subject, as it might lead to the curtailment of her present comfortable location. She owes much to you. I hope you see her often. I am desirous to receive a letter from her; her daughter can act as amanuensis. I have to thank you for a Dumfries and Galloway newspaper occasionally. Galloway, both shire and stewartry, acted well at the last election,—Broughton nobly. We have a strong war feeling here. I hope the good sense of Britain and the United States will perceive the advantage of peace. War between those states would disturb and retard the civilisation of the whole human race. The human passions are yet far from being chastened by the mild precepts of our holy religion.—Yours sincerely. (Signed) Wm. Thomson.

P. S. My health has been very poor for a year past.—W. T.

LETTER III.

From Judge Thomson to Mary Sharpe, Mrs. Cunningham.

Binghamton, Broome County, State of New York, 28*th Feb.*, 1841.

Mrs. Mary Cunningham,—My earliest and most beloved friend, Mr. Rae's letter of the 20th November, 1840, did not reach me until the 2d February, 1841. In two days after it came to hand I remitted to my friend, John Johnston, Esq., of the city of New York, £10 sterling, for thy immediate relief, which he writes to me he has done. I was truly happy to learn that thee was still numbered with the living; but I was much distressed to think how much thy feelings must have been wounded by the humiliations thee has been compelled to submit to. Thee did me justice in believing that, if I knew thy distress, I would be willing to assist thee; and I cannot express how much I am indebted to thee for the present call. But, my dear Mary, why was thy situation not made known to me twenty years ago? How happy it would have made me to have averted from the woman I have ever loved above all others, the distress and mortifications she has undergone. It wounds my feelings extremely to think that thee has become the pensioner of an alms-house. It must not continue so. Would £25 annually enable thee to remove into thine own rented house, and support thee in anything like comfort? That sum I can spare, without curtailing the comforts of my family. My circumstances for the last forty years have been easy, but never very rich. I give thee my history. A few months after I parted with thee in Liverpool, I married into a Quaker family in the State of New York, and commenced farming my own freehold. In six or eight years, perceiving that there was no probability of my having a family of children, I disposed of my property near to New York, located myself in the State of Pennsylvania, where, for thirty years, I employed myself in superintending my farm, (a large one,) and in discharging the duties of a Magistrate and Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, in Susquehanna County. I had no desire to be very rich, and the bent of my own mind rather disposed me to literary pursuits, which now afford my principal enjoyment. Some years since I sent to Galloway for my sister, her husband, and her three daughters, their husbands, and their fifteen grandchildren, all of whom are now settled on three valuable farms, with stock and everything they can reasonably want. If they are industrious and prudent, they and their descendants are placed where, if poverty reaches them, it will be their own fault. My sister deceased a few weeks since, aged 80 years. In 1836, my wife deceased. She confided to my protection an aged maiden her sister, who had lived with us 35 years; also her niece, a girl of 12 years, which she had adopted. I married the old maiden, and domestic matters were conducted without change. Becoming infirm, I sold my farm, and now reside near Binghamton, 170 miles from New York city. While I live thee shall have £25 annually, in December, which Mr. Johnston will remit; and I have made a codicil to my will, by which thee will receive £600. Should my life, however, be spared for a few years, I will remit that sum to thee myself. If the interest of £600, say £30, would support thee in comfort, the principal sum, or a part of it, would put it in thy power to reward thy dutiful child, who has foregone opportunities, no doubt, of bettering her condition, in order to wait on and comfort her aged parent. When I last saw thee, thee had three children, a son in Scotland, and two daughters with thee; one about three years old, I think, named Mary, and the other a babe in the cradle. How many of thy children grew up? What year did Captain Cunningham die? I think thee said he was then in Martinique. If your hand has become unsteady, get some one to write me for thee, and give me a history of all thy troubles. Are thy brother and sisters yet alive? The Scottish aristocracy are a heartless race. It is a disgrace to the Selkirk family that Mary Sharpe ever knew want. I am now in my seventy-sixth year, and I well remember there was but a few months' difference in our ages. I hope, my dear Mary, that thee will believe me to write in sincerity and truth when I say, that thee has conferred on me an obligation, that I can never repay, by calling upon me in thy distress. Had I known whereabouts thee was to be found, the call would not have been waited for. Had I known thy situation twenty years ago, how much humiliation would have been spared thee. On receipt of this give me a long letter in return; and write to me every three months. Address, William Thomson, Esq., Binghamton, Broome county, State of New York. Put thy letter in a packet, or steam-ship bag, a day or two before the set time of sailing, and I will receive it in about three weeks. Farewell, my dear Mary; and believe me to be, at this moment, as sincerely thy friend as when we were footing up the Barhill together, on our way from school. With sentiments of love and affection unchanged, I remain, thine ever,

William Thomson.

One is at a loss whether most to admire, the faith of Mary Sharpe in her old schoolfellow, of whom she had not heard for forty years, or the unswerving truth of that ancient friend. What a singular combination of tender enthusiasm and matter-of-fact duty and prudence, does this worthy man's epistle display! Marrying the "aged maiden" bequeathed to him, is indeed somewhat repulsive to our insular ideas; but it is thus that, by the law of the land, things are regulated in the New World. We conclude by hoping that Judge Thomson may be the citizen of the State of New York, who lately left an annual sum to be given as a prize for the best Essay on the advantages of Free trade, and direct taxation. Indeed, his politics seem as sound and enlightened, as his heart must have been warm, faithful, and devoted.

GABRIEL GARBAGE; OR,
LEAVES FROM THE LIFE OF A LITERARY CAD.

EDITED BY BON GAULTIER.

[Avis au Lecteur.—This Work was sent to us in three volumes: but by omitting a series of sketches descriptive of visits to my uncle, and various low pot-houses, voyages to Ramsgate, and Eel Pie Island, and papers rejected by the lowest Magazines, we have condensed it into the following chapters. Even these, we fear, run out to too great a length; but they present some phases of literary life, which have at all events the merit of novelty. It is distinctly to be understood, that this work has no connexion with one bearing a title somewhat similar, professing to record the literary experiences of another literary cad.—BON GAULTIER.]

CHAPTER I.

Birth, Parentage, and Education.—Ex nihilo nihil fit.

Most people have heard of the boy, who, when asked who his father was, replied, "I never had a father: mother got me at a raffle." I was not that boy, although some of my literary rivals have, with characteristic malignity, asserted that I was. No—I had a father; and I may say, without fear of contradiction, that I had a mother also—at least I cannot otherwise account for my appearance in society. When I first began to reflect upon the how and why of my existence, and to feel an interest in the family history, I found that my father—my utmost endeavours have been unable to trace the family pedigree higher—was a native of the classic village of Whommlebree in Morayshire. Although a gentleman of unquestionable respectability, he did not think it beneath him to lend his personal services, for the customary amount of wages, in reducing blocks of whinstone to that fragmentary state which fits them for being employed in the formation of thoroughfares constructed upon the principle of the great Macadam. In this he felt there was no disgrace. Cincinnatus, according to Livy, planted his own cabbages; and President Harrison, we all know, pitted his own potatoes, and baked his own pumpkin pies. My father's mind had a strong bent towards the physical sciences; and, in the pursuit of his favourite propensity, his evenings were generally spent in a retired glen in the distillation of a chemical fluid, which has attained a more than European celebrity, under the name of smuggled whisky. He was not, however, long permitted to beguile the silent hours of night with the Egeria of the small-still. The myrmidons of a despotic government rudely broke in upon his philosophical retreat; and in disgust he left his native village for the metropolis of the west, where he found a sphere for his activity in the humble but useful avocation of a street porter.

My mother, excellent matron! was of an active turn of mind. The monotony of an existence without employment preyed upon her spirits; and some cheerful occupation was recommended by her medical advisers, to keep her from sinking into hypochondria. Accordingly she invested her paternal fortune in the purchase of a mangle, and she kept it with untiring zeal. From that hour she was ready to undertake mangling to any extent "by the hour or piece." She measured her labour by the amount of currency which it brought to her exchequer, and she was happy. Her profession necessarily drew around her a large circle of female acquaintance, in whose society I had opportunities of studying the character of the gentler sex such as are rarely enjoyed. The unreserved frankness with which they told to each other the secrets of the different families who had availed themselves of their talents, and the charming vivacity with which they attacked one other's reputation, gave me an insight, at a very early age, into human life, which has been of the greatest benefit to my future career.

I was an only child—the centre of my mother's affection. On me she lavished her little income,—freely enabling me to receive the benefits of a day-school in the Gallowgate, where reading, writing, and arithmetic, were taught for three shillings a-quarter, by an under graduate of one of the Universities. I soon began to give symptoms of a literary turn. A choice collection of penny histories enriched my library; and these graver studies were relieved by several fathoms of popular songs, which my mother's liberality enabled me to purchase at the rate of a yard and a half for a halfpenny.

My father died when I was a mere child. My recollections of him are extremely shadowy. We saw very little of him. It was always late when he came home, and I remember distinctly that he never walked like anybody else; but, in place of going straight forward, traversed the street, or room, as the case might be, with a rolling and irregular motion, which I could never adequately explain. His words were generally incoherent, and thickly guttural, and his manner stupidly ferocious. A disappointed man, he sighed, with an unquenchable longing, for the dew of his own mountains. His fine genius was crushed by the legislative interference of which I have already spoken; and he died, in the vigour of life, a victim to despair and lowland whisky. This event occasioned no change upon my mother's demeanour, except that it afforded her a theme of exquisite pathos among the young virgins who frequented her establishment, and justified the dash of gin with which, from thenceforth, she invariably seasoned her souchong.

I had grown to be a youth of fifteen or sixteen, before my literary abilities developed themselves with any remarkable force. Like Burns, I owed my inspiration to a pair of black eyes; and I take this early opportunity of silencing the calumny which has ascribed my literary efforts to frequent quaffings of the Hippocrene of beer. My passion was unsuccessful; but its struggles snapped the chords that bound the pinions of my genius. I felt what it was to be a poet; and, knowing that all great poets must "learn in suffering what they teach in song," I submitted calmly to my fate. The object of my attachment was a young girl from the island of Rum, the laundress to a family in the neighbourhood, who patronised the establishment of my respected parent. For weeks and weeks my passion smouldered in my breast. By day, I raved of her to myself; and all night long frantically embraced the pillow, in visions of my charmer. At last I could restrain myself no longer. I declared myself to her—dreadful hour! But I shall tell the result in a little poem, which my friends have often said,—in this agreeing entirely with myself,—bears no small resemblance to some of the most graceful productions of the Bard of Rydal—

THE CATASTROPHE.

Some thirst for fame, and some for gold,
But Love, within its silken fold,
  Can every heart entangle;
My father early toiled and late,
And in the crowded Gallowgate
  My mother kept a mangle.

Upon her parlour floor it stood,
A huge machine of beechen wood,
  And it did never cease
To roll along on rounded pin,
And smoothed the linen laid within,
  Or by the hour or piece.

Around its pillars vast each night
Was gathered a circle bright
  Of maidens fair as day;
Sweet Bessy Brown, and Jess Mackay,
And Annie Gray, with roguish eye,
  That lives across the way.

But none that did that mangle turn
Were half so fair as Ailsie Burn.
  How strangely beat my heart,
As forward in her toil she bent,
And up her gown of gingham went,
  And showed her ancle smart!

One night I met her in the street,
Her shoes, for once, were on her feet,
  Her basket on her arm;
She to my mother's would repair,
To get her linen mangled there,
  And keep her fingers warm.

I stopped her—asked her how she did;
Proposed, if she would not forbid,
  With her to walk along;
And told her, heedless of the rain,
Of all my passion, all my pain,
  And pitched it very strong.

She heard me; not a word she said,
But, as she walked, held down her head—
  I felt that she was mine!
O happy youth! I cried, and sank
Upon a clothes-heap, steaming, dank,
  Just newly off the line.

I lay like one of sense forlorn;
The mangle, that from night till morn
  Did ever creak and turn,
Was creaking now—I heard it not—
I was too happy in the thought
  Of my dear Ailsie Burn.

But woe is me; for when I rose
From off that heap of humid clothes,
  She made me loudly wail;
And in my ears her laughter dinn'd—
Oh, death! I found that she had pinn'd
  A dish-clout to my tail!

How I survived the horror of this discovery I know not. The scornful laugh of that large circle of feminine grace, of which I have spoken, still rings in my ears. Scoffed, jeered at, my young affections made a jest, I should have died, but that I felt some consolation in being able to record the incident in such graceful stanzas. I felt how much my case was akin to that of Byron and Miss Chaworth; and the thought reconciled me, in some measure, to my discomfiture. From that moment I resolved to become a literary man. Little did Ailsie Burn imagine, as she pinned that dish-clout to my coat tail, that, in the victim of her wanton sport, the world should one day admire the author of the "Lives Of The Old Clothesmen."

Four years passed over,—a dreary blank. How they were spent I shall not here disclose. The acorn, lapped in moss, is unconscious of its winter sleep, until the genial warmth of spring awakens it into that life, which a future day shall see matured into the stately tree. Rest ye then in peace, days of my youth, not altogether forgotten by me! Carrick, of the Royal Hôtel, George Square, you once retained a Boots. Four years he ate of your bread, and drank of your cup, and was to you as the most intractable of Bootses. Would you recognise him now in the idol of the literary circles of B——, radiant with the smiles of prosperity, and glorified with a suit of Doudney's best?

CHAPTER II.

The Author arrives in London, and makes the Acquaintance of a Troubadour. Is introduced to Mr. Catnach. Young England. He is launched upon the Sea of Literature.

It would be tedious, were I to recount minutely all the disappointments I encountered in the outset of my literary career. Colburn slammed the door in my face; Bentley was obdurate as steel; and Saunders & Otley, interesting twins, declined my services at any price. Publishers are, at all times, an illiberal class of persons; and I perfectly agree with my friend Tom Campbell's remark, that the one praiseworthy act of Napoleon's life was his execution of a bookseller. At this particular crisis the London Trade were even more perverse than usual. Whether an uninterrupted course of prosperity had made them wanton and flatulent, I know not; but such they decidedly were. Twelve publishers of note rejected my offers in succession: but I have since been avenged.

In these futile efforts for honourable independence a week elapsed; and at the end of that period I found myself literally penniless. Singularly enough, even then no thought of despondency crossed my mind. I knew, to the weight of a carat, the value of the jewel I bore within me—I knew and appreciated the priceless treasure of a manly, intelligent, and cultivated mind. All the world might fail me, but that could not. However I wanted breakfast.

Pacing slowly along towards an earth-fruiterer's (I mean a baked-potatoe) stall, situated in the neighbourhood of St. Clement's Danes, the proprietrix of which was a countrywoman of my own, upon whom I meant to urge a claim for temporary refreshment, I was somewhat struck by the appearance of a young man who exercised the profession of an itinerary Troubadour. In one hand he carried a bundle of printed ballads, while the other, elaborately curved, so as to form a kind of manual speaking-trumpet, was applied to his mouth for the purpose of strengthening the effect of the following literary announcement:—

"Here you have a true and pertikilar ack-ount of the bloodi, brutal, and barbarious murder committed by John Jugg, upon the person of Mary Waddilove, at Islington; with the last speech and dying confession of the criminel,—and a ballad upon the same. All for the low charge of one halfpenny."

A small crowd of admirers collected round him. He ceased his recitative, and sung,—

"Ye Christian people, great and small,
Attend unto my song,
And you shall hear what did befall
Last week at Islington.

"A butcher bold was John the Jugg,
And much he did delight
To see sweet Mary Waddilove
As she went by each night.

(A ballad, marm? Thank ye, marm.)

"He said to her, 'Sweet maid,' said he,
'Behold me at your feet.'
But Mary Waddilove, ah, me!
Disliked the smell of meat.

"She said, 'Get out, you nasty man,
You smells uncommon strong!'
John Jugg he swore a horrid oath,
And kept it, too, ere long.

"One night the devil did appear,
And said to him, 'John Jugg,
Young Mary's wery fond of beer—
Put pison in the mug!'"

Thus far had the ballad-singer chanted, and already the pence came showering in. A brilliant thought struck me. I had still a sixpence left, and stepping up with an air of affability to the minstrel, I requested the honour of his company to discuss a pot of half-and-half in an adjoining public-house. He gave me a knowing wink.

"Vy," said he, with elegant vivacity, "I doesn't think as 'ow you'd make much by hocusing me, so I ha'n't no werry great objections. Howsomd'ever, let's go in separate, my young 'un'; cos, you see, I'm rayther pertikilar about the company I keeps."

I humoured his scruples, and gave way. A few moments afterwards we were deep in conversation over a quart of England's generous fluid.

Whatever may be my failings, from which I cannot, any more than the greatest sons of humanity, claim exemption, the betrayal of confidence was never laid to my charge. During the half hour we spent together, Jim the Screamer—for such was the sobriquet or nomen juris of my new acquaintance—communicated to me, from his large stores of useful knowledge, some valuable literary information, which had the greatest effect in determining my literary career. He proved to me, by the most perfect demonstration, that the highway to fame and riches did not lie, as the public are too prone to believe, through the wareroom of the wealthy publisher,—that popular applause was to be won in a wider arena,—that reviews and magazines were neither more nor less than fetters artfully forged to keep down the aspiring wing of genius,—and that in the free, open atmosphere of the streets alone, was the battle of reputation to be won. Nor was this the only benefit I received from the ingenuous Screamer. His eagle-glance at once detected what I truly was,—a neophyte, a young, confiding disciple, eager to embrace the true faith, but ignorant of the fountain-head to which it behoved me to repair. The Screamer saw this, and pitied me. He felt that I needed a master, and urged me, without delay, to cast myself at the feet of the great Gamaliel of song—our immortal master, the illustrious Catnach!

I obeyed. Following the directions vouchsafed to me by the friendly Screamer, I threaded the mazy labyrinth of The Seven Dials, and in Greek Street paused before the door where Catnach held his home. With what force did the admirable epigram of my old Glaswegian friend, Sinclair Manson, the great French lexicographer, occur to me at that moment—

"Seven Grecian cities fought for Homer's fame, Seven London Dials do our Catnach claim."

"Up four pair o' stairs,—fust door on the right hand," replied a descending pot-boy, with a camel-load of pewter at his back, in answer to my tremulous inquiry. The cold sweat stood upon my brow, as I wound up the narrow defile; for I was conscious that every step brought me nearer the presence of the great oracle of song,—

——— a quo, ceu fonte perenni
Vatum Pieriis ora rigantur aquis.

"Vell, young 'un, vot's the kick?" were the first words that greeted my ears, as I stumbled into a low-roofed apartment, about twelve feet square, in which two gentlemen were seated. There was beer upon the table, and pipes. A strong odour of tobacco, contending with the rich flavour of onions, pervaded the room. There were also pens and ink, and several sheets of foolscap, with which one of the gentlemen seemed busily engaged. The other, who was an elderly bald-headed man, with a brilliant saffron complexion, was engaged, at my entrance, in correcting what seemed the proof of a Dying Speech.

"Am I to understand that this is Mr. Catnach's apartment?"

"An unkimmon good guess that o' your'n, Sawney," said the elderly gentleman; "and vot if it be?"

"I am a poet, Sir, and I come to offer my services."

"A poet!" repeated the eccentric Catnach, bursting into an explosion of laughter. "Do you hear that, Young England? Here's a chap from Scratchland, come to take the shine out on you all."

Young England regarded me with a steadfast scowl. "I do not fear him," he said; "we still have our Smifzer and our Stubbins."

"And we our Howie, our Miller, and our Glass," replied I, with considerable dignity.

"Stop that ere jaw!" cried Catnach, authoritatively. "You, Young England, finish that job you're at in five minutes time, or blow me if I table down a rap. You, Sawney, take a drop o' beer in the meantime, to set the stream of varse a-flowin', and then to work. But first, your name, and who sent you here?"

I told him of my meeting with the Screamer.

"He's a good 'un, is Jim," said Catnach, musingly—"a werry good 'un, and vorth his grub any day. There ain't a better in the doleful line 'tween this and Vitechapel. I adwises you, young man, to make a friend on the Screamer. He's wot I calls a practical charakter, and hunderstands the public taste to an 'air. My eyes! wot a lot o' browns he did make out of 'Nix my dolly,' to be sure! a small fortin, qvite!"

"Did the author pocket much by the transaction?" I asked carelessly.

"Wot's that to you?" said Mr. Catnach. "Ve never splits in the trade. Hainsvorth's a reglar trump, straight up, right down, and no mistake, and I never grudges the tin for a good hartickel. Vell, Young England, are you done yet? Time's up."

"I think this will do for the catastrophe," said the poet, rising, and handing a sheet of foolscap to the modern Mæcenas.

"Vy, if it's only bloody enough, it's sure to tell," said Mr. Catnach; and he read as follows:—

Then he loaded both his pistols, and he went into the lane,
Quoth he, "My jolly banker, you'll ne'er go back again;
For, blow me, if I do not put this bullet through your wig,—
Now, dash my buttons, Bill, I hear the rattle of the gig."

It was the gig, and no mistake, and the piebald trotting horse;
The banker he was in it, and the banker's wife of course.
They were taking it quite easy, when at the horse's head
Stood Slouching Bill, and on the step stood noble Nimming Ned.

"Fork out the shiners," Ned exclaimed, "I knows they're in your purse,
Or you shall quickly go to grass," and he swore a horrid curse.
The banker took his blunderbuss and snapped it at his head,
But the powder it was wet, and so he didn't do for Ned.

Then Ned he shot the banker dead, and the banker's wife also,
And Bill and Ned they spent the tin as fast as it would go.
But Providence beheld them, though no human eye did see,
And very shortly afterwards they hung at Tyburn tree.
Sing whack fal de riddle, fal de ray!

"I've seen you do better, Young England," said Mr. Catnach. "I've seen you do vorse. This ain't spicy enough for the city, that's clear, but it may go off decentish at Wapping. So here's Wapping's wages,—seven and sixpence. But, mark my vords, Young England, you'll run dry werry soon. There ain't enough o' blood about your ballads. I never knowed a poet as lasted above the year who didn't sprinkle his lines with more blood and brains than you do. Now, Sawney, for a taste of your kevolity!"

I submitted to Mr. Catnach's inspection several of my juvenile productions, all which he tossed aside with contempt.

"That ain't the sort o' thing at all! Vy that 'ere's sentiment, and sentiment von't sell. Look here," and he handed me a copy of the Dubman's Gazette; "read that ere desperate burglary, and see if you can't cooper it up into wigorous varse. There's paper. I'm a-going hout on purfessional dooty, and shall be back in an hour; never allows more for a ballad. So look sharp."

I sate down eagerly to work, and although the raw-head-and-bloody-bones style of composition was both new and difficult, I succeeded beyond expectation. I knew that upon this trial my hopes of Mr. Catnach's future patronage depended; and accordingly I put my whole soul and shoulder to the wheel. After the first stanza or two, I became intensely interested in the subject, threw threefold fire into my verses, described the repeated blows of the bludgeon in a gush of almost fiendish melody, and bespattered each ensanguined strophe with a mixture of brains and blood. Long before my patron returned, I had completed the task, and I now placed it in his hands with a feeling of conscious triumph.

Catnach read it with delight. "That's the right stuff, Sawney!" cried he, pouring out a glass of blue ruin for my own peculiar use. "No snivelling or sentiment there! It's worth any two of Young England's trumpery, and not a long chalk off Hainsvorth hisself! I'll have it printed off this very night, and start the Screamer through St. Giles' with it. There's ten bob for you; and I'll give you as much for every bang-up thing of the kind you can vork off. Only mind this—no sentiment, or I've done with you for ever."

Behold, then, at last, the door of fortune opened. Inexpressibly gratified, I squeezed the hand of the benevolent Catnach; pocketed the remuneration, and went home to dream of new literary triumphs.

CHAPTER III.

The Author meets two eminent Literary Characters.

I was sitting, one night, in the public room of The Three Bells, musing over my third pot of heavy, and inventing materials for a work I had then in hand—The Lives of Illustrious Literary Characters,—when my attention was arrested by the entrance of two gentlemen of very singular appearance. They entered with a rollicking, roystering, air, that satisfied me they must have been partaking of a fluid more potent, at least, if not more real, than "the nectar which sparkled for Helen;" and throwing themselves down upon the benches of the next box, planted their feet upon the table before them, and began to beat a tatoo thereupon with their heels, keeping time as they whistled, in charming unison, a favourite air from Bellini's Puritani.

"What shall it be?" said the taller of the strangers; "stingo, or half-and-half?"

"Neither, say I," replied his friend. "A glass of right Nantz for me. Brandy and water, warm with. That is the true Helicon. I have a chapter to finish for old —— to-night; and a hot tumbler will put me all right."

A chapter for old ——? Some eminent literary gentleman, no doubt. I pricked up my ears.

"Driz my kemesa!" said the other, dashing his fist upon the table; "I never can write but upon the raw thing. It stirs the blood in a man's heart; and I can cut a throat, or pitch a brace of swell coves down a well, after a sneaker of gin, as pleasantly as I can sliver a salad in July!"

Another literary character! I began to scrutinise them closely. The last speaker was stout and well-formed, with an inclination to corpulence, fostered, to all appearance, by the repeated application of stimulants to the system. His face was florid, and his features well rounded off; but the circumstance of one of his eyes being in deep mourning, added to a bandit-like exuberance of whisker, gave a general air of ferocity to his appearance. His neckcloth was twisted in such a manner, as strongly to resemble a rope of unusual thickness, and terminated, in front, in a noose of an extremely significant character. In his shirt was a double breastpin, of very fanciful construction, being, in fact, a miniature gallows, the rope of which formed the chain that connected the tree itself with the mosaic malefactor, which formed the minor limb of this graceful personal ornament. His vest, again, was held together by buttons that were linked to one another by small fac-similes of fetters, of the most elaborate workmanship.

His friend was remarkable for nothing but his long hair, and a considerable profusion of mosaic jewellery, relieved against an azure satin stock and waistcoat. His features had all the interesting paleness of active intellect and dissipation, and his accent was marked by the attic graces of Cockaigne.

"I say, Villiam," said the latter gentleman, after his friend and himself had been provided with their favourite fluids, and pipes, "I say, Villiam, han't you got no spare idears, as you could help a feller to? I'm reg'larly used up. The machinery's vorn out, and the clock vont strike."

"Idears! vy, Chawls, I'd give any money, not exceeding two bob and a tizzy, for an idear, I vould. But it's no use makin' handsome offers. They can't be had at any price."

I immediately thought of offering my services, but I refrained.

"Steal, Chawls, my boy—prig, fake away! That's the sort of thing ven your own stock runs out. By the bye, talking of that, I turned off a song for my 'Jerry Abershaw' this morning. Like to hear it?" His friend assented. "No objections, Sir, to my airing my voice a little?"

This was addressed to me. "Certainly not," I replied.

"Vell, you'll chorus me, gentlemen, in course."

We bowed assent; and, clearing his throat, he began—

KETCH ENDS ALL.

Bing avast, bing avast, my kinchin mort, so fast,
  Bing avast, quoth young Jerry Snitch, Sir;
My bit of blood for me, and the common all so free,
  And midnight black as pitch, Sir,
For a grazier stout and bold, with his pockets full of gold,
  Is a prize that is not so dusty;
And with my little pill of lead 'tis I can still
  His murmurs, if he's crusty,
    With a driz kemesa—fake away!

You may like, quoth old Mob, the heath; but a fob,
  With a ticker and onions gay, Sir—
O that is my delight, on a dark and squally night,
  Ven the gemmen is a-leaving the play, Sir.
With my forks all so fly, in their pockets I ply,
  And none of them so deep is, but I know
Its depth to a hair, and votever may be there,
  Be it fogle, or fawny, or rhino,
    With my driz kemesa, fake away!

Holloh, quoth smashing Joe, there's a game that I know,
  That is worth both your games twice over,
A put up job so crank, at a counting-house or bank,
  Is the thing that will put a man in clover.
My crowbar, and my glim, and my skeletons so trim,
  They're passports to till and to strong-box;
And the cove that stops my vay vill uncommon qvickly say,
  That he finds he has got into the wrong box,
    With my driz kemesa, fake away!

The common all so free, quoth Sneaking Jeremy,
  Is good for the health and the wind, Sir;
And 'tis sweet to fake the cly of a kiddy on the sly,
  And summut therein to find, Sir;
And the werry best of men might be proud to crack a ken,—
  But, vot of that, my pals,—pass the beer, oh,
'Tis very plain that ve all on Tyburn tree
  Vun day must dance a Bolero,
    With my driz kemesa, fake away!

"Brayvo!" exclaimed the singer's friend, "you take the conceit out of Paul Bedford himself."

"Kim, kim, Chawls, don't be trying to fawny my famms that way. You can't dimber damber me," and he flourished his fingers playfully in front of his nose. "But ain't there wot the critics call a fine tone of morality running through that song?"

"Certainly. The conclusion is highly philosophical. Let a man follow what branch of Conveyancing he will, it matters not. The paths of glory lead but to the—"

"Hexactly! it's a sad truth. But the genius of the crow-bar and dark-lanthorn shall yet have its honours. Romance—romance shall hallow the legends of Hounslow and Newgate!" and the speaker emptied his tumbler in the fervour of his enthusiasm. A fresh supply was ordered in.

"I've been a-thinking as 'ow," said his friend, after a pause,—"as 'ow it won't do for two of us to be going any longer on the same beat."

"Quite my sentiments," replied the other. "We mustn't cut each other's throats."

"No, no,—we've enough to do cutting other people's. I'm thinking of going into the sentimental line."

"Babble of green fields, eh?"

"Something that way. Talk a deal about pleasant sunshine, smiling meadows, and gushing streams, and sprinkle the page plentifully with green leaves. That's always cool and refreshing."

"As soda water after a night at the Finish!"

"Precisely. I think that a great deal may be made of little children and flowers. They have great capabilities,—great capabilities, and will tell amazingly after the excitement of the burglaries, and assassinations that have been so plentiful of late. I'll tell you a plan I have."

But I cannot divulge the design of which I was then an involuntary auditor,—not so much from any delicacy upon that score, as because I mean to appropriate it to my own purposes. "Steal, prig, fake away!" The hint was excellent, though hardly new—to me at least.

What more passed on that particular evening, or how I lost sight of the literary strangers, I am unable to say. In the morning I found myself reposing under the table, a position which I am totally unable to account for. The amplitude of my dinner will certainly not explain it. I never met them again; but, I have no doubt, in my own mind, whatever others may think, that they were two very well-known popular authors, and very great men.

CHAPTER IV.

A little experience soon convinced me that a good deal more could be done in London by a fearless genius like myself, besides ministering to the literary wants of the admirers of Mr. Catnach. I became connected with several of the unstamped papers; and as I never gave way to foolish scruples about the accuracy of my facts, I was at all times ready to supply their columns with abundance of racy material. In the dull season, and during the recess of Parliament, I could cook up a murder of the most atrocious description, with minute and harrowing details, to meet the order of an hour: and there was not the slightest chance of detection, as I always chose the far west of Ireland for my locale. A fire that consumed half a city, somewhere in the Austrian dominions, cost me less trouble than the lighting of my cigar. Earthquakes at Lisbon or Comrie succeeded each other with alarming rapidity; and I remember that an original article of mine, announcing a general insurrection of the tribes who border on the Danube, produced a sensible effect upon the transactions of the money market. Nor were my exploits confined entirely to the continent. At home I made visionary way into the privacy of the most distinguished circles. Neither Lord Melbourne nor the boy Jones were more familiar with the interior of Buckingham Palace than myself; and at the Privy Council I had a constant and unchallenged seat. The morning prints were but too glad to purchase my information; and I prospered in the world to a corresponding degree.

Still I did not neglect my older friends. Catnach still received a weekly tribute from my muse, (only I had somewhat raised its price;) and I still courted the society of the courteous Screamer in the nearest public-house, whenever accident threw him in my way. This last stroke of policy resulted to my material advantage. One day the grateful youth informed me that Mr. Warren, of the great Blacking establishment, had beckoned him into his shop, and requested to know the name of the individual of whose poetical talents the Screamer was the daily herald. Jim, having first ascertained that nothing beyond half-a-crown and a couple of pots of beer could be extorted in return for the information, communicated my name and address; and to this circumstance I owed my introduction to the man, who certainly is entitled to rank foremost among the modern patrons of literature. His regular poet had just died from a fit of delirium tremens; my productions were too well-known to render a sample necessary, and accordingly I was at once crowned with the vacant bays, and retained at a liberal fixed salary. I confess that I was somewhat gratified at being relieved from the monotony of my former labours. It was by no means easy to invent new horrors every day for the expectant flock of Mr. Catnach, and real ones were of rare occurrence. I felt, too, that my relish for the classics became perceptibly blunted by dwelling perpetually over scenes of blood; and accordingly I turned with satisfaction to the more varied field which was now laid open to my steps. In proportion as my style became more figurative and classic, I rose in the estimation of the polished readers of Mr. Warren, and the sale of countless thousands of bottles was sure to follow the appearance of my chefs d'œuvre. Perhaps I may be allowed here to insert one of my sonnets, which I believe made no inconsiderable sensation at the time.

OTHELLO REDIVIVUS.

Sweet Desdemona, old Brabantio's child,
The gentle lady wedded to the Moor,
Gave not her heart away, young men, be sure,
For idle Fancy's call or passion wild.
'Twas not his form that her young love beguiled,
Nor yet the dangers that he did endure.
No! but his swart complexion was the lure,—
And the white teeth that glistened when he smiled.
Would ye then know how lady's love is won,
How best their fond affections to command?—
Lose not a moment, then, but straightway run
To WARREN'S BLACKING OFFICE, 30, STRAND,
Anoint your face with that resplendent bloom,
And maids will love you till the crack of doom.

Perhaps the following canzonet, conceived in a more lively vein, may interest the reader. It will be observed that the style is very much the same with that adopted by Shakspere and other writers of the Elizabethan era.

WHO BEATS NATURE?

Canst thou wash the Ethiop white?
Vain, oh vain, the rash endeavour—
Empty seas upon him, quite,
And he's blacker still than ever!
Swarthy is the African—
Swarthy in his face and feature:
'Tis a useless task for man
To efface the work of Nature.

Make the European black?
Is thy intellect so barren?
None can do it!—"Paddy Whack!
I'm the man for that!" quoth Warren.
Fetched a bottle—stripped him stark—
And with Blacking overlaid him—
Coals were never half so dark
As the hue that Warren made him.

About this time I became acquainted with Mrs. Bantam, the widow of a most respectable and opulent poulterer in Cheapside. She was—is, I may say—a magnificent woman, with large, dark, lustrous eyes, sometimes melting like those of the gazelle, sometimes glowing like an animated cinder. I met her first at the house of my distinguished friend, Tipsley, well-known as a leading contributor to some of the popular periodicals. Her two children had just died of the pip, which affecting event I celebrated in a little poem, which the Countess of Blessington was kind enough to insert in a late volume of the Keepsake. This little effort of the muse touched the widow's heart. The progress of our courtship was short, but prosperous. No sooner had she abandoned her weeds, than I led her to the hymeneal altar. After that interesting ceremony—but I draw a curtain over the scenes of connubial bliss.

Shortly, afterwards, I removed with my bride to a commodious mansion in a fashionable street, and, whilst there, gathered the materials from which I have been fortunately enabled to enrich myself and the literature of my native country with "The Lives of The Old Clothes Men."

The success of the work was complete, and at once placed me in an honourable position among the literati of the day. I was immediately applied to by several publishers, to undertake a series of other works in all departments of Literature and Science, which I am now compiling with my usual dexterity.

Thus, kind reader, I have gone over the principal events of my literary career. To those who shall follow after me, some such memorial is due; for I wish that one and all should learn and understand the full value of the motto which is emblazoned upon the shield of the Garbages,—"Bucca triumphans," which may be rendered for the edification of the vulgar thus,

To him who seeks to write or strives to speak,
The first best gift is this—Unbounded Cheek.

A ROYAL REVERY; (WITH INTERRUPTIONS.)

"No flattery, boy! an honest man can't live by't:
It is a little sneaking art, which knaves
Use to cajole and soften fools withal."

Twice five centuries, stern and old,
Have hallow'd this regal ring of gold;
In proud puissance 't'as nobly braved
The world enwroth, and was ne'er enslaved;
Ne'er was it wrested, never would yield
To a hostile grasp in the battle-field:—
  But what darkens down the vale?
Fair maidens and matrons cry and weep,
Gray reverend sires forsake their sleep,
And are wringing hands, with hearts that swell,
To hear and to utter that word—Farewell!
—For that soldier there? Can such as he
Create and share such deep agony?
  Hark! hark! we can hear his tale.—
    "Good bye, sweet wife and children dear;
      If I should fall in field or fort,
    Your wants who'll tend?—who'll dry each tear?—
      The Crown demanding my support!"
    "No, husband dear."—"No, partner, no:
      Oh, cruel Rule! Why must I die
    That Crown should shine? Good bye! Good bye!"
      "Nay, father! father! do not go."—
  Wherefore thus do subjects rail?
Baron and serf are by duty bound
To yield their lives for this glorious round:
It ever was so, must so remain,—
Tears like theirs are right royal rain,—
For some must suffer, and some must faint,
That the king may feel no slave's restraint,
And perish the caitiff who will not bleed
For that ancient crown in the hour of need!
          For e'er and ever,
          With nought to sever
The ship o' th' State from this golden helm,
          We will hurl the boast
          On every coast:
Intact is the crown of old England's realm!

II.

Rich with the spoil of a thousand lands,
Gathered by armies of conqu'ring hands,
Our throne—superb as the morning sheen
When breaking the mountain-peaks between—
Feels no strange footstep, knows no dismay,
For it change defies, and mocks decay:—
  But what is gathering there?—
Men withered to scare-crows gaunt and thin;
Spectres of children; a horrid din
Of chattering jaws; the fiendish cry
Despair sends echoing through the sky:—
What lazar-land or barbarous Thule
Overwhelms the happy land We rule?
  Hark! hark! one tells of the care.—
    "We starve:—yet of our native soil
      Some spot is ours to yield us bread;
    With hands to earn, denied the toil,
      Idle, oppressed, and famished,
    Moulder we piece-meal longer?—Nay!
      Nature's first law our want renews,
    Who has must share, who holds must lose;
      Right, grappling Might, sweeps thrones away."
  'Sdeath! and so far do they dare?
Whence spring these murmurs? Make We the woe?—
Sacred for ages from foreign foe
Our throne hath been; what Power comes now
To dash the diadem from our brow?
—Beware! we hold death in fee to sweep
Town, hill, plain, valley, and mountain steep;
At our command armed warriors rise,
And Havoc shrieks along the skies!
          Humble and loyal
          To true blood-royal,
Are Our anchor-flukes—the realm's renown;
          And long may flourish
          Dear thoughts that nourish
The Right Divine of the monarch's crown!

J. A. O.

THE NURSERY AND POPULAR RHYMES AND TALES OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.*

The works enumerated below are made up of things which must be ever welcome and delightful, were it but for the memory of the time when the child drank them in from lips of love, or listened to them on its nurse's knee, in the tender dawn of its budding faculties,—ever welcome to the heart while warmth or freshness remains within it. Nay, more, we are persuaded that the very rudest of these jingles, tales, and rhymes, possess a strong imagination-nourishing power; and that in infancy and early childhood a sprinkling of ancient nursery lore is worth whole cart-loads of the wise saws and modern instances which are now as duly and carefully concocted, by experienced litterateurs, into instructive tales for the spelling public, as are works of entertainment for the reading public. The adult is cunning. He seizes all the light amusing books for himself; and leaves the didactic, dull, and utilitarian to the juveniles. Yet distant be the day when "Useful Knowledge," which is making Scythian inroads into all the primrose paths of fancy, shall seriously invade the nursery; and not content with expelling fairies, brownies, ghosts and goblins, Nixies, Pixies, Jack o' Lanterns, and Water Kelpies, also put to rout Jack the Giant Queller, Little Red Riding Hood, and Tom Thumb; not sparing even Cock Robin, or the Wee Croodlin Doo. There appears some danger of such a catastrophe in these improved days, when all the sciences are taught to all ages in wondrous tiny manuals; and when Lady Lovechild and Tommy Goodchild regularly put forth Lilliputian Codes of Minor Morals, in place of the dear old chap-books of tale, romance, marvel, and ballad-story, which—

Nourish'd imagination in our youth.

Upon anything like these no modern English or American writer longer ventures; and the Americans in particular deal by wholesale in juvenile literature, composed upon the principle of cramming the memory and starving the imagination.

Without an early and ample initiation into the wild, fanciful, and romantic lore of the old nursery, we will venture to affirm that there has never been a great poet. It were not too much to affirm that there never can be one. What command over the shadowy hosts of the middle-age mythology is displayed by Shakspere, whose dramas are also richly studded with snatches of popular old songs, tales, and rhymes! Milton, Dryden, Gray, Collins, Chatterton, Akenside, Goldsmith, Burns, Scott, Southey, Leyden, Hogg, the great and the small who deserve the name of poet, display the same love for the wild tales, and fire-side rhymes and stories, which form the traditional lore of their respective countries. Some of the greatest of these men have acknowledged in this the first source of their inspiration, and their deep obligations to the kind grandam or ancient nurse, who—or chanted the rueful ballad; ever and anon bursting into the merry nonsensical jingle, which charmed her more infantile auditors. Now, alas! no respectable nurse, albeit of "the North Countrie," will conclude a story of ghost, or fay, or enchantment, without the precautionary admonition, "But now bairns, ye ken this is a' havers about the Red-Etin and Jock and the Bean. There's nae ghaists nor fairies, giants nor water-kelpies, now-a-days, when the Gospel is so rife in the land, and the schoolmaster abroad,—sae ye maunna tell your mamma I telled ye ony o' that daftlike nonsense ye plague me for, when ye should be sleeping, or else learning your phrenology, and your geology, and astronomy carritches." Nurse's pupils, if good for anything, are not likely to need her sage admonitions; nor to hold each strange tale the less "devoutly true," for her warnings. Children are never sceptical till they are beginning to be corrupted.

For the above reasons, and others equally conclusive, we conceive the rising generation and its friends much indebted to those gentlemen who have directed their time and talents to the conservation of our nursery and popular rhymes and tales; which, especially in the present rapid change of manners, and amidst the great aggregates of population in modern cities, are in imminent danger of being lost. But we owe them gratitude on other grounds. Besides the over-wise dull books written for children, it has become a fashion of late, in compliance with a vicious and debased public taste, to travesty the most exquisite and precious gems of our early popular literature, and the sweetest and tenderest morsels of our nursery lore. The talents of clever artists have been employed in embellishing these cold-blooded mockeries with ludicrous caricatures; as if starving the infant imagination and narrowing the heart were the set purpose with one class, and the depravation of the moral sensibilities of childhood the object of another. If, with Scott, we would not give "one tear shed over Little Red Riding Hood for all the benefit to be derived from a hundred histories of Jemmy Goodchild,"—what shall we think of the child who could enjoy a mocking parody of, for instance, The Babes in the Wood, with its caricature cuts, save that it was likely to grow up with a cold and mean disposition, without one generous impulse or ennobling feeling; that "the child would be father to the man," and probably come to, and well deserve, the gallows.——In proportion, therefore, to the detestation which we feel for the irreverent attempts of the sneerers to debase and ridicule the nursery and popular traditional literature, do we esteem every earnest attempt that is made to preserve, purify, and diffuse its venerable relics among children. This each of the works before us is calculated to do in no mean degree; though we naturally, if not also nationally, give the preference to Mr. R. Chambers' cheap and unpretending book. This gentleman originally turned his attention to this subject because he loved it; and he has long had opportunities of studying it, and of increasing his stores from good sources. His work first appeared in 1826, and since then no opportunity of adding to and improving it has been lost. It has thus become a volume for the literary antiquary, as well as a manual for the nursery and ingle-neuk. Mr. Halliwell has either been greatly indebted to the contemporary work of Chambers, or, as is as probable, there is a very remarkable coincidence between the tales, rhymes, games, and frolics of the children of England and those of Scotland. They are, indeed, often identical, or merely variorum editions. The affinity of both to the German popular tales and rhymes is as remarkable; though it does not lie in the way of the present collectors to trace the rhymes and stories they give to their first source; or to determine which may claim the honour of being the original. Whether Whittington's cat was really an Asiatic puss; or the Frog-wooer a German, and not a Scottish prince; whether, in reality, Jack, commonly called the Giant-Killer, and Master Thomas Thumb, "actually landed in England from the same warships which brought over Hengist and Horsa, and Ebba the Saxon," they leave, with a hundred other moot points, to the learned antiquary, never once adverting to such topics. John Leyden imagined that many of the Scottish popular stories must have been common to the Norman-French, from whom both the English and Scotch may have derived them. The Normans, again, brought them from Scandinavia. But the cold north was assuredly not the sole birth-place, or cradle, of these fanciful fables and legends. The origin and history of Tom Thumb alone, alias Tom a Lyn, alias Tamlane, alias Dunnerling, Thumbling, Tommel-finger, &c. &c., would fill volumes ere it could be determined whether we should, with the learned Hearne, accept him as king Edgar's page; or, with Southey, trace his origin to the mysteries of Indian mythology, which are conjectured to have an especial connexion with his adventure with the cow. The inmates of the nursery have enough to interest them in the bold adventures and daring pranks of the tiny hero of large ambitions, without troubling themselves about his genealogy; and neither do the latest caterers for the Nursery, Messrs. Chambers and Halliwell, concern themselves with such profound affairs.

Mr. Chambers remarks, that his collection will enable inquirers in France, Holland, and Germany, to ascertain the identity of our tales and rhymes with theirs, and Mr. Halliwell is entitled to make the same assumption. We cannot say that either of these gentlemen have, in every instance, nicely balanced the relative value of the pieces they have selected. Mr. Chambers' large collection of rhymes on places, will, probably, have very little interest out of Scotland; while his nursery rhymes, and the rhymes connected with natural objects, old usages, and superstitions, must, we think, strongly interest and delight the whole Teutonic family. If not in every instance literally the common property of all its tribes, they are in spirit, and often in form, close of kin, or a common stock.

Between many of the popular rhymes of England and Scotland, there is not merely coincidence, but absolute identity—the only differences being the dialect, and slight verbal modifications. The editions of Mr. Chambers seem to us, in general, the best—principes; though among the endless oral readings there are some which we consider better than his. As, for example, the well-remembered vituperation of truants from school, which sticks to our memory, as:—

Truan, truan trettibus,
Where shall I get you?
Round about the nettle-bus
Playing shoogie-shew.

In the same column with this, occurs other rhymes, of which there are different and better oral editions. Thus—

The mune shines bright,
And the stars gie a licht,
Ye'll see to kiss a bonny lass
At ten o'clock at night,

is more generally and better rendered—

Ye canna kiss a bonny lass—darkness being ever favourable to love-stealths. Of an elegant poetical riddle which Mr. Halliwell gives, but which he does not seem to know means a star, he entirely misses the point, from not knowing what is referred to:—

I had a little sister, they called her Peep, Peep,
She waded the waters deep, deep, deep;
She climb'd the mountains high, high, high,
Poor little creature, she wanted an eye!

Mr. Chambers has the true version, which is—

And, poor litfle creature, she has but one eye!

Some of the Scotch rhyming riddles, by the way, are rather poetical, as this of mist:—

Banks fou', braes fou',
Gather ye a' the day ye'll no gather your neives fou'.

And of high wind:—

Arthur o' Bower has broken his bands,
And he's come roarin' ower the lands;
The king of Scots and a' his power,
Canna turn Arthur o' Bower.

There are several rhymes, both Scottish and English, formed upon this one,—which, by the way, as probably refers to a river in flood causing inundation, as to a high wind.

But the most poetical of the Scotch rhymes are the lullabies, and those meant to knit the affections of children to birds and beautiful insects. The robin is the sacred bird of the north of Europe; and the wren, from its minute and beautiful form, and alert and lively motions, is not less a favourite. Among the birds which it is considered unlucky to molest, are—

The laverock and the lintie,
The robin and the wren;
And if ye harry their nest,
Ye'll never thrive agen.

Mr. Chambers supposes that the stone-chat is exempted from the pains and penalties of harrying, in consequence of the rhyming malediction put into its bill, on those who molest its nest or young: but we fear that he is mistaken; and that the stone-chat, with the yellow-hammer, is still considered quite as fair game as a pyot or a crow. By the way, his rhyme on the yellow-hammer is not the best edition, which, if we remember aright, in describing the mysterious nature of the bird, goes thus:—

Half a paddock, half a taed,
Half a yellow yorlin,
Sucks a drap o' the diel's blude,
Every May mornin'.

The lady-bird—as often prosaically called by the children of England the lady-cow—is a universal favourite in every country, probably from the extreme beauty of its colours, which makes this chaffer more resemble the brilliant insects of tropical countries than the slaty and russety tribes of northern latitudes. The children in Scotland throw up the lady-bird, singing—

Lady, Lady Landers,
Flee away to Flanders.

In Jamieson's Dictionary, variorum versions of many of our popular rhymes are to be found; and these Mr. Chambers has, in general, adopted as the best.

In addressing the lady-bird, the children of Yorkshire sing

Lady-cow, lady-cow, fly thy way home,
Thy house is on fire, and thy children all gone,
All but one, that ligs under a stone;
Fly thee home, lady-cow, ere it be gone.

These rhymes are certainly borrowed from those addressed by the German children to the Marien-Würmchen; of one of which there is an elegant translation in the dear Gammer Grethel of Mr. Taylor,—most dear to the inmates of the Nursery;—and another in Howitt's Domestic Life of the Germans. In the Scotch and English editions this song is sadly curtailed of its fair proportions; so, for the sake of the little folks, and auld langsyne, we shall copy out Mr. Taylor's translation—which is peculiarly sweet.

Lady-bird! Lady-bird! pretty one! stay:
Come sit on my finger, so happy and gay;
With me shall no mischief betide thee;
No harm would I do thee, no foeman is near:
I only would gaze on thy beauties so dear,
Those beautiful winglets beside thee.

Lady-bird! Lady-bird! fly away home,
Thy house is a-fire, thy children will roam;
List! list! to their cry and bewailing:
The pitiless spider is weaving their doom,
Then, Lady-bird! Lady-bird! fly away home,
Hark! hark! to thy children's bewailing.

Fly back again, back again, Lady-bird dear!
Thy neighbours will merrily welcome thee here,
With them shall no peril betide thee;
They'll love thee, and guard thee from danger or care,
And all for a peep at thy winglets so fair,
Those beautiful winglets beside thee.

The Frog-Prince, of which Mr. Chambers has given us a good edition, under the title of The Wadle o' the World's End, is identical with the German tale, The Frog-Prince, given by the learned Brothers Grimm, and by the ingenious Mr. Taylor, in the aforesaid Gammer Grethel. Dr. John Leyden, in the notes to his edition of The Complaynt of Scotland, mentions this tale, which, in The Complaynt, is entitled, The Wolf of the World's End. From his own recollection of the story, probably first heard in childhood in his native village of Denholm, he relates—

I have heard fragments of songs repeated, in which the 'Well of the Warldis End' is mentioned, and denominated 'the well Absalom,' and 'the cauld well sae weary.' According to the popular tale, a lady is sent by her stepmother to draw water from the well of the world's end. She arrives at the well, after encountering many dangers; but soon perceives that her adventures have not reached a conclusion. A frog emerges from the well, and before it suffers her to draw water, obliges her to betroth herself to the monster, under the penalty of being torn to pieces. The lady returns safe; but at midnight the frog-lover appears at the door, and demands entrance, according to promise, to the great consternation of the lady and her nurse.

'Open the door, my hinnie, my heart,
Open the door, mine ain wee thing;
And mind the words that you and I spak
Down in the meadow, at the well-spring.'

The frog is admitted, and addresses her—

'Take me up on your knee, my dearie,
Take me up on your knee, my dearie;
And mind the words that you and I spak
At the cauld well sae weary.'

The frog is finally disenchanted, and appears as a prince, in his original form."

In the German tale of the Grimms, the enchanted Prince sings—

"Open the door, my Princess dear;
Open the door to thy true-love here;
And mind the words that you and I said,
By the fountain cool in the greenwood shade."

The result of the adventure is the same as in the Scottish story. The Germans have another pretty tale of this kind, called, by Mr. Taylor, "Cherry the Frog-Bride." Three Princes, brothers, are each in love with Cherry, whom the spite of an old woman, who was a fairy, turns into a frog. The youngest, and the successful lover, in the course of his adventures, comes to The Bridge at the World's End, and the poor frog enables him to accomplish the many impossible tasks imposed on him,—is finally disenchanted, found to be a prodigy of beauty, and married to him. In the Scotch tale of Whippety Stourie there is an almost exact coincidence with the German story of Rumpel-Stilts-Ken. As the German edition is the more elegant of the two, we shall give it as a specimen, leaving our readers to contrast it with the indigenous Whippety Stourie, as found in Mr. Chambers—

RUMPEL-STILTS-KEN.

By the side of a wood, in a country a long way off, ran a fine stream of water; and upon the stream there stood a mill. The miller's house was close by, and the miller, you must know, had a very beautiful daughter. She was, moreover, very shrewd and clever; and the miller was so proud of her, that he one day told the king of the land, who used to come and hunt in the wood, that his daughter could spin gold out of straw. Now this king was very fond of money; and when he heard the miller's boast, his greediness was raised, and he sent for the girl to be brought before him. Then he led her to a chamber in his palace where there was a great heap of straw; and gave her a spinning-wheel, and said, "All this must be spun into gold before morning, as you love your life." It was in vain that the poor maiden said that it was only a silly boast of her father, for that she could do no such thing as spin straw into gold; the chamber door was locked, and she was left alone.

She sat down in one corner of the room, and began to bewail her hard fate; when on a sudden the door opened, and a droll-looking little man hobbled in, and said, "Good morrow to you, my good lass, what are you weeping for?" "Alas!" said she, "I must spin this straw into gold, and I know not how." "What will you give me," said the hobgoblin, "to do it for you?" "My necklace," replied the maiden. He took her at her word, and sat himself down to the wheel, and whistled and sang,

"Round about, round about,
Lo and behold!
Reel away, reel away,
Straw into gold!"

And round about the wheel went merrily; the work was quickly done, and the straw was all spun into gold.

When the king came and saw this, he was greatly astonished and pleased; but his heart grew still more greedy of gain, and he shut up the poor miller's daughter again with a fresh task. Then she knew not what to do, and sat down once more to weep; but the dwarf soon opened the door, and said, "What will you give me to do your task?" "The ring on my finger," said she. So her little friend took the ring, and began to work at the wheel again, and whistled and sang,

"Round about, round about,
Lo and behold!
Reel away, reel away,
Straw into gold!"

till long before morning all was done again.

The king was greatly delighted to see all this glittering treasure; but still he had not enough; so he took the miller's daughter to a yet larger heap, and said, "All this must be spun to-night; and if it is, you shall be my queen." As soon as she was alone the dwarf came in, and said, "What will you give me to spin gold for you this third time?" "I have nothing left," said she. "Then say you will give me," said the little man, "the first little child that you may have, when you are queen." "That may never be," thought the miller's daughter: and as she knew no other way to get her task done, she said she would do what he asked. Round went the wheel again to the old song, and the mannikin once more spun the heap into gold. The king came in the morning, and, finding all he wanted, was forced to keep his word; so he married the miller's daughter, and she really became queen.

At the birth of her first little child she was very glad, and forgot the dwarf, and what she had said. But one day he came into her room, where she was sitting playing with her baby, and put her in mind of it. Then she grieved sorely at her misfortune, and said she would give him all the wealth of the kingdom if he would let her off, but in vain; till at last her tears softened him, and he said, "I will give you three days' grace, and if during that time you tell me my name, you shall keep your child."

Now the queen lay awake all night, thinking of all the odd names that she had ever heard; and she sent messengers all over the land to find up new ones. The next day the little man came, and she began with TIMOTHY, ICHABOD, BENJAMIN, JEREMIAH, and all the names she could remember; but to all and each of them he said, "Madam! that is not my name."

The second day she began with all the comical names she could hear of, BANDY-LEGS, HUNCH-BACK, CROOK-SHANKS, and so on; but the little gentleman still said to every one of them, "Madam! that is not my name."

The third day one of the messengers came back, and said, "I travelled two days without hearing of any other names; but yesterday, as I was climbing a high hill, among the trees of the forest where the fox and the hare bid each other good night, I saw a little hut; and before the hut burnt a fire; and round about the fire a funny little dwarf was dancing upon one leg and singing,

"'Merrily the feast I'll make,
To-day I'll brew, to-morrow bake;
Merrily I'll dance and sing,
For next day will a stranger bring.
Little does my lady dream
Rumpel-stilts-ken is my name!'"

When the queen heard this she jumped for joy, and as soon as her little friend came, she sat down upon her throne, and called all her court round to enjoy the fun; and the nurse stood by her side with the baby in her arms, as if it was quite ready to be given up. Then the little man began to chuckle at the thoughts of having the poor child, to take home with him to his hut in the woods; and he cried out, "Now, lady, what is my name?" "Is it JOHN?" asked she. "No Madam!" "Is it TOM?" "No Madam!" "Is it JEMMY?" "It is not." "Can your name be RUMPEL-STILTS-KEN?" said the lady, slily. "Some witch told you that! some witch told you that!" cried the little man, and dashed his right foot in a rage so deep into the floor, that he was forced to lay hold of it with both hands to pull it out.

Then he made the best of his way off, while the nurse laughed, and the baby crowed; and all the court jeered at him, for having had so much trouble for nothing; and said, "We wish you a very good morning, and a merry feast, MR. RUMPEL-STILTS-KEN!"

One takes more interest in the Scotch Whippety Stourie, since Sir Walter Scott fancied in Miss Edgeworth, when he first saw her, the semblance of that most alert and benevolent fairy dame. The Irish have a mutilated version of this tale.

We are disappointed at Mr. Chambers giving us no Scottish version of Cinderella, as we are certain there is one extant; for we can still remember the warning of the fairy bird, when the enamoured prince carried off the wrong sister.

Clippit fit, and nippit fit,
Behind the young Prince rides,
While bonny fit, and little fit,
Beneath the caudron hides.

In the metrical story of Catskin, Mr. Halliwell gives something between the German tale of that name, and the genuine Cinderella, which, as a Nursery romance, is known over nearly all Europe. Under the name of Ashen-Puttel it is found in the collection of the brothers Grimm. It is known among the Welsh, the Poles, the Danes, the Servians, and, in short, to every nation; and the celebrated Neapolitan Collection of Nursery Tales, the "Pentamerone," a production of the sixteenth century, has the Cennertola. The genuine Scottish oral edition would be desirable, and, we daresay, may still be easily recovered. Like the memory of a dream, we can recall a fireside tale of the lowland districts of Perthshire and Stirlingshire, of which the heroine, by name Kate Ill-Prats,* was an exact counterpart of the great Thomas Thumb, with a dash of Jack the Giant-Killer; though her prodigies were all performed by strategy, and the aid of that enchanted bird-counsellor who plays so important a part in such tales. The monstrous giant or ogre against whom Kate was pitted, among other tyrannical hests, commands her to bring him a riddle full of water from some enchanted well, probably that at the World's End; and she is in despair, until the bird sings—

Stuff wi' fog [moss] and clem wi' clay,
And then ye'll carry the water away.

The gaint was, we recollect, exceeding waukrife; and he had, besides, as an alarum-clock, a coverlet to his bed, studded with bells; so that Kate Ill-Prats found it impossible to cut off his head, or steal the keys of the castle—we forget which—until she one day ingeniously stuffed the bells with boiled bread and milk.

* Ill-Prats—mischievous, clever tricks.

There is also, as we can remember, a Scottish oral edition of the nearly universal "Beauty and the Beast," with its fine moral, and true philosophy. The Fairies, no longer known in the English Nursery, and beginning to be forgotten at Scottish rural firesides, still act a conspicuous part in the fanciful popular tales of Germany. Witches are happily everywhere banished, or nearly so, though a few monkish or witch charms are remembered, and sometimes repeated in sport. The following rhyme, to make the butter come if the process of churning is tardy, is still familiar in England. It must be repeated three times :—

Come, butter, come,
Come, butter, come!
Peter stands at the gate
Waiting for a butter cake.
Come, butter, come!

The Shetlanders, among other charms, have one to cure the ringworm; and in Scotland it is still quite customary for children, before taking a mounting leap, to say,—

Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
Haud the horse till I loup on;

though they may not be aware of the significance of the rhyme, which is taken from a charm known in many parts of England :—

Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
Guard the bed that I lie on!
Four corners to my bed,
Four angels round my head;
One to watch, one to pray,
And two to bear my soul away.

The late Sir Humphrey Davy, when a boy, was taught to repeat the subjoined rhyme, as a charm against the cramp :—

Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, ease us, I beg,
The Devil has tied a knot on my leg;
Crosses three + + + we make to ease us:
Two for the robbers, and one for Christ Jesus.

Some of the rhymes which Mr. Chambers has set down as puerile, or as stark nonsense-verses, are, in fact, old charms; which, by the way, does not quite prove their sense.

Though we allow all the lullabies, and a few songs adapted to young children, to the exclusive use of the Nursery, there is not much propriety in inserting every snatch of ballad or song, historical, comic, and even amatory, and not over delicate, which lively nurse-maids may have introduced into their sanctuaries. In this style we find, in Mr. Halliwell's book, corrupted or mutilated versons of Old King Cole, When good King Arthur ruled the land, The Jew's Daughter, and in a more objectionable style, There was a Little Man, and he wooed a Little Maid, and even songs from farces of no great antiquity, and without merit of any sort. Some of these things are the catches of grown people; others mere vulgarities, as this—and the list might easily be extended :—

Says Moses to Aaron,
That fellow's a-swearing;
Says Aaron to Moses,
He's drunk I supposes.

Aaron said unto Moses,
Let's sit down and fuddle our noses.

Now, this kind of stable-yard rigmarole or ribaldry has no legitimate claim of naturalisation in a well-regulated nursery.

Some of the songs which Mr. Chambers has given, if they do not properly belong to the Nursery, are, at least, beautiful, and not otherwise exceptionable. Among the snatches of song which he has given, as a child's, is "Cock up your Beaver," which is, if we recollect aright, one of Grisell Baillie's songs for mature age. Apropos to another of these songs—Sir Walter Scott, when the exciting news burst upon Europe that Buonaparte had miraculously escaped from Elba, and was marching on to Paris in great force, began a letter to a friend with this snatch of song which Mr. Chambers gives as a Jacobite rhyme :—

Some say the deil's dead, the deil's dead, the deil's dead;
Some say the deil's dead, and buried in Kirkaldy;
Some say he's risen again, risen again, risen again,
Some say he's risen again, and danced the Highland laddie.

Mr. Halliwell has a few good political and satirical rhymes, though they be not very appropriate to the Nursery. Nay, Mr. Halliwell occasionally treats his readers to a matrimonial satire as a Nursery song.——The Reformers and Puritans had their revenge for the satires of the Cavaliers and Jacobites in the game of the Confessional; which is played by shadows on the wall. Of the words which accompanied the playful skirmish of the shadowy fingers, Mr. Halliwell gives us two versions. This is the Oxfordshire one, and the briefest :—

Father, O father, I'm come to confess.
Well, my daughter, well!
Last night I call'd the cat a beast.
Shocking, my daughter, shocking!
What penance? my father, what penance?
What penance! my daughter, what penance!
What penance shall I do?
Kiss me.

We finish with the penance of the Kentish version :—

Kiss me three times.
Oh! but I can't!
Oh! but you must!
Oh! but I can't, &c., ad lib.
Well, what must be must,
So kiss, kiss, kiss, and away.

The lullabies of the English Nursery are very inferior in poetical spirit to a few of those of Scotland; though the entire class of the Bye, Baby Bunton; Hush a by, Baby; Hey, my Kitten, &c., &c., are much the same in both countries. Mr. Chambers' collection is, however, peculiarly rich in sweet Scottish lullabies. There is also one beautiful little song, described as a north-country song, in Mr. Halliwell's collection, which deserves its place, though we had it lately in Howitt's Visits to Remarkable Places :—

Says t' auld man tit oak tree,
Young and lusty was I when I kenn'd thee;
I was young and lusty, I was fair and clear,
Young and lusty was I mony a lang year;
But sair fail'd am I, sair fail'd now,
Sair fail'd am I sen I kenn'd thou.

Among the finest of the lullabies given by Mr. Chambers, is the following, taken from Johnson's Musical Museum, and which, both from internal and other evidence, is not unlikely to have been either written or, more probably, improved by Burns :—

O can ye sew cushions,
  Can ye sew sheets,
Can ye sing, Ba-loo-loo,
  When the bairnie greets?
And hee and ba, birdie,
  And hee and ba, lamb;
And hee and ba, birdie,
  My bonnie lamb!
Hee O, wee O,
  What wad I do wi' you?
Black is the life
  That I lead wi' you.
Ower mony o' you,
  Little for to gie you;
Hee O, wee O,
  What wad I do wi' you?

There is no question of the authorship of the following rhyme, which was sent by the poet, when filled with melancholy forebodings as to the fate of his orphan children, to his friend Mrs. Dunlop:—

Oh that I had ne'er been married,
  I wad never had nae care;
Now I've gotten wife and bairns,
  And they cry, Crowdie! ever mair.
Ance crowdie, twice crowdie,
  Three times crowdie in a day;
Gin ye crowdie mickle mair,
  Ye'll crowdie a' my meal away.

The equestrian and manipulative sports of the Scottish Nursery, when the performers are still mere infants, and their steed either papa's foot or the nurse's knee, are not only lively and amusing, but, in their accompaniments of song and music, not a little poetical. We find the following specimen in Chambers' work, which, in this department, is both copious and select:—

The old-fashioned Scottish nurses were rich in expedients for amusing infants. No sooner had the first faint dawn of the understanding appeared, than the faithful attendant was ready to engage it with some practical drollery, so as to keep it in good humour, and exercise the tender faculties. One of the first whimsicalities practised was to take the two feet of the infant, and make them go quickly up and down and over each other, saying the following appropriate verses:—

This is Willie Walker, and that's Tam Sim,
He ca'd him to a feast, and he ca'd him;
And he sticket him wi' the spit, and he sticket him,
And he ower him, and he ower him.
And he ower him, and he ower him, &c.
  Till day brak.

Or the following—

"Feetikin, feetikin,
  When will ye gang?"
"When the nichts turn short
  And the days turn lang,
I'll toddle and gang, toddle and gang," &c.

Arms as well as legs were sometimes taken into these little jocularities; and then the following verses were used:—

The doggies gaed to the mill,
  This way and that way;
They took a lick out o' this wife's pock,
And a lick out o' that wife's pock,
And a loup in the lead, and a drink of the dam,
And gaed hame walloping, walloping, walloping, &c.

Imitations of mechanical operations were—and are, frequent in the Nursery; the child to be amused being himself either a principal character or an actor in the drama. One operation is the nurse shoeing the child as a horse, repeating, while the sole of the little foot is quickly patted—

"John Smith, fallow fine,
Can you shoe this horse o' mine?"
"Yes, sir, and that I can,
As weel as ony man!
There's a nail upon the tae,
To gar the powny speel the brae;
There's a nail upon the heel,
To gar the powny pace weel;
There's a nail and there's a brod,
There's a horsie weel shod,
  Weel shod, weel shod," &c.

The English editions of this are not so minute in details, though the sport is the same. One brisk equestrian rhyme is interpolated by Mr. Chambers with the adult satirical song of Supple Sandy; which seems no improvement. In fact, Mr. Chambers has clashed three distinct Nursery riding-songs as one, and clapped Supple Sandy in the midst of them. But they are each excellent.

Chick! my naggie,
Chick! my naggie,
How many miles to Aberdaigy?
Eight and eight, and other eight,
Try to win there wi' candle-light.

I had a little pony,
  They ca'd it Dapple Grey;
I lent it to a lady,
  To ride a mile away.
She whipt it, she lash'd it,
  She ca'd it ower the brae;
I winna lend my pony mair,
  Though a' the ladies pray.

The catty rade to Passelet,
To Passelet, to Passelet;
The catty rade to Passelet,
  Upon a harrow tine, O.
'Twas on a weety Wednesday,
Wednesday, Wednesday;
'Twas on a weety Wednesday,
  I miss'd it aye sin syne, O.

In the following case, it will be observed that the fun consists in a commencement with slow and graceful riding, degenerating into the gallop of a huckster's donkey:—

This is the way the ladies ride,
  Jimp and sma', jimp and sma'!
This is the way the gentlemen ride,
  Trotting a', trotting a'!
This is the way the cadgers ride,
  Creels and a'! creels and a'!! creels and a'!!!

The following explains its own theatrical character:

I got a little manikin, I set him on my thoomikin;
I saddled him, I bridled him, and sent him to the tooniken;
I coffed a pair o' garters, to tie his little hosiken;
I coffed a pocket-napkin to dight his little nosiken;
I sent him to the garden, to fetch a pund o' sage,
And fand him in the kitchen-neuk, kissin' little Madge!

The following very sweet lullaby is new to us, and is given by Mr. Chambers as from the West of Scotland:—

Ba, wee birdie, birdie,
  Ba, wee birdie, croon;
The ewes are awa' to the siller parks,
  The kye's amang the broom;
The wee bits o' yowes to the heathery knowes,
  They 'll no be back till noon;
If they dinna get something ere they gang out,
  Their wee pipes will be toom.

My Cock, Lily-cock, is a genuine Nursery song and recitative, which never fails to delight the infant hearers from the lively imitations of the pets and domestic animals with which they are first familiar. As an incitement to juvenile readers to acquire this piece, we shall copy out the first and the last stanza; which stanza, by the accumulative process, which children love so much in their games and rhymes, imitates the cries of the whole of the animals described :—

I had a wee cock, and I lov'd it well,
I fed my cock on yonder hill;
My cock, lily-cock, lily-cock, coo;
Every one loves their cock, why should not I love my cock too?

. . . . . .

I had a wee pig, and I loved it well,
I fed my pig on yonder hill;
My pig, squeakie, squeakie,
My cat, cheetie, cheetie,
My dog, bouffie, bouffie,
My sheep, maie, maie,
My duck, wheetie, wheetie,
My hen, chuckie, chuckie,
My cock, lily-cock, lily-cock, coo;
Every one loves their cock, why should not I love my cock too?

In both collections we find versions of the curious ancient ditty, The Hunting of the Wren, which describes an old custom still, it would appear, observed by children, on St. Stephen's day, in the Isle of Man, and also in some parts of Ireland. On that day the Manx children procure a wren, which they tie to a branch of holly decorated with ribbons, and carry through their villages, singing the appropriate song. In Sir Henry Ellis's edition of Brande's Popular Antiquities, this custom is traced to a very remote period. The Druids represented the Wren as the king of all birds; and the first Christian missionaries, taking offence at the superstitious reverence shown to it, incited their early converts, the peasants, to hunt it upon Christmas day, and St. Stephen's day; when it was the custom to carry about the poor little bird, hung to two hoops, crossing each other at right angles, in a rustic procession. The wren is now, however, a favourite bird; and some gentler spirit than these first missionaries has thrown sanctity around it in the well-known rhyme—

The Robin and the Wren
Are God's cock and hen.

Were it not that high, learned authority is against us, we should imagine The Hunting of the Wren a pasquinade, on some much-ado-about-nothing royal or noble hunting-match; and we should certainly set down Little Bo-peep, who lost her sheep, for a ridicule of the maudlin pastoral; were it not that a learned antiquary has lately discovered such deep mysteries in that silly lay. The edition of the famous Hunting of the Wren, given by Mr. Chambers, is from Herd's Collection; and we cannot help thinking it a more pointed one than the traditional song which is given as genuine from the Isle of Man by Mr. Halliwell. Of Robin Redbreast's Testament there are two different editions in the works before us. That given by Mr. Chambers, from Herd's Collection, would seem to be an enlargement or paraphrase of the original Nursery ditty, made by a true poet, who must, moreover, have been a client of the House of Hamilton. It is exceedingly beautiful; and so, indeed, is the English song of Robin's sorrows through the coquettish and jilting Jenny Wren. We cannot resist Robin's Testament, omitting, however, some of his complimentary bequests to his noble patrons. Robin is a true patriotic Scotsman, as well as a devoted follower. He is also a dignified, though an affectionate lover or husband, until his tenderness is abused by a jilt :—

"Gude day now, bonnie Robin,
How lang have you been here?"
"Oh, I have been bird about this bush
This mair than twenty year!"

CHORUS.

Teetle ell ell, teetle ell ell,
Teetle ell ell, teetle ell ell;
Tee tee tee tee tee tee tee,
Tee tee tee tee, teetle eldie.

"But now I am the sickest bird
That ever sat on brier;
And I wad make my testament,
Goodman, if ye wad hear.

Gar tak this bonnie neb o' mine,
That picks upon the corn;
And gie't to the Duke o' Hamilton,
To be a hunting-horn.

. . . . . .

"Gar tak this guid right leg o' mine,
And mend the brig o' Tay;
It will be a post and pillar gude,
It will neither bow nor gae.

And tak this other leg o' mine,
And mend the brig o' Weir;
It will be a post and pillar gude,
It 'll neither bow nor steer.

. . . . . .

"And tak these bonnie feathers o' mine,
The feathers o' my breast;
And gie to ony bonny lad
That 'll bring to me a priest."

Now in there came my lady Wren,
With mony a sigh and groan;
"Oh, what care I for a' the lads,
If my wee lad be gone!"

Then Robin turn'd him round about,
E'en like a little king;
"Go, pack ye out at my chamber-door,
Ye little cutty quean."

Robin made his testament
Upon a coll of hay,
And by cam a greedy gled
And snapt him a' away.

Those lines—

Then Robin turned him round about,
E'en like a little king,—

are ineffable in their Lilliputian manliness and majesty. The love-passages of the English feathered pair are much less pathetic.

Jenny Wren fell sick
Upon a merry time;
In came Robin Red-breast,
And brought her sops and wine.

Eat well of the sop, Jenny,
Drink well of the wine;
Thank you, Robin, kindly,
You shall be mine.

Jenny, she got well,
And stood upon her feet,
And told Robin plainly,
She lov'd him not a bit.

Robin, being angry,
Hopped on a twig,
Saying, Out upon you,
Fy upon you, bold fac'd jig!

Herd's Collection has the Scottish version, from which the above seems to be taken, beginning—

The wren she lies in Care's bed,

Children, could they comprehend the mystery, might be surprised to learn the high descent and antiquity of some of their idle games. The House that Jack Built, and the Old Wife that desired the kid to keep her house till she went to the fair to buy a bonny bunch of berries with the penny which she had found when sweeping her house, are instances of this. The original of this game, or dramatic Tale, has been traced by a learned German to a national Hebrew fable, written in the Chaldee language, and of great antiquity. In the original, the kid, which is one of the clean animals, is said to denote the Jews; the cat the Assyrians; the dog is symbolical of the Babylonians, the staff of the Persians, the fire of the Greeks; and so forth through all the enemies and persecutors of the Jewish nation. If the fable had been modern, we might have expected the Poles, the Spaniards, and the Russians to have figured in it. The Turks and the Saracens have a place, and also the Crusaders. There is no doubt either as to the antiquity or authenticity of this Hebrew Fable, which, however, answers its Nursery purposes not a whit the worse for its double meaning; and never fails, especially in its rapid enumerative catastrophe of "cat, cat, kill mouse, mouse winna cut rope, rope winna hang smith, smith winna fell ox," &c., &c., to give unbounded delight to a juvenile audience. Accumulative rhymes appear to tickle and charm the ears of all children. Of these Mr. Chambers has nearly exhausted the Nursery store; and Mr. Halliwell also gives a few. From Devonshire he inserts the first stanza of a song, entitled, The Beggars of Chidley Fair, of which we can remember a good version, consisting of many stanzas, once familiarly known in the South of Scotland under the name of the Beggars of Coldingham Fair.

The first time that I gaed to Coudingham fair,
I fell in with a jolly beggar;
The beggar's name O it was Harry,
And he had a wife and they called her Mary.
O Mary and Harry, and Harry and Mary,
And Janet and John,
That 's the beggars one by one;
But now I will gi'e you them pair by pair,
All the brave beggars of Coudingham fair.

The next time that I went to Coudingham fair,
There I met with another beggar;
The beggar's name O it was Willie,
And he had a wife and they called her Lillie.
And Harry and Mary, and Willie and Lillie,
And Janet and John,
That 's the beggars one by one;
Now I will gi'e you them pair by pair,
All the brave beggars of Coudingham fair.

The next time that I gaed to Coudingham fair,
I fell in with another beggar;
The beggar's name O it was Wilkin,
And he had a wife and they called her Gilkin.
And Harry and Mary, and Willie and Lillie,
And Wilkin and Gilkin, and Janet and John,
That 's the beggars one by one;
Now I will gi'e you them pair by pair,
All the brave beggars of Coudingham fair.

So on the song proceeds, to a lively tune, until an immense number of odd names are strung together in loose rhymes. Young children appear as much delighted by these sounds, as are youths and maidens with those smooth and musical couplets, which fall so sweetly on a well-tuned ear, though any meaning may, as children say, be far to seek and ill to find.

Mr. Chambers' work is rich in the games of the Scottish children, many of which are evidently framed upon old masques, carols, and those rude dramas which delighted our ancestors, from the guizards of the Farmer's Ha' to the masquers of the courtly circle. The games of little girls, in particular, are exceedingly pretty, both from their dramatic and operatic character; but especially from the beauty, and innocence, and downright earnestness, of the juvenile actors. These operatic performances always take place in the open air, and, of course, only in fine weather—the long sunny evenings of the northern summer. We are sorry that we cannot even advert to them.

There is one fire-side game which Mr. Chambers has overlooked. Curcuddie, or, according to Jamieson, Curcuddoch, denotes a play among children, in which they sit on their hams, [Scottice, hunkers,] and hop round in a circular form. In fact, they perform a kind of dance in this singular posture, which requires great agility and skill in balancing. He who, with arms a-kimbo, can keep longest up, of course beats his compeers. The dancer, or louper, at the same time, sings something like the following lines, for we do not pretend to accuracy of memory:—

Will ye gang to the lea, Curcuddie,
And join your plack wi' me, Curcuddie;
I lookit about, and I saw naebody,
And linkit awa my lane, Curcuddie.

Mr. Halliwell gives the rhyming games of England; but if ever the English children possessed the same sort of fanciful dramatic entertainments, they seem to have fallen into entire oblivion. Mr. Halliwell has, however, been very successful in scraping together an immense number of the purely nonsensical jingles that are to be found in every nursery, fresh as picked up from the street; such as,—

Jim Crow's sister
Bought a little dolly,
And dressed it and nursed it,
And called it pretty Polly.

The difficulty in the case of collectors for the inmates of the Nursery, as for other great public bodies, is "Where to draw the line." Mr. Halliwell has drawn no line at all, nor taken any rule, save to have none of the nonsense of the present century; while under the title, Popular and Nursery Rhymes, Mr. Chambers has assumed a license which covers his free borrowings from every good source. He has, therefore, given us nothing that is not well worthy of preservation, which is more than we dare affirm of his fellow-labourer. We should not object to the song of Old King Cole, or Aikin Drum, for instance, nor yet to the bald English version of the Gudewife of Auchtermuchty, though the former are as appropriate to the convivial circle as to the Nursery, and the latter Morality far above the infantile understanding; but we do object to so many of those purely nonsensical jingles which have not even musical sound to recommend them. Besides, the versions are often corrupt: the sage who has been "The Man of Thessaly" from all nursery generations, is here "The Man of Newington;" and, as a nursery tale, we have a corrupt version of the song or catch of,

> There was an old woman had three sons,
> Geoffrey, James, and John,

Sometimes the same rhyme is repeated in another part of the book, with little or no variation, and frequent mistakes are committed from apparent ignorance of the northern dialects. In short, Mr. Halliwell has opened, and poured forth a poetical inger's pock, or beggar's wallet, upon the Nursery, without much regard to the congruity, or wholesomeness of its contents.

Though we have already gone, as some may conceive, too far with so trivial a subject as Nursery Rhymes, and Fireside and Nursery tales, the theme is, in reality, left unexhausted, not only by this random notice, but by the ingenious writers to whose labours we chiefly refer. Both works we consider worthy of the attention of the popular antiquary; and the latter part, especially of Mr. Chambers' cheap book, deserves a place in every Nursery, for the instruction and edification of the maids in the important art of talking lively nonsense, and of accompanying infant exercises with music, as well as the higher uses of feeding the young fancy with its most natural and nutritious food.

LINES

OCCASIONED BY READING, IN KNIGHT'S "LONDON," AN IRONICAL PASSAGE ON THE FUNERAL OF SHERIDAN.

[Of this son of genius a celebrated pen has written—"In one week he achieved, perhaps, the highest triumph ever gained by intellectual effort: the Palace was entranced with his wit,—the World was enchanted by his humour,—the Senate was enraptured by his eloquence:" and yet most destitute did he die.]

THY tears should flow, O, Genius, for thy son;
The sought—th' admired—the flattered—the undone!
See how his flashes through the Commons blazed:
Think how his wit at Carlton Court amazed:
Now gaze on his irrevocable doom,
—His last sigh breathed "within the inn's worst room;"
'Tis his, the common lot to undergo
With more than common shame and common wo.

And now survey poor Yorick's funeral scene,
The ending pageant of Life's "fitful dream."
His obsequies observed by "troops of friends,"
In Westminster's old fane the drama ends:
'Midst mummied kings the Wit may now repose
While modern Cæsars grace poor "Sherry's" close.

There, ending life neglected and forlorn,
Here, o'er his bier see royal princes mourn:
There, suff'rance hardly bars the imprisoning writ,
Here, coronets would bail and crowns acquit:
There, left to die, by faithless friends forgot,
Here, immortality his envied lot:
There, duns would seize—would crush the broken heart:
Here, kings no more with Sheridan shall part.

O, could thy palsied hand once more have moved
In that vocation which it erst had loved,
What mirth this solemn farce had then provoked,—
How with thy neighb'ring shades thou wouldst have joked;
The vaulted roof had echoed laughter wild
At thy recital, O, thou ill-starred child!
The lengthened aisles had caught the boist'rous sound,
And "Poet's Corner" chuckled it around:
If not the jeer, one execrating groan
Had issued from each hoar sepulchral stone,
Contrasting man's harsh cruelty to man
With all the funeral pomp of Sheridan.

C.

CATALOGUE OF THE POETRY OF 1842.

THERE is a burthen of which, as far as is now possible, we must relieve our consciences. The memorable year, 1842—the beautiful season which, even in the usually surly and dark December, in passing for ever from us, has been unusually fertile in verse, deserving the name of poetry; much of which will be long held in remembrance by those contemporaries who welcomed and enjoyed it, and some of which will live. Wordsworth's new volume, the collected poems of Mr. Tennyson, and the Remains of poor Robert Nicoll, have already been brought at some length under the notice of our readers; and also Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome, not the least remarkable production of 1842. But all the while, save in the most cursory manner, we have not been able to draw the attention of our readers to Bulwer's achievements, in what to him is almost a new field of generous enterprise; nor yet to the attempts of several hopeful aspirants less known to fame, but manfully pressing on to the goal. Among the poems of 1842 which we consider worthy of especial distinction, we would specify the Salamandrine, by Mr. Charles Mackay, (already known by his fine poem, The Hope of the World,) as a highly creditable performance; and Mr. Edmund Peel's Christian Pilgrim, which if not of the highest order, nor indeed of any order of original poetry, is a piece of graceful and impressive metrical composition.

> "Died like a dolphin,"

Sir E. L. Bulwer is, in every view of the matter, entitled to precedence in our catalogue. The volume of his poems, now, we believe, in a second or third edition, takes its title of Eva, a True Story, from one of the longest, though not of the best poems in it. The distinguishing character of the collection, apart from the proofs it bears of the author's compass of mind, intellectual flexibility, and matured artistic skill, is a deeper tone, and a more reflective heart than had, until a very recent period, been perceptible in his brilliant fictions. Of the fire and passion of the born bard few traces may be seen, and the pervading spirit is more closely allied to Wordsworth than to Byron; though there is no palpable imitation of any school, or of any master. As the volume has lain upon our table for months, and been taken up from time to time, it has grown and won upon us; and this, we imagine, will be its general effect. It has none of the glare and dash, none of the theatrical effect of the Bulwer prose fictions. Beautiful, and often profound and subtle thoughts, are expressed with chastenedy and sometimes severe, or almost bald simplicity; and even those subjects which are in themselves comparatively small and trivial, display enlarged and mellowed powers, and the avoidance, if not disdain, of the trickery and mechanical resources of the dexterous versifier. For the volume is claimed, that whatever be its merits or demerits, it comprises in itself the ripest, and least imperfect forms yet vouchsafed to its author of "those fancies which make the calm philosophers, the restless only—Authors!"——This key given, our duty will be discharged by enumerating the principal pieces of the collection, and pointing out some of the smaller ones which have become favourites with ourselves. Eva, a True Story of Light and Darkness, is the beautiful story related by Mr. Combe in his American Travels, which we pointed out, at the time, as something which poets must write upon; as, indeed, a fine poem in the humblest prose. The story was of an idiot boy, or one with faculties eclipsed, who, by the gentle ministrations of a young girl, was awakened to reason: almost the classic fable of Cymon, but with further-reaching consequences; for the boy's gracious guardian-spirit became a mental sufferer in her turn. This touching story is the foundation of Eva, which displays both pathos and graceful fancy. Another long poem, The Ill-omened Marriage, is a domestic novel in verse; a good deal in the style of Crabbe, but without his harshness. But the collection consists of pieces in an endless diversity of styles, and contains a golden treasury of those wise and deep-rooted thoughts which have come with ripened experience of life, and been patiently brooded over in the secret heart during its better years:—those years in which a mind of original vigour has worked itself clear of the crudities of rank and luxuriant youth, and come forth purified and spiritualized, yet with deepened human affections. Many light and graceful fancies, and also mere, but elegant trifles, are clothed in the appropriate garb of flowing and musical verse. The finest of these aërial things is the legend of The Fairy Bride, which is one more exquisite edition of the old tale,—not without its deep philosophy—of the knight who retains a fairy mistress, of a beauty surpassing mortal, and the dispenser of all rich and gracious gifts, upon the one condition of obedience to one command; or of controlling his own spirit and passions. We take but one stanza of the pathetic close of this poem:—

> Oh, not for vulgar homage made,
> The holier beauty formed for one;
> It asks no wreath the arm can win;
> Its lists—its world—the heart within;
> All love most sacred haunts the shade—
> The star shrinks from the sun!

In a poem entitled the Souls of Books—and the Power of books is identical—we find this noble burst:—

> Ye ever-living and imperial Souls,
> Who rule us from the page in which ye breathe,
> All that divide us from the clod ye gave!—
> Law—Order—Love—Intelligence—the sense
> Of Beauty—Music and the Minstrel's wreath!—
> What were our wanderings if without your goals?
> As air and light, the glory ye dispense,
> Becomes our being—who of us can tell
> What he had been, had Cadmus never taught
> To man the magic that embalms the thought—
> Had Plato never spoken from his cell,
> Or his high harp blind Homer never strung?—
> Kinder all earth hath grown since genial Shakspeare sung!
>
> . . . . . .
> We call some books immoral! Do they live?
> If so, believe me, TIME hath made them pure.
> In Books, the veriest wicked rest in peace—
> God wills that nothing evil should endure;
> The grosser parts fly off and leave the whole,
> As the dust leaves the disembodied soul!
> Come from thy niche, Lucretius! Thou didst give > Man the black creed of Nothing in the tomb!
> Well, when we read thee, does the dogma taint?
> No; with a listless eye we pass it o'er,
> And linger only on the hues that paint
> The Poet's spirit lovelier than his lore.

The poems, we said, are in many or all styles, save the bitter and satirical, though in their spirit there is harmony. The Consolations of Sleep might have been written by Shelley; while the Love Letter, and other pieces, remind one of the sparkling graces and prettiness of Moore. Sometimes, in a simple narrative, we stumble upon such thoughts as the following:—

> Not Tadmor, in its lone repose,
> Its wrecks to wondering eye reveals
> More sad, amidst the waste, than those
> One broken human heart conceals.

Or as this, where the dying Mazarin totters into his gallery to steal a last look at those treasures and master-pieces of Art, which, in the pride of wealth, he had collected—

> An old and dying man amidst the ever-living Art;
> God's truth! it were a sight to stir some pining painter's heart;
> It were a sight to lift the soul of Genius from the Hour,
> To see the Life of Genius smile upon the Death of Power.

A single line in the same poem places before us the true relation in which Patronage has hitherto, in general, stood to Art—

> What misers are we to the toil! what spendthrifts to the name!

The lives of too many men of genius are but painful illustrations of this remark.

That we may have a single complete specimen, we copy out The Pope and the Beggar, as an example, if not of the poetry, then of the philosophy of Bulwer:—

THE POPE AND THE BEGGAR.

The Desires the chains, the Deeds the wings.

> I saw a Soul beside the clay it wore,
> When reign'd that clay the Hierarch-Sire of Rome;
> A hundred priests stood, ranged the bier before,
> Within St. Peter's dome;
> And all was incense, solemn dirge, and prayer—
> And still the Soul stood sullen by the clay:
> "O Soul, why to thy heavenlier native air
> Dost thou not soar away!"
> And the Soul answered, with a ghastly frown,
> "In what life loved, death finds its weal or woe;
> Slave to the clay's DESIRES, they drag me down
> To the clay's rot below!"
>
> It spoke, and where Rome's Purple Ones reposed,
> They lower'd the corpse; and downwards from the sun
> Both Soul and Body sank—and Darkness closed
> Over that twofold one!
> Without the church, unburied on the ground,
> There lay, in rags, a Beggar newly dead;
> Above the dust, no holy priest was found,
> No pious prayer was said!
> But round the corpse unnumbered lovely things
> Hovering, unseen by the proud passers by,
> Form'd, upward, upward, upward, with bright wings,
> A ladder to the sky!

"And what are ye, O Beautiful?" "We are,"
Answered the choral cherubim, "His Deeds!"
Then his Soul, sparkling sudden as a star,
Flashed from its mortal weeds;

And, lightly passing, tier on tier, along
The gradual pinions, vanish'd like a smile!
Just then, swept by the solemn-visaged throng
From the Apostle's pile—

"Knew ye this beggar?" "Knew! a wretch, who died
Under the curse of our good Pope, now gone!"
"Loved ye that Pope?" "He was our Church's pride,
And Rome's most holy Son!"

Then did I muse:—Such are men's judgments;—blind
In scorn or love! In what unguessed-of things,
Desires, or deeds—do rags and purple find
The fetters or the wings!

Mr. Edmund Peel, the author of the Christian Pilgrim, has felt Byron, but followed, as the better guide, La Martine. It would seem that an actual pilgrimage has been made by him to the memorable regions described—to the Holy Land. The Christian Pilgrim is, if not a religious poem in the strict acceptance of the word, a descriptive poem of religious tendency; and the lofty theme, with the author's profound feeling of the grandeur of the Hebrew poetry, has imparted both strength and fire to some of his strains. As a brief specimen, we give the following stanza from the musings of the Pilgrim in the Vale of Jehosaphat:—

Can these bones live?—the bare! the bleached! the dry!
Lord God! thou knowest!—list! a rustling sound!
The bones are moving, breathed on from high!
Are clothed with flesh! are rising from the ground,
A mighty host! The rocks, graves, caves resound!
Raised from the dust, the Resurrection sing,
In whom ye live, and evermore abound!
Bathe, dew of Hermon, bathe, the heart of Spring!
And thou, Lebonah, forth thy balmy treasures bring!

Thy flocks, Nebaioth!—thine, dark Kedar, bring!
Midian and Tema! charge with spices sweet,
And gums—an aromatic offering—
Your kneeling camels!—ye, whose wandering feet
Go forth, the Arabian caravan to meet
Of Indian, bearing frankincense and myrrh—
To balm the winds that waft the merchant-fleet—
And spikenard, shedding, when the breezes stir,
Delicious odour round the enchanted passenger.

The following is—Morning under the Cedars of Lebanon:—

The sun is on the Cedars! through the dim
Arches in splendour streaming!—voices greet
The radiant vision with a warbled hymn,
Not inharmonious, round the green retreat
Circling, of Piety the chosen seat.
Here, in the fulness of the summer-tide,
From hill and dale, the pastoral people met
To view, dark-heaving o'er the mountain's side,
The venerable grove, of Lebanon the pride.

Through each cathedral aisle, in olden time,
Rolled, in a volume of accordant air,
The voice oracular of bard sublime,
Intent the homage and the hymn to share
Of Nature, pouring out the hymn in prayer;
And even now, in these degenerate days,
Do young and old, and rich and poor, repair
To this most ancient temple, here to raise
An altar to the Lord of penitence and praise.

The landscape, rich in memorials, which in panoramic view is seen from this spot, is finely described; but, having shown the scope of the poem, and the structure of its metre, we must pass to a piece of very different character.

The Salamandrine—not the most felicitous of titles by the way—belongs to what is called "pure poetry," the imaginative and supernatural; soaring to regions beyond this dull diurnal sphere, and ranging among beings formed of purer elements than our mortal, sinful clay, yet languishing to share the hopes and affections of humanity. If the poem does not captivate all hearts by its passion and tenderness, it will enchant every well attuned ear by its wild and varied melody, and rich musical cadences. Mr. Charles Mackay claims unbounded freedom for his rhymes and rhythm, and he has turned the assumed license to excellent account in the structure of his story, and the undulating flow of his verse.

That story is soon told. Sir Gilbert, a young warrior of Germany, sleeping on the battle-field, has a singular poetic vision, in which a brother and sister—twin-spirits of the Fire—moralize over the lot of mortals; the gentle Amethysta bewailing the sufferings of guilty mankind, and the folly which, by violence and strife, shortens their brief span of life on earth. Her less gentle brother sees, on the contrary, much to envy in the human lot, since man, with all his attendant miseries, is the heir of Immortality; while the purer children of the Fire, though they enjoy a very long and blest existence, are doomed to annihilation at last, save for a contingency to which Amethysta thus adverts—save that

"From a human heart we win
A love devoid of guile and sin;
A love for ever kind and pure—
A love to suffer and endure;
Unalterably firm and great
Amid the angry storms of Fate;
For ever young, for ever new,
For ever passionate and true.
This gained—all woe is past—all joy begun;
Heaven is our hope—Eternity is won."

With a love thus firm and pure, Amethysta, in the guise of a beautiful rustic maiden, imagines that she has inspired Sir Gilbert, and thus fondly hopes, through her own loving heart, and his fidelity and truth, to be raised to a twice-blest Immortality. The course of their early true-love is very sweetly described. When their passion is at the height, comes the hour of parting, and Sir Gilbert's love soon fails of the test.

The wishes of his noble sire, and the ambition of his own earthly heart are to be accomplished at whatever sacrifice of faith and truth. Yet love for a season maintained a struggle in his breast, though sordid desires proved conquerors. For,—

Was he born so base a churl,
That he should wed a peasant girl?
Oh, no! he was a baron bold.

Sir Gilbert sinks lower and lower, and widens the gulph that now yawns between him and the beautiful spirit,—who, most innocent of self-seekers! only through his love aspired to immortality:—

And yet he loved her passing well,
And it might cheer him,—who could tell,
To leave his high-born wife a while,
And bask in Amethysta's smile,
With none the wiser for his wooing,
And a trusting heart's undoing.

On the other side is Amethysta, tender and trustful as true-love, languishing in her mountain solitude for the reappearance of her plighted lover; warned by her stern brother-spirit, who better knew "what these mortals are," but trusting still.

The pining of the patient maiden, sick of the sadness of hope deferred, is very sweetly painted, and still—

He came not.— Still, at fall of night
She burned her solitary light,
By love enkindled,—love attended;
And still her brother chid her care.

. . . . . .

Thus pass away the weary weeks,
And dim her eyes, and pale her cheeks;
Thus pass they heavily on, but still
Her love-light sparkles on the hill,
True as the Evening Star itself
It shines upon her wall,
When due towards the darkening east
The lengthened shadows fall.

No more she gathers early flowers,
No more in Morning's dewy hours
Trims with nice hand her trellissed bowers;
No more she spreads the usual crumbs
For her blithe robin when he comes,
Wild to the world, but tame to her.
Their honest watch-dog sues in vain
Her customary smile to gain;
In vain her fondling kittens purr,
And the dust gathers on her lute.

. . . . . .

Next come the splendid nuptials of the faithless knight; all is over! and the Canto entitled Hope and Fear finds this impressive close:—

One day! one night! yet what a change they bring!
High in the clouds, the same sweet birds may sing:
The same green leaves may rustle in the air,
And the same flowers unfold their blossoms fair:
Still nature smile, unchanged in all her plan,
But, oh, what change may blight the soul of man!
The sun may rise as brightly as before,
But many a heart can hail its beams no more:
'Tis but one turn of earth's incessant ball,
Yet in that space what myriad hopes may fall!
What love depart! what friendship melt away!
Ay—virtue's self may wane to her decay,
Torn from her throne, heart-placed, in one eventful day!

Canto V., the Bridal Feast, is the most striking and brilliant in the poem, and though the opening and closing scenes of the story are more pathetic and more delicately touched, it is from this that we select our specimen:—

'Tis past—the mystic rites are done—
Gilbert and Rosaline are one;
And little heed has Gilbert given
To the fond heart that he has riven.
Aye she may pine, and moan, and weep,
And feed on thoughts that banish sleep—
He'll come and visit her full soon,
When he has passed his honey-moon,—
And he will give her jewels rare,
And golden bands to bind her hair,
And gems that women love to wear,
And make her rich as she is fair:
His bribes shall make her heart forget,
And she shall smile and love him yet.

But now he cannot think
Of another than his bride,
And beautiful is she,
As she walketh by his side;—
And his father goes about
With a smile upon his face,
To bless the happy day
That has dawned upon his race;
And his mother, richly clad,
Sitteth proudly in the hall,
To welcome in the guests
To the gallant festival!

In Minden's old abodes
Shall be revelry to-night;—
From the high and fretted roof
Hang a hundred lustres bright,
That pervade the very walls
With a sun-surpassing light.

Pour, pour the sparkling wine
In the goblets like a tide,
That a thousand guests may drink
To the welfare of the bride!
Then fill them up again
In a bumper full and fair,
Then drain them every one
To the bridegroom and the heir:
May their nights be full of joy,
And their days devoid of care!

But, hark!—what voice is that!
Is't of the air or earth!
That rises suddenly
Amid the festal mirth!—
Above them and about
The echo seems to swell;—
And it saith, "Oh, farewell, love!
O happiness, farewell!
For never, never more
In Minden shall ye dwell!
Misery!"

The guests they think it strange,
But nothing can they see,—
And blooming cheeks grow pale
At that wild melody.
And hark! it swells again!
In a plaintive strain:—
"Misery! misery!"
It sounds now here, now there,—
Then melts into the air,—
"Misery!"———

What is the matter with the fire!
The sparks come rushing out,—
The writhing flames burn pale and blue,
And twist themselves about—
And now they sink—now rise again—
And mount the chimney tall,
Casting a light
Of lurid white
On the rich emblazoned wall.

What is the matter with the lamps
That hang from the ceiling high!—
For the flames grow dim, and wan, and pale
And sink as they would die.—
And now they brighten merrily,
And a livid radiance throw
On the fear-pale faces of the guests
That watch them from below:
The lustres shake as they would fall,
And form strange shadows on the wall:—
There seems a spell upon them all.

And still they heard the voice
Amid the silence swell,
Singing, "Oh, farewell, love!
O happiness, farewell!
For never, never more,
In Minden shall ye dwell!
Misery! Misery!"

And as it died away,
A gentler voice began
A more melodious song
Than e'er was heard by man;
But sad, and faint, and slow,
The solemn accents fell:—
"Farewell to happiness!
To love and joy farewell!
For never, never more,
Shall either as before,
Around my pathway shine
To cheer this heart of mine,—
Misery!"

. . . . . .

There was a rushing sound of winds,—
The doors flew open all,—
And lo! a lady, mild and bright,
With rustling robes of silvery white,
Came gliding through the hall,

A golden zone enclosed her waist;
She wore a ruby on her breast;
And round her brow a chaplet fair,
Made all of diamonds, bright and rare,
Of which the least conspicuous gem
Was worth a monarch's diadem;
And a halo followed as she went,—
Most beautiful, most innocent!

She seemed, like Melancholy's self,
A living sorrow as she passed:
Her face was pale, her step was slow,
Her modest eyes were downwards cast;
But who she was, and whence she came,
And what her lineage or her name,
Not one of all the guests could tell,—
But Gilbert sighed, and knew her well.

'Twas Amethysta's gentle face,
Her look serene, her form of grace;
And much he marvelled to behold
Her diamond crest, her zone of gold,
And her step of queenly dignity;—
No cottage maiden could she be
But a peerless dame of high degree.

There was deep silence in the hall;
You might have heard a feather fall,
For the guests were wonder-stricken all,
As the lady, like a monarch proud,
Glided majestic through the crowd,
And never raised her eyes so sweet
Until she came to Gilbert's seat;
And then she stopped,—the bride meanwhile,
Trembling and pale with doubts and fears,—
And full upon the bridegroom turned
Her face, all wet with gushing tears,
And gazed with sad and earnest look!—
The mild reproach he could not brook,
But turned his guilty eyes away—
Afraid to move—ashamed to stay.

She laid her hand upon his arm,
And bowed her gentle head,
And moved her lips as if she spoke,
But never a word she said;
Or, if she did, the bride was near,
And not a whisper could she hear.
But Gilbert started at her touch
And pressed his burning brow,
Then rose and met her mournful glance,
Resolved to bear it now;—
For her image, though he shut his eyes,
Before his vision stole,—
And, oh,—that mild reproachful glance,—
It looked into his soul!

But before the guests had time to rise
The lady passed away,
But how she went, and when she went,
Was nobody could say.
And the holy man who married the bride,
He knelt him down to pray,—
"From sprites and phantoms, heavenly Lord, Deliver us alway!"

And whither went the bridegroom forth?—
They saw him at the door,
And caught a glimpse of the lady's robe
A step or two before.

. . . . . .

The flames gave out no noxious heat,
The fire was harmless at their feet;
But in Sir Gilbert's heart and brain
There was a hot consuming pain.
Oft had he heard of phantoms dire
That lived and flourished in the fire,
And took all shapes of mortal beauty,
To lure the soul from Christian duty:—
Could she be one? Nay, Gilbert, nay!
She never led thy faith astray;
But worshipped God with reverent knee,
And had no fault but love of thee!

Within this forest glade they stood
In silence and in solitude:
She put her gentle hand on his,
And looked into his face, forlorn;—
Ah, more than looks of bitter wrath—
Ah, more than words of cruel scorn—
That look so sad, so mild, so fair,
Went to his heart and rankled there!

"Listen!" said she, in mournful tone,
"And learn my secret, ere we part:
I've brought thee to the wilds alone,
That I may show thee all my heart:
Behold a maid of heavenly birth,
Formed of the eternal Fires that shine
To light and warm this world of thine;
And not as thou of grovelling earth,
But of an essence more divine.

But the reader already knows the secret; and we shall not tell of the Doom; of the terrible trials and the penance in Expiation; the final triumph of love, and the begun immortality of the faithful maiden, and her repentant and restored lover. The Doom is the most powerful canto of the poem, but a short specimen would perhaps repel, and its awful development requires the language of poetry; so we shall cull our remaining samples from the simple and beautiful, and leave the passion and the agony untouched. In the following gay scene, Sir Gilbert, who has not yet met the lovely maiden of his vision on the battle-field, is returning to the home of his fathers.

The woods and fields are green again,
It is the month of May,
The swallow on the cottage eaves
Has built her nest of clay,
And the rooks upon the castle tower
Caw merrily all the day.

The spring has followed the winter weary,
And peace came after a ruthless war;
The land rejoices,
And childrens' voices
Welcome their fathers from afar.
There are smiles of love on many a cheek,—
Many a fond wife sobs for gladness,—
And sheds more tears in excess of joy
Than ever she shed in all her sadness.

The wars are over,—the peasants rejoice,—
Youths and maidens sit under the tree,
Or dance together
In sunny weather,
While the elder people flock to see.
The rustic pipe makes music simple,
To guide the fall of their twirling feet.—
And young veins tingle,
As love-looks mingle,
And youth and passion their vows repeat.

And Gilbert journeys to his home:
Many a laurel he hath won,—
And he hopes to reach his father's halls
Ere the rising of the sun.
The evening air is mild and cool,
The round May-moon is at her full,
And Gilbert, as he rides along,
Hums the chorus of a song;
And now he walks his chestnut steed,
And now he gallops at full speed,—
And then he stops for better view
Of the green hills or waters blue,
Or the broad path he must pursue.

All day there was a gentle breeze—
It shook no blossom from the trees,
So lightly did it pass;
But now it blows a freshening gale:—
Hark! how it murmurs in the grass,
And moans among the oak-tree tops,
And the loose willows of the copse:—
And lo! upon the western sky
The clouds are gathering fast and high.

Then follows the thunder-storm, the disasters of the knight, and his rescue from deadly peril by the lovely Salamandrine, in the guise of a country maiden.

One word before parting. Mr. Mackay reproaches the age as "preëminently practical," calling it "a hard, stiff, cast-iron age," and such like severe and ugly names. Is his own poem not a proof of directly the reverse? and it surely is a growth of this hard age. May not the silent worship be maintained, the sacred fire cherished in many a secret corner, and under many a rugged surface? That there is less of the maudlin affectation of admiring poetry than there was in the Della Cruscan age,—which had its own uses, but which has happily passed,—we readily admit; and even in name of the age plead guilty to an awkward shame where the true feeling ought to be frankness and unmingled pride and glory; in even smaller poetical achievements than those the one year of 1842 has brought to light.

We have but little space in which to conclude our catalogue.

The Edwin the Fair, of the author of Philip van Artevelde, would require more time and pains even to expound its purpose than we have to give. As a whole, this Historical drama is less carefully elaborated than Mr. Henry Taylor's earlier dramatic poem; but, it contains equally just conceptions of character; and many noble scenes. Yet it must be felt unequal, and the personages far too numerous for a drama that is only to be read. The central figure,—the dominant spirit,—is Dunstan, the very personification of the priesthood, in its lust of power and resoluteness of purpose, and as possessed by an ambition which, setting its foot on the necks of kings, would crush humanity itself in its road to its objects; but which a haughty and domineering pride does not one whit restrain from the employment of the most paltry frauds that may serve its purposes. The following scene is among the level passages of the drama. Leolf, a nobleman attached to the king's party, thus welcomes to court his friend Athulf, but tells that he would liefer give him welcome to a cot than to a priest-ridden court like Edwin's.

Athulf. What ails the Court?

Leolf. Its old disorder; complex and compounded
Of many ills in even shares partaken.
Ambition's fever, envy's jaundiced eye,
Detraction that exulcerates, aguish fear,
Suspicion's wasting pale insomnolence,
With hatred's canker.

Athulf. To which add, no doubt,
Monks for physicians.

Leolf. There you touch a theme
For large and leisurely discourse. At present
I will but say, the boldest of bold hearts
Is hither come in season.

Athulf. Say you so?
Come cowl and crosier! With a cap of steel
And battle-axe in hand, we will not fly.
But softly for a season! In what current Runs the blood-royal? Are we where we were?

Leolf. O'er the Queen-Mother's mean and meagre soul
Hath monkery triumphed; taking for allies
Her past misdeeds and ever-present fears.
Upon the Princess too I see it steal,
And stain her pleasant purity of spirit.

Athulf. But still the King is stanch?

Leolf. Young, young and warm;
Prompt in defiance, too precipitate;
For we must have him crowned, ere it be safe
To cross them. But the passion which in youth
Drives fast downhill, means that the impulse gained
Should speed us up the hill that's opposite.
How found you the mid-counties?

Athulf. Oh! Monk-ridden,
Raving of Dunstan.

Leolf. 'Tis a raving time:
Mad monks, mad peasants; Dunstan is not sane,
And madness that doth least declare itself
Endangers most, and ever most infects
The unsound many. See where stands that man,
And where this people: then compute the peril
To one and all. When force and cunning meet
Upon the confine of one cloudy mind,
When ignorance and knowledge halve the mass,
When night and day stand at an equinox,
Then storms are rife. Yet, once the King were crowned,
We could face Dunstan; which he knows too well,
And still by one thin pretext or another
Defers the coronation, and his will
The Primate follows.

The strangely mingled, and powerful elements of Dunstan's character, are developed as much in soliloquy and self-communion, as in action, though he is the soul of the entire movement; but it would take much more space than we can afford, to give even a faint indication of the author's conception of this incarnation of some of the worst attributes of an energetic, arrogant, dehumanized zealot, half-mad with spiritual pride, and the lust of power.

There is this similarity between the Historical Saxon Drama of Mr. Henry Taylor, and the Lays of Ancient Rome of Mr. Macaulay, that both endeavour to revivify the Past. There is in the Drama closer verisimilitude, whether in the personations, or in the expression and costume, of the Past; but in the Lays much more to please modern readers; which we cannot help thinking the wiser achievement.

Among the volumes of verse remaining on our list, are Hoel the Hostage, a poem of merit, the Sepulchre of Lazarus, and other poems by Sarah H. Moulton; Gerald, a dramatic poem by J. Westland Marston, a work of some mark and likelihood; Britain, a poem, by an ultra-loyal James Green; Miscellaneous Poems and Essays, by Robert Bigsby, a formidable-looking handsome volume, containing many pleasing and elegant copies of verses; and Intimidation, a Political Satire, by Cato the Censor, a terse, well-rhymed and well-timed performance; though grosser personality and coarseness of invective might have better served the poet's purpose, in an age addicted to strong stimulants. As a specimen, which, though not a favourable one, yet tends to edification, we select the following dignified admonition.

There was a time when Freedom view'd with pride
O'C———l fighting stanchly by her side;
A time when all your energies were strain'd
To nobler purpose; then your cause you gain'd.
With right and reason for your guides, you freed
From abject bonds your persecuted creed;
And having brought about that grand effect,
There had you stopp'd, you had retain'd respect;
But when misled by vanity and pride,
You swerv'd from duty's simpler path aside,
And launch'd yourself on Agitation's stream,
For projects even you must useless deem;
When thus descending from your "high estate,"
You merg'd the patriot in the advocate,
And lengthen'd out your cause to grasp the fees,
By striving for impossibilities;
(Although I charge you not as many do,
With having only sordid ends in view,

For while you really sought your country's good,
Just claims had you upon her gratitude;)
When thus you sacrificed the glorious name,
You might have handed down to future fame,
To gratify a petty love of power,
And please the small ambition of the hour;
Content to flash a baleful meteor-gleam,
You lost your place in honest men's esteem.
But still unnoticed I had pass'd you by,
Nor placed you here before the public eye,
If Freedom's cause you had not thus betray'd,
By seeking dark Intimidation's aid.
Gods! can we wonder that untutor'd men
Transgress the boundaries of virtue, when
Their betters in a worldly sense pursue
Each base design before the public view;
Their boasted education foully bent,
To further ev'ry villanous intent;
And law, perverted from her proper course,
Steps forth and lends her sanction to their force.
Are high-born men alone to gratify
Their vicious passions with impunity,
And trample down, by dint of lawless might,
Truth, Virtue, Freedom, all that's just and right!
No! not while I, all humble though I be,
Deriving strength alone from honesty,
With Heaven's approving aid, can wield my pen
Against th' oppression of my fellow men.

THE PEOPLE'S HYMN.

Gracious God! we blame thee not,
For our cheerless, hapless lot:
Man, our brother, has forgot
God and his law.

King of kings! the just, the good!
For thy subjects there is food,
But our brother's selfish mood
Thwarts wisdom's plan.

Father! Earth was made by thee
To change her blessings lovingly;
Our brother laughs at thy decree,
We pine and die.

Who! who gave our brother might!
We! we gave; but not the right
With wrong and poverty to smite,
That he might play.

Comrade, by the gloomy past,—
By the darkness round us cast,
This, this must not, cannot last,
Give us your hand.

We will no more tamely brook
Saucy word and haughty look;
God himself shall pride rebuke,
Give us your hand.

By the field, the flood, the sky,—
By the hope that cannot die,
We shall not our motto fly,
"Justice to all!"

Bloodless weapons in our hand,
We shall war, a peaceful band,
Till rejoicing fill the land,
Bread, bread, bread, bread!

LITERARY REGISTER.

The Age of Great Cities. By Robert Vaughan, D.D. 1 vol. post octavo. London: Jackson & Walford.

The title of this work may, at first, mislead. It is not a critical, antiquarian treatise on the age of Babylon or Carthage, Palmyra or Thebes, but a popularly-written volume, tracing the progress of civilized society from the earliest times through its more distinguishing epochs, until now that the world has reached the age of great cities; great centres of the civilisation, of which cities are considered the main promoters. A brief introduction gives a view of the conflict between feudalism and growing civilisation; and of the social characteristics of the great cities of ancient times. This but prepares the way for what is of infinitely more importance—the tendencies of modern society, and those mighty agencies that have produced, and are producing, an ever-progressive improvement. Among the more important of these agencies, are—the influence of women in modern society, the Reformation, the printing-press, and the spirit generated in all great civic communities. In discussing the causes of the growth of great cities, and their relations to art, science, popular intelligence, education, relig on, and public spirit, there are numerous minute divisions and sub-divisions; and, throughout, the author gives a decided, if not sometimes an over-weening preference to urbane over rural communities. The facts of history help to bear him out—from the annals of Rome to the doings of the Manchester League.

We could select many specimens of this able and elegant work, displaying to greater advantage the author's attainments in learning, and of more direct applicability, in our own country and age; but we choose the following passage from its cheerful and satisfactory character. The author is showing that the greatest triumphs of modern civilisation will possess durability; and he rests his argument upon the following grounds:—

We may say with certainty, for example, in regard to all the more important of our acquisitions, not only that they are gains, but that they are gains which society will never lose. This is the case with all the natural discoveries just enumerated. They can never cease to exist; they can never cease to produce their general effect upon society. Such is the space covered by modern civilisation, and such are the novel facilities serving to give it perpetuity and increase in every quarter of the globe, that the fall of a nation, of an empire, or even of a continent, could not endanger its existence, or its diffusive power.

The Anglo-American people are spreading themselves rapidly from the pole to the equator, and from the Atlantic in the eastward to the Pacific in the westward. During a period dating earlier than the commencement of the great American war, and reaching to our own time, the people of those regions have doubled in every twenty-two years. Many circumstances adverse to such increase arose during that interval, but they had no power to impede its course; nor is it probable that it will suffer impediment until the population from the Hudson to the Floridas shall be found to equal, or very nearly to equal, the whole population of Europe.

From that large and hopeful portion of the earth, the mind naturally passes to the European settlements in the West Indies, in Africa, in the East, and, above all, to that new land of promise—the Europe probably of the other hemisphere in the ages to come—South Australia.

It is plain from these facts, that modern civilisation—and that civilisation connected in an eminent degree with the blood, and language, and institutions of Great Britain—will have no necessary dependence in the coming time upon the fate of Britain, or even of Europe. The great relations of the human family are now such, and must always continue to be such, that whatever is known in the old world, will find its home in the new. Nor can any ingredient of knowledge have its place in one hemisphere, without becoming the property of the other. It is not too much, therefore, to affirm, that the Governor of the world has placed it in circumstances which give to it the best security against the return of barbarism—the return of a second middle age.

But it may be said, that admitting it as certain that civilisation will not fail to survive on a large scale somewhere, society in Europe may become subject to many and melancholy changes. This is not denied. The great nations of Europe may cease to be great. Power may pass from the greater to the less. The land may continue, but the people may degenerate, and the high civilisation of one country may have little influence on the low civilisation of another, though the separation between them may seem to be nothing more than the course of a river, or a chain of mountains. We see enough of the possible in this form in the recent history of Greece and Italy. But our great danger in this respect, if we suppose it to exist, must consist in the degree of our exposure to barbarian conquest, or to military despotism. In the former case, our civilisation would be prostrated by the hand of violence, in the latter it would droop and perish under other influences. But concerning both these forms of calamity, we may say, that if they have their place among the possible of the future, they certainly do not belong to the probable.

With regard to barbarian invasion, our only fear must have respect to Russia. But there are no people in Europe so distinct from the rest, in race, character, and institutions, as the people of Russia; and there is no power, accordingly, against which the states of Europe generally might be so readily expected to make common cause as against Russia, should her hordes begin to descend upon us in the character of aggressors. Even Russia, however, is rapidly ceasing to have her place among the barbarous. She has, at present, ample space for the increase of her children, and can know nothing of inconvenience in that form during many ages to come. In the meantime, it is much more probable that Russia will be subdued by the arts of the south, than that the south will be subdued by the arms of Russia. In addition to which, the affinities of Russia are much more likely to give an eastward than a westward or southward direction to her forces. Should it be otherwise, the comparative numbers of the civilized and the barbarous, and the existing apparatus of civilized warfare, would seem to have separated for ever between barbarism and conquest on the soil of Europe. It is our happiness to know that no state may now become ascendant as opposed to civilized man, without being itself in a good degree civilized.

Concerning our danger in the shape of military despotism—a despotism similar to that of the Roman empire, the geography of Europe happily presents the most formidable obstacles in the way of the man or the power that should become intent on such an object. The diversified apportionments into which the hand of providence has broken up the surface of Europe, by means of its seas, and rivers, and mountains, bespeak it as destined to be the dwelling-place of a number of separate and independent states. Its diversities in regard to mineral treasure, soil, and climate, point to the same beneficent design. Nothing is likely to constitute the people of these various languages, institutes, and characters, so far one, as to cause them to partake simultaneously and alike in any strong tendency, either toward good or toward evil. It is true, this isolation may not seem to promise well in regard to the unity necessary in order to meet the pressure of a common enemy. But it is better to find a separate life pervading each of the parts, than death pervading the whole. In general, it is from its separateness and independence that each state derives that development and power which ensure the intelligence that will lead to combination whenever it is needed, and the capacity which must render such combination irresistible. . . . . On the whole, the momentum which is now in action on the side of a progressive course of things, is much stronger than anything that can be brought against it during a long time to come. The great tendency of modern society is toward the formation of great cities; and in addition to the conclusions to this effect which we deduce from such facts as have been dwelt upon in this chapter, the Christian can appeal to the predictions of Holy Writ, which speak of the ultimate prevalence of all the arts of peace, in alliance with the knowledge, feeling, and happiness of true religion—"In his days shall the righteous flourish, and they of the city like grass of the earth."

Our next extract is recommended to us from embodying an opinion which we incurred considerable censure for avowing, some years back, when, in many quarters, it was supposed impossible for any really liberal man to doubt of the sovereign efficacy of the Prussian system of state education, or of its fitness for the people of Great Britain:—

The question now arises—do we see so much good in the results of the Prussian system of education, as to render it expedient that we should, for the sake of that good, incur the hazard of recognising those principles of government on which that system is manifestly founded? We answer, that we do not find in those results any such good as would warrant our making such an experiment, and that upon few subjects is there greater delusion prevalent than in regard to the effects which a system of that nature is adapted to produce. An intelligent traveller, who has been at much pains to ascertain the real state of society in Prussia, has not hesitated to state that, "in true moral social education, the Prussian people, from the nature of their government and social economy, necessarily stand lower than the lowest of our own unlettered population. The social value or importance of the Prussian arrangements for diffusing national scholastic education has been evidently overrated; for now that the whole system has been in the fullest operation in society upon a whole generation, we see morals and religion in a more unsatisfactory state in this very country than in almost any other in the north of Europe: we see nowhere a people in a more abject political and civil condition, or with less free agency in their social economy. A national education, which gives a nation neither religion, nor morality, nor civil liberty, nor political liberty, is an education not worth having. If to reason, judge, and act, as an independent free agent, in the religious, moral, and social relations of man to his Creator and to his fellow-men, be that exercise of the mental powers which alone deserves the name of education, then is the Prussian subject a mere drum-boy in education, in the cultivation and use of all that regards the moral and intellectual endowments of the man, compared to one of the unlettered populace of a free country. The dormant state of the public mind on all affairs of public interest; the acquiescence in the total want of political influence or existence; the intellectual dependence on the government or its functionaries, in all affairs of the community; the abject submission to the want of freedom or free agency in thoughts, words, or acts; the religious thraldom of the people to forms which they despise; the want of the influence of the religious and social principle in society—all justify the conclusion that the moral, religious, and social condition of the people was never looked at or estimated by those writers who have been so enthusiastic in their praises of the national education of Prussia. The French writers took up the song from the band of Prussian pensioned literati of Berlin, and the English from the French writers; and so the song has gone round Europe, without any one taking the trouble to inquire what this educational [illegible] tem was producing; whether it had elevated, as it should have done, if genuine, the moral, religious, and social position and character of the Prussian people, as members of civilized society, having religious, moral, civil, and political rights and duties to enjoy and to perform."

The progress of Catholicism is at present alarming many sober-minded persons, and filling them with the most dismal apprehensions for the future. Upon this question, as upon the apprehended decay or annihilation of modern civilisation, Dr. Vaughan administers timely comfort, and even assurance, based on the stable foundation of experience and reason. He at once admits that there is a great revival of zeal within the pale of the Roman Catholic Church, but proceeds—

The increase of Catholicism is a matter which is sure not to come without observation. In countries where Catholics are the great majority, any increase of zeal to make proselytes, must become the more conspicuous as being that of the greater number; while the disposition toward pomp and display, on the part of the Catholic, must tend to give more notoriety to the achievements of such zeal in that connexion, than in connexion with Protestantism. It must be a very general, and a very powerful effort indeed, on the part of the million and a half of Protestants in France, which should be found to attract as much of public attention, as would be secured by a much feebler movement as affecting the proportion of the remaining thirty millions who profess themselves Catholics. The increased energy displayed by Catholicism in Great Britain, we regard as feeble, compared with that which has been evinced by Protestantism during the last half century,—the converts occasionally made to Catholicism being of little weight, as opposed to the multitudes who have been raised during that interval from a state of mere formalism, or of gross irreligion, to the profession of a Protestantism based upon instruction and allied with devout feeling.

Still, the great fact remains—the church of Rome, which during the eighteenth century was constantly declining, not only continues to exist, but, notwithstanding all that was done by the wars of the French revolution to deprive her of her wealth, to break down her machinery, and to threaten the extinction even of her spiritual power, she possesses at this moment a stronger hold on the sympathies and homage of Catholic Europe, than she could boast when vested in all her wonted splendour a century since. We see her doing much everywhere toward regaining, in her adversity, the influence which she lost in her prosperity. The comparative power of Catholicism at the present time, may be in part explained, by the fact, that the revolutionary outbreak from which it suffered so greatly, was one hostile to Christianity in every form. Protestantism, accordingly, has suffered from it fully as much as Catholicism. Both these systems, moreover, had deteriorated greatly, before the sweep of the memorable desolation adverted to passed over them; and when the storm at length subsided, as amidst the last faint cries of the wounded and the dying at Waterloo, the mind of Europe was in no condition to resume attention to subjects of this nature speedily. Since that day a quarter of a century has now intervened, and, during this space, the men whose social and mental habits had been moulded and fixed by the long military age which preceded, have almost disappeared, and their place is, at present, pretty well supplied by a generation whose attention has been occupied mainly with questions of diplomacy and domestic policy, and with such matters as popular education, scientific improvement, and intellectual culture in its higher forms. With this change has come a new disposition, and a new power to prosecute investigations in respect to religion; and the result now is, a marked revival of religious feeling in Europe—but a revival of this feeling, with a tendency, in many quarters, not so much to connect itself with the purer form of Christianity which is traced in modern history to the age of Luther, as with the more ideal and superstitious system against which Luther raised his solemn protest.

One thing is certain—the Catholicism which is diffused in an age like the present, must be a widely different system from the Catholicism which has been prevalent in most of the ages preceding. The church of Rome has always known how to adapt her policy to every social variety and change in the past, and she will not be less expert in this respect in relation to the present and the future. It has always been her manner to appear in sackcloth, or in gorgeous attire, as the occasion might demand. Notwithstanding all her pretension to the infallible and the immutable, even her theory of power has risen or fallen according to the times and the seasons. In all things, she has known how to be more superstitious, or less so, as the people could be expected to bear it. Inflexible on a few points, she has reserved to herself a wide range of things, in regard to which large concession might be made without any sacrifice of dignity or safety. . . . . The heresy of Luther has been the regenerator of the religion of the pontiffs; and it may well be matter of congratulation among Protestants, that the effect of their labours should be scarcely more memorable as seen in the church which they have constituted, than as seen in the change which they have induced within the pale of the church against which they have protested. Protestantism has not succeeded in putting an end to Popery, but it has succeeded in extruding from it not a little of its ancient nature: and the glory of Protestantism in the ages to come will be, that it will defeat its antagonist directly or indirectly, either directly, by forcing it from the field, or indirectly, by compelling it to become less and less the system it has been. Its policy has generally been, to perpetuate ignorance wherever that might be done, but to place itself in alliance with civilisation and progress, to almost any extent, when that may seem to be demanded by the spirit of the times. Proud as it may be, its province, in the great path of human improvement, has been to follow, and not to lead. But all movement in that direction is a good, however faulty the motive from which it may proceed.

Dr. Vaughan has omitted one of the favourable tendencies of the age of great cities—namely, that, instead of confining themselves, in their writings to the metaphysics of theology, or to abstruse or controversial discussions on points in which general society feels little or no interest, clergymen, where they understand the spirit of their age, and wish to influence and improve it, compose works like The Modern Pulpit, or like this more discursive popular essay on the Age of Great Cities.

A Popular History of British India, Commercial Intercourse with China, and the Insular Possessions of England in the Eastern Seas. By W. Cooke Taylor, LL.D. One Volume. Pp. 508. Madden & Co.

This compilation is avowedly written merely to supply a want, which, in the present state of public affairs and interests, must be generally felt. There are, indeed, numerous histories of India; but Dr. Taylor concludes that such a Manual of the History of that vast country, with which Britain is so closely connected, as the present, will still be found useful. He expresses no opinions of his own on any subject whatever, but limits himself to the simple narration of facts. He has availed himself freely of the labours of his precursors; and produced a compilation which will fully answer the desired purposes, as it places before the reader a comprehensive yet succinct view of India, ancient and modern. The History of India concludes with the brilliant and satisfactory close of the Affghan war. A supplemental section of the work will, at the present moment, form to many readers the most important part of its whole contents; and this—the History of British Intercourse with China—though it appears at the end of the volume, may, with perfect propriety, be read first. The first authentic accounts of trade with the Chinese are given in the voyages of two Arabian travellers, who visited China in the ninth century. The Celestial Empire had long an exclusive trade in silks; but when the silk-worm was, in the time of the Emperor Justinian, introduced into Europe by two Persian monks, who smuggled the eggs of the silk-worm to Constantinople in a hollow cane, and taught the Byzantines how to rear the insects and manufacture silk, the trade spread so fast in the south of Europe, that commerce with China totally ceased, and was not revived for several centuries. The Arab traders were permitted to go into Kanfu, "the chief port" of China, and conjectured to be the modern Canton. The Arab travellers state—

"When merchants enter China by sea, the Chinese seize on their cargo, and convey it to warehouses; and so put a stop to their business for six months, till the last merchantman arrives. Then they take thirty per cent. upon each commodity, and return the rest to the merchant. If the emperor wants any particular thing, his officers have a right to take it preferably to any other person whatsoever; and, paying for it to the utmost penny it is valued at, they despatch his business immediately, and without injustice."

They speak of some great revolution, which affected the trade considerably. An officer named Bai-chu, not of royal extraction, joined to his banner vagabonds and abandoned wretches, and marched against Kanfu. "This city," our travellers say, "is one of the most celebrated in China, and was, at that time, the port for all the Arabian merchants; situated at some distance from the sea, so that the water is fresh. This rebel at last became master of the city, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, A. D. 877. There perished on this occasion 120,000 Mohammedans, Jews, Christians, and Parsees, who were there on account of traffic. The mulberry trees were cut down, and the silk trade began to stagnate. The whole empire was thrown into a state of anarchy. There arose many unjust dealings with the merchants who traded thither; which, having gathered the force of a precedent, there was no grievance, no treatment so bad, but they exercised it upon the foreign Arabs and the masters of ships. They extorted from the merchants what was not due; they seized upon their effects, and behaved towards them contrary to all established law.

By this account the Chinese of the ninth century were not very unlike those of the nineteenth. Those ancient travellers, however,

"Praise the uprightness and impartiality of the learned Chinese judges, who devoted their whole lives to the study of the law. They are greatly taken with the ingenuity of the Chinese in all arts and sciences. Whilst they consider the nation as the only wise one on earth, they speak in terms of abhorrence of their idols and vices. It is their opinion, that 'the emperor reserves to himself the revenues which arise from the salt mines, and from a certain herb, which they drink with hot water, and of which great quantities are sold in all the cities to the amount of great sums; they call it sah, and it is a shrub more bushy than the pomegranate tree, and of a more pleasing smell, but it has a kind of bitterness with it. Their way is to boil the water, which they pour upon this leaf, and this drink cures all sorts of diseases. Whatever sums are lodged in the treasury, arise from the poll-tax, the duties upon salt, and upon this leaf.' They speak with the utmost contempt of the vices so prevalent to this day in China. 'There are schools in every town for teaching the poor and their children to write and read: the masters are paid at the public charge. The Chinese have no sciences, and their religion and most of their laws are derived from the Indians; nay, they are of opinion that the Indians taught them the worship of idols, and consider them a very religious nation. The Chinese are more handsome than the Indians. They wear long garments and girdles in form of belts, dress in silk summer and winter; and the women curl their jet hair,' which the travellers greatly admire."

Imperfect as this narrative is, it shows that the Saracens, with their characteristic enterprise, had opened a commercial intercourse with Northern China, and it was probably from them that the Italian republics learned the value of the Chinese trade in the age of the Crusades.

From the travels of Marco Polo, a noble Venetian merchant, who, in the thirteenth century, accompanied an ambassador on a mission to Kublai Khan, who was then about completing the conquest of China, we have the next authentic account of that empire. The long residence of the brothers Polo at the court of the conqueror enabled them, after their return, to tell Europe a great deal about this remote country of Cathay, of which so many fabulous accounts were current. There was, however, little or no intercourse between Europe and China, until the discovery of the passage by the Cape of Good Hope, which led to the maritime enterprises of the Portuguese in that quarter. Though frequently annoyed by the caprice and jealousy of the Chinese government, the Portuguese for many years enjoyed the China trade exclusively, until the Dutch and English entered into competition with them. In the age of Elizabeth, so memorable in British naval annals, an attempt was made to open a trade with China; but the ships were wrecked, and it was not until the reign of Charles I. that a small English squadron appeared in the Canton river, and, after considerable opposition, an English factory was established.

The trade was, however, conducted under great disadvantages; the local authorities at Canton treated the merchants and supercargoes with contemptuous insult; the duties paid on merchandize were changed according to the avarice or caprice of the Chinese governor, and every possible impediment was offered to the extension of commerce.

Other great difficulties frequently arose, from the nature of the cargoes which were sent from England. The company was very anxious to export as many British manufactures, and especially woollens, as were saleable. Yet the consumption in China was comparatively small, and many of the goods found no purchasers.

Such was the state of things at the commencement of the trade; and the fact ought to be borne in mind at present. The trade has been liable to continual interruption, often arising from the most frivolous causes; and serious affrays frequently occurred; yet as the consumption of tea was steadily increasing at home, in China the demand for our woollens and cutlery, &c., increased correspondingly. Matters were in this condition when Macartney's embassy was undertaken, an account of which we select as a specimen of the manner in which Dr. Taylor has executed his task.

Besides the heavy exactions, which were constantly renewed, a serious affair occurred, on account of the firing of a salute, whereby a Chinese was killed, in 1784. The supercargo of the ship was decoyed into the power of the Chinese, and marched into the city of Canton under a very strong military guard. The avenues leading to the quay were all barricadoed, and filled with soldiers. The linguists and merchants fled, the hongs were deserted, and the communications between Canton and Whampoa suspended by order of the hoppo. The surrender of the gunner, who was strangled, eventually procured the liberation of the supercargo.

In order to put an end to these annoyances, it was resolved to send a solemn embassy to the court of Pekin, for the purpose of negotiating a commercial treaty with the emperor. Lord Macartney was chosen as envoy, and

Sir George Staunton was joined with him, as he was well acquainted with the forms of Chinese diplomacy.

An excellent assortment of presents, and a friendly letter from the British government, accompanied this mission, which sailed from Portsmouth in 1792, and arrived in July, 1793, at the Pih-ho. The mandarins, perceiving that the vessels could not cross the bar, thought that they must be very heavily laden with presents intended for his imperial majesty. Provisions were supplied plentifully, and the ambassador treated with the greatest respect. Two mandarins of the highest rank came to congratulate them upon their arrival, and behaved with such civility that they prepossessed the ambassador very much in favour of the Chinese. Whilst himself and his retinue embarked for Pekin, the ships received orders to proceed to Japan, there to endeavour to establish a free trade. Amidst an immense crowd of people, they passed up the river till they arrived at Tung-choo-foo. To their great astonishment, the English were accused of having supported the Tibet rebels; this circumstance made an unfavourable impression, though the ambassador endeavoured to contradict it as a palpable untruth. Though this may be said to have been a splendid embassy, they were, nevertheless, degraded by having written upon the flags, "Tribute-bearers." When arrived at Pekin, where lodgings were assigned them between Hae-teën and Yuen-ming-yuen, they were required to perform their prostrations at the audience. This was entirely against their inclination and orders. But, to remove this difficulty, the ambassadors proposed that a high officer of state should perform the same ceremonies of homage before the picture of his British majesty, which he was required to do. However, the legate who had charge of the embassy showed himself an enemy to Europeans, and endeavoured to thwart all their objects. As the emperor was at Jé-ho (Zhehol) in Tartary, they were obliged to repair thither. They passed the Great Wall, and arrived at the place of their destination, a place composed of miserable hovels, beside the dwellings of the mandarins. The subject of the requisite prostrations was again taken up with all due warmth; but the emperor was condescending enough to yield to the request of Lord Macartney, who promised to perform the same genuflexion as he did in an audience to his own sovereign.

On the day of audience, the ambassadors were ushered into the gardens of Jĕ-ho. Tents had here been pitched: the imperial one had nothing magnificent, but was distinguished from all the others by its yellow colour. The imperial family, as well as mandarins of the first rank, had all collected. Shortly after day-light, the sound of musical instruments announced the approach of the emperor. He was seated in an open chair, borne by sixteen men, and seen emerging from a grove in the background. Clad in plain dark silk, with a velvet bonnet and a pearl in front of it, he wore no other distinguishing mark of his high rank. As soon as the monarch was seated upon his throne, the master of the ceremonies led the ambassador towards the steps. The latter approached, bent his knee, and handed in a casket set with diamonds, the letter addressed to his imperial majesty by the King of England. The emperor assured him of the satisfaction he felt at the testimony which his Britannic majesty gave him of his esteem and good will in sending him an embassy, with a letter and rare presents; that he on his part entertained sentiments of the same kind towards the sovereign of Great Britain, and hoped that harmony would always be maintained between their respective subjects. He then presented to the ambassador a stone sceptre, whilst he graciously received the private presents of the principal personages of the embassy. He was perfectly good-humoured, and especially pleased with the son of Sir G. Staunton, who talked a little Chinese, and received as a token of imperial favour, a yellow plain tobacco-pouch, with the figure of the five-clawed dragon embroidered upon it. Afterwards, the ambassadors from Birmah and little Bukharia, were introduced, and performed the nine prostrations. A sumptuous banquet was then served up, and after their departure, they had presents sent to them, consisting of silks, porcelain and teas. Upon an application made to the prime minister, respecting a merchant ship which had accompanied the ambassador's frigate, they received the most flattering answer, and every request was fully granted them. Having accompanied the embassy, the ship was to pay no duty. After their return to Pekin, it was intimated to them that his majesty, on his way to Yuen-ming-yuen, would be delighted if the ambassador came to meet him on the road. When the emperor observed him, he stopped short, and graciously addressed him. He was carried in a chair, and followed by a clumsy cart, which could not be distinguished from other vehicles, if it had not been for the yellow cloth over it. On his arrival at Yuen-ming-yuen, he viewed with great delight the various presents which the ambassador had brought with him. A model of the "Royal Sovereign," a ship of war of a hundred and ten guns, attracted much of his notice.

In consequence of this embassy, his imperial majesty called together a council to deliberate what answer ought to be given to the letter. A hoppo from Canton, who had lost his rank, and the imperial legate, strongly opposed any offer of friendly terms. The result of this conference was, that the ambassador was given to understand that, as the winter approached, he ought to think about his departure. At an interview with the minister of state, to which he was invited in the palace, he found the emperor's answer contained in a large roll covered with yellow silk, and placed in a chair of state. From thence it was sent into the ambassador's hôtel, accompanied by several presents. News which arrived from Canton, stating the probability of a rupture between England and the French republic, hastened the departure of the ambassador. He had been very anxious to obtain some privileges for the British trade, but the prime minister was as anxious to evade all conversation upon business. The splendid embassy was only viewed as a congratulatory mission, and treated as such.

No practical result followed from this expensive embassy; the relations between the English and Chinese in Canton, continued to be vexatious and unsatisfactory; and the disputes occasionally became so violent that the trade was suspended, or the English ships detained.

The East India Company's supercargoes at Canton were, about the year 1815, so much annoyed by the caprice, and jealous and irritating policy of the Chinese officials at Canton; and so much affronted and mortified by the vain-glorious style assumed in Chinese speeches and documents—which ought rather to be laughed at as idle rodomontade than seriously resented—that on the representations of the Company, the embassy of Lord Amherst was undertaken. It failed even more signally than that of Lord Macartney. Lord Amherst, from some feeling of indignity, which many have pronounced absurd under the circumstances, refused to perform the nonsensical ceremony of the Ko-tow, which he considered degrading to himself personally and to the sovereign or country which he represented; and he was, accordingly, not even admitted to an audience of the Emperor. The subsequent squabbles which have from time to time alarmed the British people for their beloved tea-pots, and the British-India merchants for their valuable traffic, are still fresh in the memory of the public. The rash or gallant enterprise of Captain Maxwell, and the whole of the transactions in which figured Lord Napier, Captain Elliott, and the too-famous Commissioner Lin, are clearly detailed in the volume.

The future relations between Britain and China, and the immediate prospects of commerce in that country, form no part of Dr. Taylor's plan. This is a subject upon which it is, indeed, very difficult to speak; nor does the experience of many centuries warrant the hope that misunderstandings may not speedily again arise to interrupt the regular course of commerce; though the Celestials are, for the moment, well cowed. It will be our own fault if they shall ever again arise from British commercial aggression, and contempt of those laws by which every government is entitled to regulate and administer its internal affairs. In our lively indignation at the fickleness, boasting, and deceit of the Chinese, the fundamental principles of international justice have oftener than once been in danger of being entirely overlooked. As recent events in China and India are of the greatest interest, the readers of Dr. Taylor's History will be gratified by a complete and even minute account of our latest Eastern wars; those just happily terminated by thrice-welcome peace. In all future editions of the work he promises to bring down the history of our Indian Empire to the latest period.

The Autobiography of Heinrich Stilling, late Aulic Counsellor to the Grand Duke of Baden. Translated from the German, by S. Jackson. Second edition. John Wright & Co., Aldine Chambers.

We are glad to meet with a cheap, double-columned edition of this charming work, which, on its first appearance, excited our warm admiration. The early part of the Memoirs especially, affords the most engaging view of the inner life of the Germans of humble rank that it is possible to meet with. The character of Stilling is of itself a profitable moral study. The descendant of poor but worthy peasants, the son of a tailor, and bred himself to his father's craft,—to which he afterwards united the avocation of a country schoolmaster—the self-educated youth gradually rose, without art or effort, making his way upward by sheer merit and talent, until he became the Professor of Political Economy in several of the German Universities, and finally settled at Carlsrhue, an Aulic Counsellor to the reigning Prince. Stilling was the early friend of Goëthe; and though the simple and humble student of Strasburg, whose only wealth lay in the Bank of Faith, was in many respects the antipodes of that brilliant and distinguished person, a warm friendship subsisted between them through life. Stilling, who had studied medicine, became, towards the latter part of his life, famous over all Germany and Switzerland for his skill as an oculist, which, to many people, when combined with the singular character of the man, appeared little less than supernatural. We can promise our readers both delight and improvement from the study of this primitive man's life.

I. The Commissioner, or De Lunatico Inquirendo. Octavo, pp. 440, with twenty-eight Illustrations on Steel by Phiz.

II. Jack Hinton the Guardsman. Octavo, with a Portrait of the author, Mr Charles Lever, and numerous Illustrations on Wood and Steel by Phiz. Dublin: Curry.

This brace of goodly volumes, coming forth neck and neck, are all but overpowering in their joint and unceasing demands upon the jocund hilarity, the wreathed smiles, and side-shaking guffaws of a public never more in need of applying the recipe "Laugh and be fat" than now. With the gallant Guardsman and his friends we had cultivated a previous piece-meal acquaintance. Right pleasant has it been while it lasted; with the farther charm of leaving no melancholy regrets behind it. Mr. Lever is preëminently a writer for the day and the hour; a right pleasant companion in a post-chaise or steamer; nor would it be reasonable to demand of him what he never bargained to give; what indeed, he may have a shrewd guess, would spoil his market. His pictures of that phase of social life in which he plies his mirthful vocation, are, like the illustrations of his stories, drawn with a free and bold pencil; clever, effective, and, above all, excellently adapted to the end in view—the amusement of the hour that flies.

With the Chevalier De Lunatico we had no previous acquaintance. His adventures appear to have been constructed upon the author's idea of the Thieves' Literature; or, in other words, of what is at present the favourite reading of the many-headed monster; elevated, however, by his keeping in view the old masters of the broadly comic fiction, Smollett and Fielding. The work is none of the superficial concerns of the one tome divided into three kind. It is, on the contrary, equal to at least six circulating library volumes thrown into one. We have not, on this account, got above half through it. To the cuts, however, we are already able, at a glance, to bear high testimony. They are admirable; not one here and there, but all of them.

Scientific Wanderings, or Results of Observation and Experiment; being an attempt to illustrate the Elements of Physics, &c., &c. By the Rev. R. Fraser.

Another addition to the numerous treatises on Natural Philosophy; rendered attractive to young persons from being thrown into the form of a story, somewhat on the plan of the popular work, "Philosophy in Sport made Science in Earnest."

An Efficient Remedy for the Distress of Nations. By John Gray, Author of "The Social System." 8vo. Pp. 224. Adam & Charles Black.

Here, again, stands forward the philanthropic Mr. Gray, nothing daunted by the ill success of his former attempts, and urging the irrefragable plea—

Hear me for my cause!

We have all been sufficiently chastened by the hand of adversity to be brought into the condition of patient listeners to any proposal of "an efficient remedy for public distress;" so that we may very safely leave Mr. Gray's panacea to the dispassionate investigation of more competent tribunals than ours.

Outline of the Laws of Thought. London: Pickering.

This Treatise on Logic is brief and clear, comprehensive and original, and sticks closely to the point.

Western Australia; containing a Statement of the Condition and Prospects of that Colony: with a map, &c., &c.

This is a compilation for the use of settlers, though much of it is mere surplusage. If emigrants to the Great South Land should not know where they are going, it is certainly not for want of books of counsel and direction. We must not, however, forget the adage, "Too many cooks spoil the broth." Western Australia appears to have struggled through the worst diseases incident to the infancy of colonies; and though not yet in vigorous health, it may be pronounced in a safe and rather promising condition.

Impressions, Thoughts, and Sketches, during Two Years in France and Switzerland. By the author of "The Gladiator," &c. London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

We cannot conjecture how this work has come forth in the humble and unpretending form in which it appears; which is that of a cheap stitched reprint, in double columns, and on very ordinary paper; and certain we are that we have often seen very inferior matter ushered into the world on wire-wove, hot-pressed, with elegant typography and all a publisher's "appliances and means."

The work purports to be the correspondence of a young (and she is an accomplished) lady, who goes abroad in the independent, self-relying kind of way in which many English girls are now often sent from home to Paris, to see the world and finish their education. She lives in different boarding-schools and boarding-houses, and keeps a journal of her proceedings, noting all that is passing around her which is considered worthy of record. Her journal, or series of letters, displays a well-cultivated mind, and justness of thought and sentiment; and gives, moreover, considerable insight into the domestic habits of middle-class society in Paris. We can assure our readers, that more solid information and rational entertainment, more care and thought, may be found in this homely stitched-up anonymous volume, than in many splendidly printed books of Travels coming out with fashionable names.

NEW POEMS.

Scarcely have we closed accounts with the Poetry of 1842, before the Poetry of 1843 comes crowding upon us. And first,—

Day Dreams. By Charles Knox, Author of "Hardness," "The Rittermeister's Budget," "Softness," &c., &c.

If a good countenance be to a man a universal letter of recommendation, it is not less true that to a book, beautiful typography, fine paper, elegant illustrations, and rich bindings, are not less recommendatory. All these are found gracing Captain Knox's Day Dreams. These are, however, but the setting. Of the gems themselves it is not easy to speak so decidedly. The collection, no doubt, contains many copies of fair verses; but, on the whole, we consider the author more successful as a prose fictionist than a poet. Yet Captain Knox is not one of the mob of gentlemen who write [verse] with ease—fatal ease! He writes with care, and pains, and effort; and he has himself found great pleasure in those self-imposed labours; which will, we make no doubt, communicate pleasure to many. What more would he or the critics have?

If any theme is calculated to call forth all the powers of a poet of the cast of the author of Day Dreams, it must be Byron. From the verses to Byron we therefore select our specimen of this varied volume; varied, because Day Dreams necessarily comprehend all manner of fanciful, and of lovely and tender things.

BYRON.

A shadow pass'd before me, in whose spirit,
That gleamed from out his aspect, I could see
The soul that conquers immortality;
A sparkle of the fire that none inherit
From their vain line of human ancestry,
But wrest from heaven; that mankind may learn
That man is not a merely creeping thing—
A soulless reptile, earthly, grovelling,
And daring scarce his mole-like head to turn
Towards the eternal fountain, from which spring
Knowledge and happiness; this Man was one,
The intellectual champion of his race,
Who show'd it might be worthy its high place
And lordship o'er the earth; yet all alone
He stood among his kind, for none he found
Whose soul was set apart to mate with him;
And he was obstinate, and would not bend
His spirit, with his fellow-men to blend;
And so his heart was withered, and he bound
Himself as in a mantle, in a dim
And shadowy cloud of dark imaginings;
Embodied yearnings of a mind that sought
That which it found not, till his fancy wrought
Itself a separate world, in which he passed
His years in self-tormenting, till the springs,
That the soul moved to stir the body, snapped,
And broke in sunder, too o'erstrained to last,
And then his clay with other clay was wrapped.
. . . . . .
While lives the language of his land, his name
Is graven on the records of its fame—
But graven with the hand of misery;
For he—this gifted child of poesy,
This painter of the passions of mankind,
The mighty bard that deem'd to ride the storm,
To sing of nature in her every form,
To fathom the dark depths of human mind,
All tasks essaying, yet for all tasks able,
Was, more than all his fellows—miserable.
Joyless his childhood was, his youth of pining,
Serpents and thorns were in his bays entwining;
His fame with stains of deadly hue defiled,
A blasted bridal, and a stranger child;
Another's banner o'er his father's hall;
Friends that wept ever; foes that sought his fall;
His days of restlessness, his nights of gloom,
A withered life, and an untimely tomb.
Such is the lot that waits the noblest mind,
That parteth from his kind in cold disunion,
And feeleth not that God on high design'd
That man should live with man in kind communion.

Marriage. A Poem, in four Cantos. By Dr. Henry Edwards.

This is a poem addressed by its author to his Bride-elect; and, of course, should be candied enough. Ladies will admire it; especially if their ideas of poetic excellence are not too high. The poet gives those who are betrothed among his readers some useful, if homely and rather plain-spoken, advice, as to how they should deport themselves under all the varying circumstances of married life.

The Hall of Vision; a View of Principles. A Poem, in three Books. By William Leask. Second edition.

A poem of some merit, of the school of Pollok. Several minor pieces are subjoined to the Hall of Vision; nearly all of them of a serious cast.

Dionysius, the Areopagite; with other Poems. By Ann Hawkshaw.

The Areopagite is a more sustained effort than lady-poetesses are in the habit of making. It shows power of thought as well as facility in versification.

Genoveva. A Poem. By Richard Chenevix Trench.

The title of this poem will explain that it is a metrical version of the beautiful and pathetic German legend of Genoveva; that pure feminine incarnation of the tenderest love, meekness, fidelity, and patient endurance. The incidents of the original tale are closely adhered to, and the poem is hence, in its pathetic simplicity, much more effective than if composed in a more ambitious, ornamented, and diffuse style.

SERIAL WORKS.

KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKSPERE, PART LI.—SHAKSPERE IN GERMANY—INDEXES, &c. &c.—This Part closes the Supplemental Volume, and, as we presume, also closes the work—"the last scene of all." Its subject-matter is the German critics and eulogists of Shakspere; of two of whom, Goëthe and Tieck, characteristic portraits are given. It will be with a certain emotion of regret that many must now transfer their finished work from the table to the book-shelves; long there to maintain the honoured station to which the learning and taste of the Editor, and, more than all, his unbounded enthusiasm, love, and reverence for our great dramatist, so eminently entitle his magnum opus.

JESSIE PHILLIPS; A TALE OF THE NEW POOR-LAW, PART I. By Mrs. Trollope; with illustrations by Leech. London: Colburn.—Mrs. Trollope believes that there is something vicious in principle, or radically bad, in the new Poor-Law, without, however, being the defender of the abuses of the old system. She thinks it harsh and cruel in operation, and calculated to deteriorate the moral feelings, and to destroy the self-respect of its unfortunate objects. The fundamental mistake was passing this stringent law, conferring on a distant and unsympathizing body, arbitrary, and nearly irresponsible power, without simultaneously, or rather previously, unfettering industry; freeing the working classes from the burthen of an excessive, grinding, and most unequal taxation; and, above all, removing every impost, direct or indirect, from their food—from the prime necessaries of life. Had the new Poor-Law been better considered than its operation shows it to have been, this objection would still remain in equal force. Our legislators "put the cart before the horse;" so that it is not wonderful that smooth and satisfactory progress has not been made. These are our views; Mrs. Trollope has her own of the Poor-Law; and she thinks fit to illustrate them popularly, in a life-like story. We not only give her credit for sincerity of purpose, but for the ability, as well as the inclination, to do good, by graphic exposures of the practical working of the system, if she be careful to steer clear of exaggeration and caricature, to keep down her Toryism, and pursue her avowed object in an earnest and single spirit. In the opening number, there are some well-painted scenes, which, however, bear only remotely on the condition of paupers. The dialogue between a coarse and selfish member of the Poor-Law Board, Mr. Huttonworth, and Mrs. Greenhill, a worthy and most respectable aged widow, reduced to indigence, solely by disinterested efforts to assist her children, is, of course, a gross caricature; though we cannot forget Cowper's remark—"There is no tyrant like an English churchwarden"—the churchwardens being managers of the poor in his time. Were such brutality possible, as that which is ascribed to the button-maker, then we should rejoice to see the widow's son, like a true-hearted Englishman, give the member of the Board a sound thrashing, if the meek-spirited woman did not herself pluck off her old shoe, and slam his ears well. There is, however, a spice of truth in the general reasoning of this button-maker, turned country gentleman—though it does not, in the least, apply to the case in hand. Mrs. Greenhill was pleading for help for her blameless daughter-in-law and innocent grandchildren—

"I am come here," said she, "to ask food for a destitute woman who is just going to lie in, whose husband is in prison, and who has five children to support."—"Shame! shame! shame!" cried the indignant Mr. Huttonworth, and he addressed a clergyman who also sat at the Board. "Now, just observe, Sir,—but do for one moment observe,—the difference between those creatures who have the audacity to claim a maintenance as their right, and the people of our class who have got the misfortune of being obliged to pay it. Just, I say, observe the difference. There's my daughter, with a fortune down of £15,000: that girl, Sir, has been engaged to be married nearly a twelvemonth, and there they are waiting—she and the excellent young man that is engaged to her—till he get a living that has been promised by his uncle, Sir William Wise. That's what I call an example, Mr. Wilcox. We are expected to be prudent, and provident, and thoughtful, and careful, and all the rest of it; while these creatures that burden the earth with themselves and their filthy rags, must go and marry, forsooth; and then send politely to tell us they have five babies, and another coming; and will be much obliged if we will provide breakfast, dinner, and supper, lodging, furniture, firing, and clothing, for their dear, excellent papa and mamma, because they don't happen to have a single penny of their own."

We hope that Mrs. Trollope, as her work proceeds, will study to conciliate instead of exasperating; for we are pretty sure she will not flinch.

LE KEUX'S MEMORIALS OF CAMBRIDGE. No. XXXVIII.—This number concludes the work, which consists of a series of views, very neatly executed, of the colleges, halls, churches, and other public buildings of the town and university of Cambridge. The letter-press, consisting of historical notices, &c., is by Thomas Wright, Esq. of Trinity College, and the Rev. H. Longueville, late Fellow of Magdalene College. The work must have great attraction for all Cantabs, and generally for English "gentlemen and scholars."

CUMMING'S FOX'S BOOK OF MARTYRS. Part XIX. With a View of the singular bird's-nest Protestant Church at Bobi.—This work has now reached the worst period of the persecution, in the earlier part of the reign of Henry VIII., when Calais was still under the English sway. We are amused by one anecdote:—A black-friar came to Calais, selling Pope's pardons at a groat a-piece. A suspected heretic, named William Button, applied to the pardoner to have the souls of his father, and other friends, delivered out of purgatory, if the power of the Holy Father reached so far. "There is no doubt of his power," said the friar.—"Why then," quoth Button, "doth he not, of charity, deliver all souls thereout?" For this bold speech Button was taken before the Commissary, who chafed at the heretic. Nothing daunted, Button remarked, "If your Holy Father, the Pope, may deliver souls out of purgatory, and will not, of charity, deliver them, I would to God the King could make me Pope, and I would surely deliver all out without money."

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPEDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Part I.—This promises to be a useful and elegant compilation; and it is, though a very cheap, a really handsome, well-looking, embellished book. With the talents and industry of Mr. Robert Chambers employed in turning good matter to good account, and the accumulated stores to be found in Warton, Hallam, Campbell, and the host of good writers in this department, an excellent popular view or body of English polite literature must be the result. Part I. reaches from the origin of the language to the era of Latimer, who is in himself an embodied image of the manners of his own age, and of that more primitive one which immediately preceded it.

The London and Edinburgh Monthly Medical Journal for 1842. Edited by John Rose Cormack, M.D.—This annual volume is strictly professional. It contains a great mass of information, both in the form of original communications and in the reviews of new medical works. We do not pretend to pronounce any opinion whatever on a work so entirely beyond our province; but from the imposing list of the names of contributors, some of them already distinguished ornaments of the medical profession, and others clever and active young practitioners, zealous in the prosecution of science, it is but reasonable to augur favourably of this Journal.

The Cambridge University Register for 1843. By William Atkinson Warwick. Pp. 180, with Portrait of Professor Whewell. Cambridge: Warwick & Co. London: Hatchard.—This volume is designed to be a companion to the Cambridge Almanac, and to appear annually. It is made up of the various miscellaneous information and lists, &c., &c., likely to be useful and interesting to the student, and to every one connected with the University, or interested in its affairs.

New Zealand Portfolio. No. VI.

Thornton's History of India. Part III. Vol. IV.

Martin Doyle's Cyclopedia of Practical Husbandry. Part IX.

Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland. Part XX.—The letter-press of this part is of more than usual interest. Mr. N. P. Willis is either bestirring himself, or is inspired since he got into Munster.

An Essay on Punctuation, with Incidental Remarks on Composition. By F. Francillon, Solicitor. Whittaker & Co.

The Scottish Ecclesiastical Register and National Almanac for 1843.

PAMPHLETS.

Friendly Counsels to Female Servants. By the Rev. Andrew Thomson, of Broughton Place Chapel, Edinburgh.—A sensible and really friendly address to a large and most important and valuable class of the community; and one moreover in the improvement of which all the others are very deeply interested.

An Explanation of Gravity; or the Great Power causing Gravitation, Form, and Motion.

The Unemployed, and the Proposed New Poor-Law. A letter from a Renfrewshire heritor to the holders of real property in that county, and in other manufacturing districts of Scotland.—This pamphlet, though one of the first symptoms of that serious alarm among the Scottish heritors, which may soon be general, contains some views and observations worthy of attention.

A Defence of the Rights of the Working Classes. By William Sharman Crawfurd, Esq., M.P. for Rochdale.—A clear and able statement, laid down in distinct sections, in which the entire subject is deliberately discussed, the objections answered, and judgment pronounced in favour of the concession of those rights, which, in the abstract, no one longer denies to any sane man of the age of twenty-one. Among other objections which Mr. Crawfurd refutes, is that founded upon the late conduct of the more violent Chartists. He is not surprised that they should be distrustful and suspicious; and no one can wonder that they should have been misled for a season, but that their good sense remains so very long under eclipse. In repudiating the aid of, and indeed all coöperation with the middle-class Complete or Universal Suffragists, and clinging, without rhyme or reason, to the mere symbol of the six points, they are like a man who, invited to a substantial feast of roast-beef and plum-pudding, takes huff, and refuses to go, because the card does not also specify salt, mustard, and horse-radish; forgetting that he has power to call for these and any other condiments he chooses the moment that he is once fairly at table with the beef and pudding before him. No intelligent man among the working classes can doubt of the sincerity and friendliness of Mr. Sharman Crawfurd, or of his steadfastness to the cause of free representation; and therefore we trust that his address will do much good among the working-men, both directly, and as a counteracting force to the ill influences of their misleaders. It might also tend to mitigate the alarms of those of the higher orders, who see in universal suffrage only universal anarchy and plunder, would they but deign to read the tract.

A Shilling's Worth of Sense.—A good, and neat little book of select and choice sentences and maxims of conduct.

Cultivation of Popular Flowers. The Geranium, with a coloured specimen.

Vindication of the Complete Suffrage Union; being a lecture lately delivered in Manchester by Dr. Henry Edwards.

Printed by William Tait, 107, Prince's Street, Edinburgh.

SURFACEISM; OR, THE MANŒUVRES OF THE WORLD AND ITS WIFE.

A TALE IN TWO PARTS.

BY MRS. GORE.

PART I.

When the first of modern novelists commenced the best of modern novels with the words, "'Tis Sixty Years Since," the mind of the reader was carried back at once to a stirring and romantic epoch of civil war; and the kilted legions of the stormy '45, arose like shadows before his eyes. But time has shuffled on. The Author of Waverley has become unsubstantial as the visions of his creation. Even his especial public of readers is giving way to a younger generation; and in beginning the following story, with the same popular phrase, we specificate a very different moment from the arduous struggles of the Pretender;—a moment of inferior historical interest; but not the less auspicious to the development of domestic complications as essential to the task of the novelist as the clash of political intrigues, and the waste of human life arising from that troubled source.

About sixty years ago, the gallant vessel of the British Empire was "righting itself" after one of those revolutionary breezes so often recurring among us, and so rarely amounting to a storm.—As the invalid constantly subjected to the superintendence of the physician, is often the longest liver,—a kingdom at frequent issue with its authorities, forestalls the growth of such political abuses as create the crisis of a revolution;—and the riots of '80, and disturbances of a dozen other epochs of the last century, probably preserved us from such disastrous convulsions of popular frenzy as have imprinted an indelible stain on the history of France.

It does not follow that our moral atmosphere was the clearer for the absence of such a crisis. A kingdom in a state of warfare, whether with itself or its neighbours, is in a state of fever. But plethora is a clinical condition almost equally dangerous; and it may be observed that the corruptions of society never attain a more baneful flagrancy, than after a prolonged peace.

The early portion of the reign of George III. was, however, an era of exemplary morality. The domestic life of the young king afforded a model to his subjects; nay, so closely were the sovereigns of the realm surrounded by their extensive family, that this limited horizon appeared to shut out from their view all other objects. The state of Europe, nay, the state of England itself, seemed to escape the notice of George III., while engrossed by the interests of the school-room and the nursery; and Wilkes and Junius roared forth unheeded those eloquent appeals which were fated to be drowned in the clatter of pap-spoons, and the whining of the accidence.

As the arid nature of certain soils suffices to dwarf and wither even the finest saplings implanted therein, the atmosphere of a court seems to possess the power of contracting and distorting even the face of Virtue; and thus, not content with the perfection of her own domestic excellence, Queen Charlotte affected a sort of pedantry of morality, and exercised a cold and unforbearing scrutiny into the private life of the aristocracy, which, like all excesses, led to injurious results. Those who, for very venial transgressions, political or social, found themselves coldly looked on by the king and queen, and, by that coldness, exposed to the insolence of the servile courtier tribe,—asserted their independence by setting up a rival banner. The court was abandoned by many who did not choose to be subjected to this tyranny of moral inquisition; and it was by these means that a brilliant circle of malcontents was collected to welcome and encourage the Prince of Wales, the moment his boyish frailties rendered him an object of reprobation to his strait-laced parents. A memorable lesson is afforded, by the way, to the righteous overmuch of this world, in the fact that the mother who, in her old age, exhibited such unconscientious sanction to the vices of the potential Prince Regent, had begun by the most bitter severity towards the follies of the boy of eighteen. As is not uncommon, the prude who had strained at a gnat, ended by swallowing a camel.

Among those who, after being received with a frowning brow at St. James's, and pointedly excluded from a fête at Frogmore, chose to fall back on her own resources as wife of a Peer of England in the enjoyment of independence and thirty thousand a-year, was the Countess of Taunton. Having nothing to desire from the Court, unless an occasional invitation to some royal ball, the moment she found this distinction pointedly withheld, Lady Taunton hastened to take what, to the eyes of the world, appeared the initiative of offence; and laughingly announced her secession from the Goody-Two-Shoes Court of one whom she thenceforward designated, in her own thoughtless and brilliant circle, as "Mrs. Margery Meanwell."

The fault for which Lord and Lady Taunton were excluded from the graces of Windsor Castle, was a political offence of a trivial nature, occurring in the course of a county election, and reported to the queen by the wife of the Lord-Lieutenant, who happened to be one of the starchest and most exemplary of her Ladies of the Bedchamber. So idle an incident ought never to have reached her majesty's ear; or if forced by officious gossip on her notice, should not have lingered a second in her memory; and the overweening royal displeasure with which it was visited, served not only to provoke the Earl of Taunton into factious Parliamentary opposition, but to create in the salon of the Countess a dangerous species of tribunal, where all that was said or done, or left unsaid and undone at St. James's, was subjected to unflinching condemnation. The liberty of the subject, and the liberty of tongue of the subject, were never more fearlessly asserted, than in the coterie at Taunton House.

Seldom does a court, even the most blameless, rise superior to such criticism. The absolute Napoleon trembled more at the gossip of the Faubourg St. Germain, than before the cannons of united Europe: and the godless and lawless Regent of France was often seen to shed tears at the bitternesses uttered against him by the dowagers of Versailles. It is probable that the biting bon-mots launched from the ruby lips of Lady Taunton, occasioned more pain in the little circle at Frogmore, than the frown of her Majesty from the throne had originally inflicted on the volatile Countess.

But while the giddy trifler thus presumed to dally with the majesty of the throne, she not only lost ground in public estimation, but deserved to lose it. Unrestrained by submission to the authority of the Court, the influence of which over her mind was clearly proved by the importance she ascribed to its displeasure, she assumed an unbecoming tone of recklessness and defiance. It has been said, with truth, that people who defy public opinion, are more apt to fall below, than rise superior to its level; and the woman who satirized with such ready wit, the intolerant spirit, and petty domesticity of Queen Charlotte, accordingly exhibited a spirit of toleration far too universal, and was recognised by the world as the least conjugal and maternal of wives and mothers. Not that she was faithless to her husband, or severe to her children. But, selfishly indifferent to both, her only study was to make her life pass pleasantly away; to find pretexts for spending eight months of the year in town,—either Paris or London;—and diversify the remaining four in the country, with more music, gambling, and private theatricals, than had astonished the venerable walls of Taunton Castle, from the time of their besiegement in the wars of the Two Roses.

At the rumour of these lapses of propriety, the Court screwed up its lips, and rejoiced like a prudish spinster over the indiscretions of a rival. But there was no pretext for imposing penance. Lord Taunton, an indolent, dull, unobservant man, had no will or opinions save those of his wife; who imposed them upon him by making them pass, even to himself, as his own. He was thankful to his wife for making his house so agreeable, and his life so easy; and enjoying himself fifty times more as the centre of that brilliant circle, than as one of the outermost chorus-singers of the perpetual God save the King, of Windsor, blessed his stars and his Countess for having convinced him that he was the friend of Wilkes and Liberty, and indifferent to Georges and garters, or any other aristocratic perquisite at the disposal of the Lord's Anointed.

It will readily be understood that the banner of opposition brandished by Lady Taunton would have flaunted in vain, had not the daring arm by which it was upheld been that of a woman, young, and pretty, and witty. Lady Taunton exhibited the head of a clever man on shoulders of alabaster; and by a still stranger incongruity, the boldness of her character was combined with a graceful and feminine deportment. Whatever the audacity of her conduct, her manners never exceeded the boundary of the strictest propriety; and even while uttering bon-mots that occasionally startled the ears of her auditors, she retained the modest countenance of a nun. This species of hypocrisy was the more injurious, that women, and even men, who would have receded from her circle had her demeanour been daring as her principles, were deluded into a belief that the high-bred and plausible Lady Taunton, though sailing in the North of royal favour, was as exemplary in her way and career, as the less sparkling votaries of the throne.

Meanwhile, not a circle in London to be compared with that of Taunton House! Every witticism in vogue was to be traced back to its fountain-head. Artists, men of science, men of letters, though receiving but crabbed courtesy from royal patronage, were there made to feel themselves at home. In Lady Taunton's brilliant salon there was always something new and original going on; some great man sitting for his picture to some great artist,—some pretty woman subjected to a piquant sketch;—some folly of the day, to the pencil of the caricaturist. Nicknames were bestowed there, which the luckless victim was sure to retain for life; epigrams and by-words manufactured, which went the round of the three kingdoms. Impromptus (faits à loisir) accomplished their second birth at the bidding of Lady Taunton's smile; and the wily lady found little difficulty in convincing the credulous Earl, that political hints let fall by himself in the course of their soirées, had inspired some of the finest speeches of Sheridan and Burke.

Now, albeit great lords and ladies pretend to despise literature and depreciate the arts, by designating authors and artists as "lions,"—"odd people,"—or "strange geniuses,"—they are sure to crowd, with double zest, to any house they frequent, as an unfailing resource against their own mental collapse of dulness and ennui; and the finest of the fine world, accordingly canvassed eagerly for admittance into a circle whose ease, freedom, and brilliancy, were said to rival the laisser-aller of Parisian life. The most fashionable young men of the day were proud to frequent the house of the celebrated Lady Taunton. The stupid began to fancy themselves clever, after such close contact with the celebrities of the day; and as a few Bristol stones will pass unsuspected amid a sufficient display of diamonds, the small wits of the aristocracy contrived to pass for brilliants, while emitting their feeble rays in company with the master-spirits of the day.

Thus placed in good humour with themselves, they grew in charity with others, and returned again and again, and with an anxious desire to please, to a circle which no cloud was ever permitted to overcast, and which was gay, motley, and sparkling as the garb of Harlequin.

By the time this society had been ten years in existence, it had substantiated itself by the creation of a class of men and women suitable to its purposes. It was what we conventionally call "a set,"—a name, by the way, seldom bestowed upon any praiseworthy, or meritorious order of persons. The Taunton "set," accordingly consisted, almost exclusively, of pleasure-lovers, disposed to amuse themselves, no matter at the cost of whom or what; and ambitious people, desirous to distinguish themselves, with the same recklessness of principle, elbowing or jesting their way through life, in utter irresponsibility to God or man.

It is a mighty pleasant thing to a harassed statesman, weary author, exhausted artist, or bored lordling, to know that, evening after evening, a well-furnished, well-lighted house is open to him, where he will hear things more pleasantly said than elsewhere,—where a succession of grotesque glasses will be unostentatiously placed in the magic lantern of life,—a Lancastrian school of amusement, where every one contributes, without effort, to the entertainment of his neighbours.

To expect a man emerging from scenes so exciting, to stop short, and inquire of himself, whether, in the indulgence of such pastimes, "virtue has gone out of him," were to tax with too great an exaction, the vigour of modern morality; and the deterioration arising from the influence of the "Taunton set," was consequently so progressive and inostensible, that the modest artist graduated into a roué,—the man of fashion into an infidel,—and the pains-taking patriot into a political adventurer,—while supposing themselves to be mere loungers in a bureau d'esprit.

Among the most popular frequenters of the circle, was a young man named Sidney Hammond, (he signed himself "S. Sidney Hammond," and his enemies persisted in asserting, that the mute S. of his style and title, implied a "Samuel," which he thought proper to drop, as unromantic,) a young man who, in the Taunton set, was called a young man of fortune, and in every other, a very rising young man,—that is, he was generally considered a rising young man, because the Taunton set paid him the deference they considered due only to young men of fortune.

The real fortune of Sidney Hammond, (like himself, we will drop the initiatory S.,) consisted in that sunken rock of the sea of active life, ten thousand pounds; enough to inspire the pretension to leisure, yet insufficient to maintain it. He was the son of an official man of expensive habits, who chose to keep up certain appearances in the world; and as part of them, and with no speculative views, had educated his son at Eton and Oxford. Sidney Hammond was, accordingly, an early adept in the wisdom of the schools, i. e. the public schools. The same system of morals which had induced the father to establish his popularity in society, by keeping a French cook instead of laying by fortunes for his children, determined the son to keep a showy phaeton, an accomplished valet, and a place in an opera-box, instead of husbanding his means, with the hope of ultimately husbanding a wife. Hard and polished as all hard substances are apt to become by friction, he had been, at fifteen, too much a man of the world, to have much thought, at five-and-twenty, of the world to come. Sidney Hammond was consequently pronounced, in the Taunton set, to be a charming fellow,—a most gentlemanly young man,—though, had his associates been either married or monied men, it was very questionable whether they would have trusted him, to any extent, with the custody of their purse or their wife.

One of his associates, however, was, even on these points, manifestly unscrupulous. Of Taunton House, Sidney Hammond possessed les grandes et les petites entrées; and it was the remark of every one newly admitted into the set, that go there at what hour you would,—morning, noon, or night,—you were sure to run your head against Hammond.

"The fact is," Lord Taunton would observe, (in reply to one or two old and intimate friends, who assumed the privilege of ancient friendship, and tried to make mischief, by insinuating hints concerning the frequency of his visits,) "I cannot do without Hammond. Hammond saves me worlds of trouble,—brings me the news of the clubs, and skims the morning papers for me. When there is anything worth reading in the periodicals, it is doubled down for me by Hammond. When those cursed foreigners bring me letters of introduction, Hammond, who speaks French like a Parisian, takes them off my hands. If there is anything new at the theatres, (Lady Taunton detests the play,) Hammond is good enough to accompany me; and, above all, if I have a fit of the gout, I am sure of my picquet every evening, for Hammond is the most friendly and attentive fellow in the world."

Such was the view of the case imposed upon Lord Taunton by his wife, and by Lord Taunton submitted to the approval of the world.

The world, with its usual candour, laughed in its sleeve at his blindness; the blindness of the world being by far the greater of the two, in deciding that the attentions devoted by the young, handsome, and agreeable Sidney Hammond to Taunton House, were exclusively in honour of the Countess. For Lady Taunton, though no longer the reckless beauty of twenty-five who had drawn down upon herself the displeasure of royalty, was still a very attractive woman; and those who witnessed the persevering assiduities of Hammond; his attendance in private and public, his zeal in fetching her ladyship's shawl, and calling her ladyship's carriage,—and above all, his preference of a morning in her boudoir, or evening in her quiet circle, to the most brilliant dejeuner or crowded ball-room elsewhere, could scarcely doubt that this apparent devotion was the result of one of those liaisons which Italy sanctions openly—France tacitly—and England hypocritically,—by uttering loud disclaimers, and pretending disbelief.

But, alas! the London world was thoroughly deceived—including, among the dupes, the Countess herself. Lady Taunton was thoroughly persuaded that nothing but profound respect for her well-known irreproachability of conduct and principles (well-known, indeed—for she was never weary of proclaiming the magnitude of her virtue!) had restrained the feelings of her young admirer within becoming bounds;—and one of the arts on which she prided herself, was the tact with which she had restricted him to such general terms of gallantry, as enabled her to retain him as the confidential friend of the family. As regarded her feelings, she was as incapable of any warmer emotion towards him as towards any human being; and, in spite of the coquetry which delighted in seeing one so popular attached like a slave to her car of triumph, she would have deeply regretted any avowal of preference necessitating his dismissal from the house.

Convinced, however, that the man who gave up his whole time to her caprices, was in the depths of his soul passionately devoted to her,—when surveying her beautiful person in the glass, often did she murmur to herself, with an air of compassionate superiority, "Poor Sidney—poor Hammond!"

"He could scarcely give me a greater proof of his devotion," thought the vain Countess, "than the patience with which, for my sake, he sacrifices so much of his time to accompany Lord Taunton to plays and auctions, picture-galleries and popular preachers. I can fully appreciate poor Hammond's martyrdom, while enduring what I find it out of my power to support. But what will not love enable a man to go through!—Poor Sidney!—Poor Hammond!"

Yet all this time, the martyrdom endured by "poor Sidney," as an attendant in her ladyship's boudoir, in copying silly verses into gorgeous albums, in listening hour after hour to the bon-mot which she repeated in succession to half-a-hundred morning visiters—in hearing the news of the day lisped into absurdity by the lips of namby-pamby lords and ladies of fashion—in seeing the sacred ark of politics defiled by the touch of Lady Taunton's meretricious hand, sparkling with rings and redolent of essences,—was fifty times greater than the ennui he sometimes experienced while lounging in silence by the side of the Earl—a quiet inoffensive man, who neither wounded th vanity of his companions, nor harassed them by the susceptibilities of his own.

For this preux chevalier, this supposed adorer of Lady Taunton, was essentially a man of the day,—a child of the century;—cold-blooded, selfish, designing;—and the real object of his devotion at Taunton House was the advancement of his own interests in life! It was there alone he found himself in contact with those whom he regarded as auspicious arbiters of his destiny!

"At my age, were I to exert what little interest I possess, to obtain an appointment,"—argued Sidney with himself, on the death of his father,—"what should I obtain? Some villanous clerkship, which would at once depreciate my position in society, and lead to nothing. But if I wait till I have made myself a name, and am recognised as a man of talent, they will be ashamed to offer me anything undeserving my acceptance. Once embarked in public life, vogue la galère!—the rest depends upon myself. But by the time I accomplish the age and reputation indispensable to my projects, the whole face of political life will have altered. The party of the Prince will then be predominant; and being fortunately uncompromised, it is as easy to attach myself to the worship of the rising sun as of any other. At Taunton House, I meet the leading members of the liberal party, who have at present leisure to take cognizance of a man professing their principles, and exhibiting abilities calculated to do them service. To the Tauntons, therefore, will I attach myself;—work my way perseveringly towards my object—undeterred and unseduced by those attractions which shake the consistency of other young men. By extending my connexions in the political world, I may, in time, work my way into Parliament. There are occasions when a sudden vacancy serves to put in requisition the services of any trustworthy and zealous adherent nearest at hand. No place on earth, therefore, where it will be more useful to me to make myself advantageously known, than Taunton House."

Such were the views and principles of the rising young man, who, at twelve years old, had been sent by his father to a public school to increase his connexions.

Few species of society are more agreeable than an established circle like that of Taunton House, where a specific set of remarkable persons assembles, week after week, and year after year, rather to meet each other, than for the sake of their host. The habitués of such a house concede to each other's peculiarities, understand each other's habits and interests, and a general spirit of fusion produces an even surface peculiarly susceptible of polish.

At the close of five years, Sidney Hammond had made to himself, at Taunton House, friendships and acquaintanceships of the most promising nature. Tolerated, in the first instance, in the set, as a gentlemanly lad, hopelessly in love with the brilliant Countess, he contrived, by degrees, to recommend himself to the better opinion of those whose esteem was likely to do him service. An admirable listener, he had a ready stage-laugh at the service of those who professed to be entertaining, and an air of profound gravity and conviction for those who pretended to the didactic. It was part of his daily business to make himself better acquainted with the debate of the night before, than even those whose eloquence had taxed therein the patience of the reporters; and often was he enabled to set right an honourable member, or noble lord, on the particulars of his own speech. Under such circumstances, it needed only a session or two to convert him into "a smart young fellow," till, in the sequel, he was designated—among the baldheads and greyheads who came to drivel their political opinions, or vent their snarlings against the powers that were, beside the tea-table of the Countess of Taunton—as "a very rising young man."

Already the first step upon the ladder of ambition was accomplished. Sidney Hammond's rapid advance in the estimation of her set, passed unnoticed by the Countess, because he was interesting to her vanity, rather than to her affections. Had he really occupied the place imagined by the world, she would have been proud of his triumphs, and zealous for his success in life; but as "poor Sidney" constituted only a minor portion of the amusement of her day, she saw no further, than that he bored himself to talk politics to Lord Taunton's political associates, in order to blind them to the incongruity of so very young a man being a frequent intruder into their confabulations.

Constant, meanwhile, to his object, Hammond diverged neither to the right nor to the left; nor did he ever—by grasping at shadows, in attempting to extend his connexions in the great world—lose hold of the realities of Taunton House. There he met all whom it was essential to him to meet; and aware that the Countess was not a woman to be contented with a divided homage,—and that the perseverance of his devotion alone effaced, in the estimation of the heartless woman of the world, his deficiencies of birth, fortune, and fashion,—he neglected all other sources of advancement. In the Taunton set he must either "live, or have no life."

The matters involving his future political existence were now approaching to a crisis; for the unfortunate King's malady had declared itself—affording, like all other public disasters, grounds for venal speculation. A regency was imminent. The Taunton House set was looking forward to the inauguration of the chief of its party, and Sidney Hammond to the crowning of his hopes, by promotion to a place on his Royal Highness's footstool.

Yet, even the restless interest he could not but evince in the question, failed to open the vanity-blinded eyes of the Countess. It was with her usual smile of coquetish superiority that she murmured the name of "poor Sidney," while noticing with what eagerness he embraced a cause of no manner of moment to one of his obscure sphere, except as involving her interests and those of Lord Taunton.

"In his singlemindedness, poor fellow!" thought the vain-glorious intrigante, "he forgets, that when Lord Taunton forms part of the Cabinet, it will be impossible for him to retain the same familiar footing in our society,—that I shall no longer have half so much time to bestow upon him,—and that others of higher personal consequence will supersede him in his attendance! Poor Sidney!—Poor Hammond!—he will find out all this too late! However, there must have come a time when his intimacy here would be less acceptable; and far better that the break should arise from a cause so natural, and so little painful to his feelings, than from explanations humiliating to all."

Bootless philosophy!—the expectations of the Countess were destined to disappointment. She was not fated to triumph, in her turn, over the royal lady who had triumphed over herself. The hopes of the party were for the present blighted; and before the partisans of the Prince had half recovered the shock, the will of Providence frustrated their further views, by the perfect restoration of the afflicted King.

"How keenly does he feel for my disappointment!" was the secret reflection of Lady Taunton on the elongated face of her devoted friend; and scarcely a woman of her acquaintance but was of opinion, that the ambitious Countess must be almost compensated for the loss of the honours for which she had been supposed a postulant, by the untired and untirable attachment of the "distinguished young man," who scarcely stirred from her side,—the most faithful among the faithful adherents of Taunton House.

Though thwarted and vexed, the hopes of Sidney Hammond, meanwhile, were rather deferred than extinguished; nor did he relax in his line of policy, because the goal proved further off than he had anticipated. More than ever self-reliant, he had every reason to congratulate himself on his position in society. The undisguised partiality of Lady Taunton had done him no harm, even with many whose rigid code of morality might have been expected to place the attachment of a married woman in a less favourable light. But people seemed to make excuses, he thought, for a preference so natural. People seemed to feel that she could not do otherwise than love and admire the man who cumulated so many personal and mental distinctions. All he feared was her growing weakness in his favour. Nothing discomposed him more than the apprehension that she might be betrayed into some unbecoming exhibition of her passion before he had attained his object and secured his promotion. The promising young man who had fixed his hopes on public distinctions, dreaded an esclandre as much as the severest prude.

Though Hammond had never entertained an idea of following the law as a profession, (his fatal ten thousand pounds inspiring him with pretensions to a less thorny avenue to the temple of fame,) he had kept his terms, and still resided in the Temple; in the belief that this sort of professional pretension afforded him a more positive standing in the eyes of official men; and during the intervals of his visits to Taunton Castle, and one or two of the country houses of the intimates of its noble owner, it was his custom to retreat into this sober domicile, and repair, by a few months' assiduous study, the mental ravages produced by the enervating habits of a life of do-nothingness.

With the Countess, meanwhile, he kept up a regular correspondence; assiduously supplying to the Earl those anecdotes of London gossip which even the most stagnant moments of the metropolis are always able to furnish to the liveliest condition of the country; and to her ladyship, the pleasing excitement produced by highflown protestations, "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

It was towards the close of one of these studious intervals; and Sidney Hammond, who had been spending a couple of dull months in the Temple, after the expiration of the shooting season and the Christmas holidays, was growing sufficiently weary of legs of mutton, and the society of men whose conversational powers emulated the solidity and inelegance of that substantial fare, to look forward with eager delight to the opening of the Temple of his divinity. He was indeed justifiable in his joy at the Tauntons' return to town. With such a French cook as theirs,—such a cellar,—and such a dining-room,—their claims to the sympathy of their friends were past dispute.

"Another dull week, and they will be here," mused "poor Sidney," as he took his way towards St. James's Street, to see what news was to be collected in the neighbourhood of Brookes'; and as it happened to be Saturday, he had the satisfaction of acquainting Sheridan and Burke, (whom he met lounging on the pavé in Pall Mall,) that he had heard from Taunton Castle, and that, on the 25th, their friends were to be in town. It was only through their common initiation into the Taunton set that he was entitled to address these men, whose very bow conveyed distinction.

Though incapable of emulating, Hammond could doubtless approach the lofty elevation of thought and feeling characterizing the master-spirits of a party whose more ostensible members were heartless and frivolous as himself. With the helpless wonder with which a child contemplates such a structure as St. Paul's, or a schoolboy the majesty of the Iliad, he regarded the statesmanlike and thoughtful policy of those more steadfast minds, to whom Power was precious as a means, rather than as an end; recognising, without desiring to ennoble, the inferiority of his own pretensions.—Their broadly-based and nobly-aspiring ambition stood before him like a mighty pyramid, in whose shadow provinces lie sheltered, grounded upon eternal foundations, and tapering to the sunshine of Heaven,—compared with the unstable and glittering Chinese pagoda typifying his own interested aspirings. Still, he knew that it was only by the strength of their vigour his fragility could be protected;—and was satisfied that he could not moor his skiff of vanity too closely under their majestic ramparts.

"How much more pleasantly have I shaped my course," mused Sidney Hammond, as he sat, skimming the morning papers the following day over his coffee and rolls, "than by harnessing myself to the drudgery of the law, like Varley and Wrangham, and others with whom I started in life; and who, from that day to this, have buried themselves in books and business, yet are now scarcely beginning to earn their own maintenance!—While I have been enjoying all that is most enjoyable in society, those fellows have renounced every pleasure or enjoyment of life; their reveries brightened, perhaps, by remote visions of the Bench or the Woolsack, and a tablet surrounded by splay-footed allegorical virtues in Westminster Abbey. But what then? Even should these professional prosperities be eventually attained, what do they afford to compensate the waste of ten or fifteen of the best years of life,—the only years worth living,—with all the senses in their bloom, and the pulses of existence throbbing with intensity of enjoyment? Thank Heaven, my modest competence secured me from the necessity of toiling for bread; and the moment a man works for the mere cake of life, he is privileged to choose his own pleasant time and place for the labour."

Had any better (or worse) genius whispered at that moment to Sidney Hammond that this modest competence might comprise the utmost extent of his worldly provision, and that, though a man at thirty is rich with five hundred a-year, a man of fifty is debarred by such a limitation of income from all the happier stabilities of life,—in the wantonness of his pride he would have scouted the idea that his individual merits could be so overlooked by the discernment of destiny. Courted by his betters, quoted by his betters, he had some grounds for his vain conviction that he had attained sufficient notoriety to be sure of a provision on the accession of his party to power. For it did not occur to him that, unsupported by family connexion, or Parliamentary influence, his claims were likely to be superseded by those of hundreds of intelligent young men attached by collateral threads to the party, each of whom exhibited more experience or aptitude for business than himself; and that the pleasant small-talker of a dinner-party, who writes piquant articles for reviews, and is tolerated by public men of higher calibre, simply as somewhat less silly than the lordlings of ton,—is at a prodigious distance from such a position as maintains its own ground amid the struggling and wrangling for place consequent on every change of the Administration.

Even the expected change, however, still remained prospective; and if he contented himself with the delay, it was because the interim was to be spent in the golden palace of his Armida.

But while indulging over the breakfast-table in his compassionate soliloquy touching the martyrdom of his friends Varley and Wrangham, he was interrupted by the arrival of a letter, emitting the well-known scent of maréchale, indicating as plainly as the post-mark, that it originated in the boudoir of Taunton Castle; and with his usual cold-blooded egotism, Sidney Hammond allowed it to remain unopened on the table-cloth, till, by a patent apparatus, he had succeeded in boiling to half a turn the two new-laid eggs, whose preparation was too important to be submitted to hands less experienced than his own;—then, having leisurely buttered his sippets of crisp dry toast, and, after the discussion of the last morsel, rinsed his mouth and wiped his hands, he proceeded to open his letter as coolly as if, like the prints of butter before him, it had been carefully iced.

The utmost he anticipated from the epistle was a commission or two to execute for the Countess previous to her arrival in town: the chair-cushions of her opera-box to be covered with new chintz; her subscription to be renewed at Hookham's; or a hint of expedition with her new chariot for the birth-day, to be given to her coachmaker in Long Acre. For, during her ladyship's absence from town, "poor Sidney" was habitually employed to fetch and carry for the lady of his thoughts; Lady Taunton feeling intimately convinced, that to bear her errands from one bargain-shop to another was to her devoted admirer a task more acceptable, than to be signing despatches in Downing Street, or calling forth the cheers of the House of Commons!

On opening the letter in question, however, Hammond perceived, from its length and complexion, that it was no scribbled catalogue of commissions—no precis of orders to Hendrie to let the Hungary Water be better than the last; or of reprimands of the tardiness of Robert and Boulant. It was far more clearly and distinctly written than the thousand epistles which, in the course of the last half-dozen years, he had received from Lady Taunton. There was evidence of a well-selected sheet of paper, a new pen—nay, even of a rough copy, in the carefully calculated epistle which pretended, nevertheless, to flow from the heart of the writer to that of the reader; and which, if such were really the case, indicated, at least, that for any humanity of feeling evinced by either heart, they might as well have been manufactured out of Portland stone.

"Although I am satisfied, my dear Sidney," wrote Lady Taunton, "that your own tact and knowledge of the world must have already suggested to you all I am about to say, yet, lest your feelings should be tempted to overlook the admonitions of your graver moments, I feel it a duty to my family and myself to observe, that I fear a time is come exacting some modification of our intimacy.

"You are well aware how grateful I have ever felt towards you for your disinterested friendship for the Earl—a friendship which has induced you, indeed, to sacrifice many moments to the dulness of our domestic circle, which you might have passed elsewhere in a manner far more consonant with your age. But a period has arrived, when to persist in accepting these sacrifices, would be to expose our intimacy to a peril I dare not adventure. Since you quitted the castle, Harriet (who is to be presented immediately after Easter) has been emancipated from the school-room, and, for some weeks past, has made her appearance in our circle. I need not tell you that the first object in life of Lord Taunton and myself, is to see this dear girl satisfactorily established. With her fortune, connexion, and attractions, there is every reason she should make a brilliant alliance; and since, from the secluded life my daughter has led, her heart will naturally be more open to the influence of first impressions, than those of other girls of her age, I am doubly called upon to be careful that she shall receive only such as are likely to conduce to her permanent advantage in life.

"With these views, my dear Sidney, you will, I am sure, perceive that your continued intimacy in the family would be fraught with danger for us all. Lady Harriet could scarcely fail to give her confidence and affection to one so fascinating as yourself, whom she has been accustomed to regard as the bosom-friend of her parents; and for whom, I greatly fear, she might imbibe a partiality more than likely to disincline her young heart for the prudential marriage I have set my heart upon her making in the course of the season.

"Till Harriet shall be settled in life, therefore, I have to request, as a personal favour towards Lord Taunton and myself, that, without taking exception at any alteration you may perceive in our deportment, you will cease to frequent our house in the familiar manner hitherto so agreeable to us all. At some future moment, I trust we shall meet on our former footing; till when, with kindest regards from the Earl, believe me ever, my dear Sidney, sincerely yours,

"L. Taunton."

A sudden plunge on a winter's night into a freezing river, could not have produced a more disagreeable congelation in the frame of Sidney Hammond than the perusal of this heartless epistle! Lady Taunton pretending to exhibit the solicitudes of a mother! Lady Taunton indulging in maternal anxiety! He had scarcely patience with her hypocrisy! From first to last of their intimacy, though often the inmate of the Earl and Countess, at their country seats, as well as their daily visiter in town, he had not seen Lady Harriet Bertie half-a-dozen times,—so little had she been admitted to share the pleasures or society of her parents. Lady Taunton's children were in fact the creation of head-nurses and governesses. Knowing them to be watched over and cared for to the amount of nearly a thousand a-year, and with so many abject implements at her disposal, she felt herself exonerated from the vulgar routine of parental duties; and the lady Harriet, of whose interests she spoke in terms so tender, was in point of fact almost a stranger to her mother!

Sidney Hammond remembered having met her occasionally sauntering in company with the governess and the younger children, among the beautiful shrubberies of Taunton Castle. He had noticed her ingenuous countenance and exquisite complexion; the veined marble of her temples,—the delicate lineaments and diminutive head proverbially indicating nobility of origin. As she raised towards him her large grey eyes from beneath their fringe of jet black lashes, he had sometimes regretted that Greuge and Watteau had not possessed so fair a model for their delicate imaginings of shepherdesses arrayed like marquises, or marquises with the air of shepherdesses. But the idea of making himself acceptable to the pretty automaton, was as unlikely to enter his head, as to affect terms of gallantry towards a well-dressed wax-doll. Of this, Lady Taunton was as well aware as himself; and she must consequently have ulterior views in dismissing him from her house on such a pretext.

Who was jealous of him? Certainly not the Earl! Who mistrusted his growing ascendancy over the mind of the brilliant Countess? Certainly not the Earl! Lord Taunton had, from the first, sanctioned the intimacy, and evinced perfect blindness or perfect indifference. Convinced that he was sacrificed to some unknown rival, Sidney Hammond began to experience, at the moment of his dismissal by the haughty woman to whom the world believed him all in all, and for the first time in his life, some disposition to attach importance to her preference. The result, however, of all his indignation and all his repinings, was the disagreeable consciousness that he was a lost man,—and, like the first lost man victimised by the frailty of the sex, banished for ever from his terrestrial paradise. No more Taunton House for him,—no more Taunton Castle;—no more smiles from the Prince, or bows from Grey, or nods from Sheridan and Fox! For he now knew enough of the ways and means of the Taunton set, to be aware that, a star once fallen from their sphere, its place knew it no longer; that a man was either one of them, or nothing.

All therefore that remained for him was to gather together the three hundred and fifty pounds per annum still remaining of his ten thousand pounds, retrench his expenses, resume his former familiarity with such men as Varley and Wrangham, and reattach himself, if possible, to the scattered hordes of Hammonds from whom his father had indulged in the vanity of distinguishing himself, and from whom he had shrunk with loathing in his artificial capacity of a man of fashion; for he possessed uncles in the city, and cousins in Bloomsbury and Marylebone, who might, under his present embarrassing circumstances, prove available.

But was this all the opening that remained? The morning was a cheerless one. A small, drizzly, silent March rain came down so unremittingly, as to appear a positive atmosphere, rather than an accidental visitation; and as "poor Sidney" reclined in his roomy arm-chair before the fire, in those often contemned chambers which, now that his prospects in life were closed, had grown suddenly too sumptuous and costly for his means,—he felt sadly out of sorts with the hollowness of the world,—and inclined to believe that all was over. He, the most heartless of mankind,—he, the very King or Crown-prince of the Surfaces, took refuge from his follies in reviling the selfishness of society and the egotism of mankind! In his irritation at finding himself a dupe, the tool of an artful woman, he was as angry as though he had not intended to convert her into the implement of his ambition;—as angry, in short, as if he had indulged in real feelings to be outraged!

With the genuine spirit of his class, however, his first object was to conceal from others the downfall he could not conceal from himself. Half the torture of misfortune to worldly people consists in the injury to their self-love; and the apprehension of becoming "poor Sidney" to the malicious world, inspired him with audacity that almost supplied the place of fortitude.

Instead, therefore, of allowing echo to answer "ALL!" in reply to the above inquiry concerning the sum total of his remaining prospects, he argued with himself, that though superannuated for professional exertion—though too late for law, physic, or divinity, army or navy—one of the most important avenues to social prosperity was still open: he might make an interested marriage! The fact of his decadence was yet a secret. He was still Sidney Hammond—still the rising young man; and, instead of economy and nepotism—instead of selling his phaeton and cultivating uncles in Bedford Square, he would look out for a rich wife! There was nothing degrading in such a proposition. Everywhere, but in England, marriage is a matter "dealt with by attorneyship;" and why should he be more delicate in his sentiments on such a point than the collected millions of the continent? Since there are heiresses in the world, it is written that they must be sought in marriage; and it were doing them an injury to suppose that, in the superfluity of their affluence, they are not disposed to make a disinterested match.

At the close of these cogitations, Sidney Hammond rose from his chair, and discovered, for the first time, that the looking-glass over his mantelpiece was cloudy and of inferior quality; so little was he satisfied with the review of his forces, previous to opening his new campaign. For, alas! the face reflected before him was no longer the fine, open, manly countenance, with which he had first entered the gates of Taunton House. He now discerned certain puckerings near the eyes, almost amounting to crow's feet; and, as well as the imperfect light of that heinously rainy day permitted him to ascertain, could almost have sworn that one or two silvery fibres had inserted themselves (perforce of nights spent at loo and pharaoh in the Taunton set) into the jetty whiskers forming an ebony frame to the fine oval of his face.

His task as a fortune-hunter would only be the more laborious! But the hope of silencing the sneers of society, and of rising superior to the consequences of Lady Taunton's ingratitude, already nerved his courage to encounter the labours of Hercules.

Before he made up his mind in what tone to reply to the insolent letter of the Countess, he passed carefully in review the eligibilities as a wife presented by the various women of fortune of his acquaintance. Society has always its rich widows and wealthy heiresses—each usually provided with some drawback, forming a bane almost past relief of the golden antidote, or aurum potabile; and both in and out of the Taunton set, Sidney Hammond collected for review a glittering phalanx, each more or less efficient for his purpose.

There was the young Baroness, Lady Chesterle-Street;—but she was too well versed in the mysteries of society, not to regard with mistrust his sudden alienation from the feet of the Countess of Taunton. There was Miss Madingley, with twenty thousand a-year;—but she had too many rich men-of-business about her, connected with the mercantile origin of her fortune, not to be fonder of investing her savings in the public funds, than in the gratitude of the handsomest or most agreeable man in existence. There was the widow Penshurst, whose diamonds formed a sort of galaxy in the ground-tier at the opera; but she had already been the victim of an interested marriage. There was the Dowager Countess of Claridge,—but her avarice was more than proportionate to her prodigious jointure.

On second thoughts, Sidney Hammond determined to moderate his views on the score of property, and extend them as regarded personal attractions. No occasion, because he wished to marry well, to sacrifice himself to a monster! In such a case, Lady Taunton would still maintain her advantage over him. In such a case, he should as decidedly become "poor Sidney," and be sacrificed to the wits and caricaturists of the Taunton set, as by remaining a peevish, disappointed bachelor in his Temple chambers!

The final result of the cogitations of that rainy day, was a visit the day following to a certain Mr. Hardingston, resident in Harley Street;—a wealthy merchant, grey as Polonius but somewhat wiser, who, like Polonius, rejoiced in "one fair daughter whom he loved passing well." Having no maiden sister or gouvernante to look after the said fair and motherless daughter, Sidney Hammond could do no more than leave a card. For Louisa Hardingston received no morning visiters; and though, on his introduction to her at a ball at the house of an eminent banker some weeks before, he had been invited by the father to improve the acquaintance, there was something so little attractive to him, at that time, in the idea of a beautiful girl with fifty or sixty thousand pounds and as much more in prospect, who had never heard of the Taunton set, and was never likely to be heard of in the order of society which he presumed to call the world,—that he had refrained from profiting by the hint.

But now a change was come over the spirit of his dream, or rather, from a dream, he had progressed into realities; and right glad was the discomfited minion of Taunton House when, a few days after his pilgrimage to Ultima Marylebone, he received an invitation to dinner from the substantial city man he had hitherto treated so cavalierly.

One of the many symptoms that Hammond was in reality what we have described him, a child of the century, was the flexibility, or rather plasticity of his character.—Reed, to the very pith, he could not only bend to the storm, but accommodate himself to all possible variations of atmosphere; and before the world was cognizant of his ignominious exit from the Taunton set, he had made a triumphal entry into another, which might be described as its very antipodes.

At the house of John Hardingston, Esq., M.P., of Harley Street and Great St. Helen's, the discarded adventurer was welcomed as a man of fashion and fortune, deigning to stoop from his sphere, in favour of a house presided over by one of the handsomest girls in London; and on the day of his first dinner with his intended father-in-law, the rest of the party, consisting of two country baronets with their females, and two or three wealthy bankers with theirs, exchanged significant glances with Louisa, on noticing the attentions paid her by a personage whose name invaded, with such far from damnable iteration, the paragraphs of the Morning Post,—as dining with earls and frequenting the balls of duchesses. For this hum-drum circle, the highly polished manners of Sidney Hammond and the conversational tact acquired by talking only with and for the best society, possessed peculiar charm. Sidney Hammond was precisely a héros de roman for the horizon of Harley Street. A gay captain of the guards, they would have repudiated as frivolous,—a reckless lordling, as a roué;—but Sidney, who entered into political discussions with as capable an air as the gravest owl of them all,—Sidney, who could quote Fox, Sheridan, and Burke, inedited, and pure from the fountain-head, commanded general attention.

From none more than from poor Louisa.—Miss Hardingston was a girl of elegant mind and timid disposition, who, having lost her mother at an early age, was educated at one of those first-rate "establishments" where half-a-dozen damsels of family and fortune are received at the separate cost, which would maintain the whole half dozen elsewhere; and having, in this nursery of exclusiveism, contracted intimacies inspiring a taste for aristocratic distinction, it necessarily followed, that when required, at eighteen, to assume the head of her father's establishment, she was disagreeably startled to find herself placed far below the level of her former associates. It was no fault of her's that the tone of her father's city friends was less refined than she had been prepared to expect. Louisa had been required, for the last twelve years, to cultivate tastes and pretensions beyond her sphere; and during the first few months of her sojourn at home,—a home which her father's peremptory occupations in the city, eight hours of the day, rendered solitary enough for the promotion of serious reflection,—could not forbear regretting that she had been encouraged to indulge in social ambitions never likely to be realized.

Mr. Hardingston's intimates, on the other hand, were people too busily engrossed in the active business of life to take much heed of his daughter.—On finding her so grave, they concluded her to be shy; and on hearing the complaints of their wives and daughters that she was a fine lady, replied that she was young enough to mend, and would know better a few years hence.

So ingratiating a person as Sidney Hammond, was consequently a most agreeable accession to her society; and Louisa was delighted to converse with one familiar with most of her early friends, and habituated to their habits;—like herself, preferring Italian music to English glees; versed like herself in foreign literature, and devoted to the dulce rather than the utile of life. The new pretendant to her favour was too well accustomed to address himself to the foibles of those over whom he desired to obtain an ascendancy, not to make the most of the advantages he thus possessed. Nor was it alone to the weaknesses of Louisa's character that he laid siege. On perceiving Miss Hardingston's distaste for the joviality of the noisy city beaux who resorted to her father's house, in deference to this sensitive gentleness Hammond affected in his new sphere an almost poetical refinement of delicacy and reserve. Instead of pressing his attentions upon the heiress, he pointedly marked his respectful deference by confining his assiduities to her father; and chose that she should form her estimate of his conversation invariably addressed to others, rather than to herself.

This species of manœuvre seldom fails of success with a young and timid girl. In the conviction that the fashionable Sidney Hammond did not consider her worthy his attention, Louisa became only the more ambitious of obtaining it. For the first time in her life, she tried to please; and great, indeed, was her joy and triumph on the first occasion of his devoting half an hour to her, to whom he had already determined to devote his future life.

To obtain admission into the society frequented by the Hardingstons was no difficult matter to one so well established in the world as Lady Taunton's preux chevalier; and it conferred additional distinction on Louisa's debût, that wherever she went, to whatever hum-drum balls, or homely parties, she was followed by one whose personal qualifications were estimated by all around her as of so high an order.

But that the ambitious mind and shallow heart of Hammond were thoroughly preëngrossed, he could not but have been touched by the graceful loveliness of the girl he was predetermined to victimize, and impressed by the solid merit of the circle to which he was thus accidentally introduced. Among the Parliamentary men belonging to Hardingston's society, there prevailed a tendency to practicalism, the origin of the sect of Utilitarians that has since sprung up, very different from the brilliant, but frothy, speculativeness of his former friends. The monied world into which he had fallen, as the antipodes of the fashionable world from which he was ejected, exhibited a less polished surface, but boasted a more solid substantiality. Both were given up to materialism; but the enjoyments of Taunton House seemed to depend on capricious sunshine from without; of Harley Street, upon inherent comfort. Among the Hardingston tribe he had to abjure French cookery and pharaoh,—for which capital wines and excellent whist were a satisfactory substitute; and if his evenings were now less enlivened by brilliant sallies, there was no pretension to wit, and, consequently, no risk of failure.

But unfortunately, though agreeably surprised in the tone of the society on which he had ingrafted himself, Sidney Hammond had drunk too deep of the cup of Circe to retain any pretension to pure and natural tastes. Amid these matter-of-fact people he languished for the brilliant artificiality of Taunton House; and while all other eyes were captivated by the youthful loveliness of Louisa Hardingston, he longed to re-fashion her appearance, and reform her timid simplicity, so as to render her "presentable" to those among whom he felt that, with such a wife, he might become acceptable as ever.

"As a married man," thought he, (after an evening spent with the graceful girl, in whose eyes he fancied he had detected an expression of repressed but decided preference,)—"as a man established in life by a prosperous marriage, Lord Taunton will be as well pleased as ever to take refuge in my company from the neglect of his wife and family. Even that woman,—even Lady Taunton,—when she finds I am not disposed to resent her treachery, and that she has no further pretext for impertinence in the danger of my society to her daughter, will be enchanted to welcome back the patient victim of her whims and caprices,—the only man, as she has often assured me, who thoroughly understands her; and who, I flatter myself, is not without his share in establishing the reputation of her lively coterie!"

Such were the honourable intentions of the accomplished gentleman, to dwell upon whose broken avowals of admiration, and expressive glances of tenderness, poor Louisa Hardingston devoted so many hours of her sleepless nights:—thanking Heaven for the good fortune which, amid the prosaic tenor of her life, had brought her acquainted with a man of such ingratiating manners, such honourable sentiments, and pursuits and habits so refined and so congenial with her own!

For how is inexperienced eighteen to be on its guard against the cruel speciousness of an apostle of modern SURFACEISM?

THE CHASSEUR'S MATIN.

ROUSE ye to the hunters' shout,
Chamouni! Chamouni!
Morning puts night's lantern out,
Chamouni! Chamouni!
Anxious wife and children dear,
Safe return'd, your hunter's here;
Widow, here's your gallant son,
And maiden, here's the lovèd one:
Up! and rejoice ye,—away with your fear,
Chamouni! Chamouni! your hunters are here.

To dress the vine in safety go,
Chamouni! Chamouni!
The gaunt wolf's blood stains yonder snow,
Chamouni! Chamouni!
Rugged Blanc and Val de Aost,
We have climb'd and we have cross'd,
And from Alp and glacier's crown,
We have brought the Chamois down:
Up! and rejoice ye,—away with your fear,
Chamouni! Chamouni! your hunters are here.

Blessed be thy safe retreat,
Chamouni! Chamouni!
Free from slaves' and tyrants' feet,
Chamouni! Chamouni!
Never shall the mountain men
Stoop to dastard citizen,
Never shall our children see
The night-fall of our liberty:
Up! and rejoice ye,—away with your fear,
Chamouni! Chamouni! your hunters are here.

GIEKIE'S ETCHINGS.*

The opinion seems to have been current, even among the well-educated of our southern friends, down to so late an era as Goldsmith, that no Scotsman could possibly possess either wit or humour. What was thought of the author of "Roderick Random" and "Humphrey Clinker" it is difficult to conjecture. He might be set down as one of those rare exceptions which prove a rule. And of the elder Scottish poets, whose works abound in rich and genuine humour, the English, from the dialect, knew little more than of their own Chaucer or Piers Plowman. The works of Burns, and of Scott and Galt, are certainly beginning to shake the opinion of Scottish gravity and dulness; and though brilliant wit may still be denied to the nation, some superficial vein of humour is now generally conceded to it. The genuine humour which has always distinguished the popular literature of Scotland, is however only beginning to be manifested in Art, which is itself still comparatively new in Scotland. A few of the artists of the past generation, and especially Allan in his illustrations of comic poetry, displayed, if not much fertility of invention, yet considerable appreciation of the humour and character fairly placed before them, and some power of expressing humorous ideas in a pictorial form. The monstrosities perpetrated by Kay, though they possess considerable merit as coarse local satires, it is not easy to regard seriously as works of Art; unless the symbolical rude scratchings of barbarous nations made upon rocks and caves in commemoration of memorable events, are to be classed with the historical paintings of a civilized people. Geikie is, therefore, to be considered as almost the first Scottish etcher who, with quick penetration of character, possessed a rich, quiet humour, held in strict subordination to the truth of nature, and never once allowed to diverge into caricature. He has been named the Scottish Hogarth; and it may be allowed that no native artist has hitherto established a better claim to that distinction. Yet his genius is more akin to the masters of the Dutch School than to that of the great moral and also imaginative painter of England.

The history of this artist, who died in the prime of life, a few years since, is, independently of his talents, both touching and instructive. When only two years of age, Geikie was seized with a severe fever, from which he recovered, but with the total obliteration of the sense of hearing. From this period he remained deaf and dumb. He was a native of Edinburgh; and had the happiness of being the child of worthy and pious, and we should imagine, intelligent parents. By unremitting care of his education, his father did all that was possible to mitigate the consequences of the great calamity which had befallen his son. At the Institution for the instruction of deaf mutes, he received the elements of a useful education, though his father had previously taught him to read. He was always fond of books; but his strongest childish inclination was to imitative art: and after having been well instructed in drawing, he was, at the age of fourteen, placed under the care of Mr. Graham, the first Master of the School of Design, which has done so much for Art in Scotland. That he was received among the students of that Academy, presupposes considerable proficiency in drawing. The gallery of the Institution had not, at that period, been enriched by the collection of casts from antique statues, busts, friezes, &c., &c., which it now exhibits; but Geikie found his subjects in nature, and profited so well by the instructions of an excellent master, and a sound system of tuition, that he soon acquired remarkable dexterity in the use of the crayon. His sense of hearing seems to have been absorbed in that of sight; the power concentrated in the eye, of which the ear was deprived.

From a Biographical Introduction to the Etchings, written in the kindest spirit, by Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, we learn that, while a student in the Institution, Geikie's perseverance was indefatigable; and that he was continually on the watch out of doors for characteristic subjects for his pencil;—so that all figures or groups which pleased his fancy were immediately transferred, with unerring accuracy, to his portfolio. So great was the rapidity and facility with which he used his crayon, that it was not uncommon for him to catch the contour of odd figures, or remarkable faces, together with their racy peculiarities, as he walked by the side of the originals in the streets. Some amusing anecdotes are related of his adventures in pursuit of odd subjects that tickled his fancy.

Independently of his finished works, his paintings, and etchings, Geikie's collection of these odd scrap figures, groups, and scenes, became immense. In landscape he did not excel; his colouring was very faulty; and to what are considered the higher departments of Art—the Historical or the Ideal, he never seems to have directed his attention; or, at all events, he did not succeed. This partial failure, and the natural bent of his genius, confirmed his vocation as an etcher; and this pursuit led to his highest excellencies in Art, and to the successful display of his varied resources. His broad humour, lively fancy, and insight into nature, especially as it is manifested in what is called low life, rank him as the George Cruikshank, if not the Hogarth, of the Scottish School. A critic of Geikie's works, who, though partial, does not want either taste or discrimination, having pronounced him the Hogarth of Scotland, says, with perfect truth:—"In his etchings you find the same attention to minutiæ—the same completeness in the keeping of the whole subject.... As a proof of this, let us look for a moment at his plate entitled, in good broad Doric, 'Haud your tae still, man,' in which a worthy follower of the plough, tormented with that most intolerable of all petty plagues—corns—has delayed and delayed getting them extirpated until they have at last fairly overcome him by the sharpness and constancy of their attacks. In agony he has applied to the chiropedal skill of his better-half for relief; and she, ever ready to prove a help-meet, and moreover anxious to display her manual dexterity, has mounted the suffering limb on her lap, and peers into the tae through her spectacles with a mixture of self-complaisance, tenderness, and sturdy resolution to operate, which the artist has most felicitously exhibited. Her subject, too, though now falling into the sear, is evidently a strong man; one, moreover, who cares more for personal comfort than outward show; not a puny dandy, who has all his life suffered voluntary martyrdom in vain attempts to force his tortured extremities into a better shape than that originally given them; nevertheless he is bowed down with the poignancy of the petty pain. Was there ever a better representation of poor time-tried humanity in distress—with his one hand raised to soothe his throbbing temples, and the other placed instinctively on the suffering member, to show its lord's sympathy with its sorrows? How strong is the contrast with the deportment of the operator! No feelings of commiseration can possibly be given way to, until she has succeeded in extirpating the cause of suffering. Let her subject wince under the knife as he may, her labours must be ended before he is released; she knows the value of decision, and is determined to act on that knowledge now."

This is but one of Geikie's numerous and admirable etchings; many of which, besides their overflowing broad and rich humour, and perfect local truth, possess, like the tae, the moral charm of social kindliness, and are full of ideas of homely enjoyment. What an admirable picture and enviable person is Geikie's Musical Souter! There is much of quiet beauty in Apples, five a ha'penny! and of tender repose in An auld Couple, and a grandchild reading. All the subjects of these etchings are as distinctively Scottish as the pictures of Teniers are Dutch. Some of them embody noble street views in the Old Town of Edinburgh, antique architectural subjects which can henceforth have no existence, save in the etchings of Geikie. The principal plates are separately illustrated, and often with much graphic humour and felicity by the letter-press sketches of the literary friends and admirers of the deceased artist. Among the literary contributors to the completeness of the volume are Mr. Thomas Smibert, Mr. James Ballantine (the Gaberlunzie,) and Mr. David Vedder.

Cut off or limited in his intercourse with the external world, Geikie, whose religious feelings had been carefully cultivated, at a very early period of his life became a serious character; and it is not a little interesting to learn, as we do from one of his most intimate friends, that when a young man he established a religious meeting among the deaf and dumb—"and often," says our informant, "have we seen him, his soul fired, his eye beaming with the eloquence which his tongue could not utter—his whole energies wrapt in that noblest of all duties, the proclaiming of man's sin and a Saviour's love. His knowledge of Scripture was great, and his expositions of it particularly lucid; while the breathless attention of his mute audience showed the interest they all felt in his teaching."

Geikie, who had through life enjoyed good health, died rather suddenly of fever, at the age of forty-one. He had been, for several years, a Fellow of the Scottish Royal Academy of Painting. A few of his best paintings are in the gallery of the Earl of Hopeton. Many of his sketches were disposed of after his death; and some of the best of them are now in the possession of Sir James Gibson Craig and Mr. Bindon Blood. During his life, his success, so far as relates to solid reward, was far from being commensurate with his merits, though these were taken at the lowest estimate. But he lived in the confidence that his hour would come. Nor can we doubt, that his Works, in the complete and handsome form, in which they have now come before the public, will be warmly appreciated, especially in Scotland, and also by Scotsmen all over the world. They are admirable as mere works of Art; but, to the Scottish people, not less valuable as records of national character,—as living transcripts of Scottish scenes and manners.

INSCRIPTIVE SONNETS.

WRITTEN ON A FLY-LEAF OF HOWITT'S "BOOK OF THE SEASONS."

I go with you, dear friends, through branchy ways,
And sunniest nooks of pleasant English dales,
Where winning wild-flowers scent the fresh'ning gales;
To where the twining honeysuckle strays
Through rustic lattices. There childhood plays
Its merriest pranks; and hark! the birds are singing,
In love's sweet rivalry their notes up-flinging,
'Mongst oaks impervious to the sun's hot rays.
Thy rhyme smells of the country air: its tone,
Bird-caught, is odorous as summer flowers:
Thus, when the wearing care of life o'erpowers,
And tears unbidden flow—then am I prone,
Seeking the forest-shade, 'neath beechen tree,
To con dear Nature's book interpreted by thee!

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

To poets all things minister!—a choir
Of seraphs singing 'neath a quiet sky,
With bated breath, some master-melody:
Or the mysterious Æolian lyre
At twilight quivering with its tremulous fire:
Or the pulsation of the tireless ocean
Moving at will with world-embracing motion:—
Poets an atmosphere like this respire.
Of such thou sang'st, great Coleridge!—a vision
Was in thy soul: hence when thy lyre was strung,
Forth from its spiritual chords was warmly flung
Music that rock'd the air with tone Elysian;
And thoughts of living beauty were embalm'd
In accents soft as those by which sick child is calm'd?

PERAULT; OR, SLAVES AND THEIR MASTERS.

CHAPTER XII.

With a rueful look at Joolay, Haman came forward, and muttering to himself, "I shall place de two ugly buffas face a face," placed a chair for the stranger directly opposite to the overseer. Viands were abundantly placed before the stranger, who did ample justice to them. It seemed to be a contest between him and Joolay, who would devour most. Fish of all descriptions—from the delicious black fish to the huge drumfish—disappeared down their throats; wild turkey and venison vanished before their inroads, till Joolay paused for want of breath, and laid down his knife and fork.

"Stranger," said Joolay, "I'll be glad to take wine with you."

"With pleasure, Sir," mumbled the stranger.

"Whackie," said Joolay, "hand me that bottle."

Whackie laid hold of a small cruet with a red fluid in it; and the overseer, without paying attention to it, poured out the liquor into his glass—raised it, looked fixedly at the stranger, bobbed his head as if he was meaning to toss it off his shoulders into his opposite neighbour's face, who, in return, jerked his head down as if to avoid the blow, then each took a mouthful of the liquors, but with different effects. The stranger's being genuine wine, was drank with a look of pleasure; but Joolay suddenly placed the glass on the table, started half out of his chair, and applied both hands to the pit of his stomach, screwing his face into an expression of the most diabolical loathing, while the liquor squirted from each side of his mouth like a water-spout.

"Bless me, Mr. Joolay," exclaimed the Colonel, "what is wrong?"

"Oh, mercy!" groaned the overseer. "I'm poisoned—I'm poisoned. What is that you've given me, you black rascal?" said he, turning to Whackie; "that ain't wine, Sir!" Whackie gently raised the glass, looked earnestly at it, and, without any farther ceremony, bumpered off the liquor; but suddenly letting the glass fall, he rubbed his stomach strenuously with both hands, and drew up one of his legs, while he looked the very picture of loathing Horror blackballed.

"Kah! Massa," he sputtered; "dat no good for drink."

"Oh, you one stooped nigger!" exclaimed Haman; "wot you is do? Lora me! you hab gib you Massa de essence ob cayenne for wine—oh, you stooped goose!" And Haman grinned at the joke.

"It's an awkward mistake, Mr. Joolay," said the Colonel; "but pray preserve your temper."

"Preserve!" exclaimed he; "if you was in the same pickle, I'd like to know if you wouldn't pepper the rascal. Blow me—I feel as if I had a shovelful of hot coals down my throat!"

The Colonel laughed; and Joolay, turning angrily to Whackie, ordered him to bring another glass; and Whackie, walloping his tongue and drawing in his breath, to cool it, ruefully obeyed.

"Guess I've seen you before," said Joolay, addressing the stranger.

"Mayhap you have," the man answered. "I am a preacher, and am teaching the negroes."

"Ah, hem!" remarked Joolay; "a Missionary chap, eh?"

"I am an Independent preacher," answered the stranger.

"Well, now," said Joolay, "if I was independent, they might preach who liked for me."

"You are facetious, Sir," said the stranger.

"And plain, too," said Joolay. "We don't like some of you chaps putting nonsense into poor niggers' heads: we have had no preachers here since Old Shoes left us."

"Was he a good expounder," inquired the Missionary.

"Capital," said Joolay; "but he was like some others of his kind, totally without education for the profession he followed. However, the niggers liked him, and they'd steal anything, from a sweet potatoe up to an ox, for him."

"Did he encourage them in such a system?" inquired the Missionary.

"How could they pay him otherwise?" said Joolay. "He lost their favour though, by getting too fond of rum. One day, being in a rapturous fit at a camp meeting, he told the niggers he was a-going to heaven; and, amid the roaring and weeping of the negroes, he began to ascend a tall pine tree, bidding them all farewell. When he got to the top, a branch gave way, and he came back again in riglar style!"

"Was he killed?" inquired the stranger.

"No, no; he only got a rumbly-come-tumbly-fication of the limbs, and a clatterification of the ribs. Drunk folks, and little children, are always safe when they tumble," said Joolay.

"What said the negroes?" inquired the stranger.

"'Ah! you come back, Massa!' He told them a long story, about being struck down by Satan, in the shape of a turkey-buzzard. The niggers would not believe him; so they all left him."

"Had they no preacher after that?" inquired the stranger.

"Nobody but me," answered Joolay.

"You!" exclaimed the Missionary.

"Yes; and a powerful sarmon I gave 'em, I assure ye. I told 'em if they didn't work hard, and drop stealing the Indian corn and sweet 'taties, they'd go to a place where Old Nick kept ninety millions of cowskins going night and day for lazy niggers, and they'd be thrashed there constantly. Why, the poor blackies were horrified, and going into fits, and carried off like killed and wounded from a field of battle. It had a powerful effect, Sir: you wouldn't see a better gang on any plantation for a month after."

The Missionary shook his head, and gravely answered, "This is working erroneously on poor ignorant minds. If these negroes were educated?"

"Educated!" roared Joolay. "No, Sir; education plays the deuce with niggers. We'd have 'em reading newspapers instead of tending cotton, and studying politics instead of hoeing 'taties. No, no; that won't do. Edicate niggers! that won't do."

"But if the Northern States should interfere?" said the Missionary.

Colonel Waldenberg now joined in the conversation, and haughtily said,—"Let the Northern States look to themselves. We will not suffer them to interfere with our internal regulations."

"But, Sir," said the Missionary, "if the Northern States should, through Congress, declare the negroes free —"

"Then," interrupted the Colonel, "we would end the Union, and declare the Southern States free, and independent of the Northern States."

"What if they should take up arms to enforce their decree?" inquired the Missionary.

"Then we would arm and repel them," exclaimed the Colonel. "The Northern States awe us? What care we for them!"

"I know," said the Missionary, "that you Southern planters despise the Northern States men too much; but surely it adds to your disdain, to behold yourselves surrounded from infancy with crouching slaves, while the citizens of the Northern States proclaim freedom to all."

"They be hanged!" said Joolay, "the darned yankee pedlers and shopkeepers! Show me any place where folks are so happy as in this very State. Look at the niggers; where will you see a happier race? No care, no sorrow."

"Still they are slaves," said the Missionary.

"And pray what is Slavery?" inquired Joolay. "A mere word: give it another name, and our country would be called a second Arcadia."

"But you sell them," said the Missionary; "you flog them; you separate husband and wife, mother and child."

"Look ye, Sir," said Joolay,—"you come here with queer notions about them poor niggers. You've seen labourers in the Northern States—free labourers?"

"Yes, Sir, I have;—not only in the Northern States, but in England also."

"Well, you've seen them bought in a public market?"

"A free man bought! How make ye that out?" inquired the Missionary.

"You would see them at times in the market-places, offering their services for sale," continued Joolay. "Well, some one buys them for a certain period at a certain price; the labourer goes with his master; he thinks he will be snug; he gets a wife; takes a house, buys furniture; works away —toils on like a slave. Well, he gets a family—perhaps a dozen of squalling brats; his limited wages can't support him and his wife and family. He toils harder, and throws himself into sickness; he can't work, and loses his situation. His rent is due, his taxes are unpaid. The baker, the butcher, and the grocer have all claims against him. So soon as they know that the poor man is out of employment, when he has no master to look to, they all come forward, and demand him to pay that which they know is out of his power to pay. 'Give me a little time,' says the poor fellow, 'till I get better, and get a new master; I'll pay you all.' No, that won't do. He is poor; that's a horrid crime: so they serve him the same as if he was a mad dog: every one must have a blow at him."

But it is superfluous to repeat the stale arguments of the overseer. It is enough that they are those which have been a thousand times refuted when employed by British colonists. The Missionary at last broke in. "But you compel them to work—you flog them."

"Work or starve, is a maxim in nature," answered Joolay. "A schoolboy is thrashed because he won't learn his lesson. If I see an ill-natured, stubborn nigger, who won't work, but idling away his time, and stealing all he can get, I threaten him: if he won't obey again, I give him a rap across the shins. If that man was free, he'd be a thief and a vagabond. Society would flog him at the cart-tail, and, perhaps, hang him."

"But you sell them," insisted the Missionary.

"What is the difference if I sell them, or they sell themselves? They are a set of poor devils in Africa—worst place for slavery that in the world. Folks are never happy there but when they are cutting throats. Compare our niggers to those in Africa! Phoo, humbug!"

"If your negroes were free, this country would be in a different state," said the Missionary.

"Ay, faith would it!" exclaimed Joolay; "swarming with thieves and idle blackguards. I'll settle that question in a minute. Whackie," said he, addressing the negro, "would you like to be free?"

"Me, massa?—no, massa," responded Whackie.

"Wouldn't you like to be free and work for yourself?" inquired the Missionary.

"No, Massa; I no like for workee," answered Whackie.

"Haman," said Joolay, "what would you do if you was free?"

"Me, Massa?" said Haman with a grin. "Oh, I go sleep all de day, and I go tief all de night!"

"What says he?" said the Missionary, scarcely crediting his own ears.

"Keh, keh, keh!" chuckled Joolay; "he says he'd sleep all day, and thieve all night! Negro liberty! keh, keh, keh!"

This is the very triumph of planters' logic.

The ladies having left the table, Colonel Waldenberg and a few of the officers soon followed, leaving Joolay at a fair drinking-bout with the other officers.

The wine was circulated freely, and Joolay began, in his favourite style, to narrate most marvellous matters, which, although too full of romance for any human mind to credit, he strenuously maintained were all positive facts. Captain Charles Waldenberg soon perceived Joolay's weak side, and began to draw him out by degrees.

"I understand, Mr. Joolay," said the wag, "that your plantation at Bellgrove is in such a splendid state of cultivation that it will produce everything."

"Astonishing soil!" was the ready response. "No matter what you plant, its sure to grow,—hats, shoes, coats, anything—just plant 'em! By the hookey! they grow up; plant a dead nigger and he'll grow alive again! I lost a shoe one day when out shooting; about a month after that, I happened to be in the same direction, judge my astonishment! there was a tree grown up, and a capital crop of shoes upon it!—It's a fact I tell ye."

"Fac', massa," murmured Whackie, "see him heshef. Zama find a shoe, and fling on a tree."

"Tremendous gales, though," said the overseer; "play hell and tommy at times! Lord bless ye! one day I was sailing down the river, when a whirlwind carried off my wig, and nearly carried myself sky high. It blew the wig up to the clouds, where, I suppose, another sort of wind caught it and blew it home. I can't say whether it was the instinct of the wig, or what; but judge my astonishment! when I returned home, there was my wig drying itself before the fire!—It's a fact I tell ye."

"Fac', massa," said Whackie, "see him heshef. Zama catch a wig in a water, and carry him home for dry."

"Have you many strange birds on your plantation?" inquired Galliard.

"Wonderful, Sir," said the overseer. "You know there is a heavy penalty against shooting turkey-buzzards? Well, Sir, I was annoyed by one lately, so levelled my rifle at him. Judge my astonishment! when he roared out, 'No humbug, old Joolay! darn me, if you fire at me I'll inform against ye, and get ye fined!' I was amazed, Sir, and let him fly off!"

"Fac, Massa," said Whackie.

"Indeed, Whackie!" said Galliard. "Did you ever hear a buzzard speak?"

"No, Massa; neber yearee turkey-buzza peak all a life!"

A number of the young wags observing the peculiar contour of Joolay's phizog, took up a bet, who would make the ugliest face in the whole company. Amidst shouts of laughter the bet was accepted, and each in his turn endeavoured to distort his features into the most hideous deformity. No one seemed to relish the joke more than Whackie; but as it came to Joolay's turn, Whackie got extremely excited, and clapping the overseer on the shoulder, exclaimed in an eager tone—

"Massa Joolay, Massa Joolay, no change you face, no change you face! Goley, Massa! you face beat 'em all as him is!" The roar of laughter which followed this remark, put Joolay into a towering rage, and starting from his chair, he turned on Whackie; but the negro instantly perceiving the blunder he had committed, nimbly fled from the apartment. The young wags now interfered, and Joolay being restored to peace, allowed Whackie to reënter.

The Missionary had sat at the table with the others, and was giving much offence, by his ill-timed remarks on the system of slavery, till, tired with what was considered his impertinence, Galliard arose and addressed him—

"Sir, we have borne with your language till it has become tiresome. Look around you, and ask any one of the negroes who attend us, if he is unhappy; and I doubt not, but his answers would be in the negative. We have been brought up with, and accustomed to them from childhood; and therefore like them. It would be an act of cruelty on our parts, to drive them out from the homes where they have been born and bred. You, and such as you, however, would have us not only give them freedom, but also divide our lands and fortunes amongst them, and bid them to think, that in that empty sound, freedom, they are to be equal to angels in bliss. It is only when they would find the sad reality—when want and sickness, toil and sorrow, bore them down, that they would find that freedom is but an empty name, and curse those who had driven them to ask it."

The Missionary would have interrupted him; but looking up, he encountered the eye of Perault, who, with an angry gesture, beckoned on him to arise and follow him.

"I am glad we have met," said Perault, as he encountered the Missionary at the end of one of the garden walks.

"I heard you had arrived," said the Missionary. Your brethren in the city were most anxious to know the result of your negotiations with Christophe, and the free negroes of Hayti."

"All is arranged," answered Perault. "Christophe has already assigned the territory to us. Secrecy and despatch are all that are now necessary. Our race will hail thee as their friend, and say that there was at least one White man to lead them from this house of bondage."

"Yes!" exclaimed the Missionary, "as Moses led the Israelites from Egypt, so would I lead the oppressed negroes from this land. But, Perault, I have my own doubts as to whether we can escape with the secrecy you represent. My soul revolts against bloodshed."

"None will be shed, if it can be avoided," answered Perault. "We only require to fire the buildings, and seize the shipping during the alarm; the negroes from the plantations can enter the city under cloud of night, or join us in their canoes in the bay."

"But will the negroes on this estate join us?" inquired the Missionary.

"Preach thou the blessings of freedom; make them discontented with their present lot; tell them that they must effect their own freedom; talk to them of happier lands, where their liberties and wealth can be secured. Do this; and with the aid of those already in the plot, all will go right. I have this day discovered a powerful auxiliary to our cause."

"How?" inquired the Missionary.

"In the Obi, or magician of the woods," answered Perault.

"I will deal with no sorcerers," rejoined the Missionary.

"Bah!" replied Perault. "What would thy preaching in secret to the negroes of the city have done, had Gullah Jack not aided thee?"

"True; but his strength of mind gave him the power, which by imposition he kept up," said the Missionary.

"It is to his plotting brain that we are indebted for the secrecy of this conspiracy," said Perault; "and, trust me, that, in the Obi of the woods, we will find another Gullah."

"Be it as you wish," said the Missionary. "But when does our purpose hold?"

"Without farther delay," answered Perault: "our plot is now ripe. Proceed thou from hut to hut. Able emissaries will aid thee. On thy talents Perault relies for success. See, some negroes are approaching. To thy work, my friend—away." The Missionary turned and left him, and Perault, clenching his teeth together, muttered,—"Proceed, O fool! to seal thine own doom! Pale-faced renegade, now work thy own destruction." He turned and proceeded to the house.

CHAPTER XIII.

The night was stormy, and the loud wind howled through the forest, as Perault, with stealthy steps, slipped past the Cadet outposts, and entered into the thickets. After toiling through the underwood for a considerable distance, he found himself on the verge of a deep swamp. "Confusion!" he muttered. "I have lost my way. I must skirt along this swamp, and run the risk of being bit by these black snakes which I hear rustling among the leaves. No matter," he continued, "I must grope my way." So saying, he tore a large branch from a tree, and striking it occasionally on the ground before him, proceeded on his journey. At length he reached the firmer soil, and with speedy steps hurried forward. A faint light glimmered occasionally in the distance; and, guided by it, Perault soon reached the hut of the Obi, and struck the door thrice.

"Enter, foe to the white man," cried a shrill voice from within the hut; and the light which had hitherto guided the wanderer's footsteps was suddenly extinguished.

Perault instantly threw open the door and entered. "Peace, and the blessing of heaven, be with you, Obi!" said he, as he groped his way into the hut.

"Ha—ha—ha!" shrieked the shrill voice; "a curse would sound better than a blessing, from thy unhallowed lips!"

"Silence, dotard!" exclaimed Perault, fiercely; "I come not here to listen to thy jargon."

"Thou comest to know what may be the result of thy ambitious schemes?" said the Obi.

"And if I did, what then?" said Perault, scornfully.

"I see," answered the Obi, "a gallows strung with strangled negroes, closer than ever African girl strung beads upon her necklace!"

As the Obi spoke, a lurid flame arose from the centre of the hut, spreading a sickly hue all around, and shone upon the figure of the aged African, attired in a female dress.

Perault eyed the Obi sternly, and said—"A gallows strung with strangled negroes!—Couldst thou behold Abou Abdallah, the murderer, amongst them?"

The African uttered a faint cry of horror and surprise, as he staggered back a few paces, and exclaimed, "Am I betrayed? Who spoke of Abou Abdallah?"

"One who knows thee, and the dark deed that drove thee hither," said Perault. "Thy master's cruelty nerved thy hand; thy insulted nature loudly called for vengeance: thou didst stab thy master to the heart, then fled into the woods; and, by assuming the garb of a negro woman, and practising on the superstitious fears of the fools around thee, thou hast hitherto baffled all pursuit. Is not this thy tale, old man?"

"Thou wouldst not betray me?" said the Obi, tremblingly.

"No," answered Perault. "Thou hast had thy vengeance, and justly too: thou must now aid me in obtaining mine."

"And who art thou," said the Obi, sullenly, "who thus tracks the tiger to his lair?"

Perault's form seemed to become dilated, as he proudly answered—"Perault, the son of Hassan, headman of Woonah!"

With a cry of joy, the old man cast himself at the feet of Perault, exclaiming, "Wah! Wah!—God is great!"

"Rise my kinsman," said Perault; "I have sought thee long and earnestly. Chance has thrown thee in my way; let us make the best use of our meeting."

The old African rose and gazed on Perault with a fond look. "I remember," said he, "that horrid night when the Felatahs stormed Woonah, and thy father and his gallant followers were seized by the foe; thou wert then an infant at thy mother's breast. She also was seized."

"Yes, Abdallah," said Perault, hastily interrupting him; "and all were sold by the conquerors to the White men as slaves! Of this I know nothing save from the lips of my mother and my unhappy father."

"Thy father, Perault? not from his lips surely. He was sold to a West Indian planter, and severed from thee and thy mother the instant the slave-ship arrived. He was never heard of again," said Obi.

"He was heard of," said Perault; "and fearfully heard of. Listen: I have been told of the horrors of the slave-ship which bore you to this land."

"Hush, hush!" said Abdallah, as he shrank back, shuddering. "Talk of anything but that. Oh! e'en now, the bare remembrance of it sickens my heart."

"And ought to goad thee on to vengeance," cried Perault. "My father, my mother, and myself, and I, then a poor helpless infant, alone survived of all my father's tribe: the bodies of the rest were tossed to feed the sharks. We arrived at Carlville, and were instantly driven to the slave-market, and set up for sale. A stranger bought my father; my mother, myself, and thou were purchased by old Waldenberg of Gladswood. Nay, tremble not, Abdallah; I honour thee for butchering him. My father and mother were torn asunder by force, and never met again. Old Waldenberg was a harsh and a cruel master; his lady was mild, gentle, and tender-hearted. She heard the story of my mother's wrongs, and would have bought my father back; but the stranger to whom he had been sold had departed no one knew whither. Young Waldenberg, now my master—curses on the name!—was then a child of the same age as myself, and Mrs. Waldenberg appointed my mother to be his nurse,—thus Waldenberg and I were nourished at the same breast. A private tutor attended the family, and to please Mrs. Waldenberg I was placed under his care, along with her sons. My thirst for study was unbounded, and my young masters were soon outstripped by the poor black slave. The page of history was opened to me. The more I read, the more I wished to know. At length my young master was sent to college, and thither, as his servant, I accompanied him. There no restraint was placed upon my mind: supplied—liberally supplied, with money by young Waldenberg, I could purchase the means of information. It happened that at this time a son of Bellgrove's attended college with my master. This young man had a slave named Zama, to whom he was devotedly attached. Zama, like myself, was fond of study; and together we perused the classic page, and aided each other in our search for knowledge. At length the question arose in my mind,—to what end all my learning would, or could come? I was a slave, fettered and chained in body, while my soul seemed to hold creation too limited for its aspirings. At length my master quitted college, and with him I travelled to the sunny clime of Italy, and to gay and gaudy France. We then heard that old Waldenberg was murdered by one of his slaves."

"Hold, Perault!" cried Abdallah; "call it not murder,—it was a good deed. I bore with him till human nature could bear no longer. At length I encountered him alone in the forest: he upbraided me, called me idle,—a vagabond; and told me that on my return the whip should teach me how to spend my time. I answered him somewhat haughtily: he struck me on the mouth. Forgetful of myself, I returned the blow, and struck my tyrant to the earth. He arose; and, grappling with me, called loudly on his attendants. I knew what my fate should be should they come up; and, hurried on by vengeance, I drew the knife from my girdle and plunged it into his bosom. Thrice I struck the monster to the very heart! He fell. I dragged his dead body to a small thicket, and covered it with the bushes and withered leaves, and, wiping from my hands and dress the bloody tokens of my revenge, I returned to the fields and mixed amongst the labourers. The old man was soon missed. A search took place, and his favourite dog discovered the dead body where I had laid it. Flight alone remained, and I fled to the dark forests, to herd with beasts of prey. Chance directed my steps to this hut, where I found an aged negress whose fancied magic powers held the whole country in awe, and even the boldest hunter in the woods would tremble at her name. From her I received shelter and protection. After a short time she died, and, burying her body, I assumed her garb, and practised upon the superstitions of the negroes, who still believe, that in me they fear and reverence Obei Fetmah. Frequently I visited the plantation of Myrtlegrove, till, this morning, on entering the hut of Muma Katty, I heard the name of Waldenberg; and, horrified and trembling, I fled. But I have interrupted thee,—proceed with thy narrative."

"Let those who may, upbraid thee for the deed," answered Perault. "To me it is the best recommendation, that thy hand has been dyed with the white man's blood. But to my own matters. I returned to Gladswood in time to witness the death of my poor mother. It was a bitter scene, Abdallah! Even yet, the remembrance of it causes the tear to start unbidden from my eyes. She told me of her sad lot; and, with her dying breath, exhorted me to free my unhappy countrymen from bondage.

"A few days after this, I happened to be rambling through the city. A crowd in one of the streets attracted my attention. Pressing through it, I beheld an aged, white-haired negro in a dying state. To the rude question of 'who he belonged to?' he answered, feebly, that he was a free negro,—that he was unable to work, and for nearly three days had not tasted food. My heart bled for the poor old man; and raising him gently, I supported him to the house of a friend. Oh! Abdallah, judge my grief and horror, when in that poor, aged, dying man, I beheld my father!" Perault paused, and wringing his hands, paced hurriedly up and down the hut.

"Thy father!" exclaimed Abdallah. "Hassan of Woonah perishing in a strange land for want of food! Oh, blessed Prophet! was there no hand to aid him?"*

"Oh, Abdallah! had I a thousand lives, how gladly would I have laid them down to save him! Think—only think—that here, in a land professing itself a Christian land,—that for three days that aged, feeble, dying man, had not tasted food! In vain I strove to save him. Alas! every attention that my fond heart could dictate, was pain to him, and proved unavailing. He died—and in my arms yielded up his last sigh. Because he was a negro, he had been treated like a dog. He had been a slave—worked, lashed, branded! He had done a generous act, and for that act was rewarded:—mark the word, Abdallah,—REWARDED with his freedom! Rewarded! such a reward as hell itself would grant to suffering humanity! such a reward as fiends might stand by and laugh at! He was liberated because he was old and feeble, and could no longer serve his harsh employer. He was freed from bondage, and driven on the world helpless, unprotected,—in poverty and want, to starve!"

Here the rage of Perault arose to a fearful pitch. His eyes gleamed with supernatural fire, his figure seemed dilating, and the foam boiled from his mouth, as he paced to and fro, like an infuriated tiger.

* The reader need not be reminded that many of the African tribes, from their intercourse with the Arabians, hold the faith of Mahomet.

"Yet, Abdallah," he continued, "the sufferings of that old man only accelerated my deadly purpose. O'er the dead body of my unhappy father, I swore eternal hatred to the white oppressors, and vowed that I would never rest till I had effected the freedom of my unhappy negro brethren. Under the pretence of celebrating my father's funeral, I assembled a large body of the discontented negroes in the city. I told them of my father's fate, and pointed out many other instances of a similar nature. I asked if the same fate might not be ours, when we were old and feeble? I called upon them to strike for freedom, and to save themselves and their posterity from bondage. Their hearts responded to my wishes. In that hour we formed a secret combination; each pledged solemnly to spread the flames of discord, and to rally our negro brethren around the standard of liberty. The work went on in secret and in silence. Every hour fresh numbers were added to our cause. Arms and ammunition were purchased, and concealed in various quarters. A number of freed negroes, in our bands, joined the coasting vessels, in order to practise navigation; so that, when an insurrection broke out, there would be no lack of experienced sailors, to carry us from this hateful coast. A communication was opened with Christophe, the negro king of Hayti, in Saint Domingo; and a territory in that island was allotted to us. It latterly became necessary that I, the principal leader in the plot, should meet with King Christophe, to arrange our final plans. This was difficult to accomplish; but fortune favoured our cause. Major Maitland, a young officer in the Cadet Brigade, had recently returned from Cuba, and his mild and gentle manners made a deep impression on the negroes around; and one or two of his own slaves, who were in the plot, began to feel lukewarm in the cause. They went amissing suddenly: it was supposed they had fled." A grim, demoniacal sneer overspread the features of Perault, as he narrated this part of his career, which Abdallah soon construed to its proper meaning.

"They fled," he said. "Ah! Perault—but whither fled they?—from earth, and from its sorrows—freed by thy hand, perchance!"

"The sharks in the Ashley river can best tell the tale," said Perault, carelessly. "But the deed was necessary for our safety. Be this as it may. Thou hast heard of this outbreak of the Indians?"

"I have," answered the Obi. "But why have the Red Cherokees left their native wilds to rush to certain danger?"

"Some time ago," continued Perault, "a party of them encamped within ten miles of the city. On pretence of making their chiefs some presents, I went to their tents, and found means to wile these haughty savages into conversation. I lamented the loss of their hunting-grounds, and fishing-stations on the sea-coast; and finding they lent a ready ear, added, that were I a leader in their nation, I would not cut off the smaller villages of the white people, but assemble the whole warriors of the tribe, and destroy the inhabitants of the larger cities, which might be taken by surprise at night; and that being done, the smaller towns could readily be seized, and the whites massacred; and that thus the Indians might recover their power, and hold their native forests free. The subtile savages caught at the idea. I complained of the lot of the poor negroes, who I told them were once, like themselves, free, till the white man made them his slaves; hinted at the negroes aiding the Cherokees; and before I left the camp, arranged with them the attack on Carlville."

"Perault, Perault!" exclaimed the Obi, "beware, beware. Behold the Red Cherokee has been scattered before the power of the white man."

"Not so," answered Perault; "the Red Cherokees are now mustering fast around this spot. Ere long, their wild war-whoop shall arouse the forest echoes, and the boasted troops of Carlville sink before them."

"How effected ye the interview with King Christophe?" inquired the Obi.

"By a lucky stroke of policy, Abdallah," answered Perault, grimly smiling. "Colonel Waldenberg was on the eve of marriage with Miss Bellgrove, when Major Maitland stepped into her good graces. It was an easy matter to rouse Waldenberg to jealousy; and by vague reports, and well-timed innuendoes, I inspired him with a thirst for revenge. I watched my opportunity; and one night, at the Assembly, hinted I had heard a rumour of her breaking off intercourse with him, and marrying Maitland. He saw them both in close conversation. Filled with rage, he commanded me to bring his pistols: with joy I obeyed. It mattered little to me which fell, as I was well supplied with gold for flight. I returned with the pistols; and requesting a private conversation with Maitland, enticed him to the garden. There Waldenberg encountered him. Maitland at first positively refused to fire; till Waldenberg, threatening to brand him as a coward, roused him to anger. They fired, and Maitland fell, severely wounded. The cry of assassination arose, and notwithstanding Waldenberg's reluctance, I forced him to flight. I had engaged a schooner bound to Port-au-Prince: we arrived there; and Waldenberg being too ill to travel, I obtained permission to view part of the island. Leaving my master with Petion and his mulatto brood, I hastened on to Hayti, and had an interview with Christophe. It was attended with complete success. Ha, Abdallah! when I looked upon the sable visage of that king, and saw the weak supporters of his power, methought the crown of Hayti pressed my brows, and the sceptre was already in my grasp. Oh! godlike ambition, how I adore thee!"

"Would ambition induce thee to hurl Christophe, the king who befriends thy cause, from his throne?" said the Obi, with surprise.

"Why not?" said Perault. "He who has the soul to dare can do. Crowns and thrones are the game of daring minds: all fact, all history shows it. What! think ye that I would lead my warlike thousands through blood, through battle, and through well-won vengeance, to bid them crouch to any other power than mine? No, no, Abdallah. I will reign supreme—I will bear no secondary part. But now, Abdallah, to my purpose. Thou knowest the Lady of Myrtlegrove?"

"I do," answered the Obi; "and kind has she been to the poor negro."

"She is on the eve of marriage with Waldenberg," said Perault.

The Obi started, and tremblingly said, "Then I am no longer safe."

"Thy safety depends upon thyself," said Perault. "Thou, by thy fancied magic powers, must have a powerful sway over the negroes on Myrtlegrove and the neighbouring plantations!"

"'Tis true," said the Obi; "my bidding is like the word of fate to them."

"Then thou must be their leader. The torch of discord is already laid in these plantations: thou must fan it into a flame. All is ready to lead our countrymen from this land of bondage to a land of light and liberty."

"Say how I can aid thee and thy cause," exclaimed the Obi. "Show me but the way, and I will follow it in the face of death!"

"There is a Christain fanatic to join thee in thy labours," said Perault; "one who, moved by fancied zeal, left off his trade of shoemaker, in New York, to preach a crusade against slavery. He was seized in Carlville, and tarred and feathered. I took advantage of his rage, and fired his mind with the hopes of vengeance. He has proved of powerful aid in stirring up the discontented negroes. Under the mask of religion, he gives vent but to his own feelings and thirst for vengeance. He will soon make the negroes in Myrtlegrove unhappy: follow thou thy calling in his steps."

"Trust not to the pale-faced Christian," said the Obi; "he will deceive and betray thee."

"He dare not," answered Perault; "his own life would pay the forfeit. As to his religion, it matters not to me whether my followers be followers of the Cross or of the Koran. When we pass a brook, we ask not that the stepping-stones be made of solid marble."

"Does this Christian follow thee to Hayti?" inquired the Obi.

"No," said Perault, fiercely; "nor one of his hateful brood. His fate is already sealed; let that content thee."

A loud roll of thunder shook the hut to its foundation, and the sheeted lightning gleamed broad and brightly through the crevices of the frail tenement. Perault and Abdallah started and listened for a few seconds attentively. A still and sullen silence followed, and not even a leaf of the surrounding forest was heard to stir. Then, piercing on the night's dull ear, arose the roar of the dreaded panther, and the wild and melancholy howl of the startled wolf, mingling with the shrill cry of the racoon, and the thrilling rattle of the rattlesnake. Again all sunk into silence; then the thunder rolled in horrific peals, and the heavens seemed one broad sheet of living fire clutching the earth in its blazing embrace.

"The Tornado has set in earlier than I expected," said Perault. "However, I must face it, and hie me homewards."

"Nay, Perault," said the Obi, "you cannot venture out to-night. Hark to the panthers' and the wolves' wild cry. You are alone and unarmed—you cannot brave them."

Perault laid his hand on the Obi's arm, and, grimly smiling, answered, "The wildest beast of prey that roams the forest, the subtlest snake that crawls, seem to have virtues in their nature, which man, frail man, doth sadly want. Believe me, my good Abdallah, that amongst the human race, you will meet with those in whose breast the bloody temper of the panther, the ravenous nature of the wolf, and the subtile poison of the snake, are all combined, without one portion of their better qualities."

"Most true," replied the Obi. "Yet, still, Perault, you must not venture forth to-night."

"Give me a hatchet," said Perault; "and let panther, wolf, or white man—worse than both, cross my path if they dare!"

"Rest thee till morning, Perault. Hark how the thunder rolls,—see how the vivid lightnings blaze," said the Obi.

"There is a melody in the rolling thunder," answered Perault, "which sounds like sweetest music in mine ear. There is a beauty in the lightning's blaze, when it seems scorching up the hateful earth, that my heart rejoices in. The thunder's roll, the lightning's blaze, seem kindred to my soul; therefore I fear them not."

"Then, if thou wilt persist, I will accompany thee to the verge of the forest," said the Obi.

"Not one step, my kinsman. I would not have thee expose thy grey hairs to this angry blast. Cherish thyself well, my good Abdallah, for the day of our vengeance which is at hand."

"Nay, stay but one moment," entreated the Obi. "Hark, the thunder rolls away in the distance. There comes the rain; all will soon be clear."

A loud rushing wind was heard throughout the forest: crashing, tearing, and uprooting the huge trees, it bore onward in its resistless course. Then came the rain, no stinted shower. It seemed as if ocean had usurped the place of heaven, and was pouring down on earth a second deluge.

"Rest but a few seconds," urged the Obi; "the rain will soon be over—all will be calm again."

"Then," said Perault, "I will remain."

He seated himself at the side of the Obi. "And now," said he, "tell me of the land of my birth—the sunny clime of my childhood: tell me of its palm-groves, and of its free-born tribes."

The Obi smiled and began a sketch of African life; but Perault suddenly arose and said, "Hark, the rain is over, I must be moving. When I am free, Abdallah, we shall talk of Africa."

The loud sound of the frogs and tree-toads joining in their nightly concert, chiming with the deep-mouthed croaking of the huge bull-frog, and the chirping of myriads of locusts, crickets, and lizards, the hum of the night-bettles, and drone of musquitoes, now arose, mixed with the hissing of the straggling snakes. All seemed awakening into new life. The stars arose bright and clear; not dimly glimmering as in our northern foggy clime, but each large, lustrous, and brilliant, like golden lamps blazing in the heavens; and the milky-way, dazzling in light and beauty, glowed like a track of burnished gold laid in the realms of glory.

CHAPTER XIV.

"What think you of Zada, Miss Bellgrove's slave-girl?" exclaimed Captain Waldenberg, to Joolay, as they sauntered along the Wandoo.

"Prime wench! capital wench! famous wench!" exclaimed the overseer.

"She seems well educated, and possessed of good accomplishments," said the Captain.

"Yes, yes," said Joolay; "she had the whole benefit of the same teachers with her young lady. Her brother, Zama, too, a fine fellow, was educated with young master Charley, afore the Indgins grabbed hold of him. Zada's not so proud as Zama. Fine wench!—deuce of a pity she's black."

"Poor girl!" sighed the Captain; "what can all her education and accomplishments avail her? Perhaps married to some rude negro, whose only knowledge is how to handle a hoe. What a fate for such a sweet-natured being!"

"Ay," responded Joolay, as he shook his head; "that comes o' educating niggers. Blow me, if ever I saw it turn out good!"

"What regularity in her features!" continued the Captain: "what an elegant figure and gesture! and, when she speaks, her voice sounds like the breathings of a mellow flute!"

"Ay," said Joolay; "I like poor Zada very much. Deuce of a pity but she could be whitewashed! I'd give ten dollars myself for that purpose. Blow me, if it was possible, I'd take her myself!"

"I know not how it is," said the Captain; "but her silvery voice rings still in my ear. What a pity she is a slave!"

"If a body heard her speaking in the dark," observed Joolay, with a wise look, "they wouldn't know her from a white woman. She'd make a famous wife for a blind planter."

"I think she would make a good housekeeper," said the Captain. "And, when one lived comfortably on their own estate amongst negroes, why, she would make a most agreeable companion."

"You've hit it," said Joolay; "that's what makes Miss Bellgrove so fond of Zada. She's a managing wench; and, when she's in a merry mood, she makes one quite happy to hear her."

"Do you think her mistress would sell her?" inquired the Captain, eagerly.

"Sell Zada!" exclaimed Joolay, gaping with surprise. "No, faith no; she wouldn't take two thousand dollars for her."

"I'll give five thousand for her!" exclaimed the Captain.

Joolay turned and stared till his eyes seemed coming out of their apertures. "What the deuce are you wanting with Zada?" said he. "Ah, Captain, you're a sly dog!—keh, keh, keh!"

"You mistake my meaning, Mr. Joolay."

"Oh, not a bit, not a bit. I know how you gentlemen of the city act."

"As I live," said the Captain, "here she comes!"

"So she does," said the overseer. "You know there is an old proverb, Speak of the ——, you know it, eh?"

"Good morning, my pretty Zada," cried the Captain. "Whither wend you so early?"

"Hillo, my African Venus!" said Joolay; "gathering dew, eh?"

Zada curtsied lowly, and would have passed; but the Captain suddenly brought Joolay to the right about face, and stood at her side.

"Whither so fast, my pretty girl?" said he. "Mr. Joolay and I are just taking a walk."

"How is Charley this morning?" inquired the overseer. "Getting better, eh?"

"Yes, Sir," answered the timid girl. "He is better; he is now able to converse freely; and, this afternoon, will endeavour to meet my lady."

"And how is Major Maitland?" inquired the Captain.

"Much better, Sir. He is up to-day, and has got his arm in a sling. With a little assistance he could walk now."

"That's right," said Joolay. "Thanks to you and Ooknea, them chaps are getting fast round. Now, if a doctor chap had gotten them, he'd a bolussed and physicked them to death's door, and kept 'em a-bed for a month or two. Nothing like nature herself for working a cure."

"Are you going to see the old sick negress—Katty, I think, you call her?" said the Captain.

"I am, Sir," answered Zada.

"Then we'll go and see her, too. Take my arm, my girl," said the Captain.

"Zounds!" roared Joolay, "what are ye about? Taking me on a friendly visit to an old nigger wench, and going arm in arm with a young one! The puppy's mad, I guess."

Zada had drawn back, on the Captain offering her his arm, and stood with her eyes fixed on the ground, while the Captain felt his face glowing. With mortified feelings he turned to Joolay, and said, "There can be harm in offering aid to one so perfect as Zada."

"Flummery,—stuff! I think I see you meeting the rest of your brother-officers, with a young nigger wench under your wing. Keh, keh, keh! I think I see you! Ecod! you wouldn't hear the last of it for twelve months!"

Zada had glided rapidly onward; and the Captain, extricating his arm from Joolay, would have followed; but the overseer caught him round the waist, and held him as firm as if he had been in the arms of a brown bear. "I tell you, you are mad," said Joolay.

"Just one moment, Mr. Joolay," entreated the Captain. "I'll be back in a moment."

"Don't be foolish," urged the overseer. "Chase any other wench in the plantation, but don't harm that poor girl." So saying, he dragged him reluctantly away.

The Captain, finding remonstrances were vain, went peaceably with the overseer till they reached the house; then, pretending he was going to drink his company, got off. With speedy steps he hied towards Muma Kattey's hut; and, on coming in sight thereof, observed Zada quitting the garden

He advanced: but the girl, catching a glimpse of him, suddenly struck into another path, amongst the shrubbery. "So ho! my haughty girl," thought he, "you avoid me. I'll baulk you yet." He turned, and, hurrying through the myrtles, intercepted Zada in a narrow footpath.

"Well, my pretty girl," said he, as he fronted the abashed maiden; "you see we have met again."

"Allow me to pass, Sir," said she, as the Captain placed himself firmly in the narrow footpath.

"Don't be in a hurry, my sweet girl," said he; "I mean you no harm."

"I hope not, Sir," said she, looking at him with suspicion. "I never harmed you, and why should I dread any injury from you."

"My sweet girl!" said the Captain, "I could listen for ever to the melody of thy voice. Methinks, that in each balmy gale that fans the spreading myrtles, I hear the gentle music of thy tongue!"

The girl stepped back, and looked with indignation on him, as she answered—"Reserve such themes for ears that can listen to them; to my ears they sound as insults."

"Sorry would I be, dear Zada, to offend thee; and if my tongue but speaks the feelings of my heart, surely you cannot deem that rudeness."

"Such language, Sir, is not for me to listen to. You seem to forget that I am a negress and a slave."

"And if I can forget thou art a negress, I have the power, sweet girl, to buy thy freedom," said he, earnestly.

"Insult my feelings no longer with this ribaldry," said she. "Suffer me to pass, Sir, else I turn again."

"Nay, Zada, I mean no insult. I have been brought up from childhood amongst thy race; and my eyes are more accustomed to the African than the white complexion. Wonder not, then, that in meeting one so perfect as thyself, I should take an interest in thy fate, and wish to make thee happy."

"That lies not in your power," answered the girl. "And I am sorry that Captain Waldenberg's gallantry soars no higher, than in coining flattery for the ears of poor slave girls." She turned, and would have fled; but the Captain, springing forward, caught her in his arms.

"Unhand me, Sir!" exclaimed the girl, while her eyes flashed with anger.

"Listen to me, Zada," he entreated.

"Unhand me!" she again exclaimed. "I thought you more of a gentleman and a man of honour, than to insult a helpless negress."

"I am a Carolinian," answered he. "That name might guarantee thy safety, and quell thy foolish fears."

"I trust not to it," she answered, struggling to extricate herself from his embrace. "Unhand me, Sir. This is most unmanly conduct. Release your hold, or my cries will bring me speedy aid." She burst from his arms, and, with the speed of the frightened fawn, fled along the path.

Charles pursued her closely; and, just as he was gaining on her, she darted into a footpath leading through the forest—when, to his chagrin, he beheld Perault standing on the walk before him. The Captain paused; and with all the fiery, haughty temper of his countrymen when roused, demanded of Perault what he did there?

"Not to interfere with your sport, my young and honoured master," answered Perault. "Don't let me interrupt your chase—the game is yet in sight."

"Dog of a slave, what insolence is this?"

"Slave I am," answered Perault, bitterly; "dog I may be!"

"What mean you, Sirrah?"

"Simply that, as a dog, I may bring down the game for you!"

"Explain yourself, Sir."

"Pardon me, my honoured master, if I, your brother's humble slave, address you thus. I see how your mind, and, I dare say, your affections, lie. That girl, slave as she is, might grace an Eastern throne. Nay, blush not at my rude language to you. Master Charles, I wish you well; and I, although a poor negro, would wish to aid you in your utmost desires."

"And, pray, how would you aid me?" said Charles, with a sneer.

Perault fixed his eyes full on him, with a glance so deep, so penetrating, that it seemed to search the inmost recesses of his heart. "The young men of the city," he answered, "are at times caught by the graces of our negresses; and how often will you find that they continue in that attachment in opposition to the will of all their friends. Is it any wonder, then, that a young sensitive mind should be attracted by the superior graces of a young negress, who, to beauty and regularity of form and features, which might eclipse the boasted beauties of your land, unites a purity of mind, an elevation of soul, and an accomplished understanding, surpassing even the beauties of your polished city?"

"To whom do you allude," said Charles, scarcely trusting a look at Perault, so much did every word tell upon his heart. "If this negress be all you say, why not unite your fate to hers?"

"And rear children for the Slave Market!" added Perault. "No, no! Master Charles. Were all mankind of my mind, there would be less sin and misery in this world. That girl is not formed to become the wife of a poor despised slave. Zada must aim at something nobler."

"And, pray, what would you have her be?"

"Under the protection of one who could esteem her amiable qualities—one like thyself!"

"Plainly spoken! And what would I do with her?"

"Carry her to your plantation on the Santee. Keep her there!"

"And how am I to get her there?"

"Leave that to me. To be plain with you, Master Charles, your brother would be happy if this girl was away from Miss Bellgrove. She engrosses too much of her mistress' affections. Besides, Zada is continually praising Major Maitland, and on all occasions holds him up as a paragon."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Charles, somewhat thrown off his guard by the tone in which Perault conveyed his information. "Can Zada love Maitland?"

"I doubt it not," answered Perault; "and it were high time, for your brother's sake, she should be disposed of."

"But her mistress; what would she say?" said Charles, with an abstracted, hesitating look.

"When Miss Bellgrove is your brother's wife, she will think less of it," replied Perault. "A thousand dollars or two will settle the difference——"

"I will think of it," said Charles, turning away.

"You must think quickly, then," said the designing villain. "What if Zada should tell her mistress of your attempt on her to-day?"—Charles started, and turned fiercely on him.—"Should it come to your brother's ears—or get amongst your comrades?—Should it be noised abroad in the city that this saucy negro girl spurned you?—Nay, if Major Maitland hears of it, and asks the girl from Miss Bellgrove, she may yield her, to get rid of his importunities.—Twill be too good a theme for jesting, that the gay Captain Waldenberg was rejected and spurned at by a negress and a slave!"

Charles placed his hand upon his dagger, and angrily said, "Take care, Perault, that I don't stop your jesting!"

"Nay, Master Charles, I merely mentioned this to show the necessity of securing this girl for your own sake!"

"What would you have me do?" said Charles.

"Ask leave of absence from your brother instantly—retire to Santee; and I pledge my word, nay, by the bones of my mother, I swear!—an oath which negro never broke—I will place this haughty slave girl in your power within two days."

"Meet me this evening in my apartments; I will settle this with you," said Charles, as he walked away.

"And if my plot succeeds!" said Perault to himself, with a withering sneer.

"Why you look so sad now, Zama?" said Whackie to his friend, as they stood watching for Mr. Bellgrove's arrival. "You no speak to me now so kind as you use for do."

"You are mistaken," answered Zama, with a faint smile. "I still love you, Whackie."

"I no tink dat. Since Perault was come, you always wid him; and den I most always attend Massa Joolay. I quite tire ob look at him dam ogly face. I tink tree or two time for run away."

"Run away!" said Zama. "Where to?"

"Home again to de plantation," answered Whackie, "and leab Massa Joolay for take care ob heshef."

"But would you not like to run away from this country altogether?" inquired Zama.

"Me? No; where de debil I was run to?"

"If there was a lovelier and a better country than this, where the negroes were all free, would you not like to go there?"

"What I is do dere?"

"If you were to be happy there, would you not fight for liberty to get to it?"

"Fight! Who I fight wid?" inquired Whackie.

"With the white men," said Zama.

"Gor Amighty!" exclaimed Whackie, "me go fight wid Buccra? Oh Lor! Zama, you is go mad!"

Zama would have answered; but, looking up, he beheld his sister hurrying with speed through a glade, as if she were pursued. Fleeing rapidly towards her, he caught her, and the girl clung to him as she looked with terror backwards.

"What ails thee, Zada? Who pursues thee?" he inquired eagerly.

"A hot-headed fool," she answered. "But I am near thee, my brother, and am safe."

"Who dared to harm thee? You tremble and seem frightened."

"Never mind," said the panting girl; "let us proceed homewards."

"No negro dared to harm thee, Zada. If it was a white man, tell me; and, slave though I be, I shall let the villain feel a brother's vengeance."

"No, no, Zama; think no more of it; he was a fool, and more worthy of contempt than anger."

"You conceal his name, then?"

"To tell it thee would only lead thee into trouble. I have suffered no wrong, let that suffice thee. Nay, do not frown. 'Twill grieve me more to see thee angry with me."

"Angry with thee, Zada? No, I'll smile on thee, if that will banish grief."

She looked up fondly in his face and said, "You are ill, Zama; your hand feels feverish, and your sunken eyes bespeak the languor of disease."

"Why dost thou think so?" he said.

"My lady has observed it too; thy restless glance, thy broken sighs, show there is something weighing on thy mind. My lady thinks that there is something wrong."

"Thy lady! does she ever talk of me?"

"She does, and often. Why startest thou at the mention of her name? When thy master comes she means to ask him to transfer thee to her service. You start again; nay, now your eyes are lighted up with joy! She will exchange two favourite slaves for thee."

"Cease, Zada, cease! that has dispelled the charm. Slavery, thou hideous fiend! which ever way I turn my eyes, I view thee still. Barter me! Eternal Ruler of the universe! What crimes have our forefathers committed, that we their offspring should be treated thus? the brand of slavery stamped upon our brow, bartered from hand to hand like beasts of burden! It shall not long be so, he muttered fiercely. No, my Zada; we shall yet be free. To other climes I'll bear thee, where I can look upon thee with a brother's pride, and tell thee that this hand hath won thy freedom!" He clasped her in his arms.

"What Utopian dream is this, my brother?" said the girl, looking on him with fondness and surprise. "How canst thou achieve our freedom? Why quit this happy land, our birth-place, and the scene of youthful happy days? You smile. I knew you spoke in jest;" and the gentle negro girl bent her head upon his shoulder.

"Wouldst thou roam with me, my sister, to a land where slavery is unknown, and where thy brother's arm would gain thee rank and honour?"

"Where is that unknown region?" said the girl as she smiled in his face. 'Tis not on earth; for slavery binds her chains on all mankind, and with gigantic steps stalks through the world, cherished by all, though under different titles."

"What if thy mistress were to die?" said Zama.

"Then I would look for that land where slavery is indeed unknown, where bond and free are all alike—and to that Master, in whose holy eyes the humble negro and the haughty white alike may meet with favour."

"My noble-minded sister! the day may yet come, when thy sweet voice shall give praises to that Power by whose aid the negro wrought his freedom."

"No more of this, my brother. If you possessed the freedom that you covet, you would find it like the rainbow's flitting hues, ever pursued and ever farther from it. If want and penury assailed thee in a foreign land,—if sickness and disease should waste thy frame, and I stood by thy couch, watching o'er thee, unable as I am to aid thee,—we might sigh again for the land we had left, and the sunny banks of the Wandoo, where we had kind hearts to aid and cherish us."

The distant sound of music now fell upon their ears, and Whackie came running towards them.

"You hear dat, Zama?" he cried. "He Massa boat. Dere him is, ha, ha, ha! my own Massa—my good Massa—my bootiful Massa!" And the poor fellow ran over every term of endearment, as he danced with joy—when, shooting round the turn of the river, an elegant barge, manned by eight gaily-dressed rowers, darted along the broad waters, the merry rowers keeping time with their voices to the oars, as they chanted a negro boat-song. They sweeped towards the landing-place. Zama flew towards the beach, the boat touched the sand, and Mr. Bellgrove came on shore, and folded Zama in a fond embrace. "My own, my noble Zama, accept a father's thanks, a father's blessing, for the services rendered to his son." The unexpected fondness of the salutation struck the negro to the heart: with a faint cry, he covered his face with his hands, and burst into tears. "This, this," he thought, "is the man whom I have sworn to injure!"

Whackie advanced, ducking down his head, and clapping his hands in a delirium of joy, exclaiming, "My own good Massa!" And Mr. Bellgrove, catching him by both hands, shook them kindly as he said, "And you too, my honest, good Whackie, shall not go unrewarded for your gallant conduct."

"Oh! Lor!" exclaimed Whackie, with a shout of joy; "look at dat: my own Massa is shake my hand! Zama, you see dat?"

"And thou, my gentle girl," said Mr. Bellgrove, as he pressed Zada in his arms, "how can a father's heart thank thee for the kindness shown towards his long-lost son!"

"Ah, my dear master," said she, "you overrate the services of the humble negress."

"Thy purity of mind and gentleness of heart, sweet girl, might grace a nobler circle than the friends around thee," said Mr. Bellgrove.

"Let the esteem of those the poor slave loves be Zada's best reward," was the answer of the girl as she bent her eyes upon the ground.

"Come, Zada, lead me to my son—grief hath made sad inroads in my frame, and this most rapturous event hath shaken me more. Thy arm, my gentle Zada; Zama, thine." Leaning on the two he approached the mansion-house. At the entrance he was met by Matilda, Letia, Mr. Norrisville, and the rest. It was a silent but affecting meeting; and one would have thought, as Mr. Bellgrove embraced his friends, that he had come to follow the corpse of his son to the grave, instead of having him restored to his arms again. They entered the house, and Mr. Bellgrove earnestly entreated that they would lead him to his son, when Zada, with a smile, said, "Remain here for a little. He expected you ere now, and is prepared to meet you. Rest and kind attendance have greatly recruited his wasted strength; his wound was but slight, and he is fast recovering. He is up to-day, and I will tell him you are here." She glided from the apartment, and in a few minutes returned along with Ooknea, supporting young Bellgrove. With an exclamation of joy the youth tottered forward, and sunk upon his father's breast; broken exclamations of joy and tears of gladness were the only utterance their hearts would allow; and one by one his friends gathered around him, expressing their happiness at his restoration.

"There is one fond heart awanting yet to bid me welcome," said the youth, as he looked eagerly around. "Where is my adored mother? They told me she was happy; why is she not here?"

"She doubtless beholds thee my son, and shares in the bless we feel at thy restoration," said Mr. Bellgrove.

"Lead me to her then. Oh, my father, when chained to the Indian's fiery stake, and all their horrid tortures around me, the bitterest pang that wrung my heart was, that I should ne'er again behold her. When I fled from them, and set captivity and death at defiance, the fond hope of meeting her nerved my heart, and prompted me on my perilous attempt. You weep—you all look sad. My mother! surely there is nothing wrong with her?"

"Alas, my son!" said Mr. Bellgrove, "she is beyond all earthly sorrow now."

"No, no!" exclaimed the youth, as every nerve of his frame seemed relaxing, and he sunk on the ground. They raised him, and a wild burst of grief nearly overpowered him, when Mr. Bellgrove, anxious to divert his thoughts to another channel, said, "Compose yourself; see, your old friend and schoolmate, Zama, is eager to salute you." Zama rushed forward and cast himself at his feet. Charles stretched out his arms to him, when Zama, starting suddenly up, struck his forehead with his hands and darted from the room.

LONG AGO!

A LYRICAL ELEGY.—WRITTEN ON REVISITING A SCENE OF INFANCY.

BY JOSEPH DOWNES, AUTHOR OF "THE MOUNTAIN DECAMERON."

I.

SCENE of my boyhood's hours of joy,
Thy name remains, familiar scene;
But changed, as I am from a boy,
Art thou from that old Westbourne Green,*
Whose trees and streams and flowers among,
I lingered when the sun was low,
The brook ran stilly—cuckoo sung,—
When I was innocent and young,
Long long ago!

II.

Though now the loud suburban crowd
O'er all its buried beauty pass,
To me th' old Green, as from a shroud,
Comes with its stillness and its grass,
Wild brook and cuckoo's lullaby;
But comes the peace they brought—that low
Mild sun, soft song, and golden sky!
Ah, no! to this dark heart and eye,
That sun hath set eternally,
Long long ago!

III.

Ah! sound of woe, that "Long Ago,"
What tragedies are in that word!
Joys we have known, no more to know,
Rising like ghosts as soon as heard!
By Memory's moonlight seen, we start
As their pale forms its "glimpses" show,—
Smiling despair!—in that waste part,—
That haunted solitude of heart,
Life's long ago.

IV.

As th' ice-bound brook, if to its nook
A beam steal from the sickly sun,
Renews its sound, yet sounds that brook
Like some strange subterranean one;
Its babble changed to murmurings lowly
Through ice and perished grass,—ev'n so,
Remember'd joys rise altered wholly,
Through th' ice of years, most melancholy,
Sorrowful ev'n remembered folly,
Of "long ago!"

V.

Why doth that writing, (with joy-bright
Eyes once devoured,) that faded scrawl,—
Now blast yon joyless husband's sight,
As God's handwriting on the wall
Belshazzar's? 'Tis Hope's epitaph,—
Its mere sight to his heart a blow!—
The dear, now dreadful, autograph
Of his home's angel, heart's own half,
Cold long ago!

VI.

Yet Time shall dull his nerves and lull
His pains, and, like a holy book,
Make those outpourings beautiful,
On which he cannot bear to look,—
Her youth's love-letters! long unread;
And as he journeys, sad and slow,
By life's low sun toward her bed,
They yet may soothe him—
Make bliss of woe.

VII.

Vain, vain lament for time mis-spent,
For pleasures fled, and passions flying!
All Earth is Man's vast monument—
All Life but a protracted dying!
Ev'n thou who, with heart blest or bleeding,
Dost on this lay a look bestow,
Hast progress'd nearer death in reading;
Like wave to broken wave succeeding,
Each race rolls o'er the race preceding,
In ceaseless flow.

VIII.

And as each wave 's a rolling grave,
Hiding rich wrecks and ruins vast,
So sleep the Great, the Good, the Brave,
In that great hazy sea, the Past;
As rivers all to Ocean tend,
While through Earth's hundred regions going,
Life's thoroughfares all still descend;
All in that black Pacific end,
Where all their fighting billows blend,
All life o'erflowing.

IX.

While bound for Rome to meet his doom,
Jugurtha shared his conqueror's car;
But, having reached his goal of gloom,
Their parted fates how different there,—
Triumphal arch, and earthy pit!
So, Death's the triumph,—Death's the arch,
The car where shortlived conquerors sit;
At Death's right hand, unknowing it,
They march,—but to an earthy pit,
A masqued dead march!

X.

Ev'n he of the stupendous throne,
That rose up from a sea of blood,
In earth's eclipse,—(that mountain one,
Which darkened nations while it stood,)
That thunder bearing king of kings,
Throneless in that red sea lies low,
He and his vast imaginings,
His slaughters and his slaughterings,
And willowed rock,—already things
Of long ago!

XI.

A child, whose hand on ocean's strand
Builds towers of shells it leaves awhile,
(Soon to roll back o'er buried sand,
And silly child and shelly pile)
Is man! such all the works of man,
Built on an ancient ocean's floor;
Earth's new-come guest, his stay's whole span
Secession of a tide—no more!
Which shall reoccupy that shore
He calls his world, as once, before
His race began.

XII.

On this old ball thrones rise and fall;—
Life's perished kingdoms swell the clod;
Ev'n the "Most Ancientest" of all
Beneath the throne itself of God,
Our old queen mother Nature's own,
Hath terrible invasion borne,
Time by slow siege invests that throne,
Slow crumbling like a sea-rock's stone,
By waters worn.

XIII.

Unseen, down-trod, within that clod,
Sleep grim the works of Time and Death,
A blank amidst the works of God!
Annihilated life and breath,

* Westbourne Green near Paddington: about forty years ago a retired rural spot frequented by gypsies; now a busy suburb of the West End of London.

Man's elder born of forms unknown!
To things of yesterday how grow
Earth's earliest ages oldest throne!
By Earth's sublimest* art is shown
A lost antiquity below,
That shames Antiquity, till no
Old Time remains beneath Heaven's throne;
Th' antiquity of heaven, Creation's own
Birth-day, sole "Long ago!"

* Geology surely claims this honour.

BORROW'S BIBLE IN SPAIN.

(Concluded from page 84 of our February No.)

From the preface of Mr. Borrow's singular narrative of his inroad into Spain, we learn that it was written at a solitary hamlet in a remote part of England. But the author is not a man likely long to remain in quietude or "cold obstroction," whatever shall be the next scene of his adventures. The gypsy propensity which lurks more or less in the nature of every man, save, perhaps, the arrant Cockney, and which breaks out in a thousand ways; in the boy who plays truant, or runs away to sea; in the man's fishing excursions; in boating, yachting, grouse-shooting, and all manner of hardy, adventurous, and wild rambles, must of itself impel our missionary forth; although his remarkable qualifications, physical and intellectual, did not point him out as a man whom nature has fitted to be one of the pioneers of the advanced guard, in those discoveries and enterprises which pave the way for spreading knowledge and civilisation. Labourers of this rare sort must ever be few in number; and they ought to be prized accordingly; nor suffered to remain unemployed, while in every quarter of the globe their services are urgently required. Into how many countries might not men like Borrow repair with advantage as travellers and missionaries? What might they not have to tell us on their return, from Arabia, from Tartary, from the central parts of Hindostan, but, above all these, from China; about which, in the present state of our political and commercial relations, so keen a desire for information exists; and which offers so wide and inviting a field for enlightened missionary enterprise.—According to the nearly uniform testimony of all travellers, it is never the people that present the most formidable obstacles to the European invaders of ignorance and superstition, but the priests and rulers, and all whose selfish interests are fancied to be opposed to the introduction of knowledge and truth. This holds as true of Spain, as of the inveterately-prejudiced regions of Asia, where caste and idolatrous superstition shackle the mind with fetters of triple brass. In proceeding with our eccentric traveller, we find many proofs of this fact in bigoted Spain, on which he remarks—

> It has long been the fashion to talk of the bigotry of the Spaniards, and their mean jealousy of foreigners. This is true to a certain extent; but it chiefly holds good with respect to the upper classes. If foreign valour or talent has never received its proper meed in Spain, the great body of Spaniards are certainly not in fault. I have heard Wellington calumniated in this proud scene of his triumphs, but never by the old soldiers of Aragon and the Asturias, who assisted to vanquish the French at Salamanca and the Pyrenees. I have heard the manner of riding of an English jockey criticised, but it was by the idiotic heir of Medina Celi, and not by a picador of the Madrilenian bull-ring. Apropos of bull-fighters.

But we pass this incident for another.

Executions are fearful spectacles in every country; but their novelty of mode renders them especially so to Englishmen in Spain; though our own "death of a dog," ought, in itself, to be more revolting.

> The criminals were two young men, brothers; they suffered for a most atrocious murder, having in the dead of the night broke open the house of an aged man, whom they put to death, and whose property they stole. Criminals in Spain are not hanged as they are in England, or guillotined as in France, but strangled upon a wooden stage. They sit down on a kind of chair with a post behind, to which is affixed an iron collar with a screw; this iron collar is made to clasp the neck of the prisoner, and on a certain signal it is drawn tighter and tighter by means of the screw, until life becomes extinct. After we had waited amongst the assembled multitude a considerable time, the first of the culprits appeared; he was mounted on an ass, without saddle or stirrups, his legs being allowed to dangle nearly to the ground. He was dressed in yellow or sulphur-coloured robes, with a high-peaked conical red hat on his head, which was shaven. Between his hands he held a parchment, on which was written something, I believe the Confession of Faith. Two Priests led the animal by the bridle; two others walked on either side chanting litanies, amongst which I distinguished the words of heavenly peace and tranquillity, for the culprit had been reconciled to the church, had confessed and received absolution, and had been promised admission to heaven. He did not exhibit the least symptom of fear, but dismounted from the animal and was led, not supported, up the scaffold, where he was placed on the chair, and the fatal collar put round his neck. One of the priests then in a loud voice commenced saying the Belief, and the culprit repeated the words after him. On a sudden, the executioner, who stood behind, commenced turning the screw, which was of prodigious force, and the wretched man was almost instantly a corpse; but, as the screw went round, the priest began to shout, "pax et misericordia et tranquillitas," and still as he shouted, his voice became louder and louder till the lofty walls of Madrid rang with it; then stooping down, he placed his mouth close to the culprit's ear, still shouting, just as if he would pursue the spirit through its course to eternity, cheering it on its way. The effect was tremendous. I myself was so excited that I involuntarily shouted "misericordia," and so did many others. God was not thought of; Christ was not thought of; only the priest was thought of, for he seemed at that moment to be the first being in existence, and to have the power of opening and shutting the gates of heaven or of hell, just as he should think proper: a striking instance of the successful working of the Popish system, whose grand aim has ever been to keep people's minds as far as possible from God, and to centre their hopes and fears in the priesthood. The execution of the second culprit was precisely similar; he ascended the scaffold a few minutes after his brother had breathed his last.

Long before the expiration of the three months with which Mendizabal had probably meant to wear out the patience of the missionary, that Minister had himself fallen. Isturitz was now the nominal Prime Minister; but Galiano, the Minister of Marine, was the ablest member of the Government; and to him Mr. Borrow had been introduced. He was a man of some literary pretensions; and he understood the English language so well, that when in England, an exile, he had chiefly supported himself by writing for reviews and journals.

He was a very small and irritable man, and a bitter enemy to every person who stood in the way of his advancement. He hated Mendizabal with undisguised rancour, and never spoke of him but in terms of unmeasured contempt. "I am afraid that I shall have some difficulty in inducing Mendizabal to give me permission to print the Testament," said I to him one day. "Mendizabal is a jackass," replied Galiano. "Caligula made his horse consul, which I suppose induced Lord —— to send over this huge burro of the Stock Exchange to be our minister."

It would be very ungrateful on my part were I not to confess my great obligations to Galiano, who assisted me to the utmost of his power in the business which had brought me to Spain. Shortly after the ministry was formed, I went to him and said, "that now or never was the time to make an effort in my behalf." "I will do so," said he, in a waspish tone; for he always spoke waspishly whether to friend or foe; "but you must have patience for a few days, we are very much occupied at present. We have been outvoted in the Cortes, and this afternoon we intend to dissolve them. It is believed that the rascals will refuse to depart, but Quesada will stand at the door ready to turn them out, should they prove refractory. Come along, and you will perhaps see a funcion." . . . . . .

After an hour's debate, the Cortes were dissolved without it being necessary to call in the aid of the redoubtable Quesada, and Galiano forthwith gave me a letter to his colleague the Duke of Rivas, in whose department he told me was vested the power either of giving or refusing the permission to print the book in question. The duke was a very handsome young man, of about thirty, an Andalusian by birth, like his two colleagues. He had published several works, tragedies, I believe, and enjoyed a certain kind of literary reputation. He received me with the greatest affability; and having heard what I had to say, he replied, with a most captivating bow, and a genuine Andalusian grimace, "Go to my secretary; go to my secretary—el kara por usted el gusto." So I went to the secretary, whose name was Oliban, an Aragonese, who was not handsome, and whose manners were neither elegant nor affable. "You want permission to print the Testament?" "I do," said I. "And you have come to His Excellency about it," continued Oliban. "Very true," I replied. "I suppose you intend to print it without notes." "Yes." "Then His Excellency cannot give you permission," said the Aragonese secretary: "it was determined by the Council of Trent that no part of the scripture should be printed in any Christian country without the notes of the church." "How many years was that ago?" I demanded. "I do not know how many years ago it was," said Oliban; "but such was the decree of the Council of Trent." "Is Spain at present governed according to the decrees of the Council of Trent?" I inquired. "In some points she is," answered the Aragonese, "and this is one. But tell me who are you? Are you known to the British minister?" "O yes, and he takes a great interest in the matter." "Does he?" said Oliban; "that indeed alters the case. If you can show me that His Excellency takes an interest in this business, I certainly shall not oppose myself to it."

The British minister performed all I could wish, and much more than I could expect. . . . I went to the duke, and delivered the letter. He was ten times more kind and affable than before: he read the letter, smiled most sweetly, and then, as if seized with sudden enthusiasm, he extended his arms in a manner almost theatrical, exclaiming, "Al secretario, el kara por usted el gusto." Away I hurried to the secretary, who received me with all the coolness of an icicle: I related to him the words of his principal, and then put into his hand the letter of the British minister to myself. The secretary read it very deliberately, and then said that it was evident His Excellency did take an interest in the matter." He then asked me my name, and taking a sheet of paper, sat down as if for the purpose of writing the permission. I was in ecstasy—all of a sudden, however, he stopped, lifted up his head, seemed to consider a moment, and then putting his pen behind his ear, he said, "Amongst the decrees of the Council of Trent is one to the effect" . . . .

"Oh dear!" said I.

"A singular person is this Oliban," said I to Galiano; "you cannot imagine what trouble he gives me; he is continually talking about the Council of Trent."

"I wish he was in the Trent up to the middle," said Galiano, who, as I have observed already, spoke excellent English; "I wish he was there for talking such nonsense. However," said he, "we must not offend Oliban, he is one of us, and has done us much service; he is, moreover, a very clever man, but he is an Aragonese; and when one of that nation once gets an idea into his head, it is the most difficult thing in the world to dislodge it. However, we will go to him; he is an old friend of mine, and I have no doubt but that we shall be able to make him listen to reason."

So powerful was the influence of Galiano, that at the final interview, the Secretary made a set speech to this effect:—

"It is with great pleasure that I see you in this capital, and, I may say, upon this business. I consider it a disgrace to Spain that there is no edition of the Gospel in circulation, at least such a one as would be within the reach of all classes of society, the highest or poorest; one unencumbered with notes and commentaries, human devices, swelling it to an unwieldy bulk. I have no doubt that such an edition as you propose to print would have a most beneficial influence on the minds of the people, who, between ourselves, know nothing of pure religion: how should they? seeing that the Gospel has always been sedulously kept from them, just as if civilisation could exist where the light of the Gospel beameth not. The moral regeneration of Spain depends upon the free circulation of the Scriptures; to which alone England, your own happy country, is indebted for its high state of civilisation, and the unmatched prosperity which it at present enjoys; all this I admit; in fact, reason compels me to do so; but——

"Now for it!" thought I.

"But"—and then he began to talk once more of the wearisome Council of Trent; and I found that his writing in the paper, the offer of the cigar, and the long and prosy harangue, were—what shall I call it?—mere φλυαρία.

So much for diplomacy. There was no getting the better of the Secretary's Council of Trent; and Galiano at last bethought him, that as there was no express law against printing the New Testament in Spain, the best way was just to put it to press. He promised the protection of Isturitz, who was, on trial, found perfectly favourable.

"I have lived long in England," said Isturits: "the Bible is free there, and I see no reason why it should not be free in Spain also. I am not prepared to say that England is indebted for her prosperity to the knowledge which all her children, more or less, possess of the sacred writings; but of one thing I am sure, namely, that the Bible has done no harm in that country, nor do I believe that it will effect any in Spain; print it, therefore, by all means, and circulate it as extensively as possible."

This was shortly before one of the numerous Revolutions that have taken place in Spain; that named the Granja, or the Grange, from the Palace to which the Queen Regent had retired when it occurred. Mr. Borrow gives this history of the commencement of that summary affair:—

Early one morning a party of these soldiers, headed by a certain sergeant Garcia, entered her apartment, and proposed that she should subscribe her hand to this constitution, and swear solemnly to abide by it. Christina, however, who was a woman of considerable spirit, refused to comply with this proposal, and ordered them to withdraw. A scene of violence and tumult ensued, but the regent still continuing firm, the soldiers at length led her down to one of the courts of the palace, where stood her well-known paramour, Muñoz, bound and blindfolded. "Swear to the constitution, you she-rogue," vociferated the swarthy sergeant. "Never!" said the spirited daughter of the Neapolitan Bourbons. "Then your cortejo shall die!" replied the sergeant. "Ho! he! my lads; get ready your arms, and send four bullets through the fellow's brain." Muñoz was forthwith led to the wall, and compelled to kneel down; the soldiers levelled their muskets, and another moment would have consigned the unfortunate wight to eternity, when Christina, forgetting everything but the feelings of her woman's heart, suddenly started forward with a shriek, exclaiming, "Hold, hold! I sign, I sign!"

This Revolution was in favour of the Constitutional party. Not the least remarkable incident of the Revolution was the sang froid of Mr. D——, the reporter at Madrid, attached to the Morning Chronicle. The appearance of the streets from the encounter of hostile parties of soldiers, was most threatening, and the conflict already commencing, when, says Mr. Borrow—

D—— turned upon me his broad, red, good-humoured English countenance, with a peculiarly arch look, as much as to say . . . . . (whatever you think most applicable, gentle reader,) then taking me by the arm, "Let us get," said he, "out of this crowd, and mount to some window where I can write down what is about to take place, for I agree with you that mischief is meant. Just opposite the post-office was a large house, in the topmost story of which we beheld a paper displayed, importing that apartments were to let; whereupon we instantly ascended the common stair, and having agreed with the mistress of the étage for the use of the front room for the day, we bolted the door, and the reporter, producing his pocket-book and pencil, prepared to take notes of the coming events, which were already casting their shadows before.

What most extraordinary men are these reporters of newspapers in general—I mean English newspapers. Surely if there be any class of individuals who are entitled to the appellation of cosmopolites, it is these; who pursue their avocation in all countries indifferently, and accommodate themselves at will to the manners of all classes of society. Their fluency of style, as writers, is only surpassed by their facility of language in conversation; and their attainments in classical and polite literature only by their profound knowledge of the world, acquired by an early introduction into its bustling scenes. The activity, energy, and courage which they occasionally display, in the pursuit of information, are truly remarkable. I saw them, during the Three Days, at Paris, mingled with canaille and gamins behind the barriers, whilst the mitraille was flying in all directions, and the desperate cuirassiers were dashing their fierce horses against these seemingly feeble bulwarks. There stood they, dotting down their observations in their pocket-books, as unconcernedly as if reporting the proceedings of a Reform meeting in Covent Garden or Finsbury Square; whilst in Spain, several of them accompanied the Carlist and Christino guerillas in some of their most desperate raids and expeditions, exposing themselves to the danger of hostile bullets, the inclemency of winter, and the fierce heat of the summer sun.

The scene which the compatriots overlooked must have been not a little inspiring:—

The house in which we had stationed ourselves was, as I have already observed, just opposite to the post-office, at the left of which, this street debouches from the north into the Puerta del Sol. As the sounds became louder and louder, the cries of the crowd below diminished, and a species of panic seemed to have fallen upon all. Once or twice, however, I could distinguish the words, Quesada! Quesada! The foot soldiers stood calm and motionless, but I observed that the cavalry, with the young officer who commanded them, displayed both confusion and fear, exchanging with each other some hurried words. All of a sudden that part of the crowd which stood near the mouth of the Calle de Carretas fell back in great disorder, leaving a considerable space unoccupied, and the next moment Quesada, in complete general's uniform, and mounted on a bright bay thorough-bred English horse, with a drawn sword in his hand, dashed at full gallop into the area, in much the same manner as I have seen a Manchegan bull rush into the amphitheatre when the gates of his pen are suddenly flung open.

He was closely followed by two mounted officers, and at a short distance by as many dragoons. In almost less time than is sufficient to relate it, several individuals in the crowd were knocked down, and lay sprawling upon the ground beneath the horses of Quesada and his two friends; for as to the dragoons, they halted as soon as they had entered the Puerta del Sol. It was a fine sight to see three men, by dint of valour and good horsemanship, strike terror into at least as many thousands. I saw Quesada spur his horse repeatedly into the dense masses of the crowd, and then extricate himself in the most masterly manner. The rabble were completely awed, and gave way, retiring by the Calle del Commercio and the street of Alcala. All at once Quesada singled out two nationals who were attempting to escape, and, setting spurs to his horse, turned them in a moment, and drove them in another direction, striking them in a contemptuous manner with the flat of his sabre. He was crying out, "Long live the absolute queen!" when, just beneath me, amidst a portion of the crowd which had still maintained its ground, perhaps from not having the means of escaping, I saw a small gun glitter for a moment, then there was a sharp report, and a bullet had nearly sent Quesada to his long account, passing so near to the countenance of the general as to graze his hat. I had an indistinct view, for a moment, of a well-known foraging-cap, just about the spot from whence the gun had been discharged; then there was a rush of the crowd, and the shooter, whoever he was, escaped discovery amidst the confusion which arose.

As for Quesada, he seemed to treat the danger from which he had escaped with the utmost contempt. He glared about him fiercely for a moment, then leaving the two nationals, who sneaked away like whipped hounds, he went up to the young officer who commanded the cavalry, and who had been active in raising the cry of the constitution, and to him he addressed a few words with an air of stern menace. The youth evidently quailed before him, and, probably in obedience to his orders, resigned the command of the party, and rode slowly away with a discomfited air; whereupon Quesada dismounted, and walked slowly backwards and forwards before the Casa de Postas, with a mien which seemed to bid defiance to mankind.

This was the glorious day of Quesada's existence—his glorious and last day. I call it the day of his glory, for he certainly never before appeared under such brilliant circumstances, and he never lived to see another sun set. No action of any conqueror or hero on record, is to be compared with this closing scene of the life of Quesada; for who, by his single desperate courage and impetuosity, ever before stopped a revolution in full course! Quesada did: he stopped the revolution at Madrid for one entire day, and brought back the uproarious and hostile mob of a huge city to perfect order and quiet. His burst into the Puerta del Sol was the most tremendous and successful piece of daring ever witnessed. I admired so much the spirit of the "brute bull," that I frequently, during his wild onset, shouted "Viva Quesada!" for I wished him well. Not that I am of any political party or system. No, no! I have lived too long with Rommany Chals and Petulengres, to be of any politics save Gypsy politics.

Yet Quesada fled that same night in disguise. He was taken at a few leagues from Madrid, and prepared for the death which awaited him.

After losing his friends in power by this Revolution, Mr. Borrow hastily returned to England to consult his principals, and made his next attempt or lodgement in Seville. At several of the bookshops in that city he found copies of the New Testament in Spanish, which had been brought in through Gibraltar.

The following adventure, one of many of a similar character, tells, by reflection, a good deal of our hero, as well as of his mysterious friend :—

I had returned from a walk in the country, on a glorious sunshiny morning of the Andalusian winter, and was directing my steps towards my lodging. As I was passing by the portal of a large gloomy house near the gate of Xeres, two individuals, dressed in zamarras, emerged from the archway, and were about to cross my path, when one, looking in my face, suddenly started back, exclaiming in the purest and most melodious French, "What do I see! If my eyes do not deceive me, it is himself. Yes; the very same as I saw him first at Bayonne; then, long subsequently, beneath the brick wall at Novogorod; then beside the Bosphorus; and last at—at—Oh, my respectable and cherished friend, where was it that I had last the felicity of seeing your well-remembered and most remarkable physiognomy!"

Myself.—It was in the south of Ireland, if I mistake not. Was it not there that I introduced you to the sorcerer who tamed the savage horses by a single whisper into their ear! But tell me what brings you to Spain and Andalusia—the last place where I should have expected to find you!

Baron Taylor.—And wherefore, my most respectable B * * * * *! Is not Spain the land of the arts; and is not Andalusia, of all Spain, that portion which has produced the noblest monuments of artistic excellence and inspiration! Surely you know enough of me to be aware that the arts are my passion; that I am incapable of imagining a more exalted enjoyment than to gaze in adoration on a noble picture. O come with me! for you too have a soul capable of appreciating what is lovely and exalted,—a soul delicate and sensitive. Come with me, and I will show you a Murillo such as . . . . . But first allow me to introduce you to your compatriot. My dear Monsieur W.,—turning to his companion, (an English gentleman from whom, and from his family, I subsequently experienced unbounded kindness and hospitality on various occasions, and at different periods, at Seville,)—allow me to introduce to you my most cherished and respectable friend; one who is better acquainted with Gypsy ways than the Chef des Bohemiens á Triana; one who is an expert whisperer and horse-sorcerer; and who—to his honour I say it—can wield hammer and tongs, and handle a horse-shoe with the best of the smiths amongst the Alpujarras of Granada.

In the course of my travels I have formed various friendships and acquaintances, but no one has more interested me than Baron Taylor, and there is no one for whom I entertain a greater esteem and regard. . . . . There is a mystery about him, which, wherever he goes, serves not a little to increase the sensation naturally created by his appearance and manner. Who he is, no one pretends to assert with downright positiveness: it is whispered, however, that he is a scion of royalty; and who can gaze for a moment upon that most graceful figure, that most intelligent but singularly moulded countenance, and those large and expressive eyes, without feeling as equally convinced that he is of no common lineage, as that he is no common man.

He has been employed by the illustrious house to which he is said to be related in more than one delicate and important mission, both in the East and the West in which his efforts have uniformly been crowned with complete success. He was now collecting masterpieces of the Spanish school of painting, which were destined to adorn the saloons of the Tuilleries.

He has visited most portions of the earth, and it is remarkable enough that we are continually encountering each other in strange places, and under singular circumstances. Whenever he descries me, whether in the street or the desert, the brilliant hall or amongst Bedouin haimas, at Novogorod or Stambul, he flings up his arms and exclaims, "O ciel! I have again the felicity of seeing my cherished and most respectable B**."

The low life characters of this singular book, are, however, more in the style of Le Sage, and also more true to universal nature. At Madrid, Mr. Borrow, when in the habit of lounging about the banks of the canal, picked up an acquaintance with a shrewd fellow, whose occupation was selling oranges and iced water at a particular corner. His observations on the passers-by were equal to reading the Charivari. The orangeman was an Asturian by birth, about five feet high, and fifty years of age.

He was a fellow of infinite drollery, and, though he could scarcely read or write, by no means ignorant of the ways of the world: his knowledge of individuals was curious and extensive, few people passing his stall with whose names, character, and history he was not acquainted. "Those two gentry," said he, pointing to a magnificently dressed cavalier and lady, who had dismounted from a carriage, and arm in arm were coming across the wooden bridge, followed by two attendants; "those gentry are the Infante Francisco Paulo, and his wife the Neapolitana, sister of our Christina; he is a very good subject, but as for his wife—vaya—the veriest scold in Madrid; she can say carrajo with the most ill-conditioned carrier of la Mancha, giving the true emphasis and genuine pronunciation. Don't take off your hat to her, amigo—she has neither formality nor politeness—I once saluted her, and she took no more notice of me than if I had not been what I am, an Asturian and a gentleman, of better blood than herself. Good day, Señor Don Francisco. Que tal (how goes it)? very fine weather this—vaya su merced con Dios. Those three fellows who just stopped to drink water, are great thieves, true sons of the prison; I am always civil to them, for it would not do to be on ill terms; they pay me or not, just as they think proper. I have been in some trouble on their account: about a year ago they robbed a man a little farther on beyond the second bridge. By the way, I counsel you, brother, not to go there, as I believe you often do—it is a dangerous place. They robbed a gentleman and ill-treated him; but his brother, who was an escribano, was soon upon their trail, and had them arrested; but he wanted some one to identify them, and it chanced that they had stopped to drink water at my stall, just as they did now. This the escribano heard of, and forthwith had me away to the prison to confront me with them. I knew them well enough, but I had learnt in my travels when to close my eyes and when to open them; so I told the escribano that I could not say that I had ever seen them before. He was in a great rage, and threatened to imprison me; I told him he might, and that I cared not. Vaya, I was not going to expose myself to the resentment of those three, and to that of their friends; I live too near the Haymarket for that.—Good day, my young masters. Murcian oranges, as you see; the genuine dragon's blood. Water sweet and cold. Those two boys are the children of Gabiria, comptroller of the queen's household, and the richest man in Madrid; they are nice boys, and buy much fruit. It is said their father loves them more than all his possessions. The old woman who is lying beneath yon tree is Tia Lucilla; she has committed murders, and as she owes me money, I hope one day to see her executed. This man was of the Walloon guard;—Señor Don Benito Mol, how do you do!"

This Benedict Mol was an old Swiss militaire, who had lately led a vagrant life, during many years of which he had been dreaming of some immense hidden treasure, buried in the Cathedral of St. James, at Compostella. He found people ready to become the dupes of any delusion which had gold, and diamonds for its basis; and his subsequent adventures in pursuit of this buried treasure are not a little curious. He frequently afterwards crossed the path of Mr. Borrow during his journeys in the Peninsula, always in indigence, and often in extreme distress. When the bubble burst, to which the Government at last lent itself, he suddenly disappeared; his fate may be divined. At Cordova, Mr. Borrow lodged with an inn-keeper, a fanatical Carlist, who affected to belong to neither side, especially while any of the Christinos troops were in his neighbourhood. The history of the inn-keeper of Cordova's household, illustrates the internal condition of unhappy Spain. Could any argument for Republican government be so strong as a brief history of the sanguinary, desolating wars that have arisen in Europe on the mere question of which of two individuals should rule a country, where the one was not a whit better fitted for the duties of government than the other? The inn-keeper's tale went—

"I am of no particular opinion, and I hold neither for King Carlos, nor for the Chica Isabel: nevertheless, I lead the life of a dog in this accursed Christino town, which I would have left long ago, had it not been the place of my birth, and did I but know whither to betake myself. Ever since the troubles have commenced, I have been afraid to stir into the street, for no sooner do the canaille of the town see me turning round a corner, than they forthwith exclaim, 'Halloo, the Carlist!' and then there is a run and a rush, and stones and cudgels are in great requisition: so that, unless I can escape home, which is no easy matter, seeing that I weigh eighteen stone, my life is poured out in the street; which is neither decent nor convenient, as I think you will acknowledge, Don Jorge! You see that young man," he continued, pointing to a tall swarthy youth who stood behind my chair, officiating as waiter; "he is my fourth son, is married, and does not live in the house, but about a hundred yards down the street. He was summoned in a hurry to wait upon your worship, as is his duty: know, however, that he has come at the peril of his life: before he leaves this house, he must peep out into the street to see if the coast is clear, and then he must run like a partridge to his own door. Carlists! why should they call my family and myself Carlists? It is true that my eldest son was a friar, and when the convents were suppressed, betook himself to the royal ranks, in which he has been fighting upwards of three years; could I help that? Nor was it my fault, I trow, that my second son enlisted the other day with Gomez and the Royalists when they entered Cordova. God prosper him I say; but I did not bid him go! So far from being a Carlist, it was I who persuaded this very lad who is present to remain here, though he would fain have gone with his brother, for he is a brave lad, and a true Christian. Stay at home, said I, for what can I do without you? Who is to wait upon the guests when it pleases God to send them? Stay at home, at least till your brother, my third son, comes back; for, to my shame be it spoken, Don Jorge, I have a son a soldier and a sergeant in the Christino armies, sorely against his own inclination, poor fellow, for he likes not the military life, and I have been soliciting his discharge for years; indeed, I have counselled him to maim himself, in order that he might procure his liberty forthwith; so I said to this lad, 'Stay at home, my child, till your brother comes to take your place, and prevent our bread being eaten by strangers, who would perhaps sell me and betray me;' so my son staid at home, as you see, Don Jorge, at my request, and yet they call me a Carlist!"

"Gomez and his bands have lately been in Cordova," said I; "of course you were present at all that occurred. How did they comport themselves?"

"Bravely well," replied the innkeeper, "bravely well, and I wish they were here still. I hold with neither side, as I told you before, Don Jorge, but I confess I never felt greater pleasure in my life than when they entered the gate; and then to see the dogs of Nationals flying through the streets to save their lives—that was a sight, Don Jorge—those who met me then at the corner forgot to shout 'Halloo, Carlista!' and I heard not a word about cudgelling; some jumped from the wall and ran no one knows where, whilst the rest retired to the house of the Inquisition, which they had fortified, and there they shut themselves up. Now you must know, Don Jorge, that all the Carlist chiefs lodged at my house, Gomez, Cabrera, and the Sawyer; and it chanced that I was talking to my Lord Gomez in this very room in which we are now, when in came Cabrera in a mighty fury—he is a small man, Don Jorge, but he is as active as a wild cat, and as fierce.—'The canaille,' said he, 'in the Casa of the Inquisition refuse to surrender; give but the order, General, and I will scale the walls with my men, and put them all to the sword.' But Gomez said, 'No, we must not spill blood if we can avoid it; order a few muskets to be fired at them: that will be sufficient!'"

"You tell me that you were acquainted with Gomez: what kind of man might he be?"

"A middle-sized man," replied the innkeeper; "grave and dark. But the most remarkable personage in appearance of them all was the Sawyer: he is a kind of giant, so tall, that when he entered the doorway he invariably struck his head against the lintel. The one I liked least of all was one Palillos, who is a gloomy savage ruffian, whom I knew when he was a postillion. Many is the time that he has been at my house of old; he is now captain of the Manchegan thieves, for though he calls himself a royalist, he is neither more nor less than a thief: it is a disgrace to the cause that such as he should be permitted to mix with honourable and brave men; I hate that fellow, Don Jorge: it is owing to him that I have so few customers. Travellers are, at present afraid to pass through La Mancha, lest they fall into his hands. I wish he were hanged, Don Jorge; and whether by Christinos or Royalists, I care not."

"You recognised me at once for an Englishman," said I; "do many of my countrymen visit Cordova?"

"Toma!" said the landlord, "they are my best customers; I have had Englishmen in this house of all grades, from the son of Belington to a young medico, who cured my daughter, the chica here, of the ear-ache. How should I not know an Englishman? There were two with Gomez, serving as volunteers. Vaya que gente; what noble horses they rode, and how they scattered their gold about!"

An old Genoese, who had attended Mr. Borrow from Seville to Cordova with horses, was as zealous a partisan of the young Isabel and her mother, as the landlord was of Don Carlos. The ruin of the liberal cause at Seville, where he had kept a coffee-house, had proved his ruin; for his customers were compelled to flee without remembering to pay for their coffee and liqueurs. "Nevertheless," said the disinterested liberal—

"I am a friend to their system, and never hesitate to say so. So the landlord, as I told your worship before, when he found that I was of this opinion, glared at me like a wild beast: 'Get out of my house,' said he, 'for I will have no spies here;' and thereupon he spoke disrespectfully of the young Queen Isabel and of Christina, who, notwithstanding she is a Neapolitan, I consider as my countrywoman. Hearing this, your worship, I confess that I lost my temper, and returned the compliment, by saying that Carlos was a knave, and the Princess of Beira no better than she should be. I then prepared to swallow the chocolate, but ere I could bring it to my lips, the woman of the house, who is a still ranker Carlist than her husband, if that be possible, coming up to me, struck the cup into the air as high as the ceiling, exclaiming, 'Begone, dog of a negro, you shall taste nothing more in my house; may you be hanged, even as a swine is hanged!' So your worship sees that it is impossible for me to remain here any longer."

This reminds one of the quarrels of the Buchanan and Targe of Dr. Moore. The landlord, fancied all the English, from Belington downwards, would be delighted to promote a marriage between the son of Don Carlos and Queen Victoria; a hopeful project which could not fail to bring a good number of English to Spain, and grist to mine host's mill. Mr. Borrow says—

The host mused for a moment, and then exclaimed, "Carracho, Don Jorgito, if this marriage could be brought about, both the king and myself should have cause to fling our caps in the air."

An old Carlist priest was at this time sheltered in the inn, who had, when arrested by the Constitutionalists, been bailed by the landlord. This ecclesiastic was astonished and incredulous on learning that the English actually understood Latin!

"Vaya! Who would have thought that it was possible for Lutherans to understand the language of the church? Vaya! the longer one lives the more one learns."

"How old may your reverence be?" I inquired.

"I am eighty years, Don Jorge; eighty years, and somewhat more."

Such was the first conversation which passed between his reverence and myself. He soon conceived no inconsiderable liking for me, and favoured me with no little of his company. Unlike our friend the landlord, I found him by no means inclined to talk politics; which the more surprised me, knowing, as I did, the decided and hazardous part which he had taken on the late Carlist irruption into the neighbourhood. He took, however, great delight in discoursing on ecclesiastical subjects and the writings of the Fathers.

"I have got a small library at home, Don Jorge, which consists of all the volumes of the Fathers which I have been able to pick up, and I find the perusal of them a source of great amusement and comfort. Should these dark days pass by, Don Jorge, and you should be in these parts, I hope you will look in upon me, and I will show you my little library of the Fathers; and likewise my dovecot, where I rear numerous broods of pigeons, which are also a source of much solace, and at the same time of profit."

"I suppose, by your dovecote," said I, "you mean your parish, and by rearing broods of pigeons, you allude to the care you take of the souls of your people, instilling therein the fear of God and obedience to his revealed law, which occupation must of course afford you much solace and spiritual profit."

"I was not speaking metaphorically, Don Jorge," replied my companion; "and by rearing doves, I mean neither more nor less than that I supply the market of Cordova with pigeons, and occasionally that of Seville: for my birds are very celebrated; and plumper or fatter flesh than theirs I believe cannot be found in the whole kingdom. Should you come to my village, you will doubtless taste them, Don Jorge, at the venta where you will put up, for I suffer no dovecotes but my own within my district.

The old priest had been an Inquisitor, and Mr. Borrow was anxious to learn the secrets of the prison-house. The crimes taken cognizance of by the secret tribunal with which he had been connected were, "sorcery, Judaism, and the desecration of dovecots." The last case of sorcery which he could remember, for they are not now very frequent, was that of a nun in a convent of Seville. He related that—

"A certain nun was in the habit of flying through the windows and about the garden over the tops of the orange trees; declarations of various witnesses were taken, and the process was arranged with much formality: the fact, I believe, was satisfactorily proved: of one thing I am certain, that the nun was punished."—"Were you troubled with much Judaism in these parts?"—"Wooh! Nothing gave so much trouble to the Santa Casa as this same Judaism."

Mr. Borrow returned from Cordova to Madrid, and, with the approbation of Mr. Villiers, forthwith began to print the scriptures, to which a less tolerant government than that now existing had previously given its sanction. He stumbled upon an admirable landlady; and, in a native of Pera, picked up an all-accomplished and extraordinary valet, who had followed Zea Bermudez from Constantinople. Antonio, the Greek, was affronted at being taken for either Spaniard or Frenchman, though he spoke the tongues of both nations fluently. His history is another of the singular ones of this book. Of how many strange histories has the last disturbed fifty years been productive? After being discharged by Zea, Antonio had served many masters; seldom remaining above three days in one place. He had been taken in charity when a destitute infant, and brought up by a family of wealthy Jews of Pera. "With them I continued," said Antonio,

"Until I was a beau garçon; they were fond of me, and at last offered to adopt me, and at their death to bequeath me all they had, on condition of my becoming a Jew. Mais la circoncision n'étoit guere à mon gout; especially that of the Jews, for I am a Greek, am proud, and have principles of honour. I quitted them, therefore, saying that if ever I allowed myself to be converted, it should be to the faith of the Turks, for they are men, are proud, and have principles of honour like myself."

The only reason which Antonio could assign for quitting his numerous places was the universal one, "that he was a Greek, and had principles of honour." Mr. Borrow, however, in spite of his capricious temper and numerous eccentricities, found him faithful and attached. When Antonio was hired, Mr. Borrow inquired how he was to leave his wife, since, as his servant, he must travel into the remote and mountainous parts of Spain.

"My wife will receive the moiety of my wages, while I am absent, mi Lor, and therefore will have no reason to complain of being deserted. Complain! did I say; my wife is at present too well instructed to complain. She never speaks nor sits in my presence unless I give her permission. Am I not a Greek, and do I not know how to govern my own house? Engage me, mi Lor, I am a man of many capacities: a discreet valet, an excellent cook, a good groom and light rider, in a word, I am Pequinin. What would you more?"

I asked him his terms, which were extravagant, notwithstanding his principes d'honneur. I found, however, that he was willing to take one half.

I had no sooner engaged him, than seizing the tureen of soup, which had by this time become quite cold, he placed it on the top of his fore-finger, or rather on the nail thereof, causing it to make various circumvolutions over his head, to my great astonishment, without spilling a drop, then springing with it to the door, he vanished, and in another moment made his appearance with the puchera, which, after a similar bound and flourish, he deposited on the table; then suffering his hands to sink before him, he put one over the other and stood at his ease with half shut eyes, for all the world as if he had been in my service twenty years. And in this manner Antonio Buchini entered upon his duties. Many was the wild spot to which he subsequently accompanied me; many the wild adventure of which he was the sharer.

The day before Mr. Borrow departed on the journey for which Antonio had been hired to attend him, a gentleman, who may be easily guessed at, waited upon him, from the British ambassador, with glad tidings. Mr. Villiers had resolved to purchase a number of copies of the New Testament himself, and to transmit them to the British consuls in the different parts of Spain; instructing these gentlemen, at the same time, to afford the accredited agent of the Bible Society all the protection and assistance they could, when he should appear in their respective districts. This is the first instance of any British ambassador having made the cause of Bible propagation a national one, or of having at all directly favoured it.

The heretic Missionary found a most hospitable welcome in the Irish College of Salamanca, although he here first took the bold step of advertising his contraband goods, by bills stuck up through the town; a plan which he afterwards pursued in other places. At the Irish College, our traveller met with a priest, who invited him to visit him at his village, which lay on the route to Valladolid. One likes to get into the inside of a Spanish parsonage, which, with English readers, or even ordinary travellers in Spain, is a very rare event.

A woman directed us to a cottage somewhat superior in appearance to those contiguous. It had a small portico, which, if I remember well, was overgrown with a vine. We knocked loud and long at the door, but received no answer; the voice of man was silent, and not even a dog barked. The truth was, that the old curate was taking his siesta, and so were his whole family, which consisted of one ancient female and a cat. The good man was at last disturbed by our noise and vociferation, for we were hungry, and consequently impatient. Leaping from his couch, he came running to the door in great hurry and confusion; and perceiving us, he made many apologies for being asleep at a period when, he said, he ought to have been on the look-out for his invited guest. He embraced me very affectionately, and conducted me into his parlour, an apartment of tolerable size, hung round with shelves, which were crowded with books. At one end there was a kind of table or desk covered with black leather, with a large easy-chair, into which he pushed me, as I, with the true eagerness of a bibliomaniac, was about to inspect his shelves, saying, with considerable vehemence, that there was nothing there worthy of the attention of an Englishman, for that his whole stock consisted of breviaries, and dry Catholic treatises on divinity.

His care now was to furnish us with refreshments. In a twinkling, with the assistance of his old attendant, he placed on the table several plates of cakes and confectionery, and a number of large uncouth glass-bottles, which I thought bore a strong resemblance to those of Schiedam, and indeed they were the very same. "There," said he, rubbing his hands, "I thank God that it is in my power to treat you in a way which shall be agreeable to you. In those bottles there is Hollands thirty years old;" and producing two large tumblers, he continued, "fill, my friends, and drink, drink it every drop if you please, for it is of little use to myself, who seldom drink aught but water. I know that you islanders love it, and cannot live without it; therefore, since it does you good, I am only sorry that there is no more."

Observing that we contented ourselves with merely tasting it, he looked at us with astonishment, and inquired the reason of our not drinking. We told him that we seldom drank ardent spirits; and I added, that as for myself, I seldom tasted even wine, but like himself, was content with the use of water. He appeared somewhat incredulous, but told us to do exactly what we pleased, and to ask for what was agreeable to us. We told him that we had not dined, and should be glad of some substantial refreshment. "I am afraid," said he, "that I have nothing in the house which will suit you; however, we will go and see."

Thereupon he led us through a small yard at the back part of his house, which might have been called a garden, or orchard, if it had displayed either trees or flowers; but it produced nothing but grass, which was growing in luxuriance. At one end was a large pigeon-house, which we all entered: "for," said the curate, "if we could find some nice delicate pigeons, they would afford you an excellent dinner." We were, however, disappointed; for after rummaging the nests, we only found very young ones, unfitted for our purpose. The good man became very melancholy, and said he had some misgivings that we should have to depart dinnerless. Leaving the pigeon-house, he conducted us to a place where there were several skeps of bees, round which multitudes of the busy insects were hovering, filling the air with their music. "Next to my fellow-creatures," said he, "there is nothing which I love so dearly as these bees. It is one of my delights to sit watching them, and listening to their murmur." We next went to several unfurnished rooms, fronting the yard, in one of which were hanging several flitches of bacon, beneath which he stopped, and looking up, gazed intently upon them. We told him that if he had nothing better to offer, we should be very glad to eat some slices of this bacon, especially if some eggs were added. "To tell the truth," said he, "I have nothing better; and if you can content yourself with such fare, I shall be very happy: as for eggs, you can have as many as you wish, and perfectly fresh, for my hens lay every day."

So, after everything was prepared and arranged to our satisfaction, we sat down to dine on the bacon and eggs, in a small room, not the one to which he had ushered us at first, but on the other side of the doorway. The good curate, though he ate nothing, having taken his meal long before, sat at the head of the table, and the repast was enlivened by his chat. "There, my friends," said he, "where you are now seated once sat Wellington and Crawford, after they had beat the French at Arapiles, and rescued us from the thraldom of those wicked people. I never respected my house so much as I have done since they honoured it with their presence. They were heroes, and one was a demi-god." He then burst into a most eloquent panegyric of El Gran Lord, as he termed him, which I should be very happy to translate, were my pen capable of rendering into English the robust thundering sentences of his powerful Castilian. I had till then considered him a plain, uninformed old man, almost simple, and as incapable of much emotion as a tortoise within its shell; but he had become at once inspired: his eyes were replete with a bright fire, and every muscle of his face was quivering. The little silk skull-cap which he wore, according to the custom of the Catholic clergy, moved up and down with his agitation, and I soon saw that I was in the presence of one of those remarkable men who so frequently spring up in the bosom of the Romish church, and who, to a child-like simplicity, unite immense energy and power of mind,—equally adapted to guide a scanty flock of ignorant rustics in some obscure village in Italy or Spain, as to convert millions of heathens on the shores of Japan, China, and Paraguay.

He was a thin, spare man, of about sixty-five, and was dressed in a black cloak of very coarse materials, nor were his other garments of superior quality. This plainness, however, in the appearance of his outward man, was by no means the result of poverty; quite the contrary. The benefice was a very plentiful one, and placed at his disposal annually a sum of at least eight hundred dollars, of which the eighth part was more than sufficient to defray the expenses of his house and himself; the rest was devoted entirely to the purest acts of charity. He fed the hungry wanderer, and despatched him singing on his way, with meat in his wallet and a peseta in his purse; and his parishioners, when in need of money, had only to repair to his study, and were sure of an immediate supply. He was, indeed, the banker of the village, and what he lent, he neither expected nor wished to be returned. Though under the necessity of making frequent journeys to Salamanca, he kept no mule, but contented himself with an ass, borrowed from the neighbouring miller. "I once kept a mule," said he; "but some years since it was removed without my permission by a traveller whom I had housed for the night; for in that alcove I keep two clean beds for the use of the wayfaring; and I shall be very much pleased if yourself and friend will occupy them, and tarry with me till the morning."

But I was eager to continue my journey, and my friend was no less anxious to return to Salamanca. Upon taking leave of the hospitable curate, I presented him with a copy of the New Testament. He received it without uttering a single word, and placed it on one of the shelves of his study; but I observed him nodding significantly to the Irish student, perhaps as much as to say, "Your friend loses no opportunity of propagating his book;" for he was well aware who I was. I shall not speedily forget the truly good presbyter, Anthonio Garcia de Aguilar, Cura of Pitiegua.

At Valladolid, though literature is at so low an ebb that the only bookseller is obliged to add the sale of other articles to his trade, a considerable number of copies of the Scriptures were sold, in consequence of advertisements. Mr. Borrow visited the Catholic Colleges of the Scotch and the English in this city, and also that of the Philippine Missions, which did not, at this period, contain even one student; not a single aspirant for the glory of converting, or, as they say, conquering the Indians! The good old Rector, who had laboured among those Indians for forty years, was now entirely alone. The shepherd was left, the flock scattered. It must however be owned, that if the young Missionaries had been like the worthy Superior himself, the Indians are not likely to have suffered any great loss. When Mr. Borrow inquired if the Rector had taken an active part in the Missions, he replied—

I was forty years in the Philippines, my son; forty years amongst the Indians. Ah me! how I love those Indians of the Philippines.

Myself.—Can your reverence discourse in the language of the Indians?

Rector.—No, my son. We teach the Indians Castilian. There is no better language, I believe. We teach them Castilian, and the adoration of the Virgin. What more need they know?

Myself.—And what did your reverence think of the Philippines as a country?

Rector.—I was forty years in the Philippines, but I know little of the country. I do not like the country. I love the Indians. The country is not very bad; it is, however, not worth Castile.

Myself.—Is your reverence a Castilian?

Rector.—I am an Old Castilian, my son.

The College of the English Catholics in Valladolid is at present the most prosperous seminary of the kind in Spain. It numbers between thirty and forty students.

The traveller occasionally came across individuals of the nation of his friends the gipsies; whom he at once recognised by his secret lore or occult science, where no one else could detect the Calé. It was at Leon that he first encountered the serious hostility of the priests, which never again abated. Leon was the seat of a bishop, who had been the confessor of Don Carlos; and it was fiercely Carlist and bigoted. A bookseller had been persuaded to sell New Testaments; but scarcely had the advertisements appeared, when the clergy, who had probably heard of the heretical doings at Salamanca and Valladolid, were in motion.

They went from house to house, banning and cursing, and denouncing misery to whomsoever should either purchase or read "the accursed books," which had been sent into the country by heretics for the purpose of perverting the innocent minds of the population. They did more: they commenced a process against the bookseller in the ecclesiastical court. Fortunately, this court is not at present in the possession of much authority; and the bookseller, a bold and determined man, set them at defiance, and went so far as to affix an advertisement to the gate of the very cathedral. Nothwithstanding the cry raised against the book, several copies were sold at Leon: two were purchased by ex-friars, and the same number by parochial priests from neighbouring villages. I believe, the whole number disposed of, during my stay, amounted to fifteen; so that my visit to this dark corner was not altogether in vain, as the seed of the Gospel has been sown, though sparingly. But the palpable darkness which envelops Leon is truly lamentable; and the ignorance of the people is so great, that printed charms and incantations against Satan and his host, and against every kind of misfortune, are publicly sold in the shops, and are in great demand. Such are the results of Popery, a delusion which, more than any other, has tended to debase and brutalize the human mind.

Antonio, at this period, became seriously alarmed for the safety of his master. The inn where they lodged was watched by lurking soldiers, wearing the livery of Don Carlos. Mr. Borrow learned much more that was alarming from Antonio; who probably liked to magnify his suspicions, or scraps of intelligence. They, however, set off quietly, long before day, for Astorga. There they experienced hard and inhospitable usage—though not from the priests—and the worse to bear, that Mr. Borrow, who was not easily troubled, had been enfeebled by a previous illness. He also came no speed in his enterprise; no one would undertake to sell New Testaments. The inhabitants of Astorga are of Moorish origin, as their modern appellation, Maragatos, or "Moorish Goths," denotes. Their dress differs but little from that of the Moors of Barbary; and they shave the head; though, instead of the turban, they wear the broad sombrero of Spain. This singular race are thus farther described:—

There can be little doubt that they are a remnant of those Goths who sided with the Moors on their invasion of Spain, and who adopted their religion, customs, and manner of dress, which, with the exception of the first, are still to a considerable degree retained by them. It is, however, evident, that their blood has at no time mingled with that of the wild children of the desert; for scarcely amongst the hills of Norway would you find figures and faces more essentially Gothic than those of the Maragatos. They are strong athletic men, but loutish and heavy; and their features, though for the most part well formed, are vacant and devoid of expression. They are slow and plain of speech; and those eloquent and imaginative sallies, so common in the conversation of other Spaniards, seldom or never escape them: they have, moreover, a coarse thick pronunciation; and when you hear them speak, you almost imagine that it is some German or English peasant attempting to express himself in the language of the Peninsula.

How long it is ere the traces of origin are eradicated! The Maragatos are mostly all carriers; and a great part of the lawful commerce of Spain passes through their hands. The women are, consequently, left at home to cultivate the fields, which they do with little help from the other sex. The trustworthiness of these carriers is proverbial. The religious conversation of the Missionary made no impression on these hard, semi-Goths.

After leaving Astorga, the master and man travelled through a wild highland country, sometimes encountering parties of Galicians (to whose province they were bound) on their way to reap the harvests of Castile. After descending a magnificent mountain gorge, they reached a few cottages, so tired and spent, that Mr. Borrow entreated a woman to give him a draught of water—

The woman said she would, but added that she expected to be paid for it. Antonio, on hearing this, became highly incensed, and, speaking Greek, Turkish, and Spanish, invoked the vengeance of the Panhagia on the heartless woman, saying—"If I were to offer a Mahometan gold for a draught of water, he would dash it in my face; and you are a Catholic, with the stream running at your door." I told him to be silent, and, giving the woman two cuartos, repeated my request, whereupon she took a pitcher, and going to the stream filled it with water.

Amidst the splendid scenery which they traversed on the evening of this day one peasant, of a group that the traveller addressed, was induced to purchase a New Testament, though none of the party had any idea of what the book was about.

The love of the priests is far from being universal among the peasantry of Spain. An edifice was seen perched upon a cliff; and a peasant, who had travelled for a short distance in Mr. Borrow's company during a tremendous thunder-storm, pointed to it.

"That is the house of the Virgin of the Rocks; and it was lately full of friars; but they have been thrust out, and the only inmates now are owls and ravens." I replied, that their life in such a bleak exposed abode could not have been very enviable, as in winter they must have incurred great risk of perishing with cold. "By no means," said he; "they had the best of wood for their braseros and chimneys, and the best of wine to warm them at their meals, which were not the most sparing. Moreover, they had another convent down in the vale yonder, to which they could retire at their pleasure." On my asking him the reason of his antipathy to the friars, he replied, that he had been their vassal, and that they had deprived him every year of the flower of what he possessed. Discoursing in this manner, we reached a village just below the convent, where he left me, having first pointed out to me a house of stone, with an image over the door, which, he said, once also belonged to the canalla (rabble) above.

They were benighted long before reaching Villafranca, and exposed to some danger on the road; nor when in the town were they at once in a haven of rest—

A horrid squalling of cats, from the tops of the houses and dark corners, saluted our ears, and I thought of the night arrival of Don Quixote and his squire at Toboso, and their vain search amongst the deserted streets for the palace of Dulcinea. At length we saw light and heard voices in a cottage at the other side of a kind of ditch. Leading the horses over, we called at the door, which was opened by an aged man, who appeared by his dress to be a baker, as indeed he proved, which accounted for his being up at so late an hour. On begging him to show us the way into the town, he led us up a very narrow alley at the end of his cottage, saying that he would likewise conduct us to the posada.

The alley led directly to what appeared to be the market-place, at a corner house of which our guide stopped and knocked. After a long pause, an upper window was opened, and a female voice demanded who we were. The old man replied, that two travellers had arrived who were in need of lodging. "I cannot be disturbed at this time of night," said the woman. "They will be wanting supper, and there is nothing in the house; they must go elsewhere." She was going to shut the window, but I cried that we wanted no supper, but merely a resting-place for ourselves and horses—that we had come that day from Astorga, and were dying with fatigue. "Who is that speaking?" cried the woman. "Surely that is the voice of Gil, the German clockmaker from Pontevedra. Welcome, old companion; you are come at the right time, for my own is out of order. I am sorry I have kept you waiting; but I will admit you in a moment."

The window was slammed to. Presently a light shone through the crevices of the door, a key turned in the lock, and we were admitted.

"Ave Maria," said the woman, "whom have we here? This is not Gil the clockmaker."—"Whether it be Gil or Juan," said I, "we are in need of your hospitality, and can pay for it." Our first care was to stable the horses, who were much exhausted. We then went in search of some accommodation for ourselves. The house was large and commodious; and, having tasted a little water, I stretched myself on the floor of one of the rooms on some mattresses which the woman produced, and in less than a minute was sound asleep.

In Galicia, Antonio was found of great use in protecting his master; as he had contracted a previous acquaintance, in the capital, with all the cut-throats, who had now returned to infest their native province as soldiers of the frontier guard. A party of these men were, on entering a village, found lolling among heaps of coarse hay in a stable, exceedingly ill-looking, and very dirty. They at once recognized Antonio, who described his Gallegan friends as almost all robbers and assassins. A fellow with one eye had shortly before escaped from Madrid, who was concerned in an affair of poisoning. It was necessary to treat them with wine, and to keep them in good humour. A little farther on, the travellers were surrounded by a party whom they, at first, took for banditti, but who, though little better, were soldiers:—

They were clamorous for cigars; but offered us no farther incivility. Having no cigars to bestow, I gave them in lieu thereof a small piece of silver. Two of the worst-looking were very eager to be permitted to escort us to Nogales, the village where we proposed to spend the night. "By no means permit them, mon maitre," said Antonio; "they are two famous assassins of my acquaintance. I have known them at Madrid. In the first ravine they will shoot and plunder us." I therefore civilly declined their offer and departed. "You seem to be acquainted with all the cut-throats in Galicia," said I to Antonio, as we descended the hill.

"With respect to those two fellows," he replied, "I knew them when I lived as cook in the family of General Q———, who is a Gallegan: they were sworn friends of the repostero. All the Gallegans in Madrid know each other; whether high or low makes no difference: there, at least, they are all good friends, and assist each other on all imaginable occasions; and, if there be a Gallegan domestic in a house, the kitchen is sure to be filled with his countrymen, as the cook frequently knows to his cost; for they generally contrive to eat up any little perquisites which he may have reserved for himself and family."

The road between Lugo and the place where they had halted was considered so dangerous from robbers and bands of Carlists, that, by Antonio's advice, they placed themselves under the protection of a military party which escorted the grand post from Madrid to Corunna, and was accompanied, for safety, by an immense cavalcade of travellers. With much bustle they got under way, and proceeded up hill and down dale at a very slow pace,—the soldiers singing patriotic songs breathing loyal attachment to Isabel, and hatred of the grim tyrant Don Carlos. The nature of these effusions may be gathered from a single stanza :—

> Don Carlos is a hoary churl
> Of cruel heart and cold;
> But Isabel is a harmless girl
> Of only six years old.

In this part of Spain one might almost fancy oneself in Ireland.

The villages were mostly an assemblage of wretched cabins: the roofs were thatched, dank, and moist, and not unfrequently covered with rank vegetation. There were dunghills before the doors, and no lack of pools and puddles. Immense swine were stalking about, intermingled with naked children. The interior of the cabins corresponded with their external appearance: they were filled with filth and misery.

At Lugo a liberal bookseller was found—the Trade beats all others!—and the bishop bought two copies of the Bible himself. At the posado of this town a family of reduced gentry, Andalusians, consisting of a father, mother, one son, and eleven well-dressed daughters, with a most faithful domestic of the Caleb Balderstone species, gives us one more of those glimpses of national manners which make this work so profitable. The father, who had been receiver-general for Granada, had been suddenly ruined by the loss of office on a late change of the ministry.

At Corunna Mr. Borrow met with one of those Italian weather-glass and toy pedlars from the Lake of Como whom he had known when a boy in England, and who, after being for many years settled in Spain, still languished, not for sunny Italy, but for England, the heaven of the Piedmontese and Milanese pedlars,—wealthy, merry England. Mr. Borrow could not see why the proprietor of a considerable shop in Corunna should regret his vagrant life in England.

Regret the difference, Giorgio! Do I hear such words from your lips, and you an Englishman? I would rather be the poorest tramper on the roads of England, than lord of all within ten leagues of the shore of the lake of Como; and much the same say all my countrymen who have visited England, wherever they now be. Regret the difference! I have ten letters from as many countrymen in America, who say they are rich and thriving, and principal men and merchants; but every night, when their heads are reposing on their pillows, their souls auslandra, hurrying away to England, and its green lanes and farm-yards. And there they are with their boxes on the ground, displaying their looking-glasses and other goods to the honest rustics and their dames and their daughters, and selling away and chaffering and laughing just as of old. And there they are again at nightfall in the hedge alehouses, eating their toasted cheese and their bread, and drinking the Suffolk ale, and listening to the roaring song and merry jests of the labourers.

By way of consolation, this Luigi Piozzi had taken to drinking, having lost all hope of doing any good in Spain, yet fettered to it by circumstances.

By the tomb of Moore, the traveller speaks like a true Englishman. The simple inscription upon the marble slab is worthy of the hero who sleeps beneath it:

JOHN MOORE: LEADER OF THE ENGLISH ARMIES: SLAIN IN BATTLE, 1809.

We are told that

There is scarcely a Spaniard but has heard of this tomb, and speaks of it with a strange kind of awe. Immense treasures are said to have been buried with the heretic general, though for what purpose no one pretends to guess. The demons of the clouds, if we may trust the Gallegans, followed the English in their flight, and assailed them with water-spouts as they toiled up the steep winding paths of Fuencebadon; whilst legends the most wild are related of the manner in which the stout soldier fell. Yes, even in Spain, immortality has already crowned the head of Moore.

In the fine old town of St. James of Compostella Mr. Borrow met with the Swiss treasure-seeker, who had begged his way thither from Madrid in order to accomplish the grand object of his life. In the bookseller of the same place the stranger found a remarkable character for the country in which he lived. Rey Romero, the liberal bookseller of Compostella, and a wealthy man of sixty, well deserves the memorial he has found in this work. He frequently accompanied the English stranger in his walks, and did all that he could to "push off" Bibles.

"We booksellers of Spain," said Rey Romero, "are all liberals; we are no friends to the monkish system. How, indeed, should we be friends to it? It fosters darkness, whilst we live by disseminating light. We love our profession, and have all more or less suffered for it; many of us, in the times of terror, were hanged for selling an innocent translation from the French or English. Shortly after the Constitution was put down by Angoulême and the French bayonets, I was obliged to flee from Saint James and take refuge in the wildest part of Galicia, near Corcubion. Had I not possessed good friends, I should not have been alive now; as it was, it cost me a considerable sum of money to arrange matters. Whilst I was away, my shop was in charge of the ecclesiastical officers. They frequently told my wife that I ought to be burnt for the books which I had sold. Thanks be to God, those times are past, and I hope they will never return."

Once, as we were walking through the streets of Saint James, he stopped before a church, and looked at it attentively. As there was nothing remarkable in the appearance of this edifice, I asked him what motive he had for taking such notice of it. "In the days of the friars," said he, "this church was one of refuge, to which if the worst criminals escaped, they were safe. All were protected there save the negroes, as they called us liberals." "Even murderers, I suppose?" said I. "Murderers!" he answered, "far worse criminals than they. By the by, I have heard that you English entertain the utmost abhorrence of murder. Do you in reality consider it a crime of very great magnitude?" "How should we not," I replied; "for every other crime some reparation can be made; but if we take away life, we take away all. A ray of hope, with respect to this world, may occasionally enliven the bosom of any other criminal, but how can the murderer hope?" "The friars were of another way of thinking," replied the old man; "they always looked upon murder as a friolera; but not so the crime of marrying your first cousin without dispensation, for which, if we believe them, there is scarcely any atonement, either in this world or the next."

Liberal as he was, Rey Romero had not quite overcome the prejudice and jealousy which every native of St. James is bound to feel for the up-setting town of Corunna. One citizen thought the very hospital patients from Corunna uglier than those from any other town.

"Besides a general hospital we have likewise a leper-house," said the bookseller. "Shall I show it you? We have everything at Saint James. There is nothing lacking; the very leper finds an inn here." "I have no objection to your showing me the house," I replied, "but it must be at a distance, for enter it I will not." Thereupon he conducted me down the road which leads towards Padron and Vigo, and pointing to two or three huts, exclaimed, "That is our leper-house." It appears a miserable place," I replied: "what accommodation may there be for the patients? and who attends their wants?" "They are left to themselves," answered the bookseller, "and probably sometimes perish from neglect: the place at one time was endowed and had rents which were appropriated to its support, but even these have been sequestrated during the late troubles."

At the distance of three leagues from St. James, is a small port named Padron, relating to which we have this anecdote of the suppression of heresy.

There is a curious anecdote connected with the skippers of Padron, which can scarcely be considered as out of place here, as it relates to the circulation of the Scriptures. I was one day in the shop of my friend the bookseller at Saint James, when a stout good-humoured looking priest entered. He took up one of my Testaments, and forthwith burst into a violent fit of laughter. "What is the matter?" demanded the bookseller. "The sight of this book reminds me of a circumstance," replied the other: "about twenty years ago, when the English first took it into their heads to be very zealous in converting the Spaniards to their own way of thinking, they distributed a great number of books of this kind amongst the Spaniards who chanced to be in London; some of them fell into the hands of certain skippers of Padron, and these good folks, on their return to Galicia, were observed to have become on a sudden exceedingly opinionated and fond of dispute. It was scarcely possible to make an assertion in their hearing without receiving a flat contradiction, especially when religious subjects were brought on the carpet. 'It is false,' they would say; 'Saint Paul, in such a chapter and in such a verse, says exactly the contrary.' 'What can you know concerning what Saint Paul or any other saint has written?' the priests would ask them. 'Much more than you think,' they replied; 'we are no longer to be kept in darkness and ignorance respecting these matters;' and then they would produce their books and read paragraphs, making such comments that every person was scandalized: they cared nothing about the Pope, and even spoke with irreverence of the bones of Saint James. However, the matter was soon bruited about, and a commission was despatched from our see to collect the books and burn them. This was effected, and the skippers were either punished or reprimanded, since which I have heard nothing more of them. I could not forbear laughing when I saw these books; they instantly brought to my mind the skippers of Padron and their religious disputations."

The citizens of Pontevedra were, if possible, more jealous and contemptuous of Vigo than those of St James were of Corunna. Vigo was depriving them of their trade, as Corunna had lately done the fine old city of St. James of the honour and advantage of being the seat of the provincial government. The contempt of the Señor Garcia notary, for Vigo, and his glorification of Pontevedra, is not a little comic. The stranger, however, though well prepared to despise, could not help admiring Vigo when he saw it.

Among other stirring adventures in Galicia, the Missionary was brought into trouble by being imagined by the ignorant fishermen of the bay of Finisterra to be no other than Don Carlos! and he was even arrested as the stunted Pretender. The affair, which looks ludicrous on paper, was likely to prove serious enough amongst an ignorant and violent community. He was, however, taken under the protection of an old fellow who pretended to be acquainted with the English tongue; and who pronounced him an Englishman because he was able to translate his own entire English vocabulary, namely knife and fork, into Spanish. The guide was at the same time set down as Sebastian, the nephew of Don Carlos, and was not likely to have escaped so easily as his English employer, when by a happy thought it was judged best to carry both the prisoners before the head alcalde at Corcuvion. This magistrate was a very different person from him of Finisterra. He had but lately arrived from Madrid to assume office, and was not even a native of Galicia. The man of the knife and fork "an old valiente," who by the way, had been in the action of Trafalgar, and seen Nelson fall, said of the new alcalde—

"He is a mighty liberal, and it is owing chiefly to his orders that we have lately been so much on the alert. It is said that the Carlists are meditating a descent on these parts of Galicia. Let them only come to Finisterra; we are liberals there to a man, and the old valiente is ready to play the same part as in the time of the French. But, as I was telling you before, the alcalde to whom I am conducting you is a young man, and very learned; and, if he thinks proper, he can speak English to you, even better than myself, notwithstanding I was a friend of Nelson, and fought by his side at Trafalgar."

It was dark night before we reached Corcuvion. Antonio again stopped to refresh at a wine-shop, after which he conducted us to the house of the alcalde. His steps were, by this time, not particularly steady, and, on arriving at the gate of the house, he stumbled over the threshold and fell.

The learned alcalde was seen at last. He is, like Balthasar, the Tailor-National of Madrid, a fair specimen of Young Spain.

Sebastian and myself followed Antonio up-stairs to a room, where, seated behind a table, we beheld a young man of low stature, but handsome features, and very fashionably dressed. He appeared to be inditing a letter, which, when he had concluded, he delivered to a secretary to be transcribed. He then looked at me for a moment fixedly, and the following conversation ensued between us:—

Alcalde.—I see that you are an Englishman; and my friend Antonio, here, informs me that you have been arrested at Finisterra. Myself.—He tells you true; and, but for him, I believe that I should have fallen by the hands of those savage fishermen. Alcalde.—The inhabitants of Finisterra are brave, and are all liberals. Allow me to look at your passport? Yes; all in form. Truly it was very ridiculous that they should have arrested you as a Carlist. Myself.—Not only as a Carlist, but as Don Carlos himself! Alcalde.—Oh, most ridiculous! Mistake a countryman of the grand Baintham for such a Goth! Myself.—Excuse me, Sir, you speak of the grand somebody? Alcalde.—The grand Baintham: he who has invented laws for all the world. I hope shortly to see them adopted in this unhappy country of ours. Myself.—Oh! you mean Jeremy Bentham. Yes! a very remarkable man in his way. Alcalde.—In his way! in all ways. The most universal genius which the world ever produced: a Solon, a Plato, and a Lope de Vega. Myself.—I have never read his writings. I have no doubt that he was a Solon, and, as you say, a Plato. I should scarcely have thought, however, that he could be ranked, as a poet, with Lope de Vega. Alcalde.—How surprising! I see, indeed, that you know nothing of his writings, though an Englishman. Now, here am I, a simple alcalde of Galicia, yet I possess all the writings of Baintham on that shelf, and I study them day and night. Myself.—You doubtless, Sir, possess the English language? Alcalde.—I do: I mean that part of it which is contained in the writings of Baintham. I am most truly glad to see a countryman of his in these Gothic wildernesses. I understand, and appreciate your motives for visiting them. Excuse the inci-vility and rudeness which you have experienced. But we will endeavour to make you reparation. You are this moment free: but it is late,—I must find you a lodging for the night.

A comfortable lodging was procured, to which the alcalde sent a good supper. He, like the priests and most of the learned laymen of Spain, knew nothing whatever of the New Testament of which the stranger spoke; but deemed it some monkish legend.

At Santander, the traveller fell in, at the table d'hôte, with the famous Flinter, whose like, albeit his touch of the blarney and the Bobadil, one does not meet with every day.

Long before dinner was concluded, the conversation was entirely engrossed, and the attention of all present, directed to an individual who sat on one side of the bulky Catalan. He was a thin man, of about the middle height, with a remarkably red face, and something in his eyes which, if not a squint, bore a striking resemblance to it. He was dressed in a blue military frock, and seemed to take much more pleasure in haranguing than in the fare which was set before him. He spoke perfectly good Spanish; yet his voice betrayed something of a foreign accent. For a long time, he descanted, with immense volubility, on war and all its circumstances, freely criticising the conduct of the generals, both Carlist and Christinos, in the present struggle, till at last he exclaimed, "Had I but twenty thousand men allowed me by the government, I would bring the war to a conclusion in six months."

"Pardon me, Sir," said a Spaniard, who sat at the table, "the curiosity which induces me to request the favour of your distinguished name."

"I am Flinter," replied the individual in the military frock; "a name which is in the mouth of every man, woman, and child in Spain. I am Flinter the Irishman, just escaped from the Basque provinces and the claws of Don Carlos. On the decease of Ferdinand, I declared for Isabella, esteeming it the duty of every good cavalier and Irishman in the Spanish service to do so. You have all heard of my exploits; and permit me to tell you they would have been yet more glorious had not jealousy been at work and cramped my means. Two years ago I was despatched to Estremadura, to organize the militias. The bands of Gomez and Cabrera entered the province, and spread devastation around. They found me, however, at my post; and, had I been properly seconded by those under my command, the two rebels would never have returned to their master to boast of their success. I stood behind my intrenchments. A man advanced and summoned us to surrender. 'Who are you?' I demanded. 'I am Cabrera,' he replied. 'And I am Flinter,' I retorted, flourishing my sabre; 'retire to your battalions, or you will forthwith die the death.' He was awed, and did as I commanded. In an hour we surrendered. I was led a prisoner to the Basque provinces; and the Carlists rejoiced in the capture they had made; for the name of Flinter had long sounded amongst the Carlist ranks. I was flung into a loathsome dungeon, where I remained twenty months. I was cold; I was naked; but I did not on that account despond—my spirit was too indomitable for such weakness. My keeper at last pitied my misfortunes. 'He said that it grieved him to see so valiant a man perish in inglorious confinement.' We laid a plan to escape together; disguises were provided, and we made the attempt. We passed unobserved till we arrived at the Carlist lines above Bilbao: there we were stopped. My presence of mind, however, did not desert me. I was disguised as a carman, as a Catalan; and the coolness of my answers deceived my interrogators. We were permitted to pass, and soon were safe within the walls of Bilbao. There was an illumination that night in the town; for the lion had burst his toils—Flinter had escaped, and was once more returned to reanimate a drooping cause. I have just arrived at Santander on my way to Madrid, where I intend to ask of the government a command, with twenty thousand men."

Poor Flinter! a braver heart, and a more gasconading mouth, were surely never united in the same body. He proceeded to Madrid, and, through the influence of the British ambassador, who was his friend, he obtained the command of a small division, with which he contrived to surprise and defeat, in the neighbourhood of Toledo, a body of the Carlists, commanded by Orejitta, whose numbers more than trebled his own. In reward for this exploit, he was persecuted by the government, which, at that time, was the moderado, or juste milieu, with the most relentless animosity.

Ten months after he was thus seen at Santander, Flinter, baffled, disappointed, and ill-treated, was seized with morbid despondency, and committed suicide; a melancholy warning to those ardent spirits who engage in the service of a party too ignorant to feel the value of such devotion, and too jealous and proud for gratitude.

When Mr. Borrow returned to Madrid, after this and the other journeys, to which we cannot advert, he found the priests and their partisans boiling with malice and fury, though the demand for Bibles, at the stores, had not been great. The influence of the British ambassador overawed them.

At this time, the beginning of the year 1838, he found leisure to finish the translation of the Gospel of St. Luke into the Spanish-Gypsy and Euscara languages, and to have them printed. The latter language is either the Basque or something nearly resembling that ancient tongue.

Mr. Borrow's fortunes in Spain had now reached a crisis. The political governor of Madrid issued an order prohibiting any more New Testaments being sold; and an alguazil paid a visit to the Bible depôt, but did not go the length of closing it, nor would the agent take down his placards. He was now attacked in the journals as a Jew, a sorcerer, a companion of witches and gypsies. We leave his vindication, without comment, to our readers.

That I was the associate of Gypsies and fortune-tellers, I do not deny. Why should I be ashamed of their company when my Master mingled with publicans and thieves? Many of the Gypsy race came frequently to visit me; received instruction, and heard parts of the Gospel read to them in their own language; and when they were hungry and faint, I gave them to eat and drink. This might be deemed sorcery in Spain, but I am not without hope that it will be otherwise estimated in England; and had I perished at this period, I think there are some who would have been disposed to acknowledge that I had not lived altogether in vain (always as an instrument of the "Most Highest"), having been permitted to turn one of the most valuable books of God into the speech of the most degraded of his creatures. In the meantime I endeavoured to enter into negotiations with the ministry, for the purpose of obtaining permission to sell the New Testament in Madrid, and the nullification of the prohibition. I experienced, however, great opposition, which I was unable to surmount. Several of the ultra-popish bishops, then resident in Madrid, had denounced the Bible, the Bible Society, and myself.

When matters came to the extremity, Mr. Villiers defended the agent of the Bible Society to the utmost.

Though there was no great demand for New Testaments, the whole edition of the Gospel of St. Luke in the Gypsy language sold in a fortnight.

Long, however, before this period had expired, the clergy were up in arms. "Sorcery!" said one bishop. "There is more in this than we can dive into," exclaimed a second. "He will convert all Spain by means of the Gypsy language," cried a third. And then came the usual chorus on such occasions, of Que infamia! Que picardia! At last, having consulted together, away they hurried to their tool the corregidor, or, according to the modern term, the gefe politico of Madrid.

The few remaining copies of the Gypsy Gospel were consequently seized, and the prohibited book was thenceforward run after more than ever. Mr. Borrow's vigilant and friendly landlady at this time warned him that he was in danger of arrest; which actually took place, through the excessive zeal of the corregidor, who went far beyond his powers in this rough step, and the wishes of his superiors. Comforting himself that he did not live in the age of Autos da fé, "Don Jorge," on his way to prison, thus moralized—

"And here am I," thought I, "who have done more to wound Popery than all the poor Christian martyrs that ever suffered in this accursed square, merely sent to prison, from which I am sure to be liberated in a few days, with credit and applause. Pope of Rome! I believe you to be as malicious as ever, but you are sadly deficient in power. You are become paralytic, Batuecas, and your club has degenerated to a crutch."

The prison of Madrid opened strange new scenes in life to the Missionary, which he has sketched with precision and spirit. Spanish ruffians seem more savagely atrocious than similar characters in other civilized countries; and here were to be found some of the vilest and blackest criminals.

The authorities had in our hero caught a Tartar. Once in prison, it was not so easy to get him out again. A formal apology was at last extorted in a document transmitted to the ambassador, confessing the imprisonment unjust; and after a confinement of three weeks, and all the expenses being paid, the prisoner condescended to walk forth, proclaiming his intention of circulating the Bible through every village in Spain!

The clergy were once and ever the party the most virulently opposed to the agent of the Bible Society; but he candidly confesses that, as

Rome is fully aware that she is not a Christian church, and having no desire to become so, she acts prudently in keeping from the eyes of her followers the page which would reveal to them the truths of Christianity. Her agents and minions throughout Spain exerted themselves to the utmost to render my humble labours abortive, and to vilify the work which I was attempting to disseminate.

In Mr. Borrow's dramatic description, the Archbishop of Toledo, the primate of Spain, appointed too to his office for his assumed enlightened views, does not stand forth as in any way superior to the good old priest of the dove-cotes. He was a better judge of gems, but not more favourable to the free circulation of the Bible, though without note or comment.

After this period Mr. Borrow was peculiarly active in circulating Bibles in the villages around Toledo and Madrid, and also in more remote hamlets,—his most active enemies still the priests. In these Biblical rambles he had his usual good fortune in the way of adventure and of small diverting fleabite persecutions, when either vending his poisonous wares personally or through his rustic agents. Lopez, one of these, who had caught the inspiration of his trade, would set out with a mule heavily laden with Bibles, exclaiming "Down with the friars! Down with superstition! Viva Ingalaterra! Viva el Evangelio!" Civil war was raging in the places they visited, and Mr. Borrow was sometimes the accidental witness of its atrocities and horrors.

Before Mr. Borrow finally left Madrid, there was a favourable reaction. He employed several men, and even women, to go about selling Bibles, to hawk them, in short;—and a considerable number were thus disposed of;—nay, in two of the Churches the New Testament was regularly expounded by the curates to children who had copies of the Society's Bible. But these liberal curates might probably wish to give the dangerous volume their own gloss. The name of Luther had been as detested and odious in Spain as that of Beelzebub; but now people ventured to inquire for the works of "Dr. Martin," whom some of them fancied still alive. Luther's name is the only one connected with the Reformation that is known in that dark land. In Seville, Mr. Borrow again established himself for a season, to circulate the Bible; and turning with contempt from the effeminate and ignorant higher class of Andalusians, he sought solace in the society and converse of an extraordinary gypsy.

No scion of a noble or knightly house, "no wearer of soft clothing," no sleek highly perfumed personage, none of the romanticos who walk in languishing attitudes about the streets of Seville, with long black hair hanging upon their shoulders in luxuriant curls; but one of those whom the proud and unfeeling style the dregs of the populace—a haggard, houseless, penniless man, in rags and tatters: I allude to Manuel, the—what shall I call him?—seller of lottery tickets, driver of death carts, or poet laureate in Gypsy songs. I wonder whether thou art still living, my friend Manuel; thou gentleman of Nature's forming—honest, pure-minded, humble, yet dignified being! Art thou still wandering through the courts of beautiful Safacoro, or on the banks of the Len Baro, thine eyes fixed in vacancy, and thy mind striving to recall some half-forgotten couplet of Luis Lobo; or art thou gone to thy long rest, out beyond the Xerez gate within the wall of the Campo Santo, to which, in times of pest and sickness, thou wast wont to carry so many, Gypsy and Gentile, in thy cart of the tinkling bell? Oft in the réunions of the lettered and learned in this land of universal literature, when weary of the display of pedantry and egotism, have I recurred with yearning to our Gypsy recitations at the old house in the Pila Seca. Oft, when sickened by the high-wrought professions of those who bear the cross in gilded chariots, have I thought on thee, thy calm faith, without pretence,—thy patience in poverty, and fortitude in affliction.

Another frequenter of the old lonely house in the Pila Seca was Dionysius, an unfortunate Greek, who had come to Seville with a fine library, collected on the dissolution of the convents, and in the vain hope that, in a large cathedral city, abounding in rich priests and canons, books might be in demand. He was completely deceived. These ecclesiastics had many wants of luxury more pressing. The seizure of New Testaments and Gypsy Gospels signalized the departure of the heretic Missionary from Seville. The intellectual state of this city may be gathered from the cry of "sorcery" having been raised when steam-boats (an English speculation) first appeared on the Guadalquiver. The boats are now, however, crowded with passengers, though the engineers are still Englishmen—luckily for the safety of those passengers.

Before leaving Seville, Mr. Borrow formed the design of visiting Barbary; for which he gives various good reasons, without mentioning "a truant disposition." Of his journey thither, by the route of Cadiz and Gibraltar, we shall merely say, that it is as lively and pregnant of Jew and Gypsy adventure, and graphic portraiture, as any other portion of the Narrative. The landlord at Gibraltar shall prove our assertion :—

I could observe every person who entered or left the house, which is one of great resort, being situated in the most frequented place of the principal thoroughfare of the town. My eyes were busy, and so were my ears. Close beside me stood my excellent friend Griffiths, the jolly hosteler, of whom I take the present opportunity of saying a few words, though, I dare say, he has been frequently described before, and by far better pens. Let those who know him not, figure to themselves a man of about fifty, at least six feet in height, and weighing some eighteen stone, an exceedingly florid countenance and good features, eyes full of quickness and shrewdness, but at the same time beaming with good nature. He wears white pantaloons, white frock, and white hat, and is, indeed, all white, with the exception of his polished Wellingtons and rubicund face. He carries a whip beneath his arm, which adds wonderfully to the knowingness of his appearance, which is rather more that of a gentleman who keeps an inn on the Newmarket road, "purely for the love of travellers, and the money which they carry about them," than a native of the Rock. Nevertheless, he will tell you himself that he is a Rock lizard; and you will scarcely doubt it when, beside his English, which is broad and vernacular, you hear him speak Spanish—ay, and Genoese too, when necessary; and it is no child's play to speak the latter, which I myself could never master. He is a good judge of horseflesh, and occasionally sells "a bit of a blood," or a Barbary steed, to a young hand, though he has no objection to do business with an old one; for there is not a thin, crouching, livid-faced, lynx-eyed Jew of Fez capable of outwitting him in a bargain, or cheating him out of one single pound of the fifty thousand sterling which he possesses; and yet, ever bear in mind that he is a good-natured fellow to those who are disposed to behave honourably to him; and know, likewise, that he will lend you money, if you are a gentleman, and are in need of it; but depend upon it, if he refuse you, there is something not altogether right about you—for Griffiths knows his world, and is not to be made a fool of. There was a prodigious quantity of porter consumed in my presence during the short hour that I sat on the bench of that hostelry of the Rock.

The Bible in Spain properly stops here; and we must resist the gypsy spells and whispering that would tempt us onward to Tangiers. There may be different opinions as to Mr. Borrow's merits and qualifications as a Missionary of the Bible Society; there can be none, as to his having produced a clever, most amusing, and,—to minds capable of healthy intellectual assimilation,—profitable work. We trust that it will not be the last, and that his gipsy lore, and the singular free-masonry which might find him a safe way into many inviting regions, sealed to ordinary Christians, are not to be henceforth lost to the world.

FADED FLOWERS.

Oh, ye are drooping—parted flowers,
And your beautiful life it is gone like a dream,
Pining for love of sheen and showers,
Twilight dewdrop, noon-day beam.
By your loveliness ye fell,
For beauty is ever a fatal spell;
And love will dare even wrong unknown,
To make the thing beloved its own.

Mourn not, mourn not, faded flowers!
Was fragrance yours in your sunny bowers?
Still is her spirit hovering near,
And she will not quit a home so dear,
But o'er ye breathes, and long will breathe,
Like love, outlasting time and death.

Had ye a language, blooming flowers,
Now is your voice more deeply dear;
Tones to the heart ye bring—and showers
Of visioned dew o'er the senses weep,
And waken thoughts—ay, thoughts that steep
The soul in transport, while ye sleep
All hueless, shrunk, and sere;
Had ye a charm—now, now unbroken—
Even as the passionate spell ye token—
It clings to you more closely still
Than to all the loved of ray or rill.

Oh, I will love you, sweet, sweet flowers,
For fair was the hand that reft your hours,
And the bosom where first ye knew to fade—
A pillow for love's own visions made;
And idle it may be thus to deem,
But token flowers to me ye seem;
And spoiled and withered though ye be,
What marvel yet your charm to me.

Pass, young flowers—how sweet to see,
All is not lost with your early bloom;
Better thus, than to waste away
Beneath the dull doom of decay,
And when lovelier things than ye
Press the stirless couch of gloom,
Not alone is the heart laid low,
Its hopes—its loves—partake its grave;
For there, alas, no starry glow
Beacons beyond death's shoreless wave.
And, if it be naught save a dream of bliss,
That love hath another sphere than this,
And hopes, on earth's cold bosom that die,
Have a happier home on high;
What more may hallow human clay,
When passion with life hath passed away?
What—but the love to linger prone,
The love-taught fancy that renews
Bloom to the sere, the faded hues—
The lifeless life—the voiceless tone?
Oh—to the heart bereft and lone,
Deem not that fantasy all vain,
Which bids the forms of passion flown,
In spiritual shadow live again;
And wings from the last tyrant's power
Even the charm of a wasted flower.

SIR ROBERT PEEL AND HIS ERA.*

This is a rather remarkable production of its kind.—Though its leading subject be comprehensively "The condition-of-England question,"—which, for the moment, is more closely depending, more intimately connected with Sir Robert Peel, whether as Prime Minister, or leader of the Tory party, than with any other individual whatever—it is not less noticeable as a rapid, brilliant, and tolerably fair epitome of the history of public opinion and political progress for the last sixty eventful years. It tells nothing that is absolutely new, and does not pause for philosophic reflection, though pertinent remarks and illustrative quotations are interwoven; but it tells, with clearness and spirit, the outlines of a story with which all men, mingling, or aspiring to mingle, in public affairs, or to take note of their progress, require to have their memories occasionally refreshed. The author, if not by any means a servile Peelite, is probably more attached to the Peel party than to any other. Taking Burke for his lode-star, he, however, assumes a tone of perfect independence, which is tolerably well preserved; and deals round his applause to the leading men of all parties with considerable tact, and a creditable appearance of impartiality. His ultimate opinions on any single point,—save against a farther extension of the parliamentary franchise, and on the necessity of holding a strict hand over the currency, as a curb on speculation, over-trading, population, &c., &c.,—it is not easy to make out. His plan for settling the Corn Laws, the pressing and immediate question of the hour, is the (we believe) original and complex one of a fixed duty for America, with a sliding-scale for the Continent. He attributes, though not always directly, national distress to bad seasons, without insisting upon the corrective—the equalizing principle of Free Trade in corn, and in all kinds of food; and he appears to consider the adoption of any line of policy, or of the manner in which a question should be treated, as equally important, from its probable bearings on party, as from its effects on national interests; or, as if the great principle of a statesman were merely expediency, or the knowledge of how to yield, and make the most of the sacrifice when the crisis arrives which it has been his policy to delay. As, for example, Sir Robert Peel conceding the Catholic claims, not because of their indefeasible and immutable justice, and the wisdom of granting them, but because it had been demonstrated that the Catholics could no longer be trampled on with safety.

The book opens with an account of the Peel family, and particularly of the father of the Premier, the first Sir Robert. But the history of that family is already well enough known; and it is at least as creditable as that of three-fourths of the lawyer, soldier, or court-favour-sprung noble houses of the empire. It was the ambition of the elder Peel to found a family, and make his son the successor of the "Immortal Pitt." He succeeded in both objects; and although he did not live to witness their complete realisation, he must have had a Pisgah-view of his son's high destiny, for he lived to see him almost on the highest step of the ladder. After his introduction into public life is described, the great measures in which Peel was successively prominent, are discussed at length. On the Bank Restriction the writer passes just censure, and forcibly expresses what are generally held to be sound opinions on the dangers of inconvertible paper; otherwise his opinions on the wisdom or absolute necessity of the war with revolutionary France augurs a thorough acquiescence in the policy of Pitt, and the views of Burke. The condemnation of the Bank Restriction, paves the way to indirect laudation of Peel's first memorable retractation of his original opinions, when the strenuous supporter of PITT AND PAPER MONEY was converted into the "PEEL'S BILL PEEL" of Cobbett.

Though Sir Robert's admirers must regret that he has seldom, if ever, taken the initiative in any great measure, it would be as ungracious as unjust not to give him the praise due to the candid confession of error, and the courage to do what was right at last, in defiance of the indignation of alienated friends, and the sneers and ridicule of enemies. Looking back upon the history of Catholic Emancipation, with Canning in the grave, to which he had been hastened by a wounded spirit, and his rival triumphant through his sudden abandonment of the cause of the bigots, of which he had been the champion for many a long year, and in many a hard-fought field, it is not wonderful that men's sympathies get the better of their reason, or that the feeling of "shabby" attaches to what was either the most praiseworthy act of Peel's public life, or a thing of those mingled elements, in motive, which we do not care at this moment to analyze. Nor could the final acquiescence of Mr. Peel fully atone for his long and obstinate opposition to a measure wrung forth when concession had lost all its grace, and much of its healing virtue. Sir Robert Peel was only honest in disclaiming the merit of having carried the question, which, as he said, Fox, and Grattan, and Plunkett, and Canning, the Whig party, (and he should have added the Irish Catholics,) by their continuous efforts, carried in spite of his opposition.

Sir Robert Peel's small or narrow attempts at Law Reform give place to a chapter upon the Law Improvements and Improvers of the last half century, and, among the rest, Bentham, the superfluous or captious remarks on whom would augur the writer to belong to the genus lawyer. Animadverting upon the mischievous tendency of Bentham's philosophy, as creating excitement and dissatisfaction, he throws out the following questionable opinions:—

* London: N. H. Cotes.

But in the great and complex business of law and legislation, it is frequently far better that the national mind should rest in the vagueness of a fallacy, than to be tormented with the acuteness of a logical definition; far better that an entire people, who have not yet discovered that they are utterly miserable, should be convinced that, on the whole, they are tolerably well as they are, than be prematurely driven into the discovery that they are much worse than they might be.

This author admits that Bentham, though a vain man, and an intolerable egotist, was severely conscientious, and that he abandoned the profession of law from sincere abhorrence of the dishonest practices and low morality of lawyers; but he concludes, and we hope with truth—

A far better and far higher feeling has, since Bentham's early days, been gradually animating the legal profession; and the process of improvement, though slow, has been sure, leading to a confident expectation, that, ere long, the CIVIL LAW of England may become as simple in its processes, and as unexpensive and expeditious in its nature, as the artificial forms of our civilisation will permit.

Though it is evident that, if not vulgarly Tory in his opinions, this commentator on the Peel Era is highly Conservative, in looking back, he generally holds the balance with a fair and firm hand. When the contagion of "French principles" had, in 1794, done its worst in this country, and justified, as he believes, the adoption of Pitt's extreme measures, it is confessed,—

At the same time, impartial history must record that POWER, being in FEAR, was guilty of straining JUSTICE, in order to repress what it considered dangerous in the practices of the agitators of that day; and therefore, when, in 1794, the subject of the transportation of Muir and Palmer, "the Scotch Martyrs," * was brought before the House of Commons, Fox had some justification for his warmth when he exclaimed, "Until such time as there is a law to send me to Botany Bay for publicly avowing my sentiments, I shall think it a duty incumbent on me to condemn the actions of those in power, whenever they may, as in the present instance, call forth the execration of mankind. If England, unhappily, relapsing into despotism, should ever be governed by such principles, then farewell, a long farewell, to our boasted freedom."

The Second REIGN OF TERROR, that of 1817, "when the whole country," in the words of Earl Grey, "was placed out of the pale of the Constitution," is vindicated as "partly necessary," though the author forgets to tell, that those who did the wrong had also created the necessity. Of the Duke of Wellington's celebrated "pig-headed" speech, which, in the excited state of the public mind, precipitated Reform, it is remarked,—

Had this bold and manly avowal of opinion been uttered before Catholic Emancipation, it would have had a prodigious influence; but after it, and in the excited state of the country, it was clearly too late—unequivocally ill-timed!

Success is too much regarded as the measure of right in this and other passages. Thus the complete and abrupt change in The Times newspaper, when Lord Melbourne's ministry was broken up, which change can be explained upon no principle of integrity, would appear to be regarded as a step which is completely vindicated by the results. It is thus alluded to in connexion with Lord Melbourne's sudden dismissal:—

The decaying enthusiasm of the middle-classes was suddenly rekindled, and glowed intensely. Another matter added fuel to the excitement. The Times newspaper, the greatest engine of its kind that ever existed—which had fought, for many years, with a powerful arm and a rough vigour, the cause of Reform and "Civil and Religious Liberty"—took one of those steps which end either in ruin or in triumph, according to the boldness and the skill with which the experiment is made. For some time it had manifested symptoms of a growing alienation; had quarrelled with Lord Chancellor Brougham, and had successfully held him up to ridicule; and had fiercely, but unavailingly resisted the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act. It now came out on the "opposite" side, to the astonishment of everybody who read it; a cry of "Traitor!—we are betrayed!" was heard; for a brief period, like a powerful vessel labouring in a heavy sea, The Times plunged amid approbation and disapprobation, its timbers apparently creaking and groaning under the change: shortly, however, it "righted," and now floats the most magnificent, as it had been the most daring "craft," that ever sailed on the ocean of public opinion.

The restoration of the Tories, or, as they are here uniformly termed, the Conservatives, to power, and a sketch of the business of the last session, in which Sir Robert Peel is treated with "high consideration," and receives the praise for his Tariff measure, and his firmness in carrying it, "which he amply deserves," concludes "Sir Robert Peel and his Era;" for the chapter, "Corn and Currency," is more one of speculation than of retrospect. On the manufacturing system, the author has not exactly found firm ground. It is a difficult and delicate subject, and much may be said on both sides. Some things he has said well, and opportunely. With the causes of distress,—upon which, so far as legislation is concerned, not much is explicitly affirmed,—we shall not intermeddle, but merely quote a few of the remedial suggestions, which are worthy of attention:—

The remedy, to a given extent, appears simple in principle, if not in detail; and only requires an intelligent and courageous statesman, and an honest legislature, to apply it.

Our manufacturing industry, and our mechanical power, require no further stimulus—no further EXTENSION. Leeds, Manchester, and Glasgow are large enough for all our national purposes; our manufacturing population numerous enough on every consideration of social safety. Therefore let the CURRENCY be TIED UP; so that, when we enter on our approaching cycle of good seasons, (if the cycle has not commenced,) there will be a LIMIT to the stimulus which abundant seasons gives to our tremendous manufacturing power. Better that a small number of poor honest men should occasionally be unable to find a SPRING-BOARD [credit] from which to vault into a fortune, than that the whole country should be exposed to the wild fury of periodical commercial tornadoes.

Having TIED up the CURRENCY, let the CORN TRADE be set as FREE as it can be, with reference to circumstances. For, in the language of the philosophic statesman whom we have so often quoted, "A statesman differs from a professor in an University: the latter has only the general view of society; the former, the statesman, has a number of circumstances to combine with those general ideas, and to take into his consideration. Circumstances are infinite, are infinitely combined; are variable and

* These "Scotch Political Martyrs" are the same individuals whose memories that "most magnificent craft that ever sailed on the ocean of public opinion,"—as this writer designates The Times, when it made its most barefaced wheel, and yet stood out the storm by undaunted impudence, or the intrepidity of Journalism,—the same individuals The Times has lately been abusing, from day to day, as the lowest and vilest of felons; though as much apparently from sheer ignorance, and the assumption of ignorance among readers, as from unprincipled recklessness.

transient; he who does not take them into consideration is not erroneous, but stark mad, metaphysically mad. A statesman, never losing sight of principles, is to be guided by circumstances; and judging contrary to the exigencies of the moment, he may ruin his country for ever."

Looking then to "circumstances," yet never losing sight of "principles," it may be worthy a statesman's consideration, to what extent he can set the corn trade FREE, at the same time that he TIES up the currency. On the principle that some protection is needed for our home agriculture, it must be admitted that no sufficient answer has been given to the argument, that, with a fixed duty, in cycles of abundant seasons, we should be swamped by supplies of corn from those European countries on the same parallels of latitude with ourselves, and which generally share with us in the same series of abundant and deficient harvests. But with a SLIDING SCALE for Europe, and a FIXED DUTY for America, there might be at once sufficient protection given to our agriculture, and sufficient encouragement given to our manufacturing industry; and with a currency secured from unnatural expansion and sudden check, we might see our abundant seasons pass away without any extraordinary OVER-TRADING, and witness the approach of deficient harvests, not, indeed, without regret, for that can never be, but at least without the terror of those days of woe, and nights of trembling, which must ever be endured when we have to "enter the cloud" of commercial panic and the decay of trade.

These observations may appear to indicate a deficiency of consideration or of appreciation of the difficulties of our social condition. These difficulties are indeed great. We have grown up under an unnatural and artificial state of things. Our NATIONAL DEBT is a huge and unnatural excrescence, the growth of war, fictitious capital, and our enormous manufacturing power. Yet the removal of the tumour would cost the patient its life. Our vast manufacturing industry, great and wonderful as it is, has shot up into a tremendous artificial power, the creature of rare and accidental circumstances, such as having for a brief space the world for its operation, without any effective rivalry, as well as stimulating and being stimulated by that fictitious capital to which we owe so much of our National Debt. And our protected agricultural interest is another artificial but not unnatural excrescence, though it be the product of a short-sighted legislation.

Not unnatural only, because the selfishness of those who possess power, is, unfortunately for mankind, so general as to seem perfectly natural. And yet, the Corn bill of 1815 is pronounced "that astounding legislative blunder" "which was brought in to sustain rents, which had sprung upward out of high prices, and an inconvertible paper currency," and called "a measure to keep prices at, or about 80s. a-quarter,"—a most modest and righteous measure! But yet, this writer contends, that this "not unnatural protection" to the agricultural interest must be continued, because, we presume, these interests have made it necessary that the rest of the country should confirm to them the advantages (real or supposed) of their own wrong; for

> How are we to unthread our vicious legislation without injury to that agricultural interest, which, in its present state of progressive improvement and productive power, is one of the most important in the world, viewed as the basis of the prosperity of an empire the greatest which the world has ever seen?

The periodical agricultural distresses are noticed, and it is stated, on erroneous data, that "the disastrous periods of manufactures are the prosperous times of agriculture, and vice versâ;" which is equivalent to saying, that when the manufacturers have the greatest command of money, they consume the smallest quantities of bread, and meat, butter, and cheese; and which the present state of the country, when both interests are suffering to the extreme, demonstrates to be fallacious. Unless, as is not impossible, the bounty of Providence, in sending good seasons, is, under that vicious system which they have inflicted upon the country, an unfailing cause of distress to our landowners. Deficient harvests are insisted upon as the root of our distress; and this might be quite true, if there were no other corn-growing country save Britain, or no other continent than Europe. Till the harvests of the world are shown to be all deficient at the same time, the evils of vicious legislation are, it seems, to be charged against the seasons, and not laid to the door of our class law-makers. Some of the conclusions are rather more satisfactory. We are told,

> We must come first to FREE TRADE, but we cannot spring into it; the clown who tried to jump into his breeches broke his leg. Sir Robert Peel is following the career of the lamented WILLIAM HUSKISSON, a Minister of Commerce whose name ought to be held in honour by his country. Let him but be effectively seconded by the Legislature, and this country may yet retrace its steps into a sound policy and a prosperous condition. Increased production, the effect of the application of capital under the guidance of science and skill, will enable our agricultural interest to maintain its just place in the social condition of this country; while a cautious, an enlightened policy, may enable us to sustain our present great manufacturing industry, without giving it such an undue importance as to enable it, like Aaron's rod, to "swallow up all the rest." We cannot now become "the workshop of the world;" our utmost efforts will only enable us to maintain our position. And in settling this question, it is worth while remembering that there is some truth in the words of Burke, who observes that "The cry of the people in cities and towns, though unfortunately (from a fear of their multitude and combination) the most regarded, ought, in fact, to be the least attended to upon this subject; for citizens are in a state of utter ignorance of the means by which they are to be fed, and they contribute little or nothing, except in an infinitely circuitous manner, to their own maintenance."

Where it might seem arrogant for our author to dogmatize in his own person, he frequently draws upon Burke and Fox; apparently forgetting that "the schoolmaster has been abroad," within the last forty years, during which opinion has made the progress of centuries. The notion, that "the inhabitants of towns contribute little or nothing to their own maintenance," and so should sing dumb, is worthy of the Duke of Buckingham. Do the agriculturists maintain them? In like manner the Chartists are silenced by the fag-end of a forgotten speech made by Fox shortly after he had entered Parliament; but are not the speeches of Pitt and the Duke of Richmond, in the support of the most sweeping Parliamentary reform, of equal authority?

The concluding chapter, "A Night in the House of Commons, would have made a crack magazine article in this present month, or any other of the present session. It is a dialogue between one who may be presumed a clever Parliamentary reporter, and a member of either the Reform, or the Carlton Club—for he is wonderfully impartial in his portraiture—and a friend, whom he instructs in the gossip of the lobby and the reporters' gallery, while he points out, in a lively way, the more remarkable members of the House, with a slight leaning to the Tories, sometimes, however, neutralized by the temptation of making a hit. The remarks on Lord Brougham, like some of those on Bentham and his disciples, ought to excite our gratitude. We might have been in danger of thinking too highly of our author. We are furnished with the measure of the man's intellectual stature,—the plummet-line to his depth,—who can see no failing or falling off in the Great Duke, or blemish in the Chancellor, Lyndhurst, while he talks so unceremoniously of Lord Brougham,—admitting that his criticisms were as just as they are inapplicable. If Brougham be not the man that he was in the House of Commons, it is not his fault that the House of Peers is not a House of Representatives; and what would that House have been, for years back, had not that one man been in it, to give its proceedings some interest, and some dignity?

It is to be observed, that our author's sketches of character deal chiefly in superficies, and that he holds a breach of conventional usage, or the mispronunciation of a word, as heinous an offence in a member of Parliament, as a misstatement, a misrepresentation, or the employment of a mischevious fallacy; and finds a political adventurer more tolerable than a bore. If the character of its public men be the best property of a nation, what shall we say of the writer who would attempt to hold up to ridicule, for petty blunders,—admitting them to have been made,—one of the best intentioned, and most honest, disinterested, and useful men, that ever, year after year, watched over the people's interests, or sat in the House of Representatives?—Joseph Hume. What should we think of the man who, in O'Connell, could find nothing so distinguishing as his Munster brogue? This is vile,—nay, worse, it is paltry. Mere manner is of far too much relative consideration in our aristocratic National Assembly, and is all in all with its superficial observers. The writer is certainly not to be classed with these; but the nature of his light sketches does not admit of any careful or profound analysis of individual character; and when he cannot get at the man, he rests content with his dress, appearance, blunders, and style. It is but justice to cull a few specimens from what, though far from being the best, will probably be the most popular, as it is the most entertaining, chapter of his work. And first, for the hero,—

What time does Peel come down to the House?

Generally about five o'clock; he is very punctual. He will be here immediately. Oh, there he is, with papers in his hand; I suppose the copy of some newly-concluded commercial treaty. You will see him stand at the bar to catch the Speaker's eye, when, of course, he has not long to wait; though, if other matters are in the way, he must take his turn. Hark!

"Sir Robert Peel!"

"Papers, Sir, by command of Her Majesty."

"Bring them up."

There, now, he is "bringing them up."

Does it not strike you, as he moves up the floor of the House, that there is a sort of mauvaise honte about him?—a thing that surprises me, considering his rather handsome person, address, and long usage of the House of Commons.

Yes, but though reputed such a peculiarly cool, cautious man, he is, in temperament, very sensitive, and keenly alive to all the proprieties of morals and of manners. You see he is a florid man—sanguineous; and such men are frequently very attentive to externals, while "black," or "bilious" men, though just as full of SELF, are more apt to neglect manner, in their deeper meditation of matter.

How old is Peel?

He approaches his fifty-fifth year, and, as you may perceive, is in the bloom of health, as well as the prime of life.

Do you know anything of his domestic life—of Lady Peel, who she is, and what she is?

Not a bit; and if I had heard anything I would not repeat it. Ladies' maids, chambermaids, and footmen are the very worst appreciators of character; so far from being able to see below the surface, they do not even see the surface; and a man so quiet in his domestic habits as Sir Robert Peel can only be known through a medium which it would foul a man to penetrate. As for Lady Peel, I only know what everybody knows—that she is the daughter of General Sir John Floyd; that he was married to her in 1820; that she is a quiet, unobtrusive lady; and said to be doatingly fond of her husband and her family.

As for Sir Robert's oratory, what do you think of that?

It depends on your estimate and definition of oratory. As a speaker, Sir Robert Peel has no rival in the House of Commons.

Why, what do you mean? I understand by an orator, a man who can talk well.

No doubt, no doubt. But Sir Robert Peel is not a Burke, nor a Fox, nor a Canning: his understanding, though not very capacious, is excellent; and though rather slow to appreciate and acknowledge principles, he is not capable of doggedly persevering in a course against which his intellect protests. His eloquence is therefore a reflection of his character. His mind is not deep-toned, his oratory is not electric, he clothes no principles in burning words, emits no "living thunders," imprints no ineffaceable recollections. Yet he is really an admirable and accomplished public speaker—as such, unrivalled in the present House. . . . . Sir Robert Peel knows that he is a capital speaker, and, like a good singer, has no objection to a display. His tact and prudence restrain him from being unnecessarily intrusive; yet, if he could, he would reserve all the ministerial talking to himself. He enjoys the sensation of having to make a speech of some four hours in length, on introducing some new measure, with the House crowded with listening members, the strangers' gallery crammed, and the public impatient; and very likely his enjoyment of such a sensation as this compensates, in some degree, for any mortification arising from his having to propose a measure which he may have formerly opposed. Next to this, he greatly enjoys having to reply to opponents who may have laid themselves open to fair retort, or even to a dexterous quibble, or an ingenious rhetorical perversion.

The further analysis, and the parallel, or rather contrast, between Peel and Sir Robert Walpole, we must leave to the reader, and call another figure.

Will you point out Lord Stanley to me?

He is not in the House. See, there he is, coming in, swinging his hat betwixt finger and thumb.

Why, I thought that Stanley was a little man—quite a boy in personal appearance.

You surely don't expect men to remain for ever the same. Edward Geoffrey Stanley is now forty-four years of age; a time of life when, if ever a man is going to become stout, he manifests it; and see, Stanley exhibits symptoms of a paunch. Besides, he is of an average stature; has more physique than his friend Lord John Russell, whose personal appearance, as you know, and may observe, is meagre.

His friend Lord John! What genuine friendship can subsist between political rivals, where one of them, especially, is so bitter and caustic in his application of skin-plasters? I am afraid it must be a hollow profession of words.

There you are mistaken. A very cordial sympathy still exists between Stanley and Russell; for Lord John is quite aware that nobody more regrets Stanley's impetuosity and petulance of temper than Stanley does himself—when the fit is over. On the occasion of the death of Lord John's first wife, and in the very heat of party warfare, Stanley wrote a letter to Lord John, full of kindly and affectionate sympathy; and on several occasions there has been a very cordial interchange of mutual regard.

What a pity, then, that Stanley, with so much real ability and genuine oratoric fire, should lower his standing as a statesman, by those occasional bursts of clever, energetic, indiscreet, passionate impetuosity, which render him as much the dread of friends as of foes!

Ah! he will cool, if he continue long in office. His natural temperament was excited and sharpened in opposition; and he was encouraged and flattered in his displays, because he is the very Picton of an assailing party in debate. In careless power, rapid yet easy flow of idea and of utterance, and in severe, almost savage retort, Stanley has no equal in the House: Brougham, in his best days, would have overtopped him, but there is no Brougham in the present House of Commons.

This last is an honest admission. Our sketcher next handles Lord John Russell, and hopes for a coalition—for an adhesion—between those worthy scions of two most illustrious houses.

Now that many great questions have been settled, I cannot reconcile myself to the idea, that because the Whigs are out, and the Tories are in, therefore such a man as Lord John Russell is to be for ever excluded from office, in a ministry where he could sit beside his friend Stanley, and his old colleague Graham. . . . . Talking of Graham, show me Sir James Mackintosh's "manly puppy."

There he is, sitting beside Peel. Sir James Robert George Graham is of the same age as Lord John Russell, both having been born in '92; but you see the bright sword of Netherby is big enough and tall enough to put Lord John in his scabbard.

Graham has oscillated too violently between extremes for my taste.

No doubt of it; and Lord John, in his quiet way, very effectually "pitched it into him" not long ago, when he reminded him of his denunciations of "the birds of prey," the recipients of the public money, while he, Lord John, who had started in public life "a moderate reformer," was "a moderate reformer still." It is curious to see Graham on these occasions, or when he is pelted with quotations from his "Corn and Currency:" at times he blushes a little; an "innocent confusion" occasionally mantles on his cheek; but generally speaking, he laughs as hearty as the rest, and seems to think it capital fun.

Does not that manifest a deficiency in the nice sense of honour?

Well, well: let "sleeping dogs lie;" for "to err is human, to forgive divine." Graham abandoned his colleagues and his party, and did not treat them with scrupulous care after he left them. But they say that the old hare returns at last to the old form; his father was a Tory. But let justice be done to Sir James Graham. He is a man of real ability; and now that he is in office, he retains and maintains some of his old opinions with manliness and consistency. By the way, there is the rising hope of the Conservatives, and Peel's right arm—William Ewart Gladstone, Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and Master of the Mint.

That young man!—what a disappointment! In person he is of a good stature, and, like Stanley, has a pretty, good-natured, rather pouting mouth, while the upper part of the face, like Stanley's, has a "knitted," if not a frowning aspect. But what disappoints me most is the smallness of the head. Under Stanley's careless locks, you can see hidden a good solid mass of forehead: but this noted young man—this philosophic worker-out of Church principles—I want for him capacious skull and breadth of face. Can such a small head carry all he knows?

We must take men as they are, and not as we imagine them. The head is small, but it is well shaped. You notice that the upper part of the face rather expresses severity; and I am told that old Gladstone, and the family generally, have been noted in Liverpool for what is called a "crusty" temperament. If this be so, and this young man inherits it, he is an example of the power of principle, for he seems to have his temper singularly under control. . . . . Old Gladstone has risen into great wealth from poverty, has he not?

Yes; the Gladstone family, like the Peel family, furnish evidence of the power of our trade and commerce to throw up individuals from the bottom of society, to disport themselves, like Leviathan, on the surface. Old Gladstone made his money in Liverpool, as Morrison, the member for Inverness, made his huge fortune in London. . . . . Talking of foppery—is not Palmerston a fop? inquires the friend.

Tut, one has no patience with these vulgar ideas of people, which vulgar fools propagate. Certainly "Fanny was younger once than she is now;" and time works changes. But look at Palmerston, sitting on those front benches; you see all the signs of a man of high breeding, but foppery there is none.

Is it not singular that Palmerston and Peel should now be pitted as rivals?

It is, rather; but remember, though Palmerston and Peel commenced public life together, Palmerston was in advance of Peel on such questions as Catholic Emancipation and Parliamentary Reform. Palmerston is four years older than Peel, being now fifty-nine. But he seems in excellent keeping; his vigour, mental and bodily, appears unimpaired—what a fine-looking man he is!

But is he really a man of talent?

The question is superfluous. His family—the Temple family—has a hereditary reputation for ability; and Palmerston does not belie it. To be sure, his opponents say, as Melbourne said of Lyndhurst, that his talents are from God, but the application of them is from the devil! And that reminds me of D'Israeli. Do you see that tall, rather thin young man, (hardly young now,) with Jewish cast of features, dark countenance, and heavy, full, swimming eyes, bent either in meditation or on vacancy—gazing downwards to discover the perforations in the floor? That's young Ben D'Israeli, the son of old D'Israeli, and as great a "Curiosity of Literature" as his father ever produced. Some time ago he took to the foreign line, wanted to overhaul all our Consular Establishments, and thought he would make a palpable hit, by finding Palmerston, like the devil, in every mischief brewing abroad. Ben is really clever—a genius; but somehow Sir Robert Peel and the party have not taken to him.

With such youngsters (comparative) as D'Israeli and Emerson Tennant, this de haut en bas style is just tolerable; with such men as Hume, it is as low in moral feeling as execrable in taste.——But we must not dwell on blemishes, which, though ugly, are few; for our author is, on the whole, tolerably good-natured. Here is a fat man ready for comedy, with appropriate pendants:—

If you want a "fat" man, in the sense, not of mere fleshy grossness, but of genuine jollity, look here: that is Humphery, the present Lord Mayor of London. He was a standing dish of enjoyment during the dry discussions on the Tariff; and never failed to raise a fund of merriment by his affectionate solicitude on behalf of turbot and lobsters. Then, too, there was his pronunciation of the word "Fish"—which seemed to swim in melted butter in his mouth.

Behold another combination of contrasts—Sibthorp and Muntz—the one with his whiskers and moustachios; his "documents," of which his hands are generally full; and his jewellery, with which he sparkles: the other with a beard like Aaron's, trousers like tunnels, and a stick that would fell an ox. There is much shrewdness under the beard of Muntz, and not a little candour, too: if he were shaved, and dressed like other men, he might not set the Thames on fire, but he would cease to be an oddity.

Here is another brace :—

See, Duncombe and Wakley, the Finsbury members, are together. Both notable men; neither fools nor idiots; each knows a hawk from a hand-saw; and both are racy, piquant speakers. How Tommy Duncombe, with his aristocratic associations, came to be the representative of extreme democratic opinions, is best known to himself. He has not only the reputation of being, but he really is, "a very gentlemanly fellow;" and with that reputation, he is not only tolerated, but laughed with, in the utterance of severe things. His cool avowal of the "bribery and corruption" which he had practised at Pontefract and Hertford, and his challenge to all "who were without sin to cast the first stone," were amongst the richest things of last session; quite a new and improved edition of the Dublin basket-woman—"I know I am a rogue and a thief, but barring all that, I defy you to say black is the white of my eye!" Here is Roebuck, too; a clever little wasp, but who acquired decided reputation for temper, in his management of the inquiry into those cases of compromise and bribery which made so much noise—much cry and little wool!

Beyond is that clever, gentlemanly young fellow, Milner Gibson, who labours under the disadvantage of having changed sides, but will "rise," if he takes care of himself; and walking out of the House is very tall Charles Buller, "so witty and so thin," he who went out to Canada with the late Earl Durham. Contrast with him little Sheil, in whose veins mercury still dances, and who can still scream out an electrical and rhetorical speech, in which the oddity of manner is as remarkable as the style is startling. Not so O'Connell, in whose huge trunk the fire seems gradually burning out; while Sir John Cam Hobhouse seems destined to live on his past reputation. What Macaulay may hereafter be, is in the book of fate; he gets remarkably stout, and has the air of an overgrown schoolboy: but Macaulay is a genius, and ought to leave a reputation behind him. Monckton Milnes is not a Macaulay, but he has a very pretty poetical taste—I mean that young man down there, with his black hair combed in one direction, and who, when he speaks, talks as if he had liquorice in his mouth. Oh! mentioning poets and geniuses, there is Lord Francis Egerton,—that tall, unobtrusive man,—as amiable as he is rich, and as sensitively kind in his temper as he is wealthy and great. He is the brother of the Whig Duke of Sutherland, but is himself a moderate Tory. You know he translated the "Faust" of Goëthe, and, like Pope with Homer, contrived to make his original very pretty, very melodious, besides stripping him of some of his impiety, and some of his indecency. He exchanged his paternal surname of Leveson Gower for that of his maternal kinsman, the celebrated Duke of Bridgewater, whose great canal property he inherits.

Do you observe that dandified personage passing along the gallery, who appears to be on the debatable ground between youth and age; his hair or his wig frizzled to "the very top of its bent," and with what appear to be gold spectacles on his nose? That is Emerson Tennant, the Belfast member, and one of the secretaries of the Board of Control—a clever man, but disfigured by literary foppery.

Mr. Escott is a man of some mark at present, as men go, and not so well-known as most of the other members of the House, who are at all spoken about.

Observe this man now "on his legs."

That, I should say, is a "dangerous" fellow! With his dark complexion, the harshly-solemn tones of his voice, and his somewhat appalling manner, one might think that the end of the world was come. Who is he?

Escott, the Duke of Buckingham's own man, and therefore an ultra-Tory. He is one of the members for Winchester. Yet, considering his position in relation to the Duke of Buckingham, for whom I believe he is agent, he has proved himself not only clever, but singularly honest. I do believe that if there were more Escotts in the House of Commons, it would be a great deal better for the country. He looks at subjects for himself, and would not sacrifice his convictions to any party interest whatever. By the way, though his whole aspect shows that he is no professional "joker of jokes," he split a good-humoured thing on the somewhat corpulent body of Mark Philips, the member for Manchester, which was as good-humouredly taken as given. It was in committee on the Railways Regulations Bill, and the subject was the locking the doors of carriages, and how people could best get out of an overturned one. Escott glanced at Mark Philips' rather portly frame—for he is a somewhat fine specimen of a Manchester man; and Mark repaid the allusion by telling how he was overturned in a stage-coach, and had employed the interval of prostration by proposing to sundry ladies and gentlemen who lay atop of him, that they should "toss up" for first chance of getting out.

Here is another Manchester man :—

Cobden I don't see—oh, yes, that pale-faced Manchester-looking man sitting beside Villiers.

What is, and what was Cobden?

Don't exactly know. I have been informed that he describes himself as having been born a Sussex clawbacon, and I suppose went, or was carried in infancy, to Lancashire. At all events, he has risen by industrious energy: his print-works at Chorley are large, and the firm has paid as much as £20,000 a-year in wages.

Cobden would have been nothing, I suppose, but for this Anti-Corn-Law agitation?

No man is anything without circumstances. But Cobden's talent has been developed by the agitation; and considering that he had deficiencies to overcome, and difficulties to encounter, it must be admitted that he has shot upwards into notoriety with extraordinary rapidity. Some say that he is but a man of one idea. It is a mistake: Cobden is really a man of great talent, energy, and tact; though, of course, it has been by means of his one idea at the critical time that he has become, in the compass of a year and a half, a noted public character.

Is he in earnest in his agitation against the Corn-laws?

Ay, ay; that is the secret of success. Right or wrong, a man must be in earnest.

The very unheroic appearance of some great heroes, in the eyes of those who judge by the mere physique,—as at a first glance we are all too apt to do,—is proved by this, not incorrect, sketch of a naval hero :—

Look here—do you see that man crossing the floor?

Is it that little, square-built, short-necked, and somewhat bull-headed man who limps as he walks?

The same. It is "the old Commodore," the redoubted Sir Charles Napier.

How men do disappoint one so! Why, the bombarder of St. Jean d'Acre, he who ran over the tops of houses and called to the Turks to "shake a reef out of their trousers," I took to be a very different looking man!"

Yet if you observe Sir Charles, you will see that his weather-beaten frame ("hull" I suppose I should say) exhibits the determined and fearless tar: he carries a light at his figure-head. He has taken the state of the navy under his particular care, and you will shortly hear him, in his broad Scotch, asking "the right honourable birronet" a question about it. His blunt naïveté is exceedingly amusing; and he never fails to raise a roar of laughter when he enlightens the House on such subjects as the inconveniences which a ship may suffer when troubled with "a foul-wind."

In some of the above sketches, the writer is ill-informed on points of fact; but they are clever, not very ill-natured, and withal inferior, as well as different in character from the rest of his able work.

SPECIMENS OF THE MODERN FRENCH AND GERMAN POETS.

THE TRICOLOR.

Le Vieux Drapeau. Béranger. 1830.

My friends in many a field of fame
Again around me lately came;
Drunk with the mutual tales we told,
Our wine recalled the days of old.
Proud of my exploits, and of theirs,
I keep my flag amidst my cares:
When shall I shake the dust away,
Its glorious colours when display?

Concealed beneath the straw it lies,
Where, poor and maimed, I close my eyes;
The flag which, sure of victory, flew
From field to field, years twenty through,
The flag, with wreaths and laurels crowned,
Which flashed its light all Europe round;
When shall I shake the dust away,
Its glorious colours when display?

Nobly that flag requited France
The blood she poured beneath its glance;
While nursed by Freedom as they lay,
Our children with its staff would play;
May it again to despots show
How little fame can birth bestow:
When shall I shake the dust away,
Its glorious colours when display?

Low in the dust its eagle lies,
Wearied with distant victories;
Instead the Gallic cock restore,
Which launched its thunderbolts of yore;
Then France, no longer doomed to pine,
Haughty and free, shall bless the sign.
When shall I shake the dust away,
Its glorious colours when display?

With toils of conquest spent and worn,
To guard our charter 'twill be borne.
Our soldiers, wont with it to roam,
Became true citizens at home.
Alone our sorrows it can hide;
On all the frontier fling it wide.
When shall I shake the dust away,
Its glorious colours when display?

Amidst my arms, at hand, 'tis there;
Once more unfold it let us dare.'
Come forth my flag, my hope, my pride!
By thee my tears shall soon be dried;
Yes, Heaven a soldier's prayer will hear,
When strengthened by a soldier's tear;
And I shall shake the dust away,
Thy glorious colours shall display. W*.

THE SONG OF THE COSSACK.

[From Beranger.]

"My courser, come, the Cossack's noble friend—
Hark! 'tis the signal of the trumpet's breath:
Thine aid to tyrants and to slaughter lend,
And haste with me to add new wings to death.
I have no gold to deck thy bridle rein;
But thou wilt neigh with pride, my courser fleet,
When I for thee Old Europe's wealth will gain—
When Kings and People crouch beneath thy feet.

"Fair Peace before thy withering steps shall fall:
Come fill my greedy hands with treasures free:
Europe has lost her Polish ramparts tall,
Within the 'Louvre I will stable thee.'
Where thou in foam and gore hast bathed thy side,
Now thou wilt neigh with pride, my courser fleet,
When thou shalt drink the Seine's rebellious tide—
While Kings and People crouch beneath thy feet.

"As in a fortress, princes, nobles, peers—
Besieged by suffering subjects all around—
'Mid northern wilds their cry the Cossack hears:
Come, be our master, we to thee are bound,
As serfs for ever to thy savage hordes:
But crush our People, let us reign their Lords.
Then neigh with pride, my courser fleet,
See, Kings and People crouch beneath thy feet.

"I saw the Shadow of the mighty Hun
Fix on our tents an eye of scorching light.
Once more, he cried, I see my reign begun.
To lands, by freedom named, with vineyards bright,
His spirit calls, and leads us to the west.
Then neigh with pride, my courser fleet,
For now on France Attila's scourge shall rest—
Her Kings and People lie beneath thy feet.

"All the refinement Europe proudly boasts,
The immortal records of the mighty dead,
The light of other lands, behold the Calmuck host
Trample beneath their savage warrior's tread.
When thus shall fall fair Freedom's cause,
Then thou wilt neigh with pride, my courser fleet,
When temples, altars, glory, 'learning,' laws—
When all that men hold sacred lies beneath thy feet."

THE MIDNIGHT REVIEW.

[From the German of Baron Zettlitz.]

At the dead mid-hour of night
The drummer leaves the tomb:
Hark, through the air, how faint and hoarse
The drum's deep sound doth boom!

See, with his fleshless, bony arms,
How he beats the dread tatoo;
Hear how he sounds the wild reveille
As he marchs to and fro.

Louder and louder beats the drum,
But hollow its fearful tone;
The veterans stern, from the darksome grave,
Silent arise each one.

And far from the utmost north,
From their frozen tombs of snow;
And far from the utmost south,
Where the scorching hot-winds blow;

From the banks of the slimy Nile,
From Araby's parched-up sand,
The Dead arise, a ghastly crew,
Their weapons in their hand.

And hark! at the dead of night,
The bugle strikes the ear,
And the trumpeter leaves the darksome grave,
And far he rides, and near.

And see, on their phantom-horses borne,
From each side how the horsemen pour!
How the squadrons ride with their weapons bare,
And their forms begrim'd with gore!

And the sun-bleach'd skulls grin grimly forth
From under the helmet's shade;
And the sapless skeleton hands, on high
Hold each a glittering blade.

And now at the dead twelfth hour of night
The Captain leaves the tomb;
With his staff around on shadowy steeds,
Silent and slow they come.

Silent and slowly the Captain comes,
In simple garb array'd;
And down from his side, by his saddle bow,
There hangs a quivering blade.

The sickly moon's pale yellow light
Illumes the plains below;
And the spectral form of the chief looks on
As the phantoms come and go.

And now the lines present their arms,
And now their arms they ground,
And new salute, and the echoes hoarse
The hollow stroke rebound.

And Marshal's form, and General's shade,
Crowd round the Chief, and near,
And the Captain turns to the nearest form,
And breathes a word in his ear.

And the word runs through that shadowy throng,
And it speeds along the line;
And "FRANCE" that night was the watchword passed,
"HELENA" the countersign.

And thus does the Emperor's shadowy form
His phantom troops review;
At the midnight hour, in the fields of death,
Thus meets that deathlike crew. S.

CASSANDRA.

[From Schiller.]

BY BON GAULTIER.

Joy through Priam's halls was ringing,
Ere they sunk in Ruin's fires;
There are youths and maidens singing
To the touch of golden wires.
Hushed the din of strife and slaughter,
Tears on every cheek are dried,
For old Priam's lovely daughter
Shall be brave Pelides' bride.

And with garlands, and with dances,
Troop on troop, a festive throng,
To the stately fanes advances,
To the Thymbrian's shrine, with song.
Through the streets, in murmurs sweeping,
Revel's echoing tide is borne:
One sad heart alone is weeping
In its agony forlorn.

'Mong the joyful joyless only,
Does the pale Cassandra rove,
Sad, companionless and lonely,
To Apollo's laurel grove.
Deep amid the wood's recesses,
She, where shades fell darkly round,
Tore the fillets from her tresses,
Tore and dashed them on the ground.

"All around of joy is telling,
Every heart leaps with delight,
Hope my parents' breast is swelling,
And my sister's robes are bright.
I alone must weep—deluding
Bliss hath fled from me, and flies,
For I see winged Ruin brooding
O'er our walls with baleful eyes.

"See, a torch! I see it gleaming!
Ah, but not in Hymen's hand,
Heavenward high its light is streaming
Like no sacrificial brand.
Feasts I see in mirth providing,
But on my prophetic ear
Comes the rush of footsteps striding
On to crush the festal cheer.

"And they chide my lamentation,
Scorn my anguish. Far apart
Must I bear the desolation
Of a lone and wildered heart.
Happy faces turn and fly me,
Scoffed and spurned I move abroad,
Heavily hast thou dealt by me,
Pythian, thou cruel God!

"Why with sense prophetic blast me,
'Mid a blind unthinking race,
Wherefore, wherefore didst thou cast me,
To reveal thy darkened face?
Oh, to see, yet feel we may not
The impending stroke recall!
What is fated will delay not,
What is dreaded must befall!

"Wherefore from a coming terror
Seek to lift the veil! The breath
Of human life is nought but error,
Knowledge bears the cup of death.
Take, oh take the vision gory
From my purgèd eyes! To be
The mortal vessel of thy glory,
Is a dreadful agony.

"Let my sense be darkened ever,
Make, oh make me blind again!
Since thy voice inspired me, never
Have I sung a joyful strain.
Thou hast given the future to me,
Yet thou took'st away the swift
Joys, that passing hours shot through me:
Take once more thy treacherous gift!

"Wreaths and bridal flowerets on my
Dusky hair did never shine,
Since I took thy vows upon me,
At thy melancholy shrine.
Youth was one long sigh of anguish,
And I never knew but woe;—
Did a heart I loved but languish,
My heart quivered with the blow.

"My companions all—they grieve not:
Youth and love have made them glad,—
Fired with hopes, they dream, deceive not.
My heart—mine alone! is sad.
Not for me Spring opes her treasure,
Robes the smiling earth with flowers;
Never soul in life had pleasure,
That could scan its deeper powers.

"Blest is Polixena, in her
Heart's intoxication blind,
For Achilles soon within her
Bridal clasp she hopes to find.
Proud her heart swells to the vision:
All the world but him forgot!
You, ye Gods, your dreams Elysian,
In her trance, she envies not.

"And I, too, have view'd, adoring,
Him my heart hath made its choice,—
Seen his bright eyes, rapt imploring,—
Heard his love-inspiring voice.
Oh! with him I'd go—how lightly!
In his home a wife to be!
But a Stygian shadow, nightly,
Steps between my love and me.

"Proserpine, to mock and spurn me,
Sends her phantoms of affright:
Wheresoe'er I go, or turn me,
Shadows, shadows, throng my sight.
Where the young, in measures sprightly,
Sport the sunny hours away,
There they be—a crew unsightly!
Oh! I never can be gay.

"And I see the red knife streaming,
And the assassin's fiery eye!
Right and left I see it gleaming,—
I can not the terror fly!
No! I dare not blench. Unbending,
I must look it in the face:
Meet the fate I see descending—
Perish 'mid a stranger race!"

Pouring thus her griefs, unfailing—
Hark! a cry from yonder fane
Fills the air—a cry of wailing—
Thetis' mighty son is slain!
Eris shakes her snaky tresses,—
Shrieking forth the gods are gone,—
And the low'ring thunder presses
Darkly over Ilion.

DRINKING SONG BEFORE A BATTLE.

[From Körner's "Lyre and Sword."]

The battle 's near!
But greet it shall our joyful band
With a loud, bold song for our German land:
Then, brother, hear!

Yes! pour the wine!
The trumpet's voice is rising shrill,
My life's last offering cup then fill—
Brother, to mine!

Hear! God our Lord!
What we, the grave's dark portal near,
To Fatherland now deeply swear—
Brother, your sword!

Hear, Fatherland!
We will, from out thy burning chain,
Die, or thy soil set free again,
By oath, by hand!

The foe is up!
By Love, by Hope, by Vengeance tied—
Death! thou can'st not our band divide!
Brother! the cup!

Hark! rings the fray!
The trumpet's call is stern and high—
Forward! to live or bravely die!
Brothers, away! J.

DRINKING SONG.

[From the German of Blumäuer.]

Hist! Brothers, come hear me, old Time is a cup,
Which Fate to the brim for each toper fills up
With Gall, and with Water, and sometimes with Wine!
The Wine that but yesterday gladdened the soul,
To Water to-day yields its place in the bowl,
And Gall may be there when the morrow shall shine!

What matters! the wise man who drinketh will stand,
And seizing the goblet with dexterous hand,
Will throw a quick glance in its cavity first.
If golden it gleameth, why, then, let him drink
A deep, hasty draught of the liquor, and think
"To-morrow, perhaps, I shall not be athirst!"

And, therefore, it is, brother topers, I hold,
Fate at times fills her cup with her wine bright as gold,
And all who may wish it, to drink doth invite.
The Water, then, we till to-morrow will leave,
On yesterday's Gall we'll nor ponder nor grieve;
But the Wine, boys, the Wine! let us quaff it to-night!

THE HISTORY OF THE HAT.

[From the German of C. F. Gellert.]

The skilful man who did invent
The Hat, that useful ornament,
Were it at first all smooth and round,
By no projecting edges crowned;
And yet it was on such a plan,
All owned him a distinguished man.
He died at length, and his successor
Assumed the hat, its new possessor.

The heir bethought him that the hat
Was certainly too round and flat;
So, to improve it, sitting down,
He made two corners on its crown,
Then walked abroad, into the town;
Where all the people's wondering faces
Bespoke th' enchantment of its graces.
He also died, and his successor
Received the hat as next possessor.

The heir upon it thus descanted:
I see, says he, there's something wanted:—
Then, after pondering well upon it,
He raised another corner on it,
And each beholder wondering cried,
"This genius is his country's pride!"
He died, and then his next successor
Proclaimed himself the hat's possessor.

The hat was now no longer clean,
(And this, you'll grant, must needs have been:)
The heir was grieved this fact to find,
Yet, having an ingenious mind,
He dyed it black, with skill and care,
And all exclaimed: "What grace is there!
The black bespeaks a master-mind,
And leaves all rival hats behind."
He died, and, as the hat's possessor,
His will installed his next successor.

The willing heir takes home the prize,
But soon observes the incipient tatter;
He thinks and thinks, and tries and tries,
How he can rectify the matter:—
Then, after hard and frequent rubbing,
Hotpressing and redoubled scrubbing,
He binds the hat all neatly round,
And walks abroad, with air profound:—
"What see we here?" each townsman cries,
"A new hat!—Can we trust our eyes!—
O happy era! Error's sway
Now melts before the light of day,
And Genius, fraught with blessings rich,
Hath reached at last her highest pitch!"
But he too died, and his successor
Became forthwith the hat's possessor.

Discoveries, though long in finding,
Make the inventor's name renowned:—
The heir took off the former binding,
And girt the hat with laces round,
Fastening the whole upon a button;—
Then, at the glass, the hat he put on;
And all, transported out of measure,
Before it skipped with very pleasure,—
"What are the rest to him?" they cried,—
"Now every rival well may hide;
For this great Spirit's wondrous flame
Eclipses every other name,
And wins itself immortal fame!"
He also died, and his successor
Was duly named the hat's possessor;
And every time the newest fashion
Was kept by all, with care and caution.

What further happened with the hat—
My second Book will tell you that—
Each new possessor changed its mould;—
The hat itself continued old:—
In short,—this emblem suits my purpose nicely—
Its fate was like PHILOSOPHY'S precisely!

"THE PRAYER FOR ALL."

[From the "Priere pour Tous" of Victor Hugo.]

To prayer, my child! and O, be thy first prayer
For her who many nights, with anxious care,
Rock'd thy first cradle; who took thy infant soul
From heaven, and gave it to the world; then rife
With love, still drank herself the gall of life,
And left for thy young lips the honied bowl.

And then—I need it more—then pray for me!
For she is gentle, artless, true like thee;—
She has a guileless heart, brow placid, still;
Pity she has for all, envy for none;
Gentle and wise, she patiently lives on;
And she endures, nor knows who does the ill.

In culling flowers, her novice hand has ne'er
Touch'd e'en the outer rind of vice; no snare
With smiling show has lured her steps aside:
On her the past has left no staining mark;
Nor knows she aught of those bad thoughts which, dark,
Like shades on waters, o'er the spirit glide.

She knows not—nor mayest thou—the miseries
In which our spirits mingle; vanities,
Remorse, soul-gnawing cares, Pleasure's false show;
Passions which float upon the heart like foam,
Bitter remembrances which o'er us come,
And Shame's red spot spread sudden o'er the brow.

I know life better; when thou'rt older grown
I'll tell thee—it is needful to be known—
Of the pursuit of wealth—art, power; the cost—

That it is folly—nothingness :—that Shame
For Glory is oft thrown us in the game
Of Fortune's chances where the soul is lost.

The soul will change. Although of every thing
The cause and end be clear, yet wildering
We go through life, (of vice and error full.)
We wander as we go;—we feel the load
Of doubt; and to the briers upon the road
Man leaves his virtue, as a sheep its wool.

Then go, go pray for me! And as the prayer
Gushes in words, be this the form they bear :—
"Lord, Lord, our Father! God, my prayer attend.
Pardon—Thou art good! pardon—Thou art great!"
Let them go freely forth, fear not their fate!
Where thy soul sends them, thitherward they tend.

There's nothing here below which does not find
Its tendency. O'er plains the rivers wind,
And reach the sea; the bee, by instinct driven,
Finds out the honied flowers; the eagle flies
To seek the sun; the vulture where death lies;
The swallow to the spring; the prayer to heaven!

And when thy voice is raised to God for me,
I'm like the slave whom in the vale we see
Seated to rest, his heavy load laid by;
I feel refresh'd—the load of faults and woe
Which, groaning, I drag with me as I go,
Thy winged prayer bears off rejoicingly!

Pray for thy father! that his dreams be bright
With visitings of angel forms of light,
And his soul burn as incense flaming wide.
Let thy pure breath all his dark sins efface,
So that his heart be like that holy place,
An altar's pavement each eve purified!

THE CAPTIVE MAID.

[From the French of Victor Hugo.]

Oh! were I not a captive,
I would love this fair countrie;
Those fields with maize abounding,
This ever-plaintive sea:
I'd love those stars unnumbered,
If, passing in the shade,
Beneath our walls I saw not
The Spahi's sparkling blade.

I am no Tartar maiden,
That a eunuch black should tune
My sweet guitar, and hold to me
My glass in the saloon.
Far from these horrid places,
In our dear country we,
With our young men at evening,
May talk and wander free,

But still I love this climate,
Where never wintry breeze
Invades, with icy murmur,
These open lattices;
Where rain is warm in summer,
And the shining insect green,
Most like a living emerald,
Among the leaves is seen.

With her chapelles fair Smyrna—
A gay princess, is she:
Still, at her summons, round her
Unfading spring ye see.
And, as in beauteous vases,
Bright groups of flowers repose,
So, in her seas are lying
Her archipelagoes.

I love these tall red turrets;
These standards brave unrolled;
And, like an infant's playthings,
These houses decked with gold.
I love, for soothing reveries
In listless ease, a tent
Voluptuously swaying
Upon an elephant.

Here, in this fairy palace,
Full of all melodies,
Methinks I hear deep murmurs
That in the deserts rise;
Soft-mingling with the music
The Genii's voices pour,
Amid the air, unceasing,
Around us evermore.

I love the burning odours
This glowing country gives;
And, round each gilded lattice,
The trembling, wreathing leaves;
And, 'neath the bending palm-tree,
The greenly-gushing spring;
And, on the snow-white minaret,
The stork with snowy wing.

I love on mossy couch to sing
A Spanish roundelay,
And see my sweet companions,
Around commingling gay,—
A roving band, light-hearted,
In frolicsome array,—
Beneath the screening parasol,
Dance down the merry day.

But, more than all, enchanting
At night, it is to me
To sit, where winds are sighing,
Lone musing by the sea;
And, on its surface gazing,
To mark the moon so fair
Her silver fan out-spreading,
In trembling radiance there.

THE MANIAC.

[From the German of Heinrich Huttenbrenner.]

The wild winds roar through the fir trees tall,
The streamlets rush through the laughing vale,
I wander in haste, through forests and snow,
From height to height many miles I go.

Oh! shall not this dark life, 'midst valleys free,
Once more greet the sunlight joyously!
I turn from the vain thought with burning brain,
And rather seek winter's stern domain.

'Mid the green groves,
On the bright plains,
My heart her wild sorrow
Ever retains!
Though itself a rock,
Still life doth bloom:
Alas! one heart is
Closed like the tomb.

O Love! O Love! thou tyrant high,
Thou drawest thy memories from earth and sky;
The birds sing thy joys on their azure way,
And the streams tell thy sorrows moaningly.

Oh, let me wander
'Mid pathways wild,
Of howling winds;
The sad, strange child.
O Spring's glad brightness! O flowers' young light!
Must ne'er thy beauty this sick heart delight!

ERLAF LAKE.

[From the German of Heinrich Huttenbrenner.]

I am so glad, so sad,
On quiet Erlaf Lake!
I am so glad, so sad,
On quiet Erlaf Lake.

Holiest silence in the pine groves,
Motionless Heaven's azure space,
Only clouds their shadow flinging
O'er the beauty of her face.

Joyous winds are murmuring gently
Brightest waves o'er;
And the great sun's golden circlet
Palely gleams there.

I am so glad, so sad,
On quiet Erlaf Lake!
I am so glad, so sad,
On quiet Erlaf Lake.

SEHNSUCHT.

[From Schiller.]

Ah! from the depth of this dark glen,
By yon dismal cloud oppress,
Could I but a passage gain,
Ah, how should I be blest!
There I see a lovely land,
Ever fresh and ever fair!
Had I wings at my command,
Soon should I be hovering there.

Melodies around me ring,
Sweeter than heaven's rest can be,
And the gentle breezes bring
Fragrance on their wings to me.
Golden coloured fruits are glowing,
Nodding midst the leafy boughs,
And the flowers, that there are blowing,
Feel no winter's chilling snows.

Ah, how sweet to stray at will
There in sunshine ever free,
And the air of every hill,
O how balmy must it be!
But that mighty river's force,
As it dashes roaring past,
With it's billows, dark and hoarse,
Makes my very soul aghast.

Lo! a boat rides by the shore,
But, alas! no helmsman 's there.
Boldly enter, doubt no more!
See its sails have caught the air.
Firm in faith and courage be,
For no gods will stretch a hand;
Wonders only can bring thee
To that lovely wondrous land. S.

THE GRAVE.

[From the German of Von Galis.]

The grave is deep, and stern, and still,
And terrors round its margin stand;
It with a veil of darkness hides
The Undiscovered Land.

A silent realm, where never sounds
The voice of bird in flowing song;
There friendship's roses fallen away,
Are strewed in dust along.

The bride bereaved may mourn in vain,
And wring her hands in deep despair;
Loud may the cry of orphans be—
No sorrow reacheth there!

Yet weary hearts that here below
Have struggled with the storms of life,
Long for its everlasting Peace,
Untroubled more with strife.

For to us in no other place
That welcome, looked-for rest can come;
And only through that Portal dark
Man goeth to his Home. J.

TEXIANA.

RIDES, RAMBLES, AND SKETCHES IN TEXAS.

BY CHARLES HOOTON, AUTHOR OF "COLIN CLINK," "BILBERRY THURLAND," &c., &c.

How natural is the propensity in man to seek for El Dorados, Happy Lands, wild Gardens of Eden,—where flowers grow without cultivation,—where beasts of chase are not monopolized by the arm of aristocratic power,—where governments are as liberal as the air,—where labour reaps its own results,—and lastly, and above all else, where a man's back is not exactly either broken or very badly humped by too heavy a load of that most solid and dense of all known substances, commonly recognised under the name of taxation! Poets, happy race! have the faculty of manufacturing their own Paradises at home, without encountering sea-sickness, and all the perils of the great deep, before arriving at them. They can see happiness in the landscape of a murky London street; and, by an alchemy more abstruse and subtle than was that of Roger Bacon, convert a garret into a garden, a wash-basin into a flower-pot, and the dirty dimity of a bedstead into the Tyrian purple drawn around some beautiful ideal Paphian queen.

Ordinary people, however, are compelled, in the course of their search after a blissful seat on earth, to go another, and quite a different way to work. The dirty lanes of mere matter-of-fact must be gone through,—the mire of pure animal misery must be trampled in, until both body and mind are almost brought to a stand-still; and long and heavy must be the labour before the garden-wilderness smiles as it ought to do, and enables the labourer therein to laugh outright, as he ought to do, from very joy at his changed condition. To speak individually, from my very youth upwards, I had a strong desire, one day or another, to squeeze myself through the gate of some one or other of these—(next to Heaven itself)—most-to-be-desired places. It so happened, however, that up to the year of grace 1840, I contented myself with thinking about it, and abiding my appointed time.

At the latter end of December of that eventful year, after having carefully weighed in the balance the respective merits of different paradisaical parts of the earth, including New Zealand, and Australia, (the present prison, alas! of my friend Richard Howitt,) I finally made up my mind to go to Texas. The very name of Mexico, with its marvellous associations,—its Montezumas, its magnificent vegetation, its old renown in the romance of American history, ever threw out attractions to my imagination. To add to them, the various books and pamphlets written upon that country, which happened to fall into my hands, contributed a golden store of almost unalloyed "sweet promise;" while the political relations of the young republic so exactly coincided with all my preconceived notions of governmental purity and integrity, that it is no wonder the seal was at once and conclusively affixed to the bond of my determination to depart forthwith. Accordingly, after much delay and trouble, occasioned by the unprincipled conduct of the ship-brokers, we left the London Docks on the 28th of December 1840, with twenty-one adult passengers, male and female, and eight or ten children. Although our voyage was not without its curious incident and interest, I shall not linger over its description in this place, but proceed at once to relate in what manner we first touched upon the Texan shore. About half-past six o'clock in the evening of the 25th of March, many of the passengers being on deck for the benefit of the air, unsuspicious, and wrapped in the conscious security of having passed the great deep unharmed,—with the suddenness of a falling thunderbolt, the ship struck upon the bottom. The shock made her shiver from head to stern, like a leaf in the wind, or a creature alive that has received its death-blow, and trembles nervously before it falls. For a moment or two, every soul was dumb. The water heaved and swelled around us; and, as the waves passed on and left the vessel to sink again, crash we came again upon the bottom,—and again, and again. And then followed shrieking of women and children, and weeping and praying, shouting and swearing, and hurrying half unconsciously and desperately to and fro. Many of the sailors,—men of courage and desperate daring on any or all other occasions, now seemed to lose all confidence; and, with the loss of confidence, all power. While the captain (who happened to be below when the vessel first struck) rushed instantly up the stairs, and, in an agony of terror, ran about the deck, crying "The Lord preserve us!"—"God Almighty have mercy upon us!" and using other expressions of a similar nature; but which, of course, carried little comfort to the already hopeless hearts of the females, and the more timid of the stronger sex. Twilight was drawing on. That sun, half under the horizon, was gazed on tearfully by many wild eyes as the last sun they would ever see; while the very soul seemed to sink at the dread consciousness that night and an undug and tombless grave were closing over us for ever. During this time, the ship was put upon many various tacks, in order to try in what direction we could make our escape from the shoal. At length she again floated, and we steered direct from land and towards the open part of the Gulf of Mexico. So close upon the tropics, day and night are almost as distinct, and as abrupt in their distinctness, as dark and light painted close together on a board. There is little blending of the two together,—almost nothing of that warm, dreamy, and angelic twilight which, in more northern climates, gives to romance one half its ideality, and to love one of its deepest fascinations. Darkness fell, and fear became more fearful than before. The deck was crowded with anxious but invisible faces, and all ears were strained to catch the tidings minute by minute communicated in a musical melancholy tone by the seaman at the lead, as he sung out, with each haul of the sounding-line, "Quarter less two!"—"Deep two!"—"Half quarter two!" and the like. If we gained a quarter of a fathom, there arose beneath that dark canopy of sky a general and very heart-felt "Thank God for that!" in which even the old skipper himself was not too heroic to join. The pumps were tried, and, to our surprise as well as gratification, found not to have more water than before. The old ship had clearly sprung no leak. About two o'clock in the morning, however, the man at the helm discovered, for the first time, that the vessel refused to obey her rudder, and declared his conviction that we had lost it when we struck, and had been sailing all night without one, or rather, perhaps, it may be said, under the especial guidance of the stump thereof only.

Within a short time afterwards, the anchor was dropped, and early after daylight on the following morning, what remained of the helm was unshipped, when it was discovered that the post was snapped asunder, and the whole of the rudder part had been carried away.

All hands on board (passengers included) were now busily employed in manufacturing a new helm out of three spars rough from the forest, and a few old planks which luckily chanced to be on board. These were lashed together and nailed as well as circumstances and the rude nature of the materials would permit; while, in order to give this poor substitute for a rudder the requisite ponderosity in the water, a quantity of broken flints, brought from Ramsgate by way of ballast, was inserted into the interstices between the boards on either side. When finished and shipped, it was calculated to last, with moderate weather, about three days at farthest; while hard weather and a rough sea would, in all probability, have carried it off in as many hours. To increase the delights of our situation, it was now discovered, on examination, that but fifty gallons of water remained, while there were above forty souls on board. The victuals also ran short, partly in consequence of the unusual length of our passage, but much more in consequence of the vessel having, in the first instance, been despatched from London upon such rigidly-economical principles that she might more aptly have been regarded in the light of a sort of floating parish workhouse, than a vessel carrying such a number of human beings and bound upon a voyage of rather precarious duration in point of time. This, indeed, is a point upon which emigrants (of the poorer classes especially) to any part of the world, generally find themselves most miserably misled and deceived. To find it out, however, only when in "blue water," is too late for the application of any remedy:—patience and endurance are the most available virtues during the remainder of the passage. Perhaps on some future occasion I may give, for the especial benefit of the thousands of emigrants who annually leave our shores, such an insight into the system pursued by "passenger-brokers" in our sea-ports, as cannot fail at least to be highly useful to them, even if it answer not the higher purpose of assisting in the correction of a deeply gross and infamous, though too little understood, abuse.

Not to prolong the story of this our first misfortune, let it suffice the reader to be informed that, after two other days blind sailing in fog and mist, which rendered the sun invisible, so that no observation could be taken, we anchored again on the night of Saturday, March 27, intending to remain there until the return of daylight, and perhaps clearer weather, should enable us the better to ascertain our actual position. About midnight, however, the wind rose, until it blew almost a hurricane, and the sea rolled in magnificent and lengthened billows, until our old ship pitched, head and stern, as though about to dive endways into the sand below, and reeled from side to side so deeply, as to threaten, every instant, to lie down like a too exhausted and toil-worn thing to struggle for liberty any longer. At the same time, her timbers trembled and shrieked with the prodigious strain upon them, and she tugged madly at the chain cable, by which her anchor held us to the place, as might some infuriated and unmanageable wild beast at the lashings that fix him to the ground. About half-past three, the morning being pitch dark, the cable snapped suddenly in two, and we drifted rapidly towards the land and those formidable breakers which everlastingly dash with such impetuous violence upon the whole shelving coast of the Gulf of Mexico. In this second emergency, the pusillanimity of our captain evinced itself in the same manner as before. He appeared half bewildered, and as though he now finally gave us up for lost. But, by the combined exertions of all on board, a second anchor was soon slipped, and the vessel was brought-to in about five fathoms water. When daylight at length broke, the sky seemed still almost as heavy and black as night; and the "ground-swell," the result of the preceding storm, was absolutely fearful to look upon. Signals of distress were now hoisted; but, owing to the fog which enveloped the land, were not seen until late in the day. About four o'clock P.M., the pilot-boat, which had long been seen approaching, reached us, and on the same night we anchored just outside that shifting sand-bar which renders the harbour of Galveston so difficult to enter; and, in the opinion of many men much better qualified to judge correctly in this matter than myself, will ever prevent this, the most favourable port on the whole Texan sea-board, from becoming a place of any really extensive maritime commerce. This sand-bank, or "bar," proved to be the same upon which we had struck four days previously, our vessel at that time drawing only nine feet water. Statements have repeatedly been made, calculated to lead to much misconception on this subject, and to direct that spirit of enterprise towards Texas, and on the part of inexperienced and far-off individuals, which eventually resulted in partial if not entire disappointment and disaster. It has been said, that in certain tides, sixteen feet of water are upon the bar. This may be the case occasionally; but it is not upon occasional and comparatively rare chances of ingress and egress to and from a port, that commerce by sea can beneficially be rendered dependent. One of the only two pilots in Galveston (Mr. G. S——, formerly of Liverpool) has several times assured me that, in general, no vessel can pass with safety that requires a greater depth of water than thirteen feet; that being the average sounding upon the bank. He also states that the bar itself has changed its position nearly half a mile within the last three or four years.

These facts—for as such they are given—are most admirably illustrated by the appearance of the bay of Galveston itself. Sprinkled with wrecks of various appearances and sizes, all alike gloomy, however, in their looks and associations, it strikes the heart of a stranger as a sort of ocean-cemetery—a sea churchyard—in which broken masts, and shattered timbers, half buried in quicksands, seem to remain above the surface of the treacherous waters, only to remind the living, like dead camels on a level desert, of the destruction that has gone before, and yet awaits many who may come after.

It may not be improper, while on this subject, just to add, that a current produced by the rivers from the uplands which fall into the bay, runs through it to the sea, and forms the only safe track, like a narrow lane for a coach, down which ships reach the city. The remaining mass of water, at least three miles across, from Galveston to Pelican Island opposite, is so shallow, that under the influence of particular winds, combined, perhaps, with other causes, it may, in certain places, be waded across with safety! Such, then, is the plain truth, as far as I could ascertain it, respecting the famous port of Galveston, the intended mart of all the rest of Texas, and the place from which all the as-yet-unproduced produce of the interior—the dreamed-of wealth of thousands of dreamed-of settlers—is to be exported to all parts of the civilized world.

About noon on the 29th of March, we landed in reality. From the sea, the appearance of Galveston is that of a fine city of great extent, built close upon the edge of the water; but its glory vanishes gradually in proportion to the nearness of approach of the spectator, until, on his arrival at the end of one of the long, rude, wood projections called wharfs, which shoot out some quarter of a mile into the shallows of the bay, he finds nothing but a poor straggling collection of weather-boarded frame-houses, beautifully embellished with whitewash, (they may be mistaken for white marble from the Gulf,) and extending, without measurable depth, about the length of two miles of string. It presents, in this respect, a bold front to the enemy; but, like a bulwark made of brown pasteboard, has more appearance than power; and, in the event of a war with the Mexicans, might, in the course of a few hours, be swept from the face of the earth by a brisk and determined cannonade of nothing more formidable than dried peas instead of grape-shot, and bay shells by way of bombs.

As Galveston is at present (and, in all probability, for a very long time to come will continue to be) considered the head-quarters of modern Texas in population, in commercial importance, in the civilisation of its society, in religion, education, morals, and literature, I shall be rather more particular than otherwise might be deemed needful in its description, touching all these matters; trusting thereby to convey to the reader a more perfect facsimile of things of this kind in the new republic, than all the laudatory pens of all preceding writers put together, have yet attempted to give.

When a man reads of a "city," he very naturally associates with that word the idea implied by it at home. He almost unconsciously jumps to the conclusion that a city in a newly-founded country is, if not quite so elegant externally, yet pretty much the same sort of thing as a city in an old one. If he be told there is already an University established, his mind reverts to Cambridge and Oxford;—education assumes her most imposing aspect, and learning peeps out in cap and gown from her palace of books, surrounded by a splendid court of intellectuals, and raising up, as her most solemn duty is, a train of graceless rascals, on whose heads the stamp of manhood is not yet fully impressed, but who are destined to become—each in his degree—the lights of our modern world. Should he be told of civilisation,—arts, sciences, and those numberless and nameless refinements which constitute in his view the stock-meaning of civilisation, instantly rise up to view; and mentally he beholds the strange phenomenon of intellectual and moral power rising unsupported in the midst of a natural wilderness on which even the hand of agriculture, the first task-master of physical labour, has not as yet left so much as its lightest impression. He is told of busy ports and harbours dotted with the flags of all nations,—of steamers plying up and down, and to and fro; and at once, by the most easy and natural of all associations, he sees a floating forest of branchless and leafless pines throwing their streamers abroad upon the air over the bosom of some Thames or Mersey, yet unknown to fame; and exalting, by their commerce, the humble and industrious pedlars of the newly-planted cities into merchants, who ere long shall become like princes.

Such and similar are the impressions almost invariably made upon home-bred readers and aspiring emigrants by the perusal of favourable Commissioners' very impartial reports, the works of interested or hasty and incompetent parties, and the inspection of maps upon which cities only just conceived by the parental surveyor, are laid down as fully grown, and over which it is quite as easy to travel four or five hundred miles by the aid of a scale and a pair of compasses, as it is to walk as many single miles along the nasty dirty roads of the "old country" from one's own house to the next village. It is not a little surprising too, with what unexpected ease a man fells the imaginary timber growing upon a map;—selects his bit of "happy land" upon the bend of some delightful river, knocks up his log-house or "shanty" as the case may be,—puts to the rout whole bodies of hostile and obnoxious Indians;—kills his own buffalo and deer,—catches more than he can consume every time he goes fishing,—(since fish in places of this description are generally of such a generous nature that they positively volunteer into your net whether you want them or not,) and in short succeeds so admirably in the country of his adoption —(sitting all the while by his fire-side with his pipe and pot of English ale,) that in the course of a very few years he finds himself perfectly independent and as happy as a little rural king.

More surprising, however, than all this, is the reality,—the fact against the fiction. It is usually a rather melancholy surprisal too. The flourishing "city," rising in importance, in commerce, and in wealth, he discovers, in the majority of cases, to be not half so large as many an English village:—its houses being of the poorest and most temporary nature, and reared here and there and anywhere, with no more apparent regularity than is displayed by a crop of mushrooms that have suddenly popped their heads up some dewy morning in the prolific area of a sheep-pasture. Its "University" is considerably less than a country pedagogue's common school, both in its means of education and the number of its students; while the magnificent pile of building in which the mysteries of language and mathematics are carried on, is built in the finest style of log and weatherboard architecture, —the columns that support it being rough unwrought cedar-stumps, and the groining of the arched roof, the bare rafters and laths upon which the shingles are nailed. The "commercial importance" of which he had read, is found to consist principally in the mutual peddling and swindling carried on by the inhabitants amongst themselves and their country neighbours; while the remaining portion is made up of individual or associated monopolies, whose strength is obtained and power perpetuated by the employment of much greater capital than the hosts of new settlers commonly possess. Such at least is the reality in Galveston, as contrasted with the imaginary picture drawn at home by the intending emigrant from the delightful sketches made by those fanciful and highly poetical gentlemen whose various works upon Texas are already before the public. The forest of masts bearing the flags of many nations dwindles into a few straggling poles bearing the "star-spangled" buntin of the States; "the lone star" of Texas itself; and possibly, once in the course of four or five months, the red flag of St. George of England: all, however, looking as idle, as melancholy, and as lonely as so many half-starved cormorants, watching, from their perch of stone, whom or what they can devour. The arrival or departure of a steamer from or to New Orleans, creates a sensation in the place, and two or three hours of common hurry and bustle along the wooden-pier at the foot of which she may happen to come to anchor: after this, all relapses again into mere inanity; and the public mind, for want of something better to do, falls back upon its stock subject of speculation touching that most interesting of all intellectual items,—"what comes next?"

Literature and art, though words to be found in a dictionary, have nothing correspondent to them in Texas. The literature there is embodied in some twenty newspapers of the most miserable description. The editor of each usually combines within the compass of his own body, proprietor and compositor too. This trinity of the printing-office clips out extracts, writes original drivel of his own, takes in both advertisements and the pay for them,—notices a marriage for a bit of bride-cake and a gallon of whisky,—works at his "case" along with his men, (being not a whit more important than any one of them,) and publishes the whole collection in his own especial name. By this means he contrives to "get along" in the articles of bread and cheese, but seldom, if ever, arrives at such a high point of prosperity as to be enabled to enclose a snipping of prairie-ground, and build a plank-mansion of his own. To expect to find a book for sale of any higher character than the illustrated alphabet,—"A for Ape, and B for Bull,"—except it be derived from the sea-chest library of some diseased and beggared emigrant, who disposes of all he possesses in order to get away again,—would be to expect a very remarkable and unusual phenomenon. Any old book-stall in her Majesty's dominions contains more literary wealth upon any given number of its square inches, than can be found in the same number of square leagues in Texas, pick them from whatever part you will. In fact, the means of obtaining a mere animal existence engross the first and almost sole attention of every one. A state of things inevitable in a country as poor, as a country, as ever Job was as an individual, and far more prostrated by its extreme poverty than ever Job could have been. These are anything but unfounded and gratuitous observations, as will appear in proper place by and by.

The city of Galveston as it stands, and the "city" laid down upon the plans, bear about the same relation to each other, in point of size, as a pea to a pumpkin respectively; and could but a man build houses with his eyes, the now waste and trackless prairie would be covered with first-rate edifices. He would behold streets thronged with happy citizens and happier merchants, where at present are found only rank grass breast-high,—the carcases and bleached bones of cattle that have died of thirst and madness, and gorged and gorging turkey-buzzards that feed on the filthy carrion until they can scarcely fly away with their delicious burden. Such a man would be a very competent and fitting associate for all those praiseworthy gentlemen to whom the world is at present indebted for throwing open to its gaze the gates of the Texan paradise. He would then see things as they ought to be, not as they are,—and that constitutes the grand secret of writing a book upon any new country which requires an incoming population. Of course, there are abundance of squares laid down, but no squares of building upon them. The streets (if wide passages between rows of houses may be so called) are ankle-deep in fine sand during dry weather, and almost deeper still in mud during wet: they being totally unpaved in any part. An east or north-east wind drives the waters of the bay so far up, that the principal street is laid completely under water; and boats have, I believe, been employed to convey necessaries about the city, and to assist all such as were not naturally of an amphibious tribe, in the transaction of their business. Upon one occasion, it was carried away altogether,—the place upon which it stood being left as clear as a summer beach during an ebb tide. At that period of the year commonly termed winter, but which, more properly may be called the rainy season, a vast portion of that part of the island prairie upon which the imaginary portion of Galveston is already erected, the water lies from twelve to eighteen inches deep after storms, and forms a sort of extensive fish-pond (only without fish) in which a man might throw his float and line either from his chamber-window or his door-step, just as his genius and roving fancy might incline him.

The present remains of the city, or rather, I mean, the actual remains at the beginning of the city that is to be, are intersected with wide and tolerably deep ditches for the purposes of drainage. These generally contain some portion of water, and consequently are the resort and local habitation of incalculable numbers of a small amphibious species of crab, familiarly denominated "fiddlers," from the fact of their being amply provided with one enormous claw, larger than the whole body, and not unlike a huge animal bass-viol; while the corresponding one on the other side is a mere stick in comparison, and to all appearance fitted only to scrape the other. These curious insects inhabit every extensive gutter or drain, whether in the town or out of it, and exhibit a remarkable degree of alacrity in saving themselves from danger; as, upon the approach of the passenger, a tumultuous movement, a scouring away, and "general scramble," takes place; and, in the course of a few seconds, nearly all have dropped into their holes in the banks. The body of the largest does not exceed three quarters of an inch square, while the large claw is two inches and a half long. They are harmless, and not unwholesome, although never eaten; their diminutive size effectually protecting them from the ravenous appetites of the inhabitants.

When, for the first time, we walked down the hot and sandy "Strand," (the principal street before alluded to,) the name of "Van Winkle," upon the front of a store, caught our eyes, and called up pleasant visions of Washington Irving's "Rip;" of mysterious, mute, and eternally-smoking Dutchmen; of the famous Katskill mountains, and of the early times of settlement on Manhattan Island, when, perhaps, the New York of that day was a sort of Galveston of this. And at the moment, I wondered how long it might be before the first city of the "Lone Star" would become as great as is that of the many-starred banner which Washington and his colleagues have planted amongst the first and most permanent on earth. But nine months' experience and observation have since led me to the conclusion, that, to say the best of it, it will, at least, be a very long time indeed.

The "stores" in Galveston are remarkable places; curious assemblages of all manner of miscellaneous articles, in almost every department of human wants and occupations. Unlike the shops of Europe, in which one article, or at most, perhaps, some few of the same genus, constitute the staple commodity of the place, these stores much more nearly resemble a series of modern museums, the curiosities of which are selected from almost every variety of manufacture upon the face of the globe. In one of these, of any "mark and likelihood," you may be provided with house-brooms, and hair-brushes, combs and rakes, broad-cloth and baskets, wines, spirits, and gunpowder,—razors and Colts' six-chambered rifles,—boots and bed-tickings,—pottery of all kinds, and ready-made pantaloons,—fish-hooks and bacon,—soap and soda,—buckets, iron pots, washing-tubs, Yankee clocks, French silks, stoves, and an infinity of articles much more numerous and tedious to mention than all the unmentionables of an auctioneer's catalogue. In short, with the two exceptions of meat and fish, I believe everything that can be purchased, is to be purchased at these medley repositories denominated stores. Throughout this immense variety, however, it may be necessary to state, that perhaps not a single article is produced by the Texan population itself. All are imported; and as the storekeepers generally calculate upon a profit of one hundred per cent. on the great majority of the goods in which they deal, it may readily be inferred how rapidly the little money there is in the place becomes transferred from the pockets of the people at large to the purses of the storekeepers.

The latter have a practice amongst them of supplying the planters of the interior with a year's outfit of all kinds of necessaries upon the pledge and security of their coming crops; a system which keeps them long out of their money, and occasionally leads to losses of no inconsiderable extent. Accommodation of this description is also almost universally afforded by the shipping merchants of the southern slave-holding states to the cotton growers of that country; a course which, in many instances, has pledged the latter two or three crops deep, and materially assisted, in conjunction with an atrociously bad banking system, to produce that stagnation and commercial distress, the complaints of which have latterly been so loud from those districts of America.

In connexion with the stores, it may be opportune to mention, that the market in Galveston is held every day, Sunday included: that day, indeed, being the best in the week for abundance and variety. It consists principally of meat and fish of various kinds, with now and then a few vegetables. These are but seldom seen, being very scarce and dear; a cabbage about the size of a blacksmith's fist readily bringing as much as eighteenpence or two shillings, English. The market is opened with the earliest peep of daylight, and may be considered well over by six o'clock in the morning. The meat is killed during the preceding night, and brought to the stalls in a state that may properly be termed yet warm with life. Even with this necessary, though disagreeable haste, unless it be cooked almost immediately, it will, during the hottest weather, turn green, and putrify before mid-day. At any time to purchase more than is needful for the day's consumption, is useless; as all beyond that becomes waste. Beef and fish are very cheap indeed; their price may be considered almost nominal. Pork is higher, and mutton higher still, though of the most wretched quality, and the narrowest conceivable supply. The exceeding dearth of green vegetables is severely felt by the newcomer in this intensely sultry climate; and in conjunction with drinking water of the vilest description, contributes, I doubt not, very much to the unhealthiness of the people, (more especially of the poor, who constitute nineteen-twentieths of the whole,) and at times renders both the island and the whole of the seaboard a mere lazar-house for disease and death to revel in. Melons of various descriptions, and the finest growth, flourish and abound during the heats of midsummer, and consitute indeed almost the only resource of the parched-up and sun-dried inhabitants. There are no springs in Galveston Island; nor is there any fresh-water, except what is caught during rain, and that which filters through the sand into wells, one of which is usually attached to each homestead. The former soon grows corrupt in summer, and abounds in the larvæ of musquitoes, which assume the appearance of small eels, with feathered heads, and are amazingly active while in this aquatic state. The wells cannot be dug more than about eight feet deep; as below that measure lies a stratum of black pestiferous sea-mud, intermingled with rotting shells, the contact of which with the water renders it totally useless. During the hottest part of the year, these shallow wells fail partially or altogether; and the drought that ensues is highly injurious to the inhabitants, as well as destructive to the cattle. At those times considerable money is made by such people as chance to have either rain or well water to dispose of.

Although these minute particulars may not possess any general interest, they will perhaps be pardoned, when the reader reflects upon the many strenuous efforts already made, and yet making, to populate Texas with English emigrants; and to whom, practically, such apparently-insignificant circumstances are of every importance.

I will now proceed to make some few remarks upon the state of society in Galveston,—to illustrate it by the story of Captain Thompson, who, in 1841, met his death in Mexico; and thus conclude the present article.

Texas generally may, with safety, be regarded as a place of refuge for rascality and criminality of all kinds:—the sanctuary to which pirates, murderers, thieves, and swindlers, fly for protection from the laws they have violated in other countries, and under other governments. It has become almost a proverb in the United States, that, when a runaway debtor is not to be found—when a slave-stealer is totally missing, or a murderer has contrived to elude justice,—he has chalked upon his house-door, G. t. T.—"Gone to Texas." Nor has this passed into a proverb without much fact to support it. Many innocent and deluded people are certainly mixed up with this vile population—and some mercantile men of respectability, education, and probity; but in the main, scoundrelism, under one shape or another, constitutes the larger portion of the present population of Texas. Were it either necessary or becoming, I could give the names of several parties of the most respectable standing in Galveston, (so far, at least, as wealth may be considered to confer respectability,) who were Southern slave-stealers, old smugglers and buccaneers in the Mexican and Indian seas, runaway swindlers and murderers in the States. This is stated with the greater certainty, as the individuals alluded to were within the range of my own acquaintance, and, in some instances, have related their lives and adventures within my own hearing. I also, on one occasion, accidentally met with no less a character than the first mate to the celebrated Lafitte the pirate, whose head-quarters were on Galveston (formerly called St. Louis) Island; and who took such an active part with the Americans at New Orleans during their last war with England. On another occasion, I shall probably have a curious story to tell of this old campaigner.

Some three or four years ago, as I am informed by the older inhabitants of the island, Galveston was scarcely habitable by people of decent life, in consequence of the numbers of desperate gamblers who infested it; set all law and authority at defiance, and, by intimidation, and the force of arms, (which they openly carried,) maintained themselves at whatever period, and during any length of time, they might think proper. At that period, the formidable Bowie-knife was in pretty active operation; and assassination the ordinary termination of personal quarrels and disputes. Mr. F. of Galveston, a gentleman whose kindness to me in sickness and difficulties deserves this public acknowledgment, has related an anecdote to me, touching this subject, which I cannot withhold from the reader, as it so strikingly illustrates the lawlessness and disregard of human life which then prevailed. One evening, towards sunset, he was standing at his doorway in the principal street of Galveston, when he observed a man of respectable appearance and carriage, coming down the rude causeway towards him. Not far behind was another individual, who walked rather faster than the first one, and apparently with the intention of overtaking him. This he shortly did; and on passing by, drew a bowie-knife, stabbed the unsuspecting victim of his revenge, who instantly fell dead upon the spot; and, with the greatest coolness and deliberation, wiped the knife-blade upon his sleeve, and walked on as before. This was within about fifty yards of Mr. F.'s door. Little or no notice was taken of the matter; nor was the individual who had committed the crime, even so much as arrested. In the "city" itself, matters are now considerably improved; but no further off than Houston, and throughout the country generally, the knife, pistol, or rifle, is the supreme arbiter in every personal "difficulty"—as a quarrel is there termed—that occurs. Even during my own residence in Galveston, a man was one morning found, in the midst of the town, slaughtered in a similar manner, and, as far as my knowledge or inquiries went, with equal impunity on the part of the murderer. Indeed, at this very day, although the crime of assassination is actually less frequent than formerly, human life is held at the least possible value, and esteemed not too great an atonement for very venial crimes. I shall have occasion to give some curious illustrations of this fact, before my observations upon Texan society are concluded; but, for the present, let the story of Captain Thompson suffice.

Being one evening at the Tremont hôtel, in company with Mr. F., the gentleman above alluded to, a large company being at the time present, he privately inquired of me whether I knew, or had ever seen Captain Thompson, or Mexican Thompson, as he was more generally termed. On my replying in the negative, Mr. F. pointed out an individual in the crowd, with the remark,—"That is the very man. He is one of the boldest fellows that ever breathed, or he would not dare to come into Galveston, where he knows there are many who would seek his life, but are, perhaps, afraid to encounter him. He is a frank and good-natured man, but of the most desperate and reckless character. I do not think there is a single individual in the whole island who would care to fight him, if he could possibly help it, with any weapon." On inquiry, I found that Thompson (an Englishman, I believe, by birth) had, several years previously, been the captain of a sloop of war in the Mexican service. During the latter end of the year 1835, he was ordered to Galveston bay, for the purpose, it was stated, of ascertaining the facts connected with certain troubles that had previously taken place at Anahuac, between the Mexican government and the people there. Thompson, however, improved upon these orders, (if they were his orders,) and at once attacked, captured, and carried off an American vessel then engaged in the Texan trade, and which at the time chanced, by ill luck, to fall in his way. This act was regarded by the inhabitants as a virtual declaration of war on the part of Mexico; and the highest indignation was expressed towards the individual aggressor himself. Time passed on: the revolution which made Texas independent was effected;—no restitution or redress for Thompson's violence was made,—when, lo! he appeared again in Galveston, alone, and as bold and confident as Hector himself. He came and returned, when and in what manner he pleased, and no man ventured to meddle with him. On my expressing the wish, Mr. F. introduced me to this singular individual. He was a man of middle stature, stout, but compact, possessed of the most good-humoured and pleasing of countenances,—wore huge mustachios of a reddish-brown colour,—carried on all occasions a brace of double-barrelled rifle pistols upon his person, besides a bowie-knife,—while his conversation evidently showed that he lacked neither native intellect nor education. Indeed, to speak the truth, I was really "taken" with him.

Some few days after this interview, Mr. S., the pilot of whom I have previously made mention, expressed to me his intention of going down into Mexico Proper, with the view of settling there, in case things were found according to his expectation. From that time, up to November 1841, (and several months had elapsed,) I heard nothing of either Mr. S. or Captain Thompson; until one evening, as I was smoking my cigar, after a hard day's hunting, and trying to fumigate away the myriads of musquitoes that filled the air, as though with dust,—Mr. S. the pilot entered; and, sitting down upon a rough-hewn sofa by my side, informed me that he had just returned from Mexico, and subsequently related the following story of Captain Thompson:—

"Mr. Hooton," he began, "let me beg of you never to drink spirits any more,—for I have seen such a sight with Captain Thompson in Mexico, originating altogether in brandy-drinking, as I hope never to see again in this world, and which has made me a tee-totaller for life."

"What has happened, Mr. S.?" I inquired.

"I told you," he replied, "that I was going down to Mexico. Thompson wanted to go with me; and eventually we agreed to sail for Tampico, taking my pilot-boat, and that Thompson should act as captain. During the whole passage, which, owing to unfavourable weather, lasted nearly a fortnight, he did nothing, scarcely, but drink brandy day and night. He scarcely either ate or slept. When we arrived at Tampico, and went ashore, Thompson put a belt round his body, stuck a brace of pistols in it, and additionally armed himself with a cutlass. Three of the men we had brought with us he armed in the same manner; and, thus attended, walked into the town. He said it was needful, in such a place as Mexico, where a man was never safe of his life. In one of the principal streets he stepped aside to get a 'drink' of brandy and water, at a groggery. When he had ordered what he wanted, he gazed steadfastly in the face of the landlord who was serving him behind the bar, and then demanded whether his name was not so and so?—(giving the name, which I omit.) The man said it was his name. 'Then,' replied Thompson, 'do you not remember, about seven years ago, being MY first mate? Do you remember how you betrayed me? and that I promised, if ever I met with you again,—no matter how long first,—I would shoot you? I shall be as good as my word.' And immediately he drew a pistol upon the astonished vintner, and pulled the trigger; but the weapon missed fire. The second was upon the point of being discharged, when the man attacked drew a double-barrelled gun from underneath his counter; and, before Thompson could fire a second time, put the contents of both barrels into his body. He was almost cut in two, and fell dead upon the floor. One of his men immediately jumped over the counter, sabre in hand, and clove the innkeeper down,—nearly cutting the head and upper part of the body from the remainder. They were now making off, when the acting authorities, hearing something of the disturbance, arrested the attempted fugitives; and, within an hour, without judge, jury, or trial, the three men were shot. Such is law in Mexico, and such the effects of drink in this burning climate."

And thus Mr. S. ended his story, and thereby enabled me to be the first who has put the death of the notorious Mexican Thompson on record.

THE CORNOPEAN.

To the Editor of Tait's Magazine.

EDINBURGH, 10th February, 1843.

SIR,—Having lately taken some interest in a musical instrument of great power of tone, and of expression,—viz., the Cornopean, or Cornet à Pistons (as the French call it,) it struck me that one or two difficulties, which stand in the way of performers who are not very skilful, might be removed in a very simple manner.

The cornopean is pitched by means of crooks varying in length. The instrument without a crook, stands in B; and, by adapting to it its crooks of A, A flat, G, F, E, E flat, or D, its pitch gradually descends; the natural scale of the instrument being upon these keys; while, by means of the Pistons, music upon any key may be performed, as the cornopean with three pistons comprehends the chromatic scale throughout the whole compass of the instrument.—When pitched upon A, A flat, or G, the tone is brilliant; but, in the hands of an ordinary performer, the cornopean is then more adapted for the open air, or for a very large apartment, owing to the difficulty of softening the power of the instrument.

When the longer crooks (viz., those of F, E, E flat, or D,) are used, the tone is much softened; but it becomes impossible to play in tune the notes produced by the pistons, owing to the slides not being long enough to enable the performer to flatten the notes sufficiently by drawing the slides out to a suitable extent. Indeed, when the slides are pulled out to nearly their whole length, they must be remarkably well-fitted, or they cease to be perfectly air-tight; and so destroy all chance of bringing out the notes properly.

A difficulty exists in playing the cornopean as an accompaniment to the pianoforte, &c., inasmuch as the natural scale of the instrument never being upon C, the music must be transposed; which, especially in difficult passages played at sight, is always more or less annoying. For example, if the key played upon by the orchestra be C, the cornopean with the A flat crook must be played in E major; or, if the G crook be used, it must be played in F major. If the orchestra plays in A, the cornopean with the A crook must be played in C; with the G crook, in D; and so on.

Now this transposition, in playing an accompaniment to the pianoforte, &c., is always troublesome; and it struck me that by lengthening the tuning slides, the instrument might be pitched upon C; by which not only would the tone be softened, but the trouble of transposition be done away with.

I had three long slides adapted to a very good German cornopean, by Mr. Glen, musical instrument maker, in North Bank Street; and, by combining the crooks,—as, for instance, putting on the E flat and F crooks,—I threw the instrument down to C, and the experiment succeeded perfectly. The power of the instrument could be modified to a much softer degree than when pitched higher, so as to serve as a good accompaniment for a female voice; in short, it approached very closely to the timbre of the French horn when very softly played. The piston notes could be brought out perfectly in tune, and the trouble of transposing was avoided. The instrument merely requires the addition of the three slides of extra length, and of course serves as well as before for any of its usual keys. An additional crook may be made to throw it down to C, or, in the German instruments, where one crook fits into another, a combination of these crooks may be used.

I may remark, that, in 1841, I got made, by Mr. Glen, some of those funnel-shaped mouth-pieces for the Cornopean, which are suggested in Graham's Essay on Musical Composition, and which have since been adopted by the best London makers, instead of the cup-shaped mouth-pieces formerly in fashion; and I found the tone of the instrument much improved by them.

I remain, Sir, your very obedient servant,

A SCOTTISH AMATEUR.

THE HISTORY OF WOMAN IN ENGLAND.*

In writing the Historical Memoirs of the Queens of England, Miss Lawrance must necessarily have turned her attention to the social position of women of every rank, so far as information was attainable. While making inquiry concerning the royal and fair inmates of the palace, the lady of the feudal castle, or the noble recluse of the convent, she must have been enabled, by her careful and really learned research, aided by a picturesque and poetical fancy, to elicit many particulars of the condition of the humbler female inmates of the workshop in the city, and the farm-house in the country, which she has here turned to account in a work of a more comprehensive character than the Memoirs of English Queens.

Even at a very early and comparatively barbarous period of English history, female influence was felt in public affairs, and always beneficently. At a later period, female influence gave the impulse to the Reformation; and to a woman's patronage England owes the introduction of the Art of Printing. At the period of the Roman invasion, when the internal condition of Britain is first made known with anything deserving to be regarded as authentic history, the women held a higher place in the social system than is usually accorded to them among barbarous tribes. They, however, vindicated or achieved their right to share or to hold the supreme authority by their warlike character. The history of the heroic British Queen, Boadicea, is conclusive of the condition of the women in the earlier periods of our authentic annals, though hers may have been an extraordinary crisis. But the British women, at least in the southern parts of the island, also cultivated some of the arts of peace. They knew the use of the distaff, were skilful in weaving cloth, and also beautiful baskets of fine grass; and they had some knowledge of embroidery, and of dyeing or staining stuffs with colours. A Roman writer, Dio Cassius, describes Boadicea as a woman of tall stature, clothed in a parti-coloured vest, gathered round her in thick folds, over which she wore a large mantle; her yellow hair flowing to the ground, while around her neck was a gold chain. Miss Lawrance conjectures that this ornament may have been the torque, a symbol of royal authority, consisting of three or four flexible gold rods twisted together, and fashioned at the ends so as to hook round the neck. But the warlike queen, who achieved the sovereign power, must have been a rare exception among the sex. The inferior station assigned to all women among the ancient Britons, from the queen downwards, is shown in the romantic Tales, and also in the laws and usages of the period elapsing between the Roman and the Saxon invasion. In the attempt to illustrate the condition of the women of those times, in respect of legal rights and customary privileges, we find, among other curious traits of manners, the following notice of the laws for regulating the interior arrangements of the palace, and the domestic state of the queen :—

While each officer of the king, down to the falconer, has his appropriated place in the hall, the king's wife occupies her solitary chamber, waited upon by a single attendant handmaiden; a steward, who is to "serve her in her chamber with meat and drink;" and a page, who "is to convey messages between the chamber and the hall, keep the keys of her coffers, and supply the chamber;" and two or three inferior attendants. That in this state of melancholy seclusion, the queen should occasionally ask the solace of song, seems to have occurred to the law-makers as no unlikely circumstance; they therefore enact that, "when the queen shall will a song in her chamber, let the bard sing a song respecting Camlan," (the battle in which Arthur fell,) "and that not loud, lest the hall be disturbed!"—lest the amusement of the queen should interrupt that of her servants, the boisterous mead-drinkers carousing round the blazing hearth.

Among a people where the queen was held in such low estimation, we cannot expect to find a woman raised to the supreme power; and thus, from the time of Boadicea to the invasion of the Saxons, we have no instance of a queen reigning in her own right. Nor does it appear that, under the restored British sway, women were capable of holding lands; they, however, possessed some rights, though very limited, and on the whole, the inferior class of women seem to have possessed more independence than the higher.

On reference to these curious laws, although we find it laid down as an axiom that the value of every woman is one-third of that of her husband, still it appears that, in case of separation by mutual consent, the joint property was very fairly shared between them. The quotation, although long, is too characteristic to be passed over, and it is therefore given.

"If husband and wife separate, the husband has the swine and the sheep; if only one kind, to be shared. Goats are to the husband. Of the children, the eldest and youngest to the husband; the middlemost to the wife. The household furniture shared; but the milking vessels, except the pail, to the wife; the husband the drinking vessels and riddle; the wife the sieve. The husband has the upper stone of the hand-mill, the wife the lower one. The upper garments are the wife's, the under garments the husband's; and the kettle, coverlet, bolster, fuel axe, settle, and all the hooks except one; the pan, trivet, axe, bill, ploughshare, flax, linseed, wool, and the house-bag, to the wife; if any gold, it is to be shared between them. The husband to have the corn above ground and under, and the barn, the poultry, and one of the cats; the rest to the wife. To the wife, the meat in the brine and the cheese in the brine; those hung up belong to the husband. The butter, meat, and cheese in cut, belong to the wife; also as much meal as she can carry between her arms and knees, from the store-room to the house. Their apparel to be divided."

. . . . . .

According to the same laws, the wife had an exclusive right to her jewellery and wearing apparel: nor was this a trifling boon; for in an early state of society, these supplied the place of a current coinage, and the robe, or the mantel, or the bracelet, often purchased food during famine, or supplied a ransom to the captive. From another law we find that the wife of a "privileged man," which seems to mean a free man, might lend her "undergarment, mantle, head-cloth, and shoes," (and this was, probably, well-nigh her whole apparel,) without consent of her husband; and "can give meat and drink unrestrictedly, and can lend the furniture." The wife of the "taeog," or bondsman, could only lend her head-covering; and of her household utensils only "her sieve and riddle," and these but "at the distance she can be heard calling with her feet on the threshold." The reason for these restrictions in regard to the wife of the bondsman was, probably, owing to the fact that the household goods, and even the clothing, were the property of the bondsman's master.

In reflecting on these curious ancient laws, it seems strange to find the middle classes of women in possession of privileges apparently denied to the highest. But this we shall find arose entirely out of the rude state of society. . . . . Although no "swords might be ready to leap from their scabbards" to avenge the wrongs or maintain the rights of the fair and noble lady; although no place of honour was assigned to her, and no admiring homage paid, and she sat in her solitary chamber weaving the delicate web, or engaged with the distaff, the housewife was valued at a higher rate, for on her it depended whether the labour of her husband should be in vain. On her devolved the joint care of the cattle, and the exclusive care of the dairy; and the active and laborious wife, like the good milch-cow, could not but be prized, since the comfort of the rude household depended on them both. Woman in the abstract, among our Celtic ancestors, occupied a sufficiently low station; but individual woman gained that consideration from her useful drudgery which among the Teutonic nations was awarded to her higher qualities; and thus the British law, while it estimated her value at only one-third of her husband's, allowed her an equal participation of his goods.

The Saxon invasion was a happy era for the women of Britain. In their rational respect for the sex, in what Charles Lamb describes as "true gallantry," the Saxons were like the Anglo-Americans of modern times. One grand distinction of the whole Teutonic race, was the relative station held by the women; who, among the rude northern nations, were considered the equal of man; while amongst the most polished nations of classical antiquity they were either the toys or drudges of their lords. The Saxon queens possessed many rights and privileges, but the condition of private ladies marks more decidedly the social position held by the sex. According to Sharon Turner, an excellent authority on the subject—

"They were allowed to possess, to inherit, and to transmit landed property; they were present at the witena-gemot and the shire-gemot; they were permitted to sue and be sued in the courts of justice; and their persons, their safety, their liberty, their property, were protected by express laws."—"That the Anglo-Saxon ladies both inherited and disposed of property as they pleased, we have many instances. A wife is mentioned who devised land by her will, with consent of her husband, in his lifetime. We read also of land that a wife had sold in her husband's lifetime. Widows selling property is also of common occurrence; so is the incident of women devising it."

The Saxon ladies sat in the shire-gemots or county courts, though probably only when they were land-holders. In this and some other respects women possessed a nearer equality of civil rights with their "Masters," than in modern polished times.

Like the British females, the Saxon ladies seem to have possessed unquestioned right to the clothes, jewels, and plate, which had belonged to them previously to marriage, and, what the former do not seem to have possessed, full power of disposing of them by will. And the value and number of these garments and jewels would surprise the modern reader, who, perhaps, is scarcely aware that, at an early and unsettled period of society, plate, but especially jewels, were valued not alone for their intrinsic beauty, or as designating high station, but as forming a most useful species of money, easily concealed or carried away, and easily convertible in any part of Europe into the current coin. Necklaces adorned with gems, gold chains, broaches, crosses, bands for the head, and bracelets, apparently of great weight and value, meet us in the wills of Saxon high-born women.

Although the dress of the high-born lady chiefly consisted of fine woollen or linen, still, even at this early period, we find occasional mention of silk. The peculiar style of the Saxon dress, consisting of long and flowing garments, and which were worn by men as well as by women, was probably the origin of the early superiority of the Saxon women, especially the high-born, in the arts of weaving and embroidery. That in weaving, even so early as the commencement of the seventh century, they had attained to some perfection, is proved by a passage from one of Aldhelm's Latin poems, where he speaks of "the shuttles, filled not with purple only but with various colours, moved here and there among the thick-spreading threads;" and he alludes, in another passage, to woven borders.

Although little is known of the women of the middle and inferior classes, it is at least certain that their protection was insured by a double fine; so that, where the principle of pecuniary compensation for injury was applied to all offences, those against women, instead of being rated lower, were in every case much higher; thus marking the consideration in which the "weaker vessel" was held. Women appeared, at all amusements and festivals, not as attendants and ministers to the pleasure of their lords, but as partakers, and ornaments of the social assemblies. The rude illuminations of the period present the male and female guests seated side by side, as in modern times, around the well-covered board; conversing, or listening to the songs of the minstrel. The first missionaries of Christianity to Britain were warmly welcomed and patronised by the women; and the first monasteries were those endowed by wealthy and noble ladies; and which were, consequently, even when intended for men, often placed under female rule. This anomaly has excited attention, and Miss Lawrance solves the difficulty by conjecturing that the royally-descended Lady Abbess could not submit to the sway of any man; and also adduces the superior fitness of the educated Saxon women to administer conventual affairs, when compared with the capacity of men, trained only to war and the chase. What a contrast does the life and business of a modern lady of rank present to that of the noble Saxon matron! and how much more of true dignity surrounded her, when—

Placed at the head of a household consisting, perhaps, of more than a hundred office-bearers and serfs, the "lady" among the Saxons, as her very name, "hlfædge," loaf-giver, implied, was the person to whom each member of the family looked, not only for his general comfort, but for his daily bread. While the king, and his earls, and his theyns, were absent, engaged in war, or following the chase, or carousing over the mead-cup at home, it devolved on the wife or the daughter to provide the household both with food and clothing, and to exercise that continued superintendence which domestic cares must always demand.

A sketch of the history of the Lady Hilda, the canonized Abbess of Whitby, enables Miss Lawrance to illustrate the condition of the nobly-born and learned women of that age. The biographer of Hilda, the venerable Bede, points exultingly to the learned men who had obtained high ecclesiastical dignities, and the band of missionaries that had been among the pupils of Hilda's convent school. She has the honour to have been the patroness and instructor of Cædmon, who has been styled the Saxon Milton; and whose original condition, when his extraordinary genius dawned, was that of an ignorant neat-herd, belonging to the abbey. Her successor, Elfleda, the daughter of King Oswy, who is also commemorated by Bede, was not less eminent in active virtue and solid acquirements. Instead of spending their lives in the vain practice of unmeaning rites, and useless fasts, penances and mortifications, and living in ascetic seclusion from the world, their course was one of reasonable piety and active virtue. They employed their talents and learning in diffusing knowledge, civilisation, and religion, by means of the youths trained in their schools. These were a much higher order of benefactresses than those ladies who afterwards lavishly endowed monasteries and churches with their wealth, but left its administration solely to the lazy and luxurious monks.

The strong prepossession for the Anglo-Normans which was visible in Miss Lawrance's History of the Queens of England, is not less conspicuous in this work; in which an attempt is made to prove that the Norman Conquest was especially beneficial to the Saxon women, as well as to the whole nation. As a sample of the sort of agreeable antiquarian entertainment which the volume affords, we select the description of the daily routine of the life of the nun after she was professed.

About five o'clock in the morning, the nuns, if in the winter season, each bearing a taper, proceeded to the church, and there performed the first of the daily services, "prime." After a short period devoted to meditation, they assembled to breakfast, and this seems to have consisted on fast-days of fish and water, on other days of meat and beer,—the usual breakfast of all classes during the middle ages. After this they went to their daily occupations, and moderate conversation on various subjects was allowed. At eight o'clock, the bell summoned them to "tierce," the service which answers to the "morning prayer" of the English church, and which was followed by "sexts," at which high mass was performed; and when the sermon, if there was any, was preached. These services lasted until nearly ten o'clock, and then the nuns proceeded to their refectory to dinner.

Their diet, judging from the minute directions to the cellaress of Barking abbey, seems to have been good and various. In this very curious document, we find that she was to provide twenty-two good oxen for the convent, (to be salted down for the winter provision,) as well as salt herrings and salmon; that she was to provide geese for Michaelmas-day; fowls and pig at various times; pork, and "white puddings with eggs, pepper, and saffron," for Advent; eels for Sheer Thursday, and pancakes for Shrove-tide. She was to make due provision of ale and wine, and give each nun ("layde" she is called) her "liverage" of two pounds of almonds, five pounds of rice, one pound of figs, and one pound of raisins, each week during Lent. As all the Benedictine convents strictly followed the same rule, the duties of each cellaress were, doubtless, the same as those of her sister officer at Barking, and there is no reason to believe that the black-robed sisters ever, except on fast-days, sat down to "Lenten fare."

At the tables in the refectory the nuns sat in order, another table being placed at the end for the novices and pupils; the table for the superior of the convent, who was either abbess or prioress, was raised on a dais at the upper end; but from the account of Barking abbey, it appears that the superior most frequently dined in her private room. On the ringing of a hand-bell, the dishes were brought in, and all the nuns stood while a short Latin grace was said—generally by the præcentrix. There were servants under the direction of the cellaress, to bring whatever was wanted; and during the whole time, a nun read from a desk a portion of Scripture, or some religious book. When dinner was concluded, the reader returned thanks, and the benediction having been given by the prioress, or, in her absence, by the sub-prioress or præcentrix, the nuns retired.

The period between after dinner and "nones" seems to have been devoted to recreation. Friends called about that time, and the nuns retired to the cloisters to converse, or walked in the garden.

The mid-day service "nones" was very short, and it does not seem that the nuns were obliged to assemble in church. Immediately after they took their "meridian," a noontide slumber, which our forefathers, during the middle ages, always indulged in, and which was absolutely necessary to the nuns, as their nightly rest was broken into by the midnight service. It was at this time that the younger nuns mostly endeavoured to meet their friends at the postern door, to enjoy a little secular conversation, and sometimes, through aid of the portress, they would steal out, to catch a furtive glance at the gaieties of that world which they had professed to renounce. The injunction, therefore, of Dean Kentwode to the convent of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, in the fifteenth century, that "some sadde woman, and discrete, honeste, and wel named, for shuttying the cloyster dores," should be appointed, was not unneedful.

How long the "meridian," was allowed, we cannot ascertain, nor the precise time of the "vespers," or "even-song." According to some writers, vespers were performed at three o'clock P.M., while others give five o'clock as the time. The latter seems the more correct, inasmuch as the service itself, especially the hymns, refer to the "close of day," a phrase which might be applied to five o'clock, but certainly not to the earlier time. The nuns, too, are represented as exercising their various occupations in the cloister before even-song; but there would have been scarcely time, if three o'clock had summoned them to the service.

At five, therefore, the sisterhood again proceeded to the church, and on their return, on those days when supper was allowed, partook of a slight refreshment. Among the more devotional, or the more rigid, the interval between even-song and complin (the concluding service of the day) was devoted to reading, and to meditation; and it was considered a mark of superior sanctity never to speak to any one.

At seven o'clock the bell summoned the nuns to the completorium, or complin, when the emphatic benediction of "May the Lord grant you good rest and a quiet night," was pronounced; and after prayers and hymns, that supplicated protection from violent men, but more especially and earnestly protection from the powers of darkness, the service of the day closed.

Soon after this, the nuns retired to rest in their dormitory, or "dortour," where they slept until midnight. Then the chapel-bell again summoned them to the "nocturnæ vigiliæ," or "lauds," as they were more frequently called —a short but beautiful service, entirely made up of thanksgivings; and then they again retired to rest, until summoned by the bell for "prime."

Such was the daily routine of conventual life; sometimes varied by fasts and longer vigils, but sometimes also relieved by splendid processions and festivals; and at Christmas and Easter, more especially by social observances, which rendered the convent the scene of mirth and rejoicing, no less than the abodes of the laity.

It is proper here to remark, that nuns, during the middle ages, were by no means so strictly immured as they are in the modern conventual establishments. They were allowed to receive visiters in the presence of another nun; and on some occasions, "secular women" seem to have been allowed to sojourn for some time in the house.

This was the practice in France and Italy until the present time. In French memoirs we continually read of the gay court ladies clearing scores with Heaven by retiring to some favourite convent to spend the Holy week, or the season of Lent, in seclusion and devotion. Miss Lawrance holds the silence of Piers Plowman, Chaucer, and other satirists of the middle ages, to be conclusive of the purity and high morality of the female recluses, and the good order which prevailed in their establishments; while the lives of the monks provoked censure by their licentiousness. Down to the dissolution of the monasteries by Henry VIII., few charges, and those vague or extravagant, could be brought against the female convents, even by the royal commissioners, interested in making out a case against them. The education of the whole female population, was then in the hands of the nuns; and it appears probable that in large towns the seminaries belonging to the nunneries held the place of our girls' day-schools, and that in them girls of inferior station were instructed in useful female employments. A very old man told Aubrey, that just before the dissolution of the monasteries, he remembered, when a boy, to have seen the nuns of St. Mary, near Bridgewater, walking in the meadows belonging to their house, surrounded by their scholars, and each with a distaff in her hand. The education of the common order of female children, is supposed to have been gratuitous, though boarders were received into the convent, as in Catholic countries to the present day. The high-born girls often received a learned education; and were instructed in music, and the exquisite embroidery and fine needlework for which the ladies of England had long been celebrated; while those of inferior rank were instructed in the useful arts of housewifry, then somewhat numerous and onerous, as the housewife and her maidens exercised the arts of the weaver, the baker, the dyer, and the spinster. The nuns also instructed girls of all ranks in their religious duties.

In the early period of the Plantagenets, Miss Lawrance is inclined to think that women of the middle class enjoyed a fully equal, if not superior, degree of consideration to that enjoyed by the same class of women in modern times, when their rights have been curtailed to save their modesty! Their names often appear in civil cases, and they not only held independent property, but are imagined to have been more frequently engaged in trade than modern refinement permits. If there had been Lord Huntingtowers in those times, which, no doubt, there were, they might have found female money-lenders, both Christian and Jewish. Among the lower classes, women were then the general medical advisers; and, to the skill of the herbalist, the wise woman often added the arts of the pretended sorceress. The belief in the powers of the vervain and rue, and the mysterious misletoe, scarcely yet exploded in some rural remote localities, together with spells, charms, and incantations, and many modes of divination, were, in the twelfth century, in full potency; while the age of chivalry was only dawning, and witchcraft was still treated, by churchmen, as an imposture. The volume closes with a period when the History of the Women of England becomes less conjectural, and when the generous illusions of chivalry arose to exalt one sex, and refine both.

From the hymns employed in the daily services of the Church in the twelfth century, and those especially appropriated to particular times and festivals, Miss Lawrance has given some beautiful specimens, which are, as we presume, now first translated. They not only breathe a warm devotional spirit, but are really beautiful hymns, some of which might at once be received into any modern collection. After giving a hymn for Easter from the "Sarum Missal," our authoress states—

> The Complin hymn for Lent is more beautiful, and supplicates still more earnestly protection from the powers of darkness. And it was natural; for not only was Paschaltide a joyful season, but, in the words of the old romance of Merlin—
> "The dayes are clerer, and draweth longe;"
> and thus a soft twilight was around our forefathers when they exchanged the Complin hymn for Lent for the more joyful carol that welcomed Paschaltide; and ere this was exchanged for the Pentecost hymn, the service was sung by the pleasant light of the declining sun.
> Far different was it when the subjoined hymn was sung. It was then "black Lent," the season of wind and snow, when thick clouds veiled the day, even before the early sunset. And by the dim light of the sepulchral lamp, and tapers that scarcely cast their faint gleam across the chancel, was the Complin hymn for Lent sung —and thus, with feelings ever harmonizing with the seasons, and which invest with poetry all the middle-age observances, it breathes a deeper and more earnest spirit of supplication, a more trustful and child-like confidence, than the former hymn; as though the belief that the powers of darkness were actually lying in wait in the gloom, served but to bid the child press closer to the fatherly arm that alone could protect him. The metre is the same as the original in the "Sarum Missal."
> "Thou who art the day, the light,
> Chase these gathering shades of night,
> By thine all-pervading might,
> Light of lights, we pray to thee!
>
> Holiest Lord! amid the shade
> Of thickest night put forth thine aid;
> Oh, guard us while in sleep we're laid.
> For peaceful rest we pray to thee!
> By no horrid dreams molested,
> By no snares of night infested,
> Safe from him, our foe detested,
> Saviour, may we rest in thee!
> While our eyes in sleep are closing,
> May our hearts, on thee reposing,
> Find thine own right arm opposing
> Him, our deadliest enemy.
> O! safeguard of thine Israel!
> Whose watchful care no tongue may tell,
> Chase, chase these foemen fierce, and fell,
> Of thy blood-purchased family!
> Since thou of frailest flesh hast made us,
> Wilt thou not in the conflict aid us?—
> Yes! safe we'll rest,—nought shall invade us,— > Adesto nobis, Domine!"

This, poetical as it is, would scarcely suit a collection of hymns for a modern Christian congregation. Among the many curious morsels of antiquarian lore to be found in the volume, is the translation of a poem which, upon pretty good evidence, is stated to be one of those composed by the royal minstrel, Richard Cœur de Lion, while languishing in captivity. But we have already gone, perhaps, too far with this fragment of a work, which we are persuaded will, taken as a whole, leave on every mind a strong desire to follow this picturesque history of the Women of England, and animated picture of the Past, to the conclusion.

REPORT ON ACCIDENTS IN COAL MINES. *

No one could believe, unless the facts were brought under notice, that so many fatal accidents, and so great a waste of life, is consequent upon mining operations. A few years since, when fifty-one lives were lost by an explosion in the St. Hilda pit, a committee of gentlemen, connected with South Shields, was appointed to investigate the causes of these frightful casualties. Their inquiry embraced safety-lamps, ventilation, scientific instruments, infant labour in the mines, the scientific education of the officers in mines, Government inspection, and other collateral subjects; besides the economical questions involved in the most important national interest of coal-mining. The committee has discharged its duties with industry and ability, and its Report (published in a blue folio, like the Parliamentary Reports) is interesting and valuable in different respects, and not a little curious from the nature of its information. Some geologists, according to the rather alarming preliminary disquisition, have calculated that the coal basin of South Wales alone might supply the whole kingdom at the present rate of consumption for 3000 years! But these sanguine persons appear to calculate without their host, as Professor Sedgwick "is convinced, that with the present increased and increasing demand for coal, 400 years will leave little more than the name of our best seams;" and so thinks Professor Buckland: and thus ends the 2000 or 1700 years' supply supposed to exist on the Tyne and Wear alone. The speculations of Bakewell are even more dismal; for he anticipates "a period, not very remote, when all the English mines of coal and ironstone will be exhausted." What is more to the point at present, the Tyne coal now worked is of inferior quality, and brings at least 2s. a ton less in the London market than that of the Tees and the Wear; a fact that should be borne in mind by purchasers along the east coast of Scotland, which is generally supplied from the Tyne. The coal of America, of which the vast fields are rich and abundant, it is stated in this report, is only kept out of successful competition with us from the want of capital and the dearness of labour. There is abundance of fine coal in the northern and other parts of France, and also in Belgium, and in Saxony, Silesia and Bohemia. Russia, Syria, the East Indies, China, Australia, and many other parts of the world abound in this valuable mineral; and the philanthropist must rejoice to hear of this wide diffusion of a common blessing, though the possessors should by its means, at some future and indefinite period, become our rivals in arts and manufactures. "Unceasing exertion," we are told, "and the adoption of every scientific improvement adapted for the extraction and economising of her mineral wealth, can alone enable Britain to continue at the head of the competition of the world." It is therefore as necessary for the continuance of national prosperity, as for the sake of humanity, that a safe, economical, and well-arranged system of working the mines be established. To this great object the labours of the South Shields Committee, which began its inquiries in 1839, have all been directed. Reasons of pure humanity do not, however, seem to have, in any case, led to an overlooking the necessity of "not augmenting the difficulty and cost of production," —"which it is the interest of all parties (save, perhaps, the mining operatives) to render cheap and abundant."——Of the many deplorable accidents during the present century, from fire-damp alone,—the great agent of destruction,—there are accounts which curdle one's blood. The unsatisfactory, or positively dangerous nature of Davy's Safety-lamp, which has been the undoubted cause of several fearful accidents, is demonstrated, and many fatal cases are specified. There is a description of the various lamps since constructed, both at home and on the continent; but the final conclusion of the Committee is, that not one approaches perfection; and that safety must be looked for in the prevention of accumulated Fire-damp, and other noxious gases, by means of proper Ventilation, and not from the use of any lamp. The ventilation of many, we may say of all the mines, in the extensive coal district which formed the scene of the Committee's researches, "requires important change;" and the grand desideratum is "more shafts, and more air." On this subject, the evidence of R. Smith, Esq., a mining engineer, given before a Committee of the House of Commons, is not a little curious, from revealing the world below, independently of its scientific importance. This gentleman had been extensively employed in the coal mines of Staffordshire, and also in those of Portugal, Nova Scotia, and Cape Breton.

Equally valuable are the statements of other engineers. Mr. Smith was asked,—

"You said, in the very dangerous works you superintended in North America, you relied entirely on ventilation? Yes, always, wherever I went; I think I should not be doing justice to the miners under my care, if I left them entirely exposed to the use of an implement, (the safety lamp,) which, itself being liable to accident, might destroy the whole of them. If there had been such an explosion in the coal mines in Nova Scotia as there was in the north of England the other day, (at Wallsend,) it would have swept away the entire establishment of the company." . . . . And "when I saw the plan produced by Mr. Buddle, but which I had not an opportunity of examining carefully, nor except when under examination by different gentlemen, I was surprised to see the extent at which those mines were opened, compared with the limited means of ventilation in the shaft."

Thus speaks Mr. Smith of about one of the best ventilated mines in the north, with 4 distinct pits for 130 acres. What would have been his surprise to have examined their average condition, or to have seen one shaft for 3, 4, 5, and 600 acres and upwards!

In Staffordshire, "they never like to take their pits more than about 300 yards from each other." Each is supposed to get from 15 to 16 acres of coal. The average depth is about 450 feet. This gentleman has been fortunate enough never to lose any lives by explosion in the mines he has managed. He adds—"The true principle of working mines will be that of efficient ventilation; and my opinion is, that you never can work coal seams any other way so properly and profitably as by keeping the men always in a safe and healthy atmosphere."

Other gentlemen examined, corroborated these opinions on ventilation. The coal-mines of the north present a painful contrast to the metallic mines of Cornwall, in which, at the same time, there is no deleterious gas to encounter, and which are as deep (a great cause of safety) as the coal mines; some of them being 1500 feet deep, yet shafts are sunk at every 200 or 300 yards for the purpose of ventilation. The difference between the ventilation of these mines, and those of the north, is brought out in the examination of Mr. John Taylor, a civil engineer, before a Committee of the House of Commons:—

"I am sorry I cannot state to the Committee the number of shafts at the consolidated mines (in Cornwall,) but I think they extend, including the winges, (the staples,) to more than 12 miles of perpendicular depth, and I believe the horizontal galleries to more than 40." To a coal mine in the north, with galleries to nearly double the same extent, they have a single shaft, or scarcely two-thirds OF A MILE in perpendicular depth.

Mr. Taylor is asked—"But as intimately connected with mining, cannot you suppose a case in which a considerable period must elapse after the completing of one shaft before it becomes expedient on the part of the owner to sink a second?" His answer is—"Certainly; but we consider it the great duty of the directors of mines to foresee all such circumstances; and we consider it the worst management possible to delay the sinking of shafts to a period that would become inconvenient. I look upon that kind of foresight to be the great improvement in modern mining." . . . . . .

On the introduction of the Davy lamp, Mr. Taylor doubted its nature, because he feared "that it would tend to make the owners of collieries not take the same pains for ventilation that they otherwise would do: his opinion being, that the only safe thing for collieries is to get rid of the gas if possible."

There is no difference of opinion as to the best mode of preventing accidents in mines. The expense of sinking shafts is a very different consideration. It is often enormous, but is reckoned the truest economy, where the mine can be productively worked at all. Mr. Gurney, the discoverer of the Bude Light a few years since, suggested a plan for procuring an increased force of ventilation, by the application of high-pressure steam, by means of an apparatus described in the Report; and of which a lithographed view is given. The Committee think very favourably of this suggestion, and even recommend ventilation by this means as far superior, in safety, economy, and facility of execution and manageableness to the other modes. The Committee are rather favourable to a Government-Inspection of the mines, which shall not be troublesome, nor interfere improperly with individual rights, or the freedom of trade; and also to the employment of boys in the mines, if upwards of eleven years of age. Both from the inhumanity of the practice, and the increased danger of explosions from the ignorance and carelessness of boys of a tender age, they recommend that steady old men, past hard labour, should be employed, in preference to young boys, in small offices which are often important to the safety of the entire establishment. They not only sanction, but protest, in the present state of the mining interests, and the successful competition of Belgium with British coal in the markets of Rouen and Marseilles, against boys after the age of eleven or twelve being prohibited from working in the mines; care, however, being had to afford them time "for such education as the boy's situation will permit, or his parents afford." Now, it must depend on the master, whether the boy's situation will admit of any time for education, after he enters the pit, save perhaps at a Sunday School.

The Report contains a copious Appendix, consisting of the various plans, letters, and memorials given in to the Committee, in the course of its labours, by mining engineers and other men of science. Altogether, it is a production of great interest and value, and one that is highly creditable to all concerned, whether in reference to the investigations, or the drawing up of the Report.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Forest Days; a Romance of Old Times. By G. P. R. James, Esq. 3 volumes. Saunders & Otley.

THIS, if less ambitious in character than many of Mr. James's romances, will, we are persuaded, be found even more charming. When can "Forest Days" life in the greenwood, in the jovial old times of "Merry England," fail to charm? The starving weavers of the north of England—in which many of the scenes of the romance are laid—might, in a Barmecide Feast with Robin Hood and his merry men, under the boughs in the sylvan glades of Sherwood, for the moment forget their misery, as their brethren in Glasgow and Paisley said they did, when fascinated by the perusal of Scott's novels. In "Forest Days," Robin Hood is once more in the field. What, indeed, would they be without him? By placing the bold and generous outlaw in the reign of the Third Henry, instead of that of Cœur de Lion, Mr. James has been able to introduce several remarkable historical personages into his scenes, as actors; though the romance cannot be termed historical. He has also, by this means, availed himself of the stirring period of one of the first distinct struggles between the Crown, and what may be almost called a popular party, led by the great Simon de Montfort. This struggle exalts the stealer of the King's deer,—the arbiter and distributor of wild justice, and the redresser of wrongs, as Robin Hood has hitherto been considered,—into a patriot—a smaller Wallace or Tell; throwing his power into the scale of the popular party, and acting a very important part in a sort of guerilla warfare.

Though some of the principal characters belong to history, they are here brought forward principally in connexion with the main plot of the story, which turns on the fortunes of a pair of noble lovers. There are inferior personages in the drama, who as strongly engage the sympathies of the reader, and, in particular, one frail and humble maiden, the victim of the arch-villain of the Tale, whose character is finely conceived; and supported throughout with great tact and delicacy. In the name of sound morals and good taste, we would thank Mr. James for showing that this ruined village maiden—woman, and fallen though she be—is still a reasonable and responsible being, and not a crouching spaniel, kissing the feet of the cruel and treacherous villain who has destroyed her;—not one who, through an infatuated devotion, more allied to the lowest animal instinct, than to the attachment of an intelligent being, confounds the first principles of right and wrong, and perverts every nobler feeling of her nature to follow the blind impulse of misplaced love and fidelity. Something like this has of late been the favourite female character in some of our modern romances. In poor Kate Greenly, Mr. James has done better. Without being vindictive, or ceasing to be gentle and womanly in her feelings, she retains her moral sense, and is made the voluntary agent in unfolding the villany of her betrayer, whose plans she frustrates, without losing her hold upon the reader's sympathies. This is a somewhat difficult task for an artist; but it is successfully accomplished.——We cannot give even the faintest hint of the plot, or sketch of the characters; but as specimens of the still-life scenes, select this wayside inn of the olden time—the home of Kate Greenly in her days of peace and innocence—which chances to turn up first:—

The house was constructed of wood, and was but of two stories; but let it not be supposed on that account that it was devoid of ornament, for manifold were the quaint carvings and rude pieces of sculpture with which it was decorated, and not small had been the pains which had been bestowed upon mouldings and cornices, and lintels and door-posts by the hand of more than one laborious artisan. Indeed, altogether, it was a very elaborate piece of work, and had probably been originally built for other purposes than that which it now served; for many were the changes which had taken place in that part of the country, as well as over the rest of England, between the days I speak of, and those of a century before.

Any one who examined the house closely, would have seen that it must have been constructed before the year 1180; for there was very strong proof, in the forms of the windows, and the cutting across of several of the beams which traversed the front, that at the period of its erection the use of glazed casements in private houses was not known. At the time I speak of, however, glass had become plentiful in England, and, though cottages were seldom ornamented with anything like a lattice, yet no house with the rank and dignity of an inn, where travellers might stop in rainy and boisterous weather, was now without windows, formed of manifold small lozenge-shaped pieces of glass, like those still frequently employed in churches, only of a smaller size.

The inn was a gay-looking, cheerful place, either in fine weather or in foul; for, as there are some men who, clothe them as you will, have a distinguished and graceful air, so are there some dwellings which look sunshiny and bright, let the aspect of the sky be what it will. The upper story of the house projected beyond the lower, and formed of itself a sort of portico, giving a shelter to two long benches placed beneath it, either from the heat of the summer sun, or the rain of the spring and autumn; and it need not be said that these benches formed the favourite resting-place of sundry old men on bright summer evenings; and that many a time, in fine weather, a table would be put out upon the green before the house, the bench offering seats on one side, while settles and stools gave accommodation on the other, to many a merry party round the good roast-beef and humming ale.

Before the door of the inn, spread out one of those pleasant open pieces of ground, which generally found room for themselves in every country village in England; on which the sports of the place were held; to which the jockey brought his horse for sale, and tried his paces up and down; on which many a wrestler took a fall, and cudgel-player got a broken head. There too, in their season, were the merry may-pole and the dance, the tabor and the pipe. There was many a maiden wooed and won; and there passed along all the three processions of life—the infant to the font, the bride to the altar, the corpse to the grave.

One more detached bit we may venture upon—an equestrian quite characteristic of "Forest Days,"—

Jogging along upon the mule, with his legs hanging down easily by the side of the animal, and his fat stomach resting peacefully upon the saddle, was a jolly friar, clothed in grey, with his capuche thrown back, the sun not being troublesome, and a bald head—the glistening smoothness of which had descended by tradition even to Shakspeare's days, and was recorded by him in his Two Gentlemen of Verona—peeping out from a narrow ring of jet black hair, scarcely streaked with grey.

His face was large and jovial, which, in good sooth, was no distinction in those times between one friar and another; but there was withal a look of roguish fun about the corners of his small grey eyes; and a jeering smile, full of arch satire, quivered upon his upper lip, completely neutralizing the somewhat sensual and food-loving expression of the under one, which moved up and down every time he spoke, like a valve, to let out the words that could never come in again. Indeed, he seemed to be one of those easy-living friars who, knowing neither sorrow nor privation in their own persons, appeared to look upon grief and care with a ready laugh and a light joke, as if no such things in reality exist. His rosy gills, his double chin, and his large round ear, all spoke of marrow and fatness; and, indeed, at the very first sight, the spectator saw that he was not only a well-contented being, but one who had good reason to be so.

Just as they reached the entrance of the tavern which we have mentioned, the friar, by some mismanagement, contrived to get his mule's hind quarters towards the servant, who was riding singly on horseback, and, by a touch of the heel, given, apparently, to make the beast put itself into a more convenient position for all parties, he produced a violent fit of kicking, in the course of which the horseman received a blow upon the fleshy part of his thigh, which made him roar with pain. The seat upon the vicious beast's back was no easy one, but yet the fat monk kept his position, laughing heartily, and calling his mule a petulant rogue, while he held him by his left ear, or patted his pampered neck. As soon as the fit was done, he rolled quietly off at the side, and looking up to his companion, saw, or appeared to see, for the first time, the wry faces which the servant man was making.

"Bless my heart!" he cried, "has he touched thee, the good-for-nothing rogue! I will chastise him for it soundly."

"If he have not broke my leg it is not his fault," replied the man, dismounting, and limping round his horse; "and you have as great a share in it, mad priest, for bringing his heels round where they had no business to be."

"Nay," rejoined the friar, "I brought not his heels round, he brought them himself, and me along with them. It was all intended to cast me off; so the offence is towards myself, and I shall puniah him severely. He shall have five barley-corns of food less for his misbehaviour."

"Pshaw!" said the serving-man, looking up at the inn. "You are jesting foully, friar; I am sorry I let you join us. Is this the hostel you boasted had such good wine! It seems but a poor place for such commendation."

"Thou shalt find the liquor better than in any house in Hereford," replied he of the grey gown; "whether you choose mead, or metheglin, or excellent warm Burgundy, or cool Bordeaux. Taste and try,—taste and try; and if you find that I have deceived you, you shall cut me into pieces not an inch square, and sow me along the high road! There is good lodging too.—Canst thou not trust a friar?"

Miscellanies in Prose and Verse. By C. Bond. Edinburgh: Blackwood & Sons.

These Miscellanies consist of reminiscences of Inverness, alias, Clachnacudin, taken down by the Editor of the Inverness Herald from the conversation of a man of ninety years of age, a venerable relic of the past,—whose faculties are still entire, and whose mind is as vivacious as it may have been shortly after the Battle of Culloden. This patriarch lost his parents in his infancy, and was brought up by a grandfather, who lived to the great age of ninety-seven. The memories of the Highlands, transmitted from the grandfather to the grandson, thus stretch back for above 150 years, to a period, "when," as we can well believe, "the Highlands were in a very different state from what they are now." The reminiscences of the Nonagenarian must possess great local interest; and though Captain Burt's Letters have forestalled some of his information, he has related many curious incidents, particularly those which occurred about the time of the Rebellion, which was long subsequent to Burt's residence in Inverness. We select the following traits of manners, now a century old, as specimens of this amusing little book:—

KIRK DISCIPLINE.

The Rev. Peter Nicholson of Kiltarlity so far carried out the discipline of the Kirk, as to order, of course not for good conduct,

LORD LOVAT ON THE CUTTY STOOL.

This order sadly militated against the pride and wishes of his Lordship. Being, however, assured by Clerk Fraser that the law of the Kirk was imperative, and that nothing but compliance would save him from excommunication, he consented to the punishment, upon a promise from the Clerk that he would stand by him for three Sundays in the Church of Kiltarlity. Mr. Nicholson, who was then the John Knox of the Highlands, being about to address the lordly occupant of the Cutty Stool, Lovat exclaimed, "Ah, Nicholson, you ungrateful man! was it not I that placed you there?" (having presented him to the living); whereupon Mr. N. answered, "True, my lord, you have placed me here; and I have placed you there to-day, to be publicly rebuked for your sins." Lord Lovat, however, thereafter forsook the Church of Kiltarlity, and became a hearer of that eminent divine, Mr. Chisholm of Kilmorack. . . . . Nonagenarian remembers seeing, in addition to the cutty stool, the brangus, or iron collar, affixed near the entrance; and the last person said to have been exhibited as an example to offenders, was a military officer, at the instance of the Rev. Mr. Macbean.

INTRUSION OF MINISTERS.

In 1722, however, Lord Simon Lovat presented the Rev. Mr. Thompson, at that time chaplain in the Castle of Inverness, to the parish [Kirkhill]. The anticipated difficulty of reconciling the people to such an appointment was immediately realized. Forgetful, it would seem, of the peaceable doctrines inculcated by the departed minister, the parishioners proceeded violently to oppose the settlement. The population turned out en masse; the women, under the leadership of Muckle Kate M'Phail, a person of masculine stature, being particularly active. Having filled the creels they carried on their backs with stones, they commenced such an attack upon Mr. Thompson, that he precipitately retreated to Inverness, closely followed by his persecutors, who kept up a brisk running fire at him with stones from the church till he reached King Street, near the Central School, a distance of about eight miles. His appearance, on passing the Green of Muirtown, was painfully ludicrous in the extreme. Mr Thompson was a remarkably little man; under his arm he carried what was then termed a brown polonie, or great coat, a huge wig reached half down his back, while his broad-skirted and long-flapped coat sorely oppressed and encumbered him, as, with his cocked hat in one hand, and perspiring at every pore, he trotted on; a stone or two from his enraged pursuers, under their generalissimo, Muckle Kate, ever and anon counselling him to quicken his pace. The very children accompanied their mothers and supplied ammunition for their creels, by picking up stones and putting them into them. Such an exhibition attracted numerous females to the doors of their cottages at the Green of Muirtown, to whom he said, as he ran by, "Oh, women, is not this hard?" His brother, being master-gunner at the Castle, and expecting the reverend gentleman would have to make a quick retreat from Kirkhill, was looking from the Castle-hill in that direction; and seeing his brother hard pressed by the foe, he sent a few soldiers out to cover and make good his retreat; and at sight of t-arm dearg, or the "red-sodgers," Muckle Kate and her "irregulars" in turn "faced about" in double-quick time. A whole year elapsed, before Mr Thompson attempted again to appear at the church of Kirkhill. In the meantime, the feelings of the parishioners were softened down; and being an excellent man, and as "a continual dropping wears the rock," so in process of time the parishioners of Kirkhill became quite reconciled to his ministrations,—Muckle Kate, among other of her allies, being indebted in after-life to him for assistance. At the era of 1745-6, Mr Thompson was conspicuous for his loyalty to the house of Brunswick.

THE PRICES OF PROVISIONS NINETY YEARS AGO.

Nonagenarian remembers the best butter being sold at 10s. the stone, Dutch weight; cheese at 3s. per stone do. A good leg of mutton might be obtained for 1s. 3d., the fleshers never thought of weighing legs of mutton but merely named a price from 1s. to 1s. 3d. according to the apparent size. Good beef was sold at 1d. and 1½d. per lb. Oatmeal at 6d. per peck. Hollands, 1d. per gill; strong beer, 3d. per Scotch pint. A fat hen was sold at from 3½d. to 4d., chickens 2d. per pair; eggs were generally sold at about 1d. per dozen. Shoes, (Brocan Sasanach,) from 2s. 6d. to 2s. 9d. per pair; brogues, (Brocan Dubh,) from 10d. to 1s. per do. The best green tea was frequently bought at 1s. 6d. the pound; it is probable, however, that it was smuggled. In those days the Excise officers in the town, consisted of honest Mr. Collie and his son; and when the Inverness dealers expected a smuggling vessel in the Firth, they were accustomed to get the father and son into their houses and treat them with such hospitality, that they would neither be fit to distinguish a free trader from another vessel, nor have an opportunity of leaving the houses of their kind entertainers before a late hour on the following day. Although the prices enumerated appear very low, yet they were great compared with previous years. Nonagenarian well remembers Donald Cameron, a neighbour, mentioning that he and his wife had been on a Friday morning to the market, and purchased a leg of mutton, a peck of meal, and cart of peats, all for 11d., and procured a gill of Hollands for himself and guidwife with the other penny composing the shilling. Wages were low, the difference, however, that existed, was considerably in favour of the poor.

So far as the reminiscences of the Nonagerian go, the book is really amusing. It also contains some copies of verses; and a semi-political Essay.

Man and his Mistress; or, Woman's Revolt; a Mock-heroic Melo-drama. By George Nash.

This bit of fun appears in Calcutta, which is perhaps the most remarkable circumstance connected with it.

The Biographical Dictionary of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. Volume II. Longman & Company.

This volume extends from the conclusion of the Alexanders to the Amelion's; Amelion Pascal being the last memoir. Among the more interesting lives are those of Alfred and Alfieri.

The Last Year in China, to the Peace of Nanking; as Sketched in Letters to his Friends; by a Field-Officer. Longman & Co.

These letters have all the interest which an intelligent eye-witness who was at head-quarters, and personally engaged in those military events, which led to the late glorious peace, (if it last,) can communicate to a narrative. The author's views of policy are as sound as his sketches are lively and characteristic. The work has been late of reaching us, but we hope to be yet able to give a better account of it.

Attica and Athens; an Inquiry into the Civil, Moral, and Religious Institutions of the Inhabitants, the Rise and Decline of the Athenian Power, &c. &c. &c. Translated from the German of K. O. Müller, Grotefend, Gruber, and others. By John Ingram Lockhart, F.R.A.S. London: Groombridge.

Notwithstanding the many volumes which have been written by Englishmen upon Athens and Greece, we cannot doubt that the researches of those erudite and patient German scholars who have more recently turned their attention to investigations connected with this the most interesting spot of earth to scholars of every nation, will be appreciated by classical readers in England. The work is illustrated by Müller's Map of Attica, and Plan of Ancient Athens.

Elements of Universal History. For the use of Schools, and of Private Students. Pp. 660. By H. White, B. A. of Trinity College, Cambridge. Oliver & Boyd.

This portly volume is formed on nearly the same excellent plan as the large work of M. Von Rotteck, which we had lately occasion to commend; with this difference, that the German work is adapted for readers of all classes, and this condensed view of Universal History mainly for the use of schools, of the self-educated, and those who have not means or leisure to peruse voluminous works. It evidences great care and industry in the compiler; and will be of value as a reading-book, and also from its clear chronological arrangement, as a work of reference. The History, from the Creation to the recent Peace with China, is taken by centuries; more or less space being devoted to each, according to the importance of the events by which it was marked. An excellent feature is, a brief view of the state of Literature, Science, and Art, in the different countries of Europe, occurring at the close of particular epochs. Upon the whole, we consider this the most complete and valuable compendium of general history, for the use of the young, that we have yet seen.

Ten Thousand Things relating to China and the Chinese. By William B. Langdon, Esq., Curator of the Chinese Collection. Sold at the Collection, Hyde Park Corner.

This is a handsomely got-up volume, with numerous lithographed illustrations, on tinted paper, of the various objects to be seen in the Chinese Collection; or the "Chinese World in Miniature," now exhibiting in London. But the work is more than this. It is a timely, if cursory, account of "the Genius, Government, History, Literature, Agriculture, Arts, Manners, Customs, and Social Life of the Chinese, in the form of a descriptive catalogue of the contents of the Chinese Collection. That Collection, which is extensive, rich, and even magnificent, was originally formed by Mr. Nathan Dun of Philadelphia, who devoted many years, spent in China, and a fortune to its acquisition. To those who have not an opportunity of visiting it in London with this catalogue in their hands, the catalogue will of itself afford a great deal of interesting, curious, and accurate information about a region and a people that now fill the thoughts of all Europe.

Practical Mercantile Correspondence; a Collection of Modern Letters of Business, &c., &c. By William Anderson. Second Edition. London: Effingham Wilson.

This is a companion or guide to a young man entering a counting-house, and beginning to write business letters. Perhaps, in real practice, some of the model epistles might be found to contain more than exactly the needful for daily practice. But boys must practise great text in order to acquire a current hand, and compose long letters before they acquire the art of condensation.

Practical Arithmetic, with Notes and Illustrations, &c., &c. By John Darby, Leeds.

Aphorisms and Reflections; a Miscellany of Thought and Opinion. By William Benton Clulow. London: John Murray.

This is one of a class of works which are even more useful to men involved in the active business or turmoil of life, than to the studious and reflective. It is of the distilled spirit, or essence of the finest thoughts of the wisest men; with the added treasures of the author's own reflections. It is suggestive as well as conclusive; a book to lie at one's elbow. Open it at any page, and you will be sure to meet with a good idea or ingenious speculation of some sort; which may act as a key-note to the thinking faculty. Though, from its nature, desultory, the contents are arranged in paragraphs and sections, under such general heads as Character; Intellectual habits; Fame; Style; Fancy, and Imagination, &c., &c. To give specimens of such a work is not easy; every paragraph being equally highly finished. We have marked out many, but must be content with one or two. This first is from the section of the work, entitled Mind, Studies, and Intellectual habits:—

The culture of the affections and the fancy is a most important branch of education; though, in general, it is entirely neglected. It would, indeed, require a widely different order of instructors from those that commonly abound.—The greatness of man appears not chiefly from his intellect, for he knows but little, and reasons less; nor from his immortality, for matter is probably indestructible as well as mind—to say nothing of the presumptions in favour of the future existence of brutes—nor from the ingenuity or magnitude of his performances; for in both these particulars he is rivalled or surpassed by some of the lower tribes of creation—witness the cells of the bee, and the coral-reefs of the Pacific, the work of animalcules. But it is the wondrous, fathomless endowments of feeling, and of imagination, viewed especially in their moral relations, that most betoken his grandeur, and invest him with so mysterious a dignity. I can never think meanly of a being who is capable of the exquisite dreams that visit the youthful fancy, or of the passions that are portrayed in the tragedy of Othello.

From the section on Happiness we cull this sample of our Reflector's philosophy:—

It is astonishing with how few external resources a person may live in a state of comfort and intellectual progression. The catalogue of human desiderata is certainly not very extensive, if we are to admit the opinion of Alphonsus, the wise king of Arragon, who, as quoted by Sir William Temple in his Essay on Ancient and Modern Learning, was accustomed to say, that, among the various things which mankind either possess or seek, all are baubles, except "old wood to burn, old wine to drink, old friends to converse with, and old books to read." The Roman people, in the time of Juvenal, somewhat like the Parisians at present, required only panem et Circenses. As a general rule, where there is much physical satisfaction or repose, there are not many complicated or artificial wants. The inhabitants of sunny and delicious climes are usually satisfied with a small number of gratifications; for if the body be at ease the mind is commonly so too; while most of the pursuits and cravings of people in colder countries arise from the necessities imposed by their local situation. It demands no trivial fortune, expended on the accommodations which ingenuity can procure, to overtake the luxurious independence of those who live in a benign and cloudless region.

It would be easy to find passages more profound and subtle than the above—as the following:—

The union of pride with affectionate feeling, a combination by no means uncommon, often occasions considerable uneasiness to its subject. The former assumes the appearance of sufficient internal resources; while the latter requires the sympathy and attachment of others, which is liable to be chilled or repelled by that appearance.

Mediocrity.—"Correct mediocrity will succeed better, at least for a while, with the public at large, as well as with a certain class of critics, than the most distinguished merit, combined with some conspicuous foibles or peculiarities. Witness Bentham in legislation; and in poetry, Coleridge and Wordsworth."

These passages, we are sensible, convey no adequate notion of the merits of this bundle of wise reflections and sage aphorisms; but they may give a general idea of the nature of the book.

Introduction to the Study of the Works of Jeremy Bentham. By John Hill Burton, Advocate, one of the Editors of the Collected Edition.

The works of Bentham, both from their extent and character, require a Guide, and also something in the shape of a Key; nor could the Disciple do more fitting homage to the memory of the Master, than by supplying this, or whatever else may facilitate the study and dissemination of his Master's doctrines. This ministerial office Mr. Burton has performed for Bentham, in a clear and well-written general review of the opinions of the philosopher, as they are found embodied in his voluminous writings; or, more properly, he has given a bird's-eye view of Bentham's system, and of whatever is original or peculiar in the development of that system. The Introduction is divided into Sections, the first of which treats of Bentham's Style, the second of the Greatest-Happiness Principle; another of Fallacies; another, the Pursuit of Truth, and so on: each giving a brief, but comprehensive view of Bentham's ideas on the subjects discussed.

The tract will not only afford a guide to the perusal of Bentham's Works, and an incitement to their study, but will put many, who may never have an opportunity of opening them, in possession of whatever, in his doctrines, is most conducive to the improvement and well-being of society, which was the great and undivided object of Bentham's labours for threescore years. Mr. Burton's laudable attempt to render these labours more available to mankind will, we doubt not, be highly appreciated.

SERIAL WORKS.

Bells and Pomegranates. No. IV. The Return of the Druses.

Jessie Phillips, a Tale of the New Poor-Law. Part II.—With the actual working of the Poor-Law we do not get far in this number; though "coming events" are shadowed by a Lawyer Commissioner from London, a complete man of the world; and by an accomplished rural seducer of the Squire Thornhill breed.

Harry Mowbray, by Captain Knox. Part II.—This is a story illustrated by humorous cuts in the prevailing taste—not the highest nor purest—of the day; but as we have not seen the first number, we are rather at sea about it; though the style appears lively, and the characters diversified.

Chambers's Cyclopædia of English Literature. Part II.—This part contains upwards of thirty subjects, among which are the whole of the master-spirits of the Elizabethan era. In general our fault with such compilations is, that they are too long; but to thrust the galaxy of the greatest English poets and dramatists into this narrow space, is making the work not a Cyclopædia, but a mere Index or Catalogue raisonné. Even that is highly desirable; but Mr. Chambers should surely allow more scope for "Elegant Extracts."

Cumming's Book of Martyrs. Part XX.

Doyle's Cyclopedia of Practical Husbandry. Part X.

Chronicles of the Care-worn. No. I.—This is the first number of a cheap series, with illustrations, which appears intended to draw the attention of the wealthy to the miseries of their fellow-creatures, and to some of the vices of the social system, as these affect all classes.

The Vicar's Lantern. Vol. I.—This volume consists of a thick, stitched, paper pamphlet, made up of lesser pamphlets, the object of which seems to be the exposure of Church abuses, and of the unscriptural nature and evil tendencies of Church Establishments.

German Amaranths. No. I.—This is a small periodical in the German language, edited by M. Klauer, whose educational works are now well-known in this country. It consists of short pieces, original and selected, in prose and verse, the subjects of which are in all styles.

The Sea Hath Spoken.—A Sermon lately preached in Ebenezer Chapel, Shadwell. By E. E. Adams, formerly Chaplain to the Seamen at St. Petersburg.—This discourse is meant to recommend and carry out the objects of the British and Foreign Sailor's Society. If somewhat declamatory in style for a severe taste, it is telling, and at times even impressive.

Report of the General Meeting of Artists held at the Free-Masons' Tavern, London.

Popular Flowers. No. II.—The Pansy.

Gurney's Faust, a Tragedy. Part the Second. Nos. VII. and VIII.

Smee's Elements of Electro-Metallurgy. Parts VIII. and IX.

PAMPHLETS.

National Distress: its Causes and Remedies.—This pamphlet is evidently the production of an able and a philanthropic man; and so highly do we esteem its purpose and its execution, that if it were not so low-priced as to be generally accessible, we should think it our duty to lay a summary of it before the public. As it is, we rest contented with a few insulated passages, without attending to their logical connexion:—

With respect to the question of accumulation, there may appear, at first sight, to be some variance between me and the authorities, but I think the difference will be found to be merely verbal. My argument has reference to real wealth, and they speak of a nominal or representative wealth—the one is in esse, the other in posse. When I make use of the term wealth, I understand by it articles of necessity and comfort, of convenience and luxury; and I allege that it is impossible to create any accumulation of these, partly because the produce of the earth, on an average of years, is not more than an ample sufficiency for its inhabitants; and partly for the reason that people never value any thing of which they are not in want, provided it is to be had when they happen to have occasion for it. Consequently, the producers of any species of goods never accumulate stock; since, even if it were practicable for them to fill their barns with a two-years' supply of corn, or their warehouses with a two-years' stock of manufactured articles, they would derive no benefit whatever from the accumulation, but, on the contrary, suffer a depreciation of its value. The wealth of a country consists, in the first place, in an abundant supply of articles of general consumption. . . . . The wealth of Great Britain is generally rated very high, without considering the frightful mass of poverty which must be set off against it. . . . . It therefore appears, that the miserable destitution of a large portion of our population is a necessary coincidence with the inordinate wealth of the upper classes. That wealth cannot be accumulated but to a very moderate extent. That a vast amount of what is called wealth is merely the means of producing it with greater facility, the effect of which is, not to create a surplus or accumulation, but a better and cheaper supply than before. That the term cheapness has reference principally to a saving of labour, which, though in itself an obvious and important advantage, has, nevertheless, in consequence of a corrupt political and social system, involved many and serious evils, with little corresponding benefit. . . . . .

With regard to the Corn Law. It must be admitted that it is injurious in every point of view. In the first place, it raises prices to the manifest and permanent detriment of the whole community; and in a country which is unable at any time to supply the wants of its population, the inevitable effect is to obviate the possibility of cheapness. Secondly, it counteracts the beneficent provision of Nature against local scarcity, by restricting commercial intercourse, and leaving a people as much as possible dependent upon the uncertain production of their own soil. Experience has shown, that although the produce of any particular district be as problematical as the duration of an individual life, yet, nevertheless, the aggregate of harvests is as constant and certain as the average value of lives. If, therefore, an occasional deficiency in the crops of a particular country have any meaning at all, surely it must be to teach all nations their mutual dependence upon one another, and by making them feel their need of assistance, to furnish them with every motive to cultivate those feelings and affections, the prevalence of which is essential to the general welfare of humanity. Thirdly, by narrowing the range of supply, it creates enormous fluctuations in value, and produces gambling of the worst sort, either involving the ruin of the gamblers, or the general privation incident to high prices. Fourthly, it has a very injurious effect upon native agriculture, by taking away a powerful motive to improvement, and inducing cultivators to depend upon a full price, rather than an abundant produce. Fifthly, it is productive of vast injury to the large landed proprietors, by greatly augmenting the amount of their enormous revenues; which, as they cannot possibly expend in a rational manner for their own benefit, they squander away in every species of profligacy and extravagance. In fine, this Corn Law is a rank manifestation of blind selfishness, without any qualification to redeem it from utter and universal reprobation.

He must be a primitive writer, who, in these days, speaks of augmenting the revenues of landed proprietors, —of swelling out the dimensions of the camel, so that it shall be still more difficult for it to pass through the eye of the needle, as if it were inflicting "a vast injury" on them. But this is, indeed, no every-day preacher of political economy and social morality. In another place, he remarks,—

Having traced the proximate cause of the prevalence of poverty and wretchedness, I shall now proceed to show the ultimate causes which produce and perpetuate this unsatisfactory state of things. The origin of the excessive inequality of wealth is to be found in the extravagant demands of pride, vanity, and rapacity,—coincident with general ignorance and a low standard of morality. Pride and vanity, in their various manifestations, operate indirectly to induce the accumulation of wealth, in order to their own more effectual gratification; but greediness and rapacity operate directly to the same end, and the general result is to render all mankind the enemies of each other. Seated at the ample table of Nature, which provides abundance and variety for all, the greedy man covets everything that is within his reach, and without any regard to the necessities of his neighbours, appropriates all he can get to his own use. The supremacy of selfishness is the curse of the present, as it has been of all past ages. In different periods of the world's history, and under different circumstances, its manifestations have been variously modified; but pride and vanity have been ever directed to the attainment of rank, power, and distinction, and the present generation seems to be devoted, body and soul, to the service of Mammon, because he happens to have them all in his gift. The pure principle of selfishness is therefore, openly avowed, and practically carried out,—that every man has a right to get as much as he can, without any regard to the rights or interests of others. Upon consideration, however, it will appear clear, that as no individual would be justified in making use of his superior physical strength to aggrandize himself at the expense of his fellow-men, so, if an individual should compass the the same end by means of his intellectual superiority, he would equally violate the plain principles of morality, although he might not offend against the common or statute law. It is obvious, that a variety of cases must constantly occur which cannot be made the subject of legislative provision; but the man who feels himself bound by the dictates of reason and conscience, will still acknowledge the supremacy of natural justice, although the civil power interfere not to maintain it. It is therefore rather surprising, that in the nineteenth century, there should be found men, many of them calling themselves Christians, who should unblushingly assert the principle of might against right, and approve in their hearts "the good old rule, the simple plan—that they should take who have the power, and they should keep who can." Nevertheless, it appears to be assumed, as a proposition too obvious to admit of dispute, that any man has a right to amass as much wealth as he can, so long as he keeps to windward of the law; and it seems to be considered, that the code of natural or Christian morality has no reference to the matter whatever. It is held, moreover, by nine tradesmen out of ten, that they are fully justified in charging the highest rate of profit which it is possible to obtain. Now in both these cases the principle is the same; but such a principle is utterly repugnant to reason and morality. If an individual devote his labour and skill to the production of any species of wealth, he is entitled to a profit having reference to the magnitude and importance of the beneficial result to the community, and the amount of mental or physical exertion which is necessary to produce it. Profit or wages is an equivalent for a service performed, and should therefore bear a due relation to its extent, and the difficulty attending its performance. Consequently, the producers of wealth have a right to a good profit, because their labour and skill confer a value upon the raw material. The distributor, however, who is merely the agent of the producer, confers no additional value upon the goods, his store being simply a matter of convenience to the public, by furnishing facilities for the better supply of their wants. The profit of the distributor must, therefore, be comparatively small, because the principle upon which it is received is this,—that the party has performed some valuable service, and is entitled to a corresponding recompense. It is consequently evident, that any individual who takes advantage of the necessity or ignorance of others, to demand a larger profit than the nature of the transaction fairly warrants, is guilty of a piece of dishonesty. The term may appear harsh, but I know of no better definition of dishonesty, than the making use of force or deception to obtain that to which the party has no rightful claim. An extravagant profit is, without doubt, a violation of right ; but if the public are ignorant of the fact, or unable to help themselves, the immorality of the affair is so much the greater. It is plain enough that most people view the matter in this light, when they are capable of looking at it with an unprejudiced eye. If the public ascertain that their butchers, bakers, or grocers, have been charging them exorbitant prices for their goods, the whole herd are forthwith denounced as little better than so many scoundrels ; and, if they cannot be induced to come down to moderate terms by fair means, compulsory measures are immediately threatened. But the misfortune is, that although every man is sharp-sighted to discover his neighbour's sins, he is wonderfully dull to the perception of his own. There are few who will not admit in theory the principle which I have propounded ; and yet, with strange inconsistency, they deny it in practice, and compound for their own self-justification by wholesale abuse of others. Competition, however, stimulated by rapacity, is so severely felt, that one-half of the trading community are rendered dishonest in spite of themselves ;—indeed, the spectacle which society presents, when its influence is in full operation, is to the last degree sickening and disgusting. The wealthy urged by the love of gain, the poor by stern necessity, engage in an unequal struggle, each endeavouring to take advantage of the other ; and, in order to do so, resorting to every species of chicanery and imposition.

Here we might fancy Jonathan Dymond speaking from the Dead.——The author's Remedies we can barely enumerate. They are first, the abolition of the law of primogeniture; secondly, the thorough revision of the system of taxation, and the adoption of direct taxation; thirdly, a general restriction of the hours of labour, by legislative enactment ; fourthly, the establishment of free commercial intercourse with all nations.——The Currency, and the National Debt, are also subjects held to be for inquiry, with a view to remedial measures ; but these, without the reasons on which they are argued, cannot be understood. We may add, that this writer is no friend to Universal Suffrage, until that Millennial period arrives, when every man shall be sufficiently well-educated, and so independent of external influences as to make a proper use of the Franchise ; i. e. when it will no longer be required.

Love Letters of Mrs. Piozzi, written when she was eighty, to William Augustus Conway.—There appears to be no question as to the authenticity of the Seven Letters, filling some twenty pages, which bear the above title ; and yet we fear the publication must be denominated "a catch-penny." A preface, establishing the authenticity of the letters, labours also to prove, that Mrs. Piozzi, at fourscore, was in love with the eminently handsome, young tragedian, to whom her vivacious epistles are addressed. And, no doubt, the octogenarian lady was seized with one of those periodical crazes to which persons of her kind, but flighty and fickle character, are liable ; though, at her age, the favourite object is more frequently a parson or a poodle, than a young player : and to describe the letters as love-letters, is too much. At the very most, they merely demonstrate that—

Even in our ashes live their wonted fires.

In England, such things are of rare occurrence, and therefore marvellous ; but a Frenchwoman, at all ages, may freely write in this style, and not be liable to be mistaken. Madame du Deffand, who, in extreme old age, was seized with a strong partiality for Horace Walpole, then a sprightly young man, carried on a constant correspondence with him in this "love-letter" style, which even went so far as to alarm the sensitive Englishman; who often remonstrated with his correspondent on her impassioned style, as exposing them both to ridicule. The fate of Mrs. Piozzi's last lover—for Conway surely was the last—was melancholy. He had been so bepraised for his extremely handsome person and face, that he had probably formed an over-weening opinion of those histrionic powers which both England and America treated with coldness and indifference. From a disappointed actor, he became a devotee, and studied with a view to taking orders. His mind was, however, so cruelly lacerated by the gibes and sneers of his American critics, that, in a fit of despondency, he threw himself overboard in a voyage between New York and Charleston, just as the packet was crossing the bar. Among his effects, which were afterwards sold at New York, were found the originals of Mrs. Piozzi's Letters, which are now published, and which will probably turn out a bad speculation for the purchaser ; as all such publications ought to do. In the notes to the letters, we find the extraordinary reason assigned for the marriage of John Kemble with the widow of Brereton the player, (which to many seemed a strange union for "King John,") that he was induced to marry from the expectation of receiving a large sum from a nobleman whose daughter was in love with him ! Green-rooms for all manner of esclandres and gossip, certainly beat both Courts and Clubhouses.

New Zealand Colonization. By John Jennings.—The author of this pamphlet is a New Zealand agent. He points out some errors and mistakes in the plans hitherto pursued by the Company, and broaches his own scheme ; the details of which, to make them intelligible, would occupy nearly as much space in our pages as in the original pamphlet.

Two Lectures on the Defective Arrangements in Large Towns, to Secure the Health and Comfort of the Inhabitants,—Read before the Hull Literary and Philosophical Society. By Humphry Sandwith, M. D.—To those who have seen Mr. Chadwick's Sanatory Reports, Mr. Symons' Arts and Artisans, and the other tracts that have, within the last three years, appeared upon this subject, these Lectures tell little that is novel ; but the subject of them is one that cannot be too often brought under discussion, nor too constantly kept before the public eye.

PERAULT; OR, SLAVES AND THEIR MASTERS.

CHAPTER XV.

PERAULT, on seeing Zama quit the apartment so hastily, followed him, and overtook him on the lawn.

"Perault," said Zama, fiercely, "you have dragged me into an abyss, from whence I cannot escape. I have sworn to abide by you in this struggle for the freedom of our race. Yet there is one pledge which I exact; without it I draw back from this enterprise."

"And betray us, I suppose," said Perault, coldly.

"No, there you wrong me. Your secrets I shall keep; but dare to harm one hair of those who are now on this plantation, and by my soul's best hopes, I swear that my hand shall shed thy heart's blood."

"Be it so," said Perault; "but why this burst of fury?"

"Mark me, Perault," said Zama. "Here are the friends who brought me up from infancy: there is the kind master, kinder than a father to me; there is the youth, my companion in childhood; there is—"

"The lady of thy love," said Perault. "Go on, Zama, with thy catalogue."

"Sneer not at my words, Perault; rouse not the devil in my heart, else you may fare the worse for it!" said Zama, with a burst of passion.

"Heavens!" exclaimed Perault, "how frenzy will mislead a man! Here is the friend of my youth, to whom liberty, glory, honour, and wealth, are offered; and yet, for a silly feeling of gratitude to his owners, he rejects all and remains an abject slave. Revile me, Zama, as you will, I'll calmly listen to you."

"Perault, I cannot—will not hear of my friends being injured in this revolt," said Zama.

"I seek not their lives," said Perault. "Let them live here if they will. Let Miss Bellgrove remain, and be the bride of Waldenberg. Nay, frown not. Let a chosen band remain with thee to guard over Waldenberg and his bride. We ask none to join us who covet not their freedom."

"Perault, you tamper with my feelings too much," said Zama, sternly.

"Nay, Zama. I have heard that you are to become the slave of Miss Bellgrove, as a reward for saving your young master. When you are her slave, of course you are the slave of her husband—of Waldenberg."

"His slave!" shrieked Zama.

"Ay," continued the wily tempter, "his slave; to behold before thee constantly how much she loves him. Nay, more, Zama; thy sister, the gentle Zada, must become his slave also, subject to his commands, harsh enough at times, perhaps, should he think she shared with him her lady's love."

"No more of this, Perault," cried Zama. "I will lead your cut-throat bands along with you; so cease this hated theme. And yet," he added, as he clasped his hands, "to think that I should prove an ingrate to one so generous and good."

"Ingrate!" said Perault, "where lies the ingratitude? You wrought hard enough for food and clothing, I presume. After young Charles was carried off, you met with the tender care of that old polecat, Joolay,—a man whose name is a scoff and by-word in the city. As to kindness shown you to-day, they would have shown as much to a favourite dog; for, trust me, Zama, these pale-faced planters make no distinction between a trusty slave and a trusty dog."

"There you are wrong, Perault," said Zama. "'Tis true, that after the death of Mistress Bellgrove, my master lived in deep seclusion: if I employed myself amongst the negro bands, it was by no command of his; and as for Joolay, harsh though he is, he never did me wrong."

"He knew you had a soul that would not bear it; but although he dared not touch you with his whip, has he not often struck a sorer blow to your feelings? Has he not, by taunts, given that injury which is, of all blows, the keenest felt by a sensitive mind?"

"No more of this," exclaimed Zama.

"I have but one remark to make," said Perault, "and then I have done. Your sister—"

"What of her," said Zama.

"This morning I, by accident, saved her from the rude assault of a Waldenberg."

"Ha! So this accounts for her alarm, and her refusal to tell me the name of her assailant."

"Are such things to be submitted to, Zama? You love your sister, doubtless; would you wish to see her cast into the arms of a Waldenberg?"

"No, never! Sooner than see that, I would stab her to the heart, and free her from such vile pollution," exclaimed Zama.

"I honour you for such sentiments, Zama. But the sooner our blow for liberty is struck the better. Be ready; the hour is at hand."

"As soon as you please, Perault:—my heart is nerved to it," said Zama.

"In the meantime return to the mansion-house. Let no suspicion dwell in the minds of its inmates."

"But recollect, Perault," said Zama, "no harm must befall them, or your own life shall answer for it: I have sworn it."

"Mr. Bellgrove and his son shall be safe," said Perault. "As for Miss Bellgrove, she is in your power; do with her as you please."

Perault turned and proceeded towards the negro huts, when, in passing a small thicket, he observed a stick thurst into the ground, with a piece of black crape attached to it. He started, and, glancing apprehensively around, gave a faint, low whistle. It was answered from a neighbouring brake; and pressing through the underwood, Perault encountered a gigantic negro, of coarse and ferocious appearance. "Gullah!" exclaimed Perault, "what has brought you here?"

"We are in danger, Perault: follow me," answered the negro.

With eager steps Perault followed the negro through the brakes, till, reaching the margin of the river, Gullah pressed back the branches of a huge cypress tree, and pointed to two large canoes, filled with armed negroes, concealed beneath its shade.

"What means this?" said Perault. "Has any outbreak taken place in the city?"

"Not yet," answered Gullah; "but the Governor has been poisoned! and the whole city is in confusion."

"Poisoned!" exclaimed Perault. "By whom?"

"By his own favourite slave, Mahmet," said Gullah; "and despatches have been forwarded to your master, Colonel Waldenberg, to return instantly to the city."

"They must be intercepted," said Perault, in alarm.

"They have been intercepted," said Gullah. "Behold them," and he drew a packet from his bosom and handed it to Perault, who, looking anxiously at the seals thereon, said,

"Is the Governor dead?"

"He is; the dose was strong enough," answered Gullah.

"Then this may concern us," said Perault, as he broke open the packet, and attentively perused its contents. "There are some lurking suspicions here," he added, as he finished his perusal. "We must be speedy in our efforts."

"Are the negroes on these plantations ready?" said Gullah.

"Almost all of them," answered Perault. "I have formed a plot, however, which will throw them into instant open revolt. Zama has joined us."

"I am glad of it," said Gullah.

"The conduct of the young cadets has enraged the negroes here," said Perault; "and all they ask is vengeance for the insults heaped upon themselves, their wives, and children. Zama has a sister who has the principal charge of this plantation, and who is adored by the negroes."

"You mean Zada? I have heard of her," said Gullah.

"Well," continued Perault, "Waldenberg's brother has taken a foolish fancy to the girl, and I have pledged my word to place her in his power. You must aid me in this; and it must be done in such a manner as to throw the blame on Colonel Waldenberg. If Zada is carried off, her brother will demand instant vengeance. I know his proud, fiery nature too well, to think that he will trust redress to other hands than his own. If he encounters the Colonel—"

"He will murder him," added Gullah.

"The Colonel's life," continued Perault, with a grim smile, "is not to be guaranteed in Zama's hands. The negroes on the plantation will fly to arms to aid Zama, and, uniting with the Red Indians, will soon overpower the Cadet Brigade; that done, the city is at our feet."

"'Tis a shrewd device," said Gullah. "But should Zama suspect you?"

"Tush, man, I am more of the hypocrite than to arouse his suspicions. Have one of your canoes ready, and let six of your followers be close at hand to obey my commands."

"By the bye," said Gullah, sullenly, "they say in the city that on your return from Hayti, you saved Colonel Waldenberg's life from some pirates: how is this?"

"'Tis true," answered Perault, with a savage sneer. "When off the western coast of Cuba, and nigh the Bahamas, a pirate schooner bore down on us. Our crew were but few; yet it was agreed to resist to the utmost. A sabre was placed in my hand, and I had power to destroy granted me. The pirates poured in a broadside, which we returned. They then boarded our vessel. Gullah, they were white men!" . . . . .

On returning to the mansion-house, Perault was informed that Captain Waldenberg wished to see him; and understanding that the Captain was with the ladies in the drawing-room, Perault entered, and observed Major Maitland, pale and feeble, reclining on an ottoman, while Miss Bellgrove and Colonel Waldenberg were endeavouring to dispel the heavy clouds of grief which hung on his brow.

"Nay," said Miss Bellgrove, "if nought else will do, I shall try the effect of music on your nerves." Turning to Letia, she requested her to take the harp.

"Major Maitland will consider me but a very indifferent performer," said Letia, as she seated herself at the instrument and sung:—

There is a land, 'tis a land of joy,
Where roses and myrtles entwine,
Where no grief and care the heart annoy,
There love and rapture combine!
And there I will build thee a sunny bower
Of the orange and the laughing vine;
And love will enliven each flitting hour,
While every bliss shall be thine,
And I'll twine around thy happy brow
Love's emblem sweet, the myrtle bough.

She looked up, and encountered the glance of Maitland. She had forgotten that the air and the verses she was singing were his own, which she had but recently received from him; a deep blush spread over her countenance, and she became confused, when suddenly one of the strings of the harp snapped asunder with a startling sound.

"'Tis a bad omen!" said Letia, rising. "I must call Zada to my aid. I heard her singing a sweet African air. I should like to hear it again."

"I have heard it also," said Matilda; "and since you have broken off your song, perhaps Zada will try it."

Zada timidly took a small lyre in her hand, and, running her fingers over the strings, looked towards Miss Bellgrove, and said—"The song is but rude and simple. You are aware that it is a popular belief amongst the negroes, that when they die, their souls return to the land of their forefathers, and revel amidst the palm groves of sunny Africa."

"And a beautiful idea it is," said Major Maitland. "I have found that even the efforts of the missionaries cannot make the negroes forego this prospect. 'Tis the only hope the poor negro has of revisiting the home of his fathers."

"It is, indeed," said Zada, with a deep sigh. "The song, then, is that of the Dying Negro." She gently touched the lyre, and, in a sweet, plaintive voice, sung the song of—

THE DYING NEGRO.

Away, my soul, o'er the glittering deep,
Away to the land where my fathers sleep,
And their spirits soar on soft gales of balm,
'Mid groves of the wide and the spreading palm!
To the palm groves of Afric away!

Away, away to the land of the Sun,
Where, dazzling in glory, his course is run!
He kisses the plain with his burning ray,
The soil and its children adore his sway—
To the palm groves of Afric away!

Away, away to my forefathers' land,
To wander once more o'er its golden sand,
With friends of my youth in freedom to roam
'Mongst the gorgeous scenes of my native home!
To the palm groves of Afric away!

A deep sob from Perault interrupted and startled the songstress, and the attention of the company was attracted towards him. His features seemed distorted with conflicting passions; and his bosom swelled, till the golden studs which bound his vest burst asunder, and were scattered over the floor.

"Perault," exclaimed Colonel Waldenberg, "what means this conduct?"

Perault turned fiercely on him, his countenance distorted with rage and hatred; but suddenly calming himself, he said, while his voice trembled with emotion, "Pardon me, Sir. Methought I saw the land of my birth arising on my view,—its sunny clime and its palm groves; but I forgot myself. I am far—far from it, and in bondage!" He bowed, and pressing his hand upon his forehead, stepped back.

Captain Waldenberg then arose and left the apartment, motioning on Perault to follow him.

"Early to-morrow morning," said the Captain, "I sail down the Wandoo."

"Do you wish Zada to be placed in your power?" said Perault.

"I do; you understand me?" said the Captain.

"It shall be done," said Perault. "By to-morrow at noon she will be in your possession."

"He's off at last," said Joolay, as he looked after the barque which bore young Waldenberg down the Wandoo. "Well, I never guessed I'd 'a missed anybody's company so much as that young, impudent, teasing, glorious, fine young puppy's. Heigho!"

"Oh! what a sigh was there," said Galliard, who stood beside him. "What strength of lungs you must have to bring up such a breeze, Mr. Joolay; a puff like that would do honour to a pair of smith's bellows, or set the sails of a windmill a-going."

"None of your gibes, you eternal puppy," said Joolay. "Don't you see I am sulky, dull, and melancholy as a starved owl?"

"Or a hackney-coach horse," said Galliard, laughing.

"Ay, bearing the burden of your bad jokes," replied Joolay; "but you're just like him, so I am satisfied. What's the matter with your dandy nigger?—he seems in a deuce of a fright," he continued, as Tom, with a look of consternation, came running at full speed towards them.

"What's the matter, Tom?" said Galliard.

"Oh Lor! Massa—I is got cus' fright!"

"Was you looking at your own face in a glass?" inquired Joolay.

"No, nor your face eider," said Tom, briskly; "got fright wid hoss, Massa."

"A horse, you goose!"

"Yes, Massa, wid horn on him head." And Tom placed his hands on either side of his head, spreading out his fingers by way of explanation. "Oh Lor, dere um is!" cried he, as he again took to his heels, leaving his master and Joolay to face the fancied danger themselves.

"The fool," said Galliard; "what has alarmed him?"

"See, see!" said Joolay, in an eager whisper, as he pointed to an opening in the thickets. "See what a beautiful elk: three of them, by the hookey!"

Galliard looked towards the spot, and soon discovered the cause of Tom's terror. There stood three large and beautiful elks, gazing around them with startled looks.

"Hush," whispered Joolay. "Oh! how beautiful. Oh! for a rifle to have a pop at them."

The lovely animals stood for a second or two; then tossing up their antlers, bounded away amongst the brakes.

"A hunt—a hunt!" cried Joolay. "To horse! to horse!—a chase! Oh, mother of Moses, what glorious sport! Run, Galliard, run!" and Joolay, in his excitement, ran faster than ever he had run before. Clinging on by Galliard, who was equally excited, Joolay urged forward, swearing at Galliard for running so slow.

"Let go your hold, Mr. Joolay," cried Galliard. "I'd as soon drag a whale along, as you."

Covered with dust and perspiration, Joolay and Galliard reached the house, to the great alarm of the inmates.

"To horse!" roared Joolay, as soon as he came within hearing. "A chase!—a chase!"

"Who is chasing you?" cried Colonel Waldenberg.

"Three elks," cried Joolay—"large beautiful elks. Oh graekie! what sport!"

"Mr. Galliard," said Matilda, "what has excited Mr. Joolay so?"

"There are three elks in the clearings," answered Galliard: "we wish to form a party instantly to hunt them."

"Indeed," cried the Colonel. "To horse, then!"

"Come, you tarnation black rascals," cried Joolay to the negroes; "off to the stables—out with the horses! Away with you, or else——" He flourished his whip, and gave a "whurr," which sent the negroes off grinning at the fun.

"Shall we lay the dogs on the track?" said the Colonel.

"No, no," cried Joolay; "fair rifle-play—full speed, and bang away at them. A good rifle against all your stag-hounds yet!"

"Ladies," said the Colonel, addressing Miss Bellgrove and Letia; "since we proceed no farther than the clearings, may we hope to be honoured with your company?"

"I care not," said Matilda, smiling. "Letia, do you go?"

"Pray, excuse me," answered Letia; "from the mound I will see the sport, if sport you call it, to run down a helpless animal; and I sincerely hope the game will escape."

"Not if I can help it," said the Colonel, gaily.

The horses were soon ready, and the party speedily mounted and galloped away to arouse the game.

Letia sat for a short time after the party had rode away. "Strange," she said; "why do I feel this presentiment of danger? Would that they had remained! Zada," she continued, as the girl approached her, "will you ascend the mound with me?"

"I have this moment received a strange message from my brother," answered Zada, while the tears trembled in her eyes; "he has been bitten by a rattlesnake in the forest, and lies there dangerously ill."

"Indeed," said Letia, in alarm. "Fly then, Zada, to his aid; take some collinsonia, and other remedies, with you."

"These have already been given him, I am told," said Zada; "but I will hurry to him; this negro is to show me the way," as she pointed to Gullah Jack, who had been commissioned by Perault to wile her into the forest, where his gang lay in readiness to seize her; and the poor confiding girl fell at once into the snare laid for her.

Zada had scarcely gone, when Major Maitland, accompanied by Mr. Bellgrove, joined Letia. To them she mentioned her wish to ascend the mound to view the chase, when Maitland, with a look of deep alarm, said, "It was madness to have ventured on this hunting expedition. They might have guessed that the elks could only be driven from the more distant parts of the forest by the Indians, who now, perhaps, surround us. Come, Mr. Bellgrove, we must get the Cadets ready; for, trust me, our rifles will be needed." So saying, they departed.

Resolved to have his full share of the sport, Joolay armed himself with a long rifle, at the same time commanding Whackie to take another, with plenty of powder and ball, and a good sharp hedge-bill to clear the underwood. Everything being prepared according to order, Joolay mounted his horse, and, followed by Whackie on foot, set out to join the hunting party. A negro can never see a quadruped walking before him, without catching hold of it by the tail, to pull himself onward; and, no sooner was Joolay fairly mounted, than Whackie seized the tail of the horse as his portion. The animal, used to such treatment, submitted quietly to the firm grip of the negro; but Joolay, finding the horse rather slow in its movements, and unaware of the drawback, roared out to Whackie to "Slap him up." Whackie instantly obeyed; and, raising his hedge-bill for the purpose of stirring up the nag, came down with the edge of the bill on the tail. The blow was such, that it severed the tail from the rump; and the poor animal, bounding forward, kicked up its heels—tossing the overseer, with an elegant somerset, heels over head into the thicket; then scoured across the plain, kicking furiously as it flew, leaving the amazed and terror-stricken Whackie holding the severed member firm in his grasp.

"What's the matter with the horse?" roared Joolay, emerging from the bushes.

"Goley, Massa! him tail come off!" answered the astonished negro, holding up the tail to the overseer.

"His tail come off?" roared Joolay, in a towering passion. "How did that happen?"

"Don' know, Massa: he leave him ahind," replied Whackie.

"You infernal yahoo," roared Joolay, "I'll teach you how you meddle with a tail again." So saying, he rushed at the negro; but, just as he collared him, Whackie cried out, "Oh, Lor! Massa Joolay! look, look! dere de dam Red Cherokee." Joolay looked round, and, to his terror, beheld the Indians gathering in a large body on the clearings, and anon their terrific war-hoop rang loud and long in the ears of the astonished overseer.

"Down, down! Whackie," said Joolay, forgetting his anger amid his alarm. "It is that blasted horse that has roused them: down on your face, and let us crawl into the bushes. How lucky the brute's tail came off! Providence certainly put it slightly on, just to save me. Now, Whackie, we are snug," continued he, as they fixed themselves in the thickest part of the bushes. "The rascals have not seen us. Now look well to your rifle, put other four balls into it, take good aim, and fire when I tell you."

In the meantime the rest of the company pressed forward, till they reached the spot where the elks had been seen; and, after riding a short distance, they beheld one of them quietly browzing in a small glade. The beautiful symmetry of the animal, and the various attitudes it assumed, were such as caused the company to pause and gaze with delight upon it. The Colonel raised his rifle to fire; but Matilda called on him to refrain, and exclaimed, "Oh, that it could be taken alive!"

"We 'll try," said the Colonel. "Ha! there it goes!" he cried, as the elk, terrified at the noise, bounded away into the forest.

"Forward! Hurrah!" was the shout; and, at headlong speed, the hunters dashed upon the track.

The elk was in sight,—and Matilda, animated with the chase, still following it at full speed, soon distanced the whole party. The elk suddenly paused, and, tossing its antlers, dashed into another part of the forest. Matilda's steed had cleared a small clump of cypress; and, instantly starting back, snorted and reared with affright. A savage yell arose from the underwood around, and two Cherokees sprang suddenly from the thicket, and seized the horse by the reins. Terrified and trembling, Matilda looked around, and, to her horror, beheld herself surrounded by a host of the savages. Still her presence of mind did not desert her: she struck one of the Indians, who held her horse, a smart blow across the eyes with her whip; and, urging the animal onwards, dashed the other Indian to the ground. The noble animal, darting forward with one bold bound, cleared the heads of the astonished Cherokees. On, on with the speed of the wind she flew; while the Indians, raising their thrilling war-whoop, followed in pursuit, and a number of balls whistled around her head. The dense forest was at length cleared, and the plantation grounds burst upon her view; one high fence alone remained to be surmounted, and she was safe—when, to her dismay, her horse stumbled. Another volley from the Indians' rifles whistled past her, and one of the balls very slightly grazed her on the shoulder; while her horse, uttering a shrill and piercing shriek of agony, sprang over the high fence, then staggered and fell. It struggled to regain its feet,—but, with another piercing cry, which chilled the very heart's blood of its unhappy mistress, looked at her with an expression of agony in its eyes, then drooped its head on the ground and expired. Matilda tried to extricate herself from the fallen steed, but found herself unable to move. "Oh, God!" she exclaimed, "have compassion on me! preserve me from the hands of these savages! Alas! Alas!" she cried, "they have cleared the fence! Oh! merciful heaven, protect me!"

A stalwart Indian rushed upon her, and, with a fiendish yell of triumph, twisted her hair around his hand, and, forcing back her head, flourished his knife before her throat. Already was the cold steel pressed upon her neck, when a sudden exclamation of "Down, monster!" was heard—a heavy crash followed, and the blood and brains of the Indian were spattered over her face and bosom; and, still entangled in the gripe of the dead Indian, she fell to the ground.

"Fear not, dearest Lady," exclaimed a friendly voice, as she felt herself extracted from the Indian's grasp. Look up, dear lady! 'tis your own faithful Zama!"

Scarcely trusting her senses, Matilda looked up, and found herself in the arms of the noble negro. Her lips almost refused their office, and, murmuring his name, she swooned upon his bosom. Zama raised her in his arms, and grasping his hatchet firmer in his hand, shook it at the advancing Indians; and rushing with his rescued mistress amongst the thick cotton-shrubs, set their pursuers at defiance.

Snugly concealed in the thicket, into which they had crept for safety, sat Joolay and Whackie, chatting with the utmost composure.

"Darn the red rascals," said Joolay, "I guess I'd like to have a pop at some o' 'em."

"Hi! Massa Joolay," said Whackie, who had now learned the art of flattering the overseer, "I no like for be Indine you fire at: you is capal shot—fust rate shot."

"Do you think so, Whackie?" said Joolay, trying to perpetrate a smile of pleasure.

"Fac, Massa: you kill dozen ob 'em at one shot."

"Well, I daresay, if they were all ahind one another, I'd go pretty right bang-slap through 'em, I guess."

At that moment a crashing sound amongst the bushes caused them to grasp their rifles firmer.

"Who is that rushing through the thicket with a female in his arms?" said Joolay, as Zama, almost breathless with speed, burst through the underwood with Matilda clasped to his bosom.

"Lor, Massa!" cried Whackie, "him is Zama and Missee Bellgrove. See, see! dere is tree dam Red Indine chasing 'em; come, Massa Joolay, we fight de red tiefs." And Whackie would have rushed to the rescue, but Joolay, catching hold of him, drew him back.

"Sit still, you ass," said the overseer; "we can do more service here. Now, take good aim at that foremost Indgine; I'll put daylight through the second rascal. Now, fire!"

Zama, with the insensible form of Matilda in his arms, now cleared the bushes, and became exposed to the rifles of the Indians. Just as the first Indian raised his rifle to fire, Whackie took aim at him, and, with unerring shot, brought him down a lifeless corpse. The other two Indians instantly paused to see from whence the shot had come,—when Joolay fired, and the second Indian bounded in the air, and fell dead.

"Well done, Whackie," said Joolay; "that deserves a glass of brandy."

"Yes, Massa," grinned Whackie, as he reloaded his rifle.

The third Indian had watched the shot, and fled behind a tree, from whence he took aim at Joolay's white trousers, which, of all dresses for bush fighting, is decidedly the worst. Crack went the rifle, and Joolay, kicking up his heels with a thundering oath, applied his hands to a certain part of his body, and fell floundering amongst the bushes.

"You no kill?" said Whackie, in alarm.

"No!" cried Joolay. "Darn the red rogue!

he 's spoiled my sitting for a month, I calculate. I say, Whackie, if you shoot the rascal, I'll give you his rifle and blanket in a present."

Whackie looked forth to see where the Indian was; but the eye of the Cherokee was better trained for this mode of warfare. Before Whackie could take aim, and while he was holding the rifle upright before his face, the Indian again fired, and the ball, striking the barrel of Whackie's rifle, brought it in such rude contact with the poor fellow's nose, that it made the fire flash from his eyes, as, dropping the rifle with a yell of pain, he clapped both hands to his face, and felt for the spot where his unassuming nose had once stood. There was little occasion for any additional flattening to that feature, as it was sufficiently flat before; but the blow operated as powerfully as if the nose had been smoothed to the rest of the face with a bottle mall.

"Yeh!" he exclaimed, clutching at the place where his nasal organ had been. "Yeh, wurra dat!"

"Hush," said Joolay, "I see the villain: now for him!" So saying, he snatched up Whackie's loaded rifle. The Indian raised his head to take a surer aim, and thereby became exposed to Joolay's fire, and instantly the Indian was writhing, like a wounded snake, amongst the underwood.

"Guess that tarnation thief won't hurt us any more," said Joolay, with a grim smile. "I think he 's food for the turkey-buzzards!"

"Yes, dam him eye!" answered Whackie, tenderly touching his injured nose, as if congratulating it on the manner in which it had been avenged.

"Now, Whackie," said Joolay, "you must carry me home on your back. Hookey!" he exclaimed, "there is the Colonel running like a madman. Hillo! Colonel!" he shouted, as Waldenberg was flying with speed past him. Waldenberg turned.

"Miss Bellgrove," he cried; "have you seen her?"

"Ay, ay!" answered Joolay. "Zama has carried her full-bang to the house, I guess."

The Colonel instantly hurried onwards to the house.

"Ho! he 's off, dash him!" cried Joolay, as Waldenberg flew past him. "He may thank his stars he can walk so fast: as for me, I'm in a rigglar fix. Come, Whackie, take me home on your back."

While these transactions were going on, the unsuspecting Zada, filled with grief and alarm at the report of her brother's illness, (a device of Perault to entice her into the forest,) followed Gullah into the thickets, when they were observed by Haman, who, surprised to see Zada with a strange negro, cautiously followed them. After walking for some distance, Gullah suddenly paused, and, turning rapidly on Zada, seized her by the throat, and forced her to the ground; when a band of negroes rushed from the thickets, and, seizing the hapless girl, bore her speedily towards the river. Haman's first impulse was to rush forward to the rescue of Zada; but suddenly recollecting that he was single-handed, before a host of opponents, he thought his best plan was to hurry back to the plantation for aid. He cast another look at the party, and, to his surprise, beheld several of them in the Waldenberg livery. With the utmost speed he traversed the footpath through the forest which led to the clearings, when, to his terror and amazement, the whole forest became one blaze of flame, and the loud report of the rifles of the Indians contending with the cadets burst around him. Haman took no time to look for friend or foe; but as if a pack of bloodhounds were at his heels, he flew over every impediment till he reached the clearings. There he beheld groups of terrified negroes throwing away their hoes, and fleeing for safety to their dwellings, while all around, the incessant rattle of musketry arose loud and appalling. Winged with terror, Haman speedily reached the mansion-house, and darted up the front staircase; when, on reaching the front verandah, he beheld Zama leaning against one of the pillars, breathing quick and hard, as if exhausted; while, in the midst of a group of females, with Miss Norrisville and Ooknea supporting her, lay Matilda, to all appearance dead.

"Oh, Zama!" shrieked Haman, as he flew forward, "help! help; your sister Zada, help!"

"My sister!" cried Zama; "what of her?"

"She has been choke—knock down—carry away—force into boat. Oh, help!" cried Haman.

Zama caught by the pillar to keep himself from falling, and a mortal sickness spread throughout his frame, as he feebly asked—"By the Indians?"

"No, no," cried Haman; "by nigger; Coram Wallenpeg nigger!"

"Waldenberg!" cried Zama, with mingled rage and grief; "the villain! He shall dearly answer for this." So saying, he bounded over the verandah; and, before Haman could recover his breath, was out of sight. Nor did Zama hurry far till he met Waldenberg.

"What have you done with Miss Bellgrove? Where is she?" said the Colonel, hurriedly. "Is she safe?"

"Where is my sister?" cried Zama, fiercely, while his eyes gleamed with rage. "Where is Zada, Colonel Waldenberg? Restore her, or, by the God who made me, your life shall answer for it!"

With looks of mingled anger and surprise, the Colonel receded a pace, and said—"The fellow is either drunk or mad."

"Neither, Sir!" exclaimed Zama. "Again I demand the restoration of my sister."

"Fool!" said Waldenberg, "what should I know of your sister?"

"Liar!" exclaimed Zama. "Who forced her from her home; who tore her from the protecting arms of her friends? Coward! you can shun the foe, to wreak your poor vengeance on a helpless female."

"By heaven! this is too much," exclaimed Waldenberg; "bearded by a negro, and a slave too!"

"Although a negro, I am not the less a man," exclaimed Zama: "and slave though I am, I am not yet void of human feelings. Colonel Waldenberg, I again charge you with carrying off my sister."

"Madman! stand back!" said Waldenberg.

"Why do I listen to a dog like this? The whip shall teach you a little more civility."

"The whip—to me, too!" exclaimed Zama. "Yes! it were a weapon more befitting your cowardly hand than the sword that mocks your side!"

Thrown off his guard, and enraged at this bitter taunt, Waldenberg sprung forward, and struck Zama so violent a blow on the mouth, that the negro staggered back a few paces, while the blood flowed fast from the effect of the stroke. Instantly recovering himself, and infuriated at this indignity, Zama rushed upon the Colonel, and grasped him by the throat—a fierce struggle ensued, for both were possessed of strong muscular power. With a great effort the Colonel freed his throat from the iron-grip of the negro, and, blinded with passion, clutched the hilt of his dagger; but, in doing so, lost the advantage which he had obtained over his foe, who, with herculean force, raised him in the air, then hurled him on the ground, where he lay bleeding and insensible. Zama gazed for a few seconds on his prostrate enemy, and the rage fled from his bosom.

"I have killed him," he sighed. "'Twas rash—I might have questioned him mildly: all now is lost. —Zada, thou art indeed gone!"

A rustling sound amid the underwood startled him, and he would have turned from the spot; when a friendly voice hailed him—

"Zama!"

"I am here," he answered. "Approach, whoever calls."

"'Tis I, Perault!" said the conspirator, advancing from the thicket. "Ha! this looks well," he exclaimed, as he beheld the insensible form of his master stretched bleeding on the earth. "Behold!" he continued, in a triumphant tone, as he advanced, and firmly placed his foot on the throat of the inanimate Waldenberg. "Behold how the poor slave tramples on his haughty master!"

"For shame, Perault!" exclaimed Zama. "Even I, who struck him down, would scorn to treat him with such base indignity!"

Perault withdrew his foot from the throat of his master, and sullenly said, "Is he dead?"

"If he was alive you dared not treat him so," said Zama.

Darting an angry glance at Zama, Perault knelt down and placed his hand upon the heart of Waldenberg. "Ha," he exclaimed, "he lives. Zama, your work is but half done." Drawing his master's dagger from its sheath, he raised his hand to plunge it into the heart of Waldenberg, exclaiming, "Thus I put an end to farther doubt!"

"Cold-blooded monster, hold!" cried Zama, grasping the upraised arm of Perault, and wrenching the dagger from his hand. Perault sprang to his feet, and for a space the two negroes stood glaring on each other with looks of fiercest anger, till Zama, pointing to the body of the Colonel, said, "Were he able to combat with me now, I would struggle with him to the death; but as he now is, stunned and insensible, he is more an object of pity than of anger. To injure him further would be an act of cold-blooded cruelty; nor would I stand tamely by, and behold him, deeply though he may have wronged me, treated with such base brutality."

"You forget," said Perault, sternly, "that you have forfeited your own life by this attack on him."

"And if I have," answered Zama, "I alone must answer for it. In fair and open combat would I meet my foe, not stab him like a base assassin."

"Hush!" said Perault, "he revives. Zama, you must seek for safety in instant flight. Away, arouse your friends—the hour of vengeance is come!"

"Promise me," said Zama, "that you will not injure him in that state.

"I swear it," said Perault. "Fly to the forest: meet me at midnight at the hut of Obi—away!" And Zama hurried towards the forest.

Doubtful how to act, Perault stood by the side of Waldenberg, when the sound of the battle approached nigher and nigher to the spot. "Hark," muttered the conspirator, "the Red Cherokee is driving the haughty planters from the woods. Shall I remove the body of this proud lord of mine, or let him lie where he is? Good! let him lie.—If the Cadets stumble on him they will take care of him: if the Red Indians, they will save further trouble on his account; in either way I keep my word to Zama. The fool! had it not been for his romantic folly, Waldenberg would have found the bottom of the Wandoo with a stone about his neck." So saying, he spurned the still insensible form of his master with his foot, and turned from the spot.

Major Maitland, along with Mr. Bellgrove and Mr. Norrisville, were hastening to the scene of action with a small band of armed negroes, whose sullen looks plainly showed that they had been drawn out against their wills, when Lieutenant Galliard with a party of Cadets suddenly met them.

"What means this?" exclaimed Maitland. "The Cadets retreating?"

"Not so," answered Galliard. "Although the red devils outnumber us, we can cope with them yet."

"Whither so fast then?" said Maitland. Galliard beckoned him aside, and in a low voice said, "Have you seen the Colonel?"

"No," answered Maitland.

"Or Miss Bellgrove?" inquired Galliard.

"No," said Maitland, turning deadly pale; "I hope she is safe."

"This accursed hunting-match has ruined us," said Galliard. "We were too much scattered,—too secure and confident: these wily fiends have completely surrounded us. I fear the Colonel and Miss Bellgrove are seized. Heavens! you are ill," he exclaimed, as he caught Maitland in his arms.

"No, no," said Maitland, faintly; "'tis the effects of my recent wound. But, come; if she is seized, to her rescue!—to her rescue!" So saying, he started up and drew his sword.

"Stay!" said Galliard. "See, here comes Perault, perhaps he knows something of his master."

Perault advanced towards them, and Galliard, calling on him to draw nigher, said, "Know ye aught of your master?"

"I hear that he has fallen; severely, perhaps mortally wounded," answered the hypocrite.

"And Miss Bellgrove?" cried Maitland, shaking with agitation.

"Is wounded also," said Perault. "She is at the mansion-house."

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Bellgrove, advancing, "you will pardon my interference; but this is no time to hold long parley,—the war-whoop of the Indians is drawing closer to us. Now, my gallant fellows," cried he to the negroes, "to the bush! to the bush! Be cautious,—let every shot tell on the Red Indians: don't let them come near your dwellings. Fight for your wives, your children, your lady!"

An enthusiastic cry burst from the negroes, and they rushed forward to the combat; while Galliard, turning to his followers, cried, "Come, gentlemen, guide the operations of these gallant fellows: under your command they may do much. Forward, then!"

"One moment," said Perault. "I came in search of you, Mr. Galliard, fearing that Major Maitland was too ill to issue orders."

"Well, well," said Galliard, testily, "if I must, I must. Forward, gentlemen," cried he, addressing the cadets nigh him; "aid the negroes!" And the young men hurried once more into the combat.

"I only wish to ask your opinion, gentlemen," said Perault, "as to how I ought to act. My master is severely wounded, and insensible; and despatches from the city have just arrived."

Here he was interrupted by a loud cheer from the negroes, who advanced towards them, dragging a number of Indian prisoners. With proud and haughty looks these sons of the forest walked amid their enemies; but Perault's lip quivered, and he hastily turned aside, to avoid the gaze of the Cherokees, fearing he might be recognised by them. A party of the cadets now came up, and, after a brief conversation, the greater part of the negroes, led on by the cadets, once more betook themselves to the bushes, to oppose the Indians on their own wily system of warfare, while the remainder escorted the Indian prisoners to the dwellings.

"You spoke of despatches from the city," said Maitland, as Perault rejoined them.

"There are despatches from the city," said Perault, "addressed to Colonel Waldenberg. The bearer of these despatches was seized by the Indians, and shamefully ill-used, while the greater part of the despatches were torn and mutilated. By them I perceive that the governor of Carlville has been suddenly seized with yellow fever, and is now dead."

"Dead!" exclaimed Galliard, "and so sudden."

Perault bowed, and, interrupting him, continued,—"By these despatches, Colonel Waldenberg is commanded to return to town instantly. Now, gentlemen, I am at a loss how to act. I am loath to carry my master to town in his present state, and yet I must devise some means to get him there."

"'Tis well thought of," said Mr. Bellgrove; "we can readily get the canoes manned, and carry Miss Bellgrove and the others to the city: they will be much safer there than here."

"My only dread," said Perault, "is, that the banks of the river may be in possession of the Indians, and the canoes would be exposed to a galling fire from them. Since the cadets are all engaged, perhaps Mr. Bellgrove would arm another body of the negroes to protect the canoes descending the river."

"This must not be," said Maitland; "the presence of the armed negroes in the city might occasion mischief."

"Not so," replied Perault; "their presence will be hailed with joy, and they will only show their zeal for the cause in which they have embarked!"

"Be it so, then," said Maitland. "But, Lieutenant Galliard, you must take the command of this party, and see them safely in the city."

"But, Major," expostulated Galliard, "I cannot think of quitting my brave comrades in the midst of battle. After we drive the Indians back——"

"It may be too late," said Maitland, interrupting him.

Galliard reluctantly agreed; and Perault, requesting Mr. Bellgrove and Mr. Norrisville to get the canoes pointed out, departed to collect his own party; so that, by the time the canoes were ready, he had forty followers ready armed, all in the plot, conveying his unconscious and intended victims to the city, which was soon to be the scene of ruin and of bloodshed. Before embarking, he despatched a trusty messenger to Obi Abdallah, informing him of his departure, and ordering him to join Zama in leading on their bands to the city without delay.

Two elegant barges, accompanied by six large canoes, filled with the negroes, the prisoners, and the wounded, proceeded down the river. In the first barge were Miss Bellgrove, Letia, Mr. Bellgrove and his son, and Mr. Norrisville. The sudden disappearance of Zada and her brother had increased the alarm of the party; and Miss Bellgrove, now attended by Ooknea, was completely overpowered with grief for the loss of her favourite, though the suggestion made by Mr. Bellgrove, of hearing some tidings of Zada in the city, caused a lingering ray of hope to shine through the dark cloud of grief, and render her almost regardless of her slight wound received from the Indians.

In the second barge were Colonel Waldenberg, Galliard, and the Missionary, accompanied by Perault. The only signs of consciousness which Waldenberg had shown were a slight movement of his hands, and one or two feeble groans; while Perault, by the orders of Galliard, wiped the congealed blood from a wound in his right temple.

Around the barges were the canoes, containing the negroes and prisoners, placed in such a manner as safely to guard off any attack from the banks of the river.

They rowed onwards in silence; now gliding through the thick masses of matted reeds and water-lilies, which here and there impeded the current; then skirting the sides of the deep mangrove and cypress groves, which lined the margin of the river; now passing rich rice swamps, and cotton grounds, and clearings, with the gay villas of the planters embowered in orange and pride-of-India trees.

At length they swept into the conjunction of the river with the Cowper, and the splendid expanse of the noble bay burst on the view; while, wafted from the shore, the breeze came loaded with perfume. Anon, the high spire of St. Michael's, towering to the sky, and the lines of the city, were seen; then the city itself rose like a dazzling panorama. The splendid mansions of the planters and merchants, with their brilliant verandahs, surrounded with rich gardens, gave a beauty to the scene which the pen cannot describe. Here the palm, orange, and magnolia trees arose; while large and gorgeous blooming roses twined around the porticoes, filling the air with fragrance. Then the shipping burst like a dense forest upon the wondering eye, while flags of every nation streamed gaily from the masts; then came Castle Pickney, and, farther down the bay, lay Fort Moultrie, and, commanding the passage of the bar, Fort Jackson; while, from the ramparts of the various forts, the gorgeous star-spangled banner floated gaily on the breeze. The vast number of vessels, of all sizes, sailing on the bay, and crossing the bar, gave an animation and life to the scene which no mind could look upon without feeling elated.

The boats neared the beach, reached the landing-place, and were soon surrounded by a crowd of people. The guard were easily satisfied as to the appearance of the negroes in arms; and Perault giving a private signal to the negroes of the city assembled around them, the landing-place was speedily cleared.

Tom, the negro dandy, had been most eager, during the whole passage from Bellgrove to the city, to impress Whackie with a high idea of his mighty importance amongst the fashionable negroes of the city.

"Now," said he, "I is so glad I is get away from 'em dam red Indine, wid my scalp safe and sound. Lor! how men does become barbarize in a wild state of cibil nature."

"Werry true," said Whackie, shaking his head very gravely; "yet de red Indine is coward. I was fight wid 'em, and chase half-dozen myshef.

"I like for fight 'em too," said Tom, "perwided dey was put away 'em rifle, and 'em ugly tomahawks and scalping-knife. I neber like for see 'em; 'pon soul, 'em is cus uncibilize. How de debil should I appear in fassionable society in de city wid my scalp off? 'Pon soul, I shake at de werry thought. How would de ladies in de city lament, poor debils! I almost break my heart for tink how dey would weep for loss ob me!" And Tom wiped his eyes with the sleeve of his coat, at the melancholy idea of the grief which his loss would have occasioned to the fair sex. "Dere!" cried he, as they approached the city; "dere is de land ob beauty! dere is de home of de noble and de fair! See: see how de pride-ob-India, de orange, and de pomegrani line de walks all around; see wot wealth and power can do! Lor! I is feel so glad at get back again;" and, in the height of his joy, he cut a caper which nearly upset the canoe.

"Keep you seat," cried Haman, who was one of the party; "you want for drown us, eh?"

"Beg pardon," said Tom, sitting down quietly. "But I say, Haman, if you Massa and Missee find all tings right, sha'n't we hab tea-party an' ball to-morrow night, for celebrate our coming?"

"Well," said Haman, "if Massa don't go to dere town-house before to-morrow night, I don't care; but how we raise de wind?"

"Oh, de ole plan," said Tom, with a sly look: "cheat de store-keepers." And Tom and Haman laughed loudly.

"Ah!" said Haman, "Whackie is not up to dat plan."

"I is teachify him;" said Tom, "for, 'pon soul, he look quite raw; and de cus wagibone niggers in de city will impose on him umsoapfisticate natur." —And Whackie, was, indeed, a perfect specimen of an unsophisticated country negro.

"You got any money, Whackie?" inquired Tom.

"Yes," said Whackie. "I hab five dolla' I was got from Massa."

"You must take care ob you money, den," said Tom, "or you get youshef cheat on all hand. Now, let me see. I is hab one dolla' I got from Massa for tear my trouser; (bad job dat was, 'pon soul,)" he continued, by way of parentheses; "and I got oder two dolla' in Massa waistcoat pocket, which I took de loan of. Now, lend me you five dolla', if you please?"

Whackie, with the utmost simplicity, pulled out the five dollars, and placed them in Tom's hand, who gave Haman a knowing wink, and thrust his tongue into his cheek.

"Tank you, Whackie," he said; "you is good soul; 'pon hono', you is. I shall gib ball in you Massa kitchen to-morrow night, and invite all de beauty and fashion ob de city. Mind you heart, Whackie; no fall in lub wid some ob de pratty galls I shall bring. De nigger galls ob de city is de most lubliest and fairerest dat is: all like noo blown rose, 'pon soul."

Whackie grinned with glee, and rubbed his hands, as he expressed his high sense of Tom's kindness; and the call to aid their masters at landing ended the conversation.

On landing, Mr. Bellgrove gave orders to drive to the Planter's Hôtel, then justly reckoned the most fashionable in the city; and, having despatched Whackie, along with Haman and a few other domestics, to announce the arrival of the family to their household in town, and to get their town dwelling prepared for their reception, he ordered the armed negroes to return to Myrtlegrove. This, however, was prevented by Perault, who secretly commanded them to cross to the opposite side of the bay, and conceal themselves in the woods, till he joined them. Perault then caused his wounded master to be conveyed to the Waldenberg mansion-house, and a physician to be sent for.

Galliard, having seen the company all safely landed, looked around for his valet; but Tom, more eager on his own affairs than attentive to his master's comfort, was detailing, to a group of gaily-attired negroes, his own wonderful adventures and achievements amongst the Red Indians. Provoked at the fellow's carelessness, Galliard walked up to the group, but suddenly paused on hearing one of them cry out—

"Hi! bubba Tom, how many Indine you was kill?"

"More den hunder!" answered Tom. "'Pon soul, 'em was all fright for see me."

"How you plan for kill so many?" inquired the negro.

"Oh! I jost do 'em in style," answered Tom, with a flourish of his arm.

"Come here, you lying vagabond!" cried Galliard. Tom sneaked up to him crestfallen and sulky.

"How dare you tell such notorious lies?" said Galliard. "You know very well you never looked an Indian in the face, but hid yourself in the cellar at Myrtlegrove."

"You please, Massa, no 'peak so loud!" said Tom, with an imploring look. "No mention hide in a cella'! Gor, Massa, dat ruin my carrumter: no talkee 'bout dat no more. If de niggers believe I, dat is no do you no harm."

Galliard smiled at Tom's logic, and ordered him home.

After Colonel Waldenberg had been conveyed to his own mansion-house, a considerable time elapsed before he was restored to consciousness. On opening his eyes, the first face he beheld was that of Perault. Shuddering, he again closed them. "Are you much pained?" inquired Perault, in a tone of deep sympathy. The Colonel raised himself partially on his elbow, and looked around, as he feebly asked, "Where am I?"

"In your own mansion at Carlville," answered Perault.

"Carlville!" exclaimed the Colonel; "how is this?"

"Despatches," answered Perault, "were forwarded from the city, commanding your instant return, in consequence of the sudden death of the Governor."

Colonel Waldenberg started, and hurriedly said, "Is the good old man dead?"

"You seem moved, Sir," continued Perault. "He is dead; and his death has made room for your advancement. The bearer of these despatches had been seized by the Indians, and the despatches broken open and partly destroyed. The messenger, however, escaped, and placed the mutilated papers in my hands to be given to you. On searching for you, the war-cry of the Indians arose and the conflict began. I found you at length, stretched on the earth insensible, and a number of Indians around you."

The Colonel fixed his eyes on the subtle traitor, as if he would have read every thought in his breast, but Perault returned the piercing gaze with a calm unperturbed look. The Colonel clenched his teeth, and, clutching at his own breast with both hands as if to crush his fierce emotion, said, "Were there any negroes at my side?"

"One," answered Perault.

"Who?" cried the Colonel, franticly.

"Zama, the favourite slave of Mr. Bellgrove," said Perault. "He was lying at your side, dead."

The Colonel sprang from the couch as he thundered forth, "Dead! has he then escaped me?"

Staggering forward, he would have fallen, had Perault not caught him.

"Why this emotion?" said the false villain; "why move yourself for the death of a poor slave? The fellow was doubtless killed by the Indians."

"It was only a passing qualm," said Waldenberg, as he reseated himself.

"Miss Bellgrove came to the city with you," said Perault, endeavouring to divert his attention. To his surprise, however, the Colonel frowned angrily, and inquired—

"Are there any officers of the Cadet Brigade present?"

"Lieutenant Galliard is in town," answered Perault.

"Send him hither instantly," said Waldenberg, motioning to him to quit the apartment. Perault bowed lowly and obeyed.

"Strange!" remarked the Colonel, as he gazed after him. "I feel my very heart's blood chill as I look upon that negro's face now."

Perault's object was, if possible, to prevent all intercourse between the Colonel and Galliard; and instead, therefore, of obeying his master's orders, he returned with a falsehood, stating that Galliard had left town.

Whackie and Haman were arrayed in rich new liveries, and each was admiring the other's appearance, when Tom entered the apartment.

"'Pon soul," said Tom, "I is glad for see you again. Dat is werry handsome libbery you is got on!"

"Aint he?" cried Whackie, with delight, as he turned round and round before the admiring Tom. "Look wot nice long tail I hab: two big yellow button on um! Look at dat, Tom!"

"Capal!" exclaimed Tom. "'Pon soul de country niggers will not know you again. You is look quite fresh. Has you Massa come for stop here?"

"No," answered Haman. "Massa is gone to the Planta Hôtel, for stop a leely while. Him no come here till to-morrow or next day."

"We must hab ball, den, to-morrow night," said Tom.

"Wid all a heart!" cried Haman.

"Den we is go and inwite all de ladies and de genelem ob de city, for come here. 'Pon soul, we must hab splendid affair! All de bootiful and most fassonablerest ladies in de town."

"Come away, den," said Haman.

"Now, Whackie," said Tom, "you must not look at you grand clothes on a street. Gor Amighty! de people will be tink you was neber hab no clothes on before."

So saying, the trio sallied forth, arm in arm, to invite their party. Having secured a sufficient number, it was then agreed that the supplies should be levied from the poor storekeepers, and that Tom and Whackie should take the round, and spunge the simple ones; and, according to this agreement, Tom and Whackie set out to levy the contributions from the generous storekeepers; Whackie carrying a large basket wherein to deposit the spoil.

"We must take all de noo storekeepers," said Tom; "for de old ones is get too sly: 'em is all know me now. 'Top, here be new store; read him sign, Whackie!"

"Where him is?" inquired Whackie.

"'Bove de door," said Tom. "You read him, eh?"

Whackie shook his head. "No can read dat book," he answered.

"Lor!" exclaimed Tom, "you is werry ignoram. All we genelem nigger and lady nigger in de city read. 'Top, I shall read de sign myshef."

So saying, he looked long and gravely at the sign-board.

"What him say?" inquired Whackie, getting tired of Tom's cogitations.

"I tink," said Tom, with a wise shake of his head—"I tink 'em is de French letters; 'em is werry bad for read. 'Top, now; dat fust letta' look debilish like a P. My eyesight been werry weak, you see, Whackie, eber since my Massa was broke my quizee-glass. Dat letter is P. Yes, him is. De next one be A; and de one a-hind him is T. Yes, dat is it: P, A, T. Wot de debil is dat? Oh, him mean dish!—dat is de ting! Den come an M, den a U, den an R, and anoder P; den an H, and, last ob all, a Y. Dat all right."

"And wot all dat say?" inquired Whackie.

"'Top, I see again: M, U, R, P, H, Y," spelled Tom. "Hab him now," he cried, triumphantly: "dat is mean 'Tatie. Tatie dish!—dat is him. Massa Tatie-dish. 'Top, we shall see if him good-natured Buccra."

Tom then made a long neck, and peered into the store, where, standing behind the counter, he beheld a little baggy Irishman, whose ruddy cheeks seemed to scorn the sweltering clime he now lived in, and looking the very picture of fun and good nature.

"I say, Whackie," cried Tom, "come away; him is de werry ting for we. Now, you no 'peak—hol' you tongue. No say noting, and I shall do him fust-rate."

So saying, he boldly entered the store, followed by Whackie.

"How you do, Massa Tatie?" said Tom, making a low bow to the storekeeper, and which Whackie did his best to imitate.

"Your sarvant, Mr. Sheepsface," exclaimed the storekeeper. "Troth, and d'ye know the difference betwixt a murphy and a potato?"

"No, Massa," answered Tom, bowing; "I is not hab de felicity."

"Then I'll be after enlightening your darkened understanding," said Pat. "I'm a Murphy when I'm above ground, and I'll be a Tatie when I'm planted under ground." And the good-humoured storekeeper laughed loudly at his own joke; while both Tom and Whackie roared also, wondering, at the same time, what they were laughing at.

"I hope you is well, Massa?" said Tom, recovering himself.

"Illegant, my honey!" answered Pat. "And who may you be that's so mighty polite as to be inquiring after my own darling self?"

"I be head servant to de noo Gobernor ob dis city," said the lying knave, while Whackie actually gaped with astonishment, thinking that Tom had forgotten who he really belonged to. "And dis genelem," continued Tom, "is de head servant, and werry intimate friend, of de rich and bootiful Miss Bellgrove of Myrtlegrove and Wandoo-bank."

Whackie's mouth opened more and more on hearing that he also had changed owners; but his surprise was surpassed by that of the poor storekeeper, who, wondering what could bring the servants of such magnates to his shop, exclaimed—"I'm mighty glad to see yese: faix, it's an honour I didn't expect at all, at all!"

"Don't mention dat," said Tom, most graciously bowing. "You see, Sar, de fac of de matter is dis: De oder day, de young, rich, and lubelly Miss Bellgrove was drive in she's carriage along wid my Massa, de noo Gobernor. 'Em was pass dis way, when my Massa, de noo Gobernor, was look out de carriage window, and him see dis werry bootiful store ob yours. 'Look,' say he to Missee, 'dere is one ob de most tastey and handsomerest stores in de whole city,—quite noo fit up,—werry neat indeed.'"

"Long life to his honour!" exclaimed the amazed storekeeper. "Did he really say all that about Paddy Murphy's store?"

"So," continued the lying rogue, "when Missee Bellgrove look out de carriage, she say, 'Oh! wot a pratty genelem is keep dat store! how good lookee him is!'"

"The darlint!" exclaimed poor Paddy, swallowing all the new-coined lies of the negro for positive truths. "Did she see me?" Here he cast an admiring glance at his person. "Faix, and she's right, too," he added. "Be de powers! before I left Tipperary, the girls were after tearing one another to pieces about me!"

"I is sure ob dat, Massa," cried Tom; "handsome, good-lookee genelem like you must play de berry debil wid de gals!"

"Faith and you're the boy for guessing that; ha, ha, ha!" roared Pat.

"Well, Sar," continued Tom, "when de Gobernor and Missee Bellgrove was come home, dey was meet wid large party at dinner, and dey tell all about de new store and de handsome storekeeper."

"Did the gentry do that!" exclaimed Paddy, in a transport of joy. "Oh! Paddy, my boy, your fortune's after being made!"

"So, Sar," continued this lying varlet, "de whole company was quite delight, and 'em all say—'Berry well, since you recommend de genelem, we is all go deal wid him, perwided him wittals be de real ting.'"

"By my showl," exclaimed Paddy, in a fit of rapture, "I keep the best in the world. Sarch all Amerrykay, ay, and owld Ireland to the bargain, the devil a taste you'll find better!"

"Dat is jost wot de bootiful Missee Bellgrove was say," responded Tom, enlarging as he found Mr. Murphy's weak side. "Missee says—'I is sure dat de genelem must hab ebery ting good—he look so good heshef!'"

"Oh! the darlint!" exclaimed Paddy, his very eyes moistening with delight. "If I had her in my arms, I'd give her an Irishman's blessing!"

"So, Sar," continued Tom, thinking it was now high time to bring his colloquy to a peroration, "de company was all say—'We should like to see sample ob him different goods; and, if dey please us, we sall all go deal wid him; but we must see wot he deal in, and if de tings be real good.' So, when de Gobernor was hear dat, him say—'I like de genelem, and want for encourage he; so I sall send my head servant'—dat is me, Sar," he added, by way of parenthesis, laying his hand on his bosom, —"'for request de sample ob him different goods, and I sall send 'em to you; and if dey please, you must all become customer and friend ob de genelem.'"

Paddy's mouth was wide open, swallowing the barefaced lies of the rogue. "Well," he exclaimed, "its myself that's proud to think that the Governor and the gentry, and more particularly the beautiful young lady, should talk of me!"

"So, Sar," continued Tom, with increased energy, "de Governor say to me—'My good friend,' say he, 'go to dat bootiful new store, and get sample ob all de tings de genelem is deal in, and bring 'em to me. Get de best, till I show 'em to all my friend in de city. If de tings be good, de genelem's fortune is made, and him store shall be de fust in de city!'"

"Only to think of such kindness!" exclaimed the deluded storekeeper.

"Well, Sar!" continued Tom, coining the lies with vast rapidity as he made sure of poor Murphy's weak side, "when de bootiful Missee Bellgrove was hear dat, she say to dis genelem—" Here he pointed to Whackie, whose open mouth and staring eyes might have excited a suspicion of something being wrong. There he stood, half-bent forward, staring at his lying companion, and wondering if what he said was really true, so glibly was it uttered. Tom, however, had riveted the attention of the storekeeper to himself; and, without noticing Whackie's wonder-stricken countenance, he proceeded:—"'Go,' says Missee Bellgrove; 'take one basket—call on dat handsome genelem, along wid de Gobernor's sarvant: get sample ob him goods, and ax him if he is marry.'"

"Married!" exclaimed Paddy, in a fit of rapture; "no, by de powers! I'm a shingle man yet —hurrah! Oh! thunder and turf, I'll live for the pretty darlint for ever and ever, and as long after that as she plases!"

"I is glad ob dat," said Tom, grinning; "who know wot may happen handsome, good-lookee genelem like you dat de lady is fall in lub wid? So, Sar, you be kind enough to gib small sample ob you goods?"

"Faix, my honey, I'll give ye the whole shop if ye like!" said Paddy.

In the openness of his heart, the good-natured storekeeper proceeded to fill the basket with the various articles which Tom pointed out, till it was completely crammed.

"I tink, Massa, dat is do now," said Tom, when he found that the basket would hold no more. "You is so werry kind, you hab fill de basket."

"It's myself that 's sorry there 's no more room in the basket," said the storekeeper. "I'd almost go into it myself to see your lovely mistress!"

"Oh, Sar!" grinned Tom, "we is take you in, wid great pleasure, I do assure you!"

"Now," said Paddy, "you must take a glass of brandy before you go."

"'Pon soul," exclaimed Tom, "you is too kind; Missee shall be quite delight when she hear ob dis."

The Irishman handed two large glasses, filled with brandy, to the negroes; and Whackie had raised his glass to his lips, when Tom caught his hand, and requested him to stop. Whackie laid down the glass, with a sulky look at his friend, who said, "I beg you pardon; but you know you Missee is not like de smell ob brandy;—so I tink, if dis good genelem is give us small drop ob brandy in one bottle, we is drink him health at night wid great pleasure and much joy."

"Arrah, dears! you'll get a bottle full to drink my health then!" exclaimed Paddy, as he filled a bottle; and which Tom instantly pocketed, bowing to the very ground as Whackie and he departed, leaving the duped storekeeper to indulge in dreams of love and wealth, which were never to be realized.

On turning the corner of the street, Tom burst into a fit of laughter.

"Ha, ha, ha!" he shouted. "Oh Lor! if eber I see such goose as dat storekeeper: was I not do him fust-rate, Whackie?"

"Tom," answered Whackie, seriously, "I no like de way you was cheat dat good Buccra. You was tell him so many lie; I no like dat. My Massa say, dat I must always tell de trute, and be honest."

"Honest!" exclaimed Tom, with a look of mingled wonder and contempt; "wot de debil hab poor niggers got for do wid honesty? My dear Sar, de white men hab kick trute and honesty out ob de worl' long ago: dere is no such ting now."

"Den," answered Whackie, earnestly, "if Buccra drive 'em away, poor nigger should bring 'em back again, and keep 'em in him bosom!"

"And if he do," said Tom, "him no get no credit by 'em. No, no, Whackie; if you wish to get on in dis dam wicked world, you must send honesty to de debil, and tell no more trute den be occasion for: dat's de way for get on now. If you is honest, den ebery rogue try for cheat you wery eyes out you head; and if you always tell de trute, dey call you a dam jackaramass, and knock you eyes out: so you see dis world is not made for trute and honesty."

"Maybe no," said Whackie; "but while I is in dis worl' I should like for be honest, if I could."

"Den you neber shall make anyting by 'em," answered Tom.

Whackie ceased arguing, and Tom, suddenly pausing in his career, said, "I say, Whackie, here be anoder new store. Walk you on wid de basket, and I shall go in and get my pockets fill wid sample."

Emboldened by his success with "Pat Murphy," Tom entered into another store, but started when he beheld a tall, raw-boned, grim-looking Scotchman behind the counter, who answered his salutation with a contemptuous grunt.

"You is hab any good tea and sugar?" inquired Tom, in the most insinuating tone of voice.

"Was ye gaun to buy ony?" inquired the Scotchman, haughtily.

"Perhaps I is," answered Tom, "perwided you keep 'em good."

"Guid!" exclaimed the Scotchman. "D'ye mean to say I keep onything bad?"

"Can't say, Massa, till we see sample ob you goods," grinned Tom.

"Get oot o' my shop, ye villain!" cried the Scotchman, menacing Tom with a heavy roller which he snatched up from the counter. "A sample—ye intak'—I'll sample ye!"

"Massa!" exclaimed Tom, retreating into a corner, "'pon soul, dis is most uncibilize usage!"

"Ye villain! I'll sample ye, ye cheatin' rogue. Gang oot, or I'll brain ye!" cried the Scotchman, in a towering rage, advancing towards him with the roller in his hand.

"Dis is most ungenelamy, 'pon soul!" exclaimed Tom. "You is no genelem!"

"Nae gentleman! ye black vagabond, I'll nae gentleman ye!" exclaimed the store-keeper. And, suiting the action to the word, he brought the roller in contact with Tom's skull so forcibly, that he broke the roller through the middle, one end spinning high in the air, while the other remained firm in his grasp.

"Yeh!" yelled Tom, "you dam Scotcha tief, is dat de way you treat you customers?"

"Confoond yere hard head!" exclaimed the wrothful store-keeper; "I micht as weel hae hutten a whinstane: dang ye! ye hae broken my guid roller!" So saying, he dashed the fragment of the roller at Tom's shins, who fled from the store, cursing in the most approved negro style, nor halted till he overtook his friend Whackie, who, observing Tom's flurried appearance, inquired—

"Wot did dat storekeeper gib you?"

"More den I was want," answered Tom sulkily.

"Wot him gib you sample ob?" inquired Whackie.

"Sample ob him good breeding—dam him eye!" responded Tom. By this time they had entered the public market, and nothing daunted by his recent failure, Tom looked around for a victim. "We must hab some few egg, for make pancakes," said he. "See here be old mullatta woman be sell 'em. I try she.—How you do, ma'am? hope I is hab de felicity of see you well?" he continued, bowing to a yellow-visaged old woman, who presided with great dignity over two large panniers filled with eggs.

"How you do?" said the dame, with a haughty bend of her head to the negro.

"Is you eggs good?" inquired Tom.

"Best in market," she answered.

"I should tink so, when handsome good-lookee lady like you keep em," said Tom, bowing, while the dame smirked and jerked her head, seemingly highly pleased with the compliment; and Tom added—

"Hab you got any black hen eggs?"

"How do I know black hen eggs from white hen eggs?" inquired the woman, staring at him.

"You no know dat?" cried Tom, with affected surprise; "de greatest secret in de trade—I must teachify you. I want two dozen ob black hen eggs—I pick 'em myshef if you please." So saying, he began picking out the largest and best eggs he could see, till the woman exclaimed, "My eye! do black hens lay bigger eggs than white hens?"

"Always, always," answered Tom, as he clutched at another large one.

"Stop, stop," cried the woman, pushing him aside. "I have no more black hen eggs."

"I must hab de two dozen," cried Tom.

"You can't get 'em," cried the woman, fiercely.

"I no pay for wot a got, den!" chuckled Tom, as he made off with his booty, amid a shower of curses from the defrauded woman.

THE FIRST HOME.

"Whatever fortunes wait my future toils,
The beautiful is vanished, and returns not."
The Death of Wallenstein.

About the casement of a room
In which a maid had slept
From budding infancy to bloom,
A honeysuckle crept.

And every morning, when the dew
Lent odour to green lanes,
The honeysuckle-flowers looked through
The maiden's window-panes.

How much of loveliness they saw,
When summer morns were mild,
It is not meet for man to know—
I only know they smiled!

They might have smiled at accents sweet,
And sighs of tenderness,
Such as the dreams of love may cheat
A maiden to express.

They might, indeed, have smiled to see
The early sunbeams dance,
As if they felt it joy to be
On such a countenance!

But when the maid her chamber lef
Dressed as became a bride,
Of her soft voice and looks bereft,
The honeysuckle died.

Upon the lonely window-sill
Its withering tendrils hung,
And, through the vacant room, a chill
Of desolation flung.

The yellow bee, that ever found
Rich increase of his store
'Midst flowers that wreathed that casement round,
Came buzzing there no more;

Nor nestling butterfly, whose wing
Wore all the hues of June,
And to its leaves had loved to cling
Beneath the sultry noon;—

Nor aught, with form imparting grace,
Or music with its voice,
About this love-forsaken place
Did e'er again rejoice;

Because the beauty that had moved
Upon the chamber floor,
Delighting everything that loved,
Returned to it no more.

QUAKER MISSIONS TO AUSTRALIA.*

The Friends are not zealously or systematically a proselytizing sect; although, since their Founder, George Fox, incessantly perambulated England, and visited the West India Islands and the British American colonies, "Friends" in the ministry have from time to time been moved to go forth into strange lands, to preach the glad tidings of the Gospel; and also for those benevolent objects which are among its purest fruits. About the year 1832, James Backhouse of York, a Minister among the Quakers, (who, though they have no ecclesiastical order, have ministers,) and George Washington Walker of Newcastle, "under impressions of religious duty," formed the design of visiting the Australian colonies. Their desire, when laid before the Society, was approved. They went out together, and for nearly six years sojourned principally in Van Diemen's Land, and New South Wales; though the more recent settlements of Port Philip, South and West Australia, and Swan River, were each visited before their return to England. Though Mr. Backhouse and his companion omitted no opportunity of communicating religious instruction and of doing good, their labours were chiefly directed to the convicts, whether prisoners, assigned servants, or chain-gangs. The advocacy of the Temperance cause was another especial object. In all the towns, meetings were held for the promotion of religion and good morals, to which the public were invited; and many visits for religious objects were made to the different Penal Establishments. The expenses of this protracted residence were probably defrayed by the Society of Friends in England; and the missionaries were supplied with Bibles and Tracts, to distribute among the convicts, and with little presents to give to the Aborigines. Their journeys were generally made in the Apostolic mode of walking on foot, by which means they were enabled to visit a large proportion of the scattered settlers, and to carry their message to the most solitary habitations; where they met, on equal terms, the farmers, and the convicts assigned to them as servants. In every instance that is recorded in the voluminous Journal of Mr. Backhouse, they appear to have been received by all classes, from the highest to the lowest, with respect, courtesy, hospitality, and often the most cordial kindness. The days of the browbeating magistrates, the stocks, and the prison, exist no longer for the Quakers, who have peacefully conquered the esteem of a rebellious world.——Though the Journal is mainly occupied with what was the business of the author's mission, and his daily and hourly employment, it is diversified by lighter topics, and contains a good deal of useful information of a popular kind. James Backhouse displays a scientific knowledge of Natural History, especially Botany, and an ardent attachment to these pursuits, which will recommend his work to persons of similar tastes, independently of its leading and higher objects. The Quakers, who, upon principle, deny themselves many pleasures, which other religious sects deem innocent and even useful, as subservient to health of body and cheerfulness and enlargement of spirit, seem happily, of late, strongly attracted by natural beauty; by fine scenery, flowers, the feathered creation, and those minuter works of God, the study of which may, in their grave minds, tend to soften and expand the religious sentiment. A religion so entirely devoid of all ritual and external observances; so spiritualised as that of George Fox—so far as the absence of pomp and show, or what strikes the senses, begets spirituality—seems peculiarly to demand the innocent mental excitement which may be found in the endless forms of natural beauty. If we remember aright, George Fox gave a piece of ground which he possessed in Philadelphia "for a flower-garden, where the lads and lasses might walk." This showed knowledge of the wants of humanity, and a wise indulgence.

Our Quaker Missionaries went out in a vessel in which there were a number of Chelsea pensioners, who had commuted their pensions for an advance of money; as was also lately done, and in no case with the best consequences, with pensioners going as emigrants to Canada. The example of these drouthy veterans and their womenkind did not lessen Mr. Backhouse's admiration of Total Abstinence. As long as their money lasted, they were drunk, riotous, and even mutinous; and in answer to his friendly expostulations, replied, like lords, "That they were free men, and would do what they pleased with their own." Some of the more turbulent were left at the Cape of Good Hope, and others voluntarily remained there. Their conduct leads our author to remark upon the obedience or docility of men whose lives are regulated by inherent moral principle, and those who have been trained by a coercive military discipline, unreasoning to submit. The faithful ministrations of the Quaker brethren among these incorrigible old soldiers, do not appear to have been attended with much effect.——We have hinted that our author has an eye for Nature, both in her beautifully-minute and her more sublime manifestations. This marine picture, found in one of the opening pages of the volume, will tend to corroborate our opinion:—

As we were in the act of crossing L'Agullas Bank, which lies off Cape L'Agullas—the southernmost point of Africa—the waves were magnificently bold. Sometimes we were in a deep hollow, and the next minute mounted on the top of a lofty billow, which, as it approached, seemed ready to swallow us up; but the buoyancy of the vessel occasioned it to rise over the surge; in mounting which, the masts would form an angle of, perhaps, 45 degrees with the horizon, in an opposite direction to that in which the billow advanced: on reaching its top the inclination was suddenly reversed, the wind at the same time pressing the vessel against the receding mass of water, which boiled from under the leeward side, or sometimes flowed over a portion of the deck. Sometimes the top of a broken billow struck against the ship's side, and covered half the vessel with spray. Now and then a shower fell, but often the sun shone brightly on the agitated scene, illuminating the spray from the tops of the broken, dark blue waves, with the colours of the rainbow, and sometimes showing light of emerald green through the unbroken water. Vast numbers of stormy petrels were sailing on the wing, within a few yards of the stern of our bark, and numerous wandering albatrosses were flying around, or occasionally settling on the surface of the boisterous ocean, and riding with careless dignity over the highest billows, scarcely regarding their surfy tops. When custom has taken away the nervous excitement occasioned by the rolling of the ship, it is surprising how little the mind recognises danger under such circumstances; and "how thoughtless still the thoughtless seem." For my own part, I enjoyed the spectacle; but the remembrance, that He who rules over all is our Father, merciful and kind, regarding us for good, was necessary for the enjoyment."

The first place at which the Missionaries touched was Hobart Town; and their first pedestrian excursions—sometimes stretching in the bush to thirty and forty miles a-day—were among the scattered settlements in the surrounding division of Tasmania. Though the work is not intended to give a history of the Australian colonies, yet their most important features, the condition and prospects of the settlers, are necessarily often brought into view during the frequent and intimate intercourse which the Quaker gentlemen had with the people of all ranks. Over all these colonies one is charmed to meet with names familiar and endeared in the Old Country, which, unlike the emigrants to America, the settlers never designate but as—Home. Argyle, Hamilton, the Clyde, Derwent Water, Helvellyn, the Hampshire Hills, Glenorchy, the Esk, the Tamar, and names of like affectionate derivation, are perpetually occurring; while homesteads are named Mona Vale, Avoca, Ellangowan, and by other as kindly, if less romantic, appellations.

One of the excursions recorded was to New Norfolk, formerly Elizabeth Town, to ascertain the condition of persons settled there, who had formerly been located at Norfolk Island, but were now emancipated—and of those still in the penal settlement at Macquarrie Harbour. But as the condition of the convicts, from recent regulations, must soon cease to be of so much interest as that of the free emigrant settlers, we are naturally more attracted by the latter:—

We accompanied George Dixon, an old schoolfellow of mine, and three of his nieces, to his house at Green Valley, on the Lower Clyde, travelling twenty-seven miles on foot, by the side of a little cart, drawn by four oxen, and driven by a prisoner, and proceeding at the rate of about two miles and a half per hour, along a road, a large part of which was a mere cart track. Much of the country was settled: it consisted of hills, generally covered with open grassy forest, and interspersed with little patches of cultivated ground. In locations of land of two or three thousand acres, it is seldom that as many hundreds have been tilled. Large portions are of woody and rocky hills, that cannot be ploughed, but on which sheep feed. . . . . On Macquarrie Plains we called on John Terry, an emigrant from Yorkshire, who has a corn-mill at New Norfolk, and who was here shearing his sheep. He is a scrupulously honest man, who left England at a time when farmers were suffering adversity; and notwithstanding many difficulties that he has had to contend with, he thinks his circumstances have been greatly improved by the change. A few miles beyond his cottage is the Woolpack inn; the sitting-room of which would not disgrace a market-town in England. We called also at the hut of a Scotchman, to get a drink of water, no more being to be had for nine miles. . . . . Pursuing our route over low hills, some clear of wood, and others covered with black wattle, Acacia affinis, yielding a gum like gum Arabic, we at length reached Green Valley, where we received a hearty greeting from Agnes Dixon, a native of Lewis, one of the Western Islands of Scotland, who soon prepared a refreshing cup of tea; after which, we gladly resigned our weary limbs and blistered feet to rest.

George Dixon emigrated to this colony eleven years ago; he was trained to agricultural pursuits, and has brought a portion of his location of land into cultivation, both in the growth of wheat and other grain; he has also formed a good garden, which is well stocked with fruit trees and has a hawthorn hedge. The common fences of the country are formed of logs, branches, or posts and rails. His house is built of split wattles, plastered and whitewashed, the roof projecting in front and resting on wooden pillars so as to form a verandah, a common style of building in this country. The house consists of two front rooms with boarded floors, and two behind,—a kitchen and store-room,—floored with stone. His land consists of basaltic hills with grassy forest, and he has about a mile of frontage on the Clyde, which at this season of the year is little more than a chain of pools—called here lagoons—of various length and depth, and about thirty feet in width. In winter this becomes a considerable river. Some parts of its banks are open, others bushy, and some rocky. In one place, a rock like a steeple stands between a cliff and the margin of the river. G. Dixon's shepherd is a prisoner, but a man of religious sensibility; he became a thief from the influence of intoxicating drink, but does not show any dishonesty when he abstains: he had a ticket-of-leave, but lost it in consequence of being persuaded to drink a glass of porter, which immediately revived his thieving propensity.

If Mr. Backhouse believes that a single glass of porter will excite "the thieving propensity," he does well to be tee-total. In a visit in a different direction, another settler's dwelling was seen.

Having received an invitation from a settler named Robert Mather, to pay him a visit at Lauderdale, on Muddy Plains, we made our way to his house, crossing a salt marsh, on the side of which were large bushes of Shrubby Samphire. R. Mather sent notice to his neighbours, of our wish to have a meeting with them, and walked with us to the house of an industrious, sober couple, who, while prospering in temporal things, did not forget the importance of those that are spiritual. A well-worn bible was lying on their table, and the woman told us, that as she became unable to do needle-work by candle-light, she spent much of her evenings in reading this precious book to her family. Her husband was a marine, and is a pensioner. He was formerly addicted to the use of spirits, till, like many others in this country, he would bring rum home in a bucket, and drink it neat out of a pint tin. This his wife would not allow, and he had the good sense to submit to her better government, by which he has become greatly raised in circumstances and in comfort. They have a neat, clean brick house, two tidy children, and a thriving garden, clear of weeds. . . . . Accompanied by R. Mather, we called on several of the settlers, many of whom are of the poorer class, to whom we spoke on the importance of attending to their spiritual concerns, and gave some tracts, for which they appeared grateful. We dined with a respectable family living in a hut of the humblest structure, who increased their means of support, by converting into lime such shells as have accumulated in great abundance on the shore of Ralph's Bay. At this place we met with William Gellibrand—a settler residing on a peninsula in the Derwent called South Arm,—and accepting an invitation to visit his establishment, proceeded thither in a lime boat. W. Gellibrand's house is situated near the northern extremity of the peninsula: it commands a view of Ralph's

Bay and the Derwent, backed by the woody hills on the shore, with Hobart Town at the distance of nine miles. This part of South Arm is a little elevated. Basaltic and grit rocks project on its steep sides; on which Gulls and Shags roost in great numbers. Peach and almond trees are coming into blossom in the well-stocked garden. The native grass of the country is thin; but the land in tillage yields a fair return. The intelligent proprietor pays more attention than most persons to the comfort and morals of his assigned servants. This attaches them to him, and raises a tone of feeling in their minds congenial to their reformation. On conversing with one of these men, who has had an unusual measure of privilege during the time he has been a prisoner, respecting the comparative difficulties he might expect on becoming free, his sentence expiring in a few days; he remarked, "But, Sir, Liberty is sweet!"

We returned to the main land, and dined with an interesting family of Independents. Here we first partook of Kangaroo, the taste of which is somewhat intermediate between that of beef and mutton: it is usually served up with bacon in a kind of hash called "a steamer."

Every settler is not in the snug domestic position of George Dixon and his Hebridean wife; though, by industry and perseverance, every one has it very much in his power to improve his circumstances. We shall give another example of this sort. The locality is the neighbourhood of Launceston.

Andrew Gatenby left Yorkshire, at a period of difficulty among farmers, in that county and settled for a time in Wales. Here he found his rent too high, to admit of his making a livelihood for his family, even with his industrious habits: he therefore determined to emigrate to Van Diemen's Land. When his landlord found that he was really intending to leave his farm in Wales, he offered to lower the rent; but A. Gatenby had already made arrangements for his projected voyage; and he now says, that it has been better for his circumstances that he has emigrated, than it would have been to have accepted the farm in Wales as a gift. On arriving in Tasmania, he obtained a good grant of land, under the regulations then existing; upon which, himself and family, several of whom were sons, worked diligently with their own hands. Perhaps in no country is the adage more true than in this, "He that by the plough would thrive, himself must either hold or drive." They tilled their own land, made their own bricks, and built their own house, with the help of a few prisoner-servants; and they have now one of the most complete farming establishments in the Island. In the early part of their residence here, their house was attacked by Bushrangers, one of whom was shot by one of A. Gatenby's sons; and one of his sons lost his life by some hostile Aborigines. These causes of alarm and distress are now removed from the country, in which life is, nevertheless, much more frequently terminated by accidents than in England. In speaking respecting a neighbour that A. Gatenby had in Yorkshire, and whom he esteemed very highly, and would gladly have had for a neighbour in Tasmania, he said—"You may tell him how I have done; but do not say I advise him to come. You know all have not done so well as I have, and I do not know how he might succeed."

At first, and often for years, many severe privations must be endured.

When a place is first occupied by a settler, a hut of the simplest kind is formed, often like a mere roof resting on the ground; and when other needful things have been effected, one of upright logs is built, and covered with shingles. This is usually divided into two rooms; one of which is fitted up with broad rough shelves, for sleeping berths; and the other, which has a square recess for a fireplace, built of stones at the outer end, and continued into a rude chimney a little higher than the roof, is used for a cooking and sitting-room. The crevices between the logs either remain open, or are filled with wool, or some other material. A square opening, closing with a shutter, admits light into each room, and short logs of wood, or rude benches, serve for seats. Many families that have been brought up in England in respectable circumstances, live for several years in a hut of this description, until they can find time and means to build themselves a better habitation; and a hut of this kind is generally to be seen contiguous to a better house, and is occupied by the male servants, who are mostly prisoners.

Perhaps a chief reason why some persons make a better livelihood here than in England, is, because they submit to live at a much smaller expense. The original settlers having had free grants of land, subject only to a quit-rent, had also no rent to pay; but no free grants of land are now made. The lowest sum for which land is sold by the Government is £5 per acre. Although convict servants are sentenced to work without wages, they cost a settler, in one way or another, from £20 to £25 a-year, including maintenance, clothing, &c. . . . . In the course of one of our walks, we passed the remains of a hut that was burnt about two years ago, by the Aborigines of the Ouse or Big River district. An old man named Clark lost his life in it, but a young woman escaped; she rushed from the fire and fell on her knees before the natives, one of whom extinguished the flames which had caught her clothes, and beckoned to her to go away. They killed a woman on the hill behind the hut. A few weeks after, they surrounded the house of G. Dixon, who received a spear through his thigh, in running from a barn to his house. Previously to this period, the natives had visited this neighbourhood peaceably, and excited no alarm. They have now been removed to Flinder's Island; but a detachment of soldiers, such as was placed in various situations to defend the settlers against the Aborigines, still remains at Ellangowan, near the house of a fine old Scotchwoman, named Jacobina Burns, who emigrated from her own country many years ago, and has induced several of her relatives to follow her. She has improved her circumstances, and is noted for hospitality, which is indeed a very general virtue among the settlers in this land.

While at Green Valley, walking alone, and meditating on the clear evidence I had had of its being my religious duty to visit this part of the world, for many years before the right time seemed to be come for me to set out, and querying within myself as to how we should proceed, so as to be found acting in accordance with the divine will, the words, "Go through the breadth of the land," were impressed on my mind with such authority as left no doubt but this was the counsel of the Lord, mercifully granted for our direction. For the Lord still condescends to lead about and instruct those who put their trust in him; notwithstanding it may seldom be by impressions exactly of this kind; but more frequently by a constraining sense of his will, independent of any distinct form of words, or by the overruling of his providence.

Many passages of this kind may be expected to occur in the journal of a disciple of George Fox. Of the natural intellect of the Aborigines here and in the different Australian colonies, Mr. Backhouse expresses the humane and enlightened opinions held by all reflecting men; and he has related many anecdotes and traits of individuals among this ill-treated, despised, and degraded race, which demonstrate that they labour under no natural incapacity. His observations on the prisoners in one Penitentiary are almost equally applicable to the convict prisoners everywhere. "Many of them appeared truly grateful for a little religious counsel, extended in friendly sympathy." The tenets of Mr. Backhouse, as a Quaker, lead him frequently to regret the omission of public worship in these new colonies, because there happened to be no minister to conduct the service; as if there could be no public acts of devotion where there is no priest. In one place he remarks,—

If people were directed to wait more singly upon the Lord, they would not omit assembling for worship because no minister was present, as some did to-day, when their minister was prevented from arriving by the stormy weather. It is a hurtful thing to lean upon man, in that which is a duty to God, and which ought to be performed in spirit and in truth.

In another place we find him enforcing the same opinions:—

I cannot but greatly esteem the privilege of having been trained to the practice of meeting, to wait upon the Lord, independently of the intervention of a minister. The common custom, of no minister, no public worship, ill accords with the precept, "Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together, as the manner of some is." Indeed, I know of no people but Friends, who, exercising faith in the Redeemer's declaration, "Wheresoever two or three are met together in my name, there am I in the midst of them," act upon the Apostle's precept fully, by meeting when there is no preacher present. Much as I esteem Gospel ministry as a gift of God, conferred for the edification of his Church, I cannot but look upon those views of public worship, which render it dependent upon the intervention of a priest or a minister, as belonging rather to the dispensation of the law of Moses, than to the Gospel of Christ.

This next is for the Puseyites; the place Bathurst:—

I spent some time in the school, under the care of J. E. Keane, in which there are about thirty pupils, who are trained with much Christian care, and are diligently instructed in the Holy Scriptures. I could not, however, but lament to hear them taught such palpable error as is conveyed in the Catechism of the Episcopal Church, by which they are instructed to say, that they become members of Christ, and children of God, by baptism, clearly implying by baptism with water. I know this fallacy is attempted to be explained away, by various arguments; but it is quite in vain to try to twist the plain meaning of the words. It remains palpably untrue, that any infant, by water-baptism, becomes a member of Christ, or a child of God; and the direct tendency of such instruction as teaches them to say that this is the case, is to deceive the young, with regard to their own religious state, and to lead them to attach to this rite the imaginary effect of a mystical charm, and to divert their attention from the baptism of the Holy Ghost, received only through the mediation of Christ, by which alone they can become members of Christ, children of God, and heirs of eternal life.

The Quaker Missionaries,—we do not know how otherwise to designate them, and in our vocabulary Quaker is an honoured name,—visited the Aborigines of Tasmania, now settled or exiled to Flinder's Island, in Bass's Straits. These people have been often described. A number of them were waiting on the beach to see the strangers disembark, and they shook hands with them very courteously. The settlement was, at the time, short of provisions; and when it was learned that supplies had been brought, they held "a corrobery," or festal dance, around a fire, to testify their satisfaction. Their dances are all pantomimic.

Several of the Aborigines came into the Commandant's hut, when we were at breakfast, and seated themselves quietly on stools, or on the floor; they did not offer to touch anything, but expressed pleasure on receiving a little tea or bread. They have a great dislike to butter or anything fat. At their own meals, they have learned to use tin cans and dishes, of which they take some care. On their first settlement, they threw away these articles as soon as their meals were over, and it was a matter of no small trouble, and exercise of patience, to gather them together again. Fuel was at first collected by their white attendants, to boil the water for their tea; but when their taste for this article became strong, they were told, that they must either bring fuel for themselves or go without tea; and by means of this kind they were led to exertion in supplying their own wants. They now collect fuel cheerfully, and assist in cooking, making bread, &c., and a soldier's wife teaches the women to wash. . . . . Late in the evening we visited the Aborigines in the three huts or "break-winds" that have been erected for them; these are built of spars, and thatched with rushes: they resemble roofs, and have an aperture along the ridge, for the escape of smoke. These, with a few cottages of similar materials, for the soldiers and prisoner boats-crew, and some weather-board huts, occupied by the Commandant, Surgeon, &c., and a tent used by a Surveyor, form the Settlement at this place, which is called The Lagoons. In each of the huts of the natives, there were fires along the centre, around which they were lying, in company with their dogs, which are good-tempered like themselves. On our entering the people sat up, and began to sing their native songs—sometimes the men, at others the women—with much animation of countenance and gesture. This they kept up to a late hour; they are said often to continue their singing till midnight. To me, their songs were not unpleasing: persons skilled in music consider them harmonious. . . . . The men having been requested to cease from wearing "bal-de-winny," that is red ochre and grease, in their hair, they had signified a willingness to do so, if they might have some other covering for their heads; and to-day, according to a previous agreement, Scotch caps were distributed among them, with which they were much delighted. In these they seemed to perceive a similarity to the head-dress of the military, and they immediately arranged themselves in a rank! . . . . . They wear the bones of deceased relatives around their necks, perhaps more as tokens of affection than for ornament; and these are also used as charms. They are commonly leg or jaw bones, wrapped with strings rolled in grease and ochre, the ends only protruding; but there is a couple here who lost their only child in infancy, and its skull is generally to be seen suspended on the breast either of its father or its mother. A man who had a head-ache to day, had three leg bones fixed on his head, in the form of a triangle, for a charm. The shells for necklaces are of a brilliant pearly blue.

The manners of the Aborigines of Van Diemen's Land will soon be little more than a matter of antiquarian curiosity. They are fast perishing under the blight which the white men, the "superior race," seem to carry wherever they go. Like all savages, the people here are remarkable for the keenness or perfection of their senses, of which some singular instances are recorded. Mr. Backhouse and his colleague made a second visit to Flinder's Island, which impressed him still more favourably. The natives came on a Sabbath morning with the soldiers to a religious meeting which he held.

The Aborigines, having noticed that the few soldiers at this station, who were placed as a guard against the Sealers, were mustered on First-day mornings to see that they had made themselves properly clean, voluntarily commenced mustering in a similar way; they also brought out the wares with which they had been entrusted, to have them inspected. The Commandant took advantage of this, and encouraged them to do so weekly. This morning they presented their tin pots and plates, knives and spoons, bright and clean, and, except three men, were clean in their apparel. These men complained that the women had not washed their clothes, and threatened to wash them themselves, if they should again be so neglected.

Sometimes our wayfaring apostle was compelled, for want of better shelter, to bivouac in the unexplored, or unsettled plains into which he made his way. One example of this sort must amuse stay-at-home and feather-bed Friends of all denominations.

As evening drew on, we made a "break-wind" of boughs, and thatched it with fern, &c., of which we also prepared a bed. Toward night, rain fell, but not so as to extinguish our fire, though it stopped the burning of the grass and fern. We were amused with the note of a little bird, in the wood near which we had formed our shelter, that in a shrill whistle, seemed to involve the words, "Who are you? who are you? Are you wet? are you?"—In passing through a woody hollow, we saw many of the tree-ferns, with the upper portion of the trunk split, and one-half turned back. This had evidently been done by the Aborigines, to obtain the heart for food, but how the process was effected, I could not discover; it must certainly have required considerable skill.

Mr. Backhouse relates many anecdotes illustrative of the previous character, training, and habits of the convicts. Among a chain-gang of a hundred and fifty employed in cutting a road between Hobart Town and Richmond, there was a "juvenile offender," still a youth, who had been trained in vice from his infancy, and who had passed from the milder to the more severe form of punishment since his transportation to the colony, in consequence of new offences. When in his first convict state, and employed as a cabin-boy in a cutter, the following conversation is said to have taken place between him and the mate of the vessel.

Mate: "Tommy! where do you come from?" Boy: "Liverpool, sir."—Mate: "What is your father?" Boy: "I have none, sir."—Mate: "What was he?" Boy: "Nothing, sir."—Mate: "What is your mother?" Boy: "She is dead, sir."—Mate: "Who do you live with, at home?" Boy: "My sister, sir."—Mate: "What is your sister?" Boy: "Nothing, sir."—Mate: "What did you do for a living?" Boy: "They used to put me in at the windows to open doors, sir."

The following passages have little connexion, but for that reason they offer a fairer idea of the lighter parts of this journal.

We visited Hugh and Mary Germain, in their neat cottage. Hugh Germain came to Van Diemen's Land with Colonel Collins, at the first settlement of the colony. He was a private in the marines, and was for many years employed in hunting kangaroos and emus for provisions, which the officer, whose servant he was, received from him, and sold to the government, at 1s. 6d. per pound. Germain, assisted by two prisoners, returned 1000 pounds per month, on an average. Though emus are now rarely seen on the island, at that time they were frequently met with about New Norfolk, Salt Pan Plains, the Coal River, and Kangaroo Point. The kangaroo was also very plentiful in places where it is now rarely seen: one of the largest foresters that Germain killed, was on the spot where Hobart Town barracks now stand: the hind quarters weighed 130 lbs., and it measured nine feet from the tip of the nose to that of the hind feet. At this period, these animals were usually taken by dog. H. Germain says, he rarely carried a gun, though he often fell in with parties of aborigines, "in whom there was then no harm." He thinks they hurt nobody, till two white men, charged with murder, escaped from Port Dalrymple, and got among them. He pursued this mode of life so closely, as to be, at one time, five years without sleeping on a bed; and sometimes, in very wet weather, he was driven to take refuge from floods in a tree; where he has had to remain all night, covered with a large kangaroo's skin, to keep off the rain. He was the first white man who penetrated into several parts of the colony, and a principal in conferring upon them such names as Jericho, Bagdad, Abyssinia, &c. Only one of the party could read; and his only books were a Bible, and the Arabian Nights' Entertainments; out of which books the places were successively named. He considers his health to have been preserved through these hardships, chiefly, by washing himself well every morning and evening. . . . .

The adaptation of animals to their station, is one of the subjects in which the wisdom and skill of the Creator is remarkably exemplified. Thus the eye of the Morepork or Greater Night Jarr, which I lately had the opportunity of examining, is wonderfully adapted for enabling it to see the insects in the dark, on which it feeds. The eye is large, and stretched by a bony ring, of one piece; and when recently removed, it forms a fine camera-obscura, transmitting the images of objects facing it, through the integuments at the back of the retina. The tongue of the Wattle-bird and the Honey-eater being pencilled with hairs, is as remarkably adapted to enable them to obtain the honey, which forms their food, from flowers. . . . . .

I had a conference with a person respecting the settlement of his affairs, and took some memorandums, from which the draft of his will was prepared, which was read to him, in the company of his wife and sons. It is to be regretted that the laws of primogeniture and entail, which are of prejudicial influence in Great Britain, should be in force in a new colony like this. Their direct tendency is, to preserve influence in the hands of persons who may have nothing to qualify them to use it aright, and thus to prevent the influence of others, who may have every necessary qualification to benefit the public, but may not be possessed of great property; and this is but a small part of the evil connected with these laws. My attention has long been attracted to their pernicious effect upon the progress of civil and religious improvement in my native land, the prosperity of which lies near to my heart.

Among the outcasts at Norfolk Island, the approach to which is denominated "Hell's Gates," and the denizens of which are among the blackest criminals that outraged society has ever thrown from her bosom, there are still some lingering traces of man's susceptibility of divine renovation. Mr. Backhouse, who, with his companion, at different times visited these wretched prisoners, tells of one of them:—

One man, who now mourns because of his past sins, told us, that he had been twice sentenced to death, and a third time had narrowly escaped the gallows, when he had been concerned in a robbery, with attempt at murder. He was formerly in high esteem with his fellow-prisoners, for his boldness; but this boldness was then exercised in the practice of iniquity. He was brought to reflect upon his sinful state, under the divine blessing, upon the labours of William Marshall, the surgeon of the Alligator, who, when that vessel was here, a few months ago, during the time that a number of men were tried for mutiny, frequently visited the prisoners, and endeavoured to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God.—This prisoner was scarcely known to flinch under the lash, of which he received, at one time, three hundred strokes, nor did he weep under the sentence of death; but now the tears steal down his cheeks, while he lifts up his heart in prayer to God, against whom he has so greatly revolted, and implores the pardon of his sins for Jesus' sake. In remarking upon the contriting influence of the love of God, he told us, that he sometimes heard the prisoner who slept next him, and who had also been very hardened, weeping under its influence, while others slept.

Mr. Backhouse had by this time left Van Diemen's Land, and established his head-quarters at Sydney, where he and his companion seem to have opened a Meeting, as was also done at Hobart Town. In Sydney some young men were found who had been brought up among the Quakers; though "Friends" in the colonies seem sad backsliders. In Sydney, Mr. Backhouse gave lectures on Temperance; the advantages of which virtue must then have been very obvious in these colonies, where intemperance has been the fruitful mother of much vice and misery among all classes. These colonies are now, we believe, much improved in this and other respects. In the towns, besides holding religious assemblies, the Quaker Missionaries attended all meetings for benevolent purposes, and laboured diligently in every branch of their vocation, and in a true Catholic spirit. We find Mr. Backhouse often bearing testimony to the useful labours of other ministers, and especially of the missionaries of the Wesleyan Methodists. He is much less fond of the Roman Catholic priests and their "old bones." One day while travelling on foot as usual, and in a country then—seven years since—very thinly settled, when at a place about forty or more miles from Bathurst, he relates—

In the forenoon we rested on a log, by a shepherd who was watching his flock, with whom we conversed on the way of holiness, and work of redemption. The young man's heart was open to understand the things that were spoken, which he frankly acknowledged had not had sufficient place in his thoughts. Being much fatigued in the evening with our walk of thirty-two miles, we had concluded to make a fire, and sleep in the bush, when it began to rain, lighten, and thunder. We therefore made our way, which was now become difficult to find in the dark, to a mean, dirty hut, at a place called Newry, belonging to a settler, and occupied by a ticket-of-leave stock-keeper, and an assigned prisoner-servant. These men entertained us hospitably with milk and damper, fare such as was offered to us at every station at which we called, on our way, and sometimes with the addition of tea and meat. There were two black youths residing in the hut with the stockmen: we were informed that they made themselves useful in minding the sheep, milking the cows, &c. The stock-keeper observed that these Blacks stopped with them better than their countrymen generally do with white people, because they treated them more like companions, and gave them a part of such provision as they themselves eat, instead of throwing scraps to them, as if to dogs.

Our accommodation last night, though the best the place afforded, was such as we but seldom have had to put up with. Our bed was more sombre than would be found in the meanest, mendicant, lodging-house in England; it was only outdone by a blanket, generally used by one of the Aborigines, which was folded to add to the width of the bed.

At Wellington Valley, in this district, the Church of England had then a mission station; and after the missionary had read the prayers of the Episcopal church, he informed the congregation, consisting of soldiers, settlers, and a few blacks, that as the stranger was present he would forego preaching. He accordingly invited Mr. Backhouse, if he had anything to say in love, to address the audience. This privilege, to which Mr. Backhouse was courteously invited, was used somewhat as George Fox may have employed his Christian liberty when he had made a forcible entrance into a "steeple-house." Yet the matter was excellent; the time, all things considered, not quite so suitable for part of the address delivered. It is, however, too characteristic to be passed in silence.

My mind had been under much exercise, and after a short pause, I stood up, and gave utterance to what was before me; alluding to what was said by the apostle Paul, when he preached to the Athenians; and showing, that the superstitions of the present day, do not consist in worshipping idols of wood and of stone, graven by art, and man's device, but in imagining that we are doing God service, by going through certain forms and rituals, devised by man, in imitation of the expressions of spiritual devotion. These things I had to contrast with that worship which is in spirit and in truth; showing their inferiority, and that the Lord, to many who use them, is an unknown God.

We forbear the rest. At this station, Mr. Backhouse had good opportunities of observing the native character, though only as it is to be seen deteriorated by the bad example and oppression of the whites. The pernicious effects of the intercourse of the soldiers and convicts with the blacks, the labours of the missionaries had not been able, in any sensible degree, to counteract. An old Irishman, who was met hereabouts, informed Mr. Backhouse, that the language of the blacks of the colony in many points resembled the ancient Irish tongue.

This picture of a matron of New South Wales, in the district of Illawarra, will charm the reader:—

On a little spot of cleared land, near the margin of a lake, is the habitation of a settler, in humble life: it is a very rustic hut, covered with bark, and internally having much of the sombre hue common to the dwellings of the lower classes of the Scotch and Irish, and which too often prevails also in those of the English in this colony. But the mother of this family is of a character rarely met with in these wilds; she is pious, and abounding in Christian goodwill to all around her. It was a treat to visit her, and to receive her hearty blessing. She is an honour to her country, Scotland, and an ornament to the community to which she belongs. Our medical friend had been called in professionally, when she was ill; but he found that he had come rather to receive than to give advice. From this place we went to the hut of our friend to dine. It was of rough slabs, covered with bark, rustic, in the full sense of the word, and scarcely protecting his valuable library from the weather. Here he is superintending a flock of sheep, the joint property of himself and one of his friends, who is also temporarily dwelling in the same habitation. But Illawarra not being a favourable country for sheep, though a delightful climate, and fine soil, well adapted for agriculture, and which will, no doubt, become the Egypt of Australia, our friend is about to remove with his flock to one of the more elevated southern districts.

Among many anecdotes of the distress and loss occasioned to the farmers and flock-masters by the severe droughts to which these southern lands are liable, we are much struck with the following fact. A herd of sixteen horses, belonging to the proprietor of Regentville, near Penrith, when famishing of thirst, strayed to a peninsula on the mountains, attracted by the sound of falling water, which, however, they could not reach. As if enchanted by the sound, they continued to pace round and round the spot, till they all perished by thirst. Mr. Backhouse frequently alludes to an epidemic among the domestic animals, which goes by the convenient name of Influenza, and often occasions great havoc among the flocks.

A grand sacrifice to the genius of Tee-totalism was one day consummated at Sydney, which the missionaries had the satisfaction of witnessing. Five puncheons of rum, and two hogsheads of Geneva, were poured out into the Cove, the Governor having previously remitted the duty. Some looked on from the neighbouring vessels with approval, others with surprise; and one man cried out—"That's real murder!" He was, however, able to fish up a horn of salt-water grog, but not to swallow the nauseous draught. Upon another occasion, a commissariat officer called them to witness, immediately after dinner too, the destruction of his private stock of brandy. Could he not as well have sent it to the hospital surgeons?

Mr. Backhouse never wearies in expatiating upon the lovely Flora of New South Wales, with which his long pedestrian journeys gave him abundant opportunity to become acquainted. One passage may serve as a specimen of those little sketches, which so pleasantly relieve the graver parts of the Journal.

The brushes on the border of the Wilson, are very magnificent. The trees, some of which are of gigantic size, are overrun with climbing, evergreen shrubs, twisted about them in fanciful coils, or wreathed around them, like huge serpents, or hanging from them like ropes; their leafy tops being enlivened by gay and fragrant blossoms, and often hanging pendent to the ground, which is covered thickly with beautiful shrubs, ferns, and flowering plants, nourished by the moisture of the rich alluvial soil, and kept from the parching influence of the sun by the exuberant foliage. Mosses, epiphytes of the Orchis tribe, and splendid ferns, as well as various species of fig-tree, support themselves on the trunks and branches of the larger timber, and add greatly to the richness of this kind of forest scenery; among which gay parrots, cockatoos, and other birds, unlike those of our native land, sport and chatter in harmony with the rest of the surrounding objects, which are strongly calculated to remind an Englishman that he is far from home, even though he may have made this his adopted country. But to one who, feeling reconciled to God through the death of his Son, can, with a sense of the divine presence in his mind, look upon these objects, and with filial love to his and their Creator, say, "My Father made them all"—they have an interest which cannot be understood by those who are living at enmity with God.

He upon many occasions recommends matrimony, from witnessing its numerous beneficial effects, both among the convicts and all classes of settlers, whether in town or country. The dwellings of the married are neater and much more comfortable; their property is better cared for; and they are in every respect in a happier and higher moral and social condition.

When Mr. Backhouse visited Port Philip in 1837, business was in a very unsound state in that new colony. Almost everything was paid for by orders on Sydney or Van Diemen's Land; and persons having cash to pay, demanded from £20 to £40 per cent. discount. The enormous nominal wages given to mechanics at this time, were paid half in goods charged £30 per cent. profit, and the rest by an order, for which £10 per cent. discount was given. Such high wages are, in fact, a complete deception. The short residence in South Australia in the same year, does not require much notice, as that colony has since made considerable advances. Nothing favourable is reported of the settlement in King George's Sound, nor of the Swan River settlement. Nor is there a much better report of Western Australia. The excessive use of spirits has been very detrimental to all these colonies, both as regards the diminution of their capital, and the demoralization of the habits of those who should have been the very sinews of the young settlements. Of Western Australia it is remarked—

The whole revenue of the Government, amounting to about £7000 a-year, is derived from spirits, in the form of duty on the imports; so that the amount of capital annually paid for them must be much more considerable The colony is so poor, as to be unable to import sheep in sufficient quantity to stock its lands, so that the holders of grants of from 5,000 to 100,000 acres, have little stock of any kind upon them. Such grants are consequently of so little value, as to occasion land to be sold as low as from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. per acre! Had the money expended in spirits since the foundation of the colony, been occupied in the importation of sheep, it is not improbable that land might now have been ten times its present value; and had no grants originally exceeded 5000 acres, many more persons would have had the means of maintaining flocks of about 1000 sheep each. The wealth of the colony would probably have been thus increased, so as to have rendered grants of this size, by this time, as valuable as those of 50,000 acres each now are. Spirit drinking, and avarice in obtaining grants of large extent, have paralyzed the country, which, beyond a doubt, is naturally very inferior to what was originally represented. The exports of oil and wool are yet very inconsiderable, perhaps not amounting to £4000 in any one year; and almost the only other sources of income to the colony, are the payments of Government salaries, the supply of provision to the few ships that put in here, and a little arising from private property. The persons who have improved their circumstances by emigration to this country, are labourers, storekeepers, and a few others, into whose hands much of the capital that was originally in the possession of other colonists, has passed; but by this transition the capital of the colony is not increased. Its population is said to be now only about 2000, or one-third of what it was three years after the colony was first settled. Death, frequently the result of drinking, and emigration to Australia and Tasmania, have been the chief causes of this reduction.

By more recent accounts, (for this was written in 1838,) Western Australia has rallied, and made a more satisfactory progress. In each of these settlements, Mr. Backhouse saw groups of natives. Their condition and character appear much the same in all of them; though, from one passage of the Journal, we are led to believe that some of the tribes had, before the invasion of the whites, made some advances in civilisation, and were living in somewhat the same condition as the American Indians, if not a step before them in social progress. Mr. Backhouse, who is ever friendly to the feeble and friendless, relates of them—

I have heard, from persons of respectable authority, that in the Swan River country, as well as at King George's Sound, the natives have their private property, clearly distinguished into hunting-grounds, the boundaries of which are definite, trees being often recognised by them as landmarks, and that the possession rests in the head of a family. Several of these families residing in a district, form what the white people call a tribe; but these tribes are not subject to any recognised chief, though a man of prowess will often gain great ascendancy among them. A young man, who resided some years at King George's Sound, told me that several tribes of blacks assembled there, once a-year, and held a sort of fair; and that as different tribes excelled each other in the manufacture of weapons, such as spears, throwing sticks, or woomeras, kylers, or boom-rings, shields, and waddies, these formed the articles of exchange, as well as the red-ochre, with which, combined with grease, they besmear themselves, and which is only found in certain localities.

To some readers we may have said too much about this Quaker record; but to many more we should hope not half enough. As a whole, it may appear tedious and monotonous, at least to short-hand modern readers; but it cannot fail to communicate both entertainment and instruction to many a quiet and intelligent domestic circle; to excite the minds of the young, and improve the hearts of all; and these surely are among the best uses of literature.

MONTHLY MEMENTOES.

NO. II. FOR APRIL:—WAR DEPRECATED.

Grim, hideous relique of the savage Past,
The via Moloch for six thousand years,
Who sees thy horrors, shuddering turns aghast,
Thou dreary pass of blood, of rapine, cairns, and tears.
Doth history blason this a glorious way,
Where conquerors slaughtered hinds to nourish kings,
Treading God's wine-press with their feet of clay
In monstrous scorn of humanizing things,
Man's bliss or being frantic to bewray!
Oh! every hour and wind the treacherous falsehood sings:
Yet war—this barbarous heritage,
This winter of the wide world's story,
This lava roaring through each Age,
Grave madmen recognise as glory!—
Hence, Wisdom, on thy pilgrimage!
Earth and her countless fools grow hoary.

And must these Thugs still pile the battle pyre?
Must human shambles still be human gear?
Must Carnage raise his bloody altars higher,
And scathe the living hearts of half a hemisphere?
Christian and patriot, what is your decree?
Enlighten'd statesman, your wise code unfold—
Speak, priests and prelates,—He of Galilee
Demands your practice of His precepts old—
How? Warriors all!—Huge hypocrites are ye,
Or, else, your creed is false and heaven's a cheat that's sold!
For war—the barbarous heritage,
The winter of the wide world's story,
Red lava roaring through each Age,
You, madmen, recognise as glory!—
Hence, Wisdom, on thy pilgrimage!
Earth and her countless fools grow hoary.

Christian or pagan, gothic or refined,
Earth's old distemper, Wrong, remains the same,
Greed leads forth Conquest, Vengeance grins behind,
And all man's boasted gain proves but an altered name.
Explore Time's archives,—through the lustrums gone
Fame smiles on Fury;—through each varied creed
Priests herd with soldiers ever and anon!
Do tyrants topple, or do subjects bleed—
Are systems raised or systems trampled on?
Fame holds her lamp to Force—yea, Slaughter hath the meed!
For war—the barbarous heritage,
The winter of the wide world's story,
The lava roaring through each Age,
Grave madmen recognise as glory!—
Hence, Wisdom, on thy pilgrimage!
Earth and her countless fools grow hoary.

Should this be so? Does man exist for this,
To reap the harvest of the life of man?
Being he has, and hopes hereafter bliss,
Yet reckless mars them both when "valiantly" he can.
Will all the battles for his leagues of land—
Will all the murders for his monarch's thrones—
Will all the prayers to bless "the hero band,"
With all the glory of foes' rotting bones,
Avail his wish in that Space-grasping Hand
Which holds the harp of Life and loves to wake its tones?
Yet war—the barbarous heritage,
The winter of the wide world's story,
The lava roaring through each Age,
Grave madmen recognise as glory!—
Hence, Wisdom, on thy pilgrimage!
Earth and her countless fools grow hoary.

Albeit, conflict rageth as of yore!—
This month of April hath its epochs brave,
It saw the Barons' league. The Charter bore
Themselves and churchmen free, but call'd the People —Slave!
Then, priests took arms, true militant on earth,
With falchions slaying whom they first would curse,
And, being warlike, proved the second birth
Was cutting Paynim—or a Hebrew's purse:
No lukewarm scruples checked their murderous mirth:*
God's Word they made a corpse and all the world its hearse.
For war—the barbarous heritage,
The winter of the wide world's story,
The lava that devoured the Age,
Those madmen recognised as glory!—
Hence, Wisdom, on thy pilgrimage!
Earth's countless fools, untaught, grow hoary!

This month, too, saw the battle of Dunbar;
When English Edward seized on Scotia's throne,
Gouting with blood—as other trophies are—
The patriarch's pillow borne from Royal Scone.†
That Age ferocious wore a butcher's knife
And bred a race of sanguinary Thors,
Of whom this month closed Cœur de Lion's strife,—
And those foul murders called the Civil Wars
This month, at Barnet, took false Warwick's life:
Chiefs in that heinous crime which injured heaven abhors:
Yet war—the barbarous heritage,
The winter of the wide world's story,
The lava roaring through each Age,
Grave madmen recognise as glory!—
Hence, Wisdom, on thy pilgrimage!
Earth and her countless fools grow hoary.

This month gave birth to one who slew his Liege,
Cromwell ycleped—a man of blood and prayer!
The warrior empire raised in Europe's siege
This month came thundering down—a ruin and despair:—‡
Why farther yet the hateful theme pursue?
These men are memories, and their power's no more;
Thousands rush by in shadowy review
Who led the strife, or all its fury bore,
Proving, with those, this holy maxim true—
Perdition waits each cause imbrued in human gore:
Yet war—the barbarous heritage,
The winter of the wide world's story,
The lava roaring through each Age,
Grave madmen recognise as glory!—
Hence, Wisdom, on thy pilgrimage!
Earth and her countless fools grow hoary.

* The title of "The Army of God and Holy Church" was given to the armed barons and ecclesiastics who demanded Magna Charta. This was in accordance with the spirit of the Crusades—that purely ecclesiastical war. During the two hundred years of its continuance, the very essences of Christianity—love, peace, and mercy—were openly denounced, and in their stead, hatred, massacre, and spoliation were advocated in the pulpit and sanctified at the altar. Debtors' liabilities were cancelled—murderers were forgiven—and heaven was assured to all to do slaughter on the Saracen. The loss of life ensuing from these atrocities is incalculable: at the siege of Acre alone, three hundred thousand men were destroyed; besides five hundred barons, forty earls, six archbishops, and twelve bishops; with priests, friars, and camp-followers innumerable.

† The old coronation seat of Scotland is a large square stone, the identical one—as its legend represents—on which Jacob rested his head when he dreamed of the heavenly ladder. It is now fixed beneath the seat of the coronation chair in Westminster Abbey.

SURFACEISM; OR, THE MANŒUVRES OF THE WORLD AND ITS WIFE.

BY MRS. GORE.

PART II.

Sixty years since, what is termed the season began and ended two months earlier than in our own time; but one of the distinctions between the King's party and the Prince's, consisted in the fact, that the adherents of the latter remained in town till the Prince's birth-day, the 12th of August; while the votaries of Windsor Castle disappeared from London on the King's birth-day, the 4th of June.

Lady Taunton, accordingly, was among the latest to rejoin the beau-monde; nor was it till the end of April that the fashionable journals began to teem with paragraphs in honour of the new beauty, Lady Harriet Bertie; who, even in a coterie, far from propitious to girlish triumphs, commanded universal homage. Lady Harriet was said to be the prettiest, sprightliest, and most taking little fairy that had ever entered the lists of coquetry; and her bon-mots were cited, and conquests enumerated, almost as soon as she had danced her first minuet at Devonshire House. A few rhapsodical words uttered by the Prince in her honour, had served to place her at the height of the fashion.

So charming an accession to the circle at Taunton House naturally rendered imperceptible the absence of a man like Sidney Hammond; and deeply would he have been mortified, could he have surmised how very few were at the trouble of inquiring what was become of him. Of the few who did remark his absence, the greater number guessed the exact truth;—that he had been tacitly dismissed, as a sacrifice to propriety on the part of Lady Taunton on the debût of her daughter,—to whose advantageous settlement such an appendage to the family was scarcely likely to conduce. A few persons who had not tact to conjecture this, and keep the conjecture to themselves, on inquiring "what had become of that agreeable Mr. Hammond they used to meet at Taunton House?"—were informed by the Countess, that "poor Sidney" being "hard up," and forced to marry for money, was paying his addresses to some city heiress.

Such was the result of his efforts to defy the superciliousness of Lady Taunton; for there is no possibility of retaliation on the part of the little who throw themselves out of their sphere, so as to incur the contumely of the great. Their utmost attempts to repique those by whose insolence they have been piqued, only expose them to further impertinence; and Sidney Hammond, among all his mistakes, was never more mistaken, than in supposing that his devotions to another would awaken the sensibility of the hard-hearted high-priestess of fashion.

Meanwhile, his influence in Harley Street was increased and increasing. When he made his appearance, he was welcomed with a silent blush, more eloquent than words; and, at the close of a few weeks' intimacy, almost to his surprise, was invited by old Hardingston, "to look in sometimes of a morning, and practise duets with Louisa,"—a distinction which, he was well aware, was conceded to no other young man. It is true, that when he profited by this unexpected permission, Louisa had been careful to surround herself with two or three of her young female friends, on pretence of getting up some choruses from Paesiello's new opera. But she might have spared herself these precautions against a tête-à-tête. Her own feminine reserve was a sufficient panoply against all freedom of address; "just as (according to the remark of an old English writer) the Muses, in a state of nudity, have a decent and imposing deportment, while Venus, though charged with draperies, retains the air of the goddess of voluptuousness." Even when exposed by her father to the impassioned declarations of her admirer, Miss Hardingston, by the influence of her manners, contrived to delay the declaration of his attachment.

But why should Louisa Hardingston, to whom Sidney Hammond's attentions were so acceptable, desire to delay the declaration of his attachment? Was the girl, so simple-hearted and so chaste of thought, becoming susceptible of the coquetries acquired by Lady Harriet Bertie in the meretricious atmosphere of Taunton House?

Alas! poor Louisa had far deeper, and more painful motives for her conduct! Already, the heart of that gentle girl had been tortured by a first lesson in the science of worldliness. Though seemingly surrounded by the prosperities, and cheered by the dearest affections of life, there could not exist a more unhappy creature! The fanciful vexations arising from disappointments in the nature of her father's society, as compared with her more sanguine anticipations, were wholly merged in griefs of a more serious nature.

It was about a month after the introduction of Sidney Hammond to her father's house, that one night, on returning from a ball, during the greater portion of which her admirer had remained stationary by her side, Mr. Hardingston abruptly acquainted her with the permission he had volunteered to his young friend, to become a morning visiter at the house.

"I am sorry to hear it, dear papa," was Louisa's mild reply; presuming, for the first time, to differ in opinion from her father.

"And why sorry?" retorted Mr. Hardingston. "I trusted, Louisa, that you had too much sense to affect the hypocritical prudery of your sex. You certainly appeared quite as well pleased to-night to retain him all the evening by your side, as he did to remain there."

"I was pleased. In the midst of a party of two hundred people, he could not be more with me, or nearer to me than I desired. But considering that I have no chaperon,—considering the remarks that might, perhaps, be made on Mr. Hammond's visits here during your absence—"

"What the devil signify the remarks of the world, since you are to be man and wife?" cried Mr. Hardingston.

"But is it so sure that we are to be man and wife?" rejoined his daughter. "Mr. Hammond has never hazarded even a hint of proposals."

"Simply for want of an opportunity. How is he to hazard such a hint, unless you meet elsewhere than in parties of two hundred people? It is for this express purpose I have invited him here."

"My dear father," remonstrated Louisa, inexpressibly surprised.

"It is for this express purpose, I say, I have invited him here," reiterated Mr. Hardingston, almost angrily. "It is probably my presence that embarrasses him. When he sees you here in the morning, alone and at his ease, his feelings will influence him to make the proposals I see hovering on his lips."

"I would much rather hear them without any previous effort on our part to bring him to an explanation," replied Louisa, with dignity. "I certainly hope, nay believe, that Mr. Hammond likes me. But there may be a thousand reasons, a thousand obstacles, which deter him from offering me his hand."

"I hope not, Louisa."

"I have sometimes fancied him even pointedly careful to avoid committing himself by anything amounting to a declaration of attachment," added Miss Hardingston.

"Then you must be pointedly active in making him overcome his hesitation!" cried her father with impetuosity.

"I fear I cannot promise that, papa. Should he propose to me, I freely acknowledge that I should cheerfully accept Mr. Hammond for a husband. But I will never take the smallest step, or breathe the slightest word, with the view of hastening his advances."

"But I tell you, you must!" was the vehement rejoinder of Mr. Hardingston. "You must, and shall." Louisa was silent. She was not accustomed to be addressed by her father in so peremptory a tone; and for a moment, almost fancied him excited by wine.

"I repeat to you, Louisa," persisted he, "that unless you can surprise this man into offering you his hand, you are lost!"

"Surprise him?—Lost?"—faintly repeated poor Louisa, in increasing terror.

"It is time we came to a serious explanation," said Mr. Hardingston, after opening the drawing-room door to ascertain that no officious waiting-woman was loitering without.—"It is time we understood each other. You fancy yourself a great personage, Louisa—you fancy yourself rich and independent; and affect delicacies of sentiment and refinements of taste, well-suited perhaps to the possession of wealth and independence,—but in your case, wholly out of place. I am a ruined man, Louisa Hardingston. For this year past, it has been a difficult, almost an impossible effort to me to keep up the decent appearances of life. It is for your sake, chiefly, I have made the endeavour. To find myself reduced to beggary at the very moment of my daughter's introduction into life, was a trial beyond my courage. Let me only see you settled in life, in the sphere to which I so long considered you entitled, and, for my share, I am content to fall."

"My dear, dear father!"—exclaimed Louisa, on whom the intelligence thus abruptly conveyed produced so startling an effect, that for some moments she was incapable of utterance,—"if indeed this terrible announcement be not an ordeal you have devised to try my strength of mind,—if indeed you are a ruined man,—for the sake of heaven,—for all our sakes,—let us resign ourselves to the worst, and meet our destiny with fortitude. The efforts to which you allude, can only serve to aggravate the evil. If we must be poor, let us be poor with courage. Above all, let us not incur the disgrace, the crime of endeavouring to inveigle others into sharing our reverses."

"It was just this sort of girlish romance I expected from you, Louisa! The apprehension of such Quixotism has hitherto determined me to conceal from you the state of my affairs. Thank heaven I know somewhat too much of the world to listen to your absurd arguments. Be assured, that though the daughter of Mr. Hardingston the rich merchant, is surrounded by admirers,—the daughter of Hardingston the beggar would be left friendless and unnoticed. As to any hope of your marriage under such circumstances—"

"If Mr. Hammond really entertains for me the affection you suppose," interrupted his daughter, with spirit, "our change of fortune would have little influence over his feelings. If not, heaven forbid I should owe his attentions to deception. I entreat, dear papa, whatever course you may hold towards others and the world, do not, do not mislead the man whom you wish to call your son!"

A harsh laugh accompanied the ironical reply of Mr. Hardingston, to whom the critical situation of his affairs had been too long familiar to produce on his mind the exciting effect the exposure exercised over that of his daughter.

"You must have a better opinion of Hammond than I have of him, or any other human being," said he, "if you suppose him capable of fidelity to the daughter of a bankrupt. Do not shake your head, my dear Louisa,—I have tried the strength of worldly friendships! On the first derangement of my affairs, produced by the mercantile crisis which disorganized the whole commercial world two years ago, I had recourse to what are termed 'my friends,' many of whom had been made so by benefits conferred, all of whom had invariably pretended the greatest zeal for my service;—yet not one of them came forward! They had advice to offer, but no assistance. Fortunately, my prospects brightened; and I took care to announce them as far brighter than they really were, in order to prolong, to the last possible moment, my chances of redemption. Even when I discovered that all was lost, and could calculate to a year—a month—a week—the moment when the wreck of my fortunes must be apparent to the whole world, I kept a firm face,—determined that, in the interval, no renewal of weakness should betray my position till I had secured a happy marriage for my only daughter."

"Your first thought, then, in your misfortunes, was to separate me from you for ever?" exclaimed Louisa. "Dearest father! it is now only that, for the first time, I begin to entertain hopes of being of use and comfort to you. So far from desiring to accelerate an explanation with Sidney,—so far from desiring to become his wife,—all I wish is to remain with you,—to sustain you in your reverses, and solace your declining years!"

"Romance, romance! mere folly and absurdity!" cried Mr. Hardingston, impatiently. "This sort of thing sounds plausibly on the stage, and reads well in a novel; but, in point of plain matter-of-fact, can you not see, Louisa, that—as a ruined man, without an establishment, without a home—a daughter would be a painful encumbrance, increasing my discomfort? No, no! child! you must marry! I had, I own, begun to entertain misgivings concerning the possibility of such a blessing. For the rash appeal to my friends has never been forgotten; and the more cautious of them survey, with mistrustful eyes, the evidences of my renewed prosperity. When, therefore, Hammond made his admiration manifest, I did my utmost to encourage his addresses. He has lived too completely out of our mercantile circles to have the slightest suspicion; and, having once made his declaration in form, it will be too late for him to retract, on learning that you have only the five thousand pounds secured to you by your mother's settlement; nay, with his fortune and prospects, perhaps I wrong him by the mere supposition of any such reluctance."

"But, since I have five thousand pounds secured to me, papa," observed Louisa, (whom this portion of his communication rendered indifferent to the rest,) "surely it will afford us both the means of subsistence? Even in the event of the realization of your worst expectations, might we not live together in some obscure retreat,—more happily, more honestly, than we are doing now,—imposing on our creditors and the world?"

These rash words produced only an explosion of wrath on the part of Mr. Hardingston.

"I ask you for no advice,—no lessons,—no support,—no assistance!" cried he. "All I require of you, and I do require it,—is the implicit obedience becoming a daughter. My plans are decided,—my principles are fixed. Frustrate them by unbecoming interference, and from the depths of my ruin, Louisa, shall I curse you as having brought disgrace upon my house!—At present, all hope is not utterly lost. I may retrieve myself. If I get over the next three months, I have payments due to me from India, that may carry me on safely,—nay triumphantly.—But were I, at this moment, to alienate the confidence of my commercial brethren by the slightest indication of change in my establishment, or wavering in my purposes, I would not give a month's purchase for the stability of my house!—How would it suit you, pray, Louisa Hardingston, to hear your father taxed with insolvency!—How would it suit you to see his name in the Gazette?"

Choking sobs impeded the articulation of the broken-hearted girl, when she vainly attempted to utter the reply insisted on by her father.

"Remember, then," resumed he, perceiving her inability to remonstrate, "that the slightest imprudence on your part, may accelerate this cruel catastrophe. If you, my inmate, my daily companion, have remained till this day unconscious and unsuspicious of the hollowness of the superficial prosperity around you—admit that indifferent people are scarcely likely to be more discerning.—I am still rich, Louisa, for I am rich in the confidence of the rich.—So far from supposing me on the verge of bankruptcy, the people with whom we associate regard you almost as an heiress; and unless you act up to your part—"

"I cannot, father—for all that you may promise or threaten, I cannot!"—cried Louisa Hardingston, recovering, in her disgust at the vile duty imposed upon her, her powers of thought and action.—"I feel that I have not courage to meet so hateful a responsibility!"

"Find it, then, to bear the malediction of the father who has sacrificed so much for your sake!" cried Hardingston, quitting the room, and slamming the door with violence in her face. And the poor gentle girl was left alone with her despair.

For despair it was!—She felt that she had lost her father. It was impossible for her to regard with the same affectionate deference as before, the parent who boasted of a system of deception, and would willingly have imposed the same duplicity upon herself. Louisa had lost the father whom, a few hours before she loved with filial reverence; and was threatened with the loss of the only human being for whom she believed herself capable of a still stronger attachment!—All was over for her!—She must either obey her father, and, to avert the fiat of his ruin, submit to a line of habitual dissembling, and forfeit for ever her self-esteem; or, by steadfastness in her principles, condemn to instant penury the man who, as he had justly said, whatever might be his misfortunes, had never suffered the winds of heaven to visit her cheek too roughly; and as Hardingston assured her, disunite herself for ever from him who had become, only too essential to her happiness!

Still, in this first combat of virtue in an uncorrupted mind, the good prevailed. At the close of the mental conflict, Louisa resolved to limit her personal expenses to the requirements of their fallen fortunes; and while retaining in public the habits exacted by the interests of the wary speculator, assume towards Sidney Hammond so cold a deportment, as must necessarily deter him from a proposal, till after the period fixed by her father as the criterion of their destinies.

"Should our prospects improve," argued Louisa with herself, "there will need but little kindness and encouragement to bring him back to his present feelings. Should our ruin be completed, the sequel will show whether his attachment be real, or my father's cruel surmises justly founded."

But Louisa had yet another ordeal to undergo. The excitement produced by his terrible explanations, seriously affected the health of Mr. Hardingston. Indications of a paralytic attack became apparent that very night. Bleeding was ordered, —quiet prescribed,—and it was in one of his intervals of troubled sleep, that he extorted from the sorrowing daughter, who was watching by his bedside, a promise of implicit submission to his exactions.

On his restoration, therefore, Louisa found herself, with reluctant feelings, resuming her prodigal habits of life. New invitations were issued for future dinner-parties,—costly dresses ordered for her by her father,—and, amid the show of opulence, which she now loathed, as concealing the elements of ruin and disgrace, Sidney Hammond was more warmly welcomed than ever to the house of feasting.

Meanwhile, the abruptness by which the coquetish intrigante of Taunton House had suddenly turned upon him, had so far shaken the confidence of "poor Sidney" in his own attractions, and the consistency of the sex, that he watched every turn and variation in the countenance of the new object of his speculations, with considerable uneasiness. A clouded brow, a careless word, a listless ear, seriously affected him; and on perceiving the change produced in the manner of Louisa Hardingston by her father's illness, the shrewd politician decided that, aware of his precarious condition, and on the eve of coming into the enjoyment of his fine fortune, the heiress was becoming ambitious of a higher match.

"She thinks—and she is doubtless right—that she might do better for herself!" said he. "She is becoming more cautious,—more reserved. But that the old gentleman, alarmed by his attack, is evidently anxious to see his daughter settled in life, previous to his death, I should be apprehensive that this girl, timid and artless as she seems, was temporizing with me. Luckily, her father is a plain-sailing practical man; and, aware of the miserable lot usually attending heiresses, (whose fortune is pretty sure to be squandered by some heartless roué,) is satisfied to see her become the wife of a poor gentleman, steady enough, and sensible enough, to be a safe guardian of her property. With his fortune, Hardingston is wise enough to care little for opulence in his son-in-law. Propose when I may, I am pretty sure of the father's consent."

It was the daughter who puzzled him. It was the daughter by whom he found his manœuvres disconcerted. Though, at times, he had felt sure of Louisa's preference, (enlightened by those tremours of voice, and variations of complexion, which even the most prudent of womankind is incompetent to control,) still, her reserve,—her more than womanly dignity,—her open differences from him in opinion,—her pointed acceptance of the attentions of others,—convinced him that she was either the coldest or most capricious of her sex. Thwarted and vexed, his partiality, as in the instance of Lady Taunton, increased in proportion to the waywardness of its object; and never had Sidney Hammond run greater risk of finding his pretended passion converted into a real one, than when he saw Miss Hardingston surrounded by admirers, of each of whom the homage seemed more acceptable than his own.

After evenings spent in such demonstrations, and the struggle of feeling arising from her dissimulation, how sore was the heart of poor Lousia! How painfully did she watch the influence of her conduct on the heart of the man she loved!—How touching, through her rising tears, were the furtive glances she fixed upon the countenance of one far too well-schooled in the doctrines of Surfaceism, to betray any evidence of his feelings in his well-bred callous face!

It was a desperate game they were playing;—each intent upon discovering the real sentiments of the other, which both were intent on concealing;—the one, from the purest, the other from the vilest motives.—At those balls and parties, from which indifferent persons went away observing, —"How pretty the heiress looked to-night,—and how beautifully she was dressed!—The flirtation between her and Sidney Hammond seems to be cooling!"—or, "Hammond has hooked Miss Hardingston!—more attentive to her to-night than ever! —They sat together an hour in the boudoir, looking over the Annuals!"—poor Louisa experienced all the fluctuations of feeling endured by a rash gambler, the whole of whose earthly fortune is staked on the table before him. For her conduct was influenced by the presence of her father, whose eyes, from some corner or other, were, she knew, fixed upon her proceedings; while that of Hammond, which she supposed to depend upon her smiles as surely as the ebbing or flowing of the tide on the shining of the moon,—was in fact wholly and solely controlled by the parliamentary divisions of the night before, as rendering more or less urgent his re-introduction into political life, by his restoration, as a married man, to the favour and patronage of Taunton House.

The truest and most susceptible lover never exhibited stronger ebullitions of feeling, than were often displayed by Hammond on returning at night to his chambers; and bitter was his constant outcry against the cruel coquetry of the sex. Harassed beyond his patience,—for above all things he dreaded the ignomy of refusal,—he was literally growing pale and thin under the influence of his perplexities;—and this piteous alteration in his appearance was not lost upon Louisa.—Already she trembled, when about to attempt against him those manœuvres so nobly intended to moderate his attachment or at least procrastinate his avowals. Her reluctance was as that of a mother when inflicting punishment on an idolized child; and tears were ever in her eyes, and anguish in her heart, whenever, in pursuance of her generous projects, she endured with apparent satisfaction the assiduities of another.

At length the impatience of her father grew almost as great as that of Sidney Hammond.

"This will never do, Louisa," cried he, as they were driving home one night from the opera. "Do you suppose this sort of shilly-shally is to last for ever?—Do you imagine that I can afford to pay ten guineas for our opera-box, for you to play the fool in? Will nothing subdue the heartless vanity of your sex? Your encouragement of that jack-anapes, Mr. Henry Lissadel to-night, drove poor Hammond almost distracted. As I followed you both through the crush-room, after you had given your arm to Lissadel, I saw that poor Sidney was pale as death. It would not surprise me if he did not keep his appointment to-morrow to meet us at the Zoological! What do you mean by this? What do you expect from it? What can be the result of a flirtation with a spendthrift like Lissadel, who is looking out only for fortune in a wife? Must I repeat all I said to you a month ago, concerning the disastrous position of my affairs,—concerning the necessity, the absolute necessity, for your marriage with Hammond?"

"No, no—for heaven's sake, no!" exclaimed Louisa, dreading above all things a recapitulation of sentiments which had already so cruelly shaken her confidence in the integrity of her father. "I am to blame. I have suffered myself to be misled by the vain impulse of the moment. I will amend my fault!—Spare me to-night, dear Papa, and I will—I will——" A burst of tears prevented the conclusion of her promises!

"You are well aware," said Mr. Hardingston, unmoved by distress, which he attributed to just repentance, "that it is in your power to make this man propose to you when and where you will. A word, a smile, of encouragement from you, and the offer of his hand is instantaneous. I give you, therefore, only a few days, Louisa!—At the expiration of that time, unless I find your destiny decided, I swear I will throw up the game. I will oppose no further obstacle to the progress of my misfortunes. The world shall know the worst—and its knowledge will make the worst irretrievable! You may then, child, rejoice in my ruin, for it will be your work. You may say to yourself for the remainder of your days—'To gratify my frivolous coquetry, I sacrificed the life of my father!'—Ay!—the life; for so surely as I sit beside you, Louisa, I will not survive my disgrace!"

The following day, when Sidney Hammond assisted Miss Hardingston to step out of her father's handsome carriage at the gate of the Zoological Gardens, he had the gratification of finding that, instead of accepting the arm of Sir Henry Lissadel, (which was officiously interposed to make the round of the gardens,) she turned blushing towards himself, and almost sought the offer of his own.

Can it be doubted that Louisa's was fervently pressed to his heart, at so decided a mark of preference? Half an hour afterwards, the grating before the den of the giraffes, which has lent itself to the furtherance of so many flirtations, was fated to hear one of the most impassioned declarations of attachment that ever expanded from the lips of man, or drew tears from the eyes of a feeling and grateful woman!

Even uneasy as she was concerning the false show of prosperity surrounding her, and the precarious state of her father's fortunes, poor Louisa was a happy girl that night. How was she to doubt the sincerity of protestations so warmly and urgently expressed? How was she to imagine that a man in the station of a gentleman—a man of refined education and unblemished honour—had made her the stake of a coldly-calculated game? While listening to Sidney Hammond's declarations of boundless love and changeless fidelity, she was happy with all the happiness of a true and loving heart.

Instead, however, of being touched by her confiding tenderness, he almost regretted to find her so easy a dupe; contemplating, with no little anxiety, the injury that might arise to his interests from such ready credulity; for though it suited admirably with his plans, that Miss Hardingston should be easily imposed on, it was essential that Mrs. Sidney Hammond should be clearer sighted. Time enough hereafter, however, to sow the seeds of Surfaceism in her heart. Time enough to imbue the timid, but frank Louisa, with the shrewdness and duplicity essential in the wife of so accomplished a man of the world.

Having ascertained at what hour the following day Mr. Hardingston would be at liberty to receive him, he hastened to comply with her request, that he would look for the carriage, (her emotions being of so genuine a nature as to make her wish to be at home;) and, after assisting her in cloaking, profited by the occasion of placing her in the carriage, to press her hand and arm with all the semblance of the fondest passion. Then having bade a hearty good night to his intended father-in-law, he hurried from the house, little daunted by the prospect of the morrow's explanations. Mr. Hardingston, he was persuaded, was too attached a father to this only daughter, to resent having over-estimated the fortune of the man to whom her whole heart was given; and, as he intended to propose settling his eight thousand pounds upon Louisa, as well as the full amount of the fortune assigned her by her father—be it what it might—nothing could be easier than to deceive Mr. Hardingston as to the amount of his income,—which, as arising from professional sources, it would be impossible exactly to specify. After all, a few thousands more or less mattered little to this wealthy merchant, whose chief object in life must be to secure the happiness of his fireside.

Thus confident in his own plausibility, Sidney Hammond gave himself up to the enjoyment of the fruition of his schemes. No one could have surveyed him at that moment, without noticing the exultation that sparkled in his eyes, and glowed in his usually colourless cheeks. His step was light, but firm—his voice melodious with inward joy. In the excitement of his success, "poor Sidney" was more than himself.

Had one single genuine impulse of affection prompted the outpourings which had so captivated the ear of poor Louisa, like herself, he would have been eager for solitude and self-communion: like her, he would have wished to be alone, in order to think over every look, word, and gesture of the object of his passion: the flutter of his soul, in the first excitement of knowing himself to be beloved, must have rendered other society insupportable. So far, however, was this from the case, that instead of proceeding to his chambers from the house where he parted from Louisa, he hastened to a brilliant ball at Altamont House, the noble owner of which (a man too distinguished to have become aware, through the vulgar gossip of society, that the Sidney Hammond presented to him as a rising young man the preceding year, was now a nobody) still honoured him with invitations. On the present occasion, however, he profited by his entrée, neither because the Duke of Altamont was so distinguished a man, nor his fêtes so brilliant, but because, in the consciousness of forthcoming triumph, he wanted to look upon Lady Taunton face to face. He longed to luxuriate in the feeling, while returning with a formal salutation her patronizing bow, that his hour of independence was at hand,—that he should soon meet her on ground whereon he might dictate terms of pacification.

Never had the difference between the humdrum society of Marylebone, and that aristocratic world to which he so burned to attach himself, struck him with such force, as on the present occasion. Never had the blaze, the splendour, the grace, the ease of that high caste which moves through life,—as Cleopatra on the Cydnus, to the sound of flutes and hautboys, in an atmosphere of perfumes, with sails of purple and gold,—appeared one-half so intoxicating. The lightness of its conversation—its gay and joyous superficiality—enchanted his very heart and soul, as being, both physically and morally, the Triumph of Surfaceism. For the jog-trot class of people to whom he had been recently paying his court, he had neither taste nor patience, unless as the leaden weight of the pulley by which he was to be elevated into importance.

The moment he entered the brilliantly-illuminated vestibule of Altamont House, blazing with light, and glowing with forced flowers of the richest fragrance, while joyous music pealed from a distant ball-room, (how different from the scanty orchestras of the Marylebone fêtes!) he felt himself an altered being. His spirits revived, and his wicked wit of aforetime came back upon him as with the possession of a devil.

On entering the ball-room, the first object that met his eye was the lovely daughter of the Countess of Taunton,—flying through a valse with the heir-apparent of one of the wealthiest Dukes in the kingdom,—dressed, and dancing to perfection, and embellished by the delicate bloom that exertion assigns to complexions of peculiar fairness. Impossible to look prettier, more graceful, or more attractive than Lady Harriet at that moment. The little affectations assumed by the spoiled beauty, to secure her conquest, appeared natural to her mignon features and fanciful dress, like the affectations of one of Watteau's pictures; and Sidney Hammond stood and gazed upon her, entranced, with precisely the sort of admiration he would have bestowed on some bright and costly trinket in the show of a jeweller.

The somewhat too marked attitude of attention in which he stood arrested in the doorway of the ball-room, did not escape the notice of the watchful Countess. A few minutes after the close of the valse, the charming danseuse was led to a quadrille by another of the great matches of the day; to whom she dedicated precisely the same smiles, glances, and bon-mots she had just lavished on the young Marquis; and still, Sidney Hammond remained riveted to the spot,—comparing her, in his mind's eye, with the milder, and more feminine, but cold, dull, and heavy beauties of the Hardingston coterie,—and secretly trembling at the prospect of introducing his Louisa into contrast with the easy audacity of the Taunton set: not lest she should derive contamination from the contact, but lest they should disparage his choice as unfashionable and obscure!

While gazing, apparently enraptured, upon the Dresden-shepherdess-looking figure before him, Lady Taunton, who was watching him, fancied she could detect answering glances of admiration exchanged between her daughter and the nameless exile from her good graces; and her suspicions thus awakened, (needlessly enough—for the young beauty was thoroughly engrossed by the platitudes of her noble partner,) she began to imagine that she was perhaps the dupe of these two persons whose movements she fancied herself to be controlling with despotic power. Perhaps they were laughing at her,—perhaps deriding her fruitless attempts to keep them asunder!

In the irritation of the moment she rose from her seat, and directed her steps across the room, to the very spot where Sidney Hammond was standing,—the diamond ornaments scattered over her dress glittering the more from the unusual vivacity of her movements,—and, in defiance of her habitual caution, indifferent, apparently, to the probability of being overheard, she hastily accused him, not only of breach of compact, but insinuated that his good understanding with her daughter was of older date than he cared to avow.

What an enhancement to the long-premeditated triumph of Sidney Hammond! With a graceful deference of manner, derived in a great measure from her ladyship's especial schooling, he replied, that he trusted shortly to afford her an incontestable proof of the error into which she had fallen, by asking permission to present to her his wife, whose charms, though immeasurably inferior to those of Lady Harriet Bertie, were such as to bear him blameless against all possible accusations of attachment, or even undue admiration elsewhere.

For once, the woman of the world stood confounded. Though usually steadfast of countenance, as Talleyrand himself, "poor Sidney" had the gratification of observing, even through her rouge, how her colour went and came, in the vexation of having made herself ridiculous, whether by jealousy of her daughter, or susceptibility on her daughter's account. She recovered herself, however, with the readiness of her vocation, and was prepared, in an instant, to cover all consciousness of defeat, by expressions of warm satisfaction at the advantageous settlement in life of an acquaintance she had so long valued.

In reply to Lady Taunton's inquiry, whether

"she had already the pleasure of the lady's acquaintance," great was the satisfaction of the expectant bridegroom, in replying, with an air of affected deprecation, that he "feared she moved in too obscure a circle of society, to have attracted the attention of Lady Taunton; being the only daughter of Mr. Hardingston, Member for the Tower Hamlets, and better known in Lombard Street, than among the coteries of the beau-monde!" "Poor Sidney" was overjoyed to make it apparent, that he was nothing indebted, for the wealthy connexion he was about to form, to the influence of the Taunton set.

But this was enough for the Countess. The match was just what she could have desired: securing independence to her former protégé, but leaving all the superiority of position on her side. Instead of having to feel that the man she had discarded had now the best of it, she was able to intimate her gracious intentions to notice the object of his choice; nor was she slow in seizing the golden opportunity to prove the absence of all pique on her part, by the courtesy of her intimations concerning the future Mrs. Hammond.

His utmost hopes were thus accomplished; and the two intimate friends (supposed by the world to exceed, in their mutual regard, the bounds of friendship) parted with the delightful conviction of having humiliated and inflicted pain on each other: such being the worthy results of worldly connexions.

With a very light heart, accordingly, did the accepted lover proceed to Harley Street, the following day, at one; Mr. Hardingston having promised to absent himself from the city, in order to receive the momentous visit; and even had Hammond approached the door of the mansion he already foresaw in perspective as his own, with nervous feelings, they must have been reassured at once by the affectionate manner in which he was welcomed by his future father-in-law, a more experienced knave (we beg pardon—disciple of Surfaceism) than himself.

The negotiation opened between the par nobile fratrum was of the same diplomatic nature as the preliminaries of a treaty between the plenipos of two minor states of the empire, each contriving to throw dust in the eyes of the other. Mr. Hardingston was intent upon bestowing his portionless daughter on a man of fortune, with a trifling dowry, on pretext that the nature of his business prevented his giving money down during his lifetime, the better to ensure a noble fortune at his decease. "Poor Sidney" was equally desirous of apologizing for his deficiency of available funds, by referring to professional gains more than problematical. Both were bent upon deception. It was a realisation of the fable of the file and the viper: the city man being the deep old file, on which the man of the world found his fangs, for once, ineffectual.

Profound as was the amazement of both parties on finding the pleasant verdant declivity, down which they had been gliding, terminate abruptly in a frightful abyss, each was cautious to betray no alarm at the prospect of the precipice. Each persisted in protestations of disinterestedness. Mr. Hardingston declaring, that merit was all he sought in his son-in-law; Sidney Hammond, that there needed for his happiness only the hand of his Louisa: each having instantly determined that the odium of a rupture of the negotiations should rest with his lawyer.

Meanwhile, the victim of these two worldly men,—the poor, open-hearted girl, whose affections had been engaged on such false pretences,—was again exposed to professions of tenderness that rendered her gentle heart only too happy. Alas! how little did she imagine that she was listening to them for the last time! Unversed in the tactics of the Taunton set, unversed in any tactics save those arising from the suggestion of the best feelings of her sex, poor Louisa did not perceive that the part of excellent dissembling assumed towards her was less excellently played than usual; —that, already, the approaching catastrophe had its influence, and the indignant lover,—the biter bit, — scarcely patience to maintain his show of attachment towards a girl of whose fondest affections he had possessed himself, little supposing her to have a pitiful fortune of five thousand pounds.

After quitting the house,—and quitting it with all the outward demonstrations of love becoming the occasion,—Sidney Hammond could scarcely restrain the outburst of his rage. Never had he been so completely "poor Sidney" as at that moment! Duped,—deceived,—taken in his own toils! —How was it possible to sustain the shock of such an overthrow!

Not that, at present, he entertained the smallest surmise of the real state of the case. He felt convinced that Mr. Hardingston was either prevented by avarice from doing justice to his only daughter; or that, having discovered the state of his finances, he was in hopes, by the penuriousness of his proceedings, to break off the connexion. In either case, his views were equally frustrated. In either case, it was out of the question to make one of the loveliest and most amiable girls in England, a stepping-stone to his fortunes.

CATULLUS. ODE LXVIII. (TO MANLIUS.)

As on the mountain-top a rill
  Leaps smiling from its rocky source;
Then winding down the steep at will,
  Through peopled valleys takes its course.
There its cool wave the traveller greets,
When fields are parched with Summer heats:

As to the seaman, ocean-tost,
  Comes the soft gale and favouring sea,
When of his gods he asked them most,—
  Such, Manlius, was thy help to me!

L. J.

HANGING, PAST AND PRESENT.

THERE is a first floor to let, on reasonable terms, in the house of a potato and oatmeal merchant, in front of the principal entrance of Newgate, in the city of Dublin.

It is an airy apartment, and commands a near view of a massive iron balcony, over which two strong but hollow beams, of the same metal, project from the heavy cut-stone masonry of the prison. These beams terminate, towards the street, in a pair of grinning iron skulls, through which the ropes of the executioner were wont to run, over pullies that flickered, like the tongues of mocking fiends, within the teeth.

The name of the modern Tubal-Cain, by whom this artistical piece of mechanism was put together, has not come down to posterity. Doctor Whitelaw, in his History of Dublin, strangely omits all mention of him, and of his work; which was, nevertheless, hammered on a poetical anvil, and deserves to be recorded and preserved, in perpetuam rei memoriam, as a monument of the old criminal law.

The person who desires to dispose of the vacant tenement opposite, is an old bachelor-looking gentleman, and dresses in a blue coat, buttoned up to the chin, with bright gilt buttons. He wears a white cravat, very yellow chamois leather gloves, carries an umbrella in all weathers, and never appears, by any chance, in a top-coat. He is an Irish philanthropist, with a great taste for the tragedy of real life, which has led him to witness every execution at Newgate—from that of Crawley the Attorney, who robbed a priest in Peter's Row, and beat out the housekeeper's brains with a cobbler's hammer, to that of the Sawyers, who suffered about the memorable year eighteen hundred and thirty-one, for murdering a master of their trade, in the street, with (pace TEMPORUM dicatur!)—"bats and bludgeons."

He rented these lodgings for the sole purpose of indulging his appetite for such edifying spectacles; having secured them to his own use, by lease, for the term of his natural life, at more than the present annual value of half the street, and never entered them, except to give a breakfast to the sub-sheriff, with a few select friends, on mornings marked in his calendar with the white stone of a "public example."

The blackguards of the city knew this old fellow and his peculiar taste so well, that whenever he was seen to cross Essex Bridge, from the south side of the Liffey, where he lived, and to bend his steps along Capel Street, a concourse was made towards the Eggmarket, in the assured certainty of an execution toward. "Hark to the ould dancing-master!" was the cry of the whole pack; not that he was, by profession, a trainer of "the light fantastic toe;" he is, on the contrary, a man well connected, and possessed of independent means. But his passion for beholding every performance of the grand saut obtained for him this honorary designation. If there were a college of rope-dancers, the genius of Hibernian satire would doubtless have long since placed him, per saltum, amongst its highest graduates.

His favourite window is still there, with a list, chronologically arranged, of all the sufferers whom he has seen make their exit through the opposite portal, and the number of minutes and seconds, ascertained by the stop-watch, which they severally took to die, pencilled behind the shutter. The drop, too, still faces it, with its heavy iron grate flapping and creaking dolefully in the wind.

But the "ould dancing-master" never comes to Green Street now. It moves his feelings too much, to see the use to which that time-honoured balcony is turned, not to speak it, profaned. For it may sometimes be seen, at summer eve, with the trap raised, (which never was raised of old, unless to give way speedily under the feet of a devoted victim,) and its floor converted into a kind of terrace for supporting flowers and boxes of mignionette. A bold swallow feathers her brood within the mouth of the counterfeit death's-head above; and at the open door, through which the almost monthly train of death itself used to pass, the gaoler's pretty daughter sits at her work, carolling a merry song, or listening to her piping blackbird, which, from its wicker cage, makes the echoes of the lonesome old street ring again with joyous melody.

The drop thus occupied is, to my thinking, a far better admonition, to teach men justice and respect for its sacred source, than it was on that day, when Crawley stood aghast, before the hooting populace, and gave a name to Hessian boots, which the fashion of them could not long survive. *

But the old gentleman, who is now so anxious to part with his good-will of the window over the way, is of a directly opposite way of thinking. His imagination reverts fondly to the bright and sunny forenoon, when Bridget Butterly tottered across that fatal threshold, robed in what it would have been a comfort to her to consider her grave-clothes, and wearing a cap profusely pranked with death-knots of white ribbon.

There was a fearful and pitiable circumstance connected with that girl's case, which being well authenticated, (at least in the main facts,) I may be here pardoned for relating. She was a servant; and at the instigation of, and aided by, an elderly female, who was occasionally employed about the house, as charwoman, had murdered her mistress, a frail and beautiful young woman. The deed was executed at noon-day; and the kind keeper of the lady—who was a military hero—on his return to his quiet cottage, near the Royal Canal, found her

* An historical fact. Crawley made his last appearance before the public, in a highly polished pair of those integuments; and the grand moral effect of his punishment has been, that Hessian Boots—as often as any superannuated dandy shows so much of the Calf as to sport them in the streets—are to this day, cried down by the popular voice, as Crawleys. "See the Crawleys.—Shilloo for the man with the Crawleys!" body on the kitchen floor, dreadfully mangled and weltering in a pool of blood. Poor gentleman—(I wish I could remember his name.) He was shocked beyond measure.

"Keen were his pangs: but keener far to feel,"

as he felt, on rushing up stairs into the parlour, that his desk had been broken open, and a matter of twenty guineas, together with a gold watch, abstracted from it. Here was the comble de misére, which made his frenzy ungovernable, insomuch that his friends had to keep watch over him for several nights successively, lest a lacerated spirit should drive him to an act of pure desperation.

The horrible affair was soon bruited about the town, and our "old dancing-master" heard it, while he sat at dinner, at the table of a friend. It was communicated by the butler, who had just heard it from the boy that brought in the beer, who had it from a penny-a-line man, who was hastening with it to The Freeman's Journal, and by whom the additional fact was stated, that the parties were in custody and had confessed their crime.

The old man was unusually excited. The city sessions were at hand, and as the law piously ordained that murderers must die within forty-eight hours of conviction, he should not suffer the agonies of hope deferred, but at once complete his catalogue of videnda by the sight, as yet strange to his experience, of a young woman expiring under the gallows. "And Andrew"—said he to the butler, "you shall see it too: that is, if you have a mind yourself, and your master don't object; for I invite you to wait upon my company, at breakfast, on the morning of the execution, which cannot be delayed beyond a fortnight; and by that means, you shall have a full view of the whole ceremonial, from a corner of one of my windows."

Andrew thanked him, and said that nothing could give him greater pleasure.

"Where is the young tigress from?—Tipperary, I'll be sworn," said the dancing-master.

"I don't know that, Sir," said Andrew; "but they say she has decent people belonging to her, and does nothing but cry about her poor father."

"God pity him!" said the master of the house.

"He hardly deserves it, Sir," said the butler. "Why did not he bring up his child in the fear of God?"

"Many a worthless sucker springs from an honest stock, Andrew," meekly replied his master.

The dancing-master's anticipations were well-founded. Within a fortnight the two criminals were brought to the scaffold, and he was

"There to see."

At an early hour of the morning, he was busy setting his room to rights, when a feeble old man, of a frightened and bewildered aspect, stood before him.

"Well, Sir, your business with me?" interrogated the dancing-master.

"You said, Sir," answered the old man, "that I might see the sight, Sir, from your window."

"I really forget, Sir, I have not the pleasure—"

"Oh, Sir, don't you remember Andrew, Mr. Wilson's butler?"

"Yes; true, true. He has sent you, I presume, in his place, to lay the breakfast."

The old man spoke not. His eyes had caught a view of two ropes, with a noose and running knot upon each, that dangled, idly and "not wanted yet," from the iron death's-heads at the opposite side of the street; and he was transfixed to the spot whereon he stood, unconscious of all around him, and trembling through his whole frame, with an agony that actually shook the room. It was poor Andrew himself—not the hale, bluff, dark-haired serving-man of fifty, that he had appeared a fortnight before, but an emaciated, decrepid, miserable old man. Thirty winters appeared in that brief interval to have gone over his head,

"Which now was white, as Apallachia's snow."

He was the father—the "poor father"—of the wretched blood-guilty young woman, whose dying throes he had been invited to witness; and he had accepted the offer—little thinking what was before him—"with pleasure!"

In less than a week after that, before the surgeons had done hacking the flesh from his daughter's bones, and passing their ribald jests over her dishonoured corpse, Andrew Butterly was flung into an unpitied grave, according to the tenor of his own harsh sentence, as being the father of such a child; done to death by the infamy of her guilt, and the shock which his parental feelings had sustained in hearing and witnessing her doom.

But that awful day, when the young murderess stood forth beside her haggard accomplice, throwing an eager and agonizing glance through the crowd, as if in quest of some person to whom her soul still clung upon earth, which person was undoubtedly the shivering old man that crouched behind the breakfast party in the first-floor window, now "to be let——" That day is chronicled in the memory of our sexagenarian gallows-fancier, as the "most interesting" point of time in the whole annals of Green Street. "How fortunate I was," he still exclaims, "to have invited Andrew to come that morning. I would not have lost that stare at the first view of the ropes, or the shudder that came over him, when Tommy Galoin (that was the hangman's name) stept out to draw them straight, and rub a little soap to the nooses;—no, I would not have lost it, to see the whole of Thistlewood's gang hanged and beheaded over again." He had, in fact, taken a journey to London expressly, in order to feast his eyes upon the last-named imposing exhibition.

The late George Dunn, gaoler—or, as modern magniloquence will have it, governor—of Kilmainham, was a blunt, kind-hearted Northumbrian, who had witnessed many affecting scenes in his time. Being required to mention the incident, connected with capital punishments, which had most affected him during his long experience, he selected one so simple, and so touching, as proves him to have been possessed not only of very tender feelings, but of a most correct and delicate judgment.

At the last interview between a condemned criminal and his wife, their child—a bonny wee thing, just beginning to prattle—was playing about the cell. Her eye was caught by the glitter of the bolts which confined the father's legs, and she cried out, in blissful ignorance of their use—"Oh, daddy, daddy, what pretty things! You never wore these at home."

"Many a sad thing I have seen," said the honest gaoler, "and many a bitter cry I have heard within these walls; but never one that made me blubber like a child till then. The mother, Sir, and the poor fellow himself—Oh, Sir, it was terrible—terrible."

It is now five years since the "ould dancing-master" has been seen in Green Street. His last visit was for the purpose of consulting the mortuary register, behind the shutter, on a disputed point of precedency between Crawley, of whom mention has been already made, and a poor lieutenant, named Bellamy, who, having a wife and ten children, at a time when beef was 10d. a pound, and the quartern loaf sold for 1s. 6d., was hanged for having forged a bill of exchange. The dispute ended in a bet, with an alderman of the late corporation, for a dinner, with vinous accompaniments, ad arbitrium victoris, for a select party. Of course, the old fellow with the chamois-leather gloves won the wager, and ordered hung beef for the head dish, with a variety of "things strangled" for the second course.

He now mopes about, groaning at the degeneracy of the times, almost as dolorous in look as Cruikshank's "Last Man," mounted on a crazy gibbet, and demanding of Echo—"Who'll pull my legs?" to which Echo answers—"Nobody!"

The hangman has truly declined from his high estate. One by one the jewels of his hempen coronal have been plucked away, and himself driven into a corner with the murderer and the traitor. But there he is in that corner, so intrenched and fortified by the laws of man, and by strained interpretations of the law of God, that it will take a vigorous effort yet to dislodge him.

There is this good political reason why treason should be followed by death: If convicted traitors were left unhanged, they might be released afterwards from the penalty of their misdeeds upon the success of the plot, and perhaps even rewarded, to the great scandal of constituted governments, and the encouragement of seditions yet unhatched. But from this knot is no release. It is dignus vindice, and makes sure work with the foremost and most daring spirits of a movement, however the final event may turn out. The old Tory epigram is hereby verified—

"Treason doth never prosper: What's the reason?
When it does prosper, none dare call it treason."

Thus, although Lafontaine has survived the price set upon his head, and attained a post, from which he may denounce traitors in his turn, it is not so with those who fell into the snares of the law, while might was too strong for right. Lount, Matthews, and the ill-stared Pole, who (cum multis aliis) were so cruelly sacrificed to Orange vengeance and Whig pusillanimity, must still be supposed to have been traitors, because they died on a scaffold; and we are bound to admit, that perfect justice was done in their case as well as in that of the present Attorney-general of the Lower Province, although, according to the hackneyed quotation—

Ille crucem, sceleris pretium tulit, hic diadema.

In like manner, there are doubtless many persons now living in this realm and professing an ardent zeal for the Reform Bill, who would have been very glad to have tied the noose, with their own hands, for Lord Grey, Lord John Russell, ay, and for Sir James Graham too, as "most toad-spotted traitors," because they brought forward such a measure. Nor, supposing the measure to have succeeded afterwards, would they be now one whit less sincere reformers than they are, or (strange as it may seem) less firmly impressed with the conviction, that Lord Grey and his friends deserved to be hanged.

Now, as to murder:—This is Jack Ketch's strongest hold; for which, truly, there is better ground in reason and in the natural feelings and resentments of the human breast, than with respect to any other offence which has ever been punished with death. That a deliberate murderer deserves to be put to death, is past dispute; but that it is wise, proper, or conducive to the prevention of the crime, that we should inflict that punishment upon him, is quite another question. Yet, if we dare to raise a doubt upon this point, 'tis well if the Holy Bible,—His Book, who said, "Vengeance is MINE, I will Repay,"—be not hurled at our heads, and the charge of Infidelity thrust rudely upon us.

Every one who has ever heard this subject enlarged upon, from the Bench of Justice or the Preacher's Chair, must be well acquainted with the one Text, by which the doctrine of Satisfaction by the Gallows is supported: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." This is repeated ad nauseam by all the advocates (ermined and otherwise) of "the Stern path," whenever any one presumes to speak of a less violent mode of retaliation. SUPREME AUTHORITY has happily interdicted the Mosaic rule of "an Eye for an Eye, and a Tooth for a Tooth," from being pressed into this cause. But, as no special bar is recorded against the demand of Blood for Blood, although it may be plainly and, by every rule of right reason, certainly inferred, this open question is clung to by the advocates of Capital Punishments, as their point d'appui. Being hemmed in to one spot in the Book of Life, they make the best of it. It is to them both the Law and the Prophets,—a complete Body of Divinity,—an Eleventh Commandment, equal in force and value to the whole Decalogue.

The Rev. Thomas Scott, in his far-famed Commentary, goes so far as to argue from this text, that a Magistrate who remits the extreme punishment in any case of murder, incurs the guilt of an accessary. "From this energetic declaration," says he, "it certainly follows, that wilful murder ought invariably, in all communities, to be punished with death; whatever form it assumes, or however it may, by specious pretences, be extenuated; and that God will himself require it of those who suffer the murderer to escape; so that the punishment due to murder, will,—in some way,—be inflicted on them, as accessaries to the crime." *

To the self-same tune, and indeed upon the self-same string, the gentlemen of the Fourth Estate have lately manifested an atrocious fury of piety, taking occasion, from the lamentable assassination of Mr. Edward Drummond, to assert the divine supremacy of the Gallows. If the Devil can quote Scripture for his purpose, why should not the hangman? And what more worthy chaplains could the latter functionary employ, than the godly Cordeliers who have taken up his cause in the diurnal Press?

Of that murder, there can scarcely be two opinions among civilized men. It was so treacherous, so cruel, so unprovoked; and the sufferer bore his fate so firmly, and "with such gentle sorrow," that hard indeed must be the heart which has not mourned his fall, as though he had been a dear familiar friend. Never, in our memory, did any case of individual suffering elicit a more general feeling of sympathy and regret. Never did any crime excite a more just or universal burst of abhorrence. But the persons who have been the most sincerely grieved at that event, were not, probably, those who set up, in the public prints, a yell for the murderer's blood, and denounced beforehand all who might disapprove of so barbarous and heart-hardening a punishment, as if their conduct were "unworthy of a religious, and of a Christian people." †

It appears, at best, a questionable test of any man's religion, that he should insist upon hanging another by the neck; nor is the justice of that reasoning quite clear, which would exclude from the Christian pale those who may conscientiously object to the punishment of death as unwise and inexpedient, even towards so dangerous an assassin as Daniel M'Naughten. Awful as may be the penalty of avowing such an opinion, I will not hesitate to declare it: That man may be turned to a more beneficial use for the advantage of society, and his body made a more permanent and impressive vehicle of admonition to the cruel and the vindictive, than if it had been suspended for an hour upon a gibbet, and then thrown into a hole in an obscure and inaccessible corner of the gaol-yard.

The issue of M'Naughten's trial has created an extraordinary sensation in all parts of the kingdom; and we are promised a new penal law, founded upon it, from the master-hand of the Lord Chancellor himself. Many violent lunatics have been brought to trial before now for deeds of great atrocity, and absolved from the extreme penalty, as being unaccountable agents; but until an Old Bailey jury decided that a man might meditate the destruction of a Cabinet Minister, and yet be insane, no Government ever dreamt of altering the law upon the subject. Even when the life of the Sovereign was attempted by an individual of far more equivocal claims to derangement, it was a matter of derision amongst the friends of our present rulers.

It is, nevertheless, very proper and desirable, that effectual restraints should be placed on persons who are incapable of exercising moral control over themselves; and though such precautions might, in many instances, involve a vexatious interference with the comfort and enjoyment of harmless lunatics, that evil should be tolerated, as necessary to protect society against a greater. But the suggestion, which has been thrown out in many quarters, to "hang madmen, that madmen may be deterred from crime," is disgraceful to a civilized age and nation. If such a principle, however modified, be ingrafted into our criminal code, what becomes of "The Perfection of Reason?"

A howl of disappointment is still ringing through a portion of the Press, at the lame conclusion of M'Naughten's trial; and the wild excesses of Dillon and Stevenson coming immediately on the heels of that event, seem to add point to such exclamations. In truth, however, the conduct of Stevenson at least is directly opposed to the reasoning employed by those writers; for the violent and threatening language, with which he is charged, was uttered prior to the acquittal of M'Naughten, and when it was the universal expectation that he would be found guilty, and executed. The conduct of this maniac, therefore, proves that the anticipated judgment of M'Naughten had no terrors for him; nor, on the other hand, could he have grounded any hope of impunity on the probable issue of that trial.‡

But, is the event of M'Naughten's trial what is commonly understood by an acquittal? Does it really confer impunity? or will the public at large so construe it? It is a sentence of perpetual incarceration, the very next degree of rigour to judgment of death. Few men in their senses would prefer it to instant execution. Of those who have been condemned to it, and are now enduring its lingering, hopeless, heart-sickening misery, is there one who would not, in his inmost soul, adopt the sentiment of Macbeth:—

> Better be with the dead,
> Whom we, to gain our place, have sent to peace,
> Than on the torture of the mind to lie
> In restless ecstasy.

I have seen and conversed with an acquitted cul-

* As Mr. Scott is a very high authority with the preëminently righteous, we recommend the sequel of his observations, on this head, to their perusal:—

"It is a subject for serious inquiry, to all who are cordially affected to the welfare of these nations, how far national guilt is contracted, when so many are suffered to elude justice, who commit wilful, deliberate murder, in Duels; whilst many thieves are put to death, a punishment which God never commanded to be inflicted on them, and perhaps (perhaps?—Oh, Mr. Scott!)—perhaps does not approve.—The connivance also of BRITISH RULERS IN INDIA at the murders committed by the inhabitants, in their idolatry and idolatrous customs, should not be forgotten."

The recent vote of thanks, by both Houses of Parliament, to the Governor-General who presented a pair of Sandalwood gates to the Temple of Jughernaut, an idol gorged with human sacrifices, would perhaps have been disapproved of by the author of these observations.

† Times.

‡ Dillon's last letter to Mr. Goulburn, threatening to "send a ball through him," is dated the 4th of March, the day of M'Naughten's acquittal; hence it is possible, though most unlikely, that the writer may have been aware of the termination of that inquiry.

prit of this sort, over whose head fifteen years have passed since he saw a green field. In a fit of rage and drunkenness he had murdered a near relative of his own,—approaching him unawares from behind, and discharging the contents of a blunderbuss through his body. The crime was perpetrated under circumstances precisely similar to those which marked the assassination of Mr. Drummond; and a jury, on much lighter grounds, pronounced the murderer to be insane. But whoso imagines that he thus escaped with impunity, or that the crime of assassination received an impetus from the supposed mildness of his lot, should look in upon the unhappy wretch as he paces to and fro within the bars of his prison, and then search the records of crime in that district, for a similar act of reckless atrocity.

What fate more mournful, or more fearful, could be conceived than that of Hatfield, confined for nearly half a century within the walls of Bedlam? What example more sadly impressive, than the accounts we have lately seen in the papers, of Oxford even now turning pale as a sheet at the mention of his allotted destiny, and entreating that he might be placed for life under the strictest surveillance, so he might be permitted to return once more to the world? If these things were made generally known, as they should be, there would be no need of adding another red spot to what the late Mr. Wilberforce called "our bloody laws."

According to human judgment and the natural reaction of human feelings, in the shedding of blood there is full remission, not only for the criminal, but too often also for his crime. The grave covers all things, even the hatred due to the blackest crimes. The part of wisdom, therefore, would be, to let the criminal live, a memorial of the continued misery which the law entails upon the guilty. Cain, cast out from human intercourse, and suffering the terrors of a troubled mind, found his "punishment greater than he could bear;" and those who witnessed it were more moved to abhor his crime, than if his carcass had been exposed, for an hour or two, swinging on a tree. After that first shock, the spectators would have passed on, and soon forgotten what manner of man he was. Who is there that now calls to mind the crimes of Courvoisier, of Greenacre, or of Thurtell? What murderer, in thought, shudders at their fate?

Notwithstanding the eloquent homilies we so often hear from the Bench, proceeding from the threadworn text already alluded to, it will not be denied, at this time of day, that the punishment of death, as recognised by the law of this realm, rests upon very different grounds. It is a mere question of expediency; and if the practice cannot be maintained by an appeal to its efficacy as an example, no administrator of human justice would dream of justifying himself to society, by texts of Scripture, for taking away the life of the most guilty of God's creatures. On that ground he might as well order an adulterer to be taken out beyond the walls of the city, and stoned to death by the multitude. Prove to me, then, that the hangman makes fewer murderers, and you silence me; but failing in that, don't think to knock out my brains with The Pentateuch.

Since the mitigation of the penal code, many crimes, of which death was the established and customary punishment, have become less frequent. Although the distresses of the people were never more severe, or more general, burglaries, robberies on the highway, and even theft—to all of which even honest minds have been prompted by want—are not so common as they were some twenty years ago. In Ireland, where the common people are in a starving condition half the year, the two first-mentioned crimes are scarcely ever attempted. Even in the heart of Tipperary, the outer door of any gentleman, who has not rendered himself obnoxious to popular vengeance, by offending against the Agrarian code of Captain Rock, may be left open all through the night with perfect safety; and he may himself travel unattended, at any hour, through the wildest districts, without fear of losing his money. These are very surprising facts, but their truth is notorious. I think Lord Glengall himself would not hesitate to acknowledge it. I have no theory to account for them; but it is evident, that our fathers of the past generation were mistaken in their belief, that no species of property could be secure without the safeguard of the gibbet, and that a vast quantity of blood was shed by them—legally shed, to be sure—in support of that opinion.

Not twenty years ago, I saw two young men hanged for pushing open a door, which had been purposely left unbarred to entrap them; a spade having been placed against it, in order to render just so much force necessary as would constitute the crime of burglary. They forced the door, certainly, with intent to commit a robbery, but were taken, re infectâ, by a party of police, who lay in wait for them; and when they were placed on their trial, Lord Norbury, addressing the jury, significantly demanded—"Which of you, gentlemen, could sleep in your beds, if ruffians like these are suffered to go about the country with arms in their hands, to pillage, and, perhaps, to murder?"

Those "wretches hung, that jurymen might sleep;" but it has been since discovered, that jurymen may sleep quite as serenely, nay, more so, though burglars are only transported.

Horse-stealing was another of the crimes, of which we were told there would be no end, if the powerful sanction of the halter should be relaxed. Yet it is now a rare offence. For this, and the stealing and maiming of cattle and sheep, the gallows was an absolute decoy; and its officiating minister exercised a sort of irresistible fascination.

But Forgery was long the twin-brother of Murder on that levelling platform; with this difference, that interest could sometimes save a murderer, but never was suffered to prevail against the doom of a forger. The pardon of a man convicted of that offence, or the commutation of his sentence to the most rigorous and severe form of secondary punishment, would have been cried down as an act of national bankruptcy, which public credit could not possibly survive. In such event, it was confidently surmised that every fellow who could write would have nothing to do but raise money in the name, and at the expense, of an honester man; the banks would all be ruined; the merchants would be obliged to suspend payments; and so universal a counterfeiting of powers of attorney was to ensue, that every widow and every orphan, through the length and breadth of the land, (who had "their little all" invested in the funds,) were to be reduced inevitably to beggary.

This sort of talk kept the hinges of our Newgate balcony pretty limber for many a year; for there were innumerable forgeries and convictions took place at almost every Session. Nor in any instance, where the guilt of the party was clearly established, was the monster baffled of his prey. The execution of Doctor Dodd had effectually "shut the gates of mercy on mankind." George the Third, who possessed that sort of firmness common to some men with a pig when it is bent upon pursuing the wrong way, treated all applications for the remission of the extreme sentence, in cases of forgery, as a direct imputation on his humanity. "If I pardon this man, then Doctor Dodd was murdered," was his answer. He was understood to have said the same thing with regard to Peltier, a French merchant, when applied to on behalf of Dr. Dodd; and so, because those two men might have been "murdered," others must submit, without repining, to the same hard fate.

Down to Fauntleroy, those various reasons, royal, political, and mercantile, kept the system of forgery alive and active. Rogues presuming on the human feelings of those whom they designed to cheat, and on the general sympathy created by a punishment so disproportionate to the crime, were content to run the risk of detection. Hundreds of them fell victims to their temerity; but hundreds escaped: and in the former cases the calamity was shared by the prosecutor with the victim; the indignation of society being diverted from the iniquitous law, which enacted such a savage retribution, to those who had recourse to it for protection or satisfaction.

Thus, in the case, before slightly alluded to, of Lieutenant Bellamy, the prosecutor was an attorney, rising in practice, and likely, through his connexions, to advance rapidly to affluence; but the cruelty of the law, and of the executive administration, was visited upon him. Friends looked cold; clients avoided him; and he became an obscure man, broken in spirit and broken in fortune. Yet he had not acted from vindictive motives, nor taken an unfair advantage; but the general pity for the poor culprit was turned into gall against his prosecutor. Had a punishment short of death been awarded, this man would have been applauded by those who now condemned him, not for his own fault, but for that of the hideous criminal code of England.

The blind and irrespective ruthlessness with which this particular crime was attempted to be hunted down, displays itself in a case which, unlike most instances where the crown had taken a delinquent in its toils, had a pleasing and somewhat ludicrous termination.

A simple countryman, who had acquired the dangerous accomplishments of reading and writing, having come into possession of a five-pound note, altered the five, in a rude manner, with the pen, to ten, and presented it, in that form, to be exchanged for cash, at a bank in Waterford. For this attempt, which, of course, did not succeed, he was tried and condemned to death; but the simplicity of the man was so apparent, that the jury strongly recommended him to the mercy of the crown; and the judge who presided supported the application with all his influence.

That Government, however, had a "vow in heaven" against sparing one drop of blood which the tribunals had once devoted to the altars of the Papyrocracy. Several respites were granted at the earnest request of gentlemen whom it would not have been quite politic to disgust; but at last the sheriff received an official letter from the Castle, impressed with the black seal of destiny, to the following purport:—

"Dublin Castle.

"Sir,—The Lord Lieutenant has been graciously pleased further to respite the execution of the sentence of death upon Peter Walsh, condemned at the last assizes, until Saturday next, when you will proceed, without fail, to carry the sentence of the law into effect.—Your obt. servt.

A. B., Under Secretary.

To the High Sheriff,
City of Waterford.

"Perhaps," as the Rev. Mr. Scott would say, the supreme disposer of events did not approve of this sort of justice. At all events, he otherwise ordained the result.

"I will—will I?" said honest Tom Backas, the sheriff, as he thrust the Under-secretary's letter into his coat-pocket; "I will see thee hanged first." And away he went to the city gaol to break the matter as gently as possible to Peter Walsh, whom he found endeavouring to soothe the torments of "hope deferred" with a pot of porter.

"Peter," said the sheriff, "have you made your sowl?"

"The Lord be between us and harm, your honour!" said Peter. "Why would I think of the like?"

"Because you must be hanged on Saturday morning, my poor fellow, without fail."

"Is it in airnest ye are?" said Peter, dropping the porter; "or maybe you're jokin. You wor always fond of your joke, Masther Tom, ha, ha, (here he tried to laugh;) but, by St. Peter, that's not a pretty subject to joke about (and he threw a fearful glance around the cell) in such an oogly place as this."

"'Tis too true to put in a ballad, Peter. I have a letter from the Castle—devil burn it!—ordering me to see the job done without fail: so, send for Father Kenny, and make your peace, as well as you can."

Having thus delicately introduced the matter to the party most nearly concerned, the worthy sheriff hastened to the gaoler, and, in terms of high indignation, communicated the substance of the Under-secretary's letter to that officer. But the gaoler received it all as a matter of business, observing, that he thought, all along, how it would end, and that they might as well have let the law take its coorse at first.

"Humph!" thinks the sheriff to himself; "there is not much sympathy to be looked for in this quarter: but we will try a stratagem. Pray, Master Bolton," he said aloud, "what are we to do for a hangman?"

"There is no such convaniency to be had in Waterford," said the gaoler, drily.

"And how, if we can't get one anywhere else?"

"Why, then, I suppose, the sheriff must do the business himself," replied Bolton, raising his finger and thumb to the butt of his left ear with an expressive jerk and shrug of his shoulders, and a clicking of the tongue against the palate, which is well understood in the language of pantomime.

"Very pleasant, indeed!" thought the sheriff. "But, Bolton, my dear friend, you must assist me here."

"Assist you!" said the droll; "Lord love you, I never could tie a running-knot in my life."

"Pooh! d——n it! man," said the sheriff, "don't be ridiculous. I mean, you must help me to procure an executioner. Could not you now, like an honest fellow, take my gig and drive over to Clonmel. I'm sure they have a permanent hangman on that establishment."

"Ay, but I doubt he's always engaged at home," says the gaoler.

"Well, then, say Wexford; that's but forty miles off. You'd be back in three days; quite time enough, you know: and as you understand these things much better than I do, I shall take it as a great favour if you will transact this little matter for me."

"Yes," said Bolton, "and bring the hangman back in the gig beside me? How would Mrs. Backas like that, I wonder?"

"No matter for her; I'll arrange all that. Only say you'll oblige me."

"Willingly," said Bolton, "on this condition, that you remain here and act the gaoler during my absence; for it would never do to leave things, trusting to such drunken rascals as the turnkeys."

This was what Backas expected, and indeed desired; so he was on the following morning invested with the keys, while the phlegmatic gaoler, rejoicing in any occasion of snuffing the fresh country air for a time, solutus curis, was trotting at the rate of ten miles an hour along the road to Wexford.

Father Kenny was closeted for a considerable part of the day with the condemned prisoner, whom he pronounced to be a true penitent; though he found it a little difficult at first to reconcile his mind to the justice of the law, which demanded the forfeit of a life for so trifling an act as that of drawing a pen across a flimsy bit of paper. A disaffected priest was that Father Kenny, or he never could have uttered such a remark.

At midnight the prison lay in darkness. Only in the gaoler's apartment, where reclined the sheriff in his arm-chair, was a light suffered to glimmer; and that was carefully hooded from external observation. The keys of the prison lay on a table before him, and the snoring of the turnkeys in an adjacent room, satisfied him that he was alone in his glory. That, and the creaking of the drop outside the window, were the only sounds which broke the awful stillness of the prison.

He took a dark lantern and proceeded on tiptoe along the passages leading to the condemned cell. Several doors, trebly bolted and locked, had to be opened in his progress; but he accomplished all without trepidation or noise. His heart smote him not in what he had undertaken. As he passed the different cells, where the prisoners lay, he overheard many a heavy sigh, through the grating of their doors; many a miserable being also he heard writhing and moaning on his straw, "in restless ecstasy;" but the man doomed to die on the following Saturday, lay fast asleep. So sound and undisturbed was his slumber, that he scarcely seemed to breathe. The waking horrors of the day had exhausted him, and a kind Providence, in compensation for his previous agony, had steeped his senses in forgetfulness.

The sheriff found some difficulty in arousing him; and when he had, in some degree, brought him to his recollection, the wretch thought that he had come to demand his body, to be disposed of according to law, and he fell into a violent fit of trembling. Honest Tom, however, who had anticipated this, was provided with a restorative, which even Father Mathew would scarcely condemn in such a case,—he gave poor Peter a drop out of the bottle, which had the double effect of stopping his mouth, and setting him firmly upon his legs. He then briefly explained to him that he must lose no time at his toilet, but throw on a cloak, which had been provided for the occasion, and quickly and silently follow him. In a few minutes he placed him at liberty, beyond the outer gate of the prison, and bade him God speed.

A sentinel was passing on his beat, and the dismayed wretch shrunk back like a frightened bird to its cage; but just then, the heavy drop-leaf of the gallows overhead grated harshly to the wind, and he rushed forward,—while Backas, fearful lest his agitation might betray him, cried aloud, "Good night, Doctor,—good night! and mind how you go down the hill. Fair and easy go far in a day."

At eight of the next morning, the High Sheriff was aroused from as deep and sweet a slumber, in the gaoler's bed, as that from which he had roused the condemned sleeper, and told that the prisoner had escaped. He was fined five hundred pounds; but the world prospered with him, and he could spare it.

Some years afterwards, when he related this incident, some one asked, What had become of the culprit, and whether he had ever had an opportunity of showing gratitude to his deliverer?

"He received a free pardon, through the Marquis (of Waterford,) from another administration," said the worthy ex-Sheriff; "and many a warm benediction I received from his lips; but the only overt act of gratitude I can remember, was his selling me a spavined horse for twenty pounds, which, between two brothers, was not worth half the money. But, if the same thing was to be done to-morrow, and at the same cost, I would do it again. It is not for the thanks one is likely to receive from a rogue, that we should feel disposed to act a humane part; nor should his worthlessness make any difference, if the thing itself is right. I despise a man who says,—'Save a thief from the gallows, and he will pick your pocket.' Why,—let him pick it, the blackguard! if he must. He cannot rob me of the satisfaction I feel, when I recollect the night I sent Jerry Bolton on a fool's errand to Wexford, and the nice tête-à-tête he had with a hangman by his side, all the way back. Jerry was right, however, about Mrs. B. Deuce a toe would she set in that gig any more; and I had to part with it for next to nothing."

This is a long digression, almost apropos to nothing; our business being to show that the forgery trade has declined, since it ceased to be carried on in partnership with Jack Ketch as Indorsee. To that fact, however, the Old Bailey Annals and the Circuit Reports bear undeniable testimony. No person now objects to appear against a man who has perpetrated or attempted that description of fraud; yet the number of prosecutions falls considerably short of those which took place, when two cases of forgery out of three, were allowed to escape with impunity, through the horror which men felt of imbruing their hands in blood. The witnesses felt not the least compunction in bringing forward proofs against the Reverend Doctor Bailey, the other day; nor was any sensation of pity or terror excited in the public mind, when he received sentence of transportation for life. He deserved it; and it seemed to be the general opinion, that the safety of society required it. A la bonne heure, then; let the reverend preacher live out his whole allotted time, and learn, at the other side of the ocean, to connect the practice of good works with the doctrines of religion. He will do no more hurt to his neighbour in this hemisphere; nor will the degraded and wretched condition, to which he has sunk himself, encourage any extravagant roué, lay or cleric, to tread in his footsteps, in the miserable confidence that he cannot be hanged.

Two important facts have been now ascertained and verified by experience: every other denomination and variety of crime, for which the penalty of death was formerly exacted, has abated in frequency, and in atrocity, since the law has mitigated its rigour; and the crime of Murder, which is still punished with death, continues as frequent, and is attended by the same savage and ferocious circumstances, as ever. The terror of death does not operate in restraining men of fierce and vindictive passions, from slaking their burning hearts in blood, any more than it checked the audacity of the highwayman or prevented the passing of forged bank-notes.

Is not this enough to prove, that executions for murder are no longer justifiable, on the only principle which could justify a resort to them by mortals? They have utterly failed, as an example, to deter those, who witness or read of them, from the commission of the same crime. That they have in many instances "put toys of desperation" in men's heads, urging them to the perpetration of deeds which, under a less violent impulse, they never would have dreamt of, is a truth authenticated in many a well-known instance. But our case is made out, without this. If the brutal exhibition of a human body, writhing on a gallows, is proved to be without effect in preventing the crime for which he suffers, we have no right to outrage public decency, and shock every pure Christian feeling by exhibiting it. What then—it is demanded—would you make no distinction between the fate of the convicted murderer and the sheep-stealer, or the forger of bank-notes? Is it consistent with your notions of justice, that a crime so abhorrent to our nature, should be marked with no darker sign of public reprobation, than offences which are only greater in degree than those of the covetous man, the gambler, or of many a "smart man" of business, such as not only Brother Jonathan, but sly Brother John himself deems highly of?

If I had a mind to retaliate upon those venerators of antiquity, I might say that the Law, in its practice as well as in its letter, for many a long year, recognised no such distinction as that which they are now such mighty sticklers for; and that those men, whose vigorous administration of justice it is so much their fashion to extoll, were only beaten inch by inch from that horrid code, which levelled all distinctions, until they have but one scarlet remnant of it left to console them. But it is quite possible—without offending public morality by hiring one human butcher to destroy the life of another—to make a distinction in the punishment of wilful murder, which would mark the national abhorrence of such a crime, and render the guilty individual a terror, not to himself alone, but to the whole community.

To this end, I would suggest that a murderer, upon conviction, should be immediately cut off from all intercourse of friends and kindred. Whether his destination were a prison in his native land, or a penal colony abroad, he should be no more seen here. His removal should take place instantaneously from the dock after trial, so as not to allow him the interchange of a parting word; or, if it were possible, of a parting glance with the spectators. It might be worth while even to call in the aid of machinery and stage-effect, to add to the horror of his disappearance—causing him to vanish like a spectre from the sight of men. And he should be conveyed away in secret and by night-journeys, to his final abode, where he should be effectually, and for ever, divorced from all that is most dear to a parent, a husband, or a friend.

The awe produced in the by-standers by that visible and sudden separation from the world, would surpass the terror of an execution, without any of its revolting and demoralising effects. Something of the kind has been tried in Tipperary within the last year; when prisoners, condemned to be transported, were taken out of their cells at midnight and sent away to a seaport, before any of the country people were aware of their intended removal. On the following market-day, when crowds of friends and sympathizers flocked into the town and found the prison empty, the spirit of defiance, which had summoned them together, was changed into dismay and grief. To have seen the absent culprits brought out and hanged, would not have daunted them at all; but the stillness and solitude of those untenanted walls struck terror into their hearts. They looked and felt, as men contemplate the deep and tranquil waters which have swallowed up human life, and refuse to throw the inanimate form upon the surface.

Many years ago, when the present First Lord of the Treasury was Chief Secretary for Ireland, he described to the House of Commons, in very moving language, the fact of a poor woman having, with her children, thrown herself at his feet, imploring that her husband, who had been condemned and removed in that summary manner, might be brought back and hanged! Some of the senseless claqueurs who heard him laughed; but the Right Hon. gentleman rebuked their stupid merriment, saying, that if they supposed such a strange application indicated want of affection in the person who made it, they were much mistaken; for he had never seen grief or anguish more strongly depicted in the demeanour of any human being. This is a very remarkable testimony in favour of what is called Secondary Punishment.

But would this be any diminution of severity? would not many criminals, for themselves as well as their friends, welcome death as far preferable?

I have not the least doubt that it would be generally so considered. Farther, I will add, that if it were not likely to be so considered, there would be very little use in trying the experiment. But let it be recollected, that although it is not desirable to aggravate the sufferings of even the worst malefactors, it is not out of tenderness for actual murderers that these suggestions are offered. It is in mercy to those whose lives may be even now threatened, or in danger of assassination, and to whom the law, as it is enforced, is no protection; nor is it in mercy to them only, but also to the reckless miscreant who meditates the blow, nothing awed or terrified by the course of punishment at present resorted to. Such a person would be much more forcibly and continually acted upon by the stern, impassive, and immovable aspect of justice, presented in this form, than as we are accustomed to see her, rushing sword in hand into the arena, destroying her victim, and then relapsing into a state of apathy and repose.

When a man of a sufficiently desperate character to commit a murder has brought his mind to contemplate and resolve upon the deed, he will run chances for the final event, pretty much as the soldier in Horace calculates the fortunes of a battle:

> Quid enim? concurritur; horæ
> Momento cita mors venit aut victoria læta.

He readily stakes his life against the hope of escape, or of a dropped link in the chain of evidence which may set him free; and even if he throws these calculations aside, and braces himself up for the worst, he plunges headlong down the steep with his victim, as an affair of "an hour," in which the satisfaction anticipated balances the pain.

But let him see the convicted murderer divested in a twinkling of his ruffian heroism; sucked down, as it were, into the earth from the presence of his kind for ever; borne away to a remote and inaccessible place, to drag out his lingering years in total ignorance of all things that happen in the world; denied even the gloomy comfort of learning what is thought of himself, of his crime, of his sentence, or whether people think of him at all:—Men who would face the gallows with a smile, would shrink in terror from such a living death.

But the old dancing-master plucks my sleeve and asks—"What am I to do? Consider my window in Green Street. Is there to be no respect for vested rights?"

A serious question this, my masters: if the old fellow's window is going to be put, like Old Sarum, into Schedule A, he must be at least exonerated from the special rent required of him. Indeed, it is a question of law, if he might not, even now, throw up the tenement, inasmuch as the contract was based originally on an immoral consideration. But at all events, the subject of compensation—I do not say to amateur dancing-masters, whose loss is but fantastical—but to the legal functionary who made an honest living by the practice, and who cannot well turn his hand to any other calling, as well as to the Rope-maker and furnishing Ironmonger of those finishing Establishments, must receive due attention.

OUR STATE AND PROSPECTS.

We are not to be ranked with those fatalists, who hold that nations are subject to certain fixed laws of prosperity and decay, sprouting, budding, and blooming like the lilies of the field, and, like them, drooping and decaying with a predestined uniformity, which no art or energy can obviate. Nations are made up of intellects and of consciences; and when the hour of decay comes, there is something in these elements which was not to be found in them during the hour of success. If there are bounds to the prosperity capable of being achieved by that portion of the human race that has taken the lead in the march of improvement, they are yet far out of sight. While Central Africa is undrained, and Southern Africa unirrigated,—while hundreds of millions of acres in Australia are unvisited, while there is no daily mail across the isthmus of Darien, while the Kentish farmer uses the plough of four generations back—a nation that is free to give, and free to take—free to work, and free to buy and sell, beholds no visible horizon to bound the expansive field of its progress.

But it is too true, that nations on the highway to prosperity have fallen—that great empires have been checked in their progress; and that which has happened may happen again. The question comes to be—Do effects of this sort take place without causes? And if it be answered in the negative, another question will follow, whether it be worth while inquiring what the causes of national retrogression are? When a commercial house, which has been transacting a prosperous business, gives way, the calamity arises from some mistake in the art of carrying on a successful trade; in other words, in the art of making rich. Political economy is the science from which nations learn the art of making rich; and if a nation —an industrious, well-meaning nation—be growing poor instead of rich, it must be from some mistake in the application of political economy. Let us look at an illustration in that empire which was formerly to the world what Britain is to it now. Philip II. of Spain possessed dominions, on which, as on those of Queen Victoria, "the sun never set." Naples, Milan, the Netherlands, the Palatinate, bowed to the empire of Madrid. The new world was claimed as an apanage to dominions which bid fair to cover the surface of the old. There are many points of similarity between the old state of Spain and that of Britain at the present day. The sea was covered with Spanish ships—a great merchant navy, and its offshoot a powerful armed fleet. Cadiz and Malaga had their merchant princes—their Barings and Gladstones. The interior swarmed with busy workmen. In its best days, too, Spain had a Parliament, with its sturdy uncompromising opposition, and its pliant ministerial benches. All these elements of prosperity had their gradual and steady rise and progress, and, when the apex was reached, as steady and as gradual was the descent; and the full-blown prosperity of a great people faded and died, as if Nature had set a season for budding and blooming, and a season for decaying. And whence did it arise, that half a century of degeneracy saw harbours decayed, ships rotting in the docks, warehouses empty and ruinous, and a people stamped with a listless and hopeless indolence, destined to make them the laughing-stock of Europe for centuries? Why, even in a mistake in political economy—one of those selfish, grasping efforts at a monopoly of prosperity, which, by the fixed laws of Providence, are destined to be the ruin of those who attempt them. The possession of the bullion mines caused the ruin of Spain, because the Spanish Government, instead of looking on bullion as an article of commerce, looked upon it as that wealth which commerce was only a means of acquiring. Having got their hand on the gold, the next thing was to keep it; and so its exportation was prohibited. The matter was a simple one. They saw all the world toiling and speculating for the purpose of getting gold. We grow gold in our own lands, they said; let us then keep it to ourselves. It puzzled people to find out how the nation should sink into poverty when there was plenty of gold in it, as it puzzles people to discover how artisans can starve, when the landlords, who employ them, have made provision for keeping up rents. The sideboard of the Duke of Albuquerque had forty silver ladders, and, when he died, six weeks were spent in inventorying and sorting his gold and silver dishes. How could starvation creep into such company? As we refuse to import what others have to give us for our manufactures, Spain refused to export that commodity which she had to give for the produce of other countries. Intense, blind, besotted selfishness has the ruling motive in both cases; and Providence has set a law in the world, whereby selfishness shall be visited. There were wise men then in Spain, as there were in Gotham of old, and as there are in England now. A royal Commission was appointed to report, and it did report; saying, that the decay of the nation might be attributed to the occupation of the people being that of agriculture, which is laborious and exhaustive, and recommending that of pasture to be substituted for it; just as the Standard and Mr. Ferrand will tell us, that our present calamities arise out of over-production and machinery; that our loss of the market arises from the superior industry of our population, and from the fertility of our resources for producing quicker and cheaper than our neighbours.

There is a particular phase in the state of a nation, at which any such great calamitous mistake tells upon it. Prussia would no more be injured by a Corn Law, than Britain by a prohibition against exporting native gold. While we produced more grain than our population consumed, we could be pillaged by the landlords for a bounty, without being starved; but our population has now outrun home produce, and every twenty-four hours add a clear thousand to its number. For some years past we have felt the vibration and commotion attendant on the turning of the beam—on our change from a state of progression to a state of retrogression. The adjustment has now been made: we are on the way down. Incidental seasons of panic and distress have occurred heretofore; but things righted themselves again; and there were none of those symptoms of steady decay which the present day exhibits. It is not alone that hundreds of thousands—ay, millions, of the working people are starving. How happens it, that with so many hands to be employed, there is a glut of uninvested capital? While workmen starve, the manufacturer keeps the money that would employ them, were there buyers, lying at 2 per cent. It is plain, that under this pressure, our boasted capital must decrease, and every day see us a poorer nation. Our capital is the accumulated savings of the produce of our industry and enterprise. When its possessors must live upon the capital itself, instead of its produce, it dwindles away; and thus will the nation exhibit the fate of her individual children—the savings of old days of enterprise and prosperity scattered in the hour of adversity.

Is the operation to go on? Is a helping hand to be held out to us ere it be too late? Or are we to be left to our fate? Let those who defend the latter alternative remember what that fate is—that the disease begins with the mortification of the extremities. All classes suffer; but the poorest and the feeblest die the death of starvation. At this moment, with a freezing wind that cuts into sable and dreadnought, an artisan, with his children, parades the street, covered with tattered rags of thin cotton, squeezing from his rotting lungs a creaking ballad. There is no phenomenon in nature carrying more clearly the history of the cause in the nature of the effect, than the haggard cheek and shrivelled limbs of that man. He would have worked, but the manufacturer did not want his services. The manufacturer would have employed him, but there were hands enough, and too many, for the home market, already at work; and the foreign trade, instead of increasing with the numbers of the population, had been falling off. The trader on the Baltic would buy the woollen or cotton stuffs from the manufacturer, but he has no money to do it with: we have stopped the course of commerce at his door, by refusing to take the article his country deals in—corn. Will the ballad-singing victim of this system be ever restored to the paths of industry and respectability? No, never. It is a truth which has lately received too many illustrations to be overlooked, that those who lose their hold of honest industry and self-esteem, and cast themselves upon the ocean of public mendicity, never recover their moral health. A few months—it may be, perhaps, a year, or two years—will see the wretch who has just passed by, stretched on his death-bed. It will not be apparent that he has died of starvation; it will be typhus fever, or consumption—the fruit of much exposure, fearful privation, and a little intemperance. For him there is no hope in this world; and ere the grave has closed over him, the only practicable and rational question is, Whether a happier race shall tread upon its turf?

There is a horrible optimism pervading society, on the subject of the influence of national suffering, which should be uprooted, for it is as dangerous a fallacy as the Anti-Corn Law League or the Anti-Slavery Association, ever combated. There is an opinion entertained by many people—and kind-hearted and benevolent people they sometimes are—that if starvation be a painful operation to contemplate, there is satisfaction in reflecting that it tends to obstruct the growth of population: as if it were simply the numerousness of the people, and not the ratio between the employment and the numbers, that occasions national distress. The worthy Lord Kaimes used to direct attention to the circumstance, as one of the most pleasing indications of the action of a benevolent providence, that population was kept to its due proportion by mortified masses dropping off now and then. In our philosophy, it is the existence of the mortified matter, not the extent of the population, that is the evil. If there were a limited supply of food upon the earth, and no man produced anything, then it might be a not unwise policy in the existing population to knock on the head every addition made to it; but it is clear, that if 100 people can produce two thousand times as much as 10 people can, each man out of the 100 will be twice as well off as each man out of the 10, let philosophers rage together as they please, and imagine vain things about the pressure of population. As Cobbett remarked, every mouth is born with two hands; and if great men, having authority, do not stand in the way, with restrictions and protections, and all manner of infernal devices, the two hands will provide as much as the mouth will eat—ay, and more; and the whole concern will be somewhat of an addition to the general wealth of the community, showing, in its own case, a balance of production over consumption. If a population be in a right state, the faster it increases the better. Let us see what is the individual operation of a population thus increasing. A couple are married early in life; they have children while they are themselves hale and vigorous; no cause of premature death, or of prolonged sickness, occurring to either of them, they live to see their children established in life and able to support themselves. Let families increase, in this manner, at any ratio you will, there is no occasion either for Poor Laws or Committees on national distress. But vary the picture a little. After the couple are married there comes a stagnation in trade, with its consequences—anxiety, over-exertion, tattered raiment, and scanty food. The man's days are thus shortened by some ten or fifteen years. He has become a burden on society in his own person; he does not live to see his children able to do for themselves; and he leaves a widow and a family of orphans to the care of the parish—a deposit on that heap of misery which constitutes the raw material of pauperism. Now, here we cannot expect to escape without a slight smile of derision from the complacent commentator on the vices of the lower orders, who will ask if there are no other causes, besides stagnation in trade, capable of killing off artisans before they reach the age of maturity? Are there no gin palaces in the world? have filthy and intemperate habits no physical influences? Kind, generous, and noble-minded censor, we admit all that you would insinuate; but because one out of the hundred will shorten his life by dissipation, we see no reason why the lives of the remaining ninety-nine should be shortened by commercial restrictions.

It were a vain and useless task to attack the pig-headed prejudices of the Buckinghams and the Sibthorps; but there is one man who sees and who understands the tragedy that is passing before him—one who can well apply to himself the words—

Video meliora proboque, deteriora sequor.

If there is faith to be placed in words, he has more than once shown that he understands, whatever he may do. Nursed among the enlightened sons of trade, he has been bribed over to desert their cause and use against them the knowledge acquired among them—bribed from the leadership of a great people, to the empty but glittering honour of the leadership of a proud aristocracy. Not for all its outward appurtenances of splendour is the position of that man at this moment to be envied by the most wretched victim of his system. Can such a man "sleep o' nights?" Does he never dream that it would be better, after all, that he gave the millions their bread, than that the mortgaged spendthrift who cheers him from the back benches should be kept in his claret? Has he no moments of generous enthusiasm in which, sick of the dishonest plaudits of the self-interested and the tinsel honour of serving a class, he resolves to throw off his chains, and do what he is able to serve mankind?

It must be admitted that the sacrifice would be not inconsiderable. The leadership of a proud feudal aristocracy must have charms almost irresistible to one lowly born; and the principle on which the appointment could alone be held was that of becoming a Bourbon or an Arnold. The aristocracy held out the glittering prize of command to some man versed in the ways and tactics of rising democracy; one who, belonging originally to the people's own ranks, knew what missiles galled them most sorely, and what fortifications they were least able to surmount; and Sir Robert obtained the prize. The duty assigned to him was to hold out the old fortress of aristocratic ascendancy—to conciliate and give way when it was necessary to do so—to fight when the sword had a chance of being successful. Hence has come the piebald morality of his policy: one half of it utilitarian and democratic; the other as deeply stained as it could be in Machiavelism, Fouché-ism, and Metternichism. There is an analogy between his position and that of the other Sir Robert, who, just a century ago, gave up his long and firmly held authority. Walpole began life during the supremacy of statesmen who sold the secrets of the revolutionary court to the exiled king, and sold the secrets of the court of St. Germains back to that of St. James. Political profligacy was then at its most refined pitch at court; but there was a more virtuous spirit arising among the country gentlemen, which it was necessary to check without violence; and there was no one so fitted to accomplish this as one of their own order, permitted to make use of all the corruptive material of the court at his discretion. The result was, that a man who was in point of political morality a marked improvement on the old statesmen of William and Anne, did more to support the corrupt influence of the crown, and check the progress of public honesty, than any one man known in English history. In the hands of one less wily and less scrupulous—under the administration of such gallant profligates as Halifax or Godolphin, the system would have toppled down; but Sir Robert Walpole's cautious vigilance stratified the mischief through the substance of society, and kept the system from perdition. Somewhat alike is the duty of our Sir Robert, his moral descendant. He has to keep up those privileges which support the power and wealth of our landed aristocracy at the price of the people's misery; yet not so invidiously to protect them, that the national indignation shall be roused to a pitch which will endure them no longer. He is to estimate nicely where to bully and where to temporise: in what departments it may be well to purify the atmosphere of political morality—in what others to corrupt it. And thus it is, that in his mixture of the dark statesmanship of the older time, with the enlightened philosophy of the new, the man who is one day, like Oxford and Bolingbroke, trying to make political capital out of the attempts of an insane assassin, is, on another, proposing a liberal system of education, or nominating, against the wishes of his own supporters, a commission to inquire into the state of the poor in Scotland.

We would not have it thought that we hold forth this man as the sole fabricator of his own system. He is only the living personification of the state into which the conflicts of the two great parties who struggle with each other for political power have worked the morality of the legislature. It is not he alone that is responsible for this—it is not his party alone; their opponents have their share of the evil to answer for. There was a day when the Whigs had it in their power to take the largest stride that ever was taken in this country, in the path of political regeneration; but they were alarmed at the rapidity of the approach they thought they had been making towards a state of perfection, and stopped short, lest they should be too virtuous. Why did they hang up the question of the Corn Laws till the last moment? Why did they do nothing for the Ballot? Why did they fill seats gained by bribery? Why did they make fictitious votes while they were crying out against their opponents for corrupting the constituency? They are an illustration of a truth which few will turn over the page of history without perceiving, that between parties struggling for power, there is no such thing (whatever historians and editors may say) as abstract virtue on the one side, and unredeemed vice on the other; that the two parties will reflect their good and their evil back upon each other; and that if there be Cæsar Borgias on the one side, there will be Machiavels on the other.

It is a natural transition, to pass from the discussion of those from whom we have nothing to hope, and to consider what ought to be the conduct of those from whom everything is to be hoped—The People. There are times in the history and progress of every measure, when all is gained by the adoption of an uncompromising tone, and the sacrifice of whatever stands in the way of the one great object. The hour seems to have come when we must so act in the case of the Corn Laws. We would say then to the People, Let no member of the Legislature be trusted who is not for total and immediate repeal. Let that be the pivot on which the question of liberal and anti-liberal turns. Let us not be misled by exhortations not to split with our friends for "a difference of opinion on one point:" this one point is greater than all others put together. It is that whereon he that is not with us is against us. Let it be seen that the theory of a fixed duty as a compromise is a vision that has had its existence in the feverish brain of a section of the liberal party, and is now dispersed, and let us keep up hope. History has so often exemplified the fable of the Sibyl, that there seems to be no more sound, practical, and prudent principle than this,—that whenever a conciliatory measure is rejected, a portion of that which had been conceded for the sake of conciliation should be burned before another offer be made. We are now in a position to look with infinite satisfaction on the rejection of the eight shilling fixed duty, and to say to the Landlords, in the expressive language of the metropolitan youth,—"Don't you wish you may get it?" The long struggle for liberty during the seventeenth century was a succession of half measures rejected by the crown till it became too late to concede them. How very fortunate a thing it is, that Lord John Russell's Reform Motions of 1822 and 1826 were rejected with quiet scorn. Would it have been better for us had the Reform Bill too, been rejected? This is a strong case; but we are inclined to think that it would.

THE LAST OF THE BARONS.*

It is from Hume, that Sir Edward Bulwer has borrowed the title of his new romance. The Last of the Barons received this magnificent appellation from the philosophic historian with Tory leanings. He is the puissant Earl of Warwick, distinguished by the sobriquet of the King-maker, and described by Hume as "the greatest as well as the last of those mighty barons who formerly overawed the crown." The choice of the epoch and the hero are both felicitous. The magnificent, chivalrous, valiant, and high-spirited Warwick, possessed in rich abundance those qualities which are best adapted to the romance of history; and the period, and the contemporary characters, were as memorable as the man. The reign of Henry VII. is properly regarded as a new and great era in the constitutional and social history of England; but it was during the previous troubled reigns, and in the latter fierce wars of the Roses and the rebellions, that those complex events were evolved which finally led to the consolidation of constitutional monarchy. It is in the very heart of this stirring and memorable transition-period, that Sir E. Bulwer lays his first—and he says it is to be his last—historical romance.

One especial province of the historical romance, is the dramatic illustration of the personal character and habits of the prominent actors of history—of eminent historical personages; and of those minute, complicated, and often obscure causes of events, which history either deals with in large, or passes without any attempt at investigation. Historical romance also treats of great personages in their undress, and as seen behind the scenes, in those social and domestic relations, which it is not the province of History to describe, or only in the briefest way. This distinction has been strictly kept in mind in "The Last of the Barons," though the author occasionally takes a wide and comprehensive preliminary view of those combined causes, small and great, which impel or influence the progress of society. These were peculiarly powerful and active during the period which he has chosen to illustrate, when the power of the Commons—the influence of popular opinion, which had long been felt, first began to be distinctly recognised. That would, however, be a heavy historical romance, which is not constantly relieved by the presence of those beings of ordinary life which are the sole creation of the artist: the embodiments of his fancy and reflection, or his personified idea of the leading impulses of the age which he paints. These pure inventions are in general Bulwer's most effective characters; and this, we imagine, holds of every historical romance that is a work of genius.

The work, as a whole, with all its power and its many and great beauties, is not without blemishes. The scene is so crowded with characters, that the reader has not time to take proper account of them, nor to become interested in the fortunes of half the number; while a tone of monotony, a feeling of repletion, if not of actual weariness, arises from the too frequent appearance of some of the most finely conceived of the actors, who come forward doing and saying much the same things that they had said and done so often before; and for no purpose important to the movement of the tale. For example, the impression received from the half-crazed and half-sublime Adam Warner, the mechanician and philosopher, whose brain is turned by the life-long enthusiastic pursuit of science, is sadly impaired by his frequent appearance; which not even the exceeding softness, the tender and delicate virgin nature of his devoted daughter Sybill—one of Bulwer's most exquisite female creations—can wholly sustain. In like manner, the tymbesteres, the name of the time for the bacchantes, or timbrel-girls, who then haunted all places of popular amusement, though employed, as Warner sometimes is, to carry forward the plot, are too often called in. Another feature, approaching to a blemish, is the frequent obtrusion of the author, in somewhat the querulous or Sir Fretful vein; while, in his professed reverence for popular rights, united with bitter contempt for the body that claims their enjoyment—the People—Sir Edward displays more of the moody aristocrat of the Alfieri School, and is altogether more "melancholy and gentlemanlike," than becomes a healthful popular writer—to say nothing of the politician and philosopher of the nineteenth century. That the possession of great genius, or the enthusiastic pursuit of science, where the mind is well-regulated, can ever become a cause of blighting, and a curse, is a mistaken notion, and an unwholesome faith.—— But any sort of account of the romance is worth all the generalities that may be spoken of it, whether in praise or censure. After all, its chief fault is that superabundance which at times begets the feeling of repletion and satiety. Or, perhaps, we may have devoured too eagerly and hastily to permit of comfortable digestion.——The story opens freshly, and with animation, in one of "the pastime grounds of Old Cockaigne,"—a maiden new holiday ground which the inhabitants of Westminster had recently received from the popular and powerful Earl of Warwick. Through the field, we are told, stole the peaceful Ty-bourne, though we believe that Tyburn was a place of execution even then —and behind it rose the twin hills of Hampstead and Highgate, with the upland park and chase of Marybone. And here, with all the means and appliances of holiday enjoyment, the citizens of London and a motley crowd had assembled in hundreds and thousands for an archery match, and a day of general sport and revelry.

From the conversation of the groups on "the topics of the day," the history of the period and the state of parties is dramatically learned, and the Tale fairly opened. Edward the Fourth had just been placed on the throne; and Warwick the king-maker was in the zenith of his power and popularity.—Like Louis Philippe, and for nearly the same reasons, the cruel and profligate Edward was the King of the Middle Class, then rapidly rising into wealth and political importance. At this weapon-shaw and revel appeared young Nicholas Alwyn, the goldsmith's headman, the symbol of the rising spirit of extending Commerce; and his foster-brother, Marmaduke Nevile, the type of the young cavalier of that age, and a poor kinsman of the powerful Warwick. Both were Northcountry men, and good bowmen and cudgel-players; and their dexterity challenged the admiration of some of the noble spectators of the sports, and excited the envy of the saucy and swaggering London "Prentices." The prize had been awarded to Marmaduke; but Nicholas had come so near to him, that the popular Lord Montagu, the brother of Warwick, proclaimed a new prize for a combat at quarter-staff, which was to be given in the name of the successful archer.

The proclamation was received with a shout that traversed from group to group, and line to line, more hearty from the love and honour attached to the name of Nevile, than even from a sense of the gracious generosity of Earl Warwick's brother. One man alone, a sturdy, well-knit fellow, in a franklin's Lincoln broadcloth, and with a hood half-drawn over his features, did not join the popular applause. "These Yorkists," he muttered, "know well how to fool the people."

This malcontent was Robin Hilyard, a sort of Robin Hood or Rob Roy, who, as the generous and daring leader of a predatory band, acts a stirring part in the story to its close. The gallant victor of the archers, fresh from Westmoreland, uneducated and superstitious, though brave, honest, and manly, had been thrown into consternation by the feats of the dancers and jugglers, when the scene occurred in which the true heroine of the tale is first beheld.

While Marmaduke, bewildered by this various bustle, stared around him, his eye was caught by a young maiden, in evident distress, struggling in vain to extricate herself from a troop of timbrel girls, or tymbesteres, (as they were popularly called,) who surrounded her with mocking gestures, striking their instruments to drown her remonstrances, and dancing about her in a ring at every effort towards escape. The girl was modestly attired, as one of the humbler ranks, and her wimple in much concealed her countenance; but there was, despite her strange and undignified situation and evident alarm, a sort of quiet, earnest self-possession—an effort to hide her terror, and to appeal to the better and more womanly feelings of her persecutors. In the intervals of silence from their clamour, her voice, though low, clear, well-tuned, and impressive, forcibly arrested the attention of young Nevile; for at that day, even more than this, (sufficiently apparent as it now is,) there was a marked distinction in the intonation, the accent, the modulation of voice between the better bred and better educated, and the inferior classes. But this difference, so ill according with her dress and position, only served to heighten the more the bold insolence of the musical Bacchantes, who, indeed, in the eyes of the sober, formed the most immoral nuisance attendant on the sports of the time, and whose hardy license and peculiar sisterhood might tempt the antiquarian to search for their origin amongst the relics of ancient Paganism. And now, to increase the girl's distress, some half-score of dissolute apprentices and journeymen suddenly broke into the ring of the Mænads, and were accosting her with yet more alarming insults, when Marmaduke, pushing them aside, strode to her assistance. "How now, ye lewd varlets! —ye make me blush for my countrymen in the face of day. Are these the sports of merry England—these your manly contests—to strive which can best affront a poor maid? Out on ye, cullions and bezonians! Cling to me, gentle donzell, and fear not. Whither shall I lead thee?"

The apprentices were not, however, so easily daunted. Two of them approached to the rescue, flourishing their bludgeons about their heads with formidable gestures— "Ho, ho!" cried one, "what right hast thou to step between the hunters and the doe? The young quean is too much honoured by a kiss from a bold 'prentice of London."

Marmaduke stepped back, and drew the small dagger which then formed the only habitual weapon of a gentleman. This movement, discomposing his mantle, brought the silver arrow he had won, (which was placed in his girdle) in full view of the assailants. At the same time they caught sight of the badge on his hat. These intimidated their ardour more than the drawn poniard.

"A Nevile!" said one, retreating, "And the jolly marksman who beat Nick Alwyn," said the other, lowering his bludgeon, and doffing his cap. "Gentle sir, forgive us, we knew not your quality. But as for the girl —your gallantry misleads you."

"The Wizard's daughter! ha! ha!—the Imp of Darkness!" screeched the timbrel girls, tossing up their instruments, and catching them again on the points of their fingers. "She has enchanted him with her glamour. Foul is fair! Foul fare thee, young springal, if thou go to the nets. Shadow and goblin to goblin and shadow! Flesh and blood to blood and flesh!"—and dancing round him, with wanton looks and bare arms, and gossamer robes that brushed him as they circled, they chanted—

"Come kiss me, my darling,
Warm kisses I trade for;
Wine, music, and kisses—
What else was life made for!"

With some difficulty, and with a disgust which was not altogether without a superstitious fear of the strange words and the outlandish appearance of these loathsome Dalilahs, Marmaduke broke from the ring with his new charge; and in a few moments the Nevile and the maiden found themselves, unmolested and unpursued, in a deserted quarter of the ground; but still the scream of the timbrel girls, as they hurried, wheeling and dancing, into the distance, was borne ominously to the young man's ear,—"Ha, ha! the witch and her lover! Foul is fair!—foul is fair! Shadow to goblin, goblin to shadow —and the devil will have his own!"

"And what mischance, my poor girl," asked the Nevile, soothingly, "brought thee into such evil company?"

"I know not, fair Sir," said the girl, slowly recovering herself; "but my father is poor; and I had heard that, on these holiday occasions, one who had some slight skill on the gittern might win a few groats from the courtesy of the bystanders. So I stole out with my serving-woman, and had already got more than I dared hope, when those wicked timbrel players came round me, and accused me of taking the money from them. And then they called an officer of the ground, who asked me my name and holding; so when I answered, they called my father a wizard, and the man broke my poor gittern—see!"—and she held it up, with innocent sorrow in her eyes, yet a half smile on her lips—"and they soon drove poor old Madge from my side; and I knew no more, till you, worshipful Sir, took pity on me."

"But why," asked the Nevile, "did they give to your father so unholy a name?"

"Alas, Sir! he is a great scholar, who has spent his means in studying what he says will one day be of good to the people."

"Humph!" said Marmaduke, who had all the superstitions of his time, who looked upon a scholar, unless in the Church, with mingled awe and abhorrence, and who, therefore, was but ill satisfied with the girl's artless answer,—

"Hmmph! your father—but"—checking what he was about, perhaps harshly to say, as he caught the bright eyes and arch intelligent face lifted to his own—"but it is hard to punish the child for the father's errors."

"Errors, Sir!" repeated the damsel, proudly, and with a slight disdain in her face and voice. "But yes, Wisdom is ever, perhaps, the saddest Error!"

This remark was of an order superior in intellect to those which had preceded it: it contrasted with the sternness of experience the simplicity of the child; and of such contrasts, indeed, was that character made up. For with a sweet, an infantine change of tone and countenance, she added, after a short pause—"They took the money!—the gittern,—see, they left that, when they had made it useless."

"I cannot mend the gittern, but I can re-fill the gipsire," said Marmaduke.

The girl coloured deeply. "Nay, Sir, to earn is not to beg."

The pride of the young gallant at last took alarm at the sneers of the passing revellers, who contrasted his gallant appearance with that of the poor girl he escorted, and he said in haste,—

In a dry and altered voice—"My good damsel, you are now, I think, out of danger; it would ill beseem you, so young and so comely, to go further with one not old enough to be your protector; so, in God's name, depart quickly, and remember me when you buy your new gittern—poor child!" So saying, he attempted to place a piece of money in her hand. She put it back, and the coin fell on the ground.

"Nay, this is foolish," said he.

"Alas, Sir!" said the girl, gravely, "I see well that you are ashamed of your goodness. But my father begs not. And once—but that matters not."

"Once what?" persisted Marmaduke, interested in her manner, in spite of himself.

"Once," said the girl, drawing herself up, and with an expression that altered the whole character of her face—"the beggar ate at my father's gate. He is a born gentleman and a knight's son."

"And what reduced him thus?"

"I have said," answered the girl, simply, yet with the same half scorn on her lip that it had before betrayed—"he is a scholar, and thought more of others than himself."

"I never saw any good come to a gentleman from those accursed books," said the Nevile; "fit only for monks and shavelings. But still, for your father's sake, though I am ashamed of the poorness of the gift——"

"No—God be with you, Sir, and reward you." She stopped short, drew her wimple round her face, and was gone. Nevile felt an uncomfortable sensation of remorse and disapproval at having suffered her to quit him while there was yet any chance of molestation or annoyance, and his eye followed her till a group of trees veiled her from his view.

The girl sate down under a distant oak, and wept. Her mental condition is thus finely described:—

In our earlier years, most of us may remember, that there was one day which made an epoch in life—the day that separated Childhood from Youth; for that day seems not to come gradually, but to be a sudden crisis, an abrupt revelation. The buds of the heart open to close no more. Such a day was this in that girl's fate. But the day was not yet gone! That morning, when she dressed for her enterprise of filial love, perhaps for the first time Sybill Warner felt that she was fair—who shall say, whether some innocent, natural vanity had not blended with the deep, devoted earnestness, which saw no shame in the act by which the child could aid the father? Perhaps she might have smiled to listen to old Madge's praises of her winsome face—old Madge's predictions that the face and the gittern would not lack admirers on the gay ground. Perhaps some indistinct, vague forethoughts of the Future, to which the sex will deem itself to be born, might have caused the cheek—no, not to blush, but somewhat to take a rosier hue, and the pulse to beat quicker, she knew not why. At all events, to that ground went the young Sybill, cheerful and almost happy, in her inexperience of actual life, and sure, at least, that youth and innocence sufficed to protect from insult. And now, she sat down under the leafless tree, to weep; and in those bitter tears, childhood itself was laved from her soul for ever.

"What ailest thou, maiden?" asked a deep voice; and she felt a hand laid lightly on her shoulder. She looked up in terror and confusion, but it was no form or face to inspire alarm that met her eye. It was a cavalier, holding by the rein a horse richly caparisoned, and though his dress was plainer and less exaggerated than that usually worn by men of rank, its materials were those which the sumptuary laws (constantly broken, indeed, as such laws ever must be) confined to nobles. Though his surcoat was but of cloth, and the colour dark and sober, it was woven in foreign looms—an unpatriotic luxury, above the degree of knight—and edged deep with the costliest sables. The hilt of the dagger, suspended round his breast, was but of ivory, curiously wrought; but the scabbard was sown with large pearls. For the rest, the stranger was of ordinary stature, well knit, and active rather than powerful, and of that age (about thirty-five) which may be called the second prime of man. His face was far less handsome than Marmaduke Nevile's, but infinitely more expressive, both of intelligence and command; the features straight and sharp, the complexion clear and pale; and under the bright grey eyes a dark shade spoke either of dissipation or of thought.

"What ailest thou, maiden?—weepest thou some faithless lover? Tush! love renews itself in youth, as flower succeeds flower in spring."

Sybill made no reply; she rose, and moved a few paces, then arrested her steps, and looked around her. She had lost all clue to her way homeward, and she saw with horror, in the distance, the hateful timbrel girls, followed by the rabble, and weaving their strange dances towards the spot.

"Dost thou fear me, child? there is no cause," said the stranger, following her. "Again, I say, 'What ailest thou?'"

This time his voice was that of command, and the poor girl involuntarily obeyed it. She related her misfortunes, her persecution by the tymbesteres, her escape—thanks to the Nevile's courtesy—her separation from her attendant, and her uncertainty as to the way she should pursue.

The nobleman listened with interest: he was a man sated and wearied by pleasure and the world, and the evident innocence of Sybill was a novelty to his experience; while the contrast between her language and her dress moved his curiosity. "And," said he, "thy protector left thee, his work half done;—fie on his chivalry! But I, donzell, wear the spurs of knighthood, and to succour the distressed is a duty my oath will not let me swerve from. I will guide thee home, for I know well all the purlieus of this evil den of London. Thou hast but to name the suburb in which thy father dwells."

Sybill involuntarily raised her wimple, lifted her beautiful eyes to the stranger, in bewildered gratitude and surprise.—Her childhood had passed in a court—her eye, accustomed to rank, at once perceived the high degree of the speaker; the contrast between this unexpected and delicate gallantry, and the condescending tone and abrupt desertion of Marmaduke, affected her again to tears.

"Ah, worshipful Sir!" she said, falteringly, "what can reward thee for this unlooked-for goodness?"

"One innocent smile, sweet virgin!—for such, I'll be sworn, thou art."

He did not offer her his hand, but hanging the gold-enamelled rein over his arm, walked by her side; and a few words sufficing for his guidance, led her across the ground, through the very midst of the throng. He felt none of the young shame, the ingenuous scruples of Marmaduke, at the gaze he encountered, thus companioned. But Sybill noted that ever and anon bonnet and cap were raised as they passed along; and the respectful murmur of the vulgar, who had so lately jeered her anguish, taught her the immeasurable distance, in men's esteem, between Poverty shielded but by Virtue, and Poverty protected by Power.

But suddenly a gaudy tinsel group broke through the crowd, and wheeling round their path, the foremost of them daringly approached the nobleman, and looking full into his disdainful face, exclaimed—"Tradest thou, too, for kisses? Ha! ha!—life is short—the witch is outwitched by thee! But witchcraft and death go together, as, peradventure, thou mayest learn at the last, sleek wooer." Then darting off, and heading her painted, tawdry throng, the timbrel girl sprung into the crowd, and vanished. . . . . .

On what hazards turn our fate! On that day—a little, and Sybill's pure, but sensitive heart had, perhaps, been given to the young Nevile. He had defended and saved her; he was fairer than the stranger, he was more of her own years, and nearer to her in station; but in showing himself ashamed to be seen with her, he had galled her heart, and moved the bitter tears of her pride. What had the stranger done? Nothing, but reconciled the wounded delicacy to itself; and suddenly he became to her one ever to be remembered—wondered at—perhaps more. They reached an obscure suburb, and parted at the threshold of a large, gloomy, ruinous house, which Sybill indicated as her father's home.

Leaving the heart-struck girl gazing unconsciously from the porch of her gloomy residence, we turn to another scene, where the Trader and the Gentle, the personifications of social change, hold an animated dialogue, shadowing the bent of the new generation.

"No, my dear foster-brother," said the Nevile, "I do not yet comprehend the choice you have made. You were reared and brought up with such careful book-lere, not only to read and to write—the which, save the mark! I hold to be labour enow—but chop Latin and logic and theology with St. Aristotle (is not that his hard name?) into the bargain, and all because you had an uncle of high note in Holy Church. I cannot say I would be a shaveling myself; but surely a monk, with the hope of preferment, is a nobler calling to a lad of spirit and ambition than to stand out at a door and cry, Buy, buy'—'What d'ye lack'—to spend youth as a Flat-cap, and drone out manhood in measuring cloth, hammering metals, or weighing out spices?"

"Fair and softly, Master Marmaduke," said Alwyn, "you will understand me better anon. My uncle, the sub-prior, died—some say of austerities, others of ale—that matters not; he was a learned man and a cunning. 'Nephew Nicholas,' said he, on his death-bed, 'think twice before you tie yourself up to the cloister; it's ill leaping now-a-days in a sackcloth bag. If a pious man be moved to the cowl by holy devotion, there is nothing to be said on the subject; but if he take to the Church as a calling, and wish to march a-head like his fellows, these times show him a prettier path to distinction. The nobles begin to get the best things for themselves; and a learned monk, if he is the son of a yeomen, cannot hope, without a speciality of grace, to become abbot or bishop. The king, whoever he be, must be so drained by his wars, that he has little land or gold to bestow on his favourites; but his gentry turn an eye to the temporalities of the Church, and the Church and the king wish to strengthen themselves by the gentry. This is not all; there are free opinions afloat. The House of Lancaster has lost ground, by its persecutions and burnings. Men dare not openly resist, but they treasure up recollections of a fried grandfather, or a roasted tenth-cousin; recollections which have done much damage to the Henries, and will shake Holy Church itself one of these days. The Lollards lie hid, but Lollardism will never die. There is a new class rising amain, where a little learning goes a great way, if mixed with spirit and sense. Thou likest broad pieces, and a creditable name—go to London, and be a trader. London begins to decide who shall wear the crown, and the traders to decide what king London shall befriend. Wherefore, cut thy trace from the cloister, and take thy road to the shop.' The next day my uncle gave up the ghost.—They had better clary than this at the convent, I must own. But every stone has its flaw!"

"Yet," said Marmaduke, "if you took distaste to the cowl, from reasons that I pretend not to judge of, but which seem to my poor head very bad ones, seeing that the Church is as mighty as ever, and King Edward is no friend to the Lollards, and that your uncle himself was at least a sub-prior——"

"Had he been son to a baron, he had been a cardinal," interrupted Nicholas, "for his head was the longest that ever came out of the north country. But go on; you would say my father was a sturdy yeoman, and I might have followed his calling."

"You hit the mark, Master Nicholas."

"Hout,—man. I crave pardon of your rank, Master Nevile. But a yeoman is born a yeoman, and he dies a yeoman—I think it better to die Lord Mayor of London; and so I craved my mother's blessing and leave, and a part of the old hyde has been sold to pay for the first step to the red gown, which I need not say must be that of the Flat-cap. I have already taken my degrees, and no longer wear blue. I am head-man to my master, and my master will be sheriff of London."

"It is a pity," said the Nevile, shaking his head; "you were ever a tall, brave lad, and would have made a very pretty soldier."

"Thank you, Master Marmaduke, but I leave cut and thrust to the gentles. I have seen enow of the life of a Retainer. He goes out on foot with his shield and his sword, or his bow and his quiver, while Sir Knight sits on horseback, armed from the crown to the toe, and the arrow slants off from rider and horse, as a stone from a tree. . . . . No, no, there's no liberty, no safety, no getting on, for a man who has no right to the gold spurs, but in the guild of his fellows; and London is the place for a born Saxon, like Nicholas Alwyn."

As the young aspirant thus uttered the sentiments, which, though they might not so plainly avow and shrewdly enforce them, tended towards that slow Revolution, which, under all the stormy events that the superficial record we call History alone deigns to enumerate, was working that great change in the thoughts and habits of the people—that impulsion of the provincials cityward—that gradual formation of a class between knight and vassal—which became first constitutionally visible and distinct in the reign of Henry VII., Marmaduke Nevile, inly half-regretting and half-despising the reasonings of his foster-brother, was playing with his dagger, and glancing at his silver arrow.

"Yet you could still have enow of the tall yeomen and the stout retainer about you to try for this bauble, and to break half-a-dozen thick heads with your quarter-staff!"

"True," said Nicholas; "you must recollect we are only, as yet, between the skin and the selle—half trader, half retainer. The old leaven will out:—'Eith to learn the cat to the kirn,'—as they say in the North. But that's not all; a man, to get on, must win respect from those who are to jostle him hereafter; and it's good policy to show those roystering youngsters that Nick Alwyn, stiff and steady though he be, has the old English metal in him, if it comes to a pinch; it's a lesson to yon lords too, save your quality, if they ever wish to ride roughshod over our guilds and companies. But enow of me—Drawer, another stoup of the clary.

The conclusion was, that Nicholas resolved to stick to his traffic; while, being the better head of the two, he counselled his foster-brother Marmaduke to give up the Lancastrian faction, which was that of the youth's father, and attach himself to the powerful Warwick, who, though now a Yorkist, was the head of the House of Nevile. The sage counsel of the young goldsmith had its due effect with his gentle foster-brother.

"Truly," said Marmaduke, after a short and rather embarrassed pause, "I am little beholden as yet to the House of York. There, where I see a noble benefactor, or a brave and wise leader, shall I think my sword and heart may best proffer allegiance."

"Wisely said," returned Alwyn, with a slight but half-sarcastic smile; "I asked thee the question because—(draw closer)—there are wise men in our city who think the ties between Warwick and the king less strong than a ship's cable. And if thou attachest thyself to Warwick, he will be better pleased, it may be, with talk of devotion to himself, than professions of exclusive loyalty to King Edward. He that has little silver in his pouch, must have the more silk on his tongue. A word to a Westmoreland or a Yorkshire man is as good as a sermon to men not born so far north. One word more, and I have done. Thou art kind, and affable, and gentle, my dear foster-brother; but it will not do for thee to be seen again with the goldsmith's headman. If thou wantest me, send for me at nightfall; I shall be found at Master Heyford's, in the Chepe. And if," added Nicholas, with a prudent reminiscence, "thou succeedest at court, and canst recommend my master—there is no better goldsmith—it may serve me when I set up for myself, which I look to do shortly."

"But, to send for thee, my own foster-brother, at nightfall, as if I were ashamed!"—

"Hout, Master Marmaduke, if thou wert not ashamed of me I should be ashamed to be seen with a gay springal like thee. . . . . Better as it is; after this day's work, they will gossip about both of us, and we shall meet many who know my long visage on the way back. God keep thee, and avise me how thou prosperest."

So saying, Nicholas Alwyn walked off, too delicate to propose to pay his share of the reckoning with a superior. But when he had gone a few paces, he turned back, and accosting the Nevile, as the latter was rebuckling his mantle, said—"I have been thinking, Master Nevile, that these gold nobles, which it has been my luck to bear off, would be more useful in thy gipsire than mine. I have sure gains and small expenses—but a gentleman gains nothing, and his hand must be ever in his pouch—so——"

"Foster-brother!" said Marmaduke, haughtily, "a gentleman never borrows—except of the Jews, and with due interest. Moreover, I too have my calling; and as thy stall to thee, so to me my good sword. God keep thee! Be sure I will serve thee when I can."

"The devil's in these young strips of the herald's tree," muttered Alwyn, as he strode off; "as if it were dishonest to borrow a broad piece without cutting a throat for it! Howbeit, money is a prolific mother; and here is enow to buy me a gold chain against I am Alderman of London. Hout, thus goes the world—the knight's baubles become the alderman's badges—so much the better!"

These are not among the highly-wrought and passionate scenes of the Romance, nor yet of its ambitious delineations; but neither are they least characteristic. In retiring from this convivial meeting, Marmaduke was set upon by a band of ruffians, not the less dangerous that they were soldiers, and partisans of the House of Lancaster. From their merciless attack he was rescued by the opportune appearance of their captain, the redoubted Robin of Redesdale, who, fancying him still alive, carried the wounded youth to an adjoining house, crying, in a sharp clear voice,

"Open, for the love of Christ!"

A head was now thrust from the lattice—the light vanished—a minute more, the door opened; and Robin, as if satisfied, drew hastily back, and vanished—saying to himself, as he strode along, "A young man's life must needs be dear to him; yet, had the lad been a lord, methinks I should have cared little to have saved for the people one tyrant more."

After a long interval, Marmaduke again recovered, and his eyes turned with pain from the glare of a light held to his face.

"He wakes, father!—he will live!" cried a sweet voice.

"Ay, he will live, child!" answered a deeper tone; and the young man muttered to himself half audibly, as in a dream, "Holy Mother be blessed! it is sweet to live!"

The room in which the sufferer lay, rather exhibited the remains of better fortunes than testified to the solid means of the present possessor. The ceiling was high and groined, and some tints of faded, but once gaudy painting, blazoned its compartments and hanging pendants.

But the author has carefully studied the outward shows of the fifteenth century; and, in costume, is, we presume, in all points unimpeachable. The living inmates of that gloomy and dilapidated chamber are of more interest than their clothes or its furniture.

By the bedside stood a personage, who, in reality, was but little past the middle age, but whose pale visage intersected with deep furrows, whose long beard and hair, partially grey, gave him the appearance of advanced age: nevertheless there was something peculiarly striking in the aspect of the man. His forehead was singularly high and massive, but the back of the head was disproportionately small, as if the intellect too much preponderated over all the animal qualities for strength in character and success in life. The eyes were soft, dark, and brilliant, but dreamlike and vague; the features in youth must have been regular and beautiful, but their contour was now sharpened by the hollowness of the cheeks and temples. The form, in the upper part, was nobly shaped, sufficiently muscular, if not powerful, and with the long throat and falling shoulders, which always give something of grace and dignity to the carriage; but it was prematurely bent, and the lower limbs were thin and weak, as is common with men who have sparely used them; they seemed disproportioned to that broad chest, and still more to that magnificent and spacious brow. The dress of this personage corresponded with the aspect of his abode. The materials were those worn by the gentry, but they were old, threadbare, and discoloured with innumerable spots and stains. His hands were small and delicate, with large blue veins, that spoke of relaxed fibres, but their natural whiteness was smudged with smoke-stains, and his beard—a masculine ornament utterly out of fashion among the younger race in King Edward's reign, but when worn by the elder gentry, carefully trimmed and perfumed—was dishevelled into all the spiral and tangled curls, displayed in the sculptured head of some old Grecian sage or poet.

On the other side of the bed, knelt a young girl, of about sixteen, with a face exquisitely lovely in its delicacy and expression. She seemed about the middle stature, and her arms and neck, as displayed by the close-fitting vest, had already the smooth and rounded contour of dawning womanhood, while the face had still the softness, innocence, and inexpressible bloom of the child. There was a strong likeness between her and her father, (for such the relationship,) despite the difference of sex and years—the same beautiful form of lip and brow—the same rare colour of the eyes, dark-blue, with black fringing lashes—and perhaps the common expression, at that moment, of gentle pity and benevolent anxiety contributed to render the resemblance stronger.

"Father, he sinks again!" said the girl.

"Sybill," answered the man, putting his finger upon a line in a manuscript book that he held, "the authority saith, that a patient so contused should lose blood, and then the arm must be tightly bandaged. Verily, we lack the wherewithal."

Old Madge, in times when every woman was somewhat of a leech, and flesh-wounds and broken heads no rare sight in merry England, showed better skill in surgery than the philosopher her master. Marmaduke speedily recovered; and with health came a lusty appetite, which Sybill, in her deep poverty, could only stay by the sale of her chief valuable, her cherished gittern. And the sacrifice was freely made, though her secret thoughts were not of Marmaduke Nevile, young and handsome as he was. While Madge was abroad, selling the instrument, that she might purchase food and wine for the invalid guest with its price, we may look in upon Adam Warner in his den or workshop; for, though he often degenerates into a Dominie Sampson, without the Dominie's pathetic simplicity and consistency of character, the philosopher is somewhat imposing at first; and he should be seen to give full effect to his charming daughter. There is often, too, something impressive and even sublime in the abstracted man's complete and enthusiastic devotion to Science, which lifts him far above the level of the learned Dominie; while surrounded by misery,—steeped to the lips in poverty, the absorbed, solitary student pursues, with unabated ardour, the Idol—Knowledge, which had wrecked him and his. To external circumstances Adam Warner was, indeed, insensible, wrapped up in the glorious idea of his Eureka, as he had fondly named the machine which revealed to him glorious visions of the triumph of mind over matter, and which had already grown beneath his hand, and sprung from his brain into no faint prefigurement of the modern steam-engine, impelling powerful and complicated machinery. Adam Warner's room, the apartment which, with its various equipments, obtained for him the character of a wizard,—

Contained a strong furnace, and a rude laboratory. There were several strange-looking mechanical contrivances scattered about, several manuscripts upon some oaken shelves, and a large panier of wood and charcoal in the corner. In that poverty-stricken house, the money spent on fuel alone, in the height of summer, would have comfortably maintained the inmates; but neither Sybill nor Madge ever thought to murmur at this waste, dedicated to what had become the vital want of a man who drew air in a world of his own. This was the first thing to be provided for; and Science was of more imperative necessity than even Hunger.

Adam Warner was indeed a creature of remarkable genius—and genius, in an age where it is not appreciated, is the greatest curse the iron Fates can inflict on man. . . . . .

In applying mathematics to the practical purposes of life, in seeing its mighty utilities to commerce and civilisation, Adam Warner was driven to conjoin with it, not only an extensive knowledge of languages, but many of the rudest tasks of the mechanist's art; and chemistry was, in some of his researches, summoned to his aid. By degrees, the tyranny that a man's genius exercises over his life, abstracted him from all external objects. He had loved his wife tenderly; but his rapid waste of his fortune in the purchase of instruments and books, then enormously dear, and the neglect of all things not centred in the hope to be the benefactor of the world, had ruined her health and broke her heart. Happily, Warner perceived not her decay till her death. . . . .

. . . . Sybill, at the age of ten, six years before the date the story enters on, and two years prior to the fatal field of Touton, which gave to Edward the throne of England, had been admitted among the young girls whom the custom of the day ranked amidst the attendants of the Queen; and in the interval that elapsed before Margaret was obliged to dismiss her to her home, her mother died. She died without foreseeing the reverses that were to ensue, in the hope that her child, at least, was nobly provided for, and not without the belief (for there is so much faith in love!) that her husband's researches, which, in his youth, had won favour of the Protector-Duke of Gloucester, the most enlightened Prince of his time, would be crowned at last with the rewards and favours of his King. That precise period was, indeed, the fairest that had yet dawned upon the philosopher. Henry the Sixth, slowly recovering from one of those attacks which passed for imbecility, had condescended to amuse himself with various conversations with Warner, urged to it first by representations of the unholy nature of the student's pursuits; and, having satisfied his mind of his learned subject's orthodoxy, the poor Monarch had taken a sort of interest, not so much, perhaps, in the objects of Warner's occupations, as in that complete absorption from actual life which characterized the subject, and gave him in this a melancholy resemblance to the King. While the House of Lancaster was on the throne, the wife felt that her husband's pursuits would be respected, and his harmless life safe from the fierce prejudices of the people; and the good Queen would not suffer him to starve, when the last mark was expended in devices how to benefit his country:—and in these hopes the woman died!

A year afterwards, all at Court was in disorder—armed men supplied the service of young girls, and Sybill, with a purse of broad pieces, soon converted into manuscripts, was sent back to her father's desolate home. There had she grown a flower amidst ruins—with no companion of her own age, and left to bear, as her sweet and affectionate nature well did, the contrast between the luxuries of a court and the penury of a hearth, which, year after year, hunger and want came more and more sensibly to invade.

Sybill had been taught, even as a child, some accomplishments little vouchsafed, then, to either sex—she could read and write; and Margaret had not so wholly lost, in the sterner north, all reminiscence of the accomplishments that graced her father's court, as to neglect the education of those brought up in her household. Much attention was given to music, for it soothed the dark hours of King Henry; the blazoning of missals or the lives of saints, with the labours of the loom, were also among the resources of Sybill's girlhood; and by these last she had, from time to time, served to assist the maintenance of the little family of which, child though she was, she became the actual head. But latterly—that is, for the last few weeks, even these sources failed her; for as more peaceful times allowed her neighbours to interest themselves in the affairs of others, the dark reports against Warner had revived. His name became a by-word of horror—the lonely light at the lattice burning till midnight, against all the early usages and habits of the day—the dark smoke of the furnace, constant in summer as in winter, scandalized the Religion of the Place far and near; and finding, to their great dissatisfaction, that the King's government and the Church interfered not for their protection, and unable themselves to volunteer any charges against the recluse, (for the cows in the neighbourhood remained provokingly healthy,) they came suddenly, and, as it were, by one of those common sympathies which in all times the huge Persecutor we call the PUBLIC manifests, when a victim is to be crushed,—to the pious resolution of starving where they could not burn. Why buy the quaint devilries of the wizard's daughter?—no luck could come of it. A missal blazoned by such hands—an embroidery worked at such a loom, was like the Lord's Prayer read backwards. And one morning, when poor Sybill stole out as usual to vend a month's labour, she was driven from door to door with oaths and curses.

Though Sybill's heart was gentle, she was not without a certain strength of mind. She had much of the patient devotion of her mother, much of the quiet fortitude of her father's nature. If not comprehending to the full the loftiness of Warner's pursuits, she still anticipated from them an ultimate success which reconciled her to all temporary sacrifices. The violent prejudices—the ignorant cruelty, thus brought to bear against existence itself, filled her with sadness, it is true, but not unmixed with that contempt for her persecutors which, even in the meekest tempers, takes the sting from despair. But hunger pressed. Her father was nearing the goal of his discoveries; and in a moment of that pride which in its very contempt for appearances braves them all, Sybill had stolen out to the pastime-ground, with what result has been seen already. Having thus accounted for the penury of the mansion, we return to its owner.

Warner was contemplating with evident complacency and delight the model of a machine which had occupied him for many years, and which he imagined he was now rapidly bringing to perfection. His hands and face were grimed with the smoke of his forge, and his hair and beard, neglected as usual, looked parched and dried up, as if with the constant fever that burned within.

"Yes—yes," he muttered—"How they will bless me for this! What Roger Bacon only suggested I shall accomplish! How it will change the face of the globe! What wealth it will bestow on ages yet unborn!"

"My father," said the gentle voice of Sybill—"my poor father, thou hast not tasted bread to-day."

Warner turned, and his face relaxed into a tender expression as he saw his daughter.

"My child," he said, pointing to his model, "the time comes when it will live! Patience—patience!"

"And who would not have patience with thee, and for thee, father?" said Sybill, with enthusiasm speaking on every feature. What is the valour of knight and soldier—all statues of steel—to thine! Thou, with thy naked breast, confronting all dangers—sharper than the lance and shrive, and all——"

"All to make England great!"

"Alas! what hath England merited from men like thee! The people, more savage than their rulers, clamour for the stake, the gibbet, and the dungeon, for all who strive to make them wiser. Remember the death of Bolingbroke*—a wizard, because, O father!—because his pursuits were thine!"

Even Marmaduke Neville, the guest cherished by his hospitality, suspected the harmless Philosopher of being some species of conjuror or necromancer; an idea which Adam's extraordinary absence of mind and incoherent and unintelligible speeches strongly countenanced. One has heard so many well-authenticated anecdotes of the remarkable absence of mind, and the gross ignorance of common things, of great mathematicians, that Adam Warner cannot be called a caricature; though there may be some question of his adaptation, at all times, to the serious purposes of fiction. He, however, serves to throw forward, in beautiful relief, the lovely and exquisite nature of Sybill; and venerable in himself, from the lofty character of his pursuits and an entire forgetfulness of the selfish and the earthly, he becomes beloved through her. Adam could not tear himself from his own absorbing affairs even to discharge the customary rites of hospitality; and Sybill, when he stole away to his Eureka, tried to cover the unintentional discourtesy by redoubled attention to the young stranger. One day that Adam had mysteriously disappeared unobserved while the young cavalier was in the full career of talk to him of weapons and of war, Marmaduke, missing him, and somewhat alarmed, said—

"I crave pardon for my blindness, gentle damsel, but your father was here anon."

"His mornings are so devoted to labour," answered Sybill, "that he entreats you to pardon his discourtesy. Meanwhile, if you would wish to breathe the air, we have a small garden in the rear;" and so saying, she led the way into the small withdrawing-room, or rather closet, which was her own favourite chamber, and which communicated, by another door, with a broad, neglected grass-plot, surrounded by high walls, having a raised terrace in front, divided by a low stone gothic palisade from the green sward.

On the palisade sate droopingly, and half asleep, a solitary peacock; but when Sybill and the stranger appeared at the door, he woke up suddenly, descended from his height, and with a vanity not wholly unlike his young mistress's wish to make the best possible display in the eyes of a guest—spread his plumes broadly in the sun. Sybill threw him some bread, which she had taken from the table for that purpose; but the proud bird, however hungry, disdained to eat, till he had thoroughly satisfied himself that his glories had been sufficiently observed.

"Poor proud one," said Sybill, half to herself, "thy plumage lasts with thee through all changes."

"Like the name of a brave knight," said Marmaduke, who overheard her.

"Thou thinkest of the career of arms."

"Surely—I am a Nevile!"

"Is there no fame to be won but that of a warrior!"

"Not that I weet of, or heed for, Mistress Sybill."

"Thinkest thou it were nothing to be a minstrel, that gave delight!—a scholar, that dispelled darkness?"

"For the scholar; certes, I respect holy Mother Church, which they tell me alone produces that kind of wonder with full safety to the soul, and that only in the higher prelates and dignitaries. For the minstrel, I love him—I would fight for him—I would give him at need the last penny in my gipsire. But it is better to do deeds than to sing them."

Sybill smiled, and the smile perplexed, and half displeased the young adventurer. But the fire of the young man had its charm.

By degrees, as they walked to and fro on the neglected terrace, their talk flowed free and familiar; for Marmaduke, like most young men, full of himself, was joyous with the happy egotism of a frank and careless nature. He told his young confidante of a day his birth, his history, his hopes and fears; and in return he learned in answer to the questions he addressed to her, so much, at least, of her past and present life—as the reverses of her father, occasioned by costly studies—her own brief sojourn at the court of Margaret—and the solitude, if not the struggles, in which her youth was consumed. It would have been a sweet and grateful sight to some kindly bystander to hear these pleasant communications between two young persons so unfriended, and to imagine that hearts thus opened to each other might unite in one. But Sybill, though she listened to him with interest, and found a certain sympathy in his aspirations, was ever and anon secretly comparing him to one, the charm of whose voice still lingered in her ears; and her intellect, cultivated and acute, detected in Marmaduke the deficient education—and that limited experience, which is the folly and the happiness of the young.

On the other hand, whatever admiration Nevile might conceive, was strangely mixed with surprise, and, it might almost be said, of fear. This girl, with her wise converse and her child's face, was a character so thoroughly new to him. Her language was superior to what he had ever heard, the words more choice, the current more flowing—was that to be attributed to her court-training, or her learned parentage?

"Your father, fair mistress," said he, rousing himself in one of the pauses of their conversation—"your father, then, is a mighty scholar, and I suppose knows Latin like English?"

"Why a hedge priest pretends to know Latin," said Sybill, smiling;" my father is one of the six men living who have learned the Greek and the Hebrew."

"Gramercy!" cried Marmaduke, crossing himself. "That is awsome indeed! He has taught you his lere in the tongues?"

"Nay, I know but my own and the French; my mother was a native of France."

"The Holy Mother be praised!" said Marmaduke, breathing more freely; "for French I have heard my father and uncle say is a language fit for gentles and knights, specially those who come, like the Neviles, from Norman stock.

While still sojourning with the imagined wizard, and his fascinating daughter, for whose spiritual weal Marmaduke became deeply concerned, his foster-brother, the goldsmith, on being apprised by Madge of where he was, came to visit him. To the shrewd and better educated Nicholas he imparted his various trifling calamities and distresses from the robbers and other causes; but these were not the worst.

"I would that were the worst," continued Marmaduke, solemnly, and under his breath; and therewith he repeated to Nicholas the adventure on the pastime-ground, the warnings of the timbrel-girls, and the "awsome" learning and strange pursuits of his host. As for Sybill, he was evidently inclined to attribute to glamour the reluctant admiration with which she had inspired him. "For," said he, "though I deny not that the maid is passing fair, there be many with rosier cheeks, and taller by this hand!"

Nicholas listened, at first, with the peculiar expression of shrewd sarcasm which mainly characterized his intelligent face; but his attention grew more earnest before Marmaduke had concluded.

"In regard to the maiden," said he, smiling and shaking his head, "it is not always the handsomest that win us the most—while fair Meg went a maying, black Mog got to church; and I give thee more reasonable warning than thy timbrel-girls, when, in spite of thy cold language, I bid thee take care of thyself against her attractions; for, verily, my dear foster-brother, thou must mend, and not mar thy fortune, by thy love matters; and keep thy heart whole for some fair one with marks in her gipsire, whom the earl may find out for thee. Love and raw pease are two ill things in the porridge-pot. But, the father!—I mind me now that I have heard of his name, through my friend Master Caxton, the mercer, as one of prodigious skill in the mathematics. I should like much to see him, and, with thy leave, (an' he ask me,) will tarry to supper. But what are these?"—and Nicholas took up one of the illuminated MSS. which Sybill had prepared for sale. "By the blood! this is couthly and marvellously blazoned."

The book was still in his hand when Sybill entered. Nicholas stared at her, as he bowed with a stiff and ungraceful embarrassment, which often at first did injustice to his bold, clear intellect, and his perfect self-possession in matters of trade or importance.

"The first woman face," muttered Nicholas to himself, "I ever saw that had the sense of a man's. And, by the rood, what a smile!"

The MSS. had been illuminated by the dexterous and delicate hands of Sybill.—It was, Nicholas said, "Master-hand—Lord Scales, or the Earl of Worcester, had scarce a finer in their Collections." Sybill was gratified by the young goldsmith's admiration of her handiwork; and forgiving him its espial, invited him, in her father's name, to stay and sup with his friend.

Nicholas bowed low, and still riveted his eyes on the book with such open admiration, that Marmaduke thought it right to excuse his abstraction; but there was something in that admiration which raised the spirits of Sybill; which gave her hope when hope was well-nigh gone; and she became so vivacious, so debonnair, so charming, in the flow of a gaiety natural to her, and very uncommon with English maidens, but which she took partly, perhaps, from her French blood, and partly from the example of girls and maidens of French extraction in Margaret's court, that Nicholas Alwyn thought he had never seen any one so irresistible. Madge having now served the evening meal, put in her head to announce it, and Sybill withdrew to summon her father.

"I trust he will not tarry too long, for I am sharp set," muttered Marmaduke. "What thinkest thou of the damozel?"

"Marry," answered Alwyn, thoughtfully, "I pity and marvel at her. There is enow in her to furnish forth twenty court beauties. But what good can so much wit and cunning do to an honest maiden?"

"That is exactly my own thought," said Marmaduke; and both the young men sunk into silence, till Sybill reentered with her father.

To the surprise of Marmaduke, Nicholas Alwyn, whose less gallant manner he was inclined to ridicule, soon contrived to rouse their host from his lethargy, and to absorb all the notice of Sybill; and the surprise was increased, when he saw that his friend appeared not unfamiliar with those abstruse and mystical sciences in which Adam was engaged.

"What!" said Adam; "you know, then, my deft and worthy friend Master Caxton. He hath seen notable things abroad."

"Which he more than hints," said Nicholas, "will lower the value of those manuscripts this fair damozel has so couthly enriched; and that he hopes, ere long, to show the Englishers how to make fifty, a hundred—nay, even five hundred exemplars of the choicest book, in a much shorter time than a scribe would take in writing out two or three score pages in a single copy."

"Verily," said Marmaduke, with a smile of compassion, "the poor man must be somewhat demented."

Adam becoming excited, spoke of his own invention, as one that would multiply books without hands, works of craft without prentice or journeyman, move wagons and litters without horses, and impel ships without sails!

"But, alack! it is not yet complete, and, for want of means, it never may be."

Sybill still kept her animated countenance fixed on Alwyn, whose intelligence she had already detected, and was charmed with the profound attention with which he listened. But her eye glancing from his sharp features to the handsome, honest face of the Nevile, the contrast was so forcible that she could not restrain her laughter, though, the moment after, a keen pang shot through her heart. The worthy Marmaduke had been in the act of conveying his cup to his lips—the cup stood arrested midway, his jaws dropped, his eyes opened to their widest extent, an expression of the most evident consternation and dismay spoke in every feature, and, when he heard the merry laugh of Sybill, he pushed his stool from her as far as he well could, and surveyed her with a look of mingled fear and pity.

"Alas! thou art sure my poor father is a wizard now!"

"Pardie!" answered the Nevile. "Hath he not said so? Hath he not spoken of wagons without horses—ships without sails? And is not all this what every dissour and jongleur tells us of in his stories of Merlin?"

Is the character of the young candidate for arms and knighthood pushed too far?—is his diverting superstition incredible? We must remember the age in which he lived, and the class to which he belonged, which was neither that of the learned clerks nor merchants, who, between them, engrossed most of the knowledge of the age. Nicholas, with considerable delicacy, offered, at parting, to take charge of the illuminated MSS., with the hope of their advantageous disposal to the Lord Hastings, who was himself a ripe scholar, and an ardent collector of the treasures of literature.

"Master Alwyn," said Sybill, suppressing her tears, "it was for my father's sake that these labours were wrought. We are poor and friendless. Take the manuscripts, and sell them as thou wilt, and God and St. Mary requite thee!"

"Your father is a great man," said Alwyn, after a pause.

"But, were he to walk the streets, they would stone him," replied Sybill, with a quiet bitterness.

Marmaduke commissioned his friend to buy him a gittern—and a brave one—as a parting gift to the damozel who was too proud to take money, and who, moreover, needed it not, as she had a father who could turn his hose into rose nobles, if he lacked gold.——Before Marmaduke Nevile had left his place of shelter, the dwelling was attacked by a furious mob, inflamed by hatred and superstition, and the harmless philosopher was only saved from destruction by the interference and prowess of the ubiquitous Robin Hilyard. The scene between the persecuted philosopher and philanthropist and his devoted child, while he is writhing under an awakened sense of the cruelty and malice of those he laboured but to benefit and bless, is delicately painted; but his solitary ruminations before his Model—his Eureka—"the source of all his bliss and all his woe," are of the deepest pathos. The Model was finally forgiven,—the bitter remembrance of the hootings and peltings of the brutal rabble were forgotten. Adam Warner was again absorbed in his dumb Idol of iron and the element, and Marmaduke Nevile, fast recovering from the effects of his wounds, was falling under the spells of Sybill.

Marmaduke, in the solitude of his confinement, was not proof against the temptation which one so young and so sweetly winning brought to his fancy or his senses. The poor Sybill—she was no faultless paragon—she was a rare and singular mixture of many opposite qualities in heart and in intellect! She was one moment infantine in simplicity and gay playfulness—the next, a shade passed over her bright face, and she uttered some sentence of that bitter and chilling wisdom, which the sense of persecution, the cruelty of the world, had already taught her. She was, indeed, at that age when the Child and the Woman are struggling against each other. Her character was not yet formed—a little happiness would have ripened it at once into the richest bloom of goodness. But sorrow, that ever sharpens the intellect, might only serve to sour the heart. Her mind was so innately chaste and pure, that she knew not the nature of the admiration she excited. But the admiration pleased her as it pleases some young child—she was vain then, but it was an infant's vanity, not a woman's. And thus, from innocence itself, there was a fearlessness, a freedom, a something endearing and familiar in her manner, which might have turned a wiser head than Marmaduke Nevile's. And this the more, because, while liking her young guest, confiding in him, raised in her own esteem by his gallantry, enjoying that intercourse of youth with youth, so unfamiliar to her, and rendering herself the more to its charm from the joy that animated her spirits, in seeing that her father had forgotten his humiliation, and returned to his wonted labours—she yet knew not for the handsome Nevile one sentiment that approached to virgin love. Her mind was so superior to his own, that she felt almost as if older than him, and in their talk, her rosy lips preached to him in grave advice.

A dialogue, full of the character of the speakers, and shadowing the changes of the age, when the middle-class was shrewdly galling the kibes of the gentry—held at the open window, where the convalescent amused himself by watching the lively world beyond—ended thus:—

"Ay!" said the Nevile, "the parings of the gentry begin to be the wealth of the varlets."

"Little ought we to pine at that," returned Sybill, "if the varlets were but gentle with our poverty; but they loathe the humbled fortunes on which they rise, and while slaves to the rich, are tyrants to the poor."

This was said so sadly, that the Nevile felt his eyes overflow; and the humble dress of the girl, the melancholy ridges which evinced the site of a noble house now shrunk into a dismal ruin, the remembrance of the pastime-ground, the insults of the crowd, and the broken gittern, all conspired to move his compassion, and to give force to yet more tender emotions.

"Ah!" he said, suddenly, and with a quick faint blush over his handsome and manly countenance—"ah, fair maid—fair Sybill!—God grant that I may win something of gold and fortune amidst yonder towers, on which the sun shines so cheerly. God grant it, not for my sake—not for mine; but that I may have something besides a true heart and a stainless name to lay at thy feet. Oh, Sybill! By this hand—by my father's soul—I love thee, Sybill! Have I not said it before? Well, hear me now—I love thee!"

As he spoke, he clasped her hand in his own, and she suffered it for one instant to rest in his. Then withdrawing it, and meeting his enamoured eyes, with a strange sadness in her own darker, deeper, and more intelligent orbs, she said—

"I thank thee—thank thee for the honour of such kind thoughts; and frankly I answer as thou hast frankly spoken. It was sweet to me, who have known little in life not hard and bitter—sweet to wish I had a brother like thee, and, as a brother I can love and pray for thee. But ask not more, Marmaduke. I have aims in life which forbid all other love!"

"Art thou too aspiring for one who has his spurs to win?"

"Not so; but listen. My mother's lessons and my own heart have made my poor father the first end and object of all things on earth to me. I live to protect him, work for him, honour him; and for the rest—I have thoughts thou canst not know—an ambition thou canst not feel. Nay," she added, with that delightful smile which chased away the graver thought which had before saddened her aspect, "what would thy sober friend Master Alwyn say to thee, if he heard thou hadst courted the wizard's daughter!"

"By my faith," exclaimed Marmaduke, "thou art a very April—smiles and clouds in a breath! If what thou despisest in me be my want of book-craft, and such like, by my halidame I will turn scholar for thy sake; and——"

Here, as he had again taken Sybill's hand, with the passionate ardour of his bold nature, not to be lightly daunted by a maiden's first "No," a sudden shrill, wild burst of laughter, accompanied with a gusty fit of unmelodious music from the street below, made both maiden and youth start, and turn their eyes: there, weaving their immodest dance, tawdry in their tinsel attire, their naked arms glancing above their heads, as they waved on high their instruments, went the timbrel girls.

"Ha! ha!" cried their leader, "see the gallant and the witch-leman! The glamour has done its work! Foul is fair!—foul is fair! and the devil will have his own!"

But these creatures, whose bold license the ancient chronicler records, were rarely seen alone. They haunted parties of pomp and pleasure; they linked together the extremes of life—the grotesque Chorus that introduced the terrible truth of foul Vice and abandoned Wretchedness in the midst of the World's Holiday and Pageant.

. . . . . Suddenly, as the company, two by two, paced up the street, Sybill uttered a faint exclamation, and strove to snatch her hand from the Nevile's grasp. Her eye rested upon one of the horsemen who rode last, and who seemed in earnest conversation with a dame, who, though scarcely in her first youth, excelled all her fair companions in beauty of face, and grace of horsemanship, as well as in the costly equipments of the white barb that caracoled beneath her easy hand. At the same moment the horseman looked up and gazed steadily at Sybill, whose countenance grew pale, and flushed in a breath. His eye then glanced rapidly at Marmaduke—a half-smile passed his pale firm lips; he slightly raised the plumed cap from his brow—inclined gravely to Sybill—and, turning once more to his companion, appeared to answer some question she addressed to him, as to the object of his salutation; for her look, which was proud, keen, and lofty, was raised to Sybill, and then dropped somewhat disdainfully, as she listened to the words addressed her by the cavalier.

The lynx eyes of the tymbesteres had seen the recognition; and their leader, laying her bold hand on the embossed bridle of the horseman, exclaimed, in a voice shrill and loud enough to be heard in the balcony above, "Largess! noble lord, largess! for the sake of the lady thou lovest best!"

The fair equestrian turned away her head at these words, the nobleman watched her a moment, and dropped some coins into the timbrel.

"Ha! ha!" cried the tymbestere, pointing her long arm to Sybill, and springing towards the balcony—

"The cushat would mate
Above her state,
And she flutters her wings round the falcon's beak;
But death to the dove
Is the falcon's love—
Oh, sharp is the kiss of the falcon's beak!"

Before this rude song was ended, Sybill had vanished from the place; the cavalcade had disappeared. The timbrel-players, without deigning to notice Marmaduke, darted elsewhere to ply their discordant trade, and the Nevile, crossing himself devoutly, muttered, "Jesu defend us! Those she Will-o'-the-wisps are enow to scare all the blood out of one's body. What—a murrain on them!—do they portend, flitting round and round, and skirring off, as if the devil's broomstick was behind them! By the mass! they have frighted away the damozel, and I am not sorry for it. They have left me small heart for the part of Sir Launval."

His meditations were broken off by the sudden sight of Nicholas Alwyn, mounted on a small palfrey, and followed by a sturdy groom on horseback, leading a steed handsomely caparisoned. In another moment, Marmaduke had descended—opened the door—and drawn Alwyn into the hall.

The cavalier recognised by Sybill was the Lord Hastings; and when Nicholas wished to communicate the success of his commission, "Mistress Sybill" was ill, and unable to see him.

Alwyn looked disconcerted at this intelligence, but, drawing from his girdle a small gipsire, richly broidered, he prayed Madge to deliver it to her young mistress, and inform her that it was the fruit of the commission with which she had honoured him. "It is passing strange," said he, pacing the hall alone, "passing strange, that the poor child should have taken such hold on me. After all, she would be a bad wife for a plain man like me. Tush! that is the trader's thought all over. Have I brought no fresher feeling out of my fair village-green? Would it not be sweet to work for her, and rise in life, with her by my side? And these girls of the city—so prim and so brainless!—as well marry a painted puppet. Sybill! Am I dement! Stark wode! What have I to do with girls and marriage! Humph! I marvel what Marmaduke still thinks of her—and she of him."

And thus ends the First Book, with a view of Adam Warner in full career on his Eureka; the hideous aspect of which alarmed Marmaduke far more than becomes a gallant soldier. The Second Book introduces the reader to the court of Edward the Fourth and to the puissant King-maker. The character of Warwick, if less original,—for, with slight artistic embellishments, he is the Warwick of history,—is better sustained, because more consistent, than that of the Philosopher, alternately a divinity and an imbecile. Marmaduke Nevile had now found a patron in Warwick, and at his first interview we see the powerful Baron in the midst of his family, playfully conversing with his beautiful daughters; and learn the secret springs of his public conduct, and of his changing feelings towards Edward. Magnanimous, frank, liberal, of the most engaging manners and generous temper, we also learn the secret of Warwick's universal popularity. The scenes at the court of the luxurious and profligate Edward, if not so pleasing, are even more skilfully depicted; save that the character of that comely and good-sort-of-a-woman, the Queen—Elizabeth Woodville, is, we opine, unduly lowered. Yet why should we expect imaginative writers to keep free from unconscious prepossessions, when philosophers, writing history five centuries after the events, will incline, some to the House of York, and others to that of Lancaster,—ay, even those among the sage chroniclers who might be expected to say, "a plague o' both your houses!" Let us, in our turn, confess a preconceived dislike to the very gentle and charming creature whom Sir E. Bulwer presents to us as Anne Nevile, Warwick's youngest daughter; conceived, probably, from the same facile Anne of Shakspere,—the same Anne who, when the widow of the murdered Prince Edward, yields so easily to the flattery and cozening of Richard the Third. There is no getting rid of such feelings. Readers are not Judges, not cold abstractions of impartiality, any more than are historians. It is probably from some feeling of this nature that we fancy the young Duke of Glo'ster, the future Richard the Third, painted in this romance in fairer colours than either history or Shakspere warrants. Upon the outline of Richard the author has evidently bestowed great pains. His Richard, however, is of a much earlier date than Shakspere's, though the elements and tendencies of his dark, ambitious, and remorseless character are already beginning to be developed.

We cannot give the faintest idea of the dramatic developement of the character of the principal personage,—of Warwick,—in his mixed moods of generous ire and irritated tenderness. The hot and high-spirited chief, to whom the interests of Edward were precious, at the close of a long political discussion with the king preferred the claim of his new retainer and kinsman, Marmaduke Nevile, for a place at court, and had been taunted with his protégé being the son of a Lancastrian. He retorted,—

"I should have remembered me that his name of Nevile would have procured him a taunt in the place of advancement."

"Saw man ever so froward a temper!" cried Edward, not without reason. "Why, Warwick, thou art as shrewish to a jest as a woman to advice. Thy kinsman's fortunes shall be my care. Thou sayest thou hast enemies—I weet not who they be. But to show what I think of them, I make thy namesake and client a gentleman of my chamber. When Warwick is false to Edward, let him think Warwick's kinsman wears a dagger within reach of the King's heart day and night."

This speech was made with so noble and touching a kindness of voice and manner, that the Earl, thoroughly subdued, looked at his sovereign with moistened eyes, and only trusting himself to say—"Edward, thou art king, knight, gentleman, and soldier; and I verily trow that I love thee best when my petulant zeal makes me anger thee most,"—turned away with evident emotion, and passing the queen and her ladies with a lowlier homage than that with which he had before greeted them, left the garden. Edward's eye followed him, musingly. The frank expression of his face vanished, and, with the deep breath of a man who is throwing a weight from his heart, he muttered—"He loves me—yes; but will suffer no one else to love me. This must end some day. I weary of the bondage." And sauntering towards the ladies, he listened in silence, but not apparently in displeasure, to his queen's sharp sayings on the imperious mood and irritable temper of the iron-handed builder of his throne.

The solitary cell of the student, for the sake of the affectionate maiden who ministered to him in the holy relation of his only and devoted child, has, however, far more attraction than the glittering scenes of the court. Though Sybill had rejected the proferred love of her father's young guest, the scene at his departure,—his abrupt change of tone, his broken words and confusion, so soon succeeding his passionate declaration,—had deeply wounded her pride, "that pride of woman which never sleeps till modesty is gone," and which will long lingeringly survive the claims of woman to respect.

But this made the least cause of the profound humiliation which bowed down her spirit. The meaning taunt, conveyed in the rhyme of the tymbesteres, pierced her to the quick; the calm indifferent smile of the stranger, as he regarded her; the beauty of the dame he attended, woke mingled and contrary feelings, but those of jealousy were, perhaps, the keenest; and in the midst of all she started to ask herself—if indeed she had suffered her vain thoughts to dwell too tenderly upon one from whom the vast inequalities of human life must divide her evermore.—What to her was his indifference? Nothing—yet had she given worlds to banish that careless smile from her remembrance.

Shrinking, at last, from the tyranny of thoughts till of late unknown, her eye rested upon the gipsire [purse or pouch] which Alwyn had sent her by the old servant. The sight restored to her the holy recollection of her father, the sweet joy of having ministered to his wants. She put up the little treasure, intending to devote it all to Warner; and, after bathing her heavy eyes, that no sorrow of hers might afflict the student, she passed, with a listless step, into her father's chamber.

There is, to the quick and mercurial spirits of the young, something of marvellous and preternatural in that life within life, which the strong passion of science and genius forms and feeds—that passion so much stronger than love, and so much more self-dependent—which asks no sympathy, leans on no kindred heart—which lives alone in its works and fancies, like a god amidst His creations. . . . . Sybill seated herself abstractedly on a heap of fagots, piled in the corner, and seemed busy in framing characters on the dusty floor with the point of her tiny slipper. So fresh, and fair, and young she seemed, in that mirky atmosphere, that strange scene, and beside that worn man, that it might have seemed to a poet as if the youngest of the Graces were come to visit Mulciber at his forge.

The man pursued his work—the girl renewed her dreams—the dark evening hour gradually stealing over both. The silence was unbroken; for the forge and the model were now at rest, save by the grating of Adam's file upon the metal, or by some ejaculation of complacency now and then vented by the Enthusiast. So, apart from the many-noised, gaudy, babbling world without, even in the midst of that bloody, turbulent, and semi-barbarous time, went on (the one neglected and unknown, the other loathed and hated) the two movers of the ALL that continues the airy life of the Beautiful from age to age—the Woman's dreaming Fancy, and the Man's active Genius.

For two or three days nothing disturbed the outward monotony of the Recluse's household. Apparently all had settled back as before the advent of the young cavalier. But Sybill's voice was not heard singing, as of old, when she passed the stairs to her father's room. She sate with him in his work, no less frequently and regularly than before; but her childish spirits no longer broke forth in idle talk or petulant movement, vexing the good man from his absorption and his toils. The little cares and anxieties, which had formerly made up so much of Sybill's day, by forethought of provision for the morrow, were suspended; for the money transmitted to her by Alwyn, in return for the emblazoned MSS., was sufficient to supply their modest wants for months to come. Adam, more and more engrossed in his labours, did not appear to perceive the daintier plenty of his board, nor the purchase of some small comforts unknown for years. He only said, one morning—"It is strange, girl, that as that gathers in life, (and he pointed to the model,) it seems already to provide, to my phantasy, the luxuries it will one day give to us all in truth. Methought my very bed last night seemed wondrous easy, and the coverings were warmer, for I woke not with the cold!"

"Ah!" thought the sweet daughter, smiling through moist eyes—"while my cares can smooth thy barren path through life, why should I cark and pine!"

Their solitude was now occasionally broken in the evenings by the visits of Nicholas Alwyn. The young goldsmith was himself not ignorant of the simpler mathematics; he had some talent for invention, and took pleasure in the construction of horologes, though, properly speaking, not a part of his trade. His excuse for his visits was the wish to profit by Warner's mechanical knowledge; but the student was so wrapt in his own pursuits, that he gave but little instruction to his visiter. Nevertheless, Alwyn was satisfied, for he saw Sybill. He saw her in the most attractive phase of her character—the loving, patient, devoted daughter, and the view of her household virtues affected more and more his honest English heart. But, ever awkward and embarrassed, he gave no vent to his feelings. To Sybill he spoke little, and with formal constraint; and the girl, unconscious of her conquest, was little less indifferent to his visits than her abstracted father.

But Warner's dwelling had other visiters:—thither came Robin Hilyard, who had been Adam's school-fellow in happier days,—widely as their paths had since lain asunder. His tale—the events which had made him a wretched, a desperate, and lawless man—is as truthful an illustration of the character of that age of civil wars and rebellions as anything to be found in the romance. It was thus that he told his sad tale to his school-fellow—

"Thou knowest, peradventure, that my race dates from an elder date than these Norman nobles, who boast their robber-fathers. From the renowned Saxon Thane, who, free of hand and of cheer, won the name of Hildegardis, our family took its rise. But under these Norman Barons, we sank with the nation to which we belonged. Still were we called gentlemen, and still were dubbed knights. But, as I grew up to man's estate, I felt myself more Saxon than gentleman, and, as one of a subject and vassal race, I was a Son of the Saxon People. My father, like thee, was a man of thought and bookcraft. I dare own to thee, that he was a Lollard, and with the religion of those bold foes to priest-vice, goes a spirit that asks why the people should be evermore the spoil and prey of lords and kings. Early in my youth, my father, fearing rack and fagot in England, sought refuge in the Hanse Town of Lubeck. There I learned grave truths—how liberty can be won and guarded. Later in life I saw the Republics of Italy, and I asked why they were so glorious in all the arts and craft of civil life, while the braver men of France and England seemed as savages by the side of the Florentine burgess, nay, the Lombard vine-dresser. I saw that, even when those republics fell a victim to some tyrant or podesta, their men still preserved rights and uttered thoughts which left them more free and more great than the Commons of England, after all their boasted wars. I came back to my native land and settled in the North, as my franklin ancestry before me. The broad lands of my forefathers were devolved on the elder line, and gave a Knight's fee to Sir Robert Hilyard, who fell afterwards at Touton for the Lancastrians. But I had won gold in the far countree, and I took farm and homestead near Lord Warwick's tower of Middleham. The feud between Lancaster and York broke forth; Earl Warwick summoned his retainers, myself amongst them, since I lived upon his land; I sought the great Earl, and I told him boldly—him whom the Commons deemed a friend, and a foe to all malfaisance and abuse—I told him that the war he asked me to join seemed to me but a war of ambitious Lords, and that I saw not how the Commons were to be bettered, let who would be King. The Earl listened and deigned to reason; and when he saw I was not convinced, he left me to my will; for he is a noble chief, and I admired even his angry pride, when he said, 'Let no man fight for Warwick whose heart beats not in his cause.' I lived afterwards to discharge my debt to the proud Earl, and show him how even the lion may be meshed, and how even the mouse may gnaw the net. But to my own tragedy. So I quitted those parts, for I feared my own resolution near so great a man: I made a new home not far from the City of York. So, Adam, when all the land around bristled with pike and gisarme, and while my own cousin and namesake, the head of my house, was winning laurels and wasting blood—I, thy quarrelsome, fighting friend—lived at home in peace with my wife and child, for I was now married, and wife and child were dear to me—and tilled my lands. But in peace I was active and astir, for my words inflamed the bosoms of labourers and peasants, and many of them, benighted as they were, thought with me. One day—I was absent from home, selling my grain in the marts of York—one day there entered the village a young captain, a boy-chief, Edward earl of March, beating for recruits. Dost thou heed me, Adam? Well, man—well, the peasants stood aloof from tromp and banner, and they answered, to all the talk of hire and fame, 'Robin Hilyard tells us we have nothing to gain but blows—leave us to hew and to delve.' Oh! Adam, this boy—this chief—the Earl of March, now crowned King Edward, made but one reply—'This Robin Hilyard must be a wise man— show me his house.' They pointed out the ricks, the barns, the homestead, and in five minutes all —all were in flames. 'Tell the hilding, when he returns, that thus Edward of March, fair to friends, and terrible to foes, rewards the coward who disaffects the men of Yorkshire from their chief.' And by the blazing rafters, and the pale faces of the silent crowd, he rode on his way to battle and the throne!"

Hilyard paused, and the anguish of his countenance was terrible to behold.

"I returned to find a heap of ashes—I returned to find my wife a maniac—I returned to find my child—my boy—great God!—he had run to hide himself, in terror at the torches and the grim men—they had failed to discover him, till, too late, his shrieks, amidst the crashing walls, burst on his mother's ear;—and the scorched, mangled, lifeless corpse, lay on that mother's bosom!"

Adam rose; his figure was transformed—not the stooping student, but the knight-descended man, seemed to tower in the mirky chamber; his hands felt at his side, as for a sword; he stifled a curse, and Hilyard, in that suppressed low voice which evinces a strong mind in deep emotion, continued his tale.

"Thank the Mother of our God, the mother of the dead died too! Behold me, a lonely, ruined, wifeless, childless wretch! I made all the world my foe! The old love of liberty (alone left me) became a crime; I plunged into the gloom of the forest, a robber-chief, sparing—no, never—never—never!—one York captain —one spurred knight—one belted lord! But the Poor, my Saxon countrymen, they had suffered, and were safe!

"One dark twilight—thou hast heard the tale—every village minstrel sets it to his viol—a majestic woman—a hunted fugitive—crossed my path; she led a boy in her hand, a year or so younger than my murdured child. 'Friend!' said the woman, fearlessly, 'save the son of your King: I am Margaret queen of England!' I saved them both. From that hour, the robber-chief, the free Republican, the Lollard's son, became a Queen's friend. Here opened, at least, vengeance against the fell destroyer."

In this, as in other instances, the author has skilfully availed himself of actual events. Queen Margaret and her son thus threw themselves upon the generosity of a free-booter; and Adam Warner has a prototype in Stacey and Bolingbroke—learned men persecuted to death as necromancers. Partly through his generous natural feelings, and also from his strong desire to obtain gold to carry out his great discovery to perfection, the simple philosopher was tempted, by his friend Robin of Redesdale, to become the medium of intelligence between Henry VI., then languishing in the prison of the Tower, and Queen Margaret and the Lancastrian party; of which Robin was the indefatigable agent, for he believed that, with the triumph of this party, the popular interest was identified. It was contrived that the Eureka should be introduced into the prison as if to amuse the royal captive, who had heard of the wonderful invention; and in its intricate chimneys and tubes the written communications to Henry were to be secreted. This purpose Hilyard prevailed on the philosopher to conceal from Sybill, whose pity was strongly moved by the idea of the late-haughty Margaret of Anjou now desolate and subdued, and languishing for tidings of the health of the unfortunate husband she had once despised. When Robin had laid his plan before Sybill in the light which he desired her to view it, he farther entreated her personal aid;—

"Wilt thou so far aid the charitable work as to seek the Lord Hastings, and crave the necessary license! Thou seest that thy father has wayward and abstract moods; he might forget that Henry of Windsor is no longer king, and might give him that title in speaking to Lord Hastings—a slip of the tongue which the law styles treason."

"Certes," said Sybill, quickly, "if my father would seek the poor captive, I will be his messenger to my Lord Hastings. But oh, Sir! as thou hast known my father's boyhood, and as thou hopest for mercy in the last day, tempt to no danger one so guileless!"

Hilyard winced.

But he had gained his object; and now the devoted maiden is before the man who was to be her fate:—before the accomplished Hastings. On the character of Hastings his emblazoner has bestowed elaborate pains, which, as the man to whom Sybill gave the rich treasure of her virgin love, he was artistically bound to do. Yet he has not succeeded in commending this happy combination of the "courtier and the scholar" to the affections of the reader—well-adapted as the mingled character and conflicting passions of Hastings are to the purposes of the fictionist. Assuming much of the character of the Hastings of the romance to be ideal—the pure creation of the artist, which it indubitably is,—those who look to the moral tendencies of works of fiction will, in this delineation, find more to cavil at, than in all the other personages put together. They may fancy that they have a right to demand, why did Sybill love this man? and there is no answer ready, save the very unsatisfactory one,—to them, at least,

> "Why did she love him? Curious fool, be still:
> Is human love the growth of human will?"

Hastings, moreover, is, in his own age, but a type of the Pelhams of our times. With his great capacities as a soldier and statesman, we are told, were united "modest and manly manners," and those simple, unostentatious tastes which make men popular with the lowly, and welcome to the great. "But, in that day, a certain mixture of vice was necessary to success, and Hastings wounded no self-love by the assumption of unfashionable purism." And no such assumption was required; the vice was genuine, though,—

Profligacy, with Hastings, had the excuse of ardent passions: he had loved deeply, and unhappily, in his earlier youth, and he gave into the dissipation of the time with the restless eagerness common to strong and active natures when the heart is not at ease; and under all the light fascination of his converse, or the dissipation of his life, lurked the melancholic temperament of a man worthy of nobler things. Nor was the courtly vice of the libertine the only drawback to the virtuous character assigned to Hastings by Comines. His experience of men had taught him something of the disdain of the cynic, and he scrupled not at serving his pleasures or his ambition by means which his loftier nature could not excuse to his clear sense. Still, however, the world, which had deteriorated, could not harden him. Few persons so able acted so frequently from impulse; the impulses were, for the most part, affectionate and generous: but then came the regrets of caution and experience; and Hastings summoned his intellect to correct the movement of his heart—in other words, reflection sought to undo what impulse had suggested. Though so successful a gallant, he had not acquired the ruthless egotism of the sensualist; and his conduct to women often evinced the weakness of giddy youth rather than the cold deliberation of profligate manhood. Thus in his veriest vices there was a spurious amiability—a seductive charm; while in the graver affairs of life, the intellectual susceptibility of his nature served but to quicken his penetration and stimulate his energies; and Hastings might have said, with one of his Italian contemporaries,—"That in subjection to the influences of Women he had learned the government of Men." . . . . . Hastings was alone in the apartments assigned to him in the Tower, when his page, with a peculiar smile, announced to him the visit of a young donzell, who would not impart her business to his attendants.

The accomplished Chamberlain looked up somewhat impatiently from the beautiful MS., enriched with the silver verse of Petrarch, which lay open on his table, and, after muttering to himself—"It is only Edward to whom the face of a woman never is unwelcome," bade the page admit the visiter.

The damsel entered, and the door closed upon her.

"Be not alarmed, maiden," said Hastings, touched by the downcast bend of the hooded countenance, and the unmistakable and timid modesty of his visiter's bearing. "What hast thou to say to me?"

At the sound of his voice Sybill Warner started, and uttered a faint exclamation. The stranger of the pastime-ground was before her. Instinctively she drew the wimple yet more closely round her face, and laid her hand upon the bolt of the door as in the impulse of retreat.

The nobleman's curiosity was roused. He looked again and earnestly on the form that seemed to shrink from his gaze; then rising slowly, he advanced, and laid his hand on her arm—"Donzell, I recognise thee," he said, in a voice that sounded cold and stern—"what service wouldst thou ask me to render thee? Speak! Nay! I pray thee, speak."

"Indeed, good my lord," said Sybill, conquering her confusion; and, lifting her wimple, her dark-blue eyes met those bent on her, with fearless truth and innocence. "I knew not, and you will believe me—I knew not till this moment that I had such cause for gratitude to the Lord Hastings. I sought you but on the behalf of my father, Master Adam Warner, who would fain have the permission accorded to other scholars, to see the Lord Henry of Windsor, who was gracious to him in other days, and to while the duress of that princely captive with the show of a quaint instrument he has invented."

"Doubtless," answered Hastings, who deserved his character (rare in that day) for humanity and mildness—"doubtless it will pleasure me, nor offend his Grace the King, to show all courtesy and indulgence to the unhappy gentleman and lord, whom the weal of England condemns us to hold incarcerate. I have heard of thy father, maiden, an honest and simple man, in whom we need not fear a conspirator; and of thee, young mistress, I have heard also, since we parted."

"Of me, noble Sir?"

"Of thee," said Hastings, with a smile; and, placing a seat for her, he took from the table an illuminated MS. "I have to thank thy friend, Master Alwyn, for procuring me this treasure!"

"What, my lord!" said Sybill, and her eyes glistened, "were you—you the—the——"

"The fortunate person whom Alwyn has enriched at so slight a cost. Yes. Do not grudge me my good fortune in this. Thou hast nobler treasures, methinks, to bestow on another!"

"My good lord!"

"Nay, I must not distress thee. And the young gentleman has a fair face; may it bespeak a true heart!"

These words gave Sybill an emotion of strange delight. They seemed spoken sadly—they seemed to betoken a jealous sorrow—they awoke the strange, wayward, woman-feeling, which is pleased at the pain that betrays the woman's influence: the girl's rosy lips smiled maliciously. Hastings watched her, and her face was so radiant with that rare gleam of secret happiness—so fresh, so young, so pure, and withal so arch and captivating, that hackneyed and jaded as he was in the vulgar pursuit of pleasure, the sight moved better and tenderer feelings than those of the sensualist. "Yes," he muttered to himself, "there are some toys it were a sin to sport with and cast away amidst the broken rubbish of gone passions!"

He turned to the table, and wrote the order of admission to Henry's prison; and as he gave it to Sybill, he said, "Thy young gallant, I see, is at the Court now. It is a perilous ordeal, and especially to one for whom the name of Nevile opens the road to advancement and honour. Men learn betimes in courts to forsake Love for Plutus, and many a wealthy lord would give his heiress to the poorest gentleman who claims kindred to the Earl of Salisbury and Warwick."

"May my father's guest so prosper," answered Sybill, "for he seems of loyal heart and gentle nature!"

"Thou art unselfish, sweet mistress," said Hastings; and, surprised by her careless tone, he paused a moment, "or art thou, in truth, indifferent? Saw I not thy hand in his, when even those loathly tymbesteres chanted warning to thee for loving, not above thy merits, but, alas, it may be, above thy fortunes!"

Sybill's delight increased. Oh, then, he had not applied that hateful warning to himself! He guessed not her secret. She blushed; and the blush was so chaste and maidenly, while the smile that went with it was so ineffably animated and joyous, that Hastings exclaimed, with unaffected admiration, "Surely, fair donzell, Petrarch dreamed of thee, when he spoke of the woman-blush and the angel-smile of Laura. Woe to the man who would injure thee. Farewell! I would not see thee too often, unless I saw thee ever."

He lifted her hand to his lips, with a chivalrous aspect, as he spoke, opened the door, and called his page to attend her to the gates.

Sybill was more flattered by the abrupt dismissal than if he had knelt to detain her. How different seemed the world as her light step wended homeward!

With his own creations, and in the private life of all his personages, the artist, as he has the right, deals as it pleases him; while in public affairs he never outrages, and, in general, follows, almost literally, the current of history, and adheres to those broad outlines of character, which historians have transmitted, though he has his favourites, and his likings and dislikes. His portraiture of Edward IV. is as much too favourable, as that of his Queen, Elizabeth, is unjust. Again we must leave to casuists and moralists the question of whether unbridled lust, or the intemperance of the table, be the worst vice in a Prince. Our author considers gross epicurism the more destructive. But with all these, and other debasing vices, Edward —what we cannot well comprehend—is represented as thoroughly—

The cavalier, deeply imbued with the romance of chivalry, and, while making the absolute woman his plaything, always treating the ideal woman as a goddess. A refined gallantry—a deferential courtesy to dame and demoiselle—united the language of an Amadis with the licentiousness of a gaoler; and a far more alluring contrast than the court of Charles II. presented to the grim Commonwealth, seduced the vulgar in that of this most brave and most beautiful prince, when compared with the mournful and lugubrious circles in which Henry VI. had reigned and prayed.

Adam Warner and his Eureka, in the meanwhile, were, in virtue of the warrant of Hastings, admitted to the captive Henry, and the object of Robin of Redesdale was thus far accomplished. It is now that the future Richard the Third, then the youthful Duke of Glo'ster, and his minion, Catesby, are brought forward. Richard's shrewd suspicions pointed to something so near the truth, that the Philosopher was brought into imminent peril. Even after his infernal machine had happily exploded, and put in danger the whole of the frightened court, the doubts of Richard remained, and, left alone with Warner and his Iron Idol, the poor Student was menaced with the rack, unless he revealed what he had, in fact, wholly forgotten—the secret purpose of his errand to King Henry, and the place in which the papers were concealed. While in this extremity, a retainer of Robin Hilyard, who had carried the machine, luckily escaped, and informed his captain, who took the bold resolution of at once throwing the Lancastrian party upon the generosity of Hastings, the favourite and High Chamberlain of Edward of York. While Adam Warner was employed in his important mission, Sybill, in order to be as near him as possible, was directed, by Robin Hilyard, to remain with the noble and widowed Dame of Longueville, a zealous adherent of Margaret of Anjou, although, in her impoverished widowhood, fain to accept the kindness of Hastings, who had been enriched with the confiscated estates of her husband. In this noble lady Sybill did not, at first sight, recognise one who had been kind to her in childhood, when at the court of Margaret. —The scene is sweet in itself, and it helps on the main interest of the plot;—the destiny of Sybill.

The old lady looked up from her embroidery-frame, as Sybill sate musing on a stool before her; she scanned the maiden with a wistful and somewhat melancholy eye.

"Fair girl," she said, breaking a silence that had lasted for some moments, "it seems to me that I have seen thy face before. Wert thou never in Queen Margaret's court?"

"In childhood—yes, lady."

"Do you not remember me, the Dame of Longueville?"

Sybill started in surprise, and gazed long before she recognised the features of her hostess; for the Dame of Longueville had been still, when Sybill was a child at the court, renowned for matronly beauty, and the change was greater than the lapse of years could account for. The lady smiled sadly: "Yes, you marvel to see me thus bent and faded. Maiden, I lost my husband at the battle of St. Alban's, and my three sons in the field of Towton. My lands and my wealth have been confiscated to enrich new men; and to one of them—one of the enemies of the only king Alice de Longueville will acknowledge, I owe the food for my board, and the roof for my head. Do you marvel now that I am so changed?"

Sybill rose and kissed the lady's hand, and the tear that sparkled on its surface was her only answer.

"I learn," said the Dame of Longueville, "that your father has an order from the Lord Hastings to see King Henry. I trust that he will rest here as he returns, to tell me how the monarch-saint bears his afflictions. But I know: his example should console us all." She paused a moment, and resumed: "Sees your father much of the Lord Hastings?"

"He never saw him that I weet of," answered Sybill, blushing; "the order was given, but as of usual form to a learned scholar."

"But given to whom?" persisted the lady.

"To—to me," replied Sybill, falteringly.

The Dame of Longueville smiled.

"Ah, Hastings could scarcely say no to a prayer from such rosy lips. But let me not imply aught to disparage his humane and gracious heart. To Lord Hastings, next to God and His saints, I owe all that is left to me on earth. Strange, that he is not yet here. . . . .

While Sybill, with enchanted sense, was listening to the praise of Hastings, a low knock at the door was succeeded by the entrance of that nobleman himself. Not to Elizabeth, in the Alcoves of Shene, or on the dais of the palace hall, did the graceful courtier bend with more respectful reverence than to the powerless widow, whose very bread was his alms; for the true high-breeding of chivalry exists not without delicacy of feeling, formed originally by warmth of heart; and, though the warmth may lose its glow, the delicacy endures; as the steel, that acquires through heat its polish, retains its lustre, even when the shine but betrays the hardness.

"And how fares my noble lady of Longueville? But need I ask? for her cheek still wears the rose of Lancaster. A companion? Ha! Mistress Warner, I learn now how much pleasure exists in surprise!"

"My young visiter," said the dame, "is but an old friend; she was one of the child-maidens reared at the court of Queen Margaret."

"In sooth!" exclaimed Hastings; and then, in an altered tone, he added, "but I should have guessed so much grace had not come all from nature. And your father is gone to see the Lord Henry, and you rest, here, his return? Ah, noble lady, may you harbour always such innocent Lancastrians."

The fascination of this eminent person's voice and manner was such, that it soon restored Sybill to the ease she had lost at his sudden entrance. He conversed gaily with the old dame upon such matters of court anecdote as, in all the changes of state, were still welcome to one so long accustomed to court air; but from time to time he addressed himself to Sybill, and provoked replies which startled herself—for she was not yet well aware of her own gifts—by their spirit and intelligence.

The prolonged conversation, the entire scene, deepened in the young heart of Sybill the impression already received from Hastings, with whom she was brought into more frequent contact, from her father and his beloved Eureka being received into the household of the Duchess of Bedford, the mother of Edward's Queen. The Duchess, who dabbled or believed in the transmutation of metals, and who kept a certain Friar Burgey as a domestic chaplain of the Black Art, had conceived a vast opinion of the supernatural powers of Warner, from having been present when his machine so critically exploded at the moment when its creator had been menaced by the Duke of Glo'ster: which the wily and stately dame imputed not to accident, but to the influence and bidding of its potent master. Warner was beyond measure elated with the royal patronage which promised gold for the completion of his invention; but he remembered that he had a child,—and Sybill, in order to secure her father as an alchymist, was received as a waiting-damsel into the household of the Duchess, to whom Marmaduke Nevile was now a page. A change had also taken place in the fortunes of Nicholas Alwyn the shrewd young goldsmith; who, no longer the headman of another, came to court, to display his own gems and trinkets for the temptation of the ladies; and who was as deeply versed in the policy and foreign and domestic intrigues of the time, as ever a courtier among them. On one of Alwyn's business-errands, he made his way into the laboratory in which Adam Warner was hard at the new, and, to him, hateful work of attempting to change copper into gold. The philosopher—would not the monomaniac be the fitter appellation for one living on the narrow isthmus which divides Genius from Madness?—had completely forgotten the goldsmith, whom he mistook for some gentleman of the court, who had stood by when Glo'ster had menaced him with the rack, and his Eureka with destruction.

"I am not a gentleman," said Nicholas; "and I should have been loth to stand idly by when the torture was talked of, for a free-born Englishman, let alone a scholar. And where is your fair daughter, Master Warner? I suppose you see but little of her now she is the great dame's waiting-damsel?"

"And why so, Master Alwyn?" asked a charming voice; and Alwyn, for the first time, perceived the young form of Sybill, by the embrasure of a window, from which might be seen in the court below, a gay group of lords and courtiers, with the plain, dark dress of Hastings, contrasting their gaudy surcoats, glittering with cloth of gold. Alwyn's tongue clove to his mouth; all he had to say was forgotten in a certain bashful and indescribable emotion.

The alchymist had returned to his furnace, and the young man and the girl were as much alone as if Adam Warner had been in heaven.

"And why should the daughter forsake the sire more in a court, where love is rare, than in the humbler home, where they may need each other less?"

"I thank thee for the rebuke, mistress," said Alwyn, delighted with her speech; "for I should have been sorry to see thy heart spoiled by the vanities that kill most natures." Scarcely had he uttered these words, than they seemed to him over-bold and presuming; for his eye now took in the great change of which Marmaduke had spoken. Sybill's dress beseemed the new rank which she held: the corset, fringed with gold, and made of the finest thread, showed the exquisite contour of the throat and neck, whose ivory it concealed. The kirtle of rich blue became the fair complexion and dark chestnut hair; and over all she wore that most graceful robe called the sasquenie. . . . . She looked as if born to the air of courts; still modest, indeed, and simple—but with a consciousness of dignity, and almost of power; and, in fact, the Woman had been taught the power that Womanhood possesses. She had been admired, followed, flattered; she had learned the Authority of Beauty. Her accomplishments, uncommon in that age among her sex, had aided her charm of person: her natural pride, which, though hitherto latent, was high and ardent, fed her heart with sweet hopes—a bright career seemed to extend before her; and, at peace as to her father's safety—relieved from the drudging cares of poverty—her fancy was free to follow the phantasms of sanguine youth through the airy land of dreams. And therefore it was that the maid was changed.

At the sight of the delicate beauty—the self-possessed expression—the courtly dress—the noble air of Sybill—Nicholas Alwyn recoiled, and turned pale—he no longer marvelled at her rejection of Marmaduke, and he started at the remembrance of the bold thoughts, when recalling her poor and friendless, he had dared himself to indulge.

The girl smiled at the young man's confusion.

"It is not prosperity that spoils the heart," she said, touchingly, "unless it be mean, indeed. Thou remembereest, Master Alwyn, that when God tried his saint, it was by adversity and affliction."

"May thy trial in these last be over!" answered Alwyn. "But the humble must console their state by thinking that the great have their trials too; and, as our homely adage hath it, 'That is not always good in the maw which is sweet in the mouth.' Thou seest much of my gentle foster-brother, Mistress Sybill?"

"But in the court dances, Master Alwyn; for most of the hours in which my Lady Duchess needs me are spent here. Oh, my father hopes great things! and now at last fame dawns upon him."

"I rejoice to hear it, mistress; and so, having paid ye both my homage, I take my leave, praying that I may visit you from time to time, if it be only to consult this worshipful Master, touching certain improvements in the Horologe, in which his mathematics can doubtless instruct me—Farewell. I have some jewels to show to the Lady of Bonville."

"The Lady of Bonville!" repeated Sybill, changing colour; "she is a dame of notable loveliness."

"So men say—and mated to a foolish lord; but scandal, which spares few, breathes not on her—rare praise for a court dame. Few houses can have the boast of Lord Warwick's—'that all the men are without fear, and all the women without stain.'"

"It is said," observed Sybill, looking down, "that my Lord Hastings once much affectioned the Lady Bonville. Hast thou heard such gossip?"

"Surely, yes: in the city we hear all the tales of the Court; for many a courtier, following King Edward's exemplar, dines with the citizen to-day, that he may borrow gold from the citizen to-morrow. Surely, yes; and hence, they say, the small love the wise Hastings bears to the stout Earl."

"How runs the tale? Be seated, Master Alwyn."

"Marry, thus: when William Hastings was but a squire, and much favoured by Richard duke of York, he lifted his eyes to the Lady Katherine Nevile, sister to the Earl of Warwick; and in beauty and in dower, as in birth, a mate for a king's son."

"And, doubtless, the Lady Katherine returned his love?"

"So it is said, maiden; and the Earl of Salisbury her father, and Lord Warwick her brother, discovered the secret, and swore that no New Man, (the stout Earl's favourite word of contempt,) though he were made a duke, should give to an upstart posterity the quarterings of Montagu and Nevile. . . . . Duke Richard sent Hastings to Ireland, and a month after, the Lady Katherine married Lord Bonville's son and heir—so, at least, tell the gossips and sing the ballad-mongers Men add, that Lord Hastings still loves the dame, though, certes, he knows how to console himself."

"Loves her! Nay, nay—I trow not," answered Sybill, in a low voice, and with a curl of her dewy lip.

At this moment the door opened gently, and Lord Hastings himself entered. He came in with the familiarity of one accustomed to the place.

"And how fares the grand secret, Master Warner?—Sweet mistress! thou seemest lovelier to me in this dark chamber than outshining all in the galliard. Ha! Master Alwyn, I owe thee many thanks for making me know first the rare arts of this fair emblazoner. Move me yon stool, good Alwyn."

As the goldsmith obeyed, he glanced from Hastings to the blushing face and heaving bosom of Sybill, and a deep and exquisite pang shot through his heart. It was not jealousy alone; it was anxiety, compassion, terror. The powerful Hastings,—the ambitious lord,—the accomplished libertine,—what a fate for poor Sybill, if for such a man the cheek blushed, and the bosom heaved!

"Well, Master Warner," resumed Hastings, "thou art still silent as to thy progress."

The philosopher uttered an impatient groan.

"Ah, I comprehend. The gold-maker must not speak of his craft before the goldsmith. Good Alwyn, thou mayest retire. All arts have their mysteries."

Alwyn, with a sombre brow, moved to the door.

"In sooth," he said, "I have over-tarried, good my lord. The Lady Bonville will chide me; for she is of no patient temper."

"Bridle thy tongue, artisan, and begone!" said Hastings, with unusual haughtiness and petulance.

"I stung him there," muttered Alwyn, as he withdrew. "Oh! fool that I was to—nay, I thought it never, I did but dream it. What wonder we traders hate these silken lords. They reap, we sow,—they trifle, we toil,—they steal with soft words into the hearts which—Oh! Marmaduke, thou art right,—right!—Stout men sit not down to weep beneath the willow. But she,—the poor maiden!—she looked so haught and so happy. This is early May; will she wear that look when the autumn leaves are strewn?"

At a court revel, Hastings, piqued by the haughty coldness of the Lady Bonville, so openly paid homage to her lovely rival, that the enchanted Sybill began to dream she might yet be esteemed no unworthy mate of the "new lord." Many political intrigues were now afloat. The fickle Edward was alienated from Warwick, who chafed at the ingratitude of the king whom he had made; and fiercely vowed to stand, at all hazards, by his Order, which Edward wished to curb and control. These scenes are effective; but they change, and we see the Last of the Barons in his ancestral halls, and rural England in the middle ages. This is a charming division of the romance; but from all these things, the descriptions of the growing dissensions of the nobles, and the account of those causes which led to the destruction of the potent Warwick, and the total ruin of the house of Lancaster, we are drawn by the gentle Sybill, and by the two "world-betterers," the Philosopher, and the Man of the People, Robin of Redesdale. Neither of them were one step nearer the grand object at which he aimed, after the conflict of years; and they now stood gazing on each other, half in sympathy, and half in contempt.

Adam toiled on, but the gold came not, nor did the neglected Eureka advance to perfection. He longed to escape from the court, and from his bondage. The thrall of the Duchess of Bedford was sick at heart. Premature age and disease were stealing on him. One calm and genial day, his daughter led him to the ramparts of the fortress-palace.

The father and child seated themselves on the parapet, and saw, below, the gay and numerous vessels that glided over the sparkling river, while the dark walls of Baynard's castle, the adjoining bulwark and battlements of Montfichet, and the tall watch-tower of Warwick's mighty mansion, frowned, in the distance, against the soft blue sky.

"There," said Adam, quietly, and pointing to the feudal roofs, "there seems to rise Power—and yonder, (glancing to the river,)—yonder seems to flow Genius! A century or so hence, the walls shall vanish, but the river shall roll on. Man makes the castle, and founds the power—God forms the river, and creates the genius. And yet, Sybill, there may be streams as broad and stately as yonder Thames, that flow afar in the waste, never seen, never heard by man. What profits the river unmarked?—what the genius never to be known?"

It was not a common thing with Adam Warner to be thus eloquent. Usually silent and absorbed, it was not his gift to moralize or declaim. His soul must be deeply moved before the profound and buried sentiment within it could escape into words.

Sybill pressed her father's hand, and, though her own heart was very heavy, she forced her lips to smile, and her voice to soothe. Adam interrupted her.

"Child, child, ye women know not what presses darkest and most bitterly on the minds of men. You know not what it is to form out of immaterial things some abstract but glorious object—to worship—to serve it—to sacrifice to it as on an altar, youth, health, hope, life—and suddenly, in old age, to see that the idol was a phantom, a mockery, a shadow laughing us to scorn, because we have sought to clasp it."

"Oh yes, father, women have known that illusion."

"What! Do they study?"

"No, father, but they feel!"

"Feel! I comprehend thee not."

"As man's genius to him, is women's heart to her," answered Sybill, her dark and deep eyes suffused with tears. "Doth not the heart create—invent? Doth it not dream? Doth it not form its idol out of air? Goeth it not forth into the Future, to prophesy to itself? And, sooner or later, in age or youth, doth it not wake itself at last, and see how it hath wasted its all on follies? Yes, father, my heart can answer, when thy genius would complain."

"Sybill," said Warner, roused, and surprised, and gazing on her wistfully, "time flies apace. Till this hour I have thought of thee but as a child—an infant. Thy words disturb me now."

"Think not of them, then. Let me never add one grief to thine."

"Thou art brave and gay in thy silken sheen," said Adam, curiously stroking down the rich, smooth stuff of Sybill's tunic; "her Grace the Duchess is generous to us. Thou art surely happy here!"

"Happy!"

"Not happy!" exclaimed Adam, almost joyfully, "wouldst thou that we were back once more in our desolate ruined home?"

"Yes, oh yes!—but rather away, far away, in some quiet village, some green nook; for the desolate ruined home was not safe for thine old age."

"I would we could escape, Sybill," said Adam, earnestly, in a whisper, and with a kind of innocent cunning in his eye, "we and the poor Eureka! The palace is a prison-house to me. I will speak to the Lord Hastings, a man of great excellence, and gentle too. He is ever kind to us."

"No, no, father, not to him," cried Sybill, turning pale,—"let him not know a word of what we would purpose, or whither we would fly."

"Child, he loves me, or why does he seek me so often, and sit and talk not?"

Sybill pressed her clasped hands tightly to her bosom, but made no answer. . . . . .

Wherefore is Sybill sad? Some short months since, and we beheld her gay with hope, and basking in the sunny atmosphere of pleasure and of love. The mind of this girl was a singular combination of tenderness and pride—the first wholly natural, the last the result of circumstance and position. She was keenly conscious of her gentle birth, and her earlier prospects in the court of Margaret; and the poverty and distress and solitude in which she had grown up from the Child into the Woman, had only served to strengthen what, in her nature, was already strong, and to heighten whatever was already proud. Ever in her youngest dreams of the Future, ambition had visibly blent itself with the vague ideas of love. The imagined wooer was less to be young and fair, than renowned and stately. She viewed him through the mists of the Future, as the protector of her persecuted father—as the rebuilder of a fallen House—as the ennobler of a humbled name. And from the moment in which her girl's heart beat at the voice of Hastings, the ideal of her soul seemed found. And when, transplanted to the Court, she learned to judge of her native grace and loveliness, by the common admiration they excited, her hopes grew justified to her inexperienced reason. Often and ever the words of Hastings, at the house of the Lady Longueville, rang in her ear, and thrilled through the solitude of night—"Whoever is fair and chaste, gentle and loving, is, in the eyes of William de Hastings, the mate and equal of a king." In visits that she had found opportunity to make to the Lady Longueville, these hopes were duly fed; for the old Lancastrian detested the Lady Bonville, as Lord Warwick's sister. . . . . .

But more, far more than Lady Longueville's assurances, did the delicate and unceasing gallantries of Hastings himself flatter the fond faith of Sybill. True, that he spoke not actually of love, but every look implied, every whisper seemed to betray it. And to her he spoke as to an equal, not in birth alone, but in mind; so superior was she in culture, in natural gifts, and, above all, in that train of high thought, and elevated sentiment, in which genius ever finds a sympathy, to the court-flutterers of her sex, that Hastings, whether or not he cherished a warmer feeling, might well take pleasure in her converse, and feel the lovely infant worthy the wise man's trust. He spoke to her without reserve of the Lady Bonville, and he spoke with bitterness. "I loved her," he said, "as woman is rarely loved. She deserted me for another—rather should she have gone to the convent than the altar: and now, forsooth, she deems she hath the right to taunt and to rate me, to dictate to me the way I should walk, and to flaunt the honours I have won."

"May that be no sign of a yet tender interest?" said Sybill, timidly.

The eyes of Hastings sparkled for a moment, but the gleam vanished. "Nay, you know her not. Her heart is marble, as hard and as cold. Her very virtue but the absence of emotion—I would say of gentler emotion—for, God wot, such emotions as come from ire and pride and scorn, are the daily growth of that stern soil. Oh, happy was my escape!—happy the desertion, which my young folly deemed a curse. No!" he added, with a sarcastic quiver of his lip—"No; what stings and galls the Lady of Harrington and Bonville—what makes her countenance change in my presence, and her voice sharpen at my accost, is plainly this: in wedding her dull lord, and rejecting me, Katharine Nevile deemed she wedded power, and rank, and station; and now, while we are both young, how proves her choice!" . . . . . And if, in the heat and passion that such words betrayed, Sybill sighed to think that something of the old remembrance yet swelled and burned, they but impressed her more with the value of a heart, in which the characters once writ endured so long,—and roused her to a tender ambition to heal and to console.

Then looking into her own deep soul, Sybill beheld there a fund of such generous, pure, and noble affection—such reverence as to the fame—such love as to the man, that she proudly felt herself worthier of Hastings than the haughty Katherine.

But why was Sybill sad?

But few months had elapsed, ere Sybill's fabric of hope fell to the dust. For Hastings spoke for the first time of love—for the first time knelt at her feet—for the first time, clasping to his heart that virgin hand, poured forth the protestation and the vow. And oh! —woe—woe! for the first time she learned how cheaply the great man held the poor maiden's love; how little he deemed that purity and genius and affection equalled the possessor of fame and wealth and power; for plainly visible, boldly shown and spoken, the love that she had foreseen as a glory from the Heaven, sought but to humble her to the dust.

The anguish of that moment was unspeakable—and she spoke it not. But as she broke from the profaning clasp, as escaping to the threshold, she cast on the unworthy wooer one look of such reproachful sorrow, as told at once all her love and all her horror—the first act in the eternal tragedy of man's wrong and woman's grief was closed. And therefore was Sybill sad.

But Hastings came again, and was again forgiven; nor would he permit the simple philosopher to leave the court, to which Anne Nevile, the younger daughter of Warwick, had lately come, on a visit to the Queen, and as a pledge of the reconciliation of the Last of the Barons with Edward.

For the defection of Warwick from Edward IV., many of the causes of which remain involved in obscurity, Sir E. Bulwer has found or imagined a reason, for which, however, there is some foundation in the contemporary chronicles. The unprincipled and licentious Edward is represented as having attempted the honour of the daughter of his noble friend. Whatever the fact may have been, the tradition affords dramatic scope to the fictionist.——When both were children at the court of Margaret of Anjou, and when Warwick was still a zealous Lancastrian, the gentle Anne Nevile had dearly loved the little Sybill, and the affection was warmly renewed, when the young girls again met. On the first night that the foul passion of Edward led him stealthily to the chamber of his innocent guest, Anne was found asleep in the arms of her friend Sybill; and the enraged and baffled ravisher withdrew ere he had been detected, vowing revenge on the wizard and his child. But another night came—

King Edward feasted high, and Sybill sate in her father's chamber—she silent with thought of love, Adam silent in the toils of science. The Eureka was well-nigh finished—rising from its ruins, more perfect, more elaborate, than before. Maiden and Scholar, each seeming near to the cherished goal—to the one Love's genial Altar, to the other Fame's lonely shrine.

Evening advanced—night began—night deepened. King Edward's feast was over, but still in his perfumed chamber the wine sparkled in the golden cup. . . .

The night deepened still—the wine is drained in King Edward's goblet—King Edward has left his chamber—and Sybill, entreating her father, but in vain, to suspend his toil, has kissed the damps from his brow, and is about to retire to her neighbouring room. She has turned to the threshold, when,—hark!—a faint, a distant cry, a woman's shriek, the noise of a clapping door! The voice—it is the voice of Anne! Sybill passed the threshold—she is in the corridor—the winter moon shines through the open arches—the air is white and cold with frost. Suddenly the door at the farther end is thrown wide open, a form rushes into the corridor, it passes Sybill, halts, turns round—"Oh, Sybill!" cried the Lady Anne, in a voice wild with horror, "save me—aid—help! Merciful heaven, the King!"

Instinctively, wonderingly, tremblingly, Sybill drew Anne into the chamber she had just quitted, and as they gained its shelter—as Anne sunk upon the floor, the gleam of cloth of gold flashed through the dim atmosphere, and Edward, yet in the royal robe in which he had dazzled all eyes at his kingly feast, stood within the chamber. His splendid countenance was agitated with passion, and its clear hues flushed red with wine. At his entrance, Anne sprang from the floor, and rushed to Warner, who in dumb bewilderment, had suspended his task, and stood before the Eureka, from which steamed and rushed the dark rapid smoke, while round and round, labouring and groaning, rolled its fairy wheels.

"Sir," cried Anne, clinging to him convulsively, "you are a father—by your child's soul, protect Lord Warwick's daughter!"

Roused from his abstraction by this appeal, the poor scholar wound his arm round the form thus clinging to him, and raising his head with dignity, replied, "Thy name, youth, and sex protect thee!"

"Unhand that lady, vile sorcerer," exclaimed the King—"I am her protector. Come, Anne, sweet Anne, fair lady—thou mistakest—come!" he whispered. "Expose not to these low natures matter for guesses that but shame thee. Let thy King and cousin lead thee back to thy sweet rest."

He sought, though gently, to loosen the arms that wound themselves round the old man; but Anne, not heeding, not listening, distracted by a terror that seemed to shake her whole frame, and to threaten her very reason, continued to cry out loudly upon her father's name—her great father, wakeful, then, for the baffled ravisher's tottering throne!

Edward had still sufficient possession of his reason to be alarmed lest some loiterer or sentry in the outer court might hear the cries which his attempts to soothe but the more provoked. Grinding his teeth, and losing patience, he said to Adam, "Thou knowest me, friend—I am thy King. Since the Lady Anne, in her bewilderment, prefers thine aid to mine, help to bear her back to her apartment; and thou, young mistress, lend thine arm. This Wizard's den is no fit chamber for our high-born guest."

"No, no; drive me not hence, Master Warner. That man—that King—give me not up to his—his ——"

"Beware!" exclaimed the King.

It was not till now that Adam's simple mind comprehended the true cause of Anne's alarm, which Sybill still conjectured not, but stood trembling by her friend's side, and close to her father.

"Do not fear, maiden," said Adam Warner, laying his hand upon the loosened locks that swept over his bosom; "for though I am old and feeble, God and his angels are in every spot where Virtue trembles and resists. My Lord King, thy sceptre extends not over a human soul!"

"Dotard, prate not to me!" said Edward, laying his hand on his dagger.

Sybill saw the movement, and instinctively placed herself between her father and the King. That slight form, those pure, steadfast eyes, those features, noble at once and delicate, recalled to Edward the awe which had seized him in his first dark design; and again that awe came over him. He retreated.

"I mean harm to none," said he, almost submissively; "and if I am so unhappy as to scare with my presence the Lady Anne, I will retire, praying you, damsell, to see to her state, and lead her back to her chamber when it so pleases herself. Saying this much, I command you, old man, and you, maiden, to stand back while I but address one sentence to the Lady Anne."

With these words he gently advanced to Anne, and took her hand; but, snatching it from him, the poor lady broke from Adam, rushed to the casement, opened it, and seeing some figures indistinct and distant in the court below, she called out, in a voice of such sharp agony, that it struck remorse and even terror into Edward's soul.

"Alas!" he muttered, "she will not listen to me, her mind is distraught! What frenzy has been mine! Pardon—pardon, Anne—oh, pardon!"

Adam Warner laid his hand on the King's arm, and he drew the imperious despot away as easily as a nurse leads a docile child.

"King!" said the brave old man, "may God pardon thee! for if the last evil hath been wrought upon this noble lady, David sinned not more heavily than thou."

"She is pure—inviolate—I swear it!" said the King, humbly. "Anne, only say that I am forgiven."

But Anne spoke not; her eyes were fixed—her lips had fallen—she was insensible as a corpse—dumb and frozen with her ineffable dread.

In a chapter headed "The Lover and the Gallant. Woman's choice," the lover is found to be honest, sagacious, manly, and true-hearted Nicholas Alwyn, the Trader; the gallant, the "woman's choice," is Lord Hastings. Why should it have been so? Let Hastings state the reason, and let women judge of it:—

"Thou canst not succeed, man, nor couldst if William Hastings had never lived. The eyes of women, accustomed to gaze on the gorgeous externals of the world, are blinded to plain worth like thine. It might have been different had the donzell never abided in a palace; but, as it is, brave fellow, learn how these wounds of the heart scar over, and the spot becomes hard and callous evermore. What art thou, Master Nicholas Alwyn, (continued Hastings, gloomily, and with a withering smile,) what art thou, to ask for a bliss denied to me—to all of us—the bliss of carrying poetry into life—youth into manhood, by winning—the FIRST LOVE? But think not, Sir Lover, that I say this in jealousy or disparagement. Look yonder, by the leafless elm, the white robe of Sybill Warner. Go and plead thy suit."

"Do I understand you, my Lord?" said Alwyn, somewhat confused and perplexed by the tone and the manner Hastings adopted. "Does report err, and you do not love this maiden?"

"Fair Master," returned Hastings, scornfully, "thou hast no right that I trow of, to pry into my thoughts and secrets; I cannot acknowledge my judge in thee, good jeweller and goldsmith—enough, surely, in all courtesy, that I yield thee the precedence. Tell thy tale, as movingly, if thou wilt, as thou hast told it to me; say of me all that thou fanciest thou hast reason to suspect; and if, Master Alwyn, thou woo and win the lady, fail not to ask me to thy wedding!"

There was in this speech, and the bearing of the speaker, that superb levity, that inexpressible and conscious superiority,—that cold ironical tranquillity—which awe and humble men more than grave disdain or imperious passion. Alwyn ground his teeth as he listened, and gazed in silent despair and rage upon the calm Lord. Neither of these men could strictly be called handsome. Of the two, Alwyn had the advantage of more youthful prime, of a taller stature, of a more powerful, though less supple and graceful, frame.

It should have been said, that on this day Lord Hastings had sought an interview with Sybill, to say for ever—farewell. His "honour," his worldly prospects, presented insuperable difficulties to the prosecution of the humble love, "rashly expressed but not deeply felt." Could Sybill have overheard the discourse which led to the approach of the goldsmith, let us hope, for the honour of womanhood, that the "woman's choice," had not been the gallant. While revolving how he might best say farewell to the humble trysted maiden, who was already waiting his coming, Hastings had been thus accosted by the goldsmith.

"My lord, may I make bold to ask, for a few moments, your charitable indulgence to words you may deem presumptuous."

"Be brief, then, Master Alwyn—I am waited for."

"Alas, my lord, I can guess by whom!—by the one whom I seek myself—by Sybill Warner!"

"How, Sir Goldsmith!" said Hastings, haughtily, —"what knowest thou of my movements, and what care I for thine!"

"Hearken, my Lord Hastings—hearken!" said Al-

wyn, repressing his resentment, and in a voice so earnest that it riveted the entire attention of the listener—"and judge not as noble judges craftsman, but as man should judge man. As the saw saith, 'We all lie alike in our graves.' From the first moment I saw this Sybill Warner I loved her. Yes; smile disdainfully, but listen still. She was obscure and in distress. I loved her not for her fair looks alone—I loved her for her good gifts, for her patient industry, for her filial duty, for her struggles to give bread to her father's beard. I did not say to myself, 'This girl will make a comely fere—a delicate paramour!' I said, 'This good daughter will make a wife whom an honest man may take to his heart and cherish.'" Poor Alwyn stopped, with tears in his voice, struggled with his emotions, and pursued: "My fortunes were more promising than hers; there was no cause why I might not hope. True, I had a rival then, young as myself—better born—comelier; but she loved him not. I foresaw that his love for her—if love it were—would cease. Methought that her mind would understand mine; as mine—verily I say it—yearned for hers! I could not look on the maidens of mine own rank, and who lived around me, but what—Oh, no, my lord, again I say, not the beauty, but the gifts, the mind, the heart of Sybill, threw them all into the shade. You may think it strange that I—a plain, steadfast, trading, working, careful man—should have all these feelings; but I will tell you wherefore such as I sometimes have them, nurse them, brood on them, more than you lords and gentlemen, with all your graceful arts in pleasing. We know no light loves! no brief distractions to the one arch passion! We sober sons of the stall and the ware are no general gallants—we love plainly, we love but once, and we love heartily. But who knows not the proverb, 'What's a gentleman but his pleasure?'—and what's pleasure but change? When Sybill came to the palace, I soon heard her name linked with yours; I saw her cheek blush when you spoke. Well—well—well! after all, as the old wives tell us, 'blushing is virtue's livery.' I said, 'She is a chaste and high-hearted girl.' This will pass, and the time will come when she can compare your love and mine. Now, my lord, the time is come—I know that you seek her. Yea, at this moment, I know that her heart beats for your footstep. Say but one word—say that you love Sybill Warner with the thought of wedding her—say that, on your honour, noble Hastings, as gentleman and peer, and I will kneel at your feet, and beg your pardon for my vain follies, and go back to my ware, and work, and not repine. Say it! You are silent! Then I implore you, still as peer and gentleman, to let the honest love save the maiden from the wooing that will blight her peace and blast her name! And now, Lord Hastings, I wait your gracious answer."

The sensations experienced by Hastings, as Alwyn thus concluded, were manifold and complicated; but at the first, admiration and pity were the strongest.

"My poor friend," said he, kindly, "if you thus love a demoiselle deserving all my reverence, your words and your thoughts bespeak you no unworthy pretender; but take my counsel, good Alwyn. Come not—thou from the Chepe—come not to the Court for a wife. Forget this phantasy."

"My Lord, it is impossible! Forget, I cannot—regret, I may."

It has already been shown how the haughty noble, the proud gallant, too conscious of his own power, sent the humbler suitor to try his fortunes—to "plead his suit." And eloquently Alwyn pleaded it.——The first embarrassments over—"Look—look, Sybill!" he said,

Pointing to Hastings—"look! that man you believe loves you!—if so—if he loved thee, would he stand yonder—mark him—aloof, contemptuous, careless—while he knew that I was by your side!" . . . .

Never was wooing more strangely circumstanced than this—the one lover pleading while the other was in view—the one, ardent, impassioned; the other, calm and passive—and the silence of the last, alas! having all the success which the words of the other lacked. It might be said that the choice before Sybill was a type of the choice ever given, but in vain, to the Child of Genius. Here a secure and peaceful life—an honoured home—a tranquil lot, free from ideal visions, it is true, but free also from the doubt and the terror—the storms of passion;—there the fatal influence of an affection, born of imagination, sinister, equivocal, ominous, but irresistible. And the Child of Genius fulfilled her destiny!

"Master Alwyn," said Sybill, rousing herself to the necessary exertion, "I shall never cease gratefully to recall thy generous friendship—never cease to pray fervently for thy weal below. But for ever and for ever let this content thee—I can no more."

Impressed by the grave and solemn tone of Sybill, Alwyn hushed the groan that struggled to his lips, and gloomily replied—"I obey you, fair mistress, and I return to my work-day life; but ere I go, I pray you misthink me not if I say this much;—not alone for the bliss of hoping for a day in which I might call thee mine have I thus importuned—but, not less—I swear not less—from the soul's desire to save thee from what I fear will but lead to woe and wayment, to peril and pain, to weary days and sleepless nights. 'Better a little fire that warms than a great that burns.' Dost thou think that Lord Hastings, the vain, the dissolute——"

"Cease, Sir!" said Sybill, proudly; "me reprove if thou wilt, but lower not my esteem for thee by slander against another!"

"What!" said Alwyn, bitterly; "doth even one word of counsel chafe thee? I tell thee that if thou dreamest that Lord Hastings loves Sybill Warner as man loves the maiden he would wed,—thou deceivest thyself to thine own misery. If thou wouldst prove it, go to him now—go and say, 'Wilt thou give me that home of peace and honour—that shelter for my father's old age under a son's roof which the trader I despise proffers me in vain?'"

"If it were already proffered me—by him?" said Sybill, in a low voice, and blushing deeply.

Alwyn started. "Then I wronged him; and—and——" he added, generously, though with a faint sickness at his heart, "I can yet be happy in thinking thou art so. Farewell, Lady, the saints guard thee from one memory of regret at what hath passed between us!"

Hastings did not forego his purpose in seeking this meeting; but he had no heart to utter it. The stroke came full soon. The now widowed Lady Bonville, to whom the memory of early and baffled love, and the promptings of restless ambition gave redoubled fascinations, sought back and easily won her first lover;—and what Sir E. Bulwer morbidly and uniformly terms, "the fate of Genius," remained for Sybill.

We have attached ourselves to one humble family among the numerous and brilliant groups, ranged around the lofty central figure, Warwick; and are impelled to follow the fortunes of the Father and Child to the close. Warwick was now in open rebellion, and, returned to his ancient allegiance, was the champion of Henry. He had fled to France with his family, and his son-in-law the Duke of Clarence, for one daughter was already wedded to this brother of Edward; and the younger, the gentle Anne, was united to Prince Edward, the son of the captive Henry, and the heir to his lost throne. After details of endless and complicated intrigues, in which figure the brave and gallant Montagu, the brother of Warwick, and also his Jesuitical brother the Archbishop; "false, fleeting, perjured Clarence," and the dark Duke of Glo'ster, with the King of France and his courtiers, and many subordinate personages, England is invaded; the standard of rebellion is raised, and havoc rages until the close of all, when the fate of the last of the Barons, and that of his Order were sealed on the memorable field of Barnet. These latter battle chapters are peculiarly graphic and spirited. To the last breath the heroic character of Warwick is nobly sustained. There is a breadth, force, majesty and massiveness around The Last of the Barons, which illustrates his Order, and gives a new triumph to the author of the romance. If (probably for the personal reasons we have noticed) the story is felt to drag in the middle parts, there is no languor at its close. But as we have not intermeddled in any way with the general movement of the Tale, neither shall we allude to those rapid and grand final events which must, and we now speak literally, be perused with breath-suspending interest.

Let us then take leave of the little detached group with which we set out. The battle of Barnet is over; the triumphant Edward and his royal brothers, "false" Clarence, and plotting, guileful Glo'ster, are preparing to ride back to London; the dead bodies of the heroic Warwick and his faithful brother Montagu, are lying on the bier on which they are to be conveyed to St. Paul's for brutal exhibition. Alwyn the goldsmith, in an age when every man bore arms at need, was now a captain in the Yorkist bands; the citizens of London being mostly all partisans of Edward; who, by his popular manners, and encouragement of commerce, had gained their favour. It is matter of history, that at the Battle of Barnet, the man, half knave, half dupe, named Friar Bungey, enacted the part usually held by the cunning priests and sorcerers of barbarous tribes, in the battles they wage with each other; and that to his incantations on the field, the triumph of the Yorkists,—to which many accidental circumstances contributed,—was attributed by the superstitious. He is made to conjure up mists to mislead the Lancastrians; to exorcise guns; and completely defeat the horrible machinations of the Lancastrian wizard, Adam Warner. Near the spot where the Friar had played his part, —a young Yorkist captain passed with a prisoner he had captured, and whom he was leading to the tent of the Lord Hastings, the only one of the commanders from whom mercy might be hoped, and who had tarried behind the King and his royal brothers to make preparations for the removal of the mighty dead.

"Keep close to me, Sir Marmaduke," said the Yorkist. "We must look to Hastings to appease the King; and, if he hope not to win your pardon, he may, at least, after such a victory, aid one foe to fly."

"Care not for me, Alwyn," said the Knight; "when Somerset was deaf, save to his own fears,—I came back to die by my chieftain's side, alas, too late—too late! Better now death than life! What kin, kith, ambition, love, were to other men, was Lord Warwick's smile to me!"

Alwyn kindly respected his prisoner's honest emotion, and took advantage of it to lead him away from the spot where he saw knights and warriors thickest grouped. . . . . He pushed through a humbler crowd of peasants, and citizens, and women with babes at their breast; and suddenly saw a troop of timbrel women dancing round a leafless tree, and chanting some wild, but mirthful and joyous doggerel.

"What obscene and ill-seasoned revelry is this?" said the Trader to a gaping yeoman.

"They are but dancing, poor girls, round the wicked Wizard, whom Friar Bungey caused to be strangled,—and his witch daughter."

A chill foreboding seized upon Alwyn; he darted forward, scattering peasant and tymbestere, with his yet bloody sword. His feet stumbled against some broken fragments; it was the poor Eureka, shattered, at last, for the sake of its diamond! . . . . .

From the leafless tree was suspended the dead body of a man; beneath, lay a female, dead too; but whether by the hand of Man, or the mercy of Heaven, there was no sign to tell. Scholar and Child, Knowledge and Innocence, alike were cold; the grim Age had devoured them as it devours ever those before, as behind, its march,—and confounds, in one common doom, the too guileless and the too wise!

"Why crowd ye thus, knaves?" said a commanding voice.

"Ha, Lord Hastings!—approach!—Behold!" exclaimed Alwyn.

One could have wished a more poetic death for the philosopher. He might have been saved, if not from the blood-thirsty cruelty of superstition, then from the last brutal indignity, by dying before he was suspended.

Independently of its merits as a work of imagination, The Last of the Barons will allure the attention of many to a remarkable period of the annals of England; and there may be worse methods of studying the History of England, than, like Chatham, in Shakspere's plays. It ought to be noticed that, though in the usual number of three volumes, the work would in fact make five or six of the ordinary Circulating-Library dimensions. Readers in the country, who like novels in many volumes, may thus promise themselves, in every sense, a good spell. Though we have hinted at repletion of some things, it is more certain that there is deficiency of middle-class and common-place characters, and of those of homely life, to give a complete picture of the manners of the age; yet, as historians and chroniclers are nearly all silent about the People, the author might have been withheld by substantial reason from the attempt.

The Wives of England, their Relative Duties, Domestic Influence, and Social Obligations. By the Author of "The Women of England." Fisher & Co.

This new volume will hardly finish the cycle which Mrs. Ellis appears to have prescribed for herself. She has specially addressed the Women, the Daughters, and Wives of England; but Widows, Mothers, and Old Maids, remain, and will perhaps be found as deserving of a separate treatise.

Her disquisitions, or practical sermons, on the duties of Wives, are, upon the whole, as it strikes us, fully more fresh and pithy than her former more discursive discourses. She keeps closer to her text. They are divided into twelve chapters, with such headings as

Characteristics of Men, Behaviour to Husbands, &c.; one, entitled the First Year of Married Life, might, we had fancied, have referred to, at least in part, early matrimonial squabbles or quarrels; the first year being frequently, as it is understood, alternately halcyon and squally; but it merely treats of the wife setting out well and wisely in her domestic and social relations. Mrs. Ellis, as an instructor of women in the varied duties of life, ought to be an especial favourite with the "nobler sex," to which she never fails to ascribe all fitting honour, and intellectual and social supremacy; however, in this new work, she insists that the married woman has some domestic rights—"a little sphere of her own," which ought not to be trenched upon, either by a reasonable husband, or a husband's relatives. These last, it is laid down, should abdicate the moment the new wife crosses the threshold. Mrs. Ellis is an enlightened and a strenuous advocate for economy; of the true nature of which she has a just idea; and for a dignified contempt of the petty ambitions about dress and appearance, which degrade so many of the vain of the sex. On this and cognate topics, many of her remarks, as, for instance, the following, are well worthy the study of married women:—

We find, in spite of popular prejudice against a simple dress, or a homely way of living, that respectability and genuine worth of character are able not only to give dignity to any position in society, but also to command universal respect from others; and that, while few are bold enough to imitate, there is no small proportion of the community who secretly wish they were like those noble-minded individuals, who dare to aim at a true standard of excellence in the formation of their own habits, and the general conduct of their families.

The following may, with advantage, be copied out, and, somehow or other, smuggled under the notice of those—and we trust they are not very many—whom it concerns:—

A wife should, in all respects, be the mistress of her own house. If, therefore, the husband's relations have been accustomed to take part in his domestic concerns, it is highly important that they should do so no longer. Correct-minded persons will need no hint of this kind from the wife herself. Such persons will be sufficiently aware, that the interior of her establishment must be kept sacred to her alone; and that, while the greatest freedom is maintained, both in asking and in granting favours, there must be no intrusion on their part into the mysteries of the kitchen, the store-room, or the pantry, without an invitation from the mistress, either expressed or implied.

Should there be wanting in the husband's relatives this peculiar kind of delicacy of feeling, it will be necessary to devise some plan calculated not to offend, by which they may be made to understand that you do not wish them, in your own house, entirely to share all things in common; for let the degree of kindness on both sides be what it may, your education and their's will, in all probability, have been so different, that circumstances must necessarily arise, calculated to draw forth remarks which cannot always be acceptable; and it is therefore your wisest plan, to draw the line of demarcation on the side of safety. . . . . .

I have said that all women have their rights, and it would be wise to begin, early in married life, to act upon the principle which allows to every wife a little sphere of domestic arrangements with which the husband shall not feel that he has any business to interfere, except at her request, and into which a reasonable man would not wish to obtrude his authority, simply because the operations necessary to be carried on in that department of his household, are alike foreign to his understanding and his tastes. To submit every little act of domestic management to the opinion of a husband, would be unquestionably to have one-half of them, at least, either defeated in their object, or immediately put a stop to, from no other reason than pure ignorance of their nature, cause, and effect. Thus, unless a husband can feel sufficient confidence in his wife, to allow her to rule with undisputed authority in this little sphere, her case must be a pitiable one indeed.

There are a few other cases, in which Mrs. Ellis allows that the wife's temper may be sorely tried. Here are some of them, and they are also from among the best—as the most directly practical, and least declamatory of her exhortations:

I have always been accustomed to consider it as the severest trial to the temper of a married woman, to have an idle husband; and if in addition to neglecting his business, or such manly occupations as an exemption from the necessities of business would leave him at liberty to pursue, he is personally idle, sitting slipshod at noontime, with his feet upon the fender, occasionally jarring together the whole army of fire-irons with one stroke of his foot, agitated at intervals by the mere muscular irritation of having nothing to do, or not choosing to do anything; and if he should happen to have chosen for his wife a woman of active bustling character, as such men not unfrequently do, I believe I must, as in some other instances, leave it to the reader to suggest some possible means by which such a woman may at all times control her temper, and keep the peace at her own fireside.

Here, too, we might mention as pre-eminent amongst the trials of married life, though I question whether it operates so immediately upon the temper as some others, the ruinous propensity inherent in the nature of some men, to spend their own money, and sometimes the money of their friends, in vague speculations and visionary schemes.

The man who is possessed with this mania, for in certain cases it deserves no other name, is neither to be convinced by argument nor experience, that after ninety-nine failures, he is not very likely to succeed the hundredth time; and the wife who knows that the maintenance of herself and her family is entirely dependant upon him, has abundant need for supplies of strength and patience beyond what any earthly source can afford. . . . . It is a well-known fact, that men in general appear to consider themselves justly entitled to the privilege of being out of humour about their food. Thus the whole pleasure of a social meal is sometimes destroyed by some trifling error in the culinary department, or the non-appearance of some expected indulgence. But here again, our forbearance is called into exercise, by remembering the probability there is, that such men have had silly mothers, who made the pleasures of their childhood to consist chiefly of such as belong to the palate; and here too, if the wife cannot remedy this evil, and in all probability it will be beyond her power to do so, she may, by her judicious efforts to promote the welfare of the rising generation, impart to the youthful minds committed to her care, or subject to her influence, a juster estimate of what belongs to the true enjoyment of intellectual and immortal beings.

With all occasions of domestic derangement, such as washing-days, and other renovations of comfort and order, some men of irritable temperament wage open and determined war. But, may we not ask, in connexion with this subject, whether their prejudices against these household movements have not been remotely or immediately excited, by the extreme and unnecessary confusion and disturbance with which they are too frequently accompanied? For I cannot think that a reasonable man, on comparing an English home with a French one, for instance, would desire to be altogether exempt from such domestic purifications; and if properly managed, so as to interfere as little as possible with his personal comfort, and conducted with general cheerfulness and good humour, such a man might easily be brought to consider them as necessary to the good of his household, as the refreshing shower is to the summer soil.

A causeless and habitual neglect of punctuality on the part of the master of a house, is certainly a grievance very difficult to bear; because, as he is the principal person in the household, and the first to be considered, the whole machinery of domestic management must necessarily be dependent upon his movements; and more especially, since it so happens, that persons who are the most accustomed to keep others waiting, have the least patience to wait for others. Thus it not unfrequently occurs, that a wife is all day urging on her servants to a punctual attention to the dinner-hour appointed by her husband; and when that hour arrives, he has either forgotten it himself, or he allows some trifling hinderance to prevent his returning home until one, or two hours later. Yet the same man, though in the habit of doing this day after day, will be excessively annoyed, if for once in his life he should be punctual to the appointed time, and not find all things ready on his return.

Perhaps, too, the master of a family, on days of household bustle, when extra business has to be done, will not choose to rise so early as usual; or he will sit reading the newspaper while his breakfast waits, and thus keep every member of his family standing about unoccupied, with all the business of the day before them. Or, he may be one of those who like that women should be always ready long before the necessary time, and thus habitually name an hour for meeting, or setting out from home, at which he has not the remotest intention of being ready himself.

Now, as the time of women, if properly employed, is too precious to be wasted, something surely may be done, not by endeavouring to control the movements of such a man so as to make him true to his own appointment, but by convincing him that common honesty requires him simply to state the actual time at which he does intend to be ready. And here we see at once one of those numerous instances in which a reasonable man will listen, and endeavour to amend; while an unreasonable man will either not listen, or not take the slightest pains to improve.

Again, there are men who like the importance, and the feeling of power and decision which it gives them, to set out on a journey as if upon the spur of the moment, without having communicated their intentions even to the wife, who is most interested in making preparations for such a movement. And there are others who, when consulted about anything, cannot be brought to give either their attention or their advice, so as to assist the judgment of a wife, who would gladly give satisfaction if she could; yet, when the time to act upon their advice is past, will bestow their attention a little too severely upon the unfortunate being who, consulting her own judgment as the only guide she had, will most probably have done exactly what they did not wish. But it would be an endless task to go on enumerating instances of this description. I have merely mentioned these as specimens of the kind of daily and hourly trials which most women have to expect in the married state; and which, as I have before stated, may be greatly softened down, if not entirely reconciled, by the consideration already alluded to. Besides which, it is but candid to allow, that the greater proportion of these offences against temper and patience, originate in one of those peculiarities in the character of man which I have omitted to mention in its proper place. I mean the incapability under which he labours, of placing himself in idea in the situation of another person, so as to identify his feelings with theirs, and thus to enter into what they suffer and enjoy, as if the feeling were his own.

This alleged "incapacity" of sympathetic feeling—a very grave charge preferred against all mankind, which we cannot admit—must, we presume, be forgiven to Mrs. Ellis, in consideration of her nearly unbounded exaltation of reasoning, self-sufficing man, whose worst errors, in relation to his helpmate, are traced to foolish and indulgent mothers; vain, ignorant, and capricious sisters; and the corruption of public schools; "where the influence, the character, and the very name of women, are a by-word for contempt." Wherever these schools may be, and, we trust, they are rare, if to be found at all, the maidens of England ought to eschew husbands who have been trained at them. This over-indulgent judge finds that—

Such men are very unjustly blamed for being selfish, domineering, and tyrannical to the other sex. In fact, how should they be otherwise? It is a common thing to complain of the selfishness of men; but I have often thought, on looking candidly at their early lives, and reflecting how little cultivation of the heart is blended with what is popularly called the best education, the wonder should be, that men are not more selfish still.

We cannot admit this apology for "selfish, domineering, tyrannical" husbands. Man may, to a certain extent, be the "creature of circumstance," but he is also, and far more powerfully, the creature of reason and conscience.

Men may be found fallible and erring, it appears from Mrs. Ellis, in many small particulars, though they are so nearly perfect in the general. They are, she affirms, bad economists; but she ought to have added, in matters of which they are ignorant, and much as women are bad economists: the husband being certainly the better economist in the factory—the wife, probably, in the kitchen, the larder, and female wardrobe. Of men we are told—

Even the most penurious, the very misers of whom we read such extraordinary accounts, appear to have had a very mistaken idea of the best means of ensuring the great object of their lives. Thus, while most anxious to avoid the least unnecessary expense, some men greatly increase the waste and the outlay of money in their household arrangements, by not allowing a sufficient number of implements, utensils, or other conveniences, and means, for the purpose of facilitating domestic operations, by making each individual thing supply the place for which it is most suitable, and best calculated to secure against absolute waste. The master of a family is quite capable of perceiving that money for domestic purposes is often in demand; and that, through some channel or other, it escapes very rapidly; but he is altogether incompetent—and would that all men would believe it!—to judge of the necessity there is for each particular sum, or how the whole, in the end, must unavoidably be increased, by making every article of household use answer as many purposes as it is capable of, without regard to fitness, durability, or strength. But if, on the one hand, our first wish for the increased happiness of the homes of England would be, that men should let these things alone; our next, and, perhaps, it ought to stand first,—and be still more earnest than the other,—is this, that all women should be so educated, and so prepared by the right disposition of their own minds, as to afford their husbands just grounds for perfect confidence in their understanding and right principle, with regard to these important affairs. . . . .

With all this, however, and often in connexion with the most rigid notions of economy, men are fond of personal indulgences; nor ought they ever to be absolutely denied so reasonable a means of restoring their exhausted energy and cheerfulness, more especially, because those who are connected in any way with business, or who have to provide by their own efforts for the maintenance of their families, are generally so circumstanced through the greater portion of each day, as to be as far removed as posible from all opportunity of personal enjoyment.

It would, indeed, be a hard thing to refuse to the husband who returns home from his desk, his counter, or his fields, the best seat, or the choicest food, with any other indulgence his circumstances may afford. Here, however, in certain families, exists a great difficulty; for some men, and I need not say they are of the unreasonable class, are determined to have the indulgences, and yet are unwilling to incur the expense. From their habit of disregarding things in detail, and looking upon them only as a whole, they are utterly unconscious of the importance of every little addition, in the shape of luxury, to the general sum; and thus the wife is placed in the painful dilemma, either of denying her husband the gratification of his tastes and wishes, or of bearing all the blame of conducting her household expenses on too extravagant a scale. There are few situations, in the long catalogue of female perplexities, more harassing than this; for it must ever be borne in mind, that men have a tendency to dislike the immediate instrument of their suffering or privation.

Let us commend to the few who require such exhortations this lady's judicious remarks on those caressing or fondling wives, whose actively demonstrative tenderness for their wedded partners become a positive nuisance to their friends. By all means, let the signs and symbols of "the holy and blessed mystery" be kept for the privacy of their own firesides. Mrs. Ellis can scarcely bring herself to believe, that any married woman will so degrade herself and her condition as to coax, and wheedle, and weep, or fall into hysterics, trusting to her blandishments, and the influence of her personal charms, to gain some selfish end, or object of paltry ambition, which her husband, if consulting his reason, ought to refuse. Like her, we trust that there are few, or none of such low-minded and artful creatures honoured to bear the sacred name of wife.

It would be unnecessary to notice Mrs. Ellis' strictures on the intolerable grievance of morning visitors, were it not that she suggests a remedy, on which we propose to move a slight amendment. Her scheme is, that one hour a-day shall be set apart for receiving the skirmishing morning squadrons. Would not two, or even three hours on two or three days of the week be an improvement on this plan; as it would leave some days sacred and unbroken to duty, to domestic business, to rational and refining pursuits, and to the reception of those entitled to the entrée at all times, and at all times kindly welcome? But we must not forget that, where ceremonious or gossiping morning callers are the pest of a single Mrs. Ellis, who knows so well how to employ her time, they are the delight, one of the first social pleasures of twenty frivolous and idle women; an absolute necessary of life, indeed, as society is at present constituted. Morning visiters never, we fear, can be got rid of, until social evening parties are put upon the easy, rational, inexpensive footing of those of France and Germany; and women better educated.

Domestic management, and conduct to servants, are each well-handled; and, upon the whole, the Wives of England may peruse the counsels of their accomplished sister and adviser with both profit and pleasure. Though this volume may not run through "seventeen editions," like the well-titled "Women of England," it is really a better book.

Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands. By Mrs. Sigourney. With Illustrations from Drawings by Roberts, Turner, Cresswick, &c. London: Tilt & Bogue.

A charming book is this; made up of pleasant, desultory prose sketches; poetic gems; and of pretty engravings, not the less attractive that they are chiefly taken from memorable Scottish scenes. But the "Memories" refer to England and France, as well as to Scotland. Mrs. Sigourney believes that there are plenty of satirical, caustic, and gossiping American travellers that visit and report on Europe, though she should not add to the number; and she accordingly sets out on the principle of dwelling only upon the bright side, and seeing, or at least of commemorating nothing save the good and the beautiful. Her landing at Liverpool was made under very impressive circumstances, as the ship, after a most prosperous voyage, was in imminent danger of being wrecked in St. George's Channel. From Liverpool Mrs. Sigourney entered Scotland by the Lake country and Carlisle; and even at the outset she indited verses to ancient Chester—to Kendal, the town of Catherine Parr—to Winandermere—and Grasmere and Southey; and the same chain of bright poetic links marks her entire progress through Britain, and in Paris. The work is, however, as a whole, much better adapted to the writer's native land, than to this country; where, unfortunately, few of us have anything more to learn of Holyrood, and Abbotsford, Stratford, and Westminster Abbey; of Mrs. Fry in Newgate, or Poet Rogers amid his collection of literary and other nick-nacks. Instead of the loftier national themes which Mrs. Sigourney has chosen for the expression of her pleasant memories, we, as a fair sample, copy out the following sweet lines, which have a true relish of Auld langsyne;—

SHEEP AMONG THE CHEVIOTS.

Graze on, graze on, there comes no sound
Of Border warfare near,
No slogan-cry of gathering clan,
No battle-axe, no spear;
No belted knight, in armour bright,
With glance of kindled ire,
Doth change the sparts of Chevy Chase
To conflict stern and dire.
Ye wis not that ye press the spot
Where Percy held his way
Across the marches in his pride
The "choicest harts to slay;"
And where the stout Earl Douglas rode
Upon his milk-white steed,
With "fifteen hundred Scottish spears,"
To stay the invader's deed.

Ye wis not that ye press the spot
Where, with his eagle-eye,
King James and all his gallant train
To Flodden-field swept by.
The Queen was weeping in her bower
Amid her maids that day,
And on her cradled nursling's face
The tears like pearl-drops lay;
For madly 'gainst her native realm
Her royal husband went,
And led his flower of chivalry,
As to a tournament,
He led them on in power and pride;
But ere the fray was o'er
They on the blood-stained heather slept,
And he returned no more.

Graze on, graze on; there's many a rill
Bright sparkling through the glade,
Where you may freely slake your thirst,
With none to make afraid.
There's many a wandering stream that flows
From Cheviot's terraced side,
Yet not one drop of warrior's gore
Distains its crystal tide.

For Scotia from her hills hath come,
And Albion o'er the Tweed,
To give the mountain breeze the feud
That made their noblest bleed;
And like two friends, around whose hearts
Some dire estrangement run,
Love all the better for the past,
And sit them down as one.

This will not be considered among the best of Mrs. Sigourney's poetical Memories, but the theme is less hackneyed than other things of more ambitious character.

The Americans, if the most truthful, are certainly also the most outspoken of people. Nothing should be communicated to one of that nation which one does not wish proclaimed on the house-top—made patent to all Europe.

Sure we are that Mrs. Southey, who never saw Mrs. Sigourney between the eyes, could have had no idea of the following most affecting and confidential communication being made public; yet we know not how to regret that the American lady's failure of what, perhaps falsely, is considered amongst us strict propriety or proper delicacy, has revealed so much of whatever is most beautiful in human nature. She tells "From Wordsworth I received the first information of Southey's melancholy state of health and intellect, and resigned, though reluctantly, my intention of going to Keswick to see him. . . . . A letter the ensuing spring from his wife, so widely known by her name of Caroline Bowles as the writer of some of the truest and most pathetic poetry in the language, made me still more regret that the short time which then remained to me in England, rendered it impossible to visit Greta-Hall. I trust I may be forgiven for selecting from one of her more recent letters a few passages, &c. &c." It is these passages to which we have referred, and now quote.

"You desire to be remembered to him who sang 'of Thalaba, the wild and wondrous Tale.' Alas! my friend, the dull cold ear of death is not more insensible than his, my dearest husband's, to all communications from the world without. Scarcely can I keep hold of the last poor comfort of believing that he still knows me. This almost complete unconsciousness has not been of more than six months' standing, though more than two years have elapsed since he has written even his name. After the death of his first wife, 'the Edith' of his first love, who was for several years insane, his health was terribly shaken. Yet for the greater part of a year, which he spent with me in Hampshire, my former home, it seemed perfectly reëstablished; and he used to say 'It had surely pleased God that the last years of his life should be happy.' But the Almighty willed otherwise. The little cloud soon appeared which was soon to overshadow all. In the blackness of its shadow we still live, and shall pass from it only through the portals of the grave. The last three years have done on me the work of twenty. The one sole business of my life is that which I verily believe keeps the life in me,—the guardianship of my dear, helpless, unconscious husband."

We imagine that no travelled American lady would be longer honoured as "a postess in her own country" who ventured home without being able to tell something of Miss Mitford. It does not appear that Mrs. Sigourney actually made the customary pilgrimage to Three-Mile-Cross; but she must have been in correspondence with the lady whose filial devotion she eulogizes as adding lustre and grace to the rich imagery of her pages. Of Miss Mitford she writes,—"An aged father, of whom she is the only child, is the object of her constant cherishing care. Years have elapsed since she has left him, scarcely for an evening; and she receives calls only during those hours in the afternoon when he regularly takes rest upon his bed. She is ever in attendance upon him; cheering him by the recital of passing events, and pouring into his spirit the fresher life of her own. . . . I cannot withhold a sweet picture drawn by her pen, though sensible that she had no intention of its meeting the public eye. 'My father,' Miss Mitford writes, 'is a splendid old man, with a most noble head, a fine countenance full of benevolence and love, hair of silvery whiteness, and a complexion like winter berries. I suppose there never was a more beautiful embodiment of healthful and virtuous old age. . . . How to promote his comfort in his advanced years and increasing infirmities, occupies most of my thoughts. It is my privilege to make many sacrifices to this blessed duty; for, with my dearest father, should I be so unhappy as to survive him, will depart all that binds me to this world.'"

Miss Mitford has sustained this misfortune, aggravated we deeply regret to learn, by other circumstances, painful to every one, but doubly so to fine and sensitive minds. Owing to the long and expensive illness of her father, and the consequent suspension of those literary labours which have communicated delight to the Old and to the New world, Miss Mitford, at the death of her father, found herself involved in debts to the amount of between £800 and £900. After having relinquished her mother's large fortune in behalf of her other parent, besides several legacies left exclusively to herself, she has had the additional misfortune of losing a sum equal to the half of her embarrassments, by the failure of a publisher; and is thus left without any available means, save the pension of £100 a-year, granted her some years since by the Queen. Miss Mitford was preparing to meet this heavy responsibility as she best might,—at whatever sacrifice, and by whatever exertion,—when some of her friends, to whom the circumstances became known, interfered, and proposed an appeal to the public, for the purpose of paying debts incurred in supplying the wants of the aged and infirm father, who had long engrossed all her time, and all her care. We think too well of the British, and, we may add, of the American public, to believe that this appeal will be made in vain. Thousands, and tens of thousands, have felt and owned the charm of her writings, and they have now an opportunity of repaying some small part of their debt,—of shedding returning peace and sunshine over that once sunny and cheerful spirit, which has long diffused an affluence of refined enjoyment, and ministered to the sweetest affections of our common nature.

Criticisms on Art, and Sketches of the Picture Galleries of England. By William Hazlitt. Edited by his Son, with Catalogues of the principal galleries, now first collected, 12mo, pp. 434. London: Templeman.

This must prove a valuable acquisition not less to the student of Art, than to the Amateur.

Sometimes querulous or wayward, but much more frequently liable to the generous error of being carried away by his own enthusiasm, there is yet no English critic on works of Art to be compared with Hazlitt. His soul was imbued with passionate love of Painting; and however faulty and deficient in manual execution, certainly no artist ever conceived finer ideas of the beautiful in Art, or with the pen expressed them half so forcibly. It is often quite as good, and sometimes better, to contemplate a picture in the powerful and glowing imagery of his page than on the real canvass. He is then like the poet exalting and embellishing the charms of his mistress from the rich exuberance of his own imagination. He has, for example, in his masterly criticism on Hogarth, discovered a thousand beauties and minute strokes of genius which the artist probably never dreamed of.

Of the principal piece in this volume, The Essay on the Fine Arts, originally published in the Encyclopædia Britannica, we had lately occasion to speak, and in those terms of warm commendation which its unmatched excellence must command from every ingenuous mind. Besides this master-piece, the present volume contains Hazlitt's cursory but spirited criticisms on the pictures in the principal galleries of England; Mr. Angerstein's, now in the National Gallery; the Collection at Dulwich College; the Stafford Gallery, the Grosvenor Collection, the Pictures at Petworth, Oxford, Blenheim, Windsor Castle, Hampton Court, Burleigh House, and in other places of less note. An Essay on the Elgin Marbles, of which Hazlitt was a fanatical admirer, is taken from the extinct London Magazine in its palmy days; and the elaborate review of Flaxman's Essays on Sculpture, —another Treatise on the Fine Arts—from the Edinburgh Review. Such are the rich contents of this volume; and we know not of one better calculated to excite and guide an uninstructed admirer of Art. The Editor, in an Appendix, has given catalogues of the pictures of all the galleries described, as they are arranged at the present time; and in foot-notes corrected either the inaccuracies into which his father had fallen respecting the locality of particular pictures, or noticed the places in which they are now to be found.

We wish that it were possible, in few words, to give amateurs an idea of the varied contents of the volume, and of its suggestive value to artists. There are few artists who may not benefit by pondering such brief and pithy remarks, or artistic canons, as the following: "The highest Art is the imitation of the finest nature; or in other words of that which conveys the strongest sense of pleasure or power, of the sublime or beautiful."

In speaking of a picture of groups of girls, which, having been painted in the "fashion of the time," had not the free look of nature, and had become obsolete, uncouth, old-fashioned, and rubbishy; he makes this general remark on costume, "Dress a figure in what costume you please, (however fantastic, and however barbarous,) but add the expression which is common to all faces; the properties which are common to all drapery in its elementary principles, and the picture will belong to all times and places. It is not the addition of individual circumstances, but the omission of general truth that makes the little, the deformed, and short-lived in art." But it is still more grateful to listen to Hazlitt expatiating upon those pictures which enchanted him. We select two in different styles, the originals of which are in the Dulwich Gallery. "Look at the Cuyp next the door. [9] It is woven of ethereal hues. A soft mist is on it, a veil of subtle air, the tender green of the valleys beyond, the gleaming lake, the purple light of the hills, have an effect like the down on an unripe nectarine. You may lay your finger on the canvass; but miles of dewy vapour are between you and the objects you survey. It is almost needless to point out that the cattle and figures in the foreground, like dark transparent spots, give an immense relief to the perspective." . . . . . .

. . . . . "No. 283, Spanish Beggar Boys, by Murillo, is the triumph of this Collection, and almost of painting. In the imitation of common life nothing ever went beyond it; or as far as we can judge, came up to it. A Dutch picture is mechanical and mere still life to it. But this is life itself. The boy at play on the ground is miraculous. It is done with a few dragging strokes of the pencil, and with a little tinge of colour; but the mouth, the nose, the eyes, the chin, are as brimful as they can hold of expression, of arch roguery, of animal spirits, of vigorous, elastic health. The vivid, glowing, cheerful look is such as could only be found beneath a southern sun. The fens and dykes of Holland (with all our respect for them) could never produce such an epitome of the vital principle. The other boy, standing with the pitcher in his hand, and a crust of bread in his mouth, is scarcely less excellent. His sulky, phlegmatic indifference speaks for itself."—— An estimate of Holbein, as a painter, concludes: "Holbein's heads are to the finest portraits what state-papers are to History." From the remarks on the two celebrated Claudes, in the possession of Lord Radnor, of which everybody has, at least, seen prints, we copy this other canon of high Art. "In the cool of the evening, some cattle are feeding on the brink of a glassy stream that reflects a mouldering ruin on one side of the picture; and so precise is the touch, so true, so firm, is the pencilling, so classical the outline, that they give one the idea of sculptured cattle, biting the short, green turf, and seem an enchanted herd! They appear stamped on the canvass to remain there for ever; or as if nothing could root them from the spot. Truth with beauty suggests the idea of immortality. No Dutch picture ever suggested this feeling. The objects are real, it is true; but not being beautiful or impressive, the mind feels no wish to mould them into a permanent reality, to bind them fondly to the heart, or lock them in the imagination." We might multiply such passages without end.——As this is the season when Exhibitions of paintings are open in the great towns, when Art-Unions, and all the benumbing and blighting influences of psuedo-patronage, are in full activity, the following remarks, whatever opinion is formed of their correctness, are, at all events, opportune. Hazlitt entirely believed that patronage and progress in Art were diametrically different. "When the real lover of Art looks round and sees the works of Hogarth and Wilson—works which were produced in obscurity and poverty—and recollects the pomp and pride of patronage under which these works are at present recommended to public notice, the obvious inference which strikes him is, how little the production of such works depends on 'the most encouraging circumstances.' The visits of the gods of old did not always add to the felicity of those whose guests they were. Nor do we know that the countenance and favours of the great will lift the Arts to the height of excellence, or will confer all those advantages which are expected from the proffered boon. The Arts are of humble growth and station; they are the product of labour and self-denial; they have their seat in the heart of man, and in his imagination. It is there they labour, have their triumph there, and, unseen and unthought of, perform their ceaseless task. Indeed, patronage, and works of Art deserving patronage, rarely exist together; for it is only when the Arts have attracted public esteem, and reflect credit on the patron, that they receive this flattering support; and then it, in general, proves fatal to them. We do not see how the man of genius should be improved by being transplanted from his closet to the antechambers of the great, or to a fashionable rout. He has no business there—but to bow, to flatter, to smile, to submit to the caprice of taste, to adjust his dress, to think of nothing but his own person and his own interest, to talk of the antique, and furnish designs for lids of snuff-boxes and ladies' fans. . . . . With regard to the supposed pecuniary advantages arising from the public patronage of the Arts, the plan, unfortunately, defeats itself; for it multiplies its objects faster than it can satisfy their claims, and raises up a swarm of competitors for the prize of genius from the dregs of idleness and dulness. The real patron is anxious to reward merit, not to encourage gratuitous pretenders to it; to see that the man of genius takes no detriment; that another Wilson is not left to perish for want; not to propagate the breed, for that he knows to be impossible. But there are some persons who think it essential to the interests of art, to keep up "an aerie of children,"—the young fry of embryo candidates for fame,—as others think it essential to the welfare of the kingdom, to preserve the spawn of the herring-fisheries. In general, public, that is, indiscriminate patronage, is, and can be nothing better than a species of intellectual seduction, by administering provocatives to vanity and avarice; it is leading astray the youth of this nation, by fallacious hopes which can scarcely ever be realised; it is beating up for raw dependents—sending out to the highways for the halt, the lame, and the blind, and making a scramble among a set of idle boys for prizes of the first, second, and third class, like what we make among children for gingerbread toys." There is much more in the same strain. If true twenty years since, when they were written, how much more emphatically true are these observations now, when every town and village has its annual exhibition, its picture-lottery, and junta of critics and patrons.

The Highland Note-Book; or, Sketches and Anecdotes, &c. By R. Carruthers. Edinburgh: A. & C. Black.

Literature, in these latter times, is able to maintain,—in a corps of clever, and often accomplished newspaper editors,—a sort of permanent staff, or chain of posts, in the provinces. They are never better, and seldom half so pleasantly employed, as regards distant readers, than when describing the natural scenery, or local antiquities, of their respective districts; or in telling the historical traditions and romantic legends, and embalming the memories of the Worthies of their counties. The Highland Note-Book, in substance, and, we presume, nearly in form, appeared in this manner in the Author's excellent newspaper, The Inverness Courier. He is to be considered as peculiarly fortunate in his locality, which is the centre of a wide region, of which much remained to be told, and much to be explored. Mr. Carruthers, selecting his subjects with good judgment and taste, has contrived, in a series of years, to throw together a delightful melange of description, anecdote, tale, and tradition, which well merited the preservation it has found. Nor are his sketches limited to the Highlands and the Highland border; though, with his foot on the heather, we like him best. His Highland readers may give their preference on quite opposite grounds. An evident warm attachment to elegant literature, and love of literary allusion, gives a farther charm to his work. He has also—for "the hand of the diligent maketh rich"—been able, in the Far North, to rescue from oblivion some original letters of Thomson, Armstrong, Scott, and Allan Ramsay, which are both curious and characteristic. As brief specimens of one style of these pleasing and graceful Notes, we select a few samples.

THE HAPPY VALLEY.

Somewhat more than half-way to the Fall, we come to the inn, or change-house of Whitebridge, a small but decent hostelrie, which is welcome as the shining forehead of a star in that gloomy wild. Having seen your horse cared for—and oats as well as hay can be had—you should walk over the hills to the south, a distance of five miles, to see the Vale of Killin, a Highland Paradise, which has not unaptly been termed "The Happy Valley." It is an extensive shealing, encompassed by steep mountains, producing the richest pasture, and frequented for summer-grazing by all the crofters and their cattle. Many a Celtic beauty here trims her snood, and trills a song to please her swain. The plain, two miles in length, is dotted all over with temporary huts; some hundreds of cows are kept from June till August, and the land flows with milk, if not with honey. The verdant turf is sacred from the plough, rastroque intacta; a high mural rock bulwarks it in on one side, with lesser subsidiaries of the same character; and a lake, with a stream oozing out of it, waters and encloses the other side. Fragments of Celtic song and music have been preserved by this rural carnival in the Vale of Killin; and an eminent composer of these national melodies derived some of his sweetest strains from this pastoral source.

RANDOLPH'S HALL IN DARNAWAY CASTLE.

We pass from the modern rooms into an apartment such as few castles can boast—Randolph's Hall, a state-room, about a hundred feet long, forty broad, and ninety high. This hall is of great antiquity. It was built by Randolph, the first Earl of Moray, the friend, and nephew, and fellow-warrior of Robert Bruce, and afterwards Regent of Scotland, who died in 1331. The walls of the hall are cased on the outside with the same stone as the new castle, and it is plastered and whitewashed inside, and lighted with modern windows! These sins against good taste resemble the barbarous anachronism of the old players, (Garrick among the number,) who used to represent Lear and Macbeth in a tie-wig, and the cast-off court dresses of the nobility. The oak roof of this ancient hall still remains untouched; and it is impossible to enter the vast apartment, looking down its extensive area, and up to its magnificent roof, dim with age, recalling, at the same time, its warlike founder and his compatriots, Bruce, the Black Douglas, and others, who must often have sat within its walls, without experiencing a thrilling sensation approaching to awe and fear. Randolph was a brave soldier, as his conquest of Edinburgh Castle and his conduct at Bannockburn testified. He was also, as regent, a just, but a severe judge. "Having, on one occasion, sent his coroner before him to Ellandonan Castle, in the Highlands, to execute certain thieves and robbers, that officer caused their heads to be hung round the walls of the castle, to the number of fifty. When Randolph came down the lake in a barge, and saw the castle adorned with these grim and bloody heads, he said, 'He loved better to look upon them than on any garlands of roses he had ever seen.'" Doubtless his hall at Darnaway was sometimes adorned with such garlands! The last historical association connected with this apartment is the circumstance of Mary queen of Scots holding a council here, in her progress to the north, in the autumn of 1562. The hall still contains a few relics of the olden time. There is a carved chair which belonged to Randolph, with a thistle rudely cut on it; also a few massive oaken tables, that may have borne a banquet, spread even for the nobles of Robert Bruce. Across one of the windows are placed the colours of the Sutherland Fencibles regiment, torn and shattered at the engagement of Vinegar Hill: of this corps the late Lord Moray's brother was sometime commander.

We have lingered too long amidst the gloom and vastness of this old hall; and as the sun is now shining brightly over the trees, we shall take a plunge into the woods—the Forest of Darnaway. A noble forest! Entering it at a point called Dorsella, the tourist may pass over, in a circuitous line, until he quits the woods at Earlsmill, a circle of twenty miles—an extent of woodland which, as surrounding the residence of any one nobleman or gentleman in Scotland, is, perhaps, unexampled. The absolute value of the woods of Darnaway, in 1830, was £130,000. The annual increase in growth, of oak and fir, exceeds, in a threefold ratio, the amount of timber thinned and copsed every year; and as the system pursued is, for every fir that is cut down to plant two oaks, in the course of fifty years the whole forest of Darnaway will be one mass of oak. . . . . .

On the west bank of the river is an ancient and interesting object, a heronry. From time immemorial—most probably since the days of Randolph, first Earl of Moray—a colony of herons has congregated on the spot. Their nests are built on the branches of some old oak trees, overhanging the dark and rapid stream. As many as forty nests are on one tree, and there are from two to three hundred birds. In the bed of the river, the birds may be seen, with their tall figures, long necks, and blue wings, fishing patiently for food, or rising slowly up to begin their flight. When the stream is swollen by the autumn floods, the herons, debarred their usual employment of fishing in its stony bed, repair to the shores of the firth for food. Their number here is on the increase, probably because the noble proprietor is anxious to protect the once royal birds in their present inglorious retirement, and because the river and firth afford abundance of small trout and fry. On the opposite bank of the Findhorn is a steep, precipitous bank of light sandstone, with numerous holes and fissures, in which some scores of jackdaws have taken up their abode. These light infantry sometimes make war on the stately ranks of the herons, occasioning a din and a turmoil that resound through the forest like the noise of artillery, and they sometimes find their way into the tree-rocked nests and steal the eggs.

Another picturesque point here is formed by what are termed the Esses, or salmon leaps, where the rocks in the bed of the river suddenly converge, leaving narrow passes and falls, up which the fish try to ascend.

In one spot, perched on a high green bank, is a solitary church, where a congregation of Scottish Dissenters has assembled for upwards of a hundred years. On a calm summer Sunday, the door is thrown open, and the sound of the psalm-singing mingles in a solemn and pleasing tone with the noise of the burn and the notes of the wood-pigeon. Scenes of this kind have a peculiarly Scottish character; they remind us alternately of the old Covenanters who assembled on the hill side, and of the deep religious feeling which still pervades the scattered dwellings of our rural population.

The rookery at Brahan, the seat of the chief of the Mackenzies, is a fit pendant to the heronry of the puissant lords of Moray.

A colony of rooks has long been established at Brahan, and attempts have lately been made to lessen the number. The reason assigned is, that the nests of the birds injure the trees. The nests are strongly made, vigorous, compact, and durable—for the rook is an admirable architect and builder—but they get filled with rain, which is constantly overflowing in times of storm and tempest, and thus the branches of the trees become decayed. There seems something in this dictum, though we never heard it propounded before. But the rook is as strongly attached to the tree on which it has been cradled, as the salmon is to his native stream, and it will be no easy task to dislodge him. He is also so interesting a fellow, when wheeling about with his companions, in his usual picturesque style, before going to rest on a calm summer's evening, that we should be sorry to see the social tribe driven from their old immemorial haunts.

The Cold-Water System: an Essay, exhibiting its real merits, &c. &c. By Thomas J. Graham, M.D., Graduate of Glasgow.

When the cold-water cure was first heard of in this country, we prophesied—and, indeed, no prophet was required—that it would make a vast sensation—and that there would forthwith be numerous Hydropathic Establishments in England. And so there are; and there might, beyond doubt, be much worse places of resort for the numerous wealthy, and often imaginary invalids, of this wealthy country. The author of this Essay has opened a Hydropathic Establishment near London. He is avowedly a regular cold-water practitioner, though he has not altogether renounced his faith in the moderate use of medicine. His cold-water remedies are precisely those employed by the Father of the system—Priessnitz, though he may not carry the use of some of them to the same extent. Nor does he claim universality for his panacea; the cases in which he has found the cold-water treatment efficacious, being, at present, merely "Indigestion, Costiveness, Asthma, Cough, Consumption, Gout, Rheumatism, Ulceration," &c., which et cetera may, however, comprehend a good many other diseases. The author, as a professional man, claims superiority to cold-water ignoramuses like Priessnitz; and from being able to combine the hydriatic method of treatment with the skilful prescription of medicine; now this is an equivocal good, as getting entirely rid of drugs is held one main advantage of the new system. Dr. Graham gives numerous cases of cures effected by him, in letters from the patients. Perhaps the really valuable part of the Essay is that in which the abuses of the new method of cure are pointed out. According to Mr. Claridge, Priessnitz never failed. Here we find many instances of his temerity and consequent fatal failure. After all, we are warranted to hope that Dr. Graham avails himself of the novelty of the cold-water system to attract notice, and employs it discreetly, adopting what is good, and discarding what is dangerous.

Titian; a Romance of Venice. By R. Skelton Mackenzie, LL.D. Three Volumes. Bentley.

The author of TITIAN claims for his romance the distinction of being the first Art-novel which has appeared in England. The Art-novel is a term now as distinctly recognised in France and Germany as the Historical, the Domestic, or the sentimental novel. We have no desire to quarrel with the name, though preferring, in the structure of every prose fiction that is of any length, those broad and free views of many-coloured life, which, in subservience to good taste and sound judgment, comprehend and harmonize in one all the different styles. It is more to the purpose that Titian, though strictly an Art-novel, is an exceedingly attractive romance, and a piece of elegant and scholar-like composition. Assuming the known biography of Titian as the ground-work of the story, the adventures of the great Painter are amplified and embellished in a graceful, if not peculiarly interesting tale, illustrative of the struggles and fate of Genius and the course of true love; while ingenious criticisms on painting, and eloquent disquisitions on the principles and influences of the Fine Arts, give unity of purpose and solidity to the work. The only great Artist is Titian; but we have, in Cornelius Agrippa, a philosopher and man of science. Their mistresses are lovely and high-born maidens of Venice. Of the condition of the Republic, and the most romantic of cities, we picturesquely see and learn a great deal, as the scene seldom changes from Venice. Many fine verses are interspersed through the romance, and with good effect. On the whole, however, we are compelled to fear that Titian will be received with more favour by cultivated readers, than by the circulating-library devourers of marvellous incidents, and admirers of burlesque characters.

First Lessons in Geography, for the Use of Schools. By George Rae. Stereotyped edition, enlarged and improved. Edinburgh: Macredie.

A useful, and well-filled cheap compendium.

The Gardener and Practical Florist. First volume. London: Groombridge.

There is much excellent, practical matter in this book.

Raymond; a Tale of Truth. 1 volume. Saunders & Otley.

In spite of our superabounding good-nature, we are not able to say much for Raymond, as a literary production; but, as there was never yet any kind of story which did not find admirers suited to its character, we shall not despair for Raymond in this latter respect.

NEW POEMS.

Poems of the Fancy and Affections. By William Sinclair. Edinburgh: Tait.

Besides a piece of some length, entitled "The Maiden's Dream of Death," which displays tenderness and graceful fancy, this volume consists of numerous miscellaneous poems, generally on sentimental themes; and more distinguished by cultivated taste, gentleness, and softness, than by passion or vigour. Many of them are, indeed, truly sweet and engaging. Among our favourites are—The Highland Girl's Letter to her Sister—The Rose in the Burial Ground, and Lines suggested by Harvey's Painting, The Castaway. The volume is inscribed to Delta, with whose genius that of its author has a close affinity.

Poems—Tributes to Scarborough, Odes to Wellington and Napoleon, &c. &c. By Ben. Fenton. Saunders & Otley.

Papers of Regnault. Edward Bull.

SERIAL WORKS.

The Pictorial Edition of Shakspere. Shakspere; a Biography, Part 6; of the general Work, Part LII. In this new portion of this pleasant, though two-thirds imaginative and imaginary biography, we have Shakspere in London, and in contact with Raleigh, Greene, Peele, Lodge, Lyly, Marlowe, and other illustrious literary contemporaries. There is thus unbounded scope for the conjectural biography, which also forms a kind of dramatic literary history of the Elizabethan era.

Cumming's Fox's Book of Martyrs. Part XXI., with a View of Naples. This Part treats of the first years of the reign of Edward VI., when, if persecution had ceased, the spirit of intolerance was not inactive.

Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland. Part XXII. This Part contains two fine and characteristic plates, Devenish Island in Lough Erne, a beautifully lucid view; and Taking a Stag near Derrycunnihy Cascade, a striking scene, finely depicted. The other plates are fair enough, but inferior to these in subject and handling.

Thornton's History of British India. Volume IV.; Parts 4th & 5th.

The Phreno-Magnet, and Mirror of Nature, &c., &c. Edited by Spencer T. Hall. No. I. This new periodical is intended to form a record of Facts, Experiments, and Discoveries in Phrenology and Magnetism, which are henceforth, we presume, to be regarded, if not as twins, then as intimate auxiliaries or allies. Phreno-Magnetism has its root in the United States, where it is at present a favourite pursuit, these two new sciences being held to prove each other.

Chambers' Cyclopedia of English Literature. Part IV.

Popular Cyclopedia of Natural Science. Part III. Mechanical Philosophy.

German Amaranths. No. II.

Martin Doyle's Practical Husbandry. Part XI.

PAMPHLETS AND TRACTS.

A Dream of a Queen's Reign.—This is an ingenious production, written by a philanthropic and patriotic individual, who has adopted the machinery of a Vision to arrest attention. The queen is Queen Victoria, who with Religion, Justice, and History—three most illustrious ladies—holds discourse on many subjects of deep interest to the community. How far the living, impatient, and earnest generation—earnest from suffering—may relish the machinery of these Visions, we are not prepared to say; though we must heartily approve of the writer's attempt to win the ear of the public to the grave and pressing truths which he has to propound.

England and her Interests—and "The Times" Considered. By John White, A.M.—The writer is all for the Anti-Corn Law League, and decidedly hostile to "The Times" newspaper.

The Duty of Excommunicating the "Moderate" Ministers of the Church of Scotland.

War and Peace—the Evils of the First, and a Plan for Preserving the Last. By William Jay.—This is a reprint of the Essay of Judge Jay, issued by those of the friends of Peace who form the committee of the London Peace Society. We are glad to learn that a Peace Convention, in terms of a previous arrangement, is to be held in London in June next. Before that time, Judge Jay's pamphlet may have done something to promote the spread of the fundamental principle of this association—namely, "that war is inconsistent with Christianity, and the truest interests of mankind."

Victoriaism; or, a Re-Organization of the People, Moral, Social, and Political, &c. &c. &c., in Letters to Sir Robert Peel.

Letters on Free Trade, addressed to Lord John Russell. By Walter Fletcher, Liverpool.—An excellent pamphlet, by a genuine free-trader, though some of his remedies may be questioned. Trade ought not only to be free, but every man should be free to exercise his trade, untaxed. Now, Mr. Fletcher proposes, as a source of revenue, and substitute for the income-tax, to license all trades and professions, as attorneys and hawkers are licensed at present.

Machinery, its Tendency Viewed, particularly in reference to the Working Classes. By an Artisan.

An Exposure of Female Prostitution in London, Leeds, and Rochdale, but especially in Glasgow. By William Logan, City Missionary; with an Introduction, by the Rev. William Anderson of the Relief Church, John Street, Glasgow.—Another horrible record; but with fewer incredible-looking general averments and inferences than we have seen in works of this nature, written as if for the purpose of producing a startling effect. This City missionary, who ought to have good opportunities of accurate knowledge, says, "I have seen procuresses going to church in this city, dressed so modestly that no person could imagine that they were looking out for good-looking girls for the purpose of decoying them." In another place he says, Tracts are often seen in the kitchens of brothels; and that, at the last annual meeting of the Church of England Missionary Society, held in Glasgow, he observed two first-class harlots attending. There have surely now been enough and too many publications exposing the fearful extent and wide-spreading evils of prostitution. The remedies are what society longs to hear of. Magdalene Asylums do not meet a hundredth part of the evil, although in this case, above all others, prevention were not infinitely better than any remedy whatever. "If," says this pamphlet, "one-fourth of the time and money were appropriated for the detection of procuresses and supporters, government would not be called upon for so many grants for erecting Prisons and Penitentiaries."

Conservative System of Joint Stock and Commercial and Industrial Associations. This is a modification of Owen's Social Communities; but somewhat more rational.

The Drainage of Lands and Sewerage of Towns, with a few suggestions previous to the passing of any act for draining and sewerage. A reprint from The Westminster Review, containing many useful suggestions.

LAYS OF THE WOULD-BE LAUREATES.

CONTRIBUTED BY BON GUALTIER.

We were contemplating the perpetration of certain elegiac stanzas, in the style of Spenser, upon the demise of our recently-departed laureate. Our study was darkened; a branch of cypress nodded over our mantelpiece; our shirt-collar hung loosely from our neck; our eyes were beginning to roll with true poetic frenzy; we had actually nibbed a new pen, and written the preliminary "Oh," when the entrance of the servant with a gigantic packet interrupted our proceedings. The mystic letters, "ON HER MAJESTY'S SERVICE," printed upon the back of the packet, before the direction "For Bon Gualtier, Old Nick Street, Edinburgh," interested our attention forthwith. We felt a proud consciousness that we had never been of the slightest service to the Conservative party—rather the reverse; but as this seems—to judge by some recent Scotch appointments—to be a recommendation rather than otherwise, we were not without a hope, that the envelope might contain our nomination to some snug place,

> Where labours light, and very ample pay,
> Might give us cause to bless each quarter-day.

In fact we had made up our minds to decline anything short of a thousand a-year, and to spurn at a baronetcy, if that should happen to be the contents of the despatch,—when a shower of manuscripts falling from the interior of the packet, relieved us from all apprehensions upon either point.

It is not, of course, for us to reveal the particulars of that official communication, though it bore indisputable evidence of our being honoured with the confidence of her Majesty's government. Suffice it, that the Sybilline leaves which had dropped from the official cover, were neither more nor less than the various applications that had been made to the Home Secretary for the vacant laurel. Unable to rely on his own judgment, and seeing, that as Mr. Wakley had not a seat in the government, he could not have the benefit of his fine poetical discrimination, Sir James Graham had brought his difficulty under the notice of her Majesty. We shall not repeat her Majesty's remarks on the occasion: all that it is necessary for us to observe is, that the despatch of the documents to us was the result. Blushing from the roots of the hair to the points of our great-toes at the unlooked-for honour, we at once flung our abortive elegiacs in the fire, and proceeded to the perusal of these multiform effusions of the British Helicon.

We have said that the Home Secretary had not the benefit of Mr. Wakley's fine poetical discrimination to direct his judgment. It would appear, however, that even although Mr. Wakley had been familiar with the official red tape, personal considerations would have warped his usually-acute perceptions of the beautiful. He is himself a candidate for the office; and his application puts his views, as to poetry and poets, in so clear a light, that it were superfluous to add one word upon the subject. Here it is:—

THE CORONER'S CORONAL.

What's a poet? One who writes
  What nobody ever reads;
One who raves about moonlights,
  Dicky-birds and flowery meads;
One to whom a pretty woman
Is a being superhuman,—
A sort of cross-breed, gay and airy,
'Twixt an angel and a fairy.
  That's a poet!

What's a poet? One you'll see
  By the side of murmuring brooks,
Looking so, you'd swear that he
  Is a patient from St. Luke's;
One who maunders through the town
With long hair and collar down;
By the heath of Highgate lingers,
Counts his feet upon his fingers.
  That's a poet!

What's a laureate? One whose lays
By a pension are inspired,
Who wears a thing they call the bays,
And writes an ode when he's desired.
What's an ode? I'm noways clear
What an ode may be, but hear
'Tis some stuff about the Queen;
Long lines, with shorter lines between.
That's an ode!

Poets, laureates, odes, and all,
Are sheer humbug, that's a fact;
Young and aged, great and small,
All your rhyming birds are crack'd.
There is Wordsworth, doting elf,
I could write as well myself,
In domestic medicine's praises,
As he of buttercups and daisies.
That I could!

Give me but the laureate's place,
Soon my genius shall enhance it;
Songs each Crowner's 'Quest shall grace,
I shall versify the Lancet.
Give me but the laureate's pay,
Ballad-singers all the day
Shall have matter for their chimes,—
"Wakley's Royal Nursery Rhymes,
By the yard!"

A very concise exposition of Mr. Wakley's poetical creed, certainly. Government should take him at his offer, and engage him to put Buchan's Domestic Medicine and The London Pharmacopeia into octosyllabics for the use of schools. We should soon have the whole faculty following his example. Pills and poetry would be blended in one prescription. Instead of the cabalistic scrolls, garnished with snakes' tails and triangles, in which our leeches now issue their fiats to the apothecaries, we should have some such graceful mandate as this:—

When life appears a sullen waste,
And the mouth feels a nauseous taste—
When you abhor the genial cup, or Breakfast, dinner, tea, and supper,—
To the next chemist swift repair,
And tell him to compound, with care,
Eight drachms of colocynth with two
Of those fine pills which men call blue.
These swallow ere you go to bed.
Next day will find you well, or dead.

Such verses would take even the bitterness of quassia out of a patient's mouth.

We are naturally of a humane disposition, and should, therefore, have much pleasure in handing over the modest author of the following rhapsody to the trenchant scalpel of Mr. Wakley. Few men have written more verses—few less poetry, than Mr. Robert Montgomery, who realizes to the letter the Proud of a vast extent of flimsy lines of Pope. In the following effusion, he has out-Montgomeried Montgomery. If our readers feel any surprise at not understanding it, they can know little of his "Omnipresence" or his "Satan." It wants a title. We shall give it one.

MONTGOMERY. A POEM.

Like one who, waking from a troublous dream,
Pursues with force his meditative theme;
Calm as the ocean in its halcyon still,
Calm as the sunlight sleeping on the hill,
Calm as at Ephesus Great Paul was seen
To rend his robes in agonies serene,
Calm as the love that radiant Luther bore
To all that lived behind him, and before;
Calm as meek Calvin, when, with holy smile,
He sang the mass around Servetus' pile;
So once again I snatch this harp of mine
To breathe rich incense from a mystic shrine.
Not now to whisper to the ambient air
The sounds of Satan's Universal Prayer;
Not now to sing, in sweet domestic strife,
That woman reigns the Angel of our life;
But to proclaim the wish with pious art,
Which thrills through Britain's universal heart,
That on this brow, with native honours graced,
The Laureate's chaplet should at length be placed!

Fear not, ye maids, who love to hear me speak:
Let no desponding tears bedim your cheek!
No gust of envy, no malicious scorn,
Hath this pure heart of mine with phrenzy torn.
There are who move so far above the great,
Their very look disarms the glance of hate.
Their thoughts, more rich than emerald or gold,
Enwrap them like the prophet's mantle's fold.
Fear not for me, nor think that this our age,
Blind though it be, hath yet no Archimage.
I, who have bathed in bright Castalia's tide,
By classic Oxford, and more classic Clyde;
I, who have handled, in my lofty strain,
All things divine, and many things profane;
I, who have trod where seraphs fear to tread;
I, who on mountain—honey dew have fed;
I, who, undaunted, broke the mystic seal,
And left no page for prophets to reveal;
I, who in shade portentous Dante threw;
I, who have done what Milton dared not do,—
I fear no rival for the vacant throne.
No mortal thunder shall eclipse my own.

Let dark Macaulay chant his Roman lays,
Let Monckton Milnes go maunder for the bays,
Let Simmons call on great Napoleon's aid,
Let Lytton Bulwer seek his Aram's aid,
Let Wordsworth ask for help from Peter Bell,
Let Campbell carol Copenhagen's knell,
Let Delta warble through his Delphic groves,
Let Elliott shout for pork and penny loaves:
I care not, I—resolved to stand or fall,
One down, another on, I'll smash them all.

Back, ye profane! this hand alone hath power
To pluck the laurel from its sacred bower;
This brow alone is privileged to wear
The ancient wreath o'er hyacinthine hair;
These lips alone may quaff the sparkling wine,
And make its mortal juice once more divine.
Back, ye profane! And thou, fair queen, rejoice,
A nation's praise shall consecrate thy choice.
Thus, then, I kneel, where Spenser knelt before,
On the same spot, perchance, of Windsor's floor,
And take, while awestruck millions round me stand,
The hallow'd wreath from great Victoria's hand.

Good, twanging, sonorous lines, and quite as edifying as sounding brass or tinkling cymbals—quite. Had the author only lived in the days of Elkanah Settle or Shadwell, he might have tried a fall with them for the bays, and not without hope of success. Dryden's panegyric on Macflecknoe might have been written for him.

Others to some faint meaning make pretence,
But Robert never deviates into sense.

This won't do in these days of Penny Magazines and Informations for the People.

After all this grandiloquence something in a lighter vein will not be unacceptable. Here is a graceful set of verses by the author of Lalla Rookh—a faint echo of his early "Kiss be my passport to heaven" style.

OH, WEEP FOR THE HOURS.

Oh, weep for the hours, when the little, blind boy
  Long held me in thrall in the Paphian bower,
When I dipped my light wings in the nectar of joy,
  And soared in the sunshine, the moth of the hour.
From beauty to beauty I passed like the wind;
  Now fondled the lily, now toy'd with the rose;
And the fair that at morn had enchanted my mind,
  Was forsook for another ere evening's close.

I sighed not for honour, I cared not for fame,
  While pleasure sat by me, and love was my guest:
They twined a fresh wreath for each day as it came,
  And the bosom of beauty still pillow'd my rest.
And the harp of my country—neglected it slept—
  In hall or by greenwood unheard were its songs;
When love's dream was dispelled, I roused me, and swept
  Its chords as I sang of her glories and wrongs.

But weep for the hour—Life's summer is past,
  And the snow of its winter lies cold on my brow;
And my soul, as it shrinks from each thrill of the blast,
  Cannot turn to a fire that glows inwardly now.
No, its ashes are dead—and, alas! love nor song
  No charm to life's fast-closing shadows can lend,
Like a cup of old wine, rich, mellow, and strong,
  And a seat by the fire tête-à-tête with a friend.

This is Cupid on crutches, with a vengeance. The bulk of the verses before us proves very clearly, that the practical tendency of the age has affected even the poets. It is not the laurel wreath,

Disgraced by Cibber, and contemn'd by Gray, which forms the object of their ambition. That radiant crown is of very secondary importance; and the butt of sherry occupies the first place in the minstrel's affection. Scarcely one of these poems is without allusion, more or less direct, to this interesting source of contemplation. In none of them, however, is it more prominent than in the following:—

THE POET'S MEED.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

Southey's dead, and I am drouthy:—
Let me have the post of Southey.

Terse as a Greek epigram; but sensual—very. Mr. Hood should take a hint from the confectioners, who never issue their dishes of preserved ginger without a becoming garnish of bay leaves. The same tendency is very palpable in the following spirited lines by a poet, who is a great favourite of ours. They are in his early or middle style, rather than his later; but they are not the less pleasing on that account.

THE LAUREATE.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

Who would not be
The laureate bold,
With his butt of sherry
To keep him merry,
And nothing to do but to pocket his gold!

'Tis I would be the laureate bold!
When the days are hot, and the sun is strong,
I'd lounge in the gateway all the day long,
With her Majesty's footmen in crimson and gold.
I'd care not a pin for the waiting-lord;
But I'd lie on my back on the smooth, green sward,
With a straw in my mouth, and an open vest,
And the cool wind blowing upon my breast,
And I'd vacantly stare at the clear blue sky,
And watch the clouds as listless as I,
  Lazily, lazily!

And I'd pick the moss and the daisies white,
And chew their stalks with a nibbling bite;
And I'd let my fancies roam abroad
In search of a hint for a birth-day ode,
  Crazily, crazily!

——Oh, that would be the life for me,
With plenty to get, and nothing to do,
But to deck a pet poodle with ribbons of blue,
And whistle all day to the Queen's cockatoo,
  Dreamingly, dreamingly.
Then the chamber-maids, that clean the rooms,
Would come to the windows, and rest on their brooms,
With their saucy caps, and their crispèd hair,
And they'd toss their heads in the fragrant air,
And say to each other—"Just look down there
At the nice young man, so tidy and small,
Who is paid for writing on nothing at all,
  Handsomely, handsomely!"
They would pelt me with matches and sweet pastilles,
And crumpled up balls of the royal bills,
Giggling and laughing, and screaming with fun,
As they'd see me start, with a leap and a run,
From the broad of my back to the points of my toes,
When a pellet of paper hit my nose,
  Sneezingly, sneezingly.
Then I'd fling them bunches of garden flowers,
And hyacinths plucked from the Castle bowers,
And I'd challenge them all to come down to me,
And I'd kiss them all, till they kissèd me,
  Laughingly, laughingly.

Oh, would not that be a merry life,
Apart from care, and apart from strife,
With the laureate's wine and the laureate's pay,
And no deductions at quarter-day!
Oh, that would be the post for me,
With plenty to get, and nothing to do,
But to deck a pet poodle with ribbons of blue,
And whistle a tune to the Queen's cockatoo,
And scribble of verses remarkably few,
And at evening empty a bottle or two,
  Quaffingly, quaffingly!

  Oh, 'tis I would be
  The laureate bold,
  With my butt of sherry,
  To keep me merry,
  And nothing to do but to pocket my gold!

The man who appreciates a sinecure so well, ought certainly to have it.

Turn we now to Windsor, of whose festive board we are furnished with a delightful glimpse in the following ballad, written apparently by one of the footmen, to judge by the name attached to it.

THE ROYAL BANQUET.

BY JOSEPH JENKINS.

The Queen, she kept high festival in Windsor's lordly hall,
And round her sate the gartered knights, and ermined nobles all;
There drank the valiant Wellington, there fed the wary Peel,
And at the bottom of the board Prince Albert carved the veal.

"What, pantler, ho! remove the cloth! Ho! cellarer, the wine,
And bid the royal nurse bring in the hopes of Brunswick's line!"
Then rose with one tumultuous shout the band of British peers,
"God bless her sacred Majesty! Let's see the little dears!"

Now, by Saint George, our patron saint, 'twas a touching sight to see
That iron warrior gently place the Princess on his knee,

To hear him hush her infant fears, and teach her how to gape,
With rosy mouth expectant for the raisin and the grape!

They pass'd the wine, the sparkling wine—they filled the goblets up,
Even Brougham, the cynic anchorite, smiled blandly on the cup,
And Lyndhurst with a noble thirst, that nothing could appease,
Proposed the immortal memory of King William on his knees.

"What want we here, my gracious liege," cried good Lord Aberdeen,
"Save gladsome song and minstrelsy to flow our cups between!
I ask not now for Goulburn's voice or Knatchbull's warbling lay,
But where's the Poet Laureate to grace our board to-day?"

Loud laugh'd the Knight of Netherby, and scornfully he cried,
"Or art thou mad with wine, Lord Earl, or art thyself beside!
Eight hundred Bedlam bards have claim'd the Laureate's vacant crown,
And now like frantic Bacchanals run wild through London town!"

"Now glory to our gracious Queen,!" a voice was heard to cry,
And dark Macaulay stood before them all with phrenzied eye,
"Now glory to our gracious Queen, and all her glorious race!
A boon, aboon, my sovran liege! Give me the Laureate's place!

"'Twas I that sang the might of Rome, the glories of Navarre;
And who could swell the fame so well of Britain's Isles afar!
The hero of a hundred fights—" Then Wellington up sprung,
"Ho, silence in the ranks, I say! Sit down, and hold your tongue.

"By heaven, thou shalt not twist my name into a jingling lay,
Or mimic in thy puny song the thunders of Assaye!
'Tis hard that for thy lust of place in peace we cannot dine.
Nurse, take her Royal Highness here! Sir Robert, pass the wine!"

"No laureate need we at our board!" then spoke the Lord of Vaux,
Here's many a voice to charm the ear with minstrel song, I know,
Even I myself—" Then rose the cry—"A song, a song from Brougham!"
He sang,—and straightway found himself alone within the room.

Brougham singing! No wonder the royal party absconded so rapidly! We are sorry for Macaulay. The Duke, we think, took him up on this occasion rather snappishly. However, we trust he will take his revenge by turning a few of the incidents in the "iron warrior's" life into Lays. He might have worse employment, even at "The Windsor Castle."

The next poem we take up is by Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer, and is in a more stately vein. Sir Edward, reversing the usual order of literary progression seems of late to have abandoned the Kennington Common of prose for the Tempe of poetry. Far be it from us to chide him for the defection. Messrs. Saunders & Otley know best whether the three-volume system may be profitably continued. But as to an undivided flirtation with the muses, we certainly think that Sir Edward is rather old for the task. It is quite legitimate for boys —— To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,

Or with the tangles of Neæra's hair.

But, when gentlemen are verging on the forties, it is quite a different affair.

A MIDNIGHT MEDITATION.

BY SIR E. L. BULWER.

Fill me once more the foaming pewter up!
Another board of oysters, ladye mine!
To-night Lucullus with himself shall sup:
These mute inglorious Miltons are divine!
And as I here in slipper'd ease recline,
Quaffing of Perkins' Entire my fill,
I sigh not for the lymph of Aganippe's rill.

A nobler inspiration fires my brain,
Caught from Old England's fine time-hallow'd drink.
I snatch the pot again and yet again,
And, as the foaming fluids shrink and shrink,
Fill me once more, I say, up to the brink!
This makes strong hearts—strong heads attest its charm—
This nerves the might that sleeps in Britain's brawny arm!

But these remarks are neither here nor there.
Where was I? Oh, I see old Southey's dead.
They'll want some bard to fill the vacant chair,
And drain the annual butt—and oh, what head,
More fit with laurel to be garlanded,
Than this, which, curl'd with many a fragrant coil,
Breathes of Castalia's streams, and best Macassar oil!

I know a grace is seated on my brow,
Like young Apollo's with his golden beams.
There should Apollo's bays be budding now;—
And in my flashing eyes the radiance beams,
That marks the poet in his waking dreams,
When, as his fancies cluster thick and thicker,
He feels the trance divine of poesy and liquor.

They throng around me now, those things of air,
That from my fancy took their being's stamp:
There Pelham sits and twirls his glossy hair,
There Clifford leads his pals upon the tramp:
There pale Zanoni, bending o'er his lamp,
Roams through the starry wilderness of thought,
Where all is everything, and everything is nought.

Yes, I am he, who sung, how Aram won
The gentle ear of pensive Madeline,
How love and murder hand in hand may run,
Cemented by philosophy serene,
And kisses bless the spot where gore has been;—
Who breathed the melting sentiment of crime,
And for the assassin waked a sympathy sublime.

Yes, I am he who on the Novel shed
Obscure philosophy's enchanting light,
Until the public, wilder'd as they read,
Believed they saw that which was not in sight.
Of course 'twas not for me to put them right;
For in my inmost heart convinced I am,
Philosophy's as good as any other flam.

Novels three-volumed I shall write no more;
Somehow or other now they will not sell,
And to invent new passions is a bore.
I find the Magazines pay quite as well.
Translating's simple, too, as I can tell,
Who 've hawked at Schiller on his lyric throne,
And given the astonish'd bard a meaning all my own.

Moore, Campbell, Wordsworth, their best days are grass'd;
Battered and broken are their early lyres;

Rogers, a pleasant memory of the past,
Warmed his young hands at Smithfield's martyr fires,*
And, worth a plum, nor bays nor butt desires.
But these are things would suit me to the letter,
For, though this Stout is good, old Sherry's greatly better.
A fico for your small poetic ravers,
Your Hunts, your Tennysons, Mackays and these!
Shall they dispute with him who wrote Maltravers,
Sequel to Alice or the Mysteries?
No! Even now my glance prophetic sees
My own high brow girt with the bays about.
What ho, within there, ho! another pint of Stout!

Majestic as these stanzas are, Sir Edward's vision of the bays must, we fear, remain a strictly poetical one, as we see no chance of her majesty converting it into a reality.

Our next selection shall be a poem by the bard, who murmurs his lyric notes by the banks of the fragrant Molendinar, investing his native Gorbals in—

The light that never was on sea or land,
The consecration and the poet's dream.

The transition from the stately cadence of the stanzas just quoted to the terse downrightness and simple Doric of what we are about to quote, is somewhat abrupt. But the contrast may serve to bring out in more engaging relief the beauties of

I'M YER MAN.

BY SANDY RODGER.

What means a' this stir an this quarrel?
It's just about naething ava',
A wheen silly leaves o' green laurel,
That are no worth the neb of a craw!
Awa' wi' yer nonsense an' havers,
O' fame, an' renown, an' the like—
The chiel that wad trust to sic clavers
Will dee at the back o' a dyke!
"Gude sake, man, ye're unco mistaken,
I warn ye weel for to try;
There's hantle o' bannocks and bacon,
And a barrel o' gude wine forbye!
There's walth, Sirs, o' eatin' an' drinkin',
Ye're verra weel paid for yer sangs,
And no muckle fash about thinkin',
It's e'en just like rattlin' the tangs!"
Ou then they may mak' me the Laurat,
There's nane half sae gude as mysel';
I'll screech a' the day like a parrot,
An' hammer oot odes by the ell!
But, loch, to toom wine by the bicker
Wad mak' me uncommonly husky,
Sae maybe they'll alter the liquor,
And gie me a hogshead o' whusky.

There cannot be a doubt that her majesty's government will accede to so truly national a request, whenever they decide upon bestowing upon Mr. Rodger the laurel leaves, which he holds in such proper contempt—not sooner. Passing by a sheaf of applications in similarly classical strains by the Parnassus of poets, to whom Whistle Binkie is the Magnus Apollo, we come at once to a ballad in the stirring and graphic style, which we confess has a charm for us above every other.

THE LAUREATES' TOURNEY.

BY THOMAS BABINGTON MACAULAY.

FYTTE THE FIRST.

"What news, what news, thou pilgrim grey, what news from southern land?
How fare the bold Conservatives, how is it with Ferrand?
How does the little Prince of Wales—how looks our lady Queen,
And tell me, is the gentle Brough. once more at Windsor seen?"

"I bring no tidings from the court, nor from St. Stephen's hall.
I've heard the thundering tramp of horse, and the trumpet's battle call,
And these old eyes have seen a fight, which England ne'er hath seen,
Since fell King Richard sobb'd his soul through blood on Bosworth Green.

He's dead, he's dead, the Laureate's dead! 'twas thus the cry began,
And straightway every garret roof gave up its minstrel man.
From Grub Street, and from Houndsditch, and from Farringdon Within,
The poets all towards Whitehall pour'd on with eldritch din.

Loud yell'd they for Sir James the Graham: but sore afraid was he:
A hardy knight were he that might face such a minstrelsie.
"Now by St. Giles of Netherby, my patron saint, I swear,
I'd rather by a thousand crowns Lord Palmerston were here!—

"What is't ye seek, ye rebel knaves, what make you there beneath?"
"The bays, the bays, we want the bays! we seek the laureate wreath!
We seek the butt of generous wine that cheers the sons of song:
Choose thou among us all, Sir Knight—we may not tarry long!"

Loud laughed the good Sir James in scorn—"Rare jest it were, I think,
But one poor butt of Xeres, and a thousand rogues to drink!
An' if it flowed with wine or beer, 'tis easy to be seen,
That dry within the hour would be the well of Hippocrene.

"Tell me, if on Parnassus' heights there grow a thousand sheaves,
Or has Apollo's laurel bush yet borne ten hundred leaves?
Or if so many leaves were there, how long would they sustain
The ravage and the glutton bite of such a locust train?

"No! Get ye back into your dens, take counsel for the night,
And choose me out two champions to meet in deadly fight.
To-morrow's dawn shall see the lists marked out in Spitalfields,
And he who wins shall have the bays, and he shall die who yields!"

Down went the window with a crash—In silence and in fear
Each ragged bard looked anxiously upon his neighbour near.
Then up and spake young Tennyson—"Who 's here that fears for death?
'Twere better one of us should die than England lose the wreath!

"Let 's cast the lots among us now, which two shall fight to-morrow;—
For armour bright we 'll club our mite, and horses we can borrow.
'Twere shame that bards of France should sneer, and German Dichters too,
If none of British song would dare a deed of derring-do!"

"The lists of love are mine," said Moore, "and not the lists of Mars;"
Said Hunt, "I seek the jars of wine, but shun the combat's jars!"

* Sir Edward has, by this fine line, fixed a date for Rogers' birth, which hitherto has been a desideratum in literary history. It was generally believed that the date of this event had perished in the obscurity of the middle ages.

"I'm old," quoth Samuel Rogers.—"Faith," says Campbell, "so am I!"
"And I'm in holy orders, Sirs!" quoth Tom of Ingoldsby.
"Now out upon ye, craven loons!" cried Moxon, good at need,—
"Bide, if ye will, secure at home, and sleep while others bleed.
I second Alfred's motion, boys,—let 's try the chance of lot,
And monks shall sing, and bells shall ring for him that goes to pot."

Eight hundred minstrels slunk away—two hundred stayed to draw,—
Now heaven protect the daring wight that pulls the longest straw!
'Tis done! 'tis done! And who hath won? Keep silence, one and all,—
The first is William Wordsworth hight, the other Ned Fitzball!"

FYTTE THE SECOND.

Oh, bright and gay hath dawn'd the day on lordly Spitalfields,—
How flash the rays with ardent blaze from polish'd helms and shields!
On either side the chivalry of England throng the green,
And in the middle balcony appears our gracious Queen.

With iron fists, to keep the lists, two valiant knights appear,
The Marquis Hal of Waterford, and stout Sir Aubrey Vere.
"What ho, there, herald, blow the trump! Let 's see who comes to claim
The butt of golden Xeres, and the Laureate's honour'd name!"

That instant dash'd into the lists, all arm'd from head to heel,
On courser brown, with vizor down, a warrior sheath'd in steel.
Then said our Queen—"Was ever seen so stout a knight and tall.
His name?—his race?"—"An't please your Grace, it is the brave Fitzball.

"Oft in the Melodrama line his prowess hath been shown,
And well throughout the Surrey side his thirst for blood is known.
But see, the other champion comes."—Then rung the startled air
With shouts of, "Wordsworth, Wordsworth, ho! the bard of Rydal's here."

And lo, upon a little steed, unmeet for such a course,
Appeared the honour'd veteran: but weak seem'd man and horse.
Then shook their ears the sapient peers, "That joust will soon be done:
My Lord of Brougham, I'll back Fitzball, and give you two to one!"

"Done!" quoth the Brougham,—"and done with you!"
"Now, minstrels, are you ready?"
Exclaimed the Lord of Waterford,—"you'd better both sit steady.
Blow, trumpets, blow the note of charge! and forward to the fight!"
"Amen!" said good Sir Aubrey Vere, "Saint Schism defend the right!"

As sweeps the blast against the mast, when blows the furious squall,
So started at the trumpet's sound the terrible Fitzball:
His lance he bore his breast before,—Saint George protect the just,
Or Wordsworth's hoary head must roll within the shameful dust!

"Who threw that calthrop? Seize the knave!" Alas, the deed is done;
Down went the steed, and o'er his head flew bright Apollo's son.
"Undo his helmet! cut the lace! pour water on his head!"
"It ain't no use at all, my lord; 'cos vy? the covey's dead!"

Above him stood the Rydal bard—his face was full of woe,—
"Now there thou liest, stiff and stark, who never feared a foe.
A braver knight, or more renowned in tourney and in hall,
Ne'er brought the upper gallery down than terrible Fitzball!"

They led our Wordsworth to the Queen—she crown'd him with the bays,
And wish'd him many happy years, and many quarter-days,—
And if you'd have the story told by abler lips than mine,
You've but to call at Rydal Mount, and taste the Laureate's wine!

We have a legion of poems still before us. Hunt gives us some "stout notions on the rhyming score." Campbell, with a burst of his old inspiration, sings,—

Macaulay, Macaulay! beware of the day,
When we meet to compete for the laureate's bay.

Knowles, Talfourd, and the author of Martinuzzi, put in their oars,—but our readers have had enough of verse for one bout, and we would wish to conclude with the music of Macaulay's ballad twanging in our ears. It is a stirring picture—full of life and colour—like one of Rubens. But no, one little sonnet yet remains—the votive offering of the "hierophant of nature," whom Apollo so miraculously preserved from the fatal lance of the author of Zazezizozu. Tarry then with us yet a moment, gentle reader, and muse over the following apostrophe of conscious greatness.—

Non sine Dis animosus.

Bays, which in former years have graced the brow
Of some, who lived and loved, and sung and died;
Leaves, that were gathered on the pleasant side
Of old Parnassus, from Apollo's bough:
With palpitating hand I take ye now,
Since worthier minstrel there is none beside,—
And, with a thrill of song, half deified,
I bind them proudly on my locks of snow.
There shall they bide, till he who follows next,
Of whom I cannot even guess the name,
Shall by Court favour, or some vain pretext
Of fancied merit desecrate the same,—
And think, perchance, he wears them quite as well
As the sole bard who sang of Peter Bell.

We were so much affected by the noble simplicity of these lines, that we wrote, in strong terms, to the Home Office. The immediate installation of the bard of Rydal in the vacant place was the result.

SURFACEISM; OR, THE MANŒUVRES OF THE WORLD AND ITS WIFE.

BY MRS. GORE.

(Concluded from page 232 of our April Number.)

Few themes on which mankind have exercised their eloquence more fluently than the inconstancy of woman!—In prose and verse, romance and reality, it has been agreed for ages, that the uncertainty of the wind is steadiness itself compared with the fickleness of the sex.

Yet, whenever some warm-hearted girl like Louisa Hardingston, on being thrown off by the man who has deliberately engaged her affections, finds it difficult to recall the rich treasure so fatally thrown away, how little are her sufferings compassionated! That she should presume to persist in loving the man who has ceased to love her,—or rather ceased to pretend to love her,—is treated as an impertinence,—as want of knowledge of the world,—as "missishness." Having once received notice, in the altered attitude of the man so long enchained at her feet, that her affection has become importunate, she is expected to surmount, in a day, a feeling which, but a few days before, she was implored to perpetuate for life;—a feeling that has become part of herself,—vivifying every pulse of her existence, and tinging it with bitterness or joy.

When, in the course of the evening following their mutual explanations, Mr. Hardingston received a letter from Sidney Hammond, expressing deep regret that the limited nature of Louisa's fortune, combined with her habits of life, and the education she had received, must prevent him from realizing "the dearest wish of his heart," the infuriated father seemed to expect that a few execrations bestowed upon the name of the man he had hitherto praised so highly, would suffice to alter in a moment the feelings of his daughter; whereas at first, poor Louisa had naturally perfect faith in the sincerity of her lover's regrets, and saw in his conduct only the inevitable result of the deception practised upon him. The desperate nature of her father's position being still a secret, there was no reason to mistrust Sidney Hammond's professions of being unwilling to tear her from the comforts of such a home as hers, in order to share the privations of a man of humble fortune.

Under such circumstances what grounds had she for withdrawing her affections? On the contrary, while regretting her father's disappointment at the discovery of her lover's want of property, she saw only a stronger cause for attaching herself to the man so much less prosperous than she had supposed. He had become "poor Sidney" in her secret prayers and aspirations, in a very different sense from that assigned to the disparaging appellation by the Countess of Taunton.

But all this was nothing to the Surfaceite. Throughout the affair, he never gave a second thought to the feelings of the girl who believed herself a first object to him. All he considered was, the aspect the affair would assume in the eyes of the Taunton set;—and by what adroit colouring he might best disguise the nature of his disappointment. Nay, before three days had elapsed from the withdrawal of his pretensions to the hand of Louisa, he was looking around him for a fresh heiress. The season was only beginning. Before its close, some opportunity might be found to recommend himself anew to the favour of the Countess of Taunton.

Among the monied people with whom he had lately permitted himself to associate, were several families on which it would have suited him well enough to engraft himself. But he was afraid of the attempt. Though there was nothing in his conduct which Mr. Hardingston was, as a father, entitled to resent, it was impossible to guess in what light the city merchant might choose to represent it. Better turn to a new orbit for the furtherance of his projects.

To be deceived a second time with respect to the solidity of the fortune of his future wife, would have been too annoying; for "poor Sidney" could not afford to throw away his time as he had lately done, in fruitless speculations. When, therefore, he made up his mind to try his luck with a certain pretty little Irish widow, a Lady Lætitia de Burgh, who, on seeing him on such familiar terms at Altamont House with the fashionable Lady Taunton, had expressed a wish to make his acquaintance, and who was reported to have a jointure of two thousand a-year, and a reversion of considerable magnitude secured to her on the death of an elderly relative,—he was careful to obtain as much information concerning the will of the late Sir Cornelius de Burgh, as Doctors' Commons is always ready to supply for twelvepence lawful coin of the realm.

The result was satisfactory; so satisfactory that Hammond, free from all scruples of delicacy towards the Hardingstons, (by one of whom at least he pretended to think himself unhandsomely used,) lost no time in devoting himself to the lively widow. Lady Lætitia was an accomplished horsewoman; and well was it worth his while (having no further measures to keep with a city man by pretended attention to his profession) to exchange his showy phaeton for a good park-horse, to parade the dusty lengths of Rotten Row; where, at that period, female equestrians were as one to fifty in the present day. He was aware of appearing to great advantage on horseback, like most men who have not acquired a good seat and slouching gait by feats of sportsmanship; and became all the more delighted with the fair one to whom he was dedicating his time and attention, when he found himself shining in the eyes of the world; which perfectly approved that, having no duties to perform either at Brookes', White's, OR the House of Commons, he should devote his leisure to so pretty a woman.

And what a relief to his feelings was the pleasant company of a rattle like Lady Lætitia, after the dull formalities of the society in which he had been recently martyrized! The Irish widow was one who "said everything;" and of whom "everything" was accordingly said in return; but turning a deaf ear to the sayings that regarded her, Sidney Hammond listened solely to her own. Fresh from the court of Dublin, at a period when Dublin still possessed what might be called a court, she was full of pleasant anecdotes of pleasant people; and even the Prince was supposed to take delight in the laughing eyes and merry repartees of Lady Lætitia.

London, as if in revenge upon the stiff etiquettes of the court, still permitted itself the indiscretion of masquerades; and the Pantheon and Argyle Rooms were propitious scenes for his new courtship, of a nature so far more free and unguarded than it would have been permitted him to devote to the young daughter of Mr. Hardingston. Of Lady Lætitia's house, he had the unlimited entrée; frequently invited to dinner, and regular in his morning attendance as her horse and groom. It is true, the envied privilege was shared with half-a-dozen other admirers,—not good men and true, but, like himself, bad men and false. But he had little fear of even the most attractive among them; and would probably have hazarded his proposals after a very short acquaintance, but that he feared deference to the opinion of the world might prompt her to refuse an offer so rashly hazarded; whereas, by coquetting a little with the pretty widow, he trusted that his hand and heart would acquire double value in her sight.

To all appearance, these amiable intentions were reciprocal. As regarded coquetry, Lady Lætitia was fully a match for any Sidney Hammond in the land; and but that her ladyship's days of sunshine were so bright and pleasant, he would scarcely have found patience for the frequent storms that darkened his atmosphere, or darted around him their sinister corruscations. But "poor Sidney's" course of seasoning in the Taunton set, having accustomed him to such caprices, Lady Lætitia could scarcely have selected a more patient souffre douleur. He was, in fact, far better pleased to be made the butt of her good or ill-humour,—alternately coaxed or scolded,—than to share the calm indifference of her deportment towards others of her admirers; more especially Lord Robert de Burgh, a grave cousin of her late husband, and Sir Henry Winston of the Guards, whom every one but Lady Lætitia called Harry Winston, but whom she, as if the more to mark her displeasure at his assiduities, invariably addressed with coldness and reserve.

Even in Lady Lætitia's most whimsical moments, Sidney Hammond would have been sorry to exchange entreatment with Sir Henry. For "poor Sidney" was apparently ignorant of the aphorism, that love converts a prude into a coquette,—a coquette into a prude,—the grave to gay, the gay to grave;—and that the passion so apt to revolutionize human nature, may be estimated in force by such an influence over the character. A man less pre-absorbed by his own interests, would have inferred from the exceptions made by Lady Lætitia in favour of Lord Robert de Burgh and Sir Henry, that their influence over her feelings was far more considerable than his own.

To Lady Taunton, meanwhile, he gave himself the airs of having reluctantly renounced the Hardingston connexion, "in consequence of the extent of sacrifices exacted of him;" the word "sacrifices" being a favourite one with the Surfaceites, as equally vague and comprehensive. Her ladyship was, of course, at liberty to infer, that Miss Hardingston had demanded the "sacrifice" of memories of former attachment; or that her father, who was an ultra-Tory, (as yet Conservatives were not,) the "sacrifice" of his liberal political associates. To which alternative she leaned, it is needless to conjecture; but when, shortly afterwards, she beheld the perfidious Sidney performing the part of Master of the Horse to the rich widow, she decided that either he wished to conceal from the world his disappointment as regarded his pretty fiancée, or—that he was becoming a regular fortune-hunter.

Of Louisa's disappointment, who thought, or who cared?—Indignant against himself for having been, as he considered it, taken in, Mr. Hardingston visited upon the poor girl the irritation of his spirit; accusing her of the vexation and expense he had wantonly incurred; but, above all, exacting her unhesitating encouragement of the addresses of an elderly Portuguese merchant of considerable fortune, to whose addresses he had hitherto turned a deaf ear. Vainly did Louisa Hardingston plead that her affections were engaged! She was told that a girl endowed with becoming feminine modesty does not bestow her affections till she gives them at the altar; and on remonstrating that, right or wrong, she had infringed this severe prohibition, she was taunted with her want of pride in continuing to love the man who had so readily cast her off,—who had never been sincerely attached to her,—who had sought her only in the belief that she was rich and prosperous.

Still, these threats and tauntings on the part of Mr. Hardingston availed him nothing; for in the innocent heart of his daughter, abided the pure and fervent faith of woman's love: and she was incapable of surmising the treachery which might have justified a change in her feelings. As she neither rode, nor frequented Pantheon masquerades, nor the brilliant circles in which "poor Sidney" was now devoting himself to the Irish widow, her ignorance of his proceedings left her still a pretext for affection.

Sidney Hammond, meanwhile, was becoming inaugurated into a wholly different species of existence. Instead of the prudent, good sense of Miss Hardingston, he had to deal with the thoughtless whims of a madcap; who, from mere indiscretion, did not hesitate to accept trifling obligations from one having the habits and pretensions of a man of fortune. Lady Lætitia had not time to take heed of such trifles; and the ever-ready suitor was daily and hourly despatched for the execution of commissions,—to fetch boxes for the play or opera,—to order new whips, new saddles, new books, new engravings, as if he were already an accepted lover, or rather as if Lady Lætitia already wrote herself Hammond instead of De Burgh; while Sir Henry Winston, so far from being honoured with her ladyship's commissions, was allowed to remain all day unnoticed in her drawing-room, while the fortunate Sidney scoured all London in her behalf;—nay, more than London, for he was occasionally despatched as far as Hammersmith, to Lee and Kennedy's, in search of some rare exotic for her fanciful ladyship's bouquet.

A pleasant task enough, to become courier to so fine a lady, in weather as fine. But at the end of the first month's courtship, though Lady Lætitia's variability of temper had prevented any positive advances in her favour,—since she frowned back the latter part of the week the very assiduity she had sanctioned in the commencement,—poor Sidney found himself a quarter of a year's income out of pocket; for the commissions, however costly, imposed upon him, gallantry, of course, forbad him to leave to the credit of his liege lady. But all this mattered nothing. "To angle with a golden hook," though contrary to the policy of Julius Cæsar, is a favourite tenet of Surfaceism; and the rich jointure and reversion glittering before his eyes, would have determined him to make the hundreds expended, thousands, in the service of Lady Lætitia de Burgh.

Engrossed by his new pursuit, Sidney Hammond took no further thought of the Hardingstons than if London had not contained such a spot as Harley Street; though, had the old phaeton still remained in his service, the horses, more faithful than their master, would probably have been unable to pass through Cavendish Square without pulling towards the former scene of their daily attendance. But though secure among his present associates from collision with the city set, at places of public resort he occasionally came in contact with those who, ignorant of the rupture, would inquire of him after the friends who were no longer so much as his acquaintance!

One night, at Ranelagh, for instance, when, after escorting Lady Lætitia to her carriage, he returned a moment to the fête in search of Lord Robert de Burgh, who had promised him a place in his, as far as Brookes',—he was accosted by a young man, whose exaggerated style of dress rendered him an unwelcome companion to such a maccaroni as Sidney was becoming, even had he not pestered him with inquiries of "When he had last seen the Hardingstons;" and whether "he did not agree in his opinion, that even the Bristol waters would be ineffectual in restoring the lost bloom and broken health of poor Louisa?"

Even on hearing this, the seared conscience of Sidney Hammond felt no shame! It was not his fault if her father were so shabby a fellow as to render impossible a marriage that would have secured Miss Hardingston's happiness, and forestalled all necessity for Clifton. It was not his fault if a disappointed Marylebone Miss, desirous of shining in the great world as his wife, were suffering from the effects of an ambition thrown into the system.

With the most complete sang froid, accordingly, and still looking around him through his eye-glass for "his friend, Lord Robert," he expressed his regret to hear of Miss Hardingston's indisposition, and cited various instances of cures effected by the Hot-wells. "In his opinion, her father could not do better than take her to Clifton!"

Though Lady Taunton perfectly approved the projected union of her protégé, which would entitle her to patronize his wife, she was less pleased on learning and perceiving the favour in which he stood with the pretty little Irish widow, patronized by the Prince. Nevertheless, her mind misgave her that, even with Lady Lætitia's ignorance of the London world, she would scarcely throw away her brilliant advantages by a marriage with a young Templar of such moderate condition; and it was more for the gratification of her curiosity on this point than from a feeling of jealousy, that the Countess, whose acquaintance with her was slight, invited her one evening to Taunton House.

Sidney Hammond literally trembled when he heard of the invitation! Two imminent risks awaited him. Lady Lætitia, who had not yet set foot within the sanctuary of the élite of London society, would either command triumphant success, and acquire ambitions fatal to his prospects; or her brogue and oddities of manner and idea would expose her to ridicule,—a ridicule necessarily extending to her admirers. To prevent her accepting the invitation, however, he was too cunning to attempt;—having learned from experience, the efficacy of opposition, on all occasions, in confirming the intentions of the wilful little beauty.

Neither acquiescence nor remonstrance, however, would, on this occasion, have altered Lady Lætitia's intentions. Enchanted to find herself sought by those whose acquaintance all London was seeking, she repaired to Taunton House, highly amused at "poor Sidney's" irritation at the neglect of his former friends.

Allusion has been already made to the unfavourable influence exercised in society by the excessive rigour of Queen Charlotte in the formation of such opposition circles as the Taunton set. But the high colouring of this little group of pretty and witty vauriens was colourless beside the dare-all doings of the Vice-regal Court, from which Lady Lætitia de Burgh had recently emanated; and welcome indeed was the accession of so lively and reckless a member to the circle whose factitious spirits were somewhat apt to flag. Having laughed at the wit of Fox, Hare, and Sheridan, till they were tired,—the blunders, brogue, and audacity of Lady Lætitia were a charming relief.

From the conversation of Sidney Hammond she had gathered sufficient information concerning the secrets of her new associates, to render the edge of her irony somewhat alarming; and the moment Lady Lætitia discovered, from an indiscreet remark of General Fitzpatrick's, that she had been invited to make sport for the Philistines, she retorted with a more than sufficient share of national humour.

It happened that, at the moment she entered the room, three of the most fashionable beauties present were laughing immoderately at the recollection of an insult they had offered from Lady Taunton's box at Covent Garden, the preceding night, to that accomplished actress Miss Brunton,—(an object of jealousy to one of the party,)—by which she had been so much overcome as to burst into tears.

"Sure ye remind me," cried Lady Lætitia, exaggerating her usual brogue, for the gratification of their malice,—"of a scane that happened in our own Theatre-royal, Dublin,—where three women of ton, as they called themselves, (the top o' the tree, —like yerselves,) were in the stage-box, whooping and coughing, and laughing their hearts out, till they made a poor young cratur of an actress who was playing Lady Towneley, stop short in her part.—'Pon which, a young student of the univarsity,—neither more nor less than the present Sir Paul J——, jumped up in the middle o' the pit, t' address the audience; and says he, 'Ladies and Gentlemen, I insist upon it,' says he, 'and I know you'll maintain me in the proposition, that those three drunken officers dressed up as ladies, in the stage-box,' says he, 'be turned out of the house!'"*

A dead silence followed this daring sally. But Lady Taunton, not choosing to accept the covert affront, soon recovered herself sufficiently to laugh off the attack.

"You surprise me, my dear Lady Lætitia," cried she. "I had always heard your countrymen cited as remarkable for their chivalry. And to sanction a public attack upon three women!—I never should have expected it."

"Surely not,—if they had been women," cried Lady Lætitia, with unabated spirit. "But those who dared to insult a poor cratur of their own sex, in an infarior station, surely forfeited all claim and privilege belonging to it: and the audience was of the same way o' thinking; for, without more ado, they set set up three cheers for Sir Paul; —and, betwixt you and I, the drunken officers in women's clothes, as they were called by the people, had a hard matter to get out of the house without mobbing."

The entrance of Tommy Townshend, one of the brilliant luminaries of the Taunton set, fortunately diverted the attention of those who had some right to be offended at the impertinence (by inference) of the Irish widow; for all ears and voices became absorbed in a discussion of the stormy proceedings of the House of Commons the preceding night, concerning some increase of the establishment of the Prince of Wales.—A change of administration was even anticipated from the measure; and it was confidently asserted that ministers had resigned!

From the politics connected with the affairs of the Prince, the transition was easy to his follies; and though Lady Lætitia had taken no share in the discussion of the discomfiture of Charles Jenkinson and his junta, she was quite ready to discuss the white satin hangings† of Perdita's opera-box, which, at that moment, excited a general outcry against the weakness of the Heir-apparent in ministering to her profligate extravagance.

"For my part," said Lady Lætitia, "I think Mrs. Robinson perfectly right to distinguish her box from those of her collagues!—The Prince has so many favourites among the women of character, that, in chintz, THE Sultana might have been overlooked!"

Again did a dead silence prevail in the little circle; and the Taunton set were perhaps of opinion that, for once, the Irish shamrock might have borrowed the motto usually accompanying the Scottish thistle. At all events they refrained from all further attempts to meddle with or show up the Dublin belle; but fell upon a subject which the recent confirmation of the Independence of America brought as much under discussion as now,—the boundary line of the States,—which the entrenchments of Boston rendered somewhat more definite than an Ashburton treaty.

The following day Sidney Hammond discerned in a moment, from even Lady Lætitia's slight and careless sketch of the amusements of Taunton House, that though she had made enemies of all those it was his desire to conciliate, she had obtained among them a degree of ascendancy more valuable than popularity. No fear of their receding from Lady Lætitia Hammond! On the contrary, he was convinced that they would rejoice in the expectation of taming down the rampancy of one who attacked them in so audacious a spirit, by the influence of one of their most zealous ædiles; and on receiving from the Irish beauty an invitation to accompany her the following night to Vauxhall, then in the zenith of its fashion, he determined on bringing matters to a crisis with the woman who had subdued those of whom he stood so much in awe.

In the interim, however, he was fated to be startled by an event inducing him to believe himself an especial favourite of the blind goddess. By some miracle he had escaped an avalanche, and been held back by a single hair on the brink of a precipice! The name of "JOHN ELRAZAR HARDINGSTON, Merchant," appeared that day in the London Gazette!

"You knew it: I am convinced you were aware of what was coming, and on that account declared off!" whispered Lady Taunton, stopping to accost him a moment, as she was hurrying to her chair after the opera, but rather to afford an opportunity for conversation between the Marquis and her daughter, who were following her, than for any interest she took in the affairs of "poor Sidney." "Accept my hearty congratulations on your foresight; but, entre nous, take care that your Irish widow do not prove an equally slippery bargain!"

As he was about to request an explanation of this ambiguous phrase, the Taunton party passed hastily on, and, a moment afterwards, the footmen, brandishing their flambeaus before the sedan of the Countess, threw the light upon her face sufficiently to prove, that the bitter smile with which she uttered her mysterious warning, was in no haste to vanish from her features.

* Fact. † Fact.

While still deliberating, next day, over her ladyship's adjuration, he had the vexation to receive a few lines from Mr. Hardingston, dated from his villa at Fulham, and earnestly requesting a few minutes' conversation: for Sidney Hammond had flattered himself, on perusing the announcement in the Gazette of the preceding evening, that he was on sufficiently bad terms with the father of Louisa, to be exonerated from the necessity of so much as inquiring after him under his misfortunes; and to be thus speedily addressed by the bankrupt, was a most disagreeable surprise! He could have little doubt, that to request pecuniary assistance, must be the object of the distressed man,—assistance he had never felt less inclined to concede, than to one who had so nearly allured him into the bosom of a ruined family. Or, perhaps, Mr. Hardingston intended to offer him the hand of Louisa—insisting on his often-repeated declarations, that it would suffice, portionless, to his happiness; and assuring him that, in the altered state of the affairs of the family, any establishment he might be able to accomplish, would suffice the modest views of the bankrupt's daughter, whose small fortune, secured by her mother's settlement, was intangible by the creditors.

To expose himself to the annoyance of having to declare the insincerity of former protestations, was, in Sidney's opinion, superfluous; more especially as the father might so persist as to necessitate an explanation of his new views and entanglements. He contented himself, therefore, with a formal expression of regret that the multiplicity of his engagements prevented his driving so far as Fulham, and requesting to know, by letter, Mr. Hardingston's "commands."

To this harsh letter, he somewhat anxiously expected the answer; dreading that it might convey overtures impossible to accept, and unpleasant positively to reject. But when two days passed over without a reply of any description, he began to hope that the ruined merchant considered him unworthy of further notice; or that, amid the press of business attending his bankruptcy, he had received succours from truer friends, or found means to dispense with them.

Sidney Hammond was only the more at leisure to concert plans for his anxiously-expected explanations with Lady Lætitia; who, throughout the evening at Vauxhall, chose to adhere as closely to the arm of her kinsman Lord Robert de Burgh, as a limpet to a rock;—and who, the season being far advanced, was already talking of a migration to the little fishing-town of Brighthelmstone, now frequented by all the Taunton set; in emulation of the Prince, who was beginning to spend all his leisure on those burning cliffs at the feet of one already talked of as clandestinely his wife.

He was uncertain, moreover, at that moment, of being able to procure an invitation to a select supper party, to be given that night by Lady Clermont, at her charming house in Berkeley Square, and a message having been announced to him, which, believing it to regard the supper party, he chose to receive in person. Great was his vexation on discovering that the man described to him as one of the helpers of the Taunton House stables, was simply an errand-man from some Fulham coach-office. Mr. Hardingston, unwilling, apparently, to write a second time, had despatched this unceremonious messenger, as fast as his cart could bring him, to entreat Mr. Hammond would lose no time in hastening to Fulham.

Either the man understood not the purport of the message, or the recipient was too proud to make inquiries;—for, in the unchanged belief that the application was that of a drowning man catching at a straw, and making a few last appeals to the generosity of his friends, Sidney Hammond despatched an answer that might have been termed brutal, had it emanated from the lips of a less practised man of the world.—

"His compliments, and he would ride down to East Lodge the first cool day. But having no close carriage, the present state of the weather rendered riding impossible."

This pretext he conceived to be a safe put-off; for, on a favourable change of weather, Lady Lætitia was to leave town for her new residence on the Steyne, to which she had consented, or to which he fancied she had consented, that he should bear her company. No fear, therefore, that he should be compelled to fulfil his indefinite engagement to the troublesome people at East Lodge; and his last reflection concerning the Hardingstons that night, when, by a tardy and grudging invitation from the fastidious Viscountess, he was entitled to join the brilliant party in Berkeley Square, was, that it is very odd, when people are ruined, they cannot be ruined and have done with it, without boring all their acquaintance with their misfortunes. For next to the troublesome ghost of man or wife, returning to their lares and penates at the close of the vidual year, the most importunate of visitations is that which comes to remind the heart of man of its fickleness to the vows it has sworn, and the fidelity it has outraged. The name of Hardingston was now every way most offensive to "poor Sidney!"

That night,—a dewy delicious summer night, such as so often crowns a midsummer day,—Lady Clermont had caused her fine apartments to be profusely decorated with flowers; and the windows being thrown open to the utmost, the scent of vegetation arising from the gardens of the Square, as well as from those nearly adjoining, of Lansdowne and Devonshire houses, created an atmosphere as nearly resembling the freshness of the country, as a metropolis can well afford;—and at the close of that brilliant supper, a whispering conversation commenced at table between the Prince and Mrs. Fitzherbert, (and between Colonel St. Leger and Lady Taunton, by way of keeping them in countenance,) which drove all the good courtiers present to the remoter windows. There it was that Sidney Hammond, while pretending, like the rest, to listen to the rustling of the abele trees in the moonlight, and enjoy the calm and dewy fragrance, so welcome after the heats of a London day, fancied he had perceived, on his sudden approach, the hand of Lady Lætitia de Burgh gently withdrawn from that of Sir Henry Winston! To be withdrawn, however, it must for a time have rested there; a cruel contingency for the surmises and susceptibility of even a fortune-hunting lover!

To remonstrate in the midst of such a circle, would have been fatal to his interests; and Hammond was thankful to a cloud which at that moment lightly veiled the brightness of the moon, so as to conceal his confusion of countenance. Moreover, as is usually the case where moonlight, fine ladies, and fine gentlemen, are suited together,—particularly after a due allowance of chicken, lobster salad, and champagne,—a prodigious deal of nonsense was in process of emission concerning that changeable luminary, such as served to excuse the silence of the usually voluble Sidney; whose thoughts, by some strange coincidence, were carried back just then to the image of poor Louisa! —For it had been one of the favourite visions of their courtship to anticipate the summer evenings they should enjoy together in the beautiful gardens of her father's villa; and it was almost with shame he recalled to mind the strength and fervour of the protestations he had both made and exacted, of the eternal fidelity which was to sanctify those midnight moonlight rambles. A momentary chill seemed to run through his frame, as he gazed upon the dewy grass, and reflected how lonely must be the walks of the gentle and unhappy creature, whose destinies he had blighted!

But his compassion was thrown away!—He had NOT blighted them!—At the very moment that icy thrill pervaded his frame, the spotless soul of Louisa Hardingston had entered into its rest. While he, the worldling, stood there amid that titled horde of the vain and worthless,—women of doubtful, and men of more than doubtful character—yet despised even by them,—she was ascending to the realms of light, the appropriate atmosphere of her enfranchised and purified spirit.

The hurried letter, addressed to him a few days before by Mr. Hardingston, had been written by Louisa's bed-side, and by her desire, on the first intimation of the physician that her hours were numbered. By such an announcement, the seal was removed from her lips; and she addressed her father in terms which caused even his hardened heart to tremble within him.—Not that she upbraided him—not that she spoke harshly; but there were daggers in the gentle resignation with which she recapitulated the brief, but fatal, story of her life. She spoke of herself and him as martyrs to appearances,—to Surfaceism; imploring, rather than exhorting him, to turn to the True and Real, as the only certain sources of happiness, here or hereafter.

But above all, she entreated permission to send for the man she had so dearly loved, that she might implore and warn him too,—"lest he also should come to that place of torment;" and Hardingston, who, like Felix, "trembled, rebuked by judgment to come," instantly acquiesced in her dying prayer. He wrote, but he wrote in vain; and his surprise almost equalled his disappointment. For he had forgotten, in the anguish of his daughter's deathbed, the ill savour of poverty attached to his name. Even he—the speculator,—the heartless, callous mercenary, forgot, as he wiped the dews from that sweet and wistful face, that he was now "Hardingston the bankrupt!"

Sidney Hammond's reply reached him on the spot from which he seldom stirred; and Louisa, on recognising that well-known handwriting, asked to look upon it for the last time. Too late to refuse,—though her father bitterly upbraided himself, while noting the change that came over her countenance during the perusal of the note. She said not a word, however, but closed her eyes, as if composing herself to sleep,—probably to avoid her father's commentaries on the conduct of one who to her was all in all. But during her seeming slumbers, her lips were still moving;—either quivering with inward anguish, or articulating a repressed prayer for heavenly mercy towards him who had embittered her days with such gratuitous cruelty!

"There are so many women of the world, on whom he might have practised his deceptions without danger!" murmured the dying girl; "but I, —I had nothing but my warm affections!—And how freely I gave them to him.—But not—but not for this!"

At length she really slept; and in her almost delirious dreams, her tongue was loosed, and all she had been thinking and feeling burst incoherently, though faintly, from her lips; and the tears of the ruined man came down uncontrolled and unheeded, as he sat listening by that solitary bedside, and knew how wantonly he had sacrificed the happiness of his only child.

It was two days after this, on finding her still weaker and more desponding, while watching the silent tears glide down her wan cheeks, and believing, and with truth, that they flowed chiefly from the dread of leaving the object of her faithful love unwarned by a word from her dying lips, that Mr. Hardingston (in the excitement of beholding his poor Louisa revive from a state of insensibility which he had bewailed as death) despatched his abrupt message to Sidney Hammond. At the moment of sending it, the scarcely-conscious form of his child was resting in his arms; and even the servant to whom it was given, was too deeply touched by the plight of her lamented young mistress, to take heed to what manner of man the commission was entrusted, so that he promised to be faithful and expeditious; and the messenger was accordingly ignorant of the purport of his errand.

When the chilling answer to those agonized entreaties for his instant presence at length arrived, no one was cruel or careless enough to repeat them in the chamber of death. In answer to Mr. Hardingston's reiterated inquiries, the waiting-woman continued to reply, that "Mr. Hammond was coming,"—that "Mr. Hammond was expected every moment;"—rightly conjecturing that the fruitless hopes she thus inspired would solace rather than disturb the last moments of the sweetest angel that ever fell a victim to the worldliness of social life.

For the spirit of the dying Louisa was as serene and subdued as that of her brighter days;—no restlessness—no peevishness—no accusation. So long as her powers of sight were unimpaired, she lay watching the door;—so long as her powers of hearing were available, she listened for the footsteps she loved so dearly.—But there came a time when the powers of life were gradually extinguished; when there was no longer sight in those helpless eyes, or sound in those powerless ears; though still there abided an inward steadfastness of love, which concentred the last thoughts of the dying girl into a prayer for him. Her life had been a life of Faith, Hope, and Charity,—these three.—But Hope was the last survivor;—even the hope that she was hastening to eternal happiness, and that the object of her yearning affection might still be redeemed from evil to come.

Throughout that interminable evening, her father sat by her side, listening to her impeded respiration, and occasionally moistening her parched lips, or wiping her moistened brow. Louisa had entreated, ere consciousness and utterance forsook her, that the windows might be left open, to refresh her chamber with the summer sweetness of the gardens; and even that the watchlight might be removed, to enable her to enjoy unmolested the chastened moonlight gleaming upon her pillow;—so that the self-same light which called forth the wanton jests of the Taunton set, shone like a halo round the head of the dying girl,—till at last, and with a more subdued and deferential radiance, it fell upon the sacred features of the dead!

Then came the unrestrained gush of sorrow of the conscience-struck father,—and the few faithful attendants who knew her excellence, and had watched over her sufferings. Then came the muttered curses of old Hardingston, which, but for the presence of death, would have deepened into frantic execrations on the name of the man who had embittered her last moments by withholding the poor alleviation of one word of sympathy!—At that moment, he felt that Sidney Hammond had killed his child,—yea, killed her, as with the edge of a sword!

As the bankrupt only retained possession of his villa by virtue of the medical certificate, which declared that removal would be instant death to his daughter, it was necessary to accelerate, as far as decency would allow, his preparations for the humble funeral his present means enabled him to supply to her he had so long pampered in the lap of luxury; nor was it judged necessary for the newspapers to announce the decease of one rich only in beauty and virtue. The death of Louisa was consequently as little known or noted as that of some flower of the field; and the world went on,

> Without one laugh the less, one tear the more,
> That she was gone who joined its mirth before.

Nor was "poor Sidney" ever in greater spirits than on the very evening the undertakers were closing in for ever the now solemn face whence the tears were wiped for evermore.

That night, while the watch-lights were being set round the coffin of Louisa Hardingston, he was the gayest guest at a supper given by Lady Lætitia de Burgh, to assemble around her the little knot of friends about to be dispersed by her departure for Brighthelmstone the following day.

As the merry little banquet drew to a close, Hammond, who was seated beside the lady of the house, grew more than ever tender in his professions, more sanguine than ever in his hopes. The time was not far distant, he hoped, when that agreeable house and well-ordered establishment would be submitted to his authority,—that massive plate—those generous wines—and last, (and least,) that pretty little woman, be all his own.—It was a pleasant prospect;—and, combined with copious draughts of sparkling champagne, enhanced by the exquisite singing of the Sheridans, who, with Lady Taunton and her daughter, were of the party, melted his soul within him, almost to ecstasy.

Under the influence of such feelings, he pressed and pressed, with tenderest whispers, for a favourable answer to his petition for a place in the carriage of Lady Lætitia to Brighton, the following day.

"You must ask permission of Sir Harry Winston," was, at last, her undaunted reply. "Bridegrooms are not apt to encourage the presence of a third person quite so early in the honeymoon. Nay, I might say a fourth; for, let me claim your congratulations on the only obstacle to this happy marriage being removed, by Lord Robert de Burgh's having consented to leave me the sole guardianship of my little girl!—The opposition of the executors of my late husband's will, has alone retarded the avowal of my approaching union with my dear Harry. But Lord Robert, having satisfied himself, by the habits of intimacy on which we have recently lived, that Harry will make the best of fathers to the dear child, has actually proposed to the chancellor my nomination as co-guardian with himself; and I am now the happiest creature in the world! By the way, I may thank you, my dear Mr. Hammond, for some portion of my good fortune; for had you not examined and given me your legal opinion upon my rights, or rather want of rights under the will, and advised me to surrender the guardianship of my poor little Augusta, I should not have seen the necessity of conciliating Lord Robert; without which, matters would never have reached their present happy state of pacification."

Eager congratulations from Lady Taunton and the rest of the party, recalled "poor Sidney"—(now poor Sidney, indeed!)—to the necessity of putting a good face upon the matter; and he soon began to talk of a visit to the Steyne at the end of the honeymoon, and of completing the partie carrée by pairing off with little Augusta, as if he had been fully prepared for the thunder-clap which had suddenly exploded over his head.

Nevertheless, though he was the first to propose healths, and perpetrated, in the course of the last few minutes he was ever to spend in the Taunton set, two bon-mots which provoked the laughter of Hare and the approving smile of Brinsley, Lady Taunton, an experienced judge of such symptoms, noticed that, though he had been tossing off glasses of iced champagne enough to produce a burning fever, his hands, when he assisted to put on her cardinal as she stepped into the carriage, were cold as marble!

That was an accursed night to Sidney Hammond. On his return to his chambers he found his table covered with the season's bills, which the announcement of his intended departure to Brighton had caused to be sent in,—a somewhat substantial reminder of the ruinous extent to which he had carried his matrimonial speculations: for he had grudged himself neither enhancement nor adornment; and Lady Lætitia, heaven knows, had spared the designing barrister no expense in the prosecution of his interested suit at Love.

And now, what was to become of him? So far from having progressed a single step towards reconcilement with the Taunton set, he had rendered himself so ridiculous in their eyes by his recent defeat, as to have lost even his honorary grade as a fashionable young man about town, ambitious of becoming somewhat more. A defeated man is ever an object of contempt, let the object he has attempted to conquer be what it may; and, even in those days, administrations were careful against attaching to themselves any member peculiarly vulnerable to the shafts of ridicule;—to be laughed at, being one of the most critical perils of a public man.

He was accordingly worse off than after his banishment from the Paradise of Taunton House. Poor Sidney had nothing in enjoyment,—nothing in prospect;—no pleasant country houses,—no excursion to Brighton,—no anything. Even the Bedford Square uncles would be less attainable now that rumours of his conduct towards the Hardingstons were beginning to transpire; the Harley Street set having, since the bankruptcy, of course, attributed his precipitate retreat to a rat-like instinct, forewarning him of the fate of the house. With diminished means and deteriorated reputation he was consequently worse off than ever.

"At all events," muttered the apostle of Surfaceism, in the course of that sleepless night, "I will take care the world do not find out the extent of my disappointment. I must continue to pass for having been in Lady Lætitia's secrets; and impress people with an idea of my being on good terms with those unfortunate Hardingstons. I will ride down to Fulham this very morning—(for the sooner I get Saladin to Tattersall's the better, as I have no longer any use for him in the park.) Yes! I will ride down to Fulham, pretending to drop into breakfast in a friendly way. The air will do me good. I fear I drank too much champagne last night,—for I am deucedly feverish. Champagne! Ay, ay.—Long enough, I suspect, before I enjoy one of those charming petits soupers again!"

That summer morning was worthy to follow that summer night. The villa gardens of the suburbs were in their fullest bloom, with thousands of roses dispensing their fragrance to the air, and the acacia trees shedding their profuse white blossoms like a pearly shower. Nothing could be sweeter or more genial than the season and the scene.

"What a heavenly refreshment, after the heated atmosphere of the gorgeous fêtes I have been frequenting!"—mused "poor Sidney," while, leaving the rein on Saladin's neck, he took his way along a narrow lane, bordered on either side by beautiful gardens, with the birds singing in snatches in the shrubberies, and the bees humming among the flower-beds. "How cheerful yet how quiet these pleasant retreats! How welcome after the noise, and jostle, the insolence and scorn of the throng I have sacrificed so much to propitiate; and among whom, at two-and-thirty, I have not made a single friend! If, at this moment, I were to throw myself into the river which I see glittering yonder between the willows, not a human being would deign to notice my exit, beyond wondering at my folly—and observing, perhaps, that I was always a little wrong-headed!—Yes—one! That poor girl, I verily believe, really liked me; naturally enough, for I was the first man who ever paid her attention, and certainly took some pains to recommend myself;—more, perhaps, than I ought. But it was no fault of mine if her father thought proper to live beyond his means!"

At that moment, the sweetness and freshness and verdure of the winding lane seemed suddenly obscured by a gloomy object that took possession of the pathway skirting the palings. The startled birds instantly deserted the shrubberies for a securer retreat; and, lo! the white acacia flowers, which before had fallen on the ground, now dropped upon the mourning cloaks and velvet pall of a funeral that was passing along the road;—a walking funeral—followed by a single chief mourner, and one or two sobbing women, apparently servants.

"I thought I heard the sound of a funeral bell pealing along the water from Fulham Church!" mused Sidney Hammond, as the gloomy procession came in view,—about which, from its want of funeral pomp, he concerned himself no more than he would have done for some pauper's burial emerging from an hospital.

Apprehensive, however, that the sable array, in so confined a space, might startle his high-bred horse, (accustomed only to the pleasant sights and sounds of the ring and a London afternoon,) he drew up, and turned the tossing head of Saladin towards the opposite palings, a movement apparently suggested by feelings of respect towards the mournful procession.

But the spirited horse being thus reined in, all was silence in that secluded spot; so that the tramp of the approaching coffin-bearers, conveying the child of clay to a still more silent home, became painfully audible; and there seemed to be a sad incongruity between that measured tread and black array, and the green and sunny scene constituted by the Almighty for pleasant sights and associations. A feeling of terror and loathing, like the sickening awe that arises in the heart of childhood in contemplating a funeral, oppressed the usually callous heart of Sidney Hammond; and but that the garden-paling restrained his movements, and thrust him almost into contact with the sable mutes preceding the coffin, he would have hurried from the spot.

But what were his emotions, what his self-rebuking, when, as the coffin borne past him seemed for a moment to shut out the sunshine from his eyes, he recognised in the chief mourner the wasted person and altered countenance of the bankrupt Hardingston!

No need to inquire, as Laertes concerning the gentle

Ophelia, the name of her they were conveying to the grave. A thousand voices seemed to shriek it into his ears; and a still small whisper to echo that fatal cry with still more solemn adjuration!—Louisa was dead! He had murdered her!—and all he could do in token of his tardy reverence for her sufferings, was to raise his hat from his head, as her neglected corpse went by!

Whatever might be the inward emotions of Sidney Hammond at this unexpected termination of one of the episodes of his career of Surfaceism, he was careful to return to town with an unabashed and unmoved countenance; for he felt that, were he to betray unusual emotions on the wedding-day of Lady Lætitia Winston, the world to which he bowed the knee, would attribute his afflicted air to mortification. On entering his club that afternoon, therefore, he arrayed himself in his usual pearly smiles, and talked of his intended departure for the Isle of Wight, as if he had only remained in town to do honour to the nuptials of two of his intimate associates.

Some one present happened to mention, among the gossip of the day, the death of the only daughter of Hardingston the member,—"Hardingston the bankrupt."

"The poor girl, it seems, could not survive her father's downfall. Women have seldom courage to look ruin in the face," added the talker of small-talks;—"they are so cursedly selfish,—so wedded to their own little comforts.—Miss Hardingston is far from the only fine lady who would sooner die than live without a carriage and opera-box. After all, I suppose her death will be rather a relief to her father, who has not a rap left."

"He was always an extravagant man," muttered Sidney Hammond,—to whom these observations were pointedly addressed. "But I confess I thought his daughter had more strength of mind."

"One must not trust to appearances, my dear fellow,"—replied his companion. "We all thought you the pet of Taunton House, the lord and master (or slave) elect of Lady Lætitia de Burgh; yet how plaguily were we mistaken!—For your own sake, Sid., I trust you may not have shared our error!"

To demonstrate that he had NOT, became, of course, the immediate object of Sidney Hammond. In order to prove himself heart-whole and pocket-whole,—that he had been dismissed neither by a fair Countess, nor rich widow,—he took care to flutter that autumn, the gayest of the gay, at a variety of public resorts. He appeared at Buxton, Harrowgate, Scarborough,—which, as yet, had not ceded their vogue to the Spas of the Continent,—and spent the winter at Bath, distinguished alike by his minuet and his rubber.

His pains, however, were thrown away. Before the opening of a new London season, the Taunton set was broken up. His Countess having married her lovely daughter to her satisfaction, was gone to repair, by a couple of years' retrenchment on the Continent, her costly series of London pleasures. The Winstons, too, were in Ireland; and, by the mere ordinary course of fashionable rotation, Sidney Hammond, without legitimate pretensions to a solid footing in the world of ton, found himself distanced by the new sets succeeding to the one, to establish himself in which, he had sacrificed so largely.

A few casual invitations, a few passing nods and salutations, were all that remained to him of his former brilliant popularity. Having been once or twice seen looking somewhat seedy on the pavé,—without a phæton,—without a horse,—without a seat in anybody's opera-box,—people began to discover that he had little or nothing to recommend him; that "poor Sidney" had no "speciality" to entitle him to favour,—was not superlatively witty, superlatively well-looking, or superlatively well-bred, to excuse his want of birth and fortune; and, accordingly, when next they met this mediocre Mr. Sidney Hammond, they passed by on the other side.

At five-and-thirty, when crows'-feet begin to pucker the eyes, and silver hairs to blanch the head of a man about town, he loses the spirit and resolution indispensable to better the condition which the world has ascertained to be so meagre. Thwarted in his deep-laid projects, disappointed and peevish, Hammond had ceased to look forward, but contented himself with spending his life in small change, living from day to day, making as good a figure as he could, and avoiding, as far as he was able, the whips and scorns of the more insolent portion of society. He stuck to London, because London still afforded him a few pleasant invitations; and, by sordid economy the rest of the year, contrived to make the sort of show, during the season, of which a good club and good tailor afford the groundwork.

Every year, however, the invitations grew fewer and further between, and the show, such as it was, more difficult of accomplishment. By furnishing himself from second-rate shops, he was beginning to acquire the quizzical look which a man of forty, or five-and-forty, is sure to contract, if he affect juvenility of dress and manner, though unable to support the pretension by the fashionable cut of his clothes, the excellence of his horse, or the eminence of his social position. Many people began to call Sidney Hammond a bore, a prig, an old quiz;—for, instead of contenting himself with the matter-of-fact conversation current in the humdrum society into which he was progressing, he was always relating anecdotes and facetiæ of the Taunton set, now a thing of tradition;—and a man who invariably prefaces his remarks with "I remember some years ago," is sure to end with passing for superannuated:—anything older than of yesterday being obsolete in London small-talk.

Moreover, the order of people and order of things which his reminiscences regarded, was already out of favour with the world. There had been a great reaction in the opinions of society. The French Revolution, with its concatenation of horrors, had intervened; and the vulgar, unapt to mark their discrimination of shades and degrees of error, thought they could not protest too loudly their hatred and abhorrence of the liberalism which they chose to regard as the cause of the martyrdom of the king and queen of France, of the innocent

Madame Elizabeth, and thousands of victims equally inoffensive. And thus the Whigs were, for a moment, in disrepute, because Robespierre was a ruffian.

Loudest, of course, among the disclaimers was the voice of Sidney Hammond; for in the Church-and-State class of roast-beef and plum-pudding fanatics, into which he had fallen from his high and palmy state, the name of Fox was as that of Antichrist. As to Horne Tooke and his pupil Sir Francis, Sidney Hammond knew that to avow the smallest sympathy with such godless and lawless individuals, would be to take leave of turbot and saddles of mutton from Christmas to Midsummer. Like Peter, therefore, he denied his Master; and thenceforward set up a sort of modest "Toryism on conviction," which he knew would bring him in a yearly revenue of twenty dinners, between the Inns of Court and Bloomsbury; twenty more sober dowagerly entertainments; besides the pis aller of an indefinite number of miscellaneous but highly-respectable family dinners where the grace was long and commons short.

Not perhaps that Sidney ratted solely and wholly on the temptation of so many five-and-sixpences saved in his club account. He might possibly have persisted in dining virtuously seven days in the week on a fried whiting and cutlets, moistened by a glass or two of Bucellas, but that, among the Bedford Square uncles, there was a surly old bachelor, as stiff in Toryism as the clay of his Lincolnshire estate could make him, who had been toasting Billy Pitt in crusty old port till his temper resembled his potations. During "poor Sidney's" youthful infatuation in the Taunton set, old Bob Hammond was never known to name him otherwise than "my ass of a nephew;" nor was it till he had persisted, for a series of years, in calling in Bedford Square every time the crusty old port and the gout got the better of the crusty old gentleman, (who pleaded guilty to the Income-tax Commissioners to the possession of eight thousand per annum,) that he was induced to admit of his nephew, that, if > "Thebes did his weak unknowing youth engage,

> He chooses Athens in his riper age."

Sidney was now all for Bloomsbury and the Heaven-born minister; and Bloomsbury accepted its proselyte.

Had old Robert resided on Paddington Green instead of in Bedford Square, his prudent nephew would have found it equally convenient to "drop in" at the testy old gentleman's Sunday dinner-time, and fight over the debates of the week; allowing himself constantly to be defeated by his host, fencing with the arguments of Pitt, (which fitted him much as the seven-league boots of the ogre fitted Hop-o'-my-Thumb, because they possessed the magic faculty of contracting to the size of the meanest capacity;) and, having suffered himself to be gradually converted by the zeal of the heirless uncle, he followed up his game by renouncing such of his former high associates as had not been at the trouble of forgetting him. With such an object in view as the heirship of eight thousand per annum, it was worth his while to give up his whole time to study the caprices and prejudices of a man who was now little more than a bundle of prejudice and caprice.

The old gentleman meanwhile could not fail to be pleased with the conversion he had effected in his "ass of a nephew." To be secure of a partner at picquet and backgammon half the nights in the week, saved him a world of outlay in toadyism; which he had hitherto found almost as expensive an article to lay in, for home consumption, as the crusty old port. He had no longer any need to purchase the evening visits of his apothecary, or of a few humble friends, of whom a gouty chair had taught him the value. It is true, the needy and sneaking nephew, whom May Fair now regarded as a prig and a quiz, appeared to him, in spite of his crows'-feet and suit of pepper and salt, a very frisky young fellow. But, as he often observed, "a man must have time to sow his wild oats"—and having been young himself, old Bob, at seventy-eight, had indulgence for the follies of old Sidney at eight-and-forty. It obviated, moreover, all his scruples about absorbing the leisure evenings of his nephew, to think of the serious advantage enjoyed by the recent convert, in spending his idle time with "a man whose principles were in the right place, instead of lounging it away among a set of mischievous democrats, like those with whom he had formerly consorted." Sidney Hammond could not but agree with him. It was a very serious advantage to him indeed! More especially when the old gentleman discovered that there were six evenings in the week to be devoted to backgammon, and one to family-prayers, in which his nephew's services as reader, had become indispensable, so that the Tory proselyte had no longer a minute any more than an opinion he could call his own.

Strange to tell, no sooner had the old gentleman squabbled and lectured his submissive nephew into the adoption of his principles than he seemed to grudge them as though they were too good for him; for he lectured and squabbled quite as much now that poor Sidney was bowing the knee to Baal by his side, as when he had withheld his worship. He was so little pleased to see an indigent kinsman enjoying the excellent political faith which was the best to be had for love or money, by himself, a man of ten thousand a-year, that he made the new faith as irksome to his neophyte as lay in his power; and, if poor Sidney did but repeat a few of the dogmas conned out of his book, would turn short round upon him with inquiries of "what the devil he should know about the matter?"

Still, his cross must be borne. Sidney Hammond had left himself nothing for it but submission. In betaking himself to Toryism and Bedford Square, he had burnt his ships and blown up the bridge behind him. His hopes and fears, and the whole future of his worthless existence, were now invested in the contingencies of a last will and testament; and he must not, in a fit of petulance, blow over his house of cards.

Byron has assured us, that—

> "People living on annuities
> Are longer-lived than others;"—

but there is a tortoise-like longevity in elderly relatives,

"Like to a step-dame or a dowager Long-withering out a young man's revenue;"— withering it out, in fact, till the said young man becomes old in his turn. Sidney Hammond, accordingly, waited and waited, with his hopes deferred and heart sick, watching the bilious complexion and palsied hand of the old man; who, in return, watched his watchfulness with unsuspected shrewdness. Though old and infirm, the Bloomsbury uncle was sufficiently widely awake to discriminate between the adulation of a legacy-hunter, and the vigilance of kinsmanly regard. For Sidney was not a solitary adulator. "Where the carcase is, there shall the vultures be gathered together;" and there were divers pitiful fellows besides the needy nephew, who accommodated their ambitious appetite to the meagre fare of the invalid and his stuffy apartments.

Among these, was a man, high in the councils of the king, (who was now once more exercising his regal functions and presiding over the terrors of the war raging between England and France,) and, despite of the sanguinary and tumultuous nature of those councils, what is called a saint. In the intervals of official labour, however, he made it an act of charity to bestow his tracts and company on the old valetudinarian, with whom he had become accidentally acquainted in the course of his public career; and of all his rivals, this was the man most feared and loathed by Sidney Hammond. There was something feline in his sleekness and meekness, which roused the kindred mistrust of the legacy-hunter.

One day, having surprised his Whitehall competitor at the close of a visit to the sick man, (which had evidently been long and soothing, for there was a book of sermons, with certain leaves folded down, on the table between them, and the high sharp nose of the official was still bestridden by spectacles as though he had been reading to the invalid,) scarcely had he taken his glozing soft-voiced leave, when the old gentleman, turning abruptly to Sidney, suddenly addressed him:—

"That is a godly and a tender-hearted man, if ever there breathed one!" said he. "He has pointed out to me, my dear nephew, circumstances concerning you which I own had escaped my attention. From your frugal habits of life, and shabby appearance, (you will excuse my coming to the point,) he is convinced you are in less prosperous circumstances than your friends could desire."

A flush to which they had been long unaccustomed overspread the sallow features of Sidney Hammond. Was it possible that the man he had suspected of secretly undermining his prospects, had done him so good a turn as recommend his necessities to the sympathy of his rich uncle; and was old Hammond about to make a settlement upon him at last?

"With a degree of consideration, for which I can never sufficiently thank him," resumed the querulous treble of the old man, "he has consequently offered me for you, an appointment which has luckily fallen vacant in his department;—an all-but sinecure,—attendance six hours or so a-day five times a-week at the Treasury, and a salary of two hundred a-year!—just the sort of thing which you were telling me the other day formed the limit of your wishes; and I can tell you, Sir, that though he presses it on your acceptance, there are two hundred names on his list of men highly recommended to him for clerkships!"

Sidney Hammond's heart swelled within him! For so many years past had he considered himself on the brink of eight thousand a-year, that at nine-and forty to find himself rated at the value of a clerkship of two hundred, was almost an insult.—Nevertheless, small as was the salary, it considerably exceeded the modicum into which his own income had dwindled; and even had the offer been more modest, he felt that to refuse a favour provided for him by his uncle, such as it was, might perhaps deprive him of more important benefits. It was difficult, however, to assume the air of radiant gratitude expected at his hands.

"For my part," faltered the old man, "I know not how to be sufficiently thankful to my illustrious friend for his kind and noble consideration of me and mine. To my thinking, there cannot be a more decided proof of greatness of mind, than the acuteness of observation which led him to discover, without a hint on our part, the necessities of a perfect stranger."

Sidney Hammond longed to be affronted, and explode.—But a legacy-hunter may be defined, according to Champfort's definition of a courtier, "homme sans humeur et sans honneur;" and it was his cue to submit.

"So judicious, moreover," observed the old gentleman, "to secure for you not only an increase of income, but an occupation for your time. He has probably noticed the quantity of leisure you have on your hands, as proved by the frequency of your visits here; and has wisely decided that it is as great an act of Christian charity to provide work for an idle man in this dissolute metropolis, where

Satan finds some mischief still
For idle hands to do,—

as to augment your means of worldly comfort."

Sidney Hammond sighed deeply as he tried to infuse proper ardour into his acknowledgments. To a man hungering after a fat legacy, it was a hard thing to be belaboured by so meagre a benefit; but alas! his future fortunes depended on his grateful acceptance. At all events, the duties imposed on him by his new place exonerated him from one-half of his attendance upon his uncle; and of two disagreeable things, it was less laborious to sign his name three thousand times a-day on Government paper, than listen for the three-thousandth to the history of the ailments and infirmities of Robert the Endless.

In spite of his good wishes, however, the valetudinarian went ailing and wailing on; and the office which Sidney Hammond fancied himself to be accepting for a term of months, had galled and thwarted him for years; when by the blessing of Providence, a severe winter set in;—the price of coals rose, quicksilver fell;—and with it, the wealthy old bachelor of Bedford Square.

On receiving the intimation of his decease early one January morning from his uncle's apothecary, who had been sent for in the night, and as his note expressed it, "only to find the vital spark extinct,"—Sidney Hammond hastily accoutred himself in the customary suit of solemn black, which he had kept by him for twelve years past, to be in readiness to express his grief for his departed kinsman, even till the cut thereof reminded the looker-on, more distinctly than pleasingly, of the exploded fashion of the last century;—and hurried to Bedford Square.

His official patron, however, was there before him; looking like a walking Book of Lamentations, and sadly inclined to expatiate, in lengthier prose than could be acceptable to the next of kin to a wealthy defunct awaiting the opening of a will, upon the transient nature of sublunary things.—Nay, there was a third person on the spot, with whose presence he could have equally dispensed;—the man of business of his late uncle,—the custodian of his testamentary dispositions,—being no other than the individual who had apprized him at Ranelagh, three-and-twenty years before, of Miss Hardingston's illness; and who, having put away boyish things for the realities of life, was now one of the leading solicitors of the day.

Let us spare our readers the recital of the will; for it is tedious enough to listen to the technicalities of such instruments, even when we trust to find our names therein inscribed, in a manner satisfactory to our sense of personal merit. Suffice it that, after a preamble of the lengthiest, during the reading of which Sidney Hammond's ears became of the colour of red sealing-wax with excitement, the late "Robert Opman Hammond of Puckerfen Hall, Lincolnshire, being in a sound state of body and mind, did appoint his illustrious friend the official, sole executor of that his last will and testament; whereby was bequeathed to him the whole estate of the testator, real and personal, in trust for the charities afterwards enumerated." In consideration of the trouble certain to accrue to him from such a trust, and of the liberal kindness with which he had studied the interests of the Hammond family, by bestowing a suitable provision on his dear nephew, he was, moreover, constituted residuary legatee: and had Sidney presumed to resent this most Christian-like distribution of the family property, he must have been an ungrateful fellow;—for so far from omitting his name from the will, his affectionate uncle had bequeathed him £200 as a mark of attachment, in addition to one of twenty mourning rings!

Poor Sidney!—poor old Sidney!—In this instance, the Surfaceites had been two to one against him!—This last and worst disappointment occasioned a severe attack of nervous fever; which brought down his grey hairs in sorrow, not to the grave, but the ground; adding a caoutchouc wig to the number of his grievances. He survived, however, till within the last few years. Many of our readers must have noticed a spare, meagre, fractious official, whose deafness and blindness rendered him, till a short time ago, one of the many public nuisances of the Treasury. In his efforts to appear twenty years younger and more active than he really was, his blunders were incessant. Just, however, as the spruce, well-brushed, but nearly imbecile old clerk, was on the point of being superannuated, he died suddenly of a cramp in the stomach, from attempting to eat an ice at Graup's among his younger colleagues, when a hot jelly would have been more suitable to his years and the weather.

"From loveless youth to unrespected age," from unrespected age to an unlamented grave, was only a natural progress for the shallow egotist, who had commenced life with good abilities, a good reputation, and sufficient fortune. But he had lived for shadows,—with shadows,—deaf to the severer truths of life, and inaccessible to its more solid pleasures; till at the close of life, there was not a human soul,—no, not even the Temple laundress, who laid out his remains,—to shed a tear over the unregretted disciple of Surfaceism!

TEXIANA.

RIDES, RAMBLES, AND SKETCHES IN TEXAS.

BY CHARLES HOOTON, ESQ.

Having already mentioned the bowie-knife as not only so common, but so formidable a weapon both in Texas and the whole South-west, the reader will, perhaps, not be displeased to hear a little more of it; the various tragical hand-to-hand exploits, which have been from time to time performed even amongst the "highest circles" of that quarter of the world, through its agency, having conferred upon it a degree of bloody and horrible distinction never yet acquired by many of its elder brethren of the same craft. Let it not, however, be regarded altogether in the light of an engine of human slaughter; since, in many other respects, it is one of the most useful of articles to the settler and frontiersman. Like the Highlander's skien dhu, the same blade which this morning, perhaps, was buried to the hilt in the body of an enemy, or, it may be, of a friend with whom its owner had a "difficulty," will also serve to-night to carve the venison for supper—to skin and cut up the hunter's game—to extract hooks from the gullets of ponderous red fish, when its master goes a-fishing; or to supply any other need, no matter how small, (if not too small for its own size,) for which a knife can possibly be required.

In short, Butler has accurately pre-described its various uses, aided, no doubt, by a wonderful spirit of poetical prophecy, in the following charming portrait of the dagger of his "Sir Knight:"—

> It was a serviceable dudgeon,
> Either for fighting or for drudging.
> When it had stabbed, or broke a head,
> It would scrape trenchers, or chip bread;
> Toast cheese or bacon, though it were
> To bait a mouse-trap, 'twould not care.

Some of the tribe, nevertheless, are too exalted for these menial offices, and imbued with a spirit akin to that of many heroic men in our own times, who hold nothing worthy of themselves but "glorious war;" and would rather rust in sulky repose for ever, than for an instant condescend even to think of becoming useful in any other and probably better capacity. But Captain Marryat has given us the whole history of the parentage and uses of the bowie-knife.

I have heard it stated that a blow from one, well wielded, is sufficient to break a man's arm. Certain it is, that I have myself seen skulls of Mexicans brought from the battle-ground of San Jacinto, on which Texas gained her independence, that were cleft nearly through the thickest part of the bone behind, evidently at one blow, and with sufficient force to throw out extensive cracks like those of a starred glass. This is more true to fact than complimentary to Mexican valour. At the same time, it proves that old adages may occasionally be mistaken. "He that fights and runs away" does not always "live to fight another day." Colonel Bowie went to Texas during the troubles which preceded the independence of that country, and was lying sick in bed at the fortress of the Alamo when, on the 6th of March, 1836, it was stormed by Santa Anna, and taken. Bowie was murdered there upon his pillow.—The hand that formed the dreadful knife could no longer wield it. The celebrated Colonel Crocket of Tennessee—of whose unmatched huntings and bear-excursions few readers but must have a vivid recollection—also fell in the battle of the Alamo. The authorities say he was found almost buried amid the corses of Mexican soldiers whom he had slain before he himself fell.

Perhaps I ought scarcely to have mentioned this circumstance, which is to be found in most histories; only, that I wished to add to it the pleasing fact, that Crocket's favourite watch, which he had disposed of to a gentleman in the States during his lone tramp through prairie and forest to the Texan frontier, was recently, and with generous consideration, returned to the Colonel's widow, when the possessor, for the first time, heard of his death.

Although the act of carrying arms in secret is held to be illegal, yet it is quite general, I believe, unless perhaps with the immediate inhabitants of a tolerably-well populated town. They are generally at hand in the majority of stores,—in liquor shops either placed under the counter, or more usually behind the bar upon the wall, within reach of the individual attending, and immediately before the eyes of the customer. When openly carried, the knive is in a sheath attached to a body belt; when secretly, either in a narrow pocket purposely made down the straight part of the trousers' thigh, so that the bending of the body is not incommoded nor the weapon discovered; or in a similar casing down the back between the shoulders. It is hence considered by some individuals as sufficiently indicative of evil intentions on the part of an opponent, if, in the event of a warm dispute, or of presumed offence given, you see him pretend to scratch the back of his head, or make any other equally genteel and polite attempt to conduce to his own personal comfort and private satisfaction, in that significant and suspicious region of a loafer's earthly tenement of clay.

Besides the free use of the Bowie knife, another peculiar characteristic of the state of refinement and social intercourse amongst the people of this country is, their inveterate habit of swearing and cursing. I say peculiar, because though no unusual thing elsewhere, yet its very excess, its depth and recklessness, constitute its singleness and singularity there. To return to my personal adventures:—

Scarcely had we been located many hours, after our arrival, in the habitation of an English lady, (Mrs S.,) whose husband was then in England on business, than accounts began to pour upon us of the unhealthiness of the climate; and no trifling fund of anticipatory pity was exhausted upon us for the disappointments and miseries which we all were doomed to endure. The almost inevitable fatality of the main-land, and of those parts of the interior most particularly—Brazoria and the Brazos for instance—where at present the greatest quantity of cotton is produced, was strongly dwelt upon: unless the northern emigrant who purposed settling on the land had taken the precautionary measure of becoming "acclimated" by a year or so's residence on the island. . . .

Notwithstanding all this, we could not believe. The books said otherwise. . . . .

Perhaps Messrs. Newell, Lawrence, and Kennedy, who know so well the healthful properties and the virtues of Texan air, will endeavour to reconcile these facts to the satisfaction of that public whom hitherto they have so woefully misled. At the same time, the charges of doctors (eight in ten at least of whom never had their diplomas) are most enormous. It is no uncommon thing to hear a labouring man state something to the effect that,—"It's of no use working here; for if one contrives to save seventy or eighty dollars beforehand, and then gets 'chill-and-fever' for two or three weeks, it all goes in physic, and then one's just as forward as when one started."

And such, in fact, is the case. While patients decline in purse, doctors acquire a highly-healthy action of the same vital organ: and though hundreds of the medically advised drop into their graves, I do not believe that Galveston Island can yet boast of containing the honoured bones of one solitary medical adviser. Like tarantulas, they can kill anybody except themselves. Should the inquisitive and curious reader wish to know why they especially contrive to escape, while other people are seized; I reply, Because they supply themselves, out of the pockets of their patients, with innumerable comforts and conveniences calculated in that climate to mitigate or ward off disease, which the poor suffering patients, who have to work for their living, cannot, in nineteen cases out of twenty, supply themselves with. Individually, I was cognisant of the fact, that a common seaman before the mast was charged by one of these biting prussic-acid rascals no less a sum than seventy dollars—about £14 English—for somewhere near three-weeks' attendance, draughts and boluses included! Jack, however—(Tom, I ought to say, for that was his name,—Tom Allen, a Scot)—Tom swore he would never pay it; and Texan society may confidently repose its faith in his promise: he is sure to keep it, for the best of reasons,—because he never could pay. Incidentally, I may give a sketch of this man's career in Galveston. He was a seaman on board the ship Francis, in which we left England, and was, beyond comparison, the most able navigator on board. He had been to almost all parts of the known world,—had fought as a pirate amongst the Turks,—and had every nook and corner of the earth beneath his eye far more clearly than many a well-schooled student at twenty, with all his globes, his geographies, and his tutors. The Captain quarrelled with Tom on the voyage, because Tom grumbled at short commons and no grog. A regular cat-and-dog, or dog-and-badger life did they, in consequence, lead of it, until our passage was concluded. The Captain used to threaten to shoot Tom through the head; a threat to which Tom replied, by coolly reminding the old skipper, that "two could play at that game." As, in truth, they could, had it been tried; for the latter had too much of the old pirate in him not to keep a "bosom friend" of that kind with him ever after hostilities commenced. When we arrived in port, and the cargo was begun to be unladen, Tom discovered various casks of bottled London porter stowed away in the hold, belonging to his old enemy, the Captain. This was a glorious revelation. He now determined to be revenged for the short allowance and grog-stopping, to which the crew had been subjected at sea, by discussing this identical porter while engaged with the rest of the men in unlading. He accordingly broke open the casks, took out the bottles, knocked the necks off, and drank the contents along with his comrades, singing out—"yeo, oh—oh,—he—ave—oh!" all the while, to divert the attention of the first mate, who stood at the head of the hatchway on deck, superintending the delivery of those portions of the cargo taken from below. By afternoon, all the men below (in the hold) were gloriously drunk, and, long before sunset, totally unable to work. The mate found fault,—Tom grew rebellious and independent: the men backed him up, and eventually a desperate and bloody fray took place on the wharf, in which Tom was worsted, and for which he was afterwards lugged off to prison. On the following day he was tried and convicted in a tolerably heavy fine; which being paid out of his wages, left him at liberty again, and he returned to the ship. That same night, however, he and two others—one, the cook, named Harry, and the other, another Tom, a ship-boy, called, for distinction, young Tom—contrived a plan of escape from the ship altogether. At midnight they executed it so well, that, by getting on board a fisherman, bound towards Houston, they were sailing up Buffalo Bayou before the old skipper of the Francis knew where to look for them. Young Tom made, however, a grand mistake. He left, in the hurry, his trunk on the wharf; and when he next heard of it, it was found to have nothing inside, although it was quite full of new clothes when he left it there! Tom Allen and Harry obtained employment in the construction of a boat for some settler upon the Bayou; while young Tom (who eventually left his bones to bleach and dry in Galveston sand, under circumstances of a very pitiable nature) rambled off over the prairie in quest of adventures and a living, and finally got elected to the office of cow-herd to a gentleman squatter, who, after the accustomed Texan fashion, never paid him a penny for his service.

Tom Allen, that hardy seaman,—he it was who was suspended by ropes for half-a-day together, with his lower extremities dangling in the sea, while he fixed our jury-rudder, after getting aground, as before related; and that at a time when every other man on board positively refused to do it, from dread of sharks which abound in the Gulf;—Tom Allen, I repeat, soon fell sick; and subsequently, after the departure of the old ship for England, was brought down to the island more dead than alive. Then it was that he swallowed, in the course of so brief a period, seventy dollars' worth of doctor. After that he got into the dock-yard; and in case the intermittent fever does not cause his promotion to heaven, or his degradation to the other place, I should feel inclined to conclude that, in the long-run, he is destined to become a shining light, a sort of sea gem, upon the naval arm of Texas.

The reason why all that low, flat portion of the main-land, before alluded to, should not only be less salubrious than the island,—and indeed that its unhealthiness should increase in some given ratio to its distance from the sea, is plain enough. It is almost entirely attributable to the fact, of its being less under the influence of those fine sea breezes which almost constantly blow from the south,—tempering the burning atmosphere as they pass,—conferring most life where most strong, but dying away altogether long before they have reached a hundred miles inland; and thus leaving the dead, swampy level to reek and steam in a sweltering calm, and under an almost vertical sun, between which and the rank earth below, perhaps not once a-month is seen a single passing cloud. To any man who knows what kind of soil and temperature are required for a good rice-land, the simple fact, that all these levels and bottoms are considered eminently fitted for the cultivation of that hot-and-wet growing grain, will suffice as a more than necessary proof of its generally total unfitness as a location for emigrants from any temperate region, and most especially for the natives of such a climate as this of Great Britain.

Any person rising from the perusal of such works as Mr. Kennedy's, would naturally conclude, that an emigrant had nothing to do but select his locality in any part of this paradise he pleased, and squat down upon it in the same conscious security as though he were going upon the occupancy of a new farm in his own straggling parish.

One would be inclined to take it for granted, that a horse with a man on his back, may travel from Arkansas to Coahuila, and from Galveston to Santa Fé, without risk or peril from either biped, quadruped, centipede, or snake.

So far, however, from this facility of location in the "Garden" of Texas being matter of fact, the truth is, that a tolerably round party, well armed, accoutred, and provisioned, is required, even with absolute safety to go and look at it. These precautions are necessary, both for mutual protection and the sustentation of life in that wilderness of sweets,—that land flowing with milk and honey!

It was in consequence of this insecurity, arising from the unpopulated and unsettled state of the country, that several gentlemen, both English and American, joined the recent celebrated Texan Santa Fé "trading" Expedition, by way of escort, and were afterwards captured by the Mexicans, deprived of their arms, papers, and beasts of burden, and marched barefoot some thousands of miles down to the city of Mexico; where those that survived this perilous journey were subjected to every indignity and barbarity that the low revenge of Santa Anna (President of Mexico) could suggest; and in the end barely escaped with their lives. When in Galveston I was invited to join the party which was then in course of formation: but independently of other minor considerations, I ascertained so much concerning its outfitting, as left no doubt whatever on my mind, that something else besides trading in the ordinary way for Mexican bullion and peltries was in contemplation; and hence luckily declined to form one of the number. The assertion that hostilities of any kind were meditated has, I am aware, been strongly denied by the Texans since the total failure of the expedition itself; but assuredly — whatever might be the meaning of the leaders and captains, there were many amongst them who conceived it at least within the bounds of possibility that a leetle plunder might by chance happen to be brought back again. Mr. Kendall, one of the editors of the New Orleans Picayune newspaper,—having obtained all necessary passports, &c., from the Mexican Consul in New Orleans, to enable him to penetrate into Mexico with security, joined the Expedition because of the protection it afforded in passing through the whole extent of the Texan paradise against wild Indians, roving Mexican marauders, and other nameless dangers. He, along with the greater part of the band, fell into the hands of the Mexicans before they reached Santa Fé, and performed the journey to Mexico as above stated. His passports afforded him no protection:—they were violently taken from him, and, in conjunction with all other papers found on the persons of individuals forming the party, were burned before their faces in the public square. Since his return home, that gentleman has published some highly interesting and vivid sketches both of inland Texan scenery, and of the melancholy march to Mexico, with the adventures that attended it. One of them, both for its brevity and its strikingly Mexican character, I may venture to relate; premising only that Salezar mentioned in the extract, was captain of the prisoners' escort. Mr. Kendall says,—"As we were about starting, after the events I have just detailed, a man named John M'Allister, a native of Tennessee, and of an excellent family, complained that one of his ancles was sprained, and that he could hardly walk. He was nearly lame in the other ancle, and could never walk without limping. On starting, he was allowed to get into a cart which had been employed to carry some of the more feeble of our men; but finding it too heavy loaded, after being a mile on the road he was ordered out and told to limp along the best way he could. Salezar had frequently told those who were unable to keep up that he would shoot them rather than have the march delayed. Although he had already struck and severely beat several of the sick and more unfortunate, we could not believe him brute enough to murder a man in cold blood, whose only crime was that he was lame; but in this we were mistaken. On being driven from the cart, M'Allister stated his inability to proceed on foot. Salezar told him to hurry on. Again the unfortunate man declared himself utterly unable to walk, and this in the presence of half a dozen of his comrades. The worse than brutal captain, now wound up to a pitch of fury, commanded him to follow the cart or he would order him to be shot. 'Then shoot!' said M'Allister, throwing open his blanket, 'and the sooner the better!' Salezar took him at his word; and a single ball sent as brave a man as ever trod the earth into eternity. His ears were then cut off, his blanket and pantaloons stripped from him, and his body thrown by the road-side as food for the wolves!"

The reader will, after this, agree with me that I have since had good cause to congratulate myself on not having saddled a mule or a mustang, (wild horse,) and joined the expedition to Santa Fé. He will also conclude, that settling in the richest and only (to northern people) valuable—because only healthy—part of this magnificent country, is not quite such an easy, quiet, pleasant summer-day's job as some writers, who have never tried it, would fain persuade their more uninformed countrymen that it is. High time enough, indeed, will it be to invite poor emigrants into these flowery wastes when the government of the country possesses something like power and means to protect them when there.

Connected with matters of a sanatory nature, I must not forget to add that Mr. Kennedy has mentioned the existence in Galveston of a General Hospital for the reception of the sick. Whether it be a junior St. Bartholomew's, or a Guy's, we are not informed; nor did I ever ascertain whether any saint in the calendar had or had not any patronage over it. Of this fact I am certain: that, as the juveniles of Cocaigne have it, it was a "regular Guy" to look at. A mile and a half from any human habitation, it stood alone in the desert—dead, silent, and seemingly aloof from all living and active Christian sympathy. It was nothing more than a long and ordinary weather-boarded and shingled house, one storey high, raised on cedar blocks, about two or three feet from the ground, with two windows in front, a door in the middle, and a flight of four or five wooden steps by which to communicate within and without. On one side it looked out upon a landscape of wild sea swamp, covered with hundreds of shrieking and screaming aquatic birds; while an old and ruined wooden fort, combined with the wrecks of once-gallant sailing vessels now fast embedded in the sands of the bay, formed the background. On the other hand, the prospect was that of a wide flat wilderness of sandy shore, upon which the breakers of the gulf, whether at ebb or flow of tide, were everlastingly casting the foam of their madness, and chanting to the ears of the poor, sick, and dying within, day and night, the doleful and solemn song of eternity.

Would that I could now lay before the reader a drawing, made by my own hand, of this veritable hospital, as it stood at midsummer in the year of our Lord 1841! It now lies before me, and calls vividly to recollection many a mad hunting-expedition, many a "wild-goose chase" in reality; many a desperate fishing-bout, and many a sad musing melancholy walk that I have had with some now dead, within the reach of its dreary and fevered eye! Ruin and wreck are painful landmarks; but somehow that poor hospital—that shell of misery—that great coffin of the unburied dead—seen over the prairie from afar, was to me, a rambler in the waste, a far more melancholy landmark than either wreck or ruin.

Towards the maintenance of this deplorable caricature, every emigrant is compelled to contribute one dollar, payable to the mayor of the city. In default of this, the captain of the vessel in which such emigrant arrived, is held liable; and is, farther, empowered to detain the baggage of passengers until the "hospital-money" shall be paid. Even a regular citizen and inhabitant of Texas, coming from a visit to the United States, or any foreign country, is obliged to pay this tribute over again, as often as he goes away and returns.*

Bilious fevers, of different degrees of intensity; ague and fever, producing irrecoverable prostration of the system, delirium, and eventually death; with cholera in different mitigated stages, constitute the general diseases in Texas of a formidable character. At the town of Houston, which is admirably situated in a swamp, the latter malady most extensively prevails; and numbers die there every season.

To return to my story:—Out of the thirty individuals who went out in the same vessel with myself, not more than three entertained, for a moment, any other views than those of obtaining land either by purchase or through the medium of the government grants; of squatting upon it, and becoming, for the remainder of their natural lives, good citizens of the new republic. Look at the result! Of all this number, NOT ONE succeeded in effecting the object for which he had left home and country, crossed thousands of miles of ocean, and gone to Texas. Before Christmas of the same year, some of them had returned home or gone into the United States; some were dying, some dead, and some almost perishing from sheer want, either because they could get nothing to do, or were too sick and reduced to work at all; and some others, alas, were imprisoned upon the island merely because, their resources being completely exhausted, they had not left the means wherewith to get away.

When occasion shall call for the relation of some of their stories more in detail, the public will perceive how easily, and by what a rapid process of transition, the earthly paradise of a couple of octavo volumes may be converted, by disease and anxiety, into a bodily and mental pandemonium. May I never again see such ruin of body and fortune, such wreck of heart, as it was my fate to witness in Texas!

Acting upon the medical advices of the people with whom chance brought me into contact, in conjunction with the practical lessons taught me by a few weeks' experience, I soon resolved to remain (at least for the present) in the island;—to abandon all immediate intentions of penetrating into the interior, to await the result of farther knowledge; and profit, if possible, by the experiences of those who, in this particular, were more sanguine and venturous than myself. Accordingly,—while the various members of our emigrant party were dispersed far and wide, some in one way and some in another,—I myself rented a cottage, with a large enclosure of garden ground attached, about half a mile from the "city," and upon the border of a large bayou† about half way across the island, between the Bay and the Gulf. Some two or three weeks previous to my entry upon it, this cottage had been fairly lifted off its foundations by a tremendous "norther," and carried a couple of yards backwards; but deposited again upon the ground as level and uninjured as before. It consisted of two large rooms, open to the ridge inside, and constructed with the doors and windows opposite each other, north and south, for the benefit of the air. Daylight shone here and there through the cracks and ill-fitting joints of the

* Our contributor's description of this forlorn hospital is highly graphic; but we must be just. There might be worse institutions in a new colony than this; and of the tax for its support, until other means are found for its improvement and proper maintenance, we must entirely approve. The alleged overcharges of the doctors render such an institution doubly necessary; and its spectral exterior has nothing to do with its interior usefulness.—E. T. M.

† A bayou (or biou, as it is pronounced) is a long, narrow, and tortuous water-course, like a natural canal, which derives its origin from the sea, and runs inland like a small river, to the length, not unfrequently, of some miles. One of these completely separates Galveston island, and is pretty deep. Numerous others, generally fordable, intersect it in all directions, and render travelling a rather embarrassing business to any individual unacquainted with their position and depths. They abound with small fish and crabs, and, consequently, are the grand resort of all descriptions of wading birds, which afford such excellent sport to the fowler.

plank walls; and on the beams and rafters which supported the shingled roof, various colonies of a gigantic sort of wasp had established their homesteads in the shape of large masses of mud filled with holes of a geometrical figure, like those of a honeycomb. Mice also had built their nests on the cross-timbers ten or twelve feet from the ground; and a small republic of fierce and warlike rats had additionally declared their independence of the tenant below, and hoisted the liberal flag of Rat's-tail on the roof and upper beams of the building. Behind was a detached kitchen, which stood about two feet from the ground upon four legs, like a stool. The enclosure in which all this was situated had once been cultivated, but was now "an unweeded garden,"—a waste more rankly luxuriant by far than the open prairie itself;—for such all neglected land becomes, after the spade or plough has thrown up hitherto buried soil to the action of the sun and air. Snakes and lizards had made their choice dwellings in it, and the melancholy blue marsh-bittern sometimes paid it a brief visit of inspection at the hour of twilight. Close behind us, the bayou expanded into a large shallow pool, about two feet deep,—one foot of mud and one of water,—which, morning and night, and frequently throughout the day itself, unless too much disturbed by the sportsman's gun, was the constant resort of hundreds of wading and fishing birds of all sizes, from the snowy crane, whose breadth of pinion is six or seven feet, the large blue crane, of still more ample dimensions, the gigantic wood-ibis, and the magnificent roseate spoonbill, down through all gradations of size to some even more diminutive than a sparrow. On some low sandhills beyond, our prospect that way was terminated by the melancholy remains of an unenclosed grave-yard,—the remote and barren resting-place of all who fell by the pestilent yellow fever, when Galveston was visited by it in 1839. Just by way of illustrating the indifference which prevails there on this subject, as well as what little regard is commonly had to the ordinary observances of decent sepulture, a little incident may be mentioned which, at the time of its occurrence, shocked my feelings considerably. At some recent period subsequently to the burial of the fevered corses in these dry sandhills, a road had been formed,—not dug, but trampled,—across the prairie, and directly through the centre of this dreary grave-place, leading to the shore of the Gulf. The first time I walked along this track, and was passing between the banks formed by the divided ridge of hills, my attention was arrested by the appearance of some object protruding out of the sand on one side, of a somewhat unusual character. On stepping up to it, I found it was no other than the upper end of a rough coffin, the lid of which had been pulled aside by the hand of some one curious in the investigation of nature's laboratory of decomposition, and there left as too troublesome to be replaced. The loose fine dry sand had run down from above, and nearly filled up the vacancies of the inside; while, from amidst a mass of poor grave-clothes and sand intermixed, stared forth a dry and withered head, yet covered with long black hair; upon which corruption had not taken place, owing to the total absence of all moisture and the excessive heat of the climate; but which appeared not unlike that of an Egyptian mummy, or the preserved head of a New Zealander. A small but horrible kind of land-crab, found amongst these arid places, had left the claw-marks of its journeying to and from the coffin upon the smoothly drifted sand; and now and then the filthy carrion-eating turkey-buzzard might be seen hovering about the place or perching on the top of some adjoining wooden tomb. Nothing else of life was to be seen from one horizon to the other. The waste amid which the corpse lay seemed as dreary and as dead as the corpse itself. I turned away half heart-sick:—my dog ran towards it, snuffed up the air, and turned away also. I believe it lay in that exposed manner a week or ten days; when some one possessing more respect for the remains of man's mortality than fear of recalling buried fever from the grave, placed some thorns upon the coffin, and covered the whole up again: though still it stood out upon the line of road like a large mole-hill. The landscape, I had forgotten to say was embellished from this grave-yard view by a fine prospect of the gallows upon which a "nigger" had once been hung, I think for murder. With the exception of hemp, all the requisite machinery was in perfect readiness for the next volunteer.

My next-door neighbour in this retreat was Major A——, a Kentuckian by birth,—a hero of the Revolution, and mayor of the city of Galveston. Possessed of all the half-savage characteristics both of his origin and of Texan society generally, he yet was, both in manners and education, a gentleman. The propinquity of our dwellings soon placed us upon the footing of familiar acquaintances, and thus helped to beguile many of those tedious and listless hours which in a hot climate, and amidst a coarse illiterate people, will inevitably steal a march upon any man whose tendencies and tastes, unluckily, chance to require mental provender of a rather more dainty quality than the intellects of a population of carpenters, blacksmiths, and petty shop-keepers, are in general empowered to furnish.

It was, I think, in the "merry month of May," that I first set to work upon Galveston soil, and began to put to the test of practical experiment the boasted productiveness of its never-fading gardens. "Nearly every month"—so writes the Rev. A. B. Lawrence's protégé—"can furnish fine lettuce, radishes, beets, and peas; and thus regale the appetite of the northern traveller, as he arrives on the coast in winter, with the luxuries of his own summer season."

Having got my ground in order, I planted three favourite kinds of English peas, Brussels sprouts, French beans, parsley, raddishes, carrots, onions, garlics, and shallots. Lest, however, these should, like many other flattering Texan promises, chance to fail, I also put in a number of seeds which we had brought from the Isle of St. Thomas's, West Indies;—consisting of mangoes, mammæ apple, soursops, mespils, shaddocks, and a large brown bean which I found growing upon the rocks of the bay. The season being dry—so dry indeed that nearly all the wells in the island failed—I had these seeds watered with persevering constancy whenever they required it, but always before sunrise and after sunset. Eventually the largest kind of pea (which in England grows to an enormous size,) grew from three to four inches high, flowered, and bore pods little more than an inch long, with one or two perfectly-matured peas in each. The other kinds did not even show their noses above ground. While of all the other English seeds, as well as West Indian, not a single one came up at all.

I re-dug my whole garden, and tried a second experiment with sweet-potatoes and water-melons of various kinds. These succeeded to admiration; and I had the daily pleasure of seeing my melon vines stretching over the soil at the rate of little less than a foot in twenty-four hours.

With great care and attention some two or three hundred fine melons were produced and approaching to ripeness, when, one dire black day,—a day that "stands aye accursed in the (gardening) calendar"—I betook myself to a deer-hunt some twelve or fifteen miles down the island,—was out one day and two nights,—and on my return home found Gay's fable of the pig in the tulip-garden realized amongst my crop of water-melons. As this matter, slight as it may seem, subsequently caused my life to be openly threatened, the reader will excuse such particulars as it may appear necessary to give.

Any gentleman who happens to be enthusiastic in natural history, as displayed in the grunting genus of animals, ought to go to Galveston forthwith; since no place can be named where greater facilities for study in that particular department of science may be enjoyed. Parson Trulliber would have been in greater ecstasies there than ever he was, even when he pushed his brother Adams into the hog-stye, since the pigs are not only amazingly numerous, but remarkably acute and sharp; and in their industrious researches after the various edible delicacies of the island, display a degree of sagacity and discernment eminently calculated to redeem the character of their whole race from that odium of proverbial stupidity which, by the common consent of mankind, has been fixed upon it. Enjoying, unchecked, the republican freedom of going at large wherever they please, both town and prairie are overrun by numberless herds of them. Useful as aids and assistants to the turkey-buzzard, in clearing away all descriptions of refuse and offal, they likewise exert all their powers of nose and teeth, in smelling out and destroying snakes of all kinds, which they devour with surprising avidity. In fact, through their instrumentality mainly, is the eastern end of the island, upon which the city stands, indebted for its comparative freedom from those annoying and dangerous reptiles. The pig catches a serpent, by placing his foot upon it, and pinning it to the ground in the division of his hoof. Both day and night do they hunt about, over miles of ground, though most generally during the day. Early in a morning, almost before daylight, they may be seen setting out from the town in the greatest of all possible hurries, and in distinct droves, towards the prairie-swamps and sides of the bayous,—calling at every detached settlement in their way, to pick up what may chance to have been thrown outside the enclosure;—not omitting to walk into your garden, if entrance can be found, and no human creature can be seen; but carefully abstaining from any attempt of the latter kind, should a two-legged enemy, either in trousers or petticoat, appear to have an eye upon them. In this case, they content themselves with a longing peep through the palings, just by way of seeing when your sweet potatoes are likely to be ready, or your water-melons getting towards ripe. One very large, old sow, in particular, I remember, that used to pay a visit to my neighbour, Major A——'s garden about two o'clock in the morning—lift the gate off the latch with her nose, and deliberately walk in to devour whatever freshly-grown greens the Major and his gardener had contrived to raise. Our separation-fence was in indifferent repair, and, consequently, I also became occasionally victimised through the same channel. At first I contented myself with driving the pigs out, and securing my fences, but, on the solemn advice of the Mayor, resolved afterwards to shoot every pig found within my horticultural territory.

"D—— 'em, Hooton!" said the Major, "shoot every one of them, and send me in a piece of the pork. I shall do the same thing, and we will at least have bacon for our greens, if we can get nothing else."

As this advice came from no less a personage than the mayor of the city, and he promised to see me out of all trouble, in case any indictment for pig-slaughter should be brought against me, I did not, for a moment, hesitate to take it. Still, I adopted all preventive measures within my power, as loath to get into a "difficulty," if it could be avoided; and knowing, at the same time, that pig-shooting, in Texas, is about as dangerous a crime to the individual perpetrating it as manslaughter or wilful assassination.

As my melons grew towards ripeness, the temptation to the enemy without grew greater and greater, as evinced in the increased numbers of swinish inquiries that were daily and nightly made through the apertures of the external fences. Still, in spite of all precautions, occasional watchers would get in for a few minutes, and retire again, with a charge of buck-shot more than they calculated on. But on that sad and unlucky day in which I left the place to take care of itself for a while, a whole legion of them took advantage of my absence,—wrenched the palings off with their flexible snouts, and were actually revelling amongst melons and sweet potatoes, at the identical time when I returned home. The garden was totally destroyed,—trampled down, eaten, and grubbed into enormous hills and hollows of lifeless waste, after a fashion that would have made Abercrombie or Mr. Loudon frantic.

So intent were many of them upon their feast, that I slipped into the house unobserved, and, in addition to a charge of shot already in my fowling-piece, loaded with a pistol-ball and two triangular pieces of rough lead; being determined to bring down my game, if possible. Major A—— was looking over his fence, and smiling at these preparations as he pointed out to me the principal offender and ringleader of the herd. It was no other than his night-visiter the old sow. At a distance of about thirty yards, she received the whole contents of the gun upon the side of the head, or neck, I could not tell which, owing to the dusk of night which was then approaching. She spun round two or three times and fell. I ran into the house for a bowie-knife to finish the business, but before I could return, she had got up, and trotted away. I gave up all attempts at gardening for the future, and endeavoured to satisfy my feelings of mortification and revenge by shooting every head of swine that came into my waste, whether by day or by night. Still, out of at least a round dozen that were well shot, I did but succeed in converting one into pork,—a piece of sporting experience which warrants me in stating, for the information of old shots in England, that, to kill a pig by one discharge of powder and lead, is next to impossible, unless a particular spot can with certainty be selected.

It soon afterwards appeared that these proceedings were creating me no very desirable fame; as an acquaintance of mine who resided in the town called upon me one afternoon for the especial purpose of communicating the information, that the owner of a large old sow which had been twice shot (she was shot once by the major) by me, he believed, had expressed his fixed intention to shoot me the first time he happened to see me. Having some reason to repose a little confidence in this Texan promise, I thought it quite as well to be on my guard; and having occasion that very day to go into the town, I placed a brace of pistols in my pocket, with the firm resolve to have the first shot (if I could get it) in case any one should make a hostile demonstration towards me. Happily, however, the threat was for once not carried into execution.

Redress in any other way for destruction of this kind is totally out of the question; as, in the first place, it is impossible to trace individual travelling swine to their owners; and, in the next, if that could be done, the only answer a man would receive would be something to the effect that "he should make his fences stronger."

Directly or indirectly these filthy animals are the cause of more private animosity and personal mischief than almost anything else that could be named. Nay, during the same summer of which I have been speaking, the shooting of one belonging to the French Consul in Houston, under circumstances similar to those I have detailed, led to a great political difficulty, and at one time rather seriously threatened a rupture between the two countries! The Texan government, however, made the amende honorable as well as it could; and thus most happily averted what might have proved a painful and prolonged warfare between the advocates of gardens and the numerous and savage supporters of the constitutional and inalienable rights of pigs.

Cats also constituted another terrible source of annoyance and destruction upon our premises. In consequence of the weather, it is impossible to shut up your kitchen, or place where meat is kept, even during the night. Our kitchen had a window at each end, both of which were always left open for the air. The feline tribes in the neighbourhood soon discovered this interesting fact, and made great profit of it, by nightly devouring our fish and meat, and concluding by licking the dishes off the shelves to the floor, and then flying at a maniacal speed from the clatter of their own raising. It required considerable address to drop upon these alert and soft-footed gentry; especially during the dead of night, when, in white nightcap and bedgown, the sportsman has to turn out at a moment's warning, and creep upon them with sufficient caution to get within shot. The nights, however, in that climate, can never be called dark, like these in this country, unless some northern storm be drifting along the sky, in which case they are as black as the bottom of the Dead Sea. In consequence of this, I could frequently get to one window, while some thievish Tom or Tabby was, perhaps, hesitating suspiciously and reluctantly on the sill of the other. By thus shooting through the kitchen, I eventually relieved the neighbourhood of some of its finest midnight prowlers, and provided many excellent morsels for the buzzards, which never failed to come and decently inter the corpses in their own stomachs. Luckily for the welfare of my face and head of hair, there were few or no old maids in Galveston: women being so remarkably scarce, that a maid is hardly to be met in a day's march; and widows of any mark or likelihood, are either pestered to death by loafers of all descriptions, or compelled to get married again, if only as a stroke of good policy, and in sheer self defence.

(To be continued.)

HERO AND LEANDER. (WRITTEN TO ILLUSTRATE A PICTURE.)

What hadst thou been to fame without thy woes,
Immortal maiden of the Ocean Tower!
Who would thy classic story all disclose,
Not longest lingers on the enhanced hour,
When frenzied billows, vanquish'd by the power
Of love armipotent, yon shore was won,
And thy wave-worn Leander, midst a shower
Of passionate caresses, drooped upon
The bosom with new life instinct for him alone.

Dear is this picture—but a deeper gaze
Dwells on the after-vision of affright;—
That torch not always lent its guiding blaze,
Though, ere it faded from his straining sight,
Long strove the tempest vainly of that night,
When thy expanded arms, and fluttering heart,
Received no visitant of love—the might—
The gloom—the rush of waters—all impart—
Too dread for thought—'tis o'er—'neath Helle's wave thou art.

MEMOIRS AND CORRESPONDENCE OF FRANCIS HORNER.*

From causes much more natural than creditable to the zeal of friendship in certain parties unnamed, the Memoirs of Horner have been very long delayed; yet we should imagine, that the interest connected with his name and era cannot have subsided in the lapse of twenty-six years. Francis Horner was not one of those men whose reputation starts up in a day, and declines with its close. To those who best knew him, whether personally, or by the high character which he had established on the most solid foundation, the interest of his brief history must, we believe, be still fresh and vital as at the moment of his premature and lamented death; while to young men of superior abilities and generous ambitions, who have never yet heard of his name, his example must be found replete with the noblest lessons, and the best encouragement. With the exception of Romilly,—who was a man of much longer standing—there was, perhaps, no contemporary public and literary character of whom the judgments of men were, on all points, so unanimous in approbation. Nor did Horner owe this universal suffrage in his favour either to those brilliant intellectual powers and accomplishments which often, for a time, dazzle and mislead the sober judgments of men, or to any fortuitous circumstance in his career, but solely to great personal worth, and sweetness and amiability of disposition, combined with sound abilities highly cultivated and directed to excellent ends; and, above all, to that happy and well-balanced, though indescribable, mental constitution which was his prime characteristic, and which, without art or effort, stamped him, on the threshold of life, a general favourite.

About the time that Mr. Horner concluded his academical studies, the fanciful and captivating theory of Lavater was in high vogue; and while some of his friends were adepts, he appears to have been tinctured with, or a sort of half-believer in the physiognomical doctrines. His own sensible, serene, and mild countenance, as seen in an engraving from a portrait by Raeburn, in the front of the Memoirs, is a fair index to the character of the man. There is nothing in those benignant features, heroic, daring, or exalted; nothing to startle or perplex. The expression is quiet and simple, indicating mental power, but displaying more strikingly the harmony of moral excellence; truth, candour, kindness, benevolence, repose—that quality generally the most wanting in active and prominent public characters. One of the earliest among Horner's eminent literary friends, the Rev. Sydney Smith, said of him shortly after his death, with all the point, and more than the truth, which sometimes distinguishes his good sayings, "The commandments were written on his face; and I have often told him there was not a crime he might not commit with impunity, as no judge or jury who saw him would give the smallest credit to any evidence against him; there was in his look a calm settled love of all that was honourable and good—an air of wisdom and of sweetness: you saw at once that he was intended for a great man, whom nature intended for a leader of human beings." There is in this much less of the partiality of friendship than one usually expects in posthumous eulogies; and the fact is clear that Horner, much less, than the great majority of men, required the indulgent judgments of friends at any period, or for any act of his public or private life. There are, indeed, few partakers of this frail humanity whose blood and judgment were so well commingled. If not "intended for a leader of human beings," then he was eminently fitted for an instructor and active benefactor of human beings; and that in no narrow sphere.

For these Memoirs of an individual, whom we consider even more estimable for his virtues than he was eminent for intellectual superiority and the effective achievements of his brief public life, we are indebted to his younger brother, Mr. Leonard Horner, on whom, (by good luck,) after the long delays and subsequent failure of other friends, devolved the natural duty of editing, or rather compiling the work. This has been done from ample and valuable materials; namely, the private journals and correspondence of the subject of the Memoirs; and in that happy mode which has been adopted of late, in the instance of the sons of Romilly and of Wilberforce, of the Editor making the man tell his story; converting the Memoirs, in short, into an autobiography.

British society has passed through many trying and exciting scenes and changes since the death of Horner; but the impelling causes were in full activity during his lifetime, and his penetration and cognizance of the springs of coming events often impart an historical interest to his Memoirs. They belong to a memorable period at home and abroad. They go back to nearly the commencement of the liberticide wars waged by the combined Sovereigns of Europe, and reach to the ominous period of the Holy Alliance and the Restoration of the Bourbons. They trace what in them is of far deeper interest, the growth and developement of one superior and virtuous mind; showing step by step how the youth, Francis Horner, became what the world is now pretty well agreed in esteeming him. The Memoirs also give considerable insight into the workings and by-play of political factions; with, what will be more generally attractive, a great deal of literary gossip, and of the secret history of Reviewing; many piquant transcripts from what may be called the State Papers of the Reviewer's Office: more of these indeed than may be altogether approved of in the interested quarters, though not more than will be found highly entertaining and edifying to the uninitiated and profane vulgar. Such accessories must, we should imagine, render the Memoirs on which we are now about to give some commentary generally popular, independently of their higher and intrinsic merits.

* Two volumes octavo; edited by Leonard Horner, Esq. London: John Murray.

Francis Horner was the eldest son of a highly respectable and intelligent manufacturer in Edinburgh. He was born on the 12th of August 1778. By the way this same 12th of August is the natal day of distinguished men, to an extent which might startle a modern astrologer. It is a white or a chosen day in the calendar. In extreme childhood, little Horner toddled on the pavement about the corner of St Andrew's Square with another urchin, by name Master Henry Brougham; the young playmates being about the respective ages of twelve or eighteen months. Whether Master Harry, doubtless the brisker though younger of the two, thrashed the gentler Master Frank, or tripped up his heels, we are not informed. Horner was long a weakly child; and his mother, who was his first instructor, fancied him dull; but at six years of age, at the English school, he gained some reputation; and at the High School attained the enviable Edinburgh distinction of being "Dux of the Rector's class." His first Latin master was the eccentric William Nicoll, the convivial friend of Burns, who appears to have had the whipping of all the clever boys of that generation; but "the Rector" was then the learned and excellent Dr. Alexander Adams, for whom Horner retained, until that venerable scholar's death, a warm and grateful affection. Horner's schoolfellow and fellow-student, from the spelling-book to the conclusion of his studies, and his most intimate, cordial, and cherished friend, in boyhood and through life, was John Archibald Murray, the present Lord Murray, one of the Judges in the Supreme Court of Scotland. It is rare, indeed, out of a man's own family, to find the friendships of boyhood and youth carried into active and mature life with the same degree of sustained warmth, and affectionate confidence and cordiality, which are seen in the whole tenor of the correspondence between Mr. Murray and Mr. Horner. It is even more delightful from its unworldliness than from its rarity; and we remember nothing like it in modern biography—if we except Cowper's Joseph Hill. Though Horner had a host of distinguished and estimable friends, there was no one for whose society he was always longing, and whom he was constantly planning to meet in his brief intervals of leisure for an interchange of mind and of social affection, save Murray. It is with true propriety that Mr. Leonard Horner has dedicated the memoirs of his brother to this most intimate and beloved friend.

A casual, flattering expression of Mr. Blair, afterwards President of the Court of Session—"You must bring up that boy to the bar,"—probably gave the first hint to parental ambition; and after young Horner left the University, and had spent some time with a private tutor in England, the Rev. John Hewlett of Shacklewell, the Scotch bar seemed to be his understood destination.

The period of Horner's attendance at the Edinburgh University was memorable in the history of that seminary, whether we regard the professors or the students. Robertson the historian was still the Principal; and the respective chairs were filled by Professors Dugald Stewart, Playfair, Joseph Black, John Robison, Blair, Dalziel, Monro, and Gregory. The conjunction was rare.

By the early letters, from England, of Horner to his "Honoured Father,"—such being still the formal style of that day,—and his freer correspondence with his friend Mr. Murray, we learn his progress at Shacklewell. Though the main object of his residence in England was the acquisition of a purely English accent, his studies with Mr. Hewlett appear to have been profitable in many other ways. The whole of the correspondence at this period must impress the reader with a respectful idea of the attainments and character of Horner's parents, and of the sterling good sense and prudence which guided and qualified his own early ambition.

While still in England acquiring a pure accent, and adding to, and methodizing, his fund of general knowledge, Horner commenced the study of Civil Law; though it must be confessed, that the favourite pupil of Dugald Stewart, the juvenile member of the Literary and Speculative, and half-a-dozen other of the learned societies of the ingenuous youth of Edinburgh, was at this time a somewhat remiss law-student, and but a desultory student of any science. His time and mind must have been a good deal frittered away among the diversity of his pursuits, and by aiming at too much; though this may have been counterbalanced by that stimulus to activity which his intellect probably required. At all events, the results were good. To be a mere lawyer, however professionally eminent, could never have satisfied his liberal desires; and if he did not realize his own exalted ideal of the man who should unite, in the first degree, literature and philosophy with law, and make the wide domains of all human knowledge his own, his aims were true as well as high, and his attainments were as much above the measure of ordinary men, as they unavoidably fell below his own vast and lofty aspirations. This must ever be the fate of intellectual ambition. What man, deserving the name of great, ever yet realized the tithe of his own imaginings of perfection?

From Horner's private Journal, commenced shortly after his return from England, and when he ought to have been diligently studying the Scots Law, we see much of the inward promptings of his ambition of distinction in philosophy and science; and also of those natural misgivings, and that over-conscientiousness, despondency, and low self-estimation, which beset the most vigorous minds, and which would be very unfairly taken, if assumed as a measure of the real capacities, or even of the actual industry of the man. The most active and persevering minds are, in general, the most apt to bewail their indolence and their failures; as men of the most pure and holy lives are the most sensitive to their own sins and short-comings. It is, however, more hazardous with one order of critics for a man modestly to doubt and to depreciate himself than to indulge in egotism and vain-glory. We should no more take Horner at his word for his vast aspirings and small performances, than chime in with Scott's probably sincere lamentations over his own early neglect of classical learning and the physical sciences, while in the full triumph of what many will deem a higher knowledge. The magnificent plans of study which young Horner was continually chalking out for himself, show at once the fitful activity, and the generous ambition of his nature; and also say something for the society in which he habitually lived, and from which he gained impulse. One of his grand difficulties, at a period when, in his circle, every science was ardently cultivated, was to resist the temptations of desultory study, and desultory reading.

Shortly after his return from England, we find him, at the age of twenty, sketching a plan of studies, which, though somewhat too comprehensive, is yet well worth the attention of aspirants in the same line; of young lawyers who would be something more than mere technical machines.

"As my summer course of study commences this day, I shall here sketch the plan I should wish to pursue, and enumerate the objects I am solicitous to attain. I have already more than once experienced my inability to keep to such plans; but I am not the less satisfied of the great benefit that is to be derived from them, if resolutely followed out. Have I not firmness to bind myself by a few rigid rules, to allow no prospect of a new speculation, however inviting, to draw me aside from the route I had chalked out? I fear not—I shall try.

"My different objects may be arranged under four heads, viz. Law, Physical Science, Political Philosophy, and English Composition.

"1. I propose to give at least three hours every day to Law, viz. from breakfast to one o'clock; after the month of August, for a reason that will immediately appear, I may add a fourth hour to this allowance. Till the end of June, I shall be occupied with civil law. The four succeeding months will be free for Scots law, in the study of which my best plan will be to write out as much of Hume's lectures as I shall find convenient, to study the principles in those notes and in Erskine, confining myself for decisions to Kilkerran and Kames's first collection, which afford the best models (though models of a different kind) for Scots law ratiocination; and, if I can accomplish all this, to read Craig 'De Feudis.'

"2. In Physical Science I must restrict myself. I shall attend Allen's lectures on the Animal Economy, in order to acquire some general notion of a subject, on which I have at present no knowledge whatever. But that this may not encroach on my more necessary occupations, I vow never to meddle with the subject, either in the way of completing my notes from his lectures, or reading books connected with the subject, except before breakfast. I have never been in the regular practice of rising early in the morning; so I hope that this new and interesting science may stimulate me to that healthy and valuable habit. The lectures are from one to two o'clock; and as regular exercise ought to accompany regular study, I shall have, for this purpose, the interval between two o'clock and dinner time.

"The course will be over in three months. I wish I could bring within these three months a perusal of Euclid's Elements, and of the first volume of Euler's Algebra; but they must not, by breaking in irregularly on my physiological studies, spoil my progress in both.

"3. Next to law, Political Philosophy, History, and Natural Jurisprudence, are to be my principal objects of pursuit. To these I shall give most of my evenings for six months to come. Two evenings in the week, indeed, must be subtracted, one for the meeting of the Academy; the other I mean to reserve for exercises in style: and I shall put them together, that the train of inquiry may be broken in upon as little as possible.

"With respect to these studies, I am engaged in the first place by an essay on Population for the Academy; this I wish to finish as soon as possible, in order that I may proceed to a regular and systematic study of Political Philosophy. I shall begin with reading most accurately and analyzing Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws; this will probably suggest a variety of subjects for investigation, one or two of the most general of which I shall prosecute and write on. Nothing contributes so much as original composition, to fix the principles of a science familiarly in one's mind. I shall study and analyze, in the same manner, the Wealth of Nations; to complete the study of which, it will be necessary to examine, in the best of their own writings, the system of the French Economists. After so much general inquiry, it would be right, in order to correct the habit of mind that may thereby be formed, to give a little time to the perusal of books of fact, such as a few of the most classical histories, and one or two of the most judicious travellers. Returning to the science, the last general branch is that of natural jurisprudence, where I shall have rather to think for myself, than derive much light from books. I understand from Reddie, that the best he has met with is a treatise by Cocceius, published in his edition of Grotius. This I shall read; and just as I have time, the work of Grotius himself. If I get through these three standard books with their proper accompaniments, I ought to proceed to English history, and prosecute that study of the government and constitution, in which I made some little progress towards the end of last summer.

"4. With respect to composition, I wish I could allot more time to it than I have reserved. The single evening in the week will be laid out to best advantage in translation, or the studious and critical perusal of a few of the best English authors. When Allen's course expires, I shall have the hours before breakfast of the remaining three months to give to Cicero's Orations, and perhaps I may add those of Demosthenes. I shall take an opportunity, also, in such intervals as will sometimes occur, in the prosecution of my political studies, to give an evening or two at a time to the composition of essays on popular topics of morals and criticism.

"A vast plan this, exceeding, I suspect, my powers of execution. But I have never known yet what study is; I have never made a real effort of persevering resolution. How many blockheads of the commentator tribe have gone through ten times the labour in the space that I propose. Perhaps brains of such texture are the best fitted for toil. But it is not the fact; read the accounts that are handed down to us of the diligence of Demosthenes, Cicero, Hale, Boyle, Turgot, Jones, Gibbon, &c., not to mention the long series of illustrious mathematicians."

One must sympathize with the young student, both in his aspirations and his short-comings. In one place we find his industry stimulated to enthusiasm by the marvels told of the prodigies of study performed by one of our modern Admirable Crichtons, Sir William Jones; and after one day reading the eloge of Haller, in the Memoirs of the French Academy, he enters in his Journal—"I never rise from an account of such men as Haller without a sort of thrilling palpitation about me, which I know not whether I should call admiration, ambition, or despair." It was a compound of all the three. The example of Gibbon excited the same feelings, and also the conversation of Mackintosh. How "to unite the business of a Scotch lawyer with an ardent and steady pursuit of science, as well as the cultivation of taste," became to him an anxious and "formidable problem."

To improve himself in composition, he systematically studied the purest English classics, and exercised himself in translating from good French authors. He seems to have acquired considerable knowledge of Italian and Spanish without the assistance of masters. The historians, philosophers, and economists, at all times, stood higher in his favour than the poets and imaginative writers. At this period of life, Bacon was the object of his fond enthusiasm and unbounded admiration; a greater, to Horner at the age of twenty-two, than even Dugald Stewart, which is saying much. At this time of life we find him thus journalizing—

"PLAN.—I have long been feeding my ambition with the prospect of accomplishing, at some future period of my life, a work similar to that which Sir Francis Bacon executed almost two hundred years ago. It will depend upon the success and the turn of my speculations, whether they shall be thrown into the form of a discursive commentary on the 'Instauratio Magna' of that illustrious author, or shall be entitled to an original form, under the title of a 'View of the Limits of Human Knowledge, and a System of the Principles of Philosophical Inquiry.' I shall say nothing at present of the audacity of such ambition. No presumption is culpable, while it only stimulates to great undertakings; it becomes excessive when it appears ridiculous by the inadequacy of what is performed, when contrasted with what is attempted. If I have vanity enough to think myself—I do not say equal to such a scheme, but capable of rendering myself equal to it, I trust I shall retain pride and discretion enough to be conscious all along how far my acquisitions are adequate to my aims. . . . It is proper for me to know how much I should aspire to, and then to arrange the order of my journey. At present, I am of all men that pretend to be informed the most superficial: I have dabbled in languages, mathematics, mechanics, chemistry, metaphysics, the fine arts, even physiology and physiognomy: on all of them I can talk very fluently before the ignorant, but on none of them am I profoundly, or even accurately, informed, or capable of thinking for myself, either with originality or with precision. I see, therefore, what yet remains to be done, viz. to take up one science after another, and work doggedly through its details."

This seems the difficult and happy medium between presumption and despondency. About this time, Lord Webb Seymour, a younger brother of the Duke of Somerset, and a remarkable man for one of his rank, after having finished his education at Oxford, came to Edinburgh, to devote himself to study, attracted by the brilliant reputation of the Professors of that period. In this young nobleman Horner found a congenial mind, and a warm friendship arose between them. They read together, discussed metaphysics and mathematics together, attended lectures, and walked together, and served each other as intellectual whetstones. Horner considered himself greatly indebted to Lord Webb's example and counsels, and the advantage must have been reciprocal. Many of his happiest hours were now spent "with Bacon and Seymour."

Horner appears, at an early age, to have been led to those pursuits on which his reputation as a public man afterwards rested. Dugald Stewart about this time, in addition to his ordinary academic course of Moral Philosophy, began to give Lectures on Political Economy, then a new science, at least in name, and thus the attention of Horner was more closely directed to those investigations in which Adam Smith had triumphantly led the way. Turgot became with him a favourite writer, and he was certainly much more delighted with Turgot's Lettres sur les Grain, and treatises of kindred character, than with Les Jardins, of Delille, and the other works of elegant literature then in vogue which he read. All this while his studies of Scots and Civil Law were in progress; and his was no vulgar idea of a lawyer's qualifications. At the age of twenty, when occasionally attending the Scotch Supreme Court, to learn what was then and there considered the best style of bar oratory, we find him saying—

In order to be a barrister of any eminence, I can perceive that two requisites are indispensable; in the first place, an accurate and comprehensive acquaintance with all the points of law which, in the discussion of any cause, may be brought into the argument; and secondly, the talent of detailing the narrative and arguments of a speech in that distinct order which most properly belongs to them, so that every hearer may not only be enabled to follow them as the speaker goes along, but likewise to preserve a clear recollection of the arrangement of all that has preceded. These two points, I apprehend, are absolutely essential to success in pleading at the bar. . . . . "A barrister ought to have all his knowledge and all his talents so ready, that he may at a moment's warning call them into service. This must prove of the first consequence. He should likewise form the habit of complete self-possession, a quality very different from that impudence which is the joke against all the profession, and justly reproached to too many: but I mean that command of temper, in every respect, which is necessary to keep command of the understanding. There are several embellishments which wonderfully set off pleadings at the bar: such as a happy introduction of hypothetical cases, bearing an analogy to that at issue; a successful reference to polite anecdotes and histories; a powerful appeal (in the midst of a legal argument, and in support of it) to the passions of humanity, indignation, generosity, and honour, or to the emotions of ridicule and satire, according as circumstances demand. Such are the notions I have at present with respect to bar eloquence. I suspect they may be inaccurate, I know they are incomplete. . . . . There is nothing deserving the name of eloquence which is not always at command; I do not aim at the talent of making fine holiday speeches upon occasion. . . . . Metaphysics I find a most improving exercise; fixing the powers of attention, and sharpening those of apprehension. Metaphysics and history, says Lord Bolingbroke in a very fine passage of his letters, are the vantage-grounds which a lawyer must seize, if he means to make a science of his profession.

These were not crude notions for twenty. A year later we find him thus forecasting future achievements:—

"If I ever accomplish any scientific work, it will probably be in that line to which I have looked forward for several years; viz. general views of philosophical logic. Previous to any attempt at execution, I must go through the circle of physical, mathematical, and metaphysical sciences. Do I flatter myself with the least approximation to success? This I fear, that, presumptuous as I may be in thinking to get a prospect of the whole land of science, I shall most likely be nothing but a superficial fellow, as to my knowledge of any part of it: I may see the land of self-promise, but most likely shall die like Moses, at a distance. At any rate, let but one science be studied at a time; and always, in each investigation, let me have general principles in view. . . . . .

"To unite the business of a Scotch lawyer with an ardent and steady pursuit of science, as well as the cultivation of taste, especially in composition—a formidable problem."

It is probable that Horner was a born Whig; but, at all events, his political opinions were very early made up. He was a constitutional Whig, a Whig of 1688, and a worshipper of Fox; but he was always sage and safe, and the reverse, in short, of rash or innovating. We cannot imagine of him boldly plunging with his friend Brougham into a sea of troubles about the Droits of the Admiralty, as soon as he got into parliament; or awakening a nest of the most envenomed hornets—to buzz about his ears, and, if possible, sting him to death,—by disturbing the long and luxurious slumbers of the profiters by the gross abuses of Educational Charities throughout England. His political creed, at twenty-one, and his notions of social conduct, are thus stated :—

I daily find it more necessary to be anxious about the formation and expression of my political opinions. In such times as the present, there is some merit in setting about it in a manly and open manner. On the one hand, the majority of the country runs strongly and implicitly in favour of a minister who has made the greatest inroads on the constitution ; on the other, there is a set of people who, undoubtedly, some from wicked and ambitious, others from honest views, pant after a new and republican order of things. Between these two fires, there is some courage in pleading the cause of our neglected constitution ; it must of course be a most unpopular engagement ; but there is so much the more satisfaction to one's self in maintaining a firm post against such variety of assailants. . . . . There is a style of behaviour with which I am not at all acquainted, but which I should aim at, as an invaluable possession, by which it is possible to keep certain sentiments within one's own breast, or at least within the circle of a few friends, and at the same time fall into no corrupt hypocrisy or unmanly acquiescence in the opinions of whatever company we may happen to meet.

The Rev. Sydney Smith had come to Edinburgh with his pupils, about the same time with Lord Webb Seymour ; and on their second appearance we find Horner journalizing—

"My two English friends, the Rev. Sydney Smith and Lord Webb Seymour, are again come to Edinburgh for the winter; and I promise myself much pleasure and much instruction from their conversation. I shall perhaps improve my powers of argumentative dexterity, which are still very low ; and, at any rate, I cannot but learn candour, liberality, and a thirst for accurate opinions and general information, from men who possess in so remarkable a degree these valuable dispositions."

The Speculative Society was also at this time a useful exercising-ground to the young law-student; and we find him often at "the Society," discussing points with some able competitor, or listening to the discussions of "Brougham and Jeffrey," on such points as "colonial establishments." On these Brougham was already diligently writing. Horner for one of his subjects chose the circulation of money. In conjunction with the late Dr. Thomas Brown, and some others, Horner was at this time engaged in translating the political and philosophical works of Turgot, which were afterwards published.

In the Summer of 1800, Mr. Horner stood the usual trials and passed as Advocate ; while probably his knowledge of Scots law was not the most copious or profound. But he had abundant time "to add and eke ;" though, indeed, in Scotland he never seems to have taken heartily to his profession. The routine of irksome drudgery to which every young Scottish lawyer must submit, whether fee'd or briefless, appears to have early disgusted him. His daily attendance in the "Outer House," gave him a constant headach ; and he conceived it time unpleasantly wasted. Of this drudgery he says—

"For some days past my hours have been pretty regularly distributed between idleness and occupation. To the former side of the account, I must place the whole morning spent in the Parliament House; and which I can only occasionally relieve by attending a pleading, or by reading a law paper. On the other side, I may note a couple of hours devoted, after my return home, to the economical details of the corn trade: an hour immediately after dinner, while the rapid progress of digestion clouds the powers of apprehension, employed in the lighter labour of culling flowers from the style of Gibbon ; and the remainder of the evening filled up with the study of my friend Bell's new publication on the bankrupt law." . . . . . .

"January 22d.—After waiting the whole morning, my pleading did not take place. My only recompence for a constant and ever-during headach, consists in hearing a few important questions well discussed, out of a vast mass of cases which are either not important or do not receive an interesting discussion." . . . . . .

"The composition of Session papers for the Outer House sickens me to nausea. Self-denial, perseverance, inflexible assiduity, what virtues you are ! but what exertions you require ! That ambition, which can submit to present mortification, and to long dull drudgery, for the attainment of remote honour, is like that fortitude which can reason in the midst of danger, the attribute not of man, but of a god."

Far different were the golden evenings spent at the Speculative Society. The discussion there on a particular evening has a present and lively interest—

"I went to the speculative Society this evening, where I heard a very indifferent discussion of one of the most interesting subjects which can engage the attention of a political philosopher ; the consequences of a free commerce and intercourse between China and the rest of the civilized world. There cannot be a more splendid prospect, than that of this new world being unfolded to the curiosity and the observation of European science. The discovery which Columbus achieved, hitherto the most magnificent event in the revolutions of the globe, suffers immensely in the comparison. That world, which he found at the western extremity of the Atlantic, was thinly peopled by scattered families of naked barbarians ; who, except in one or two spots, were in the earliest infancy of the political order. But that world, which is detached from Europe by the wilds of Siberia and Tartary, exhibits the sublime spectacle of an incalculable population, which, during a long succession of ages, has been disciplined into all the arrangements of the social union, and by a gradation, of which the steps are unknown to the historians and philosophers of Europe, has attained a high pitch of civilisation, industry, and refinement. What an immense accession to the science of human nature, will be furnished by the results of an insulated experiment performed on so large a scale ! But it is not upon the gratification of curiosity, to the philosopher either of Europe or of China, that our anticipations are most fondly allured to dwell : our fancy is still more powerfully engrossed, by the prospect of a change which will be accomplished, soon after a free intercourse, in the moral situation both of China and of Europe. The mutual collision of diversified manners, opposing opinions, separate experience, will strike a reciprocal stimulus into each ; the impulse will pervade the whole system of the earth, accumulating force in the course of its progress ; new sciences will spring up, and new arts ; new powers will develope themselves, of which man is yet unconscious : but even then the career of human kind will still appear infinite, and their prospects without a close."

To make amends for dull forenoons spent in walking the Court, were evenings worthy of the gods, "with Smith, Playfair, and Alison." Mixed society Horner did not find so agreeable ; or he was probably not yet formed to it. He says—

"I have mingled more of late, than I had been accustomed, with the society of that description of women, who were so agreeable to David Hume ; but after I deduct a few exceptions, where personal preference has fixed a charm, I confess that I rather yield to the speculative anticipation that pleasure ought to be derived, than to the remembrance of pleasure actually experienced. . . . . Indeed, from what I have seen, the inhabitants of this place have very little taste in conversation ; if a few of those be excepted, who, either by their rank or by their literary pursuits, have viewed more of the world than can be seen within Scotland. I talk chiefly of that form of company in which men and females are intermingled; for in the male parties, there is always information at least to be got, though very rarely conveyed in an agreeable form."

Horner was new to mixed polite society though old to science, when at twenty-three he wrote somewhat pedantically :—

The chemical paper before the Society was an analysis of Scheele's famous theory of phlogiston and fire, which it cost me much pains to follow throughout, from my ignorance of his terms, as well as from my familiarity with a different nomenclature. From these diversified exercises, I transported myself to a scene of a different kind; where I was seated for two hours at the whist table; a game, the ingenious combinations of which interest me enough to rouse my attention, but puzzle me enough to make that attention an effort.

Though the following year saw some progress made in the general knowledge of law, it likewise added to the young lawyer's dislike of the practice and usages of the Scots Court; and, after having walked the boards for above a year, we find this grave enunciation made :—

There are certain circumstances positively disagreeable both in the manner in which business is conducted, and in the manner in which success is attained; and these disadvantages are rendered the less tolerable, after comparison with the courts of the South. To speak out at once, therefore, whether it be foolish restlessness or ambition, I have for some time entertained serious thoughts of removing to another sphere of action, and of staking my chance in the great but hazardous game of the English bar.

In the spring of the following year he actually went to London to reconnoitre, and there found friends who probably helped to fix his purpose. Among these were Mr. Abercromby—now Lord Dunfermline,—Sir Samuel Romilly, Sir James Mackintosh, and Mr. Hallam. His Journal during this visit contains many such piquant morsels as the following :—

"I have been once to the Royal Institution, and heard Davy lecture on animal substances to a mixed and large assembly of both sexes to the number, perhaps, of three hundred or more. It is a curious scene; the reflections it excites are of an ambiguous nature; for the prospect of possible good is mingled with the observation of much actual folly. The audience is assembled by the influence of fashion merely; and fashion and chemistry form a very incongruous union. At the same time, it is a trophy to the sciences; one great advance is made towards the association of female with masculine minds in the pursuit of useful knowledge; and another domain of pleasing and liberal inquiry is included within the range of polished conversation. Davy's style of lecturing is much in favour of himself, though not, perhaps, entirely suited to the place; it has rather a little awkwardness, but it is that air which bespeaks real modesty and good sense; he is only awkward because he cannot condescend to assume that theatrical quackery of manner, which might have a more imposing effect. This was my impression from his lecture. I have since (April 2d) met Davy in company, and was much pleased with him; a great softness and propriety of manner, which might be cultivated into elegance; his physiognomy struck me as being superior to what the science of chemistry, on its present plan, can afford exercise for; I fancied to discover in it the lineaments of poetical feeling.

"I have occasionally attended both the Court of Chancery and the Cockpit. In the former I have heard Mansfield, a vigorous old man, and Romilly, who stands at the head of the profession (as I am informed by every one,) both in point of legal accomplishments, general information, and respectability. In consequence of a letter of introduction from Dugald Stewart, I have seen and conversed with him for a short time at his chambers. I understand he lived very much with literary men in the earlier years of his life, and at the same time gained high reputation as a draughtsman; it is highly gratifying to know, that the two pursuits are not altogether incompatible. At the Cockpit, where a committee of the privy council decide prize appeals, I have heard Dr. Lawrence and the Attorney-General Law.

"April 10*th*.—This day I dined at the King of Clubs, which meets monthly at the Crown and Anchor in the Strand. The company consisted of Mackintosh, Romilly, Whishaw, Abercromby, Sharp, Scarlett, &c. Smith is not yet come to town. The conversation was very pleasing; it consisted chiefly of literary reminiscences, anecdotes of authors, criticisms of books, &c. I had been taught to expect a very different scene; a display of argument, wit, and all the flourishes of intellectual gladiatorship: which, though less permanently pleasing, is for the time more striking. This expectation was not answered; partly, as I am given to understand, from the absence of Smith, and partly from the presence of Romilly, who evidently received from all an unaffected deference, and imposed a certain degree of restraint. I may take notice of one or two particulars, which struck me as the characteristic defects of this day's conversation. There was too little of present activity; the memory alone was put to work; no efforts of original production, either by imagination or the reasoning powers. All discussion of opinions was studiously avoided. . . . . I shall only remark farther in this place, that between Sharp and Mackintosh, for example, there seems to me too much of assentation with respect to canons of criticisms, &c.; as if they lived too much together; as if they belonged to a kind of sect; or as if there was something of compromise between them. Their principles of criticism and taste appear to me quite just, and formed very much upon the French school; Racine and Virgil the models of poetical composition, and Cicero the prince of prose writers: at the same time they do not carry the principles, upon which this judgment is founded, to that cold and dull extreme, which limits all excellence to correctness, and allows no relish for the wildness of untamed imagination, or the flights of extravagant eccentric genius. I rather apprehend that they even suffer this indulgence a little farther than is quite consistent with the other ruling principle; their admiration of Burke, for example, is not qualified enough; and their appetite for the nervous or flowing passages that may with toil be detected in the obscure folios of some of our old English writers, 'apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto,' betrays unquestionably a palate not fully gratified with the milder relish of chastened excellence." . . . .

"If I were to describe the merit of each by a single word, I should say that Scarlett shows subtlety, Smith promptitude, Mackintosh copiousness, and Romilly refinement. I mention in Romilly this distinguishing character, both because I have seen in him a remarkable degree of softness and elegance, and because I was rather hurt by a want of sentimental delicacy in Mackintosh and Smith."

This avoidance of discussion could not be pleasant to a young man fresh from the "Speculative," and from a society in which every coterie was in itself a sort of small "Speculative." Before leaving London, Horner wrote to his father that his mind was finally made up for the English Bar; and by the advice of Romilly he chose his department, and entered himself at Lincoln's Inn before leaving town.

Previous to this trip, the Edinburgh Review, of the rise and progress of which the world has lately been informed by the Rev. Sydney Smith, had been projected. Those anxieties and calamities, apparently inseparable from the editorial function, seem to have commenced with Mr. Jeffrey even before the birth of No. I. Of that immortal Number Mr. Smith seems to have considered himself the Editor, nor does he include Horner among the original projectors of The Review, though he must have been considered at all times, by Jeffrey, one of the main props of the concern. The letter from Mr. Jeffrey, of which the following paragraph is an extract, was written about six months before the appearance of The Review in November, 1802 :—

I must first tell you about The Review, that you may be satisfied it holds the first place in my affection. We are in a miserable state of backwardness, you must know, and have been giving some symptoms of despondency; various measures have been tried, at least, against the earliness of our intended day of publication; and hints have been given of a delay that I am afraid would prove fatal. Something is done, however, and a good deal, I hope, is doing. Smith has gone through more than half his task. So has Hamilton. Allen has made some progress: and Murray and myself, I believe, have studied our parts, and tuned our instruments, and are almost ready to begin. On the other hand, Thomson is sick. Brown has engaged for nothing but Miss Baillie's Plays; and Timothy has engaged for nothing, but professed it to be his opinion the other day that he would never put pen to paper in our cause. Brougham must have a sentence to himself; and I am afraid you will not think it a pleasant one. You remember how cheerfully he approved of our plan at first, and agreed to give us an article or two without hesitation. Three or four days ago I proposed two or three books that I thought would suit him; he answered, with perfect good humour, that he had changed his view of our plan a little, and rather thought now that he should decline to have any connexion with it.

I forgot to tell you that I ran away for three days to the Circuit at Glasgow, where I recruited Birkbeck, and Lockhart Muirhead, and my friend Dr. Brown, for our review. They are all so lately enrolled, however, that I doubt if we can expect any active service from them for our first number. Birkbeck talks of going to France in the summer; and Brown, I am afraid, will have but little time to spare from his patients and his botany. We are most in want of a German reviewer at present; without that language it would be ridiculous to pretend that we are to give a passable account of Continental literature.

The individuals above referred to were Sydney Smith, Professor Hamilton, afterwards of Haylesbury, Lord Murray, Dr. Thomas Brown, and Thomas Thomson, Advocate, alias Timothy. Before The Review appeared Mr. Horner had returned, to Edinburgh, and we find him thus writing to his friend Mr. Allen, previously a surgeon and private lecturer on Physiology and Chemistry in Edinburgh, but shortly before become the private secretary of Lord Holland.*

Our Review goes on tolerably well; in consequence of Constable's own arrangement, it is not to appear till the 1st of November, but more than half the first number is already printed. I wish you would advertise the publication in some of the Paris newspapers or journals, in the manner that you shall judge most likely, if there is any chance to excite a little curiosity about it. Jeffrey has written three or four excellent articles; and Brougham is now an efficient and zealous member of the party. We regret your loss to a degree that I shall not express to you, though we do not altogether despair of receiving a few short critiques on such foreign publications as you happen at any rate to read with care. I particularly wish we had had from you a review of Ware's strange paper on the blind boy restored to sight. Brougham has selected from the same volume of the Philosophical Transactions, Herschell's discovery of the sympathy between the spots of the sun and the prices of wheat in Reading market.

In Horner's Journal we are informed—

This Review was concerted, about the end of last winter, between Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, and myself. The plan was immediately communicated to Murray, Allen, and Hamilton; Brown, Brougham, and the two Thomsons, have gradually been made parties.

When the first number (a rather indifferent one, by the way) had been published, Horner records—

Upon the whole, I do not think we have gained much character by it: it is considered as respectable enough in point of talents; but the severity, in some of the papers it may be called scurrility, has given general dissatisfaction. In the next number, we must soften our tone, and be more indulgent to folly and to bad taste. Jeffrey is the person who will derive most honour from this publication, as his articles in this number are generally known, and are incomparably the best: I have received the greater pleasure from this circumstance, because the genius of that little man has remained almost unknown to all but his most intimate acquaintances. His manner is not at first pleasing; what is worse, it is of that cast, which almost irresistibly impresses upon strangers the idea of levity and superficial talents. Yet there is not any man whose real character is so much the reverse.

Of the second number he says—

"This day we publish a second number of our Review. I think you will find it free, at least nearly so, from some of the objections that were most strongly, and all of them justly, urged against the former. There are scarcely any insignificant books,—no sermons—few personalities—the general train of criticism less abusive. We are not indeed quite purified of all our gross faults, but the opinion of our friends has made a considerable impression upon us. . . . . I must now set myself to write a few articles for the Edinburgh Review, of which engagement I heartily wish I were rid."

Horner after settling in London, and commanding a broader range of the political and literary horizon, was often grievously afflicted by the personalities and partisanship displayed in The Review. When six or seven numbers had been published, we find Mr. Jeffrey writing him :—

I am glad there is anything in The Review to please your fastidious taste, and most glad to find that you are actually at work upon something to make the next number still better. Yours has been a deplorable desertion, my dear Horner; and has really weighed very heavily upon my spirits: for our sake, for my sake, for your own sake, and for God's sake, do set about Malthus immediately, and by the labour of one week save yourself from the penitence and reproaches of many months. . . . . Brougham, I understand, has emigrated, so he writes me, but with what view he does not explain. He has left a political article for us; and says he has engaged several Royal Society men for others, to the extent of two sheets in all; he fights very well with his own hand, but I do not in general approve of his choice of seconds. . . . . For next number I project great things, though nothing that can afford an important article. I think of giving an analysis of Brougham's Colonial Policy, Richardson's Letters, Barrow's Travels, and Sir W. Jones' Life. When will Wordsworth and Southey come forth! I shall try to give you a little pointed criticism then.

The "pointed" criticism of Wordsworth and Southey, then promised, is hardly yet forgotten.

Of Campbell at this time we learn from Horner—

This morning I returned from a visit to our poet Campbell. He has fixed himself in a small house upon Sydenham Common, where he labours hard, and is perfectly happy with his wife and child. I have seldom seen so strong an argument, from experiment, in favour of matrimony, as the change it has operated on the general tone of his temper and manners. The last little thing he has written is a sea ballad, on Nelson's fight at Copenhagen, most parts of which are very successful.

Horner, like every man who cannot feel poetry, was

* We regret to see the death of this accomplished man announced as this sheet passes through the press. He had for some years been the Master of Dulwich college. —E. T. M.

but an indifferent judge of it. He, however, proved a most useful auxiliary to Mr. Jeffrey,—not alone by his own contributions, but by finding able contributors, and by his admirable suggestions. To the last he seems to have felt a warm or paternal affection for The Review; though this was more frequently shown in rebuke and remonstrance than in commendation. The combustion, particularly commemorated in Lockhart's Life of Scott, which arose on the publication of the damping and disheartening article on the prospects of Spain, in a number of The Review, which appeared while the English national feeling was blood-high, and indignation against Napoleon was boiling over, is thus adverted to in an editorial letter to Horner :—

I see by The Courier that the combustion which the review of Cevallos has excited here has spread in some degree to London. I am convinced, too, that it has damaged us a little; and am so much persuaded that it is necessary for us to make more than an ordinary exertion at this crisis, that I take courage to do that which is now very painful to me—to solicit your aid in my day of need. The Tories having got a handle are running us down with all their might; and the ghosts of all the miserables we have slain are rising to join the vengeance. Walter Scott and William Erskine, and about twenty-five persons of consideration, have forbidden The Review to enter their doors. The Earl of Buchan, I am informed, opened his street door, and actually kicked it out! Then, Cumberland is going to start an anonymous rival; and, what is worse, I have reason to believe that Scott, Ellis, Frere, Southey, and some others are plotting another. You must see, therefore, that it is really necessary for us now to put on a manful countenance, and to call even the emeriti to our assistance. I entreat you to do an article for me during the holidays. We shall scarcely be out before the end of January, and I might even give you the whole of that month, if you need it. Now, I do think that you would give me £100, if I was in great need of it; and this will cost you less work than you could do for £50 for any knave of a solicitor: and it is of infinitely more consequence and gratification to me than any £100 could be. Persuade yourself for once then, my dear Horner, that this is not a solicitation of custom, but that I make it with as much real anxiety and earnestness, and as much dread of a refusal, as if I were asking a pecuniary boon. You shall have your choice, of course, of a subject; but I wish you would put your notes and notions of Malthus together at last. It is a fine subject; and you are in a manner pledged to it. But if you can think of anything more popular or striking, take it—only no party politics, and nothing but exemplary moderation and impartiality on all politics. I have allowed too much mischief to be done from my mere indifference and love of sport; but it would be inexcusable to spoil the powerful instrument we have got hold of, for the sake of teasing and playing tricks. Tell me, too, what you think I should do myself. I grow stupid from day to day; but I will cheerfully dedicate the holidays to this service, if you will condescend to guide me.

I would gladly write you something more amusing, but I am over head and ears in session papers, and am dying of sleep. Murray tells me that you have still hopes of Spain. I have despaired utterly, from the beginning; and do not expect that we are ever to see 10,000 of our men back again—probably not 5000. The prospect is monstrous, and startles even my public apathy. . . . . Do send me a line of comfort, and believe me, in infinite haste and stupidity.—Most truly yours, F. JEFFREY.

The article alluded to, "Don Pedro Cevallos on the Usurpation in Spain," was attributed to Brougham, the author of much of the political "devilry," though here the Editor avows the same desponding opinions which rendered the review so obnoxious to the kindling patriotism of Great Britain. Editors are the coolest dunners in the world, and the most pertinacious and intrepid too; but all in modesty, because in virtue of their great office. The following are, we imagine, fair specimens of their applications. Horner had just sent an article, the review of a French translation of Fox's History; for which work, by the way, he seems to have had a most overweening reverence; and Jeffrey writes him—

I have received your article, which is now in the hands of the printer. I am half in hope that when you see yourself once more bound up with your old associates, you will feel your ancient zeal for reviewing revive, and be tempted to resume the character of a contributor. I am sure it must do you a great deal of good, and be very soothing to your conscience, if you would. In the meantime, I thank you with all my heart for what you have done; and shall send you a copy of the number as soon as it is finished. I do the American Epic, Mrs. Montague's Letters, and Hamilton's Parliamentary Logic; all fastidiously.

Upon another occasion, Horner, having promised a great or "crack" article on Turgot, is thus solicited in the meanwhile :—

Did you ever doubt, my dear Horner, that you might do Turgot, or anybody else, and to be just as long to him as you thought proper? If you would but feed my daily craving with some little matter in the meantime, I should never quarrel with your long gestation of the Majora Opera. For this reason, while I most freely commit Turgot to your discretion, I cannot help putting up a small petition for having your legal article before the end of January; that is to say, if you will not do another article for me by that time, which might probably be more immediately interesting. Murray read me several vehement remarks upon jury trials, from a letter of yours the other day; mixed with some traits of virtuous indignation at my unworthy treatment of that question on a former occasion. Now, why will you not draw up a little clear article on that most important subject? . . . . . I have attacked Playfair for the article you suggest; but am not quite sure of obtaining it; he is very busy with his Huttonianism. Do you think Whishaw could be prevailed on to lend us a few hours' work of his strong and virtuous reason?

This is almost worthy of Pope's Lintot. But the same letter contains better things—as this :—

Do, for Heaven's sake, let your Whigs do something popular and effective this session in Parliament. Cry aloud, and spare not, against Walcheren; push Ireland down the throats of the Court and the country; and do not let us be lost without something like a generous effort, in council as well as in the field. You must lay aside a great part of your aristocratical feelings, and side with the most respectable and sane of the democrats: by so doing, you will enlighten and restrain them; and add tenfold to the power of your reason, and the honour of your cause. Do you not see that the whole nation is now divided into two, and only two, parties—the timid, sordid, selfish worshippers of power and adherents of the Court, and the dangerous, discontented, half noble, half mischievous advocates for reform and innovation? Between these stand the Whigs; without popularity, power, or consequence of any sort; with great talents and virtues; but utterly inefficient, and incapable of ever becoming efficient, if they will still maintain themselves at an equal distance from both of the prevailing parties. . . . . I will write you a letter of Edinburgh news by and by; at present I have none, but that old Adam, of the High School, is dead; an excellent, simple creature, and exceedingly useful.

Bolingbroke had been suggested to the great critic and editor as a subject for his own fluent pen, on which occasion we find him delivering this somewhat contradictory response : "I think highly of his style, but not quite so highly as you do; it is altogether noble and easy, but wordy, I think, and weak, and perplexing." This we leave to the learned to settle or reconcile. After the appearance of The Quarterly, Mr. Horner became more and more anxious that his Northern friends should conduct themselves with decorum, propriety, and dignity, and eschew newspaper-like political leaders and flippant personalities. Of The Quarterly he says—

The Quarterly Review was sure to be right about depreciation; being under the command of Canning, who is under the command of Huskisson. I have heard it is George Ellis, who has set Sir John Sinclair upon his black ram. By the way, I wish you would take Sinclair's two pamphlets into your own hands, and make fun of him, in a good-natured way. You would do me a peculiar service, if you will deal with his Currency, as you did with his Longevity. The inconsistency of his opinions at present, with those which he published in 1797, in a pamphlet against the Bank restriction, and which he repeated in the strongest terms in 1803, in the second volume of his History of the Revenue, is rather a matter of grave charge, for which he ought to be put upon the defensive. I am told that George Chalmers has put forth a volume against us, more extravagantly wrong than even Sinclair; perhaps you could contrive to put them side by side into one frame, and exhibit the pair of portraits, like Noodle and Doodle in their old tie and buckle, and in the full complacency of conscious wisdom.

Horner was by this time, though, in the best sense, an able and reputed "Currency Doctor" himself.

While we are about the original projection of literary works, which have since risen to great celebrity and taken a fixed place, it is worth while to commemorate what issued in a work of yet greater importance and permanency than the Edinburgh Review; in the new Edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, which has since been enriched by many more masterly Treatises than those at first contemplated. This entry is from Horner's Journal for 1804:—
